THE CONVENTION.

REPORTED FOR THE CONVENTION.

R. SUTTON, CHIEF REPORTER.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1849.

The members elected to the Convention to re-adopt, amend, or change the Constitution of this State, assembled in the House of Representatives, at the city of Frankfort, in the Capitol of the State, this day, under and by virtue of the provisions of "an act to call a Convention," approved January 13, 1849, in words following, to-wit:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That a Convention, for the purpose of re-adopting, amending or changing the Constitution of the State, be called, to be held, commencing on the first day of October, 1849, and to continue from day to day till the business thereof shall be completed, with power to adjourn and re-assemble at such times as it may deem proper, in the town of Frankfort, in the Capitol of the State; and said Convention shall consist of as many members as compose the House of Representatives, and no more; and they shall be apportioned among the several counties in the same manner and proportion that Representatives are, by the law apportioning Representatives among the several counties, approved February 29th, 1848.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the Sheriffs, and other returning officers, at the next general election to be held for Representatives, after the passage of this act, to open a poll at their several places of voting, for Delegates to said Convention; and all citizens entitled to vote for Representatives shall have the right to vote for Delegates.

SEC. 3. That the Sheriffs shall, within ten days after the election of Delegates to said Convention, severally deliver to each individual who shall have been elected a Delegate, a certificate of his election as a Delegate; and shall, within twenty days after said election, transmit a copy thereof to the Secretary of the State, for the time being, which certificate shall be in the form following, viz: "Be it known to all to whom these presents shall come, That I _____, Sheriff of the county of _____, in my full county, by an election held on the _____ days of August, 1849, by the electors of my said county, qualified according to law, caused to be chosen _____, for my said county, to represent the same in the Convention to be held in the town of Frankfort, on the first day of October, 1849, for the purpose of re-adopting, altering or amending the Constitution of the State. Given under my hand this _____ day of _____, 1849." Provided, That in case of the resignation or death of any member who may be elected a Delegate to said Convention, that in such case the Governor shall, upon information, issue a writ to the Sheriff of the county where such vacancy may occur, authorizing him to hold an election at the earliest time practicable, to elect other Delegates to fill any vacancy thus occurring.

SEC. 4. That the President, Printer, and other proper officers of said Convention, and each Delegate thereof, shall receive, as a compensation for their services, the same allowance and mileage, to be paid by the Treasurer, upon the warrant of the 2d Auditor, as is now allowed by law to the Speakers, Officers, Members, and Public Printer, of the Legislature of the State.

SEC. 5. That the Sheriffs and other officers of the election, shall be liable to all such fines and penalties, for failing to discharge the several duties imposed by this act, as are now imposed upon them, by law, for a failure to perform their duty in conducting other general elections; and all persons who shall be found guilty of casting illegal votes for Delegates, shall be liable to all the pains and penalties now inflicted by law for illegal voting.

SEC. 6. That when two or more counties vote together, the Sheriffs shall meet at the Court House of the county to compare the polls at the same place and time when and where they meet to compare the polls for Representatives; and the certificate to the Delegate from such counties shall be given by the Sheriffs of those counties.

SEC. 7. That the Sheriffs of the several counties in this State shall be governed by the same laws now in force regulating the comparison of the polls for Representatives.

SEC. 8. That said Convention, when so assembled, shall have authority to cause to be printed, at the cost of the State, all such of their proceedings, debates, &c., as deemed proper.

SEC. 9. Be it further enacted, That in case of the failure, by death, sickness, or other cause, of the Sheriff of any county to attend to compare the list of votes in his county, it shall be the duty of the County Court Clerk, or Deputy of such Clerk, to attend with the list of votes of said county, and make the comparison, and in every respect perform the same duties which the Sheriff would have to perform were he acting, and the Clerk to receive the same compensation allowed the Sheriffs for similar services, and shall be liable to the same penalties for a failure to discharge the duties hereby imposed.

Mr. MERIWETHER rose in his seat at 11 o'clock and called the Convention to order. He then said—Gentlemen, as a preliminary step to the organization of this Convention, I propose to call Col. GEO. W. JOHNSTON of Shelby county to the Chair temporarily. Is there any objection? [Several voices—None.] There appears to be no objection to the proposition. Col. Johnston will have the goodness to take the Chair.

Mr. JOHNSTON took the Chair accordingly.

Mr. DESHA moved that Mr. KELLY of Washington county act as Clerk to the Convention temporarily.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. IRWIN then rose and said—A Clerk having been selected, I move that a committee be appointed to wait upon the Secretary of State to obtain a list of the Delegates who have been returned to this Convention.

Mr. HARDIN. I will move to alter that resolution so that it shall read that a committee be appointed to verify the credentials of the members; and let the committee get their information in regard to the credentials, in the best way they can.

Mr. IRWIN. I have no objection.

Mr. GREY. It seems to me that the first plan suggested would be the proper mode of proceeding. The Secretary of State certainly has the correct returns from all the counties in the State of the members elected to this Convention, and it appears to me unnecessary to appoint a committee to examine those credentials. If the Secretary of State will produce the list made from the returns of the proper officers, it will be sufficient; and if there should then be any doubt as to the correctness of the returns in any particular case, there might be a committee appointed to examine and report on the right of the person returned as elected. I see no necessity for going through all these details. It is perfectly useless to examine all these credentials, inasmuch as we have the returns of the proper officers of the several counties. I hope the first motion will prevail, and that the amendment will be withdrawn or voted down. Many members may not have in their possession the certificates delivered to them or returned by the Sheriff of the counties, and I think it would be better that the Secretary of State should return to us a list of members elected which has been the practice in other Conventions.

Mr. HARDIN. It is a matter of very little importance how the credentials are obtained. With regard to the mode of proceeding, appoint a committee and it can report in five minutes. We are not to depend on a Secretary of State. I met Mr. Secretary a few minutes ago upon the stairs, and I mentioned to him that it was probable a committee would be appointed to wait upon him to obtain a list of members as returned by the Sheriffs of the counties. Now suppose some of these certificates should be lost?

One way of proceeding will answer as well as another; but it shows that we are not to depend upon any officer as to who is elected or not. Our committee can ascertain the facts in a few minutes, and if there be a contested election it will require the future action of this Convention.

Mr. IRWIN. I had no idea, being a young man, of taking any interest in the organization of the Convention, but I thought it seemed to be our first duty to call for a roll of delegates. I enquired from the Secretary of State and he informed me that he had a roll already made out, which is now in his office. If we go into an examination as suggested by the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) it will occupy all day. I think it better to take the course first proposed, and if any case of contested election should hereafter appear, it may be investigated by a committee. I insist that the motion shall be put as first presented.

The CHAIR. Do I understand the gentleman from Logan to have accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson?

Mr. IRWIN. No, sir.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was negatived.

The question then recurred on the original resolution, and it was adopted.

The CHAIR. Of how many shall the committee consist?

A MEMBER. Three.

The CHAIR. How shall they be appointed?

A MEMBER. By the Chair.

The CHAIR. If there be no objection, Mr. Irwin, Mr. Meriwether, and Mr. Turner will be the committee.

The committee then retired to wait upon the Secretary of State and in a few minutes returned, when

Mr. IRWIN, on behalf of the committee, reported that they had discharged the duty intrusted to them, and received from the Secretary of State certain papers one of which was the list of members returned, and another was in relation to a contested election or tie vote, all of which he submitted to the Convention.

The CHAIR. If there be no objection the Clerk will call the roll of members to ascertain if there be a quorum in attendance.

The Clerk called the roll accordingly; from which it appeared that the following gentlemen are the OATH OF MEMBERS.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. There is not in the law calling this Convention any form of oath prescribed to be taken by the members of this body; it seems to me however proper that an oath should be administered to support the Constitution of the United States. I will therefore submit a resolution to that effect, if it meet the approbation of the Convention.

The CLERK read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That an oath to support the Constitution of the United States be administered to the members of this Convention.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I move to amend the resolution so that it shall read, "That the members be qualified by taking an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and be faithful and true to the Commonwealth of Kentucky."

Mr. WICKLIFFE. I desire so to modify it.

Mr. HARDIN. I have a form of oath drawn up which I will read to the Convention. It is in these words:

"You solemnly swear to support the Constitution of the United States and to continue true and faithful to the State of Kentucky as long as you remain a member of this Convention."

I think we ought to be true to Kentucky as well as to support the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. The only difference between my colleague and myself is this, that he confines the fidelity of members to the continuance of the Convention, whereas I go beyond it.

The resolution as modified was then adopted.

The members were then called by counties and the oath was administered to them by Chief Justice Marshall, of the Appellate Court.

On the motion of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, by general consent, his resolution was amended by adding the words, "and that the oath be administered by Chief Justice Marshall."

OFFICERS OF THE CONVENTION.

Mr. IRWIN offered the following resolution:

Resolved. That a committee of five be appointed by the Chair, whose duty it shall be to report what officers are necessary to the proper organization of this Convention.

Mr. HARDIN. I had not the pleasure to hear my colleague sufficiently to know what object he has in view. We know very well that according to parliamentary usage, we are to have a President, Chairman, or Speaker, or whatever else he may be called. We know very well that we are to have a Clerk, a Secretary if you please. We know another thing very well, that we are also to have a Door Keeper and a Sergeant-at-

Arms. Whether we shall need an Assistant Clerk and an Assistant Sergeant-at Arms, is a question that may be enquired into hereafter.—How then can the necessity grow up for the appointment of a committee to inquire what officers are necessary? I will ask my colleague where is this committee to get its information? Are they to get it from the Governor? Are they to get it from the Secretary of State? Or, are they to get it from the innumerable candidates who are pressing us here? No. Where then will you get it? What then is your object? We have come here under an expression of public opinion from the mouth of the Big Sandy to Mills Point, and from Louisville to Cumberland Mountain, that there is to be no party here, which will by postponement endeavor to produce an organization that may favor their purposes—though I do not say that such is intended. But we do know that we can now proceed as well in the organization of the House as far as respects the President, the Secretary, a Door Keeper and a Sergeant-at-Arms, as we can after this committee shall have gone into an enquiry on this subject. Of whom the committee shall enquire if they do go out, the Lord in his mercy only knows, for I do not. I hope we shall now proceed. I do not know if there is any chance to get the yeas and nays on this resolution, but I should be glad to get them. I want to see who is for postponement. We know that no good can grow out of it. Every member of this House knows as much as he will know after this committee shall have sat and reported with all possible solemnity to-morrow. If we go to the House of Commons of Great Britain we find that they have a Speaker there. If we go to the House of Lords, we shall find a Chancellor. If we go to the House of Representatives in Congress, we find a Speaker there, and in the Senate a Vice President. Why did we call you to the Chair, sir? Because it was necessary to have some one to put the question, and preserve order. There is no necessity for a committee. I hope we shall now proceed to the election of a President of this Convention.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. My colleague appears a little worried. He ascribes to me the paternity of the resolution, but I did not offer it. The gentleman from Logan had the honor of being the mover of this resolution; but nevertheless the proposition meets my approbation, and I shall with great cheerfulness vote for it—not for the purpose of seeking information abroad from the sources indicated, but in obedience to a propriety of action which should govern a body constituted like this and brought together for the purposes that this is. There is no law—no regulation—no parliamentary rule in existence that applies to this body, prescribing its authority, its powers, or its duties in reference to the election of officers necessary to the proper transaction of its business. There is perhaps a variety of opinion, as to the number of officers that this body should appoint. Whether we shall have the number that has been selected by the Legislative Department of this Government in times gone by, is a question respecting which the committee may well enquire. I therefore most cheerfully agree with the mover of this proposition that it is right and proper that a committee should take the matter in charge and report upon it. We have no resolution to select a Door-keeper or a Sergeant-at-Arms, but we know that these officers will be necessary as well as a presiding officer; and I find that the resolution of the member from Logan is drawn in accordance with the precedents set by conventions in other States—first a temporary organization, and then a committee to report officers. With this explanation, and assigning the authorship of the resolution to its appropriate source, I shall vote for its adoption.

Mr. APPERSON. I have a resolution which I desire to offer as a substitute. It is in these words:

Resolved, That we now proceed to the election of a President to preside over the deliberations of this Convention.

Mr. IRWIN. I will accept the substitute.—I had no particular object in presenting the resolution. I offered it because I thought it the usual course pursued on such occasions, but if the House think it proper to go on now with the election of Officers, I shall make no opposition to that course. Had it not been however for the delay occasioned by the gentleman from Nelson, I have no doubt the report would have been made by this time.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I move that we disagree to the acceptance of the substitute by the member from Logan. I have no idea of a vote of this House being got rid of in that way.

Mr. McHENRY. This seems to me to be a very unusual motion. I am not very well acquainted with parliamentary proceedings, but I have always understood that the mover of a resolution might accept a modification of it at his discretion: the House can then move to amend, but certainly it is not competent for the House to disagree to the gentleman's acceptance of a modification of his proposition. But what I chiefly rose for was to move to amend the proposition of the gentleman from Logan as it now stands, by adding the words, "and proceed to make such election without nominating any particular candidate."

Mr. GUTHRIE. I desire to move an amendment which I hold in my hand:

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed to report what officers are necessary for the better transaction of the business devolving upon the Convention.

The CHAIR. The proposition of the gentleman from Ohio will have precedence.

Mr. IRWIN. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and as I understand it, it now becomes the original proposition.

Mr. APPERSON. I, as the mover of the original resolution have not accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. McHENRY. Well, then, I desire to have it put to the House. As remarked by a gentleman who has preceded me, it is expected in the organization of this body, and in all our proceedings here, that we shall not be governed by party tactics or party policy. If every man shall vote according to the dictates of his own judgment, we shall be more apt to get officers unbiased by party feeling than we shall be by having particular candidates nominated and having those only voted for as heretofore. My only object is to present to the Convention a mode of organization by pursuing which we shall elect officers who will be free from party drill, party bias, and party policy, on either side.

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered, and being taken resulted thus: yeas 55, nays 41. So the amendment was agreed to.

Those who voted in the affirmative were,
 William K. Bowling, Nathan McClure,

 Andrew Hood,

The question was then about to be put on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Guthrie.)

Mr. GUTHRIE. I do not design to go into an argument on this subject. We have met, and many of us are unacquainted with each other, and it is necessary to decide what officers we are to have. We might decide that we would elect first a President, then Clerk, then a Door Keeper, and so on, but it seems to me it would be more in accordance with what is due to a deliberative body that we should determine first what officers are necessary to the transaction of the business and then proceed to their election. Deeming it proper that we should so proceed I have moved the substitute. Of course it is only my individual opinion against the opinion of a distinguished gentleman who moved the original proposition.

Mr. HARDIN. I did not hear very well when the question was stated, and I do not perceive that we have gained anything by the vote that has been taken. I understand now it is upon the simple proposition of the postponement of the election of officers necessary for the complete organization of this House. Well, Sir, do we not know as well now as we will after the committee report, that a President is necessary, that a Secretary is necessary, that a Door Keeper is necessary, and that a Sergeant-at-Arms is necessary. After we have a President and Secretary then this proposition for a further organization of the House can be put to the House. We have every information that this committee can obtain. If the object be that it shall be done with solemnity I am sure it is just as solemn to elect a President now as it will be after dinner or to-morrow morning. At what time is the committee to report? When they please. And when will they please? They may delay as long as they choose. I do hope that we shall now proceed to the election of a President, and then to the election of a Clerk. Whether we go on to the election of a Door Keeper is a matter of but little importance; but let us at least give to the House an organization that we know it needs. I have not heard from either of the gentlemen what is the object to be obtained by the committee. Is it expected that they can get any information that we do not now possess? None in the world. I do hope then that the House will vote down the proposition. I did not understand the nature of the proposition upon which we have voted. I thought it was that we would proceed with the election. I am sure the gentleman from the county of Ohio thought we would have a right to vote for whom we pleased. You may put in nomination A, B, C or D, and I might nevertheless vote for Z, if there were such a name in the Convention. All then that we have obtained by the yeas and nays amounts to nothing. We have been voting on nothing at all, (laughter) and if my friend imagines he has accomplished anything I beg leave to say that he is greatly mistaken.

Mr. TALBOT. There is no member who would regret more than I would to see a difficulty arise. I have a resolution which I think will satisfy all parties, and it is simply to require the committee to report in thirty minutes.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL rose to offer as a substitute a resolution in these words:

Resolved, That the officers of this Convention shall be a President, a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Door Keeper, and a Sergeant-at-Arms.

The CHAIR. The question is first upon the amendment of the gentleman from Boyle.

Mr. TURNER. I understand that we are getting further than any parliamentary law will authorize us to go. This substitute altogether supercedes the original proposition, and it will not be necessary to vote on these different propositions if this substitute be entertained.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I apprehend my friend from Madison is in error. My friend from Montgomery offers the original resolution; the gentleman from Louisville offers a substitute, and the gentleman from Boyle offers an amendment; now the question is, whether the amendment be to the substitute or to the original resolution which has been already amended. If it be to the substitute, it is in order. If it be to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Montgomery, it is in order, for the friends of the resolution may amend and perfect their measure before a vote can be taken upon the substitute.

Mr. TALBOTT. The amendment is offered to the substitute of the Gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Guthrie.)

The CHAIR. I have been under the impression that the friends of an original resolution have a right to perfect it. Even after an amendment has been acted upon, the gentleman's proposition would be in order as a substitute for the substitute.

Mr. TALBOTT. As far as my resolution is concerned, I have no anxiety to press it. I am perfectly ready to go into an election of officers; but if the resolution for that purpose fails, I want to submit an amendment according to the proposition I have offered.

Mr. BROWN. It seems to me we are piling resolution upon resolution, substitute upon substitute, and amendment upon amendment. If I understand the position of the question it is this: the original proposition offered by the gentleman from Logan was amended by the gentleman from Montgomery. The gentleman from Louisville offered a substitute; the gentleman from Boyle now offers an amendment to that substitute; the proper and legitimate question then is on the amendment that is offered to the substitute. The other is out of order until this question is first put.

Mr. NUTTALL. It does seem to me that we are getting things so tangled up here that we had better now, before going further, submit them to this committee and let them untangle them. I understand that what is said and done here is to be reported, and I do not intend to put any thing on paper, or say anything myself that shall be brought up in judgment against me hereafter. One word however in regard to a remark which fell from the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin.) I wish to say that I have no desire to provoke either his satire or his ire. He wants to get rid of the host of candidates here who are seeking the offices which this Convention may make. Now I do not know how it is with him, but down our way just before the August election we like to have the friendship of all such gentlemen as are seeking office here at our hands. This is a Republican Government; and I like to meet all candidates, I do not care whether it is for a Secretary's place, or that of Door-Keeper, or Sergeant-at-Arms, or any other office that they seek. They are free men and have a right to be here, and if they press the gentleman hard I have no doubt he has a very good way of getting clear of them. He can with a wink or a motion of his finger get rid of all candidates for small offices. I think it would be best, if it be within the parliamentary rule, to move to lay all these resolutions on the table for the present, and if I can get any one to second that motion I will make it.

The motion being seconded, the question was put and agreed to.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I discover upon looking at the list of Delegates the name of a gentleman who has not been enrolled and sworn, although he has his credentials in his possession—I mean the gentleman from Casey, (Mr. Coffey.) I desire that he now be registered and sworn as a Delegate to this Convention.

Mr. HARDIN. I would enquire why he was not sworn at first.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. His name was not on the printed list.

Mr. HARDIN. Has he got the certificate of election?

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. He has a certificate of election from the Sheriff.

Mr. TURNER. I have no doubt if the Sheriff of Casey had done his duty, the gentleman was properly entitled to his seat here; but my difficulty is whether he is here in such a manner that we can recognize him as a member. If I understand the facts they are these: The Sheriff of Casey county returned that there was a tie between the gentleman who desires to take his seat and another individual. When he did that his official power was at an end. The official return has remained in the office of the Secretary of State from August until within a few days. Since then the two competitors by agreement between themselves referred the matter to arbitration, and the arbitrators decided in favor of the gentleman who is now here, because four individuals who refused to vote at the commencement of the election, were permitted to come and vote afterwards—contrary to law, contrary to the act of Assembly, and contrary to the usages of parliamentary bodies. Upon that the Sheriff has assumed the power to make another return. Now the difficulty is whether the Sheriff, after having made one return can make another; and whether the gentleman shall be permitted to come in and be qualified now, without having the facts come before us in some other way. I supposed that when the Sheriff had made one return, his function was at an end; but that if a committee were to report that the original return was wrong, and report the facts of the case, it would then be a question for us to determine whether we could not permit him to take his seat. But in the present case I apprehend that the Sheriff's last return is without authority of law and we cannot receive it. I have no doubt that he should have returned this gentleman at first, if the circumstances are as I understand them; but when the gentleman gets his seat I want him to get it according to law.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I am very sure that the Delegate from Casey is properly here, and that if his name had been on the list and he had been called at first he would have been sworn without opposition; and I hope that will be the case now. It is our duty, as I understand it, to identify the members of this body. In the county of Casey there was a contest, and at the close of the polls the Sheriff made out his report in which he stated that there was a tie. There is no provision in the law which covers this case. Vacancies may be filled when caused by death or resignation, but here was a failure to elect, so far as appears by the papers. It appears that the people of Casey county, governed by first principles, determined to supply the omission of the law, and by consent of friends on all sides to submit the poll book to two gentlemen to examine and ascertain which one of them had a majority of the qualified voters of the county of Casey. Where there was a difference of opinion in regard to any vote, an umpire was agreed upon to determine the question. This was done, and the Sheriff though he returned, as I understand, a tie vote to the Secretary's office, has given, upon an investigation by this tribunal, voluntarily, and mutually, friendly and cordially selected by all parties, a certificate of election to the gentleman now present. I therefore see no reason why the gentleman should be kept out of his seat. There will be no law violated, he has certainly been elected by the voters of Casey county, he is now here to be qualified, and I move that he be permitted to take his seat.

The question was taken and the motion agreed to.
Mr. COFFEY then presented himself and the oath was administered to him by Judge James Simpson of the Appellate Court.

ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. APPERSON submitted a resolution as follows:

Resolved, That the officers of this Convention be a President, a Secretary, an Assistant Secretary, a Door Keeper, and a Sergeant-at-Arms, and that we now proceed to the election.

After a brief conversation between Mr. A. K. MARSHALL and Mr. APPERSON on a point of order, the resolution was agreed to.

The CHAIR then announced that nominations for the office of President were in order.

Mr. APPERSON nominated Mr. DIXON.

Mr. HARGIS nominated Mr. GUTHRIE.

Mr. PRESTON enquired how the vote should be taken, whether viva voce or by ballot.

Mr. APPERSON understood that it should be viva voce.

Mr. BULLITT concurred that viva voce was the usual practice, and that it should be adhered to.

The CHAIR announced that the vote would be so taken.

The roll was then called, and the result was announced to be:

Messrs. HUSTON and HARDIN were appointed a committee to conduct Mr. Guthrie to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT having assumed the station to which he had been elected, rose and addressed the Convention as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION:—I return you my sincere thanks for the honor you have conferred upon me, particularly so, as it has been unsolicited on my part, and unexpected. I am unpracticed in the duties of the Chair, though I have been a long time in a deliberative body, and I shall therefore have to claim your kind indulgence, aid and assistance in the discharge of my duties. We have convened here, selected from different counties, and I may truly say in regard to myself, totally irrespective of politics; and I believe it is the case with many of us who are in this Convention. We are to make a Constitution for the people of Kentucky, under which all are to live, and under which the rights of all are to be secured. All that I have to say to the members of the Convention upon this occasion is, that we should practice the same forbearance and discretion that our constituents in selecting us have practiced, and by mutual concession and forbearance endeavor to agree upon the best Constitution—one that will best promote the interests of all. Without saying, more, and with confidence that I shall have the aid and assistance and forbearance of all, I beg to return you my sincere thanks.

The PRESIDENT stated the next business in order to be the election of Secretary, for which office nominations were then in order.

On motion, the Convention adjourned to 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 2, 1849.

The PRESIDENT announced that nominations were now in order for the office of Door Keeper.

Mr. JAMES nominated Mr. JOHN M. HELMS.

Mr. BOYD nominated Mr. C. C. GREEN.

Mr. PRICE nominated Mr. HORACE SMITH.

Mr. McHENRY nominated Mr. ELISHA BROWN.

Mr. STEVENSON nominated Mr. WILL. R. CAMPBELL.

Mr. DESHA nominated Mr. JAMES G. LEACH.
Mr. IRWIN nominated Mr. GREENUP KEENE.

Mr. IRWIN said: While I am up, I desire to say a few words in explanation of the circumstances surrounding the gentleman whom I have put in nomination for Door Keeper. Mr. Keene is a gentleman of intelligence, of very agreeable manners, and I sincerely believe would make a most excellent officer; but the chief merit of his case, sir, consists in the object he has in view with the means to be raised by the salary attached to the office. He is the father of Mrs. James W. Davidson, of the county of Logan, whose husband, some time since, while at the Muhlenburg Court, was stricken down with disease, and died in a few hours. She is an elegant and amiable lady, with several children, in very embarrassed circumstances; and the object of Mr. Keene, the father, is to secure a little home and a few acres of land for his widowed daughter and grand children. Mr. Keene has some claims upon his country. In the war of 1812, he became a soldier, and I understand that a distinguished gentleman upon this floor can bear testimony to his manly bearing. I believe, sir, that in voting for Mr. Keene, we shall not only secure a good officer, but shall have the additional consolation of knowing that we have wiped away the widow's tears and secured a home to the fatherless.

Mr. ROOT nominated Mr. SAMUEL C. BRISTOW.
The vote was taken, with the following result:

Mr. Keene received	-	-	19 votes.
Mr. Helms received	-	-	17 votes.

Mr. Campbell received	-	-	14 votes.
Mr. Leach received	-	-	10 votes.
Mr. Smith received	-	-	6 votes.
Mr. Bristow received	-	-	3 votes.

There being no election, the Convention proceeded to a second vote, Mr. Bristow's name being withdrawn, when

Mr. Keene received	-	-	19 votes.
Mr. Helms received	-	-	17 votes.
Mr. Brown received	-	-	16 votes.
Mr. Green received	-	-	14 votes.

Mr. Campbell received	-	-	13 votes.

On a sixth vote,

Mr. Helms received	-	-	49 votes.
Mr. Brown received	-	-	48 votes.

Mr. Helms having received a majority of all the votes given, was declared duly elected, and he entered upon the discharge of his duties.

RULES OF ORDER.

Mr. MERIWETHER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of seven members, be appointed by the President, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report a set of rules for the government of the Convention.

Mr. MITCHELL moved to substitute, in lieu thereof, the following:

Resolved, That the rules of order which governed the House of Representatives of Kentucky at its late session, be adopted for the government of this Convention so far as they are applicable, and that said rules be referred to a committee, consisting of five members, with directions to report such alterations or amendments as in their judgment may be deemed necessary.

Pending these resolutions, on motion, the Convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 3, 1849.

The Journal of yesterday having been read,

Mr. HARDIN rose and stated, that he had heard some apprehension expressed as to the correctness of the last vote for the Door Keeper of this Convention yesterday. The vote, he was aware, was taken by a very able and experienced Clerk, but it was also taken by members of the Convention, some of whom were of opinion that Mr. Brown received 49 votes, and Mr. Helms 48, and not 49 for Mr. Helms and 48 for Mr. Brown, as reported.

After a brief conversation, it was agreed that the roll should be called, so that if any gentleman's vote was improperly recorded, a correction could now be made.

The roll was called accordingly, and as no error was pointed out, the election of Mr. Helms remained undisturbed.

RULES OF ORDER.

The first business in order, was the consideration of the resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Meriwether, which was in these words:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of seven members, be appointed by the President, whose duty it shall be to prepare and report a set of rules for the government of the Convention.

And the substitute of Mr. MITCHELL as follows:

Resolved, That the rules of order which governed the House of Representatives of Kentucky at its late session, be adopted for the government of this Convention, so far as they are applicable, and that said rules be referred to a committee, consisting of five members, with directions to report such alterations or amendments as in their judgment may be deemed necessary.

Mr. HARGIS said he desired, if it were in order, to offer a substitute for both the resolutions.

Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to digest and report certain rules to govern the action of this Convention, and so far as applicable, that the same shall conform to the parliamentary rules of the Congress of the United States.

He observed, that he was of opinion that this Convention was a little above the Legislature; at least he apprehended their constituents so regarded it.

Mr. MERIWETHER said the difference between the gentleman's proposition and that which he submitted yesterday was simply a difference between "three" and "seven;" for the rules of Congress would be before the committee, and they might select such as in their judgment were applicable. The committee would likewise have before them the rules of the Legislature of Kentucky, from which also, they could make a selection. Why then was it necessary to make any special reference? It was surely a very important question whether a committee should consist of five, three, or seven! A bare amendment to strike out and insert three, five, or seven, would have accomplished the gentleman's object.

Mr. HARGIS was of opinion that there was a difference between the two resolutions. Whether the Parliamentary rules of Congress would be before the committee he was not advised. The resolution spoke only of the rules of the Legislature, and the good people of Kentucky, their constituents, he apprehended, looked for something in this body a little above that.

Mr. MERIWETHER suggested that the gentleman from Morgan and Breathitt had mistaken the substitute of the gentleman from Oldham for the original proposition. The original resolution made no reference to the rules of the Legislature.

Mr. HARGIS replied, that he knew no other proposition; and at his request they were again read.

Mr. MITCHELL said the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, as he understood it, was to raise a committee whose business it would be to digest a system of rules for the government of the Convention; but the object which he had in view, in offering his substitute, was to provide some rules for the immediate government of the Convention until other rules were reported by the committee. The resolution offered here as a substitute, provides that the rules which governed the House of Representatives of Kentucky at its last session, shall be adopted, so far as applicable to this House, and then referred to the committee to report such alterations and amendments as were deemed necessary. Until they did report these would be the rules for the government of this Convention. His object was to facilitate business.

Mr. MERIWETHER said the gentleman's explanation was evidence that his proposition would defeat its own object. The gentleman wished to adopt the rules of the State Legislature. Now, on looking over these rules, it would be found there was one requiring a vote of two-thirds for their alteration. If they were adopted, the report of the committee must first get a vote of two-thirds in order to secure its adoption; and the effect would be to place them in a position where they could get none other than the rules of the Legislature, without a vote of two-thirds, and the question would be eternally arising in the House as to the applicability of a rule—for, "so far as applicable," says the gentleman's proposition. He thought it better to be without rules, for a day or two, than to have those which would create a controversy as to their applicability.

Mr. MITCHELL said the substitute, to him, did not appear obnoxious to the objection made by the gentleman from Jefferson. The adoption of the rules and their reference to a committee would be simultaneous. The resolution is an entire thing, and must be taken together. The power to alter and amend is not posterior in point of time to their adoption. Then, the rule requiring a two-third vote for their alteration would not be applicable, because it would conflict with the power to alter or amend. It might be that questions would occasionally arise as to the applicability of the rules to this body, but it was better to have some rules, even if this question did arise, than to have none at all.

Mr. DAVIS said he comprehended the proposition of the gentleman from Oldham precisely as that gentleman had explained it, and in that form he was opposed to it. He thought the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson a proper one, and that it ought to be adopted. He understood that the rules of the House of Representatives of the State of Kentucky provide for a call for the previous question. The consequence would be, as there was no previous question in committee of the whole, when in the House the previous question might be sprung upon every proposition. He desired in this Convention that every gentleman who offered a proposition for its consideration should have an opportunity of calling for the yeas and nays on every one he might choose to submit. If a proposition were submitted in committee of the whole, and was found to be unacceptable to the majority, he did not want that majority to have an opportunity by going into the House and calling for and sustaining the previous question to stifle and suppress the question on a proposition voted down in committee. In other words, he wanted a system of rules which would enable each member to have a call of the yeas and nays on his proposition in committee of the whole, as well as in the House, and he trusted the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson would prevail, and the committee constituted under it would so establish the rules of this House.

The question was then taken on Mr. MITCHELL'S proposition, and it was rejected, and the original resolution of Mr. MERIWETHER was adopted.

The PRESIDENT then named the following gentlemen as the committee on rules under the resolution just adopted: Messrs. Meriwether, Dixon, Davis, McHenry, Barlow, Mitchell, and Irwin.

MODE OF PROCEEDING.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Mr. President, I rise to submit some resolutions, not proposing any specific proposition to change or alter the Constitution, but to indicate the views which I have at this early hour as to the mode and manner by which we shall approach the labors which lie before us. I desire to have the resolutions read, and if it is the pleasure of the House to consider them now, I will give such explanations as occur to me with regard to them, that they may be comprehended by those who hear me.

Mr. NUTTALL. I would make a suggestion to my friend from Nelson (Mr. Wickliffe.) Had we not better first elect Public Printers? When the important business of the Convention is about to be brought before us in a tangible shape, we ought to be enabled to have the documents printed, that we may form deliberate opinions upon them.

Mr. PRESIDENT. The resolutions are before the Convention, and therefore the proposition of the gentleman from Henry is not now in order.

Mr. NUTTALL. I am aware of that, but I suggest that the gentleman withdraw his resolutions; then we can proceed to the election of a Printer, after which the gentleman's resolutions will be first in order.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The resolutions propose no change of principle; but only indicate the appointment of certain committees to whom the body will refer certain duties to be performed in the preparation of business.

The Resolutions were then sent up to the Secretary's Desk and read as follows:

1. Resolved, That a committee of nine Delegates be appointed, whose duty it shall be to report such "amendments or changes" in the Constitution of Kentucky, as they may deem necessary in the provisions thereof which relate to the election and appointment, term of office, powers and duties of the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Secretary of State, and such other executive civil officers whose duties ordinarily are required to be discharged at the Seat of Government.

2. That a similar committee be appointed to report such "amendments or changes" as may be necessary in the Constitution of Kentucky, in the provisions thereof which relate to the appointment, qualifications, term of office, duties and powers of all other executive or ministerial civil officers whose jurisdiction and powers may be confined to counties, districts, cities, or towns.

3. That a like committee be appointed to report what "amendments or changes" are necessary in that portion of the Constitution of Kentucky concerning the Militia, and the appointment of the officers thereof.

4. That a committee of nine Delegates be appointed to report what "amendments or changes" are necessary to be made in so much of the Constitution of Kentucky as concerns the Legislative Department of the Government.

5. That a committee of fifteen Delegates be appointed to report what "amendments or changes" are necessary in that portion of the Constitution of Kentucky that relates to the Court of Appeals, the appointment of the Judges and Clerk thereof.

6. That a committee, to consist of fifteen Delegates, be appointed to report what "amendments or changes" are necessary to be made in that portion of the Constitution of Kentucky which relates to the appointment of the Judges of inferior Courts, and officers thereof, and the tenure of their offices.

7. That a committee, to consist of Delegates, be appointed to report what "amendments or changes" are necessary to be made in the Constitution of Kentucky in relation to the County Courts, the qualifications and mode of appointment, and the tenure of office of the Justices and Clerks thereof.

8. That a committee, composed of Delegates, be appointed to report what "amendments or changes" are necessary to be made in any of the miscellaneous provisions of the Constitution of Kentucky; and that said committees have power to report from time to time, until their labors are completed.

Mr. WALLER. Mr. President, I wish to offer a resolution as a substitute. Similar resolutions were adopted in the Conventions of the States of Virginia and New York.

The Secretary read the Resolution as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of seven be appointed to inquire and report what method will be most expedient in bringing before the Convention alterations or amendments of the Constitution which may be preferred.

Mr. G. DAVIS. Mr. President, before the substitute is considered I will offer an amendment in the form of an additional resolution to those offered by the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe.)

The Secretary read the Resolution as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed by the President, with instructions to report, in substance, as the first provision of a new, or amended Constitution, that no member of this Convention shall be eligible to any office, or place of trust or profit, established directly by it, or that may be established under the authority of any constitutional provision which it may adopt; or the mode of appointment, or election, to which may be prescribed by any such constitutional provision, or by any such law, until after the expiration of ten years from the ratification and approval of this Constitution by the qualified voters of this Commonwealth.

Mr. IRWIN. At this distance I could not distinctly hear the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon (Mr. Davis,) but so far as I could understand, it seems to me to cut off every gentleman in this House from any office to be created by the Constitution. (Laughter.) If I am correct in my understanding, before this resolution shall have been adopted I feel some disposition to resign. (Renewed laughter.)

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I did not in the prolet I drew in my resolutions, borrow from any system adopted as I am aware by any Convention of a sister State, as I had not access to the journals of any other State. I am therefore entirely responsible for the propriety of these resolutions, and I desire that they may not be encumbered, when they are only intended to enable the presiding officer of this body, if in accordance with the views of the delegates, to go to work and select committees, to whom certain duties devolving on us under the law calling the Convention, may be assigned. Of course there is nothing in these resolutions, which expresses directly or indirectly, or desires to extract the opinions of any member of this House upon any principle either of the Constitution to be framed, or any change of the present Constitution or amendment thereof. I should carefully abstain from thus early introducing such a resolution myself; but to enable us to do this work, I think we should have something of system or order, and certain duties and labors assigned and apportioned out among the members thereof.—Hence it was that I proposed the appointment of different committees. There should devolve on one committee, the duty of examining the present Constitution with reference to the Executive department of the government; another with reference to the Legislative department; another, with reference to the Judicial department; and then the miscellaneous provisions of the Constitution. These committees, composed of the delegates of this House, selected by the judgment of the presiding officer, would immediately go to work.—They would make a report to-day, or to-morrow, or the next day, of so much of their labor as they had prepared,—say connected with the Executive department,—calling it if you please, number one. That will then be placed upon your calendar as an order of the day. Another will be prepared to report in part, the duties allotted to them. They have examined, deliberated upon, and digested the work; have consulted, and carefully put together the result of their labors in a manner and in language that cannot possibly be misunderstood. We can then take up those reports from day to day, and if it is the desire of the House, we can discuss them here, and if necessary the committee may explain, and any member of the House will be at liberty to offer amendments and have a vote taken upon them. And when it is perfected, we can take the vote on its engrossment and lay it aside as so much labor finished, to be put together in the mode hereafter to be agreed upon by the House. The proposition of the Delegate from the county of Bourbon, might be very appropriate as a matter of instruction to the committees, or a separate committee might be raised, and instructed to put such a proposition in the Constitution as would have that effect. But it seems to me not appropriate to the resolution which I had the honor to submit to this House. If the object of the resolutions I submitted is understood, I desire not to consume the time of the House; and if they desire further time to reflect and examine a better plan than I have submitted, I will cheerfully postpone their consideration. Certainly I cannot vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Bourbon, because it involves a great principle. I do not know that I have so great an objection to it as my young friend from Logan (Mr. Irwin,) for I certainly have no idea of holding office under the new Constitution.

Mr. NUTTALL. I wish to superadd to the amendment of the gentleman from Bourbon the following: "provided however, that this amendment shall only apply to such members of this Convention as shall vote for the same."

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. It seems to me that this is a very important step which we are about to take, and it is one which I am not disposed to vote upon at present. This resolution is to govern the future action of the Convention, as I understand it, and should be fully examined. I therefore move that it be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I believe that motion is subject to debate. I made my proposition in all good faith, and should be greatly gratified myself to see this Convention, if they think it proper, adopt it. It is not the presentation of a new principle to me, but a new application of one found both in the Federal and our own State Constitution, and as I think not an unimportant and useless one as proposed in the amendment I have offered. I will call the attention of the gentleman from Henry, (Mr. Nuttall,) and of the Convention to the clause in each Constitution. I do not know that the amendment suggested by my very respected friend from Henry would have any personal application to himself, because I am not satisfied that the effect and tendency of my amendment would in any way be to exclude him from any place under any Constitution. [Laughter.] If it had the effect to exclude myself, why I should have no sort of objection to it—none. What I have said is in pure good humor to my respected friend, for whose talents and abilities I have the highest respect, and to whom I am ready to tender my personal regard and friendship; and I should feel some distress to be sure if he should be cut off from any office or the country lose the great advantage of his talents and experience. Any proposition I have made here, I trust, will be fraught with no such catastrophe, either to himself or the country.

In the Constitution of the United States, Sec. 6, of the 1st Article, the second clause reads thus:

"No member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives shall, during the time for which he shall have been elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created or the emoluments whereof increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either house during his continuance in office."

The provision of our own Constitution I presume was borrowed by the wise men who framed it from the words just read from the Federal Constitution. It is as follows:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, or for one year thereafter, be appointed or elected to any civil office of profit under this Commonwealth, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased, during the time such Senator or Representative was in office, except such offices or appointments as may be made or filled by the elections of the people."

Now I propose an extension and application of this principle of exclusion from office to those who are to make offices, the members of this body, and that this exclusion shall have effect and operation for a term of ten years. It is not a total exclusion, but its extent will depend on the innovation and change which this body may make upon the existing Constitution, and according to my best care and deliberation I drew it up to have that restricted operation. If this Convention by any constitutional provision should establish a new office, every member of it, if my proposition should prevail,—including myself, who will vote for it, and including my respected friend from Henry who I presume will vote against it—would be necessarily excluded from office. And so it is meant for myself. If the provisions of the Constitution should authorize the Legislature to create and establish other offices, and the Legislature under the authority of such a provision or provisions should pass laws for the establishment of other offices, why, in like manner, he and myself would be excluded from appointment or election to those offices? There is another branch of the resolution that provides that where the mode of appointment or of election shall have been changed by this amended or new Constitution, or by any law passed under its authority, this exclusion shall have application to such cases also. If the office of Governor or Lieut. Governor remains intact by this body, no gentleman aspiring to those high positions, under the effect and operation of my amendment, would be excluded from them. If the term of these offices is deemed too long, it might be limited to three or two years, and still the prohibition not extend to any member of this Convention. If there should be a change made in the organization of the Legislative department of the Government—for example, that its election should be biennial, and that unless convened on extraordinary occasions by the Governor, its sessions should be, by the Constitution, restricted to once in two years—which I hope will be a provision and feature in the new Constitution—every gentleman who should vote for that provision would be eligible to seats in either branch of the Legislature. If the mode of appointing Judges should remain the same as it is under the existing Constitution, and to my mind, there will be great if not insuperable difficulty in improving that mode, although it is objectionable to myself—still, if that mode should be preserved under a new Constitution, and the Judges be required to hold their offices for a limited time—which principle I should like to see adopted in the Constitution—every gentleman on this floor will be eligible to the judicial offices of the State. So that I beg leave to inform my young friend from Logan, or at least so recently from Logan, that he will pardon me for forgetting his locality—and to my friend from Henry, that the provision which I have submitted to the consideration of the Convention, is not as sweeping as a superficial view would authorize gentlemen to infer.

Now I do not know, and indeed have no hope, unfortunately, that the proposition will prevail; nevertheless it has as much of my confidence, and will have from me as steady and as earnest a support, though I stand solitary and alone in uttering my voice in its favor, as if it was to receive the unanimous sanction of this body and the people of this State. I believe it to be right, and that it would work good to our constituency and the country. I will add one or two arguments why I believe it will not prevail. Under the existing system, and the principles of our present Constitution, a great, powerful, and talented party, consisting of nearly one half of the voters of Kentucky, are excluded from executive appointments. I admit it to be a wrong. I maintain that in all our governments, General and State, the mass of the important political offices, those that mould the administration and give character to it—the executive administration and the active politics of the government—ought to be filled with the friends of that government. But when you come to judicial and minor ministerial offices, I utterly condemn and abhor that piratical principle that would eject men from such places because they dared to think for themselves, and to entertain principles, and to cherish systems of policy not acceptable to the incumbents having the appointing power. Such a principle is oppression and tyranny, and I would like to see the free people of this country trample it in the dust and annihilate it. I admit that it is wrong and unjust to exclude the great Democratic party in this State from all executive appointments. We see them ruffled against the present mode as one man, and why? Because the present system entirely excludes them from these places, these judicial offices, and authorizes their filling by executive appointment. I am not prepared to say that any system we may introduce in its stead would be better. We are all frail and erring. No human institution is perfect. No system that the experience and wisdom and virtue of man can devise will ever work infallibly. None! On this subject I have no fixed principles or predilections. I want light—to interchange views and feelings and sentiments with my associates in this body. I want the best system that can be devised by the reflection, experience, wisdom, and patriotism of this body, to be thrown before it for its fair and unrestricted consideration; and if I know myself, when that system is addressed to me, and conforms to the dictates of my conscience and judgment, I am prepared to adopt it, come from what source it may. But I am utterly and irreversibly opposed to the election of the judiciary by the popular vote. I am equally inflexible in my opposition to the election of the judiciary by the vote of the two Houses of the Legislature. On the other hand, I see how impracticable and vain would be any proposition that did not concede something to this party that has been entirely excluded from these offices. The organization which at present seems to me most proper, but which I will cheerfully yield to any proposition that on reflection appears to me better, is this: That when the Legislature convenes, and there is a vacancy in a judicial office, the members of the House of Representatives from the district in which such vacancy exists, shall get together and form themselves into an electoral college, and shall name for the office two candidates—two gentlemen resident within the district—and shall nominate them to the Senate, which body shall nominate one of them to the Governor, and he shall receive the commission of the Commonwealth as Judge of the district. I would like some such system as that—something that would do justice to both of the great parties in this State.

While our friends constitute numbers nearly as great as ourselves, embodying talents, virtue, and patriotism nearly or quite as great as we do, I regard it as unjust and oppressive that they should be excluded from all these offices. If any one of the number of the able men of that party on this floor, whose reflection and experience will enable him to devise a system that will secure something like equal justice to both parties—that will at the same time avoid the violence, the corruption, the bribery, and the great train of ills that will follow the popular election of the judicial officers of this Commonwealth, and will prevent the offices being thrown into the Legislature of the State for scramble and intrigue—I say, if any gentleman will devise a better system than the one I have introduced, I will thank him for myself, and will most cordially adopt it. I did not intend to debate this proposition, but to throw it out, not for present action or discussion, but that members might think and ponder upon it, and if they came to the conclusion that it was worthless—reject it. If it deserved a better consideration, they could give it to it—but I think now is the proper time—at the very threshold of our deliberations—to offer it. If it was possible by my vote to cut off the members who are to frame a Constitution, from all political office and hope, and even from every party tie, I would cast such a vote. I would say that they should stand aloof, as impartial, unsullied, pure, unsuspected arbiters among contending partizan factions. They should form a government for the present and for posterity. They should have no political object or hope beyond that work. If that work was badly done, it would be sufficient evidence that they ought not to be trusted with any other. If it was well done, it would, in my opinion, afford a just and sufficient fame to satisfy the ambition of any properly organized mind. I would not only exclude them from office under the State, but under the general government. I would cut them off as far as practicable from being partizans. They should know none of the motives, personal or private, that operate upon the human mind and conscience, to debauch it and to pervert it to wrong conclusions. None! But I will add nothing more on this subject at present, but to express the hope that gentlemen will give this subject, as I have sought to give it myself, a careful examination, and if they are not satisfied with it and think it ought to be rejected, I shall feel no disappointment at the result.

Mr. HARGIS. When the gentleman offered his resolution, it appeared to me that perhaps his intention was to defeat any Constitution which this Convention might make. I do not know that I clearly apprehended the gentleman's object, but I think I am not mistaken when I say that the citizens of his county voted, by a considerable majority, in favor of calling the Convention. If then the citizens of his county voted for calling the Convention and elected him a member of it, how is it that he offers a resolution which I cannot but think was offered with the intention of defeating any Constitution which this Convention may make. He seems to mourn for the fate of the democratic party of Kentucky. I did not expect to hear much, in this place, in regard to the democratic party, or in regard to the party of which the gentleman is a member. We were not elected for party purposes. If the gentleman comes here with the intention of defeating the very object of the Convention—with the intention of securing the rejection of any Constitution which this Convention may make—I imagine that when he goes back to his constituents, they will tell him that he has not truly represented their will and wishes. The people have expressed their will, and have sent us here not to act upon principles of party policy. No, Sir, but to change the organic law of the State, and to make it conform to their will and wishes. What is the great object which is to be accomplished by us? Is it not to change the mode of appointment of the various important officers of the State? The Judiciary is one class of those officers. The duration of their offices, as those offices are at present constituted, is highly objectionable to the people. No mode of appointment, the gentleman says, can be perfect—no system of government can be perfect. That is true; but if there be any mode on earth by which appointments can be made that is as pure and as free from corruption as when made by the sovereign people, I acknowledge that I am mistaken. The people are the sovereignty of the State, and the power belonging to the people is that power which regulates the interests and welfare of this great Commonwealth. When the government is in the hands of the people, it is near and dear to them. Then why should we trust to any other power than that of the people of the Commonwealth to do this important work? I mean, to appoint the high officers of government—those officers who derive the pay for the services they render directly from the people. Who, I say, can be better qualified to appoint those officers than the people themselves? It would be a shame to deprive them of it; and I should be very reluctant to see my name enrolled with those who would deny to the people the privilege of making such appointments. I should be equally reluctant to favor the proposition that no member of this Convention should hold office for the next ten years. I should be ashamed that it should go forth to the world, that this Convention passed a resolution that no one of its members should hold office under the Constitution that we may make, within a period of ten years. I would ask the gentleman where he ever found a precedent for such a resolution? If such should be adopted, I apprehend both he and myself would be quite too old afterwards to participate in the affairs of the government. It strikes me, that we are pretty well advanced in years already. I do not know that he entertains any wish to receive an appointment, but I have no doubt there are friends of the gentleman who would not be so reluctant to render their services to the State.

But at all events I have more confidence in the members of this Convention, than to be willing to declare that they shall not hold office under the new Constitution for a period of ten years. I want to show that we are not ashamed or afraid to submit the work of our hands to our constituents, and if it be found that we have been good and faithful servants, perhaps the people may desire that we should continue in their service.

The gentleman says, let the Districts nominate two persons to the Senate for the office of Circuit Judge and let the Senate determine between them. But would not that defeat the very intention which the gentleman professes to have in view? If you should have a Whig Senate would they not be very apt to appoint a Whig Judge? Or if the Senate should be Democratic would not the appointee be a man of their own politics? Why not then, to avoid this dilemma, refer the matter to the people themselves? If, sir, the people are the sovereign power of the State, which they are,—if they support and uphold the State, which they do,—for they pay for the services of their officers—ought they not to have the right to appoint those officers? And ought they not to have the right to say how long they shall serve, and to have the right also to say whether those who have served them already in one capacity shall continue to serve them in a different capacity? But do not understand me as saying that I would place a man before the people for a high office unless he were a man of high standing. For instance, in the case of the appointment of a Judge, I would require that the candidate should be a man of long experience at the bar. Although I belong to the Democratic party, a fact which I believe is very well known, so far from placing before the people for appointment a man not duly qualified, I would require full and complete qualification and fitness in all candidates for office. I would not only have them qualified to discharge the duties of the office, but I would have them to be residents of the Districts in which their duties are to be performed. I would not only have the appointments of the Judges made by the people, but I would leave to the people the election of all officers whom they are to pay for their services. As regards the Secretary of State, Auditors, and such other officers, I would not insist upon their appointments being made by the people; but as regards those officers who reside in the various Districts, and whose services are to be there discharged, the people are better qualified to elect them than any other tribunal. There is a great deal that I might add upon this subject, but I do not desire to consume the time of the Convention. I merely wish to throw out these suggestions, and I would be glad to hear the opinions of gentlemen on both sides upon a matter as important as this is. Indeed I do not know that any remarks upon this subject are in order at this time. The subject seems to have been brought forward prematurely.

Mr. NUTTALL. I do not myself believe that this is the proper time for the discussion of this question. Nor do I think it is a time for the indulgence of pleasantry; and, perhaps, had I sufficiently considered what was due to self-respect, I should not have offered the amendment to the gentleman's resolution. I shall now ask leave to withdraw it, and at the same time tender my respects to the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis,) for whom I have always entertained a high regard. I shall not however vote in favor of the gentleman's proposition, because I prefer to save to the country the benefit of his ability and talents, (laughter,) for I am well assured, that the country would never be able to progress without the aid of his distinguished talents. (Renewed laughter.)

Mr. CLARKE. I do not intend to present to the consideration of the Convention, any projet or plan of change necessary to be made in the Constitution of the State; nor will I detain the Convention more than a few minutes. I have read with some care and particularity, the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, and I have only to remark, that the principle that is therein attempted to be applied to the members of this Convention, has never been applied to the members of any Convention in this Union which has assembled for the purpose of forming a Constitution. I am aware that in the Constitution of the United States, and I believe that in the Constitution of every State in the Union, there is a provision that no member of a Legislative body, who shall be engaged in the creation of any office, shall be appointed or promoted to that office, during his term of service in the body by which the office was created. If I understand the position of the gentleman from Bourbon, it is this—it seems at least to resolve itself into the enquiry—what is the creation of an office? If a change be made in the manner and mode of appointment, does the gentleman mean that such change shall be considered as the creation of a new office? I certainly so understand the gentleman. If I misunderstood him, I would be glad to be corrected.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman does misunderstand me. That is a distinct class of cases. The gentleman will find that there are two classes provided for in the resolution; first, those cases where offices are newly created; secondly, those in which there is only a change or modification in the manner of appointment.

Mr. CLARKE. And am I to understand that the gentleman intends that in this latter case it shall be considered as the creation of a new office?

Mr. DAVIS. I do not pretend to determine; but my proposition is to this effect: that where any action is had by the Convention itself, or by legislation occurring under the provisions which we may adopt, which may operate merely to change the mode of appointment of public officers, it will form a distinct class of cases to which the restriction shall or shall not apply according to the nature of the change produced.

Mr. CLARKE. Yes, I understand. Now I have no idea that this Convention will create in that sense any new office whatever; but I do expect and I trust that expectation will be verified by the ultimate action of this Convention, that there will be a change in the mode of electing almost every officer in the State. For my own part, I desire that there should be a change in the mode of electing the Judges of the Court of Appeals, and indeed I may say I desire to see almost every officer elected by the people of the State over whom they exercise jurisdiction or power. At present I will not argue this question, but I must say that I cannot come to the conclusion that, by a mere change in the mode of the appointment of a Judge, by the action of this Convention, you create a new office. If you have a Circuit Judge now appointed by the Governor whose appointment is confirmed by the Senate, his functions are the same as they would be if he were nominated by the people of the State and confirmed by the Senate. The resolution seems to me ambiguous. It leaves open a controversy which in aftertimes will grow up, if a gentleman of this Convention should aspire to an office, whether it was an office created by the Convention, or an office where merely the mode of appointment had been changed. Instead of shutting out difficulties hereafter, it will only produce doubt and controversy that can never be settled without calling a new Convention. As I remarked, I did not rise to make a speech. I merely wished to understand the true construction to be given to the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon. I am not prepared to vote for his resolution, but shall vote for the motion to lay it, together with the amendment and the substitute, on the table.

Mr. DIXON. I do not rise with the intention of taking any part in this discussion, for I am very well satisfied myself that it is wholly irrelevant to our present business. This is not the proper time for the discussion of this question; the principle which is involved in it will come properly before us for discussion after the various propositions which ought to be submitted to us shall have been reported upon by their appropriate committees. I am anxious to get forward with the business for which we have been sent here, and I am averse therefore to entering upon a discussion of this nature at this time. I understand there is a motion now pending to lay the original resolution and the amendment and substitute on the table. I do not know any good reason why they should not be laid upon the table and printed. I hope that we shall now proceed to adopt some rule by which our business will be facilitated that we may satisfy the country that we are in earnest in going about the duties that have been entrusted to us. I would further remark that I do not think that the subject is now properly debateable. Although we have not yet adopted specific rules for our guidance, yet we ought to be governed by a due regard to an economy of time with a view to the dispatch of business.

Mr. DAVIS. A motion to lay on the table and print is debateable.

Mr. DIXON. The debate then should be confined strictly to the question of printing. When the question does come up, I shall be glad to hear the opinions of gentlemen on all sides, but really it appears to me that this is not the proper time.

Mr. HARDIN. I rise only to make one or two suggestions to the mover of these resolutions. There is a great deal in them which deserves mature deliberation, and it would be well to have them before us in a printed form, and that they should be referred to the committee of the whole, and made the order of the day from day to day. I want at the proper time to submit my views upon the subjects embraced in them. I do not intend to do it now. I wish it to be remembered, however, that every office in this government, from the Governor down, has to be re-filled under the new Constitution. The terms of the resolutions appear to me to be too broad; indeed I do not think that my honorable friend, himself, intended that they should go to the extent which their language would imply. I differ from him, too, as to the election of a Judiciary, but I will give my reasons on a future day.

At the suggestion of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, the resolutions were laid on the table until tomorrow, and were ordered to be printed.

ELECTION OF PRINTERS.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL offered the following resolution which was adopted, viz:

Resolved, That William Tanner and John W. Finnell be, and they are hereby, appointed Printers to this Convention.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. TURNER offered the following resolutions, viz:

1. Resolved, That all the officers of Government should be elected at stated times, either directly or indirectly by the qualified voters of the county or district in which the officer is to serve.

2. Resolved, That elections should continue but one day, and votes should be cast viva voce; and to enable the electors to cast their votes in one day, the counties should be divided into townships of not exceeding two hundred electors, and an election held in each township.

3. Resolved, That members of the House of Representatives of the State Legislature should be elected for two years, and of the Senate for four years—one half of the latter to go out every two years. The Legislature to sit biennially, subject to be called together by the Governor. No person shall be eligible to either House who has not resided in Kentucky years, and who is not a citizen of the United States. No person shall be eligible to the Senate who has not attained the age of thirty-five years, or to the House of Representatives who has not attained the age of twenty-five years.

4. Resolved, That the Legislature shall have no power to grant divorces, but shall, by law, authorise the courts to do so. The Legislature shall have no power to pass any local or special law, unless three-fifths of all the members elected to each House, by yeas and nays, concur in its passage.

5. Resolved, That the General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owners. They shall pass laws to permit the owners to emancipate them, saving the rights of creditors: Provided, The persons emancipated shall be sent out of the United States at the expense of the person who emancipates them, and be sold into bondage for the benefit of the public Treasury, in case of their return to Kentucky.

6. Resolved, That no persons shall henceforth be slaves within this Commonwealth, except such as are now so and the descendants of the females of them, and such as may be brought to this State by bona fide emigrants and the descendants of the females of them, and such as citizens of Kentucky shall derive title to out of the State by marriage, devise, or descent, and the descendants of the females of them.

7. Resolved, That the Supreme Appellate Court of the State should consist of four Judges, who should hold their offices for the term of eight years, subject to removal by impeachment or address—no person to be eligible to the office except a licensed Attorney who has attained to the age of thirty years, and who has actually resided in Kentucky for years, and is a citizen of the United States—one Judge to go out every two years, but to be re-eligible.

8. Resolved, That no person should be eligible to the office of Judge of any inferior court, who has not attained the age of thirty years, and who is not a licensed Attorney and a citizen of the United States, and who has not resided in Kentucky years. They should hold their offices for the term of eight years, subject to removal by impeachment or address—one-fourth to go out every two years, and to be re-eligible.

9. Resolved, That no religious test or property qualification shall be required to entitle a citizen to vote or hold office.

10. Resolved, That instead of the mode pointed out in the present Constitution for calling a Convention to re-adopt, amend, or change the same, the persons legally authorised to vote shall, every year after the adoption of the new Constitution, at the stated elections for members of the Legislature, cast their votes on the propriety of calling a Convention, and if a majority of all the legal voters of the State shall vote for the call of a Convention, two years in succession, then the next Legislature shall pass a law for holding a Convention; but if such majority do not so vote either year, then at the end of years from that time, a similar vote shall be taken, and so on every years, until the requisite majority shall vote two successive years for the call of a Convention.

11. Resolved, That writs of error, from the inferior courts to the Court of Appeals, should be allowed to the accused in criminal prosecutions.

12. Resolved, That any amendments to the present Constitution, which this Convention may adopt, shall be submitted to the qualified voters of this Commonwealth for approval, and if not approved by a majority of those who cast their votes, such amendments shall not take effect, but the present Constitution shall still remain in full force until changed according to its own provisions.

The resolutions having been read,

Mr. TURNER said, in offering these resolutions, I am not vain enough to expect that they will all meet the views of a majority of the Convention. They are thrown out merely as suggestions for the consideration of the Convention among other propositions that may be submitted. Indeed there are some of them that I have considerable doubt about myself. I intend to act here upon deliberation and not upon preconceived opinions. I have drawn them up with some attention, however, and I hope they may be received and such consideration given to them as may be deemed proper. It may be doubtful whether we ought to debate propositions of this sort until after the committees have been appointed and have examined and reported upon them. But it appeared to me that it would be appropriate at this time to present the resolutions in order that the attention of members might be drawn to them, and that they might, at the proper time, be referred to the committee of the whole. The opinion has been expressed that it would be better to let the committees mature the different subjects which will be brought up for our deliberation before any opinions are expressed upon them in this body. On the other hand, it is said that it would be perfectly right and proper to discuss the great principles involved in these various propositions; but I have drawn up the resolutions and presented them at this time with the view that the attention of the Convention may be drawn to them. I hope they will be printed, and that they will come up at the proper time, and that they will be referred to the committee of the whole Convention in connection with the reports of the various committees.

The resolutions were laid upon the table, and were ordered to be printed.

DAILY JOURNAL.

Mr. WALLER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Printers to the Convention be, and they are hereby, directed to print six hundred copies of the Journal of the Convention.

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend by striking out "600" and leaving the blank to be filled hereafter.

The motion was agreed to, and the resolution was then laid on the table.

SEATS OF MEMBERS.

Mr. McHENRY offered the following resolution, and it was laid over, and made the special order after reading the Journal in the morning:

Resolved, That this Convention will now assign seats, by lot, in the following manner: The Secretary shall put the names of the members on separate papers, as near alike as may be, in a box, and proceed to draw them out, one at a time, shaking the box before every drawing, and each member shall, as his name is drawn, select his seat, and have a right to occupy the same during the session of the Convention.

DISCUSSION OF PROPOSITIONS.

Mr. DIXON offered the following resolution, and on the suggestion of Mr. Meriwether it was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved, That no original resolution, offered to the Convention, proposing any amendments to the Constitution, shall be discussed on its merits, till it shall have been referred to the appropriate committee.

COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERS offered the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the people of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, in ordering and calling this Convention, desired not to abolish, but to alter and amend their existing State Constitution; and that, to enable the Convention to determine what amendments are required, it is expedient to appoint six committees, to consist of — members each, to whom the appropriate divisions of the Constitution, with the amendments that may be offered to the same may be referred; and that the first of said committees be styled The committee on the Legislative Department; the second, The committee on the Executive Department; the third, The committee on the Judicial Department; the fourth, The committee on Slavery; the fifth, The committee on General Provisions; the sixth, The committee on the mode of revising the Constitution.

Mr. KAVANAUGH submitted the following as a substitute:

1. Resolved, That a committee of ten be raised to ascertain the number of standing committees necessary to facilitate the deliberations and business of the Convention; and that said committee report the same, together with a proper designation of each of said committees.

2. That, in order to form said committees, the delegates, collectively, from the counties of each congressional district of the State, shall select one of their own number as a member of said committee, and report such selection to-morrow morning.

On motion both propositions were laid upon the table and ordered to be printed:

Mr. THOMPSON submitted the following, of which the same disposition was made:

Resolved, That the preamble, and first article of the Constitution of this Commonwealth be referred to a committee of five members; that the second article thereof be referred to a like committee of five members; that the third article be referred to a like committee of five members; that the fourth article be referred to a committee of nine members; that the fifth article be referred to a committee of five members; that the sixth article be referred to a committee of five members; that the seventh article be referred to a committee of five members; that the eighth article be referred to a committee of five members; that the ninth article be referred to a committee of five members; that the tenth article be referred to a committee of five members; and that the schedule in said Constitution be referred to a like committee of five members; the members or said several committees to be appointed by the President; and that said several committees report to this Convention, for its action, such amendments as to them shall seem proper, to the several articles of the Constitution to them referred.

ANOTHER MEMBER.

Mr. MICHAEL L. STONER, from the counties of Cumberland and Clinton, appeared and took his seat.

ADMISSION OF A REPORTER.

Mr. PRESTON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That H. M. McCarty, reporter for the Louisville Courier, be admitted to the floor of this Convention, and have the privilege of a reporter's desk.

He presumed there would be no inconvenience attending it, and he hoped the privilege would be extended to this gentleman.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The subject of reporting the debates of this body, is one which has not yet attracted the attention of its members. It seems however to have engaged the attention of the Legislature, by which the act for assembling this Convention was passed. How far this body will adopt what has been done by the Legislature, it is not for me to indicate. If the resolution be passed to admit this gentleman, every reporter from every paper in the State, who may present himself, will be entitled to the same privilege, and it is a subject which I think is worthy of a little consideration, how far this privilege ought to be extended, and how far this body will acquiesce in the course which the Legislature has pursued. I do not desire now to express any opinion as to the propriety of that legislative action. I supposed that the question would have been called for, and that there would ere now have been an expression of the body in regard to it. For one I may be permitted to say that I have no objection to that course. The object which I had in rising was to ask the gentleman to postpone this matter for a little, that members may see how far they will be inconvenienced by reporters' desks in this Hall. We may have conflicting reports in the different papers, and I think at least that we might take a few hours to reflect, because, if the privilege be conferred upon the individual whose application is before us, we must extend it to all others. Certainly we cannot make a distinction. Therefore I think it is a question which is worthy of a little reflection. I hope the gentleman will consent to let the resolution lie upon the table.

Mr. PRESTON. I would willingly consent to the proposition made by the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe,) but I believe it will be useless and only take up the time of this House about a matter that is not of much importance at any time. I did not intend to present this resolution to-day to the interruption of any material business, and should have postponed it, but that I was afraid that to-morrow important matters would be brought up in committee of the whole, and that it might then be more inconvenient to present it. I know that in Congress a great many Reporters are admitted, there being thirty States of the Union interested in their proceedings, but so far from that being the case here, it would have been almost impossible to have obtained a Reporter, had it not been for the action of the Legislature. This proposition, however, is not to appoint a Reporter, or that he shall be paid by the State, but only that a Reporter, who proposes to report gratuitously, be admitted upon the floor. It cannot produce an inconvenience as the gentleman seems to apprehend. I certainly would be the last to desire to encumber or embarrass the Convention. Another thing has been alluded to by the gentleman, and it is the probability of having contradictory reports. We have an official report prepared by a very skilful Reporter appointed for us by the State. It is probable that no other may desire the privilege except two or three from our own State—perhaps from Maysville and one or two others—and no disadvantage can possibly arise from this arrangement; perhaps our debates may be more correctly presented, for no Reporter can keep his attention so constantly fixed that he may not be sometimes in error. I believe the House will sustain no inconvenience by giving the privilege to this Reporter, nor do I believe that we shall be encumbered by numerous applicants for the same privilege, and I can see no reason why he should not be admitted; nor can I see any good reason for postponement of the question. It will take more time perhaps to-morrow than it would now. It is certainly more convenient to settle it now, I think, and therefore I must respectfully dissent from the proposition of my friend for its postponement.

The question was then taken on the resolution, and it was declared to be rejected.

Mr. PRESTON. Will it be permissible under the rules of the House to call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT remarked that it was now too late.

Mr. NUTTALL and Mr. CLARKE both rose, and as an act of courtesy to the gentleman from the city of Louisville, to afford him an opportunity to call for the yeas and nays, moved a reconsideration.

Mr. MERIWETHER. The suggestion which I am about to make will probably settle the matter. There can be no necessity for the admission of this Reporter, because by subscribing to the Daily Commonwealth, the Louisville Courier can obtain all the Reports as correctly as by having a Reporter here, and at as early a period, for the published official reports will reach Louisville by the same mail by which the communication of any Reporter can be forwarded. The gentleman, I think, is also mistaken as to the number of applications that we shall have for the same privilege, for I have already had three such applications made to myself.

Mr. BULLITT. I was one of those who opposed the proposition of the gentleman from Louisville. It seems to me that there is no necessity for granting the privilege in this case; and, besides, before voting to admit any one, we should consider, that if we extend it in one case, we must grant the same privilege to all applicants. I would grant the privilege to those of my own neighborhood sooner than any other, but I oppose the proposition on the ground that we cannot make a distinction.

Mr. TURNER. I believe I shall vote for this man's having this privilege though rather against my judgment, for I believe that the paper for which the privilege is asked is an emancipation paper, and I wish to let him tell all he can.

Mr. HARGIS briefly spoke in opposition.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to lay the motion for reconsideration on the table.

Mr. PRESTON desired to have the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. CLARKE said he had made the motion for reconsideration to afford the gentleman from Louisville an opportunity to call for the yeas and nays.

Pending this motion the Convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 4, 1849.

RULES OF ORDER.

Mr. MERIWETHER, by consent, from the committee on rules, reported a series of rules for the government of the Convention, which were read.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted an amendment, and moved that the report and amendment be laid upon the table and printed.

Mr. MERIWETHER suggested that as there were but few changes from the rules of the Senate, it would be desirable to consider them now.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFE said he should vote for the printing. There were some of the rules which did not meet his approbation, and hence he wished to have an opportunity to examine them. He alluded particularly to a rule which provided for the reception of petitions and memorials. He did not, certainly, intend to invite the presentation of memorials and petitions, of a certain class, and for other reasons he preferred that the report and the amendment should be printed, and laid upon the tables of the members of the Convention.

The motion to postpone and print agreed to.

TRIBUNE FOR DEBATORS.

Mr. ROOT offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of this Convention be requested to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to place a table in front of the Clerk's table, for the use of the Delegates when they may address the Convention at length.

Mr. HARDIN said he would like to hear an explanation as to whereabouts the table was to be put, and how it was to be used—whether a member was to get upon the table. (Laughter.) As for himself, he could never get upon the table. (Renewed laughter.)

Mr. ROOT said if it were necessary to explain, that the honorable gentleman might comprehend the design of the resolution, he would state that it was mainly to accommodate the gentleman from Nelson himself, that he might have a stand placed in front when he wished to address the Convention, so that he might be distinctly heard, and that no word of his might fall without its effect upon the Convention. (Laughter.)

Mr. HARDIN replied that he did not intend to call forth any remarks; all he desired to know was, where the table was to be put, and how high it was to be.

Mr. ROOT replied that it was intended to be placed there—(pointing to the centre of the aisle.)

Mr. HARDIN said as to accommodating him, he was obliged to the gentleman from Campbell, but he did not want any such accommodation.—He presumed that it was intended to be in imitation of the plan of the French Convention—the bloody one under Robespierre, where they had to get upon a tribune. Anything in imitation of that, he did not wish to approach at all, or approximate to. He thought it better to lay it upon the table for the present, that the Convention might consider it.

The PRESIDENT ruled the resolution out of order without unanimous consent, and as objection was made it was not received.

JOURNAL AND DEBATES.

Mr. LINDSEY asked unanimous consent to take up the resolution offered yesterday, in relation to the printing of the Journal of the Convention, as follows:

Resolved, That the Printers to the Convention be, and they are hereby, directed to print—copies of the Journal of the Convention.

He suggested as a reason for immediate action, that he was advised by the Printers that they had now a large amount of type set up which it would be desirable to dispose of.

Consent was given, and the resolution was taken up for consideration.

Mr. LINDSEY then moved to amend the resolution by adding the words, "and ——— copies of the Debates of the Convention."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYES moved to fill the blank in the resolution in relation to the Journal with "100," which he thought would be a sufficient number.

Mr. MERIWETHER said he thought there should be a copy placed in each County Clerk's office in the Commonwealth, and that would amount to one hundred. Then each member should have a copy, which would amount to two hundred. There would then be a bound volume to provide for each member to take home, which would dispose of three hundred, and fifty would be necessary to exchange with other States that were accustomed to exchange similar documents with us. He thought three hundred and fifty would not be more than sufficient. It might be perhaps proper that he should explain that he intended to follow this up with another proposition to supply each member of the Convention with a certain number of copies of the weekly papers published here, in order that they might send to their constituents papers containing information of the proceedings of the Convention.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE suggested a larger number for the additional reason that the difference in cost between three hundred and fifty and five hundred copies, was a matter of small consequence in the item of expense. But fifty copies for exchanges would leave none for Libraries, Literary Institutions, and the different courts of higher jurisdiction; and again, there might be some new counties made in the State, increasing the number of County Clerks' offices, though he thought there should be some restriction on that branch of legislation. He therefore proposed that the blank should be filled with five hundred.

That motion was agreed to.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved that the blank in the resolution in relation to the Debates, be filled with the same number.

Mr. WALLER moved that the blank be filled with two thousand five hundred. The extra cost would be small, and this was a work that should be sent broad-cast throughout the land. They were all anxious that their proceedings should be known, and they ought to be in every public Library and circulated as generally as possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS thought it was a matter that should be first enquired about before they ordered so large a number as 2500 copies. He knew not what they should do with them.

Mr. MAYES was opposed to the amendment. If he could see any public good that would result from printing 2500 copies of the Debates of the Convention he would cheerfully vote for it. It was a matter worthy of consideration and reflection, and he would therefore move to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. GARRARD enquired if it was intended to give each member the control of twenty five copies.

Mr. WALLER supposed the matter of disposing of the Debates could be attended to hereafter. He supposed that two copies would be sufficient for each member, ten to each county, some to the libraries in the State, and the remainder might remain in the library here to be exchanged with other States. It was the custom in the State of New York, each year, to give a copy of the Debates of their Convention to every new member of the Legislature; there, they were all anxious that the people should understand the law and the constitution. The safety of this country rested on the intelligence of the people, and nothing was so important as an understanding of our laws.

Mr. HARDIN would like to hear what each copy would cost. He supposed it would not be less than two dollars, and that would be $5000. It was a matter of very little importance except as an item of expense. He supposed they should argue enough here to fill a book of a thousand pages, and, if they continued in the way they had started, perhaps two thousand, which would make two volumes, and these at $2 a piece would cost $10,000. Some antiquarian, perhaps, in years to come might look into them; though probably not. He would make no motion, but he would vote for 500 copies and not for 2500.

The question was then taken on the amendment, which was rejected.

The motion to fill the blank with 500 copies was then agreed to.

Mr. MERIWETHER then moved to amend the resolution so as to authorize the Secretary of the Convention to subscribe for ——— copies of the Weekly Commonwealth and Yeoman for the purpose of distribution.

Mr. GREY said he had a resolution on the same subject. It was as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish each member of the Convention with five copies of the Daily Commonwealth, containing the Debates and proceedings of the Convention, and five copies of the Weekly Commonwealth, and five copies of the Yeoman.

He said it was very desirable that they should have information of their proceedings communicated to the people, and this was the cheapest way in which it could be done. He presumed that all their constituents desired to see and know what was going on here, and what they were doing. He had fixed the number at five copies, but if gentlemen desired it, he had no objection to increase or diminish it, as would best suit their views. It was desirable that they should have some copies of the Daily Commonwealth, as it was the only paper that furnished full Debates and a full account of the proceedings of the Convention. The other papers would contain a synopsis of the proceedings and information that would be very acceptable to the people.

Mr. GHOLSON offered a substitute as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed whose duty it shall be to ascertain on what terms the editors of the Commonwealth and Yeoman will furnish, each, to the members of this Convention copies of each of their papers containing the proceedings of this body, for distribution among the good people of this Commonwealth.

He would remark that many of their constituents lived at a distance from the capitol and would not be benefited by a daily paper, as most of them had but weekly mails. The weekly paper would contain a condensed report, and perhaps all that was very material to be known, for a proper appreciation of what would be done here. It would cost much less, and he apprehended they would have a large item in the way of expenditure before they got through the business of the Convention.

Mr. MERIWETHER accepted the proposition of the gentleman from Christian.

A conversation ensued in which several members took part, which was terminated by the withdrawal of the several propositions to amend.

The question was then taken on the resolution, as amended, ordering 500 copies of the Journal and Debates, which was agreed to.

SEATS OF MEMBERS.

Mr. McHENRY called for the consideration of the special order, being the resolution which he offered yesterday, as follows:

Resolved, That this Convention will now assign seats, by lot, in the following manner: The Secretary shall put the names of the members on separate papers, as near alike as may be, in a box, and proceed to draw them out, one at a time, shaking the box before every drawing, and each member shall, as his name is drawn, select his seat, and have a right to occupy the same during the session of the Convention.

Mr. WOODSON offered the following as a substitute.

Resolved, That each Delegate be allowed to retain the seat he at present occupies during the residue of the session.

Mr. McHENRY called for the yeas and nays thereon.

Mr. GARRARD moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

Mr. McHENRY called for the yeas and nays on that motion; and being taken, they were, yeas 54, nays 43. So the whole subject was laid up on the table.

ADMISSION OF A REPORTER.

Mr. PRESTON called up the question pending at the adjournment yesterday, viz: the motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote taken on his resolution to admit to the floor of the Convention a Reporter for the Louisville Courier, on which he had called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted thus—yeas 70, nays 27.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution which he asked to have referred to the Committee of the whole and printed.

Resolved, That foreigners of the following descriptions and classes, only, shall be entitled to vote for any civil officer, or shall be eligible to any civil office, or place of trust or profit under the Commonwealth of Kentucky: 1. Those who, at the time of the adoption of this amended Constitution, shall be naturalized citizens of the United States. 2. Those who, at the time of the adoption of this amended Constitution, shall have declared their purpose to become citizens of the United States, in conformity to the laws thereof, and who shall have become citizens. 3. Those who, twenty-one years previously thereto, shall have declared their purpose, according to the existing provisions of the laws of the United States, to become citizens thereof; and who then shall be citizens of the United States. 4. Minors, who shall have migrated with their parents, or parent, to the United States, twenty-one years after their names, ages, and a particular description of their persons, shall have been entered on the records of some court of record of the State of Kentucky, or some other of the United States: such foreigners, having also, in every case, the like qualifications of residence, and on all other points, that are required of native born citizens; and a properly authenticated copy of the record being in all cases required for the verification of the facts.

The question was taken and as the result appeared to be doubtful,

Mr. DAVIS called for the yeas and nays.

Several gentlemen expressed the opinion that courtesy required that the proposition should be printed for the convenience of members in its consideration, although some of them were not favorable to the principles which it involved.—After a brief conversation the motion was agreed to without a division.

Mr. KELLY offered the following, and moved that it be postponed and printed:

1. Resolved, That the Legislature shall sit every four years, and shall be confined in their session to sixty days: that the qualifications of members and electors be as at present.

2. That the offices of this Commonwealth be made elective; and that those who have the collection or disbursement of money be elected for two years; and those who have not, for four years.

3. That the Circuit Judges be reduced to twelve in number.

4. That the members of the County Courts be reduced in number in each county, and that the Justices thereof be districted, and elected by their districts.

5. That the Legislature shall not borrow money on the faith of the State without a direct vote of the people.

6. That officers guilty of misfeasance or malfeasance, shall be removed on indictment and trial by a petit jury, and a verdict of guilty.

7. That the Common School Fund shall be made inviolate.

8. That the House of Representatives consist of fifty, and the Senate of twenty-five members.

9. That taxation for county purposes shall be on the ad valorem principle.

10. That elections be held in March or April, and continue one day.

11. That officers, after their election, shall be required to make oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and of Kentucky, and to faithfully discharge their official duty; and, also, that they, in the obtention of office, have not directly or indirectly, by themselves or others, with money, property, or any other commodity, attempted to corrupt or influence any electors in their district.

12. That persons convicted of any offence, criminal or penal, shall have the right of appeal to the Superior Courts.

13. That the power to divorce shall reside alone in the Courts of Justice.

14. That the Constitution formed by this Convention, be voted on directly by the people, and if a majority vote against the same, that the present Constitution be in force.

15. That all voting shall be viva voce, and no property qualification or religious test prescribed.

16. That a constitutional limitation be prescribed to suits for land.

17. That no slave shall be emancipated by deed, or last will, without removal from the Union.

18. That every citizen of this Commonwealth may bring from other States, and introduce slaves at his own will.

19. That the Constitution made by this body, be amended as required in the present Constitution.

Mr. ROOT offered the following as an amendment:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, consisting of five, whose duty it shall be to report to this Convention the best mode of securing the present Common School Fund, as well as its views in reference to enlarging the same.

Mr. KELLY accepted the amendment, and they were postponed and ordered to be printed.

CHAPLAINS.

On the motion of Mr. TURNER, it was Resolved, That the proceedings of this Convention be opened every morning, at the stated hour of meeting, by prayer to the Throne of Grace, and that the Ministers alternately, of the various denominations of christians, resident in Frankfort, be invited by the Secretary of this Convention, to perform the service.

NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. GREY renewed his resolution, heretofore offered as an amendment, and then withdrawn, in these words:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to furnish each member of the Convention with five copies of the Daily Commonwealth, containing the debates and proceedings of the Convention, five copies of the Weekly Commonwealth, and five copies of the Yeoman.

Mr. GHOLSON proposed as a substitute, the following:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed, whose duty it shall be to ascertain on what terms the editors of the Commonwealth and Yeoman will furnish to the members of the Convention — copies, each, of their papers, containing the proceedings of this body, for distribution among the good people of this Commonwealth.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL proposed to refer the whole subject to a select committee.

The question was taken on that motion, and it was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT named the following gentlemen as the select committee: Messrs. Meriwether, Grey, and Gholson.

BUSINESS OF THE DAY.

The propositions submitted yesterday, by Mr. C. A. Wickliffe, then came up in their order, for consideration, but on his motion they were passed over informally.

The propositions submitted by Messrs. Turner, Chambers, Thompson and others, then came up, in their order, and were disposed of in the same manner.

The Convention then adjourned.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1849.

The proceedings of the Convention were this day opened with prayer by the Rev. STUART ROBINSON, of the Presbyterian Church.

THE PURCHASE OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. MERIWETHER. Mr. President: The committee to whom was referred the resolutions in respect to the purchase of certain newspapers, are prepared to report, and as this is the day for the printing of one of the papers, if it be the pleasure of the Convention I will now make it. The committee report a substitute for the two resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Public Printers, appointed to do the printing of this Convention, be directed to supply each member, for distribution, with as many copies of either the weekly or daily papers published in Frankfort, as he may direct; Provided, That the amount furnished to each member shall not exceed the cost of twenty copies of a daily, or sixty copies of a weekly paper.

It is possible some explanation as to the cost may be necessary. Upon a conference with the Editors, we were informed that the daily paper can be furnished for $1 50 during the session, and the weekly paper for fifty cents. That resolution will permit each member to send sixty weekly, or twenty daily papers, or as many of each as he may prefer, and he will select his own paper, at a cost of thirty dollars.

Mr. HARDIN. I will enquire of the honorable gentleman what he supposes will be the cost.

Mr. MERIWETHER. If necessary, I would remark, that the cost for each member will be thirty dollars. Each member will be requested to hand to the Editors, the names of those persons to whom he would have the paper sent, and the papers will be enveloped and sent at a cost of fifty cents for the weekly, and one dollar and fifty cents for the daily paper during the session.

Mr. HARDIN. That, then, will be $3,000 for newspapers, and perhaps the members will not send off one in twenty. I do not think we should give that amount of money, and I would move that the amount be limited to a sum not exceeding ten dollars for each member.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I would say to my friend from Nelson, that in order to make it equal to all, the proportion of the weekly or daily papers should be specified. Twenty one weekly papers will be equal to seven daily. I would remark, that I am not directly interested in this resolution, for I live in a county where there are six or eight papers published, so that my constituents are provided for. It was for the advantage of those living in remote portions of the State who are not so fortunately situated as I happen to be, that I advocated this resolution. I think myself, that the public mind should be informed of what we do here as we proceed.

Mr. HARDIN. We know as a matter of fact, that the proceedings of this body will be published in every paper in Kentucky. A practice has been growing up here, and in the Government of the United States, I will not say it is at the suggestion of the gentlemen who print, and are interested, but our expenses in public printing are increasing every year. They are already excessive in this Commonwealth, and we are here proposing to add $3,000 for disseminating information which the people will all get long before they get our papers. Besides, each gentleman who sends a paper, will have to pay three cents postage, for we have not the privilege of franking.

Mr. MERIWETHER. Will the gentleman pardon me. The individuals who receive the papers will pay the postage, for they will be sent from the publishing office.

Mr. HARDIN. I understand that. But they will get information of the proceedings of this Convention in other papers before they get those that we may send, and therefore they will not want them when they come. I care nothing about the expense. It is a small amount, but our expenditures are running up very much, and in truth and in fact our expenses have run up very fast during the last 20 years. Until the year 1834, the whole revenue of the country, collected by the sheriff, was no more than $74,000; but it has now increased to the amount of $562,000. I intend at some future day to exhibit a table of the expenditures, and the amount of revenue from taxes, each year since the operation of the government, that the people may see the profligate and prodigal manner in which their money has been disbursed. Now we are asked to expend $3,000 for daily papers. The very resolution we voted yesterday, will cost the State $3,000 or $4,000, and before we quit, I shall not be astonished if the printing for the Convention should run up to ten, fifteen, or twenty thousand dollars. If it were necessary for the information of the people, I would not hesitate a moment, but we all know that in truth and fact, our proceedings will be read by the people long before we can furnish them with these papers. I will vote for the sum of ten dollars, and beg leave to call for the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. GHOLSON. With all imaginable deference for the opinions of my respected friend, I beg leave to correct him somewhat. The idea of this thing did not originate with the printers.—If any honor attaches to the measure so far as it relates to the members of this body, I claim that honor. I first mentioned it to the printers. We had talked this thing over before I left home, and I promised my constituents that I would make some such motion as this for their particular benefit in common with the residue of the State. This is a question in which the people feel an interest paramount to any other proposition that has excited the public attention for many years. We are not in my county as much of a newspaper reading people as the constituency of many gentlemen. Many of us are situated at a distance from post-offices, but we had made arrangements in advance for the dissemination of this information. I am in favor of a larger number than that recommended by the Committee, for we owe it to our constituents that they should be fully advised of, and have before them the reasons why we do one particular thing and refuse to do another. It is contemplated that the result of our labors shall be referred to the people for their acceptance or rejection, early in the season. Is it not important, then, that they should be fully advised, and entirely comprehend the subject on which they are to vote? This thing, I repeat, is urged not for the Printers' benefit, but for that of the people, and were I to suggest any alteration, it would be to increase the number to a hundred copies instead of sixty.

Mr. HARDIN. I am willing the gentleman should have the honor of the paternity of this resolution, and I will not give it to the printers. I conceive it to be an unnecessary expense, for very few will read the papers we send. Congress, never allowed, since I had an acquaintance with that body, more than thirty dollars for papers, sometimes during a session of eight months; but we are here proposing to incur an expense of $3000, for what I consider a very useless thing. I will only remark again, that my object is not to prevent information, but that we may act with a prudent and saving hand. It is indispensably necessary for this government that we should to a certain extent, retrench our expenditures.—There is not an instance known in the history of the world, where a government, without resorting to first principles, ever retraced its steps in point of expenditure. In monarchical, imperial, and aristocratical governments, heavy expenditures have repeatedly aided in producing revolutions. In republics we can only retrace our steps by recurring to first principles. We incurred yesterday an expense, I presume, of at least $2000 or $2500, and this morning it is proposed to add $3000. I hope we shall withhold no information, none at all, but I do think that ten dollars is enough to be appropriated to each member for daily papers.

Mr. BULLITT. On this subject I agree with my colleague, (Mr. Meriwether.) We, in our neighborhood, have an abundance of newspapers, but many are very differently circumstanced—many of the other counties have no paper at all. It is generally conceded, I imagine, that the Constitution we may frame, will be laid before the people for approval or rejection, and it becomes therefore a matter of great importance that they should be well informed of the daily progress which we make; and certainly this is the only mode by which this information can be extended to many counties in the State. In this government an intelligent public opinion, is the foundation on which it rests, and therefore the expense of a few dollars is scarcely worthy of consideration. A matter of $3,000 is not for a moment to be taken into consideration when we view the great importance of the people being enlightened on this subject, before they act in reference to it. Where then is the man who will consider the paltry sum of $3,000 to the State of Kentucky compared with the object in view? As I before remarked, the constituents I represent have but little or no interest in this resolution. We have five or six daily papers at our doors, but I consider it my duty to sustain this motion, for the benefit of the State at large.

Mr. GREY. I was very sorry to hear my friend from Nelson offer the objections he has made to this resolution, and it seems to me that the only objection, which the gentleman seems to interpose, of any importance whatever, has no foundation in fact. He says, if you pass this resolution, and send out the papers to the different counties in the State, you do not afford the citizens an opportunity of receiving the information until long after they have acquired it from other sources. That is the only avowed objection of the gentleman to the passage of the resolution, and I ask you if it is true? How are they to get information, unless telegraphic wires be extended to each citizen of the Commonwealth. He certainly cannot get it sooner than through the daily paper published here, transmitted by mail to each individual. That is the most expeditious manner of disseminating information that I can conceive of. The gentleman seems anxious that this information shall be extended throughout the community, but he thinks that his constituents will read through the daily papers, all the information. His constituents may be more favorably situated than the constituency of others, but I ask you if the great body of the constituency of this assembly will not fail to receive this information, unless some plan of this sort be adopted. I would send them to different neighborhoods, and to persons not in the habit of taking papers, so as to disseminate information of what is doing here among the people as much as possible. I think a less number than that proposed would be perfectly useless. What good would it do? Each member here representing from 1,000 to 1,500 voters—to circulate less than sixty daily papers among that number—what good will it do? It seems to me a less number will be of no value; and I think if the gentleman wants to go in for retrenchment and saving of expense, he ought to commence at some other point. I believe the dissemination of information among the people is a matter of which they would never complain. What is the sum of $3,000 in comparison with the intelligence the people will receive from the circulation of these papers throughout the State. I hope the amendment will be voted down, and the resolution, as proposed, be adopted.

Mr. MACHEN. Coming from a county distant, from the Seat of Government as well as from Louisville, where information is disseminated directly amongst the people, I perhaps feel more interest than my friend from Nelson in the passage of the resolution. I know that he is mistaken, so far as my constituents are concerned, in regard to the facility with which they will receive information of what we are here doing.—I feel that it is a duty which will be acceptable to them that I shall render here in voting for the adoption of the largest number, even though it exceed that which the committee have presented for our consideration. There are not more than 5 or 6 copies of the Commonwealth that go to my town, and perhaps not a single copy of the Yeoman. How then are my constituents to receive weekly intelligence of what we are here transacting in any other way than that proposed? I am for economy and retrenchment of the public funds as much as possible, but I do not consider it any economy to withhold from our constituents information of what we are doing here, intended for their good. I hope the resolution will be adopted with the largest number.

Mr. NESBITT. I have but two or three words to say. I represent about 2000 constituents, and if the question were put to them, whether they would vote that 60 men of my county should have sixty papers sent to them, paid for out of the Treasury of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, I am satisfied that not ten votes would be given for it. Suppose we take them, it would be necessary to send the whole series to the same persons or they would be disconnected, and hence, but about 60 men of the county would receive a paper for nothing during the whole session, and the balance of the 2000 that I represent will bear the expense. I do not believe it would meet with their approbation. I have no objection, none in the world, that the people should have information, and I believe that when they want it they are able to pay for it and will do so.—There are some 300 papers taken in my county, and I have no doubt in the world that every single man there who desires to know what we are doing, from the newspapers published in this town, will send his money here and pay for them. I do not think they want to have a gratuity and shall vote against the whole affair.

Mr. TALBOTT. I presume the question would have but one side if put in such a form that we should be called upon to say whether we are willing that the people should or should not have information. Then there would be only one question and one vote upon it; but the only question here is, is this the best form of attaining that end? I respect all that comes from my friend from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) from his great talent and experience. I shall vote for the smallest number. In voting for the diffusion of information, I should prefer the proposition of the gentleman from Woodford (Mr. Waller.) I would rather have the deliberations of this body in a more compact and tangible form. I would rather increase the publication of the Debates and Journals, and when this convention adjourns and the people are to decide upon the new Constitution, let them have the Debates to read. It seems to me that very many of the daily and the weekly papers distributed in the way proposed would never reach the people. I am willing at all times and under all circumstances to vote for the largest possible amount when the object is to educate and enlighten the people, but it seems to me that this is not the best way to disseminate the information. I shall therefore vote for the proposition of my friend from Nelson.

Mr. HARDIN. On the question about to be taken, I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MERIWETHER. It may be desirable that each member shall know what the cost will be, and upon an accurate calculation I think the amount may be stated at $4\frac{3}{4}$ cents of tax upon each legal voter of this Commonwealth.

Mr. BROWN. Before I vote on the amendment I desire to say a word or two, and it is with some reluctance that I say anything. I do not expect to participate much in the debates or discussions of this convention, but I desire to represent my action by my votes to my constituents. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, and then against the adoption of the entire resolution. This resolution will not accomplish the purpose which it professes to have in view—the dissemination of intelligence among the people. In my county there are some 2500 voters, and if you give to each member 10 or 20 copies, to whom are they to be sent? Each delegate will select perhaps that number among the people of his county; these papers will be sent to them, and their reading will be confined pretty much to them; and it would not be sending intelligence therefore to the people generally, so that the resolution would not accomplish the object designed. If it were to disseminate intelligence to the people generally, I should be in favor of it; but if delegates desire to send papers to their constituents or favorites, let them subscribe for them. I am opposed to their doing it at the expense of the State.

Mr. MARTIN P. MARSHALL. I wish to offer an additional suggestion, with all respect for my friend from Nelson. If ever there was a time in the history of Kentucky, that required the existence amongst us of a healthy, sound, sober, public sentiment, that crisis is now approaching, when the Constitution which we shall make shall be presented to the people. We know that by the terms of our Constitution, it is necessary that we should go through a probation in regard to the collection of public sentiment, whether the Constitution shall be submitted to them, or amendments thereof. But the time has come when the whole Constitution must be submitted to them—not whether any amendment suggested shall be put in it, but whether the whole Constitution, after it has undergone the revision of this body, shall be adopted or rejected by the people at large. I consider that a most important question, and requiring the action of a sound, intelligent public sentiment. In view of that, I am prepared to vote for every proposition to extend light and information among the people at large. This is one mode of doing it. The people will not have more than six months from this time, before they are called upon to decide whether they will reject or adopt your Constitution. This is a short period, and I consider it highly important that they should be informed as to the progress of the labors of this Convention, for the purpose of creating among them a sound public sentiment. I therefore feel disposed to vote for every thing that tends to disseminate information. This Constitution is going to produce a great change in our manner of government. It is to run in opposition to many cherished opinions, and must be considered by the people at their fire-sides, in order that there may arise therefrom a wholesome public sentiment. The cost of $3,000 or $30,000 is as nothing when you look to the good resulting from giving public sentiment a right direction.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I think it always best for a man when he ascertains that he has committed an error, at once to correct it. I rise to correct a great error that I have made. The actual cost of these papers, to each voter, will be two and one seventh cents instead of four and three quarters, as I before stated. (Laughter.)

Mr. T. J. HOOD. I concur in the suggestion that there would be but one voice in this body as to the propriety of furnishing the people with correct information of our proceedings, so far as it can be done without incurring too extravagant an expenditure. The objection of the gentleman from Boyle (Mr. Talbott) is, that he does not regard this as the best method, and I request the gentleman to embody his proposition in the shape of a substitute or amendment, and I will most cheerfully adopt it. In the absence of any such amendment, I shall vote for the proposition for the largest number.

Mr. THOMPSON. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson. It is but a few years since that the taxation of the State was but six cents on one hundred dollars; it is now in my county twenty two cents. The object of the mover of the resolution and of the mover of the amendment is to disseminate information among the people. This is very well. Suppose that the original resolution passes, and I take twenty copies of the Daily Commonwealth, and these twenty I send to twenty men of my county. In all probability there will not be forty men in the county who will ever see those papers. I think it is much more important that the people should be informed of what we have done after we have finished our labors than of what we have said while we were performing it. My object will be to have a copy of the amended Constitution printed for each voter in the State. Let provision be made by the Convention to disseminate these copies of the amended Constitution, so that each voter before he comes to the poll to vote, shall have had a copy, and this will give him all the necessary information as to what we have done. By these means he will know what we have done and not what we have said in doing it.

Mr. ROGERS. Upon this resolution to furnish $3,000 worth of papers, I shall vote with the respected gentleman from Nelson. The number is so small, and inadequate for the purpose of giving information to the citizens of this Commonwealth, that I shall not vote for the appropriation for any at all. I represent a very large county, of near 3,000 voters; of them I do not know one half, and were you to furnish me gratuitously at the expense of the State with papers for all of them, I should have to send home and get the poll book in order to know to whom to send them. As remarked by my friend from Nelson our revenue has increased very rapidly, and I promised my people during the canvass, that my voice should be raised and my action directed at all times to endeavor to frame a Constitution to render our Government of a form that will be cheaply administered, and we not be trampled upon by taxation. The only way to do that is, to cut all off. If we begin to say this is a small item of only $3,000 to-day, it will be $3,000 to-morrow, and perhaps $6,000 the next day, until there is no end to the matter. Look at us now, and it will be seen that, in some ten or twelve years our revenue has increased to some $500,000, and it is still increasing. I shall vote for the amendment first, and then I shall vote against the whole proposition. If we want to send papers to the people, we can pay for them ourselves. We receive pay here, and after paying our board, we cannot do better than to send the balance to our constituents.

Mr. MAYES. I will say one word. It seems to me that we are in a great measure forgetting one of the important reasons operating upon the people by which they were induced to call this Convention. One of the great complaints of the county that I represent was the extravagance of the Legislature in its appropriations. I fear if we go on passing resolutions for the expenditure of money as we have commenced, we shall exceed the extravagance of any Legislature that has gone before us. I agree with the gentleman from Nelson, that the passage of this resolution will not advance or promote the object it seems to have in view—that is the dissemination among the people of information of the action of the Convention in reference to the formation of a new Constitution. It is said that we should subscribe for papers to be scattered among the people that their minds may be informed and enlightened as to the Constitution after it has been framed by the Convention. If a gentleman will not subscribe for a paper himself, I hold it as true, that if you subscribe for it and send it to him, he will not read it even when he has it. My friend from Ballard and McCracken says that this thing was talked over in his county; mine is adjoining; and yet nothing was said there concerning it. I do not want $3,000 nor any other sum voted for papers. Such as desire to read will subscribe for them, and they will read them if they are willing to pay their money for the privilege of reading them. They do not expect the Convention to vote $3,000 or any other sum to scatter papers through the country to inform them what was done here to day or yesterday. Take up the proceedings of this Convention yesterday, and I ask you if there is any thing reported that will enlighten the public mind as to any principle being acted upon here bearing on the formation of a new Constitution. And there will be nothing in any paper that will enlighten any mind as to going for or against any thing in the Constitution. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, and then against the whole resolution.

Mr. TURNER. As a great many gentlemen have said they will vote against this proposition, with a view of testing its strength, and to save time, I move to lay the amendment and the resolution on the table, and I call for the yeas and nays thereon.

Mr. MACHEN. Before the vote is taken, I ask the indulgence of the House merely to reply to the remarks which fell from a gentleman who preceded me. I am for economy, but we are here spending the money for the people, and I ask if we have as yet spent a dollar that is to go for their benefit. Members may differ with me in opinion on the subject, but in my view all our printing heretofore has not resulted and will not result to the good of the people. Here is the first proposition introduced, to disseminate throughout the country the proceedings of this Convention, and the debates, discussions, and conclusions at which we arrive here. Now is it not a matter of great importance that the arguments, views, and feelings which have actuated the members of this Convention should be spread abroad throughout the land, that the people may weigh the arguments here advanced, and perhaps in due time arrive at the same conclusions to which this body has arrived? My people, I am satisfied, without the expression of any opinion from them, will justify me in attempting to give them this information. I stand here without instruction from them, but I believe that I shall maintain their will and act in accordance with their pleasure in thus extending this information to them. As I said before, this is the first proposition as yet introduced to spread intelligence before them. I admit that when they look over the paper containing the report of our proceedings yesterday our constituents will feel but little interest in what we are doing; but at the same time I am willing that they shall know how we are employed. I trust the time will soon come when our debates and proceedings will have a deeper interest with the people, and then I want them to have the privilege of reading them. I feel justified, therefore, in voting for this appropriation that they may have this intelligence, and I trust this House will not entertain the motion just made.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay on the table, and it was negatived; yeas, 43; nays, 53.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. HARDIN, and it was adopted; yeas, 57; nays 38.

Mr. T. J. HOOD. The number of papers that will be furnished under the amendment will be so small, that it will afford those who represent large counties, but a very limited means of disseminating information among their constituents. As the matter of expense seemed to be the main objection, in the hope that some gentleman may devise a cheaper, and at the same time, a better mode to attain the desired end, I will move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

This motion, the question being then taken, was negatived.

The question was then taken by yeas and nays on the resolution, as amended, and it was rejected, yeas, 40; nays, 56.

A CONTESTED SEAT.

Mr. HARDIN. I have received a communication from the county of Casey, signed by several gentlemen, and though I do not desire to have any thing to do with the subject, I suppose somebody must have. They have requested me to present the communication to the Convention, and to have an enquiry made into the election of the delegate from the county of Casey. I have heard the suggestions of my colleague and my friend from Madison, and I agree with both of them that if their statements are true, and I have no doubt of it, the gentleman present from that county is entitled to his seat. Yet it is due to those who sent this communication to me, that a committee should make an enquiry into the matter. The journals read that the Convention received the last certificate of the sheriff, and I agree with the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Turner,) that the officer had no right to make it; and I agree also with that gentleman that no man after he had voted on the first or second day of the election, had a right to come back on the third day and fill out his vote. A voter has a right to abandon the right of suffrage altogether, or to vote for a portion of the offices, but he has no right to come back and fill up a deficient vote. That was the decision in the case of the contested election of Williams and Mason. If it would be satisfactory to the gentlemen, I will move to refer the subject to a select committee. I have no doubt my friend from Casey, (Mr. Coffey,) is entitled to his seat, but his right should be clear and undoubted. We cannot act on a sheriff's certificate given two months afterwards.

The communication was then read.

Mr. HARGIS. This is a matter about which I know but little, but I imagine that the Convention does not fully understand all the circumstances in relation to the election in Casey county. It is questionable whether there is any law by which a contested seat, or the right to a seat in this body, can be investigated. I certainly have doubts on the subject, and in the absence of any certainty in regard to it, from the best information we have in relation to this election, it is to be presumed that the gentleman has come here by the consent and will of the majority of the voters of the county of Casey. When the gentleman presented his certificate, and claimed his seat, no one disputed his right to it, provided the sheriff had done his duty. There was no objection, then, that I have heard, to his having received really a majority of the votes of the qualified voters of Casey. That seemed to be conceded, and the only objection made by the gentleman from Madison, was, that the sheriff, perhaps, had not performed his duty. The voters of Casey, it was fair to presume, considered the gentleman entitled to his seat, or they would, I imagine, have taken some legal course in reference thereto, under the laws in relation to contested seats in the Legislature.—Nothing of the kind has been done, and the gentleman's claim to the seat appears to have been fully acquiesced in by the people of Casey.—When the vote was taken on the question whether the Delegate from Casey should come forward and take his seat, there was hardly an objection raised, and the Convention appeared to be almost unanimous in conceding that he was legally, and fairly, and honorably entitled to a seat in this body. The gentleman accordingly came to the book, was sworn, and took his seat among us. Would it be right now, and in accordance with parliamentary usage, and the habits, customs, and dignity of bodies of this character, after doing what this Convention has done—after we have, as we supposed, taken into consideration all the circumstances we could get possession of in relation to this election—would it seem right and reasonable that we should take barely the suggestions of a few gentlemen from some place—we do not know whether from Casey, or in fact anywhere else, for we can know nothing about the names attached to that paper—and go on and interrupt the business of the Convention by the appointment of a select committee, to enquire into the legal right of the gentleman to his seat? Such a proceeding, it appears to me, would be rather useless. I acknowledge my inexperience in parliamentary usage, but it does seem to me that common sense, and everything else that ought to govern such a body as this Convention, requires that the gentleman should retain his seat without interruption.

Mr. HARDIN. My honorable friend last up did not understand me, I presume. These are not fictitious names, I presume, and the gentleman from Casey can answer whether there are any such gentlemen. I have never heard of them, before I received their communication through the post office to-day. They claim an investigation into the subject, and if they are voters in Casey county, it is due to them that they should have that investigation, and the matter not be laid on the table. We owe it to ourselves to judge of the qualification and election of Delegates here. As I said before, I concur with the gentleman from Madison, in understanding the law to provide that a man who voted on Monday or Tuesday, and did not fill out his vote for Delegate, has no right to come back on Wednesday and fill it out. In this case, I understand that four gentlemen who abandoned the right to vote on the first day, came back on the last day and voted; and that made the result a tie. If that was the case—and I have no doubt of the fact—the gentleman is entitled to his seat; but it was due to all concerned that the matter should be reported upon by a committee. Another reason is, that I protest against the power of the sheriff, after he has made one return, some months after to give another. His official duties ceased in the first instance, and he had no right to give another. I desire the committee to examine and report on these facts; and, for one, I will vote that no man who did not give a full vote on Monday, has a right to come back and fill it out on Wednesday. I had the good, or bad fortune—in the case of the contested seat of Williams and Mason—to hold a seat in the Senate, and I voted for the report of the committee; and, in fact, drew up every word of it, which distinctly laid down this principle. I think the gentleman entitled to his seat, but we owe it to the people to enquire about it, and I think the gentleman himself should consent to it, and let the fact appear on the Journals. I am a thousand times obliged to my friend over the way (Mr. Hargis,) for the information he has given; but perhaps he has not as much experience in parliamentary usage as some of us. I have been about half of my life in parliamentary bodies, but never having expected any elevation to the chair of speaker, or even that of chairman of committee of the whole, I know as little about parliamentary rules as almost any other man.—I hope the committee will be raised, and the facts reported upon, although not for a moment doubting that the gentleman will retain his seat.

Mr. COFFEY. I not only concur with my friend from Nelson, but I ask myself the appointment of a committee to examine into this case. Let them take the whole of the papers and certificates before them, and report the truth in regard to the matter. I discover that many members of the House are only in possession of a part of the facts. Frequent reference has been made to the case as if these four votes improperly cast, alone authorized me to come here. But there were other votes in my favor. I wish the papers and evidence, and the written contract between myself and my worthy competitor also to be fully examined and reported upon. I am not ambitious to stand here improperly. When I occupy a seat in any body I wish to do it lawfully and honorably. I desire to be here independently, and without leaning on any man, and therefore I desire that this committee shall be raised.

The subject was then referred to a select committee, as proposed by the gentleman from Nelson.

The PRESIDENT named the following gentlemen as the committee, Messrs. Hardin, Turner, and Clarke.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. DIXON offered the following, which on his motion was postponed and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That the judicial officers of the State of Kentucky should be elected by the people; but, to avoid the exercise of any improper influence over the Judges, in the discharge of their official duties, by those who may have taken part in their elections, it is expedient to incorporate into the Constitution a provision, requiring the judges, living in two adjoining districts, to preside alternately in each of the Courts of such districts.

Mr. ROOT submitted the following proposition, which on his motion was postponed, referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered to be printed.

1. Resolved, That any inhabitant of this State who shall hereafter be engaged in a duel, either as principal or accessory, shall forever be disqualified as an elector, and from holding any office under the Constitution and laws of this State; and may be punished in such other manner as shall be prescribed by law.

2. Resolved, That the General Assembly shall not, in any manner, create any debt or debts, liability or liabilities, which shall singly or in the aggregate, with any previous debts or liabilities, exceed the sum of dollars, except in case of war, to repel invasion, or suppress insurrection, unless the same shall be authorized by some law for some single object or work, to be distinctly specified therein; which law shall provide ways and means, exclusive of loans, for the payment of the interest of such debt or liability as it falls due; and also to pay and discharge the principal of such debt or liability within years from the time of the contracting thereof; and shall be irrevocable until the principal and interest thereon shall be paid and discharged; but no such law shall take effect until, at a general election, it shall have been submitted to the people, and have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it at such election; and all money raised by authority of such law shall be applied only to the specific object therein stated, or to the payment of the debt thereby created; and such law shall be published in at least one newspaper in each judicial district, if one is published therein, throughout the State for months preceding the election at which it is submitted to the people.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE submitted the following, which was ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That it is the deliberate and fixed opinion of this Convention, that no provision or amendment, which shall have the effect to restrict the right of free and equal suffrage, as it now exists, or to change the conditions by which it may be now acquired, according to the Constitution of Kentucky, ought to be inserted in any Constitution which may be proclaimed by this Convention.

Mr. DIXON offered the following as a substitute for the proposition of Mr. Davis, in relation to naturalization.

WHEREAS, The people of the United States, in the 1st article and 8th section of the Federal Constitution, have given to Congress the exclusive power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; and whereas, it was contemplated by the framers of the Constitution of the United States, that the citizen naturalized should, in all respects, touching the right of suffrage, be placed on an equal footing with the native born citizen. Therefore,

Resolved, That it would be inexpedient to incorporate into the Constitution of Kentucky, any principle whereby any invidious distinction should be made in favor of the native born over the naturalized citizen, in the exercise of the right of suffrage.

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely say to the gentleman in regard to these propositions, that when the time comes for their consideration, let them be taken up in their order, and then "Lay on Macduff."

Mr. DIXON. I will only say to the gentleman that when the time comes Macduff will be in his place.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I have only to say that wherever Macduff or Macbeth may be, a Kentucky citizen will be in his place.

Mr. GHOLSON offered the following resolutions, which were postponed and ordered to be printed, viz:

Resolved, That special pleading, in all Courts of Justice in this Commonwealth, should be abolished; that a speedy and impartial trial by a jury of the vicinage, upon the merits of his case, should be secured to every citizen.

Resolved, That, to this end, Chancery Courts should be abolished.

Resolved, That a constitutional provision, which shall (within a reasonable time) quiet the titles of the occupants of lands, as to the adverse claims of all persons not laboring under some legal disability, is indispensably necessary to the well-being and prosperity of the good citizens of this Commonwealth.

Resolved, That the jurisdiction of Justices of the Peace should be increased to dollars.

Resolved, That it is expedient to lay off the State of Kentucky into four districts, in each of which the Appellate Court shall hold two terms annually.

Resolved, That the concurrence of a majority of the Appellate Judges should be necessary to a reversal of the opinion of an inferior tribunal.

Mr. CHAMBERS offered the following which were ordered to be printed and made the order of the day for to-morrow:

1. Resolved, That no part of the present Constitution of Kentucky, nor of any proposed amendment thereto, shall be referred to any committee, other than the committee of the whole, until the same has been considered and approved by the Convention as proper to be inserted in, and made a part of, the new or amended Constitution.

2. Resolved, That from and after the 7th instant, the Convention will hold a morning and an evening session each day, meeting for the former at — o'clock, A. M., and for the latter at — o'clock, P. M.

3. Resolved, That, until otherwise ordered, the morning sessions of the Convention shall be devoted to hearing, receiving, and referring such portions of the existing Constitution as may be deemed worthy of re-adoption, and of amendments to the same, the reports of committees, &c., and that immediately on assembling in the afternoon, the Convention will go into committee of the whole upon such matters as may have been referred to it, and so continue until adjournment.

RULES OF ORDER.

On the motion of Mr. MERIWETHER, the Convention proceeded to the consideration of the report of the select committee of a series of rules for the government of the Convention.

The 1st 2d 3d and 4th rules were read and passed without amendment.

The 5th was amended verbally by the substitution of the word may for shall, so as to provide that "the President may examine and correct the journal before it is read."

The 6th rule being under consideration in these words:

"6. He shall have the right to name any member to perform the duties of the Chair but such substitution shall not extend beyond a day, or over one adjournment; and when not occupying the Chair, he may submit propositions and participate in debate."

Mr. TURNER moved to strike out the words, "and when not occupying the chair, he may submit propositions and participate in debate." He said, I make this motion because it is giving a power to the President, and a right that is without precedent, as far as I know and believe, in any deliberative body in the United States, either of Church or State. It is very improper, according to my notion of the duties of a presiding officer. A presiding officer ought to understand thoroughly, the rules of the body over which he presides, and he ought to understand parliamentary law. It is his duty to be well versed in these, and to pay more attention to the duties of the chair than to any other. Our presiding officer, for whose appointment I myself voted, I have no doubt, is well versed in the duties belonging to his station, but like many individuals in his position, he is, I apprehend, a little rusty in a good many things. I make this remark, not as being applicable to that gentleman in particular, for no one in this Convention has a greater share of my regard than he has, but it appears to me, that our presiding officer ought to have his attention devoted exclusively to the discharge of the duties of the chair, in the preservation of order, and not to come down to the floor of the House, in order to bring forward propositions and argue them, throwing his weight and influence in their favor, and then to go back and take the chair, and decide upon his own propositions. There may not be any harm done in the case of our President, but there is a good book which says, we ought not to lead a man into temptation. And I think this warning is particularly applicable in politics. I do not wish to lead our honorable President into too much temptation.

There is an additional reason, according to my view of the subject, why this portion of the rules ought not to be adopted. We all know — although there is no member who will admit that he is under such influence — that when a man is made President of the United States, or the Governor of a State, or President of a Convention, the official station gives him a certain degree of influence, and in the case of a presiding officer his opinions ought never to be known; he ought to be an impartial umpire; at all events his opinions ought not to be known till the debate is over and the vote taken. I have always thought that the rule which gives to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Kentucky the right to vote is improper. You find nothing of the kind in the British Parliament nor in Congress. You find nothing of the kind in ancient legislative bodies. It is a rule that has been adopted in modern times, and one which, as I have myself seen, exerts an improper influence. The presiding officer is looked up to by the members of the body over which he presides, and when you permit him to come upon the floor and debate a proposition, and then go back to the chair and decide upon it, you destroy his usefulness and his impartiality as a presiding officer. With these suggestions, I will renew my motion to strike out the latter clause of the sixth rule. I should be gratified, when in committee of the whole upon the proposed amendments of the Constitution, to hear the views of our President expressed. I believe that his views very nearly, if not entirely, correspond with my own. I do not make this motion with any hostility to our presiding officer, or from a belief that he has any disposition to do wrong, but I do it because I think that the principle, if carried out, will have a pernicious and corrupting influence. And in this, the highest deliberative body that can be assembled in the State, there ought to be no exemption from an adherence to the practice which has invariably been followed in the most enlightened legislative bodies in the world.

Mr. MERIWETHER. With due deference to the opinions of my friend from Madison, I would suggest that he is under a misapprehension, if he supposes that whenever the President has left the chair, we are in committee of the whole.

Mr. TURNER. I mean that it is so in substance.

Mr. MERIWETHER. In substance then I differ with the gentleman, as much as in shadow. In substance, we shall not be in committee of the whole; for although the President may leave his seat, yet the previous question is applicable, so that in substance the convention will not be in committee of the whole. The gentleman will remember that we are depriving the City of Louisville of the service of one of its delegates by depriving him of the right to participate in debate upon propositions that are offered here. This is different from a Legislative body. There the Constitution makes it incumbent upon the body to select one of their number to preside.—Not so here. No man supposed that the President of this convention was to be deprived of any of his rights by his elevation to the Chair. Will you deprive him of the right which every other member enjoys of discussing propositions and submitting propositions merely because you have elevated him to that seat? Will you require the President to vote upon propositions without giving reasons for or against them?—That is the question. Many important propositions will be made in Convention which will not be made in committee of the whole, and the President of the Convention will be required to record his vote for or against them; and yet you will not permit him to assign his reasons. I ask is it right to place your presiding officer in that position?

As to the idea suggested by the gentleman that his influence is so much greater on account of his position, I cannot concur with him. Indeed the allusion made by the gentleman to the usage in the Legislature and in this Convention, of calling upon the President to vote, shows the fallacy of that idea. The vote given by the President apprises every member of his opinion regarding the proposition upon which he votes, and his participation in the debate could not carry that influence further than his vote will go.

Again, as to another suggestion that he would descend from the Chair, submit a proposition, discuss it and then return to the Chair and decide upon it. I do not understand it as being the privilege of the presiding officer to decide any question here. He only announces the decision of the House. Points of order he does decide, but he decides no question that is submitted to the Convention for its deliberation. Having thus briefly stated my views in regard to this matter, I shall vote against the motion of the gentleman from Madison.

Mr. LINDSEY moved to amend by adding the words, "but when in committee of the whole he shall have the right to submit propositions and participate in debate."

Mr. MERIWETHER suggested to the mover of this amendment that it was wholly unnecessary as the President had already that right under parliamentary law.

Mr. TURNER accepted the amendment as a substitute for his own, and then said: I do not wish to be importunate upon this subject, but the gentleman seems to think that the people of Louisville will not have a fair representation here, unless we allow the President to take the floor and debate every proposition as well, when not in committee of the whole, as when in committee of the whole. This same argument would apply to every Speaker, who has ever acted in Kentucky as Speaker of the House of Representatives, and it would apply in Congress, where sometimes they elect a Speaker who is a member from a State which sends but one or two representatives, as is the case with Delaware. But it was never thought that in such case, he should have this extraordinary privilege. Here the county of Jefferson is amply represented; it is represented by able and eloquent gentlemen, and notwithstanding this, it is feared that Louisville will be deprived of her proper share of weight in this Convention—by having one of her representatives elected to preside over the body. Unless Louisville claims to do the whole business of the Convention, I think she has no cause to complain of being deprived of the services of one of her representatives out of so many able and enlightened gentlemen as are here from that city and county. It is not only the privilege of coming down from the chair and originating and debating propositions that I object to, but there is a great deal in the discretion that may be exercised in calling to the chair a delegate of similar sentiments with himself. I do not say that the President would act improperly, but I want to be governed by that invaluable rule lead not a man into temptation. I want, not only purity, but to be above suspicion. It is said by the gentleman from Jefferson, I believe, that although the President participated in the debate he would not go back and decide upon the question that had been debated. But it appears to me that under the rule which we are about to adopt, when a vote is taken which is a doubtful one, when it is claimed by both parties, the President will be very apt to decide in favor of the proposition for which he has been contending; as a matter of course he will think the majority always on his side. Human nature is a little frail, and those who have gone before us have always acted upon the principle that it is better to guard against the influence that may be exercised by a presiding officer by being permitted to participate in debate. Take your presiding officer from his station, and he will not have time to study Jefferson's Manual, which it is so difficult to understand. I doubt very much whether it has been read this week, by any one in this Convention. I want our President to discharge the duties of the chair instead of being employed in drawing up propositions and debating them. I do not think the President desires any such privilege. It would be placing him in a position in which his usefulness would be destroyed.

Mr. MERIWETHER. If the occupant of the Chair should not desire the privilege he need not exercise it. The rule does not make it obligatory upon him to do so, and by omitting to claim the privilege he will avoid all the difficulty which the gentleman suggests. The same argument was made by the gentleman in committee. I had no particular preference on the subject, but a large majority of the committee instructed me to report that provision in the rules.

If the President, as the gentleman supposes, after discussing a proposition, will return to the Chair and decide the question incorrectly, may he not so decide without the privilege of discussing it? He will doubtless be enlisted on one side or the other of every proposition that is submitted here, and if he could be prompted to an incorrect course of action in the one case, could he not as well pursue that course without having participated in the discussion as after having done so? Does not the gentleman wish to obtain light upon any subject which is brought forward for discussion? Then why not receive from the presiding officer the benefit of his judgment as well as from every other member of this body? I have no doubt that it would be acceptable to at least a majority of us.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I shall vote for this amendment in accordance with what I think has been the proper and uniform course in all deliberative bodies. Almost the entire business in committee of the whole is matter of debate, and in that we should have the benefit of the assistance of the presiding officer. But I think that in forming rules for this House we should follow established usages, and that the presiding officer should not be permitted to originate business. Surely it could never be desired to bring the presiding officer into personal collision with the members of the body. I think we had better pursue the beaten track; it is always the safe course.

Mr. DAVIS. I will only remark that I consider this to be an innovation, and I consider with the gentleman from Madison, that there are strong reasons why the innovation should not be adopted.

Mr. McHENRY called for a division of the question and the yeas and nays on the first branch. He said, I do not desire to debate this question. I will only make the suggestion, that I do not believe the gentleman need apprehend any such impropriety of conduct on the part of our presiding officer as has been suggested.

There has been no exhibition of party feeling in this body hitherto, except in the election of a President, but I caution the majority, that this grant of additional power to the President may give rise to a suspicion that they are willing to promote party purposes.

Mr. MERIWETHER. Barely one suggestion and it is, that the majority here have not yet chosen guardians over them.

Mr. PRESIDENT. Before proceeding to put the question, I will remark that I did not know that this proposition was to be made until it was announced to the House this morning. I further ask leave of the Convention to be excused from voting upon it.

Mr. McHENRY. I will only remark that, I did not suppose that you had any such knowledge. I did not mean to insinuate any such thing.

The yeas and nays were then taken, and were yeas, 52, nays, 43. So that the amendment was adopted.

The 7th rule was amended on the motion of Mr. C. A. Wickliffe, by substituting the word "plurality," for the word "majority." So that a plurality of votes in the Convention may appoint committees.

The 8th rule was passed without amendment.

The 9th rule was amended on the suggestion of Mr. Meriwether, by the substitution of the words "presiding officer," for the word "President," so that a gentleman appointed to preside in the absence of the President might have power to clear the galleries in case of disturbance or disorderly conduct.

The 10th rule was passed without amendment.

The 11th rule which provides for the appointment of standing committees on the various articles of the Constitution, was then read for consideration.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. This rule must be regarded, I suppose, as a division of the labor of this body among the committees enumerated here. Therefore it becomes a matter of some importance, before we adopt it, to consider what its effect and operation will be. We have a hundred members in the Convention, and it is proposed that there be eleven committees, consisting of nine members each. Nine times eleven are ninety-nine, which will comprehend every member of the Convention, exclusive of our President.— If every article of the old Constitution is to be the subject matter of alterations, it appears to me that the division of labor here proposed, will be very unequal. There have been several suggestions regarding the proper division of the labor which is to be performed by us, and it is possible that the one which the committee have recommended is the best. I do not think so, however, and I will endeavor to point out a few reasons why I do not think so. I do not suppose it is a matter of very great consequence to members of this body, to be upon a committee for remodeling or amending that which requires no amendment, where there is nothing for the committee to do, except to transcribe and report the provision assigned to them precisely as it stands already. Such, I apprehend, will be the case in regard to the bill of rights. I doubt whether there is any disposition on the part of the Convention, to make any alteration in that so far as the crossing of a T, or the dotting of an I. The committee then, to which that portion of the Constitution will be referred, will have nothing to do; whilst others will have important alterations to make in the parts assigned them.

The partition of labor then, by this method, will be very unequal. It was not without attention to the provisions of the Constitution, that I attempted to partition the labor according to the partition of the various powers of the government, regarding which our judgments have been and will continue to be divided. But without detaining the Convention further with these illustrations, let gentlemen turn their attention to the eighth article of the Constitution. It is as follows:

"The seat of government shall continue in the town of Frankfort until it shall be removed by law; provided, however, that two thirds of all of the members elected to each House of the General Assembly shall concur in the passage of such law."

The time has been, sir, when a much younger man than I am now, that a position upon such committee, and, above all, the privilege of forming such committee, would have been very agreeable to me. It is one of those committees that I would like to have a hand in making, and I have no doubt that my colleague would like to have such a privilege, although I believe that he is in favor of a different place from that which I should choose, to which the seat of government, if removed at all, should be carried. If the privilege were given to me to form a committee to whom this subject should be confided, I could bring together a very formidable corps of advocates for any particular location that I might choose to designate. Therefore it appeared to me, sir, in reference to even this subject, important or unimportant as it may be regarded, as well as in reference to one or two of the general provisions of the Constitution, that it would be proper to make a different distribution of the labors of the committees from that which has been proposed by the committee on rules. We necessarily call into the committee rooms from different sections of the State men who will bring to bear their intellect and their industry, and not have more than their due proportion of labor. Very many of the miscellaneous provisions of the Constitution will not have to be touched in the way of alteration, but merely transcribed. For these reasons I thought it necessary to make these suggestions in reference to a different division of duties. It may, perhaps, be deemed egotistical in me to set up my opinions in opposition to those of the committee and to suggest a different division of labor, but I think it will be apparent, when gentlemen examine the subject, that a different distribution would be attended with much advantage. In regard to the preamble of the Constitution, for instance, what is there for a committee of nine men to do but to direct their clerk to transcribe it. With a view then of obtaining the sense of the Convention regarding a different distribution, I move to strike out so much as relates to the appointment of committees, and to insert so much of the resolution which I offered the other day, as relates to this subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I suppose now is as proper a time as any other, for the consideration of the question, whether this Convention will go about its work through committees,—selected by the Chair or in any other form,—or whether it will go about it in committee of the whole. It seems to me, that if we are determined to do our work with dispatch, and with a proper understanding of what we have to do, and come to a fair and proper conclusion upon every question that is to be presented by every member of this Convention, the right way to do it, is to do it first in committee of the whole. I know of no other plan. My mind can suggest no other; although I know that there is an opinion prevalent in this Convention, in favor of submitting every thing to committees. Some gentlemen would have committees to do that work which the Convention should do itself. I know of no plan by which the work could be so well and so expeditiously done, as it could be in committee of the whole. In addition to this fact, there are other reasons why this Convention should not resolve itself into committees, to do the work of the Convention. I find the reasons, indicated by the gentleman from Nelson, as to the impropriety of raising a committee in reference to the removal of the seat of government, amply sufficient to satisfy my mind, that this work should be done in Convention, and not through committees.—The reasons which present themselves to the gentleman's mind, in reference to the seat of government, will apply with equal force, to every proposition which any gentleman in this Convention may have to make. When sub-committees do the work, the Convention loses its power of control over the work of those committees.—They will be organised in such manner, as that the force and influence and power and talent, to be found in this Convention, will be brought to bear upon particular propositions. Not that the Chair will intentionally make such an organization, but that that will be the necessary result of having the work done through committees. All the talent and influence will be brought to bear in these committees, in order that they may carry out particular objects; and individual members of the Convention, will have no more power against the weight and influence of the committee, in any attempt to overrule or controvert any proposition submitted by the standing committee, than he would have to do any thing that is perfectly impracticable. Sir, it is wrong to work by committees in forming a Constitution. It is right that we should work by Convention, all of us together, that every man in the Convention may hear what every man has to say, and every man be free to present his own proposition and stand by it to the last.

Besides all this, we will, by taking this course, save a great deal of time. We can go to work tomorrow. We can take up the old Constitution, and examine it article by article, section by section, line by line. We can re-adopt that which we consider ought to be re-adopted, and we can modify that which we think ought to be modified. How many amendments will be required to be made to the old Constitution? I apprehend that it is not to be entirely changed. Where then is the necessity for having a committee to examine every article of that Constitution, and to devise something which the people have never conceived of, and which will be perhaps utterly repugnant to them, when devised by the committees of this Convention.

What have we to do? The people desire but few alterations; they ask for but few; we have come here with the view only of making those few, and I know of no platform upon which I would rather work, than the old Constitution.—Although I have ever been in favor of Constitutional reform, and am so now, I know of no platform upon which I would rather work, than the old Constitution. There are many of its provisions which I desire to preserve, and I am not willing that new propositions shall be urged upon this Convention, with all the power and influence of a committee, which may be unacceptable to a majority of this Convention, and yet that majority be unable to control the work of the committee.

I think we can do the work in a shorter time by doing it in Convention, and that we can do it in a manner more satisfactory to ourselves, by resolving ourselves into a committee of the whole, and taking up the old Constitution as I have already intimated. Therefore, I have submitted this proposition. Whether it will meet with a favorable reception on the part of the Convention, of course I cannot tell; but it does appear to me to be the more reasonable and proper course to be pursued.

If we go to work by committees, what is the Convention to be engaged with in the meantime? When are the committees to report? This Convention, to be divided off into eleven committees, composed of nine members each, and the Convention, I suppose, to be dissolved until those committees report. We will meet, I suppose, each day as a matter of mere formality, and wait too, three, or four weeks until the committees are prepared to report. And when those reports shall have been laid before us, will they not have to be considered in Convention? They will still have to be gone over. Then, why not begin at once in Convention? It seems to me that it would be far better.

The Convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 6, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. STUART ROBINSON.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. DAVIS offered the following, which on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed.

1. Resolved, That the Circuit Court system of the State of Kentucky, be so constituted that there shall not be less than circuits, each circuit to have a single Judge, whose term of office shall be years, and who shall be appointed to office in the following manner: Whenever there shall be a vacancy in any circuit, the members of the House of Representatives living within such circuit, shall, at the ensuing session of the Legislature, form an electoral college, and shall choose two fit persons for the office of Judge therein, and report their names forthwith to the Senate, one of whom it shall nominate to the Governor, and he shall be commissioned the Judge of such circuit.

2. Resolved, That the Court of Appeals consist of Judges, who shall hold their offices for and during the term of years, and that they be appointed in the following manner: The Governor shall select from among the Circuit Judges, or such persons as shall have filled the office of Circuit Judge under this amended Constitution, the fittest person to fill such vacancies in said Court, who upon being nominated by him to the Senate, and being approved of by it, shall be commissioned accordingly.

3. Resolved, That the Governor have power to fill such vacancies in the offices of Circuit and Appellate Judges as may occur in the period between the sessions of the Legislature; such appointments to continue until the office shall be filled by regular appointment under the provisions of this Constitution.

4. Resolved, That the Judges of the Court of Appeals and the Circuit Courts shall receive from the public treasury a fixed annual salary, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office; and that the Legislature shall not have the power to pass any law whatever to remove them from office, or the object and tendency of which is to constrain them to resign.

Mr. McHENRY submitted the following, which on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered to be printed:

1. Resolved, That the present mode of calling a Convention to revise the Constitution ought to be retained in the Constitution about to be framed.

2. Resolved, That some mode of making specific amendments, without calling a Convention, should be adopted, to apply only to those articles and sections of the Constitution, about to be framed, which shall be materially different from, and make radical changes in, the present Constitution.

3. Resolved, That the provisions of the present Constitution, upon the subject of slavery, be retained, and inserted, without alteration, in the Constitution about to be framed.

Mr. BRISTOW offered the following as an amendment, which took the same direction:

1. Resolved, That the specific mode of amending the Constitution, by submitting to the voters of the State one clause at a time, is the correct and best mode, and the same can and should be adopted, with such restrictions as to secure the rights of property, and prevent the future agitation of the question of slavery.

2. Resolved, That, in addition to the specific mode of amendment, constitutional provision should be made for taking the vote every twenty years, as to the propriety of calling a Convention.

3. Resolved, That the increase of free persons of color in the State of Kentucky should be prevented in future; and, for that purpose, power should be given to the Legislature to appropriate the necessary means to transport to the colony of Liberia, all such as may consent to go, and all that may be emancipated for that purpose.

Mr. HARGIS offered the following:

Resolved, That the following preamble, and first and second articles (in substance, as the same is herewith presented) be adopted by this Convention as the first and second articles of the Constitution of the State of Kentucky:

THE CONSTITUTION OR FORM OF GOVERNMENT FOR THE STATE OF KENTUCKY.

Preamble.

We, the Representatives of the people of the State of Kentucky, in Convention assembled, grateful to the supreme Being for the blessings hitherto enjoyed, and feeling our dependence on him for a continuation of those blessings, in order to secure to all the citizens thereof the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and of pursuing happiness, do make, ordain, and establish this Constitution for its future government.

THE POWERS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Article 1.

1. The powers of the government of the State of Kentucky shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to-wit: Those which are legislative to one, those which are executive to another, and those which are judiciary to another.

2. No person or collection of persons, being one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in cases hereinafterwards directed or permitted.

THE LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

Article 2.

1. The legislative power of this Commonwealth shall be vested in two distinct branches, the one to be styled the House of Representatives, the other the Senate, and both together the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

2. The members of the House of Representatives shall continue in office for the term of two years from the commencement of the general election, and no longer. The members of the Senate shall continue in office for the term of four years from the commencement of the general election, and no longer.

3. Representatives shall be chosen on the first Monday in August every second year, and shall meet at the capitol of the State on the — day of ——— every second year. The Senate shall also meet at the same time and place every second year, and shall be chosen on the first Monday in August every four years, but shall only assemble at the same time and place of the meeting of the members of the House of Representatives.

4. The General Assembly, as aforesaid, shall not continue in session more than forty days, unless upon extraordinary occasions, the Governor, by proclamation, should think proper to continue them in session longer, but, in no instance, shall the session be prolonged over sixty days.

5. The General Assembly shall have no power to grant divorces, or pass any law dissolving the marriage contract; nor shall they have power to pass any act or law for individual or private benefit, unless four fifths of all the members of both houses concur in the passage thereof.

6. They shall pass laws establishing in each and every county in this State at least five election precincts; and in every city or town, entitled to one or more members, they shall establish at least three election precincts, and more if the Legislature should think proper. All elections shall be held at the time and places established by law.

7. No person shall be a Representative who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States, and hath not attained to the age of twenty four years, and resided in this State two years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof in the county, city, or town, for which he may be chosen.

8. No person shall be a Senator who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States, and who hath not attained to the age of thirty five years, and resided six years in this State next preceding his election, and the last year thereof in the district for which he may be chosen.

9. In all elections for all and every officer in this Commonwealth, who are by this Constitution to be elected by the people, and also for members of Congress, or President of the United States, or Vice President, every free white male citizen who, at the time being, hath attained to the age of twenty one years, and resided in this State one year, or more, and in the county, city, or town, where he offers to vote at least four months, shall be entitled to vote for all and either of said officers, except foreigners not naturalized, and persons convicted of felony and not pardoned.

10. At the first session of the General Assembly after this Constitution takes effect, the Senators shall be divided by lot, as equally as may be, into two classes; the seats of the Senators of the first class shall be vacated at the end of the second year, so that half of the Senators shall be elected every second year.

11. The first election for Senators, after this Constitution takes effect, shall be general throughout the State and at the same time that Representatives are elected; and thereafter there shall be a biennial election for half the number of Senators to which the State is entitled.

12. Representation shall be equal throughout the State as near as may be, agreeably to the ratio as laid, from time to time, by the General Assembly, according to the number of qualified voters in the State. The General Assembly shall never consist of more than one hundred members in the House Representatives, nor more than thirty eight Senators. At the first session of the General Assembly, after the taking effect of this Constitution, they shall lay off the State into as many senatorial districts as there may then be Senators, and apportion the representation in the House of Representatives and Senate amongst the several counties, towns, cities, and districts, to which the State is entitled.

13. The General Assembly shall have no power to pass any law for the emancipation of slaves while they remain in this State. They may pass laws to emancipate slaves, saving the rights of creditors, with the consent of their owners, upon condition that they are not to be free until they leave the borders of this State; and, upon condition, that if such emancipated slave, or slaves, should ever return into Kentucky, that he, she, or they, are to be taken up and sold for the benefit of the State Treasury.

14. The General Assembly may pass laws prohibiting the importation of slaves into this State for the purposes of sale, but shall pass no law prohibiting their importation, if acquired by gift, grant, or devise by will, or otherwise: Provided, the same is solely and bona fide for the use of the importer. Laws may be passed to compel owners of slaves to treat them humanely.

15. In apportioning the representation for Representatives to both houses of the General Assembly, where one county does not contain the number of qualified voters required by law to elect a Representative or Senator, in that case, two or more counties may be joined together (which counties must lie joining each other) for the purposes of electing a Senator or Representative. The number of Representatives at the first session of the General Assembly, after this Constitution takes effect, shall consist of one hundred members, and the Senate of ———, to be apportioned as directed in the twelfth section of the second article of this Constitution: Provided, that when two or more counties adjoining, have residuums over and above the ratio, when fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to the ratio fixed, in that case, one Representative shall be added to that county having the largest residuum.

16. The House of Representatives shall choose its Speaker and other officers.

17. The apportionment of representation for members to the General Assembly, and the laying the State off into corresponding or suitable districts, shall be done every four years.

18. The Congressional Districts should be laid off and the apportionment made every ten years, containing the ratio, or number of qualified voters, agreeably to the laws of the United States, for the purpose of electing members to Congress.

19. Not less than a majority of the members of each house of the General Assembly shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and shall be authorised by law, to compel the attendance of absent members, under such rules and penalties as they may prescribe.

20. Each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualifications and returns of its members; and a contested election shall be determined by law.

21. Each house of the General Assembly may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish a member for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member.

22. Each house of the General Assembly shall keep and publish, weekly, a journal of its proceedings; and the yeas and nays of the members, on any question, shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on the journal.

23. Neither house of the General Assembly shall adjourn for more than two days at a time, during the session, nor to any other place, without the concurrence of the other.

24. The members of the General Assembly shall receive from the public treasury, for their services, such compensation as may be authorized by law, but no increase or alteration in the compensation of members of either house shall take effect during the session at which the same is altered or increased.

25. The members of the General Assembly shall, in all cases, (except felony, treason, breach, or surety of the peace) be privileged from arrest, or imprisonment, during their attendance on their respective houses, and in going to, and returning from, the same; nor for any speech or debate in the house, shall they be questioned in any other place.

26. No Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, nor for one year thereafter, be eligible to any civil office under this Commonwealth, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased, during the time such Senator or Representative was in office, except such offices as may be made, or filled by the election of the people.

27. No person, while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society, or sect, nor whilst he holds or exercises any office of profit under this Commonwealth, shall be eligible to the General Assembly, except attorneys at law, Justices of the Peace, and militia officers: Provided, That attorneys for the Commonwealth who receive a fixed annual salary from the public treasury, shall be ineligible.

28. No officer of any kind whatever, shall be eligible to a seat in the General Assembly, until he has obtained a quietus or receipt for all the moneys due, or owing from him, to the Commonwealth, or to the county in which he resides.

29. No bill shall have the force of a law, until on three several days, it be read over in each house of the General Assembly, and free discussion allowed thereon, unless four-fifths of the house where the bill shall be depending, may deem it expedient to dispense with this rule.

30. All bills for raising revenue, shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose amendments relative to the revenue, the same as in other cases.

31. The General Assembly shall have power to pass all laws not contrary to this Constitution, or the laws and Constitution of the United States, which they may think proper and expedient; they shall also regulate by law, in what manner vacancies in either house may be filled.

32. In all elections by the people, the votes shall be publicly given, "viva voce," and be proclaimed by the Sheriff of the election; nor shall any election in this Commonwealth continue more than one day; but nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to prohibit the Governor from proclaiming and issuing writs of elections, upon occasions extraordinary, or as may be required by law.

The Secretary proceeded to read the proposition, but before he had read it through,

Mr. IRWIN. The proposition is to print, I believe. If the House has determined to print a new Constitution of which we know nothing, it of course will do so, but I will move the old Constitution as a substitute therefor. I think it the best way of getting at the printing of the old Constitution, and I move that we dispense with the further reading of the proposition of the gentleman.

The question was then taken on the motion to dispense with the further reading of the proposition and it was agreed to.

Mr. IRWIN. I do not desire to run the State into any expense, as I do not believe we have a great deal of money to expend; but as I understand that fifty or sixty thousand copies of the present Constitution were printed last year, by order of the Legislature, I should like to modify my proposition so as to provide that members should be furnished with copies. They could perhaps be readily obtained at the printing office, or in some of the offices about the Capitol. I certainly move to dispense with the printing of the proposition just offered.

The question was then taken on printing the proposition of Mr. Hargis, and referring it to the committee of the whole; and the Convention refused so to dispose of it.

Mr. PRESTON offered the following:

Resolved, That it is expedient, in any Constitution which may be formed by this Convention, to classify the offices which may be declared to be elective therein, into those of a general and local character, so that the elections of persons to fill the same may occur at different times.

The attention of gentlemen will undoubtedly be engaged in regard to the mode of electing officers, and the offices would be naturally classified into those of a local and those of a general character. I hope to be able to show, when the time comes, that this will be the only practicable mode by which we can conduct those elections which I have no doubt the Convention will agree to have held, under the Constitution we propose to form. I move that the resolution be printed and referred to a committee of the whole.

The motion was agreed to.

RULES OF ORDER.

The Convention resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on rules.

The 11th proposed rule being under consideration when the subject was last before the Convention, it was again read.

The question was on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Bourbon, as published in the report of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is no gentleman belonging to this body with more anxiety than my-myself, that the labors of this body should be bought to a speedy and successful close. Nor is there anyone more aware than I am that the interposition of any obstacle to a free and fair discussion, would be the means of frustrating, to a very great extent that desirable object. I am for establishing some correct basis of procedure, and not having had the honor to present any project for the consideration of the Convention, I am wedded to no plan, and I am prepared with an unbiased judgment to decide upon the various propositions which have been submitted. If I belonged to the division of this body, if there be such a division, who believe that no alteration should be made in the existing Constitution, I should be prepared to support the substitute offered by the gentleman from Bourbon. In my apprehension the substitute assumes that the existing Constitution is not susceptible of improvement. At least it presents the question in a very doubtful aspect. It presupposes that it has to a very great extent the approbation of this body, and resolves the question into a mere enquiry as to whether it can or cannot be improved. The people of Kentucky by a large and decided majority, say they will have constitutional amendment and reform. We come up here representing a constituency in favor of such a measure. Shall we then at the very threshold present ourselves in such an attitude as to appear before our constituency as doubting whether such amendment and reform can be made? In assuming the existing Constitution as a basis of our operations in committee of the whole we give to it prima facie our preference. So it would seem to me, and hence I am opposed to the plan proposed by the gentleman from Bourbon. The sanction of all parliamentary usage as I understand it, is against such a proposition. It is necessary that some nucleus should be formed around which the opinions of this body can be concentrated. The effect of presenting the present Constitution, and taking up article by article in committee of the whole, would be to resolve every member of this Convention who may have a plan of his own into a committee. He presents his own project, and there would be a want of concentration and unity of action, which it seems to me would be the means of protracting debate here, and of lengthening much beyond the time which has been anticipated, the session of the Convention. It has been objected that in the meantime, while these committees were digesting various plans and were preparing their reports, this Convention would be without business. The rules propose to embody this entire Convention into eleven committees of nine members each—constituting aggregately ninety-nine members, and these would be engaged in carrying forward the business of this Convention. It is true the Convention, as a body, might not be prepared to act immediately after the appointment of the committees, but still the business which has assembled us here, would nevertheless be in progress. I was at the first blush, prepared to vote for such an organization of committees as is contemplated by the resolutions of the gentleman from Nelson, but upon reflection, it seems to me that the labors of this body would be better distributed by the plan proposed in the report of the committee on rules. The labors of the committees being thus indicated, it seems to me we might at an earlier period be prepared to commence the operations which have brought us here together. Under that state of the case, and with a view to facilitate as far as may be, the object which has assembled it, and to despatch as speedily as may be the business of the Convention, I shall for one vote for the rules as they have been reported by the committee.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The question immediately before the Convention is the motion of the gentleman from Bourbon, to substitute for the proposition I have offered, the one that we will at 11 o'clock each day go into committee of the whole, and take up the Constitution as we find it on the statute book, and then alter and amend it as each member may choose to propose. All who favor the appointment of committees in preference, will of course vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, whether they prefer the number of committees and the division of their labors and duties introduced in the report of the committee, or in the amendment proposed by myself. I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the gentleman from Bourbon, and to his illustrations of the effect of his mode of proceeding, but some little experience in the legislative branches of our government, has taught me to believe, I may be wrong, that we must work under the guidance of rules, and that seldom, unless on extraordinary occasions, is the public business advanced or promoted by dispensing with the rules which govern us. Under these rules, to work prudently and intelligently, we must have system and order. Suppose that we go into committee of the whole at once on the Constitution of Kentucky, and each member has his project of amendment. We have had already several indications of the opinions of members through resolutions, and there was one this morning embracing almost the entire Constitution. We should have in committee of the whole, perhaps, to discuss and debate the proposition to amend in some shape and form, of every gentleman here, whereas, if the amendment or the principle upon which it is predicated was drawn out in form with care by some committee, you would see the whole framework before you. I will assume what I believe to be the fact, and I do not think I can be mistaken, that a large majority of this body have been elected here upon the principle that the tenure of all officers, whether Executive, Legislative, or Judicial, should be changed. They have been, too, a large majority upon another principle, that the mode of appointment should be changed from that of the Executive exercise of power to an election by the voters of the State. Now I assume upon that principle that the Judiciary is to be organized on the basis of the elective franchise, and I ask you in organizing the whole judicial system of this Commonwealth—the Appellate Courts, Circuit Courts, Chancery Courts, and County Courts,—how long it would take this Convention, by resolution and amendment to perform that labor, and produce its result in any thing like an intelligent shape? It would be a most admirable theatre, I admit, for the display of those powers possessed by many in this House, to illustrate the necessity of a reform in the organic law, and to point out abuses which have crept into our system.

of government and the necessity for their reform; but we want nothing to convince us of that. Our constituents sent us here to execute their will in that particular, and the object now is to lay out the work, and carry out the reforms in accordance with their wishes. Delay and inconvenience must be the result of discussing the Constitution in the mode indicated by the gentleman from Bourbon. I think what has taken place this morning must satisfy every member of the House that under such a system, we must have amendment after amendment, and substitute upon substitute, to an extent that the House, by the hour of 1 o'clock, would be brought into such a state of confusion that it would not be able, in the course of a week's session, to tell precisely the question upon which they were called upon to vote. I will therefore briefly call the attention of the Convention to the division of labor, if we appoint the committees as indicated in the rule under consideration. I am sure that if the committee will review their own works, they will see that it is not the best division that could be made. The preamble and first article of the Constitution were to be referred to one committee of nine Delegates. The first article is merely the division of the powers of government into three several classes of magistrates; the next, that no person exercising the duties of one office shall interfere with another—and there ends the whole duties of nine Delegates. You refer this preamble and article to nine men to make report, when it is not designed to change either of them. As I remarked yesterday as to the schedule, when you take up the Constitution as we have it put together, you will find that if you confine the duties of the committees to the several articles and not to the operations of power, you will have under the head of Judicial or Legislative branch, the business of appointing coroners or sheriffs, and of appointing and commissioning militia officers. There can be then I think not much harmony in the work of these constituted committees when they shall be engaged in their labor.

In reference to the question of delay, I have already said I believe that we would save time, and expedite the work of this body, by the adoption of a plan of committees. The gentleman from Bourbon seems to think that we shall all be idle, and there will be nothing to do in this House, while the committees are at work; and he consoled himself with the idea that he could go home and attend to his business at the courts; but if he happened to be assigned on a very important committee he would be unwilling to go home. Sir, this House will have enough to employ itself from the hour of 10 o'clock until 2 o'clock, in considering and discussing the various propositions that have and may be thrown upon the table, by way of settling general questions. For instance, if it is necessary to try the judgment of the House on an elective judiciary, we can have a resolution on the subject, that may as well be discussed in the House as elsewhere. Meanwhile, the judiciary committee would be at work, predicated their labor on what, in the opinion of this House was the public sentiment, that the judiciary should be elected. They could soon give us the result of their labor in such a form that the country and the House could see it, and take it up, and judge how the principle of an elective judiciary could be carried out with safety to the country and the people. On their report coming in, we could take it up as the Legislature do a bill, and move to amend it, add to it, and discuss it. It is no objection to me if we have a committee, to say that its influence will be felt in the House. You will have individuals—members of this body—whose duty it will be made particularly to attend to the work of their own hands—to see that it is perfect, and to prevent, as far as they can, by argument and discussion, any innovation that is calculated to render it worse, or change it entirely in feature or principle. With this explanation I shall leave it, so far as I am concerned, to the judgment of the House, to pursue what I have no doubt it will do, on all occasions, its own course in reference to the action through which it will get at its labors. As to the question of time—if this was a meeting got up to nominate a man for Governor, we have been here long enough to do it. If we had come here to take up local legislation, and to redress personal grievances, we have been here long enough to pass at least fifty or sixty divorce bills. But the amending of a constitution that has lasted for some fifty years, and the making of one that shall last, I hope, fifty years longer, is a work not to be done in haste. It requires deliberation, examination, order and system, that we may be satisfied with the results of our labor when it goes from our hands.

Mr. DIXON. I feel that it is very important that the Convention arrive at a proper decision as to the three propositions which are now before it; because on that will depend very much, our success in the progress of the business of the Convention. There are three propositions which are submitted, and I apprehend that every gentleman of the Convention is anxious to adopt that which will be best in bringing about a proper system of doing the business of the Convention. The first proposition is that which has been submitted by the committee appointed to report rules for the business of the Convention. The second is that which has been offered, I believe, by the gentleman from Nelson as a substitute; and the third, is that which has been offered by the gentleman from Bourbon, as a substitute for the whole. These are the various propositions that have been submitted. I do not see a very great difference between the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, and that presented by the committee. They are in substance very much the same. But there is a very great difference between the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon and that of the committee, or that of the gentleman from Nelson. I am clearly of opinion, that either the proposition reported by the committee, or that of the gentleman from Nelson, should be adopted. When I first came here, I was of the opinion myself, that the plan proposed by the gentleman from Bourbon would be the best; but in examining the course pursued by other Conventions, I satisfied myself that this plan would be wholly impracticable. I discovered that the Virginia Convention, in the first place, appointed a committee whose business it was to report the proper mode of proceeding. I discovered in the same Convention, a proposition made by a distinguished member of that body, similar to the one proposed by the gentleman from Bourbon. It was voted down, I think, by a large majority of the Convention. A similar proposition was made in the New York Convention and voted down. I understand from a gentleman who has looked into the matter, that a similar proposition was made to the Tennessee Convention and adopted by it, and that after some time progressing under it, they came to the conclusion that it was a bad mode and abandoned it, and at last adopted the mode suggested by the committee or the gentleman from Nelson—that is, in spirit and substance.

I think that either the proposition reported by the committee, or that offered as a substitute by the gentleman from Nelson, should be adopted, because I am confident we shall never progress with the business of the convention unless we refer the important matters to committees. I care not what the committees may be, so they are formed on proper principles and organized with a view of preparing the business of the convention. I understand that my friend from Bourbon, whose speech I listened to with great pleasure, finds one great objection to the appointment of committees in the extraordinary influence which he apprehends they may exercise over the members of this convention. I understand the proposition he has laid down to be, that whenever a committee has reported, an individual will be scarcely heard on this floor, or if heard at all, his voice will be lost in the mighty influence exercised by the committee over the other members. On this point, I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken. What are the privileges of members of this house? When these committees have reported, are there not various modes by which we may at once avoid any decision on their report. I do not like the decision of the committee, and I may make a proposition to recommit their report, or I may propose to lay it on the table, or to refer it to another committee. Do I not take the sense of the whole house as to the propriety of laying it on the table, of referring it back, or of making any other disposition it may be thought proper to make of it? Do I not address the good sense of the house as to the propriety of the step? And is it to be said that it is to be overridden by the mere expression of the committee, that it is right and proper their report should be adopted? Surely not. I see no possible objection, so far as regards any influence which the committee may exercise. We select these committees because we have confidence in them, and with a view not only that they may suggest the best mode of preparing the subject before them, but that they may bring it before the convention in such a form as will satisfy the country. That is the object. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon? "The submission of all these matters at once to the committee of the whole, says he, will enable us to progress at once. We avoid the influence of committees in the first place, and then proceed at once to the investigation of all the great questions involved in an amendment of the constitution. And, says he, if we appoint committees and refer the business to them, what is this convention to do in their absence?" Does not the gentleman know that every possible proposition that any gentleman may think proper to bring forward can be submitted to the committee, and when or before it is submitted that you can discuss the proposition itself. I may offer a proposition to this effect, as I did yesterday, that the judicial officers of this government ought to be elected by the people, but that they should be placed on an eminence which should secure them against popular influences; against the prejudices that might be engendered from the various causes that might arise in the election of a judge and induce him to give a decision at war with the real principles involved in the case. I offer a proposition like that, and in what form do I present it? Resolved, That the committee on such an article of the constitution be instructed to report the substance of that proposition as an amendment to the constitution. I present this by way of illustration; and does not every gentleman see that when that proposition was reported, he would have the right to arise, and take issue with the principle, and to discuss it to any extent he may desire. Every proposition that any gentleman may desire, he will have full liberty to make, presenting it in the form of instructions to any one committee, and requiring them to report an amendment engrafting in the constitution the principle contained in the resolution offered. Does not every gentleman see at once that there is no difficulty on this point? Why then the necessity of referring everything to a committee of the whole, and dispensing entirely with the committees which are usual in all parliamentary bodies, and which are necessary to the proper presentation of business. It does seem to me that we have only to look at the ordinary routine of doing business in bodies like this to satisfy ourselves at once that this plan of committees is the one which will best conduce to the proper and speedy discharge of our business. After going into committee of the whole on the constitution, does any man suppose that he is to amend it as he desires. He may make speeches, and offer propositions to his heart's content, but what will he do in the way of amendment after all. He would have to provide some committee to lick the bantling into form. You cannot get along without committees, and it is useless to attempt it, as gentlemen would find if they adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon. I thought it to be the right plan when I first came here, and intended to offer a similar proposition myself, but on reflection, I am satisfied that it will not result in forwarding the business of the convention but rather in retarding it.

Mr. LINDSEY preferred the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, and was opposed to the appointment of committees. He said by turning to the present Constitution it would be found that there were several articles which needed no alteration. Take as has been suggested the first article, where it is proposed that nine members of this body shall be designated to do a work which no one believes is desired. The gentleman from Breathitt (Mr. Hargis) has himself this morning presented as much labor as a committee of nine could have performed during the whole session. No one thinks of changing the plan by which the powers of the government are distributed, or the declaration that one branch of the government shall not interfere with another, and therefore so far as a committee is organized on that subject, the whole work is already done and well done. There are several articles of the Constitution in the same position. Take the article in reference to impeachments—upon which also it is proposed to constitute a committee of nine; no one thinks of changing the present mode of impeaching officers or the present declarations of the Constitution in relation thereto, unless it should be previously determined to change the mode of electing the legislature and the judiciary, and then it would become important to change the whole Constitution on the subject of impeachment. What is to become of this committee during the time that another and an important committee is acting on a matter confided to them. Are they to sit in silence or to find other pursuits to engage them until this question is determined? So on the article in relation to the seat of government—and just here I beg leave to remark, that if there is to be a committee on that subject, I hope it will be of one, and I that member—because I am not disposed like Banquo's ghost to wander in these halls alone, while my friends Macbeth and Macduff are settling their controversy. Take the article in relation to slavery—it has been indicated here, and I think sufficiently strong, that no one contemplates the introduction of new propositions in relation to slavery. There are but two sections to the article. One is, that slavery shall exist in this Commonwealth, and the mode by which emancipation shall take place; and there is the manner in which public prosecutions shall be had against slaves. What is to become of that while discussion is going on in relation to the executive and legislative departments? We are here for some purpose, and what is it? The present Constitution points it out. We first, are to revise or re-adopt the Constitution as it now exists. If we refuse to adopt it, what next? Then we are to amend, alter, or change the present Constitution. Suppose we adopt this last course, let us see then whether we are not now under the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon precisely where we would be after the reports of all the committees proposed were before the house. We are, and if expedition is the intention and object of this body, it ought at once to adopt that resolution as a substitute for the report of the committee on rules, and proceed to take the vote whether we will re-adopt the present Constitution. If we fail to do that, then we could proceed to amend, section by section, article by article, the present Constitution. If we take it up on that plan, see what will be the operation. The second article relates to the legislative department—the first section to the qualifications of electors. Delegates here have already presented propositions in relation to qualifications and restrictions upon the right of suffrage.—This is one of the most important questions to be settled, and at the very outset of amending this Constitution. It is to come before this body in connection with the principle of electing all the officers of the State—not only the representative but the executive and judicial officers. If we decide to adopt the principle of electing all officers, there at once the incipient step is the determination by whom they shall be elected.

And when you settle the qualification of the elector who is to elect your representative; you have settled it in regard to all other officers.—Adopt the plan proposed by the committee on rules, and you refer this subject to three distinct committees, and they will perhaps each report a distinct and different proposition. Each proposition will be subject to amendment, or the whole may be rejected and some substitute offered by any member adopted. It will be found by looking into the three leading articles of the present Constitution, that the whole work is to be done there.

So far as regards the executive, there is but little to do, and I imagine that if gentlemen will turn their attention to the present constitution, they will find there is to be but slight change under any state of the case in that article. The only changes will as directly come up under discussion on an amendment to the second article in relation to the legislative branch of the government, as they will under that referring to the executive branch. All the sections in the present constitution in relation to the executive department, are embraced under the heads of the ages and qualifications of those elected to the offices of Governor and Lieut. Governor—when these terms shall commence and when end, and their several powers and duties. And here I would remark, that under the arrangement as introduced by the committee there will be found matters in the present constitution that really do not belong to the heads under which they are placed. Take for instance, the executive branch of the government under our present constitution—many of the powers and duties appertaining to which were distributed under the head of general powers. So it will be seen at once that it will be utterly impossible, under the arrangement the committee have made for us, that the powers and duties of the several officers can be arranged in a manner in which they can be satisfactory. After the committees shall have reported we shall be precisely at the point where we are now. You take up the present constitution, and you proceed to amend, alter, or change it. The committees come in with their reports, and you proceed to act upon them, having their projet of a constitution in connection with the original one before you. You will have the same difficulties to meet as it is contended exist now. I think therefore that the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon is the true and correct one.

We are not a legislative body—we are to originate nothing new here—and the preparation of the duties devolved upon us cannot be assimilated to that of a legislative body. There propositions are originated by members, and it becomes a matter of importance that they should be referred to the standing committees of the House, composed of persons of experience and skill in the formation of the course of legislation, that they may be compared with the Constitution of the land, in order that it may be seen whether they are in accordance with the provisions of that instrument. That is not the case here. We take up section by section, and any gentleman may propose to amend. Suppose there should be a dozen amendments offered, these are all acted upon, and when you have passed through your existing Constitution, and have before you all the amendments that gentlemen choose to offer, then you have the opportunity of making a selection and of arranging them in a form perfectly to be understood by every member of the House. I regard the plan suggested by the gentleman from Bourbon as the correct one, but if that is rejected I much prefer the plan introduced by the gentleman from Nelson to that introduced by the committee; and for the reason just given, that the present Constitution embodies under different heads matters which should not be there. The resolution of the gentleman from Nelson indicates the particular duties of the committees and their arrangement in a better form than they exist under the present Constitution, but it seems to me that even there we shall be met with the difficulties I have suggested. The various committees will have their various projects, whereas, if the Convention first settled the principle—to elect all officers for example—they would have at once the settlement of the question; the delay too would be far less.

Mr. MERIWETHER. The committee have reported rules, among which is one, that requires each gentleman to confine himself to the question before the house; and I would be very glad to see such a rule adopted, if no other.—The question now pending before the Convention, is whether we shall have committees at all or not. The question pending, is between the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, which excludes committees, and the other propositions which recommend their formation. Now I have been taught to believe that the province of the committee of the whole, was to settle general principles, the province of sub-committees, to arrange the details. Then when we are in committee of the whole, we will debate general principles, and when we meet in sub-committee we will arrange details. For instance, sir, after the members of the sub-committees collectively here as a body in convention shall have heard the discussion of general principles, and when those principles shall have been settled, then the appropriate committees may arrange the details to carry out those general principles.

I trust the Convention will vote down the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, and then the question will come up between the proposition submitted by the committee, and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Nelson.

Mr. DAVIS. I would not have said a word upon the subject, if I had not been a member of the committee for drafting rules, and had not submitted to the committee a proposition similar to the one now under consideration. I presented to the committee a proposition, similar to the one offered by my colleague for which I was indebted to his kindness. I will state my objection to the report of the committee in a few words. I agree with the chairman of the committee, that the business of the committee of the whole, is to settle the great and leading principles which are to guide the action of this body, and that the office or function of sub-committees is to throw those great principles into form or shape, and to report to us practical measures for adoption by the Convention; and so of all legislative bodies. Well now, what is proposed here? Not, as my friend says, a question simply whether any committees are to be raised or not. That is not the only question. In addition to that, there is the much more important question, shall the whole Constitution as it now exists, undergo unlimited discussion in relation to the principles contained in it, and those which gentlemen think should be embodied in the new Constitution, or be referred to sub-committees and be discussed by them in the committee rooms; or shall those leading and general principles be settled in the first instance in committee of the whole? That is the question. Now, sir, the most perfect consummation of legislative measures that I know of in the world, is to be found in the British Parliament; that is, their measures are better matured than those of any other legislative body to be found on the face of the earth. What is the uniform course that is pursued there? A subject is debated in the House of Commons in committee of the whole, and the great leading principles are there discussed, deliberated upon, decided, and established; after that has been done, the subject is referred to a sub-committee invariably, to give shape and fashion to the measures growing out of those principles thus debated. Now that is the proposition of my honorable friend, and it involves this question, whether this Convention in committee of the whole will proceed to do its proper and important office of deciding for itself the great leading principles that shall be embodied in the Constitution beforehand, and afterwards refer the different subjects thus discussed and decided upon to the appropriate committees for the purpose of being drawn up in the form of a Constitution, or whether we shall permit the important work of forming a decision upon the great leading principles of the Constitution to be done in the sub-committee rooms. I think the first mode the best. What is the proposition and its effect? Why, as I said before, every principle to be embodied in the new Constitution, every principle which any member of this Convention shall have thrown before the body for its consideration, every one which may merely be as yet nestling in the mind of any man is to be thrown by sections before the committees, and the reports of those committees taken together, will form the whole of any Constitution that we may make. Well now the question is, shall these committees go into secret conclave, pledged, perhaps themselves, against every important principle that you may propose—come before this Convention with their minds irrevocably fixed for or against those principles, or shall they first be discussed by the body—shall we have the advantage of a free and unrestricted interchange of opinion in regard to them? I prefer the latter course. What will be the effect of this proposition? Why, when the various subjects are referred to these committees, they will go into their committee rooms and there decide the principle of the various subjects entrusted to them; they will establish fixed and immutable rules for or against the principle contained in each particular proposition. They will then come in and make their report. When that is done? The reports of the committees are taken seriatim, referred to a committee of the whole, and there debated, and precisely the same work which we now propose to go about in committee of the whole will then remain to be performed. The question then is, whether it is better to go through the useless process of obtaining these reports, or shall we in the first instance consider the various subjects in committee of the whole?

But this is not all. After the committee of the whole has acted upon the reports of the sub-committees, and has agreed upon the great principles to be embodied in the Constitution, there must then be a general committee of compilation, or something like it, and to this must be referred the work of throwing together the result of the labor of the various committees, and reporting back to the convention a draft of a constitution, composed of the various reports of the sub-committees. This report must be again referred to the committee of the whole, and the same deliberation and discussion must be gone over again, with every opportunity for gentlemen to submit all the propositions which they might be inclined to submit if the old constitution were now taken up for consideration in accordance with the proposition of my honorable friend. Well now I think, as a matter of economy of time, certainly as a matter of deliberate, well considered action, as affording an opportunity for eliciting information by interchange of views, it may be more readily effected by his proposition than by that of the committee. There will be, by pursuing this method an opportunity afforded to every member of the convention to explain his views to the utmost extent that he can desire. But it is not the speeches of gentlemen that we want. I want to hear propositions from every member of this house upon every important principle that is to be embodied in the constitution. I want the benefit of the reason and experience and the deliberate judgment of every member, in the form of a proposition, and I will give to it such weight as in my judgment it may be entitled to; and I want this aid, I want such lights as I can obtain from the weakest and most ignoble as well as from the brightest and strongest intellect; for there is no man so weak but he may sometimes suggest wise and valuable propositions. I want all these aids in forming a new constitution to be substituted for that which has controlled the destinies of this Commonwealth so gloriously for half a century. I think that we can place ourselves upon no better platform than that which comes to us, sanctioned by the names of Breckinridge, of Innis, of Grundy.

Now a word to my honorable and honored friend from Henderson. I will tell him why in my judgment we should not be governed by the mode adopted in the Conventions of Tennessee, Virginia, and New York. Those Conventions contemplated an amendment of the existing Constitutions—not a fundamental change; not certainly those radical and important changes which have been already proposed to us. They did not contemplate such changes, they set themselves to improve and modify their respective Constitutions, not to cut them up by the roots; but it seems that this Convention has assembled with far different motives, at least on the part of some. The great principles then that are involved in such a radical change ought to be discussed in committee of the whole, and not by sub-committees. The Convention itself ought to do the work.

I have thus stated in few words the reasons which induced me to differ from the committee.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. I was prepared yesterday to favor the resolutions of my friend from Bourbon. They were such as commended themselves to my mind for adoption; and one great point which recommended them, was that the method of proceeding indicated by them would discipline our minds and make us more au fait at the business we have to do. But after reflection upon the subject, I am of opinion that it would be objectionable, inasmuch as it will throw into this house, the whole constitution in all its various parts and propositions, and instead of facilitating our deliberations, it will operate as an element of division and scatter to the four winds every thing like concentrated action upon any given subject; and the argument of the gentleman from Bourbon, drawn from the history of the British Parliament is in my opinion fallacious to this extent, that although in the Parliament of England, as I understand, they consider important questions in committee of the whole, and leave the details to be settled by select committees, it will be remembered that the subjects which engage their attention differ from those which it will be our province to consider.—There an isolated question is presented and it is proper that it should be considered in committee of the whole; but here the whole Constitution of Kentucky en masse is submitted to our consideration. Here it is not an isolated question. In the Parliament of England a single subject is submitted, and it is discussed in committee of the whole and sent to a select committee to be matured in its details. No such single proposition is before us, therefore the point of the gentleman's argument, I think fails to be analogous to the truth of this case.

The great objection I have to the business of this House being done by committees is one which I have no doubt has suggested itself to the mind of every man in the House. It is this, that we all have our cherished theories, that the people who have sent us here have their cherished theories, and the committees who will have these various subjects in charge, it is reasonable to believe, will be imbued with their predilections and preferences. They will deliberate carefully, consult authorities, and by every possible means endeavor to establish their own cherished doctrines. And they will be prepared to defend them against all attacks; they will be armed with authorities, and will be in a complete state of preparation to engage in debate.—The House in the meantime are not engaged in deliberation upon those subjects, they have not consulted authorities, they have not had the discipline which the members of the committee will have the advantage of. But on the contrary they are taken unawares by the return of the committee to the House with their proposition. The Committee will stand forth strong and vigorous, compact and well disciplined, against whom individuals in the house, whose minds, not less vigorous, but more crude and unprepared, cannot expect to prevail. This is the great advantage that will be possessed by the committees. It may, however, be obviated under the rules which have been reported. Suppose a committee to have an important subject under consideration. While they are so engaged, I may move to instruct that committee to pursue a course that is consistent with my own ideas.— This will become the subject of discussion here, and our minds will be brought to deliberate on the self same subject which occupies the attention of the committee. By proceeding in this way we will prepare ourselves to meet the objections of the committee and to combat the position taken by them. This objection then being overcome, the argument of the gentleman from Bourbon (Mr. Williams) would fall to the ground, and in its stead would arise this argument, that by adopting either the rules that have been reported by the committee or the resolution of the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) we shall facilitate the progress of business whilst we acquire all the advantage which the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon presents to our consideration. We were sent here by the people, not to demolish the present Constitution; there is no danger that we shall do that, I will inform my honorable friend. We have been sent here to reform various material portions of our Constitution, but not to destroy it altogether. I can assure the gentleman there is no such radical spirit as that. Depend upon it, however much a man's mind may be carried away by ideas of radicalism here, the moderate reformer, the man who confines himself within the bounds of strict conservatism is the man who will best recommend himself to the consideration of those who sent us here. I believe there are very few, if any, in this Convention, who contemplate an entire change of the Constitution. I believe that to go into such a radical change as the gentleman seems to apprehend would be to transcend the limits of our duty. I should regard it as one of the greatest evils that could befall us, if this Convention were to determine upon so entire and complete a change in all the great principles which our Constitution embraces, because the consequence would inevitably be the rejection of our labors on the part of our constituency and the very moment that it is rejected, it will give rise to agitations which will be attended with the most disastrous consequences.— But I rose merely to make the suggestion which I have made in reference to one point in the remarks of my friend from Bourbon.

Mr. BROWN. If we were about to engage in the details of legislation, the establishment of standing committees, it seems to me, would be highly proper and necessary. But we are not here for such a purpose. We have been delegated by the people to revise the present system of government in Kentucky, and to embody general principles which are to guide and govern this great Commonwealth. Now, the question presented in the three propositions is simply this: It is in what mode shall we approach the work which lies before us. I am sure, sir, that I am anxious to get at it by the best mode. Now, sir, it seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Bourbon is misapprehended by some of the delegates. They seem to comprehend it as dispensing entirely with the service of committees. I do not so understand it. It does not take it out of the power of the Convention to appoint a committee whenever the services of a committee may be deemed necessary. I cannot see how the appointment of these standing committees is to facilitate the business of the Convention. Sir, when a gentleman presents a proposition here, parliamentary courtesy requires that it should be entertained. Would it not be better that it should come up in committee of the whole and be discussed upon its general principles, and then a committee may properly have it in charge and provide the necessary details for carrying it out. Well, the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, as I said, does not take it out of the power of the Convention to appoint committees when the necessity arises. The gentleman from Jefferson, though in favor of the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Nelson, furnished, in my judgment, the very best argument that I have heard against his own proposition. He says the purpose of a committee is to determine upon general principles. I agree with the gentleman that such is its business and purpose. After it has done that, then let a committee be appointed to report a constitutional provision embracing those general principles. Permit me to give you an instance. A proposition is introduced here: "Resolved, That we are in favor of an elective Judiciary." As I said before, parliamentary courtesy requires that it should be received by the house. Is it to be sent to one of the standing committees before the sense of the house is obtained in reference to it? If you send it to a committee it comes back to you in a report from that committee, and the sense of the Convention is yet to be expressed upon it. Then, I ask, what have you gained by sending it to a committee? You are precisely where you began. The proposition comes up as at first, and all the various amendments that gentlemen may be inclined to offer are yet to be considered in committee of the whole, so that nothing whatever can be accomplished by that mode of proceeding.

The delegate from Oldham, remarked, that he was opposed to the amendment of the delegate from Bourbon, (Mr. Williams,) because it assumed that we were satisfied with the present constitution, and desired no change. I cannot so understand it. It is true, the amendment might with much propriety have assumed that the delegates and the country were satisfied with many of the principles and provisions of the constitution.

I am opposed to the amendment of the delegate from Nelson—not however for the reasons assigned by the delegate from Bourbon—because it is calculated to favor that radical and revolutionary spirit he thinks he has seen manifested here. I may belong to that class of delegates considered radical and revolutionary, but the principle I avowed before the people who sent me here, shall receive my public support as a delegate to this Convention, even at the hazard of incurring the reputation of being termed radical and revolutionary.

It does seem to me that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Bourbon indicates the best mode of approaching the important work that lies before us. The other mode, in my humble judgment, will accomplish nothing. The house will gain nothing by it.

Mr. McHENRY. It seems to me that to adopt the course indicated by the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon would not facilitate our proceedings as the gentleman who has preceded me seems to suppose. He has assumed that the resolution or amendment of the gentleman from Bourbon does not do away with the necessity for committees. In order to show that this is an entire misconception, I will ask the Clerk to read that amendment.

The Secretary read the amendment accordingly.

Mr. McHENRY. Now what is the object of it? Not as the gentleman seems to have understood it—not that we shall, in committee of the whole, take up the constitution and settle the great principles which we desire to retain in the new constitution. By no means. But that we are to take it up, article by article, and section by section, and amend it, and then refer it to committee of the whole—not to be moulded into form, but that it may be accepted or rejected. The question then before the convention is, whether we shall have standing or select committees, or whether we shall take up the whole subject in committee of the whole, and then commence the work. And when we get to a troublesome place, we shall find ourselves just where we were before. After consuming a great deal of time, as we have done to day in talking, we shall probably forget what we have already done, and shall be obliged to go back and ask our Secretary to read what has been done from his minutes, as I was a few moments ago. We shall be liable to get into this condition every day and every hour.

Now, the proposition is, which mode of proceeding will you adopt? The question is between standing committees and the committee of the whole. If we adopt the latter course, gentlemen may go on and offer propositions until we have a bushel basket full, and then we shall be obliged to stop and print them, and we shall find ourselves involved in embarrassment, from which we shall not easily escape. But on the other hand, if we appoint the different committees, we may send to them those resolutions which appropriately belong to them. Why, the gentleman from Bourbon himself has given us enough to talk about for the next three weeks, and I myself have several propositions to offer. But this committee of the whole will take up and discuss the principles involved in these propositions, which are to be distributed among the various committees, and the sense of the convention may thus be obtained, and the committees will afterwards embody those great principles which have thus been settled by the convention in committee of the whole. I am decidedly of the opinion that to have standing or select committees is a mode of proceeding that is preferable to that suggested by the gentleman from Bourbon, of bringing up the whole constitution at one time before the committee of the whole, and considering it article by article, and section by section.

Mr. RUDD. The question is a very simple one, and can be easily comprehended. It is merely whether we shall do the business of the Convention by committees who shall report to us in proper form and shape the various portions of a Constitution, or whether we shall have it done by the committee of the whole. I think that gentlemen who have given us their views here have overlooked what will be the result of having the business thrown upon the committee of the whole. We shall see forty or fifty Delegates perhaps, claiming the privilege of giving their different views upon every subject that may be brought up. Now let us make a comparison.—Here are one hundred men, each one anxious and prepared to bring forward his own proposition. Suppose nine hundred were added, making a thousand Delegates, how would this house get on with its business, if we pursue the course proposed by the gentleman from Bourbon? Why every one who reflects a moment must see that we could make no progress in that manner. We must have our committees, and the arguments which have been brought forward here against the report of the committee on rules, I think is of no weight or consequence. I trust that every man in this house has come with the determination to do the business of his constituents. If more labor be placed upon one man than upon another, let him bear it. There is no difference whatever between the proposition of the committee that was raised to report the rules and the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, except that the committee on rules have reported a smaller number for the committees to consist of than that proposed by the gentleman from Nelson. We can work under either of those propositions. Nine men can do the work of a committee instead of fifteen. It is absurd to suppose that these committees will control the opinions of this house. The members having each his own views, will differ among themselves, and on the reports which they will make we shall have the opinions of the majority.

Let the naked question be taken whether we shall work with standing committees or by the committee of the whole. For my own part, I cannot see how we are to get along without standing committees. I believe that the labors of those committees will expedite our business. I hope that either the rules reported by the committee or the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson will be adopted. I am for beginning at the beginning of our work, and not at the end.

Mr. CLARKE. I have but one or two remarks to make, sir. After an experience and practice under the present constitution of the State, for some forty or fifty years, the people of Kentucky have determined, by majorities unprecedented, at two distinct elections, that there were certain changes and alterations to be made in that constitution. Under the present constitution, the hundred Delegates who are assembled have met for making those changes and alterations. The nature of those changes and alterations, as I understand, was discussed in every county of the State. The mode and manner of electing the judicial officers was one of the proposed changes; and there were other alterations proposed by the different candidates who offered their services to the people, as Delegates to this convention; and I apprehend that there are on this floor some seventy or eighty, perhaps ninety, who agree that the present constitution of the State of Kentucky is not so good a constitution as the Delegates here assembled can furnish to the people of the State. There are those on this floor who maintain that the present constitution of the State is the best platform that we can stand upon, and that there are no changes necessary to be made in that instrument. The question then comes up, as we have assembled here under the authority of the people, whose voice has pronounced from one end of the Commonwealth to the other, that great, important, and radical changes ought to be made in the constitution of the State. The question comes up as to whether, having here assembled for the purpose of acceding to their will, we shall take up the present constitution—disorganized, scattered, undisciplined, and engraft upon the new one those principles that have been ratified by Delegates on this floor, or whether we shall organize by the appointment of committees, and perfect the work by committees. Now, I am not surprised that the original anti-convention men—those who have believed that the present constitution was an instrument as perfect as it could be made—should stand here and insist upon a fair and open fight. I am not surprised that gentlemen who are in favor of the present constitution of the State of Kentucky, should be opposed to the organization of those committees, to be composed of members who are in favor of particular changes which they think ought to be made. But I should be astonished, if those who have, before their constituents, when they asked for their suffrages, proposed changes in the constitution, and who believe that those changes will be of advantage in all time to come, should object to the formation of committees. Those who believe the constitution to be defective, and who believe that radical and wholesome changes can be made, will certainly be in favor of organizing committees.

I trust—and I have very little choice between the two propositions—that the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, or the proposition of the honored chairman of the committee appointed to draft rules for this body, will be adopted. I have little preference. If I were to declare a preference at all, it would be in behalf of the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson. I had thought that five or six committees would be sufficient; it is a matter of no consequence, however, as to the number. The only question is, as to whether the party who have assembled here in favor of changes and alterations in the present constitution, shall be organized, or whether they shall not. And whether we organize under the resolution of the gentleman from Nelson, or the series of rules offered by the gentleman who is the honored chairman of the committee to prepare rules for this House, is a matter of entire indifference to me. All I ask, all I hope is, that those on this floor, who are in favor of constitutional reform, and who believe the old constitution not as perfect as we can make it—all I pray is, that that party on this floor, will permit themselves to be organized. I care not, sir, what the influence of the reports of the committees may be, if the committee's report comes strengthened by the fact, that they have well conned and well digested all questions involved in the enquiry they have been making. I care not, when they come upon the floor with their report, whether it be a committee appointed by the chair, or otherwise, so long as the report is strengthened by that fact.

I apprehend, sir, that there is an overwhelming majority on this floor in favor of constitutional reform, and if the reports of the committees present the principles which have been sanctioned by the people at the polls, I care not how the committees have been constituted. I hope we shall have an organization of committees. I trust there is not a gentleman on the floor, who believes that reform is necessary, who will permit himself to be seduced from the faith, and aid in preventing that organization. With these remarks I am perfectly willing to await the action of the House.

Mr. HARGIS. When I came to the convention, sir, I was perfectly in favor of the appointment of standing committees. That was my intention and my proposition. After hearing the remarks of the gentleman from Bourbon last evening, when he seemed to suggest a better idea, that we could proceed in committee of the whole, and that no standing committees were necessary, I thought it would be proper, perhaps, to draw up what I conceived ought to be the two first articles of the constitution, in such form as, in my opinion, would please about nine tenths of the people of Kentucky. I had an object in doing this, I will inform the gentleman over the way. I intended to present this draft to the convention in the morning, in order to see with what sort of respect it would be treated by those gentlemen who want no standing committees. I accordingly offered it, and what was the consequence? Why, after the reading of about eight lines, the gentleman jumped up, exclaiming, O, you must not read that. Well, I thought I must submit to it all. It was not read; it was laid on the table, and I do not know what will become of it; I am utterly uninformed what the issue will be; but I do know that the resolutions which I presented, contain the two first articles of the very kind of a constitution that about nine tenths of the people of Kentucky want. I think so. Well, I thought the gentleman's remarks, last evening, entitled to some consideration, and I was willing to test his sincerity about the matter. Not that I say those gentlemen want no reforms at all. They may want some reforms for aught I know. But I am of the opinion that they are such reforms as the people of Kentucky do not desire. Almost every body understands what those reforms ought to be. But, says the gentleman, take up the old constitution, examine it article by article, and section by section, and whenever gentlemen think proper to propose a change, let it be discussed. But how are these proposed changes to be presented to the consideration of the convention, if you will not even permit propositions to be read?

I came here for the purpose, and with the intention of accomplishing the work of amending the constitution as soon as it could be done. My object is to accomplish the work as speedily as I can, and, in order to facilitate the business, it certainly appears to me that standing committees are the most appropriate. The learned gentleman from Bourbon, I am sure, has not forgotten what took place in the convention which formed the present constitution of the United States. That convention assembled early in May, with Washington at the head of it; they sat until the last of June, and what had they done? Nothing at all. They had not the committees. At last the venerable Benjamin Franklin got up and told them, that instead of going forward, they were going back, that they had been two months in session and done nothing. Having invoked the blessing of Heaven upon the convention, he moved that there should be standing committees appointed. They were appointed, and every thing went on prosperously, every thing worked well, a constitution was made, and that instrument which has been the security of our liberty has existed from that time. We are now living under it, and have under it, grown to be one of the greatest nations in the world. If there is any precedent worthy to be followed, I think it is to be found in the proceedings of that convention. I imagine that we have as much right to take example from those proceedings, as from the proceedings of any convention that ever assembled. We should go on and appoint the standing committees as they did, and let those committees present to us the form of a new constitution, or so much of the old one as ought to be retained, with alterations of those parts where reform is necessary. When those reports are laid before the committee of the whole, gentlemen can state their objections, if they have any, and then propose amendments precisely as they can now.

In order then, to hasten the business of the Convention, and to give evidence to the country that we are willing to commence the work which we were sent here to do, in the shortest possible time, had we not better have committees? With all deference to the gentleman from Nelson, however, I think it is not necessary to have so many committees as he proposes; but at all events, if we intend to go on, and amend the Constitution of Kentucky with the least possible delay, the most appropriate mode it appears to me, is to have standing committees appointed and let them go to their work.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. The remarks made by the gentleman from Simpson, render it necessary for me to explain the vote which I shall give on this occasion. He has arraigned all who are opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, as being originally opposed to all constitutional reform, or else of being seduced away from their faith. For myself, I profess to be as decidedly in favor of constitutional reform, and as warm an advocate for it as any man in this house can be. I have been said to be radical. I am not ashamed to acknowledge that I am so. Indeed I have boasted of being radical in this matter. I shall however vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, and I do so, not because I am opposed to organization—not because I do not believe that there is a necessity on the part of the house to create committees—but because committees created by the rules which are proposed to be adopted will have conferred upon them powers which ought not, I think, be confided to any committee. If they were intended only to do what the chairman of the committee says they are intended to do, that is simply to take up and put into proper shape and form the principles that have been agreed upon and established by the Convention,

I should not object. But if this is indeed the intention of the appointment of committees either under the rules or under the resolution of the gentleman from Nelson, the language in which they have couched the resolutions seems to me essentially contradictory. These committees are directed to take the initiative in the amendments which are to be proposed.

I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, and if that fails I shall move to strike out so much of the report of the committee as relates to the powers of these standing committees, and move the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon as a substitute for that clause.

Mr. DIXON. What is to be the disposition of the thousand propositions that will be thrown into this great maelstrom, for they will all go there, when we have resolved ourselves into the committee of the whole. What proposition shall be taken up first? Shall all be taken up at once, or each in the order in which it was offered?—Or shall we commence at the beginning of the constitution and take up each proposition as it applies, and so on until the whole are disposed of. My friend from Bourbon, for whose opinion I entertain the highest respect, and who makes the suggestion that the committee of the whole is the only possible mode in which this labor can be done through any principle of order, illustrates his proposition by a reference to the mode of proceeding in the Parliament of Great Britain. What is the mode of proceeding there? The proposition is first referred to a committee of the whole; it is discussed there, and afterwards it is referred to a committee. Now I suppose all these propositions will be referred to a committee of the whole, and at a proper time I propose to take them out of that great maelstrom, and refer them to a committee after every body has had a chance to be heard on them.

Mr. DAVIS. The plan proposed is that the present constitution should be taken up, and each clause read, and as it is read that every member who thought he had an amendment pertinent to it, and which would improve it if adopted by the convention, should have the privilege of offering it, precisely as he would to a bill in the Legislature.

Mr. DIXON. I have not misunderstood the gentleman; the principle is the same. The gentleman, in committee of the whole, offers his amendment, and it is adopted or rejected, and I apprehend that a thousand amendments offered there will be rejected. When the whole matter is reported to the House, what will be done with this proposition? When the amended constitution is reported to the House, what will be done with it, or when all the amendments adopted in committee of the whole are reported, what will be done with them? Are we to take a vote on each separate provision as reported? Suppose I propose to refer the whole matter to a committee of the House—and that seems to be considered as the parliamentary mode of proceeding in Great Britain, and which the gentleman alludes to as illustrative of the correctness of the principle he advocates—when it is referred to them, what will the committee do with it? The constitution has gone to a single committee, and ev-every proposition intended to amend it goes to that committee also! Does not every gentleman see the impracticability of the scheme? A thousand propositions referred to that committee!—Does not every gentleman see that if he intends his propositions to be discussed and considered by the committee, he must refer it to them, and they will decide upon all the questions which will arise before this House, upon the great question, as to how the constitution shall be framed. Is it not clear—cannot all see, that we had better have appropriate committees, that will take up each subject, with all the various propositions that would come directly before them, in reference to the particular subject matter under their advisement? Let them report back to the House the propositions they think proper to adopt, and also to be discharged from the consideration of those that they do not think proper to adopt. I think if the gentleman will reflect, he will see that there is no probability of coming to a conclusion in reference to the important question of doing the business of this convention, unless some such system is adopted. The Parliament of Great Britain never thought of forming a bill in committee of the whole—they establish a great principle there, and the whole matter is referred to a committee to report back the principle, with a well defined law for the country. My judgment is—and I have no other motive except to get the best mode—clearly in favor of adopting committees, who would settle on correct principles, and then put the constitution in correct form. Every proposition could be sent to a committee of the whole, if gentlemen desired it, and be discussed there. If committees are appointed and the gentleman desired to have his proposition discussed in committee of the whole, it would go there from the courtesy the convention would extend to it, even were it not for the admirable power that the gentleman has of charming the convention by his eloquence, which would always be an inducement to refer his proposition there. I trust the proposition either of the committee or of the gentleman from Nelson will be adopted.

The question was then taken on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Bourbon and it was rejected.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe.)

Mr. GRAY offered the following as an additional resolution, and as an amendment to the proposition of Mr. C. A. Wickliffe.

Resolved, That a committee of — be appointed to report what amendments or changes are necessary to be made in the Constitution of Kentucky in relation to the mode of revising and amending the Constitution of Kentucky in relation to slaves.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE accepted the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERS offered as a substitute for both the original proposition and the amendment, a proposition to appoint six committees to whom the various articles of the Constitution, and the amendments proposed thereto should be referred. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. T. J. HOOD offered as an additional resolution, an amendment providing that a committee of — delegates be appointed to be styled the committee on the Educational Fund, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the amount of the present school fund, the character and condition of its investment, and to report the same to the Convention with such propositions as in their opinion should be incorporated in the Constitution rendering said fund inviolable, for the establishment of a permanent system of Common School Education. The amendment was adopted.

Mr. APPERSON offered an amendment obviating a conflict of jurisdiction on the part of the committees in regard to county offices, which was agreed to.

The number of members of which the committees should be composed was fixed at nine, and the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe,) as amended, was then agreed to.

The 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th rules were passed without amendment. The 20th and 21st were verbally amended.

The 22d was so amended as to provide that "every member who shall be in the Convention when his name is called, shall give his vote."

The rules from 23 to 32 inclusive, were passed without amendment.

The 33d rule providing for a limitation of the time in which a motion to reconsider shall be made, was so modified as to provide that a Delegate voting in the majority, might move a reconsideration on the day on which a question was decided, and that if it were not made on that day, one day's notice of the intention to move a reconsideration, should be required to be given.

The rules from 34 to 47 inclusive, were passed without amendment.

The 48th rule providing that "no original proposition, proposing any amendment to the present Constitution, shall be discussed on its merits, in the Convention, until it shall have been referred to some appropriate committee," was stricken out.

The 49th rule, which provides that "no person, except the members, officers of the Convention and ladies, shall be admitted within the doors of the Hall; nor shall any person except the members and officers, be admitted upon the floor, without the permission or invitation of the presiding officer," was amended on the motion of Mr. C. A. Wickliffe, so as to give the right of admission to the floor, to the Governor of the Commonwealth, the Lieut. Governor, Judges of the Court of Appeals, and such persons as may have filled either of those offices.

The rules from 50 to 59, were passed without amendment.

On the motion of Mr. BROWN, an amendment was inserted, providing for the taking of the yeas and nays, on the call of any two Delegates.

Mr. IRWIN moved an amendment, to provide that the previous question shall bring the Convention to a direct vote upon not only "amendments reported by a committee, if any; then upon pending amendments"—but upon "amendments proposed," before voting upon the main question.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The series of rules reported by the special committee, was then adopted as amended; and on the motion of Mr. MERIWETHER, a hundred and twenty-five copies were ordered to be printed.

ANOTHER CONTESTED SEAT.

Mr. GAITHER, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial of Mr. Joseph Leconte, setting forth that he was entitled to the seat of the Delegate from Henry county, now held by Mr. Nuttall. The memorial at his request was laid on the table for the present.

On the motion of Mr. HARDIN, the projet of a Constitution submitted this morning by Mr. Hargis, was referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered to be printed.

The Convention then adjourned.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 8, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

CHANGE OF THE COMMITTEES.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that on examination it would be found that the committees as at present organized by the rules, under the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe,) did not provide for nine members of the convention. That is, there would be nine delegates not embraced on any committee. He would therefore move that one member be added to each of the standing committees except the first, which would provide for every member of the convention.

This was agreed to.

Mr. HARDIN then proposed the following:

Resolved, That a select committee of nine delegates be appointed, whose duty it shall be to enquire into the public debt of the State, the best practicable mode, not only to prevent its future increase, but to liquidate the same by the time it shall fall due.

This resolution was agreed to.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRESIDENT then announced the following standing committees:

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. MERIWETHER asked the unanimous consent to amend the tenth rule so as to supply an omission as to the number of delegates that should constitute a quorum to do business. Consent was given, and he moved that a quorum shall consist of at least two thirds of the delegates elected. This was agreed to, and the rule was so amended.

THE CONTESTED SEAT.

Mr. GAITHER enquired if there had been any standing committee on elections appointed, and if not, why it had been omitted.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that when the committee on rules were appointed, they had received no intimation that there was to be any contested elections, and therefore did not provide for such a committee. He would further inform the gentleman that the usual practice had been to constitute a select committee for the purpose to which the gentleman had alluded.

Mr. GAITHER said that his impressions were different, and that it was usual in all deliberative bodies to have a standing committee on the subject. It was not constituted expressly for the consideration of contested seats, but as a channel through which all matters in reference to elections should be brought distinctly before the convention. If there was not a committee provided of that character, and if it was in order, he would move that such a committee be now provided.

The PRESIDENT said that it would be in order.

Mr. GAITHER then moved to add a standing committee, to consist of five delegates, on the subject of elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GAITHER then moved that the memorial of Mr. Joseph Lecompte, claiming the seat of Mr. Nuttall, presented by him on Saturday, be referred to the committee just provided for.

The memorial was so referred, after being read as follows:

To the honorable, the constitutional convention of Kentucky, now assembled in the city of Frankfort.

Your memorialist, JOSEPH LECOMPTE, a citizen of Henry county, Kentucky, claims that he is entitled to membership in your honorable body, in exclusion of Elijah F. Nuttall, Esq., who now occupies a seat upon the floor of said body, claiming to represent the county of Henry: and your memorialist shows the following causes upon which he predicates his claims.

1st. Your memorialist avers, that he was a candidate for membership in your body at the last August election in Henry county, and that your memorialist having all the legal qualification for membership, as aforesaid, and being opposed by the said Nuttall, was elected over the said Nuttall, by having a majority of all the legally qualified voters, who voted at said election, to vote for your memorialist, over said Nuttall.

2d. Your memorialist avers, that the poll-books of all the places of voting in Henry county, do, in fact, show upon their face, that your memorialist did receive a majority of the total number of votes cast at said election; and he claims in virtue thereof, that he is entitled to the seat as the delegate for Henry county.

3d. Yet, nevertheless, your memorialist avers, that the returning officer, who was entitled to certify the election of the delegate who might be elected, certified to the Secretary of State that the said Nuttall was elected; and, in virtue thereof, the said Nuttall hath taken his seat in your honorable body; when, in fact, your memorialist avers, that the said poll-books show your memorialist to have been entitled to said certificate by ten votes: but your memorialist avers that he is entitled to said seat for other reasons: he charges,

4th. That voters voted for said Nuttall who were not citizens of the county of Henry at the time of voting.

5th. That voters duplicated their votes for said Nuttall.

6th. That persons, who were under the age of 21 years, voted for said Nuttall.

7th. That citizens of Shelby county voted for said Nuttall.

8th. That, in these and other respects, there were two hundred illegal votes for said Nuttall.

Wherefore, your memorialist prays that the proper steps may be set on foot to ascertain the truth of the case, and that your honorable body will declare your memorialist entitled to a seat in this convention, as a member thereof, provided it shall turn out that your memorialist is, in law, entitled thereto. And your memorialist will ever pray, &c., &c.,

JOSEPH LECOMPTE.

APPOINTMENT OF A MESSENGER.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved that the sergeant-at-arms be authorized to employ some lad as a messenger to assist him in the discharge of his duties. It was usual to allow that officer this assistance in the legislature.

After a few words from Mr. HARDIN in favor of the motion, it was agreed to.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. IRWIN offered the following, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee on the legislative department, and ordered to be printed.

1. Resolved, That some constitutional reform and restriction should be made upon the subject of the future formation of new counties in Kentucky.

2. Resolved, That the house of representatives in Kentucky ought not to consist of a greater number of representatives than sixty five, nor should the senate consist of a greater number of senators than thirty.

Mr. MAYES offered the following, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee having charge of the subject of county courts, and was ordered to be printed.

1. Resolved, That the Legislature of Kentucky ought not to meet oftener than once in three years; and that the Governor, upon extraordinary occasions, should have power to convene that body in extra session.

2. Resolved, That whenever the legislature shall continue in session longer than fifty days, the pay of its members should be reduced to one dollar per day, for every day the session shall be extended beyond fifty.

3. Resolved, That in lieu of the present system of appointing justices of the peace, in Kentucky, each county in the State should be laid off into convenient magistrate's districts; that the qualified voters of each district should, at stated times, by vote, elect some qualified person, residing in the district, to the office of justice of the peace for such district, who should be commissioned by the Governor, and hold said office — years; and he should be eligible to re-election.

4. Resolved, That should any justice remove from his district, his office should thereby be vacated, and another elected in his place.

5. Resolved, That said justices should have and exercise all the jurisdiction now legally exercised by justices of the peace.

6. Resolved, That in place of the now existing county courts in Kentucky, a court should be erected and established in each county to be called — court, to consist of a judge, or judges, (the number should not exceed three,) to be elected at stated times by the votes of the qualified voters of each county, and to be commissioned by the Governor, and to hold his or their office — years. This court should have and exercise jurisdiction in all matters now properly belonging to the county courts; and appeals should be allowed to it from the decisions of the justices in the country.

Mr. THOMPSON offered the following, the first of which, on his motion, was referred to the committee on the mode of amending the constitution, and the second to the committee on the miscellaneous provisions of the constitution, and both were ordered to be printed.

1. Resolved, That the mode of amending the constitution, by convention, is the correct and proper one, which has been sanctioned by experience under the old and the present constitution.

2. Resolved, That the committee on the miscellaneous provisions of the constitution be instructed to enquire into the expediency of adding the following section to that part of the constitution to them referred, viz: Any person who shall, after the adoption of this constitution, fight a duel, or knowingly be the bearer of a challenge to fight a duel, or send or accept a challenge for that purpose, or be an aider or abettor in fighting a duel, shall be deprived of the right to hold any office of honor or profit in this Commonwealth, and shall be deprived of the right of suffrage, and shall be punished otherwise, in such manner as the legislature may prescribe.

Mr. MERIWETHER offered the following, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered to be printed.

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide for the election of members of the state senate for the term of four years, and members of the house of representatives for the term of two years. That the legislature shall convene but once in two years, unless for special reasons, convened by proclamation of the governor. That the members shall receive a daily compensation to be fixed by law, but that no member shall receive compensation for more than sixty days of any one session, which compensation shall not be increased so as to take effect during their continuance in office.

2. That it is expedient to provide that the governor and lieutenant governor, members of both branches of the legislature, and congress, be elected on one and the same day; and all other officers, whether executive, judicial, or ministerial, elected by the people, be elected on the corresponding day of the next succeeding year, so as to effectually separate the elections of governor, lieutenant governor, members of both branches of the legislature and congress, from that of the other executive judicial and ministerial officers: Provided, That the governor, lieutenant governor, senators, judges of the superior and inferior courts, and such other officers whose terms of office may exceed two years, shall be so arranged as to cause their election to be held on the day and in the year as provided for in this resolution.

3. That it is expedient to prohibit the manumission of slaves within this commonwealth, unless ample security be provided for their removal and remaining without the limits of this state. And that provision be made for the removal of all free persons of color from the state, and to prevent the future immigration of any such persons to the state.

THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said that if there was no other gentleman who desired to present any proposition, he would call up his resolutions, submitted the other day, on the subject of the elective franchise.

The PRESIDENT said that unless some objection should be made, he would consider it to be the sense of the convention that the resolutions, referred to by the gentleman, should be now considered.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said that it had been suggested to him that the delegate from Bourbon (Mr. Davis) was not in his seat, and that, perhaps, it was not proper to consider the subject in his absence. He had offered this resolution from no desire to create discussion upon it, although it was one of those questions, when indicated in the shape of the resolutions of the gentleman from Bourbon, calculated to excite some degree of distrust in the public mind in advance of the labors of the convention. He supposed that the public sentiment of Kentucky, in reference to the right of suffrage, had been so long and so decidedly fixed, that they would not be called upon here to review the work of their predecessors. He knew of no question on which public feeling was more likely to be excited than upon these resolutions. If it was the pleasure of the convention, he was willing to postpone the consideration of the matter until the gentleman from Bourbon should return.

Mr. HARDIN concurred very much with his colleague in his opposition to the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon, yet, as a matter of courtesy to that gentleman, he hoped it would not now be taken up.

Mr. DIXON was very anxious for the discussion of the resolution, for it embodied very nearly the principle of the one he had himself the honor to submit, but he was desirous that the discussion should be postponed until the return of the gentleman from Bourbon. That gentleman, he was satisfied, desired a discussion of this question. The gentleman had thrown down the gauntlet to his friend on the left, Mr. C. A. Wickliffe and himself, and they had taken it up very promptly he believed. He was, therefore, not disposed to have any fight whilst his friend from Bourbon was absent.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE had no objection to the postponement of the subject.

Its consideration was then further postponed accordingly.

PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The PRESIDENT here requested Mr. DIXON to take the Chair, and preside for the residue of the day.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

The consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Boone, (Mr. Chambers), offered on the 5th inst., in reference to the order of business—being next in order.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved that they lie on the table—remarking that the action of the convention directing the formation of committees had dispensed with any necessity that existed for their adoption.

They were so disposed of.

Mr. IRWIN said that there had been a good many propositions presented to the house, of which no disposition had as yet been made. He would move therefore that they be now taken up and referred either to the standing committees or to the committee of the whole, as might be the pleasure of the convention.

This suggestion was agreed to, and under this arrangement the resolutions of Mr. Gholson, offered on the 5th inst., in reference to the abolition of special pleading of the chancery courts, trial by jury, etc., were referred on his motion, to a select committee of five.

The PRESIDENT designated the following gentlemen as the select committee:

Messrs. Gholson, Clarke, Triplett, C. A. Wickliffe and Bristow.

The resolution of Mr. Dixon, proposed on the 5th inst., in reference to the election of judicial officers, was referred to the committee on circuit courts.

AN EXPLANATION.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President: Upon referring to the Louisville Courier of Oct. 6, I think it possible that I may not be correctly reported, or that my vote does not stand correct on the journals, and I rise to ask the attention of the convention to a brief explanation. In a letter written from this city to the Louisville Courier, I find the following passage:

FRANKFORT, October 5.

W. N. HALDEMAN:—

"As I informed you by telegraph yesterday, the sages from a hundred counties now assembled in the present capital of Kentucky, very summarily disposed of the Courier case, by refusing to reconsider the vote, and thus preventing a direct vote by the calling of the ayes and noes upon Col. Preston's resolution. I regret this—as I desired for many reasons, to know explicitly the position of every member upon the issue presented. However, the vote upon reconsidering is almost a test vote, every member voting against the reconsideration, being opposed to granting your reporter a seat, and every member, except Messrs. Nuttall, Clarke, and probably one other, who voted for the reconsideration, was in favor of granting the application."

I have merely risen for the purpose of standing right on the subject. Through courtesy to my friend from Louisville, Mr. Preston, who was desirous to take the sense of the house by a call of the ayes and noes on his proposition to admit the correspondent of the Louisville Courier to a seat on this floor, I made the motion to reconsider, but I afterwards voted against it. I do not know whether the journals so represent me or not, but this letter places me in the attitude of having voted for the reconsideration. I did not so vote, and I desire to make the statement here, that the repudiation may be as public as the charge.

Mr. PRESTON. My recollection accords precisely with that of the gentleman from Simpson. I regarded the motion as merely an act of courtesy extended to me so as to afford me an opportunity to call for the ayes and noes, which I had neglected to do. At the same time, if I understood anything of the gentleman's views, they were adverse to the admission of the reporter.

With these statements, the matter was dropped.

DESIGNATION OF THE COMMITTEES.

Mr. APPERSON, offered the following resolution with a view of more specifically designating the committees, and it was adopted.

Resolved, That the standing committees shall be called and known by the following names: No. 1, the committee on the executive of the state at large. No. 2, the committee on the executive and ministerial offices of counties and districts. No. 3, the committee on the militia. No. 4, the committee on the legislative department. No. 5, the committee on the court of appeals. No. 6, the committee on the circuit courts. No. 7, the committee on the county courts. No. 8, the committee on miscellaneous provisions. No. 9, the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery. No. 10, the committee on education. No. 11, the committee on elections.

SLAVERY—A SPECIAL ORDER.

Mr. TURNER believed that the resolutions he offered the other day were referred to the committee of the whole, without a time being fixed for their consideration. He did not propose to take up the whole series, at any one time, but desired to have the one relating to slavery taken up on Wednesday next. His reasons were—that there had been a committee appointed on that subject, and various resolutions submitted here in regard to it. Some proposed to allow the unrestricted importation of slaves, others to provide a constitutional restriction on the subject, while a third class were for giving to the legislature all power in regard to the importation of slaves. On these questions there was likely to be considerable diversity of opinion, and he deemed it proper before any standing committee was to act, that there should be an expression of opinion on the part of the house, as a guide to the committee, so that when it did report, its recommendations would be in accordance with the sense of the house. With that view, and as there was nothing set apart for consideration on Wednesday he moved that the resolution referred to, be made the order of the day for Wednesday.

The motion was agreed to.

The convention then adjourned.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. TALBOTT submitted the following, and moved that it be referred to the committee on slavery, and printed.

1. Resolved, That it will be expedient to incorporate into the constitution this convention is about to form, a clause that it may be amended specifically on all subjects not involving the right of property.

2. Resolved, That the question of slavery, and all other questions involving the right of property, shall not be reached, except through the call of a convention.

3. Resolved, That no specific amendment shall be adopted, or convention called, under the constitution this convention may adopt, except upon the recommendation of at least two thirds of both branches of the legislature for two successive sessions, and afterwards sanctioned and ratified by a direct vote of the people, a majority of all the qualified electors in the State voting for the same.

Mr. NEWELL suggested to the gentleman from Boyle, that an enormous sum would be expended by so much printing, and he enquired if it would not be sufficient to have the resolutions referred to the committee, before whom the gentleman could appear, if he desired it, to give further explanations.

Mr. TALBOTT replied, that it had been the custom to print propositions, and he asked for no deviation from the usual course.

The motion to refer and print was agreed to.

Mr. RUDD offered the following:

Resolved, That no city, town, or county shall hereafter, in any manner, give, loan, or sell its credit in aid of any individual association or corporation; neither shall it contract any debt but in anticipation of its regular revenue for any fiscal year, and to be paid within six months after expiration of such fiscal year; nor shall the legislature authorize any city, town, or county, to contract any such other or further debt unless it be payable in fifteen years at farthest; nor unless there be levied at the same time an annual tax upon the real and personal property situate within the corporate limits, adequate to the annual payment of the interest and the extinguishment of the debt within the time stipulated for the payment; nor shall any such law take effect until three months after the passage, nor until the same shall receive the sanction of a majority of all those who at the time are assessed, or owners of such real or personal estate by a vote to be taken after ten days notice, on a day to be named, and in a manner to be prescribed by those having control of the principal affairs of such city, town, or county; nor shall the taxes on the real or personal estate of any city, town, or county be increased, but by a law which shall in like manner receive the sanction of a majority of all those whose property is assessed as aforesaid. The legislature may, at any time after the approval of such law by the tax payers, forbid the contracting of any further debt or liability, under such law; but tax imposed by such law, in proportion to the debt or liability which may have been contracted in pursuance thereto, shall not be repealable, but be annually collected until the principal and interest of the debt contracted shall be discharged.

He asked that it be printed, for it was a proposition of some considerable importance, and that it be referred to the committee on the executive and ministerial officers for counties and districts.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McHENRY submitted the following:

1. Resolved, That if representation can be made equal and uniform, and each county in the State have separate representation, by increasing the number of representatives to one hundred and fifty, it should be done; but, if by so increasing the number of representatives, each county cannot be entitled to a separate representation, and at the same time representation be more equal than at present, then the number of representatives should be reduced to and fixed at seventy-five, and the number of Senators to twenty-five.

2. Resolved, That the regular session of the legislature should be limited to sixty days, unless extended by a vote of two-thirds of all the members elected to both branches thereof.

He moved that it be referred to the committee on the legislative department, and printed.

Mr. NEWELL enquired if so much printing could not be avoided. He called for a division of the question, so that the vote could be taken separately upon the motion to print, for the purpose of testing the question whether the convention was willing to print all resolutions that might be offered to it.

The question was taken, and the motion to refer and print was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY offered the following, and they were referred to the committee on the court of appeals:

Resolved, That commissioners shall be appointed to codify and condense the laws of this Commonwealth, and that the rules of practice in the various courts of justice be made uniform.

Resolved, That the court of appeals, as at present constituted, be abolished, and that the circuit judges constitute said court.

PRINTING OF RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. MAYES submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That all resolutions, hereafter offered in this convention, shall be referred without printing, unless otherwise specially ordered.

Mr. TRIPLETT expressed the hope that that resolution would not be adopted, for the object of printing was, that members of the convention might have an opportunity to learn thoroughly what the propositions submitted were. Some of them were so situated in the house that they could not hear distinctly when the resolutions were read, and it was due to them that they should be afforded an opportunity to read if they could not hear them.

Mr. MAYES, in defence of his resolution, said that if all resolutions submitted to the house were to be printed, as a matter of course, a very large amount of expenditure, for printing alone, would accrue. But the gentleman from Daviess did not appear to have heard his resolution, or he would have perceived, that if it should be adopted, the convention could order any resolution to be printed whenever the printing was deemed necessary for the information of the delegates, and if they were not of sufficient importance, of course, the printing would not be ordered.

Mr. BULLITT said it seemed to him to be a courtesy due to any member, that his proposition should be printed, that it might be maturely considered by all the other members of the convention. Some of them could not hear all the resolutions that were read, nor could they hear all the speakers that addressed the convention, and without some such means of forming a correct judgment, they could not rightly discharge their duties to the people who had sent them there. The cost of printing such documents was a small consideration, when compared with the importance of the work in view. Unless he could have printed documents to consult, he should very often be at a loss how to vote, and he hoped, therefore, that the convention would consent to print any such document that any gentleman, as the representative of a constituency, might think proper to offer.

Mr. MERIWETHER thought that nothing would be gained by the adoption of this resolution, for it proposed that a vote should be taken on the printing of every proposition, which was now the rule and the practice of the convention. The resolution was rejected.

THE COURT OF APPEALS.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said that the standing committee, on that branch of the constitution which related to the court of appeals, had directed him to make a report, which he styled No. 1, as follows:

ARTICLE —.

Concerning the Judicial Department.

SEC. 1. The judicial power of this Commonwealth, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in one supreme court, which shall be styled the court of appeals, and in such inferior courts as the general assembly may, from time to time, erect and establish.

SEC. 2. The court of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the State, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. The judges of the court of appeals shall hold their offices for the term of eight years, and until their successors shall be duly qualified, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the Governor shall remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly: Provided however, That the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in such address, and on the journal of each house. They shall, at stated times, receive for their services an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law.

SEC. 4. The court of appeals shall consist of four judges, any three of whom may constitute a court for the transaction of business. The judges shall, by virtue of their office, be conservators of the peace throughout the State. The style of all process shall be, "The Commonwealth of Kentucky." All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name, and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and conclude "against the peace and dignity of the same."

SEC. 5. The general assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this constitution, shall divide the State into four appellate court districts—in each of which districts the qualified voters therein shall elect one judge of the court of appeals.

SEC. 6. The judges first elected shall serve as follows, to-wit: one shall serve two years; one shall serve four years; one shall serve six years, and the other shall serve eight years. The judges at the first term of the court succeeding their election, shall determine, by lot, the length of time which each one shall serve; and at the expiration of the service of each, an election in the proper district shall take place to fill the vacancy. The judge having the shortest time to serve shall be styled the Chief Justice of Kentucky.

SEC. 7. If a vacancy shall occur in said court, by death, resignation, removal, or otherwise, the Governor shall issue a writ of election to the district in which such judge was elected, and another judge shall be elected by that district, to serve until the expiration of the time for which the judge was elected, whose death, resignation, removal, or other cause, produced such vacancy.

SEC. 8. Any citizen of the United States, who has attained the age of thirty years, and who is a resident of the appellate district for which he may be chosen, and who has been a practising lawyer in the courts of this state for at least eight years, or whose practice at the bar, and service upon the bench of any court in this state shall, together, be equal to eight years, shall be eligible to the office of judge of the court of appeals.

SEC. 9. The court of appeals shall hold its sessions in each appellate district at such times and places as may, from time to time, be provided by law.

SEC. 10. The first election of the judges of the court of appeals shall take place on the — day of —, and every two years thereafter, in the district in which a vacancy may occur, by expiration of the term of office; and the judges of the said court shall be commissioned by the governor.

SEC. 11. There shall be elected, in each appellate district, by the qualified voters thereof, a clerk of the court of appeals for such district, who shall hold his office for the term of eight years, and who may be removed by the court of appeals for good cause, upon information by the attorney general.

SEC. 12. No person shall be eligible as clerk, unless he is a citizen of the United States, a resident of the district in which he may be elected, of the age of twenty-one years, and have, at the time of such election, a certificate of his qualifications from the judges of the court of appeals.

SEC. 13. In case of the vacancy in the office of clerk of the court of appeals in any district, for any cause, the governor shall issue a writ of election to that district, and the qualified voters thereof, shall elect a clerk for that district, to serve until the end of the term for which the clerk was elected whose vacancy is to be filled.

SEC. 14. The legislature shall provide, by law, for the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns, to the secretary of state of all elections of the judges and clerks of the court of appeals, and of determining contested elections of any of those officers.

There is (said Mr. W.) one other provision connected with this subject that attracted the attention of the committee, but we prefer before expressing any opinion upon it to wait the action of the other committees connected with the judiciary. I allude to the mode of electing these officers—whether it shall be by ballot or viva voce. The view of the committee was, to adopt, in reference to the election of all these officers, especially those connected with the judiciary, the ballot system; but we have not gone into that subject, preferring first to wait the action of the other committees. In obedience to the direction of the committee, I ask that the convention will order the printing of five hundred copies of the report. They desire this more than ordinary number, that they may be enabled to send out to sections of the State, where newspapers perhaps, will not reach, the views they propose shall be adopted in the constitution.

Mr. KELLY. I do not know whether it is in order to offer the resolution introduced by me a few moments since, as an amendment to the report of the committee; but if it be in order I will so offer it. I think I see also in the report of the committee, in regard to the clerk of the court, another defect. In the case of the death or the resignation of that officer, they require the writ of an election to fill the vacancy thus caused, to be issued by the governor. Suppose however, the officer should die or resign on the first day of the term, who would discharge the duties of the office? I think the report ought to provide for a pro tempore appointment, by the court itself, until the vacancy should be regularly filled.

The PRESIDENT said that the gentleman's resolution had been referred to the committee, and was not now in possession of the house.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. My friend from Washington can attain his object in committee of the whole, when it will be in order to take up, discuss, consider, and amend the report of the committee. I do not think this is the appropriate time to offer an amendment; certainly it was not the design of the committee to ask the consideration of this report now, before it is printed. The difficulty in reference to the clerk, to which allusion has been made by the gentleman, did not escape the attention of the committee. It is to be presumed that there will be left some power of legislation after we have terminated our labors here, to provide for the temporary discharge of the duties of the office, in case of the resignation or death of the clerk. However, that can properly be considered, when it is proper to take up the subject for amendment—that is, when it is considered in committee of the whole. I was instructed to ask the reference of the report to that committee, and not its consideration now.

Mr. KELLY. To obviate all difficulty I will withdraw my motion, being satisfied that the subject will come up more properly in committee of the whole.

Mr. HARDIN. This is a matter of great importance, and I am certain that every gentleman here would like to enter upon its discussion prepared with his views on the subject. I would suggest that a day be fixed upon for the consideration of the report.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE had no objection to fix upon a day as suggested, and moved to make the consideration of the report a special order for Monday next.

The question was then taken on the motion to print 500 copies of the report, to refer it to the committee of the whole, and to make it the special order for Monday next, and it was agreed to.

THE DISTRIBUTION OF NEWSPAPERS.

Mr. MACHEN. There was a subject disposed of some two or three days since, in regard to which I am inclined to think the sense of the convention has, perhaps, undergone a change. It was the proposition to disseminate through the medium of the Commonwealth and Yeoman, throughout the country, information as to the proceedings of this convention. I desire that the vote disposing of this subject may be reconsidered, and as I understand that, under the rules, it is necessary to give one day's notice of a motion for reconsideration, I will give that notice now.

Mr. GREY. If the matter is to be acted upon at all it might as well be done at once. I move therefore, to suspend the rule so that the vote on the reconsideration may be taken now.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MACHEN. I now make a motion to reconsider the vote laying the subject on the table. The house will recollect that the original proposition was to provide that each delegate should be furnished for circulation through the country with 60 copies of the weekly Commonwealth or Yeoman, or a certain number of copies of the daily Commonwealth, not exceeding the cost of $30, as each might prefer. There was an amendment introduced by the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin), limiting the amount to $10 to each delegate, and then by a vote of the convention the whole subject was laid on the table. I am inclined to think that the convention has had perhaps, a favorable leaven operating upon it with reference to the subject, and that many members who then voted adverse to my opinion are now disposed to extend this information to the country. It was objected to when this question was before under discussion that the means proposed were entirely inadequate to the purpose proposed to be accomplished. Now we can adopt no measure to disseminate our proceedings so as to reach every individual who may be scattered over the country, but we may adopt such a mode as will result in their pretty thorough dissemination. I come from the county of Caldwell, and am pretty well acquainted with its territory and the location of the people—as I presume every gentleman here is with that of the county he represents—and I can send to the different neighborhoods, copies of the Commonwealth or Yeoman, and I doubt not the citizens in the respective portions of the county to whom they are sent, will feel a sufficient interest in the proceedings of this body, to secure for these papers a wide-spread and very general circulation in their vicinity. I apprehend that none of our citizens will complain of us for having in this way attempted to advise them of what we are doing. I understand further that the appropriation made at the last session of the legislature to defray the expenses of the convention, will amount to the sum of near $60,000. If so, and my information may be incorrect, it does seem to me that $3000 can in no better way be appropriated, than in the dissemination of this intelligence, and I trust that the gentlemen who have been adverse to this method of doing it, will change their views on the subject and allow the delegates to be furnished for the purpose with these newspapers.

The motion to reconsider the vote, laying the subject on the table, was then agreed to.

Mr. HARDIN. As to what the gentleman said in regard to $60,000 being set apart for the expenses of this convention, I have not seen any law which set apart such a sum for the purpose. There was a taxation of four cents additional levied—two cents of which were for the school fund, and which would amount to $56,000, allowing for a fair increase in the value of property, but allowing for no such increase, and just standing as we were, it would amount to $54,000. Then there was two cents more assessed upon the people, which would make about $56,000 more. But the gentleman will bear in mind that the dividends upon slack water, which went into the sinking fund, have been taken and appropriated to the school fund, and the loss of that amount to the sinking fund will have to be made up by these extra two cents. I have examined the slack water, and take the whole of it, I do not know how much it will amount to this year, but I guess to not more than $25,000. The receipts are, or at least are likely to be, much less than they were last year, while the expenses are much greater than last year, owing to the timbers that make the dams becoming rotten. And they will become more and more so every year, until they finally sweep away the whole system in less than ten years, unless I am a false prophet. The gentleman is mistaken—there is very little money, hardly enough to live on, coming from these two cents. After supplying what the sinking fund requires, there will be far short of $60,000 left for us. Then an account has to be opened for the convention, and unless we are saving we shall have no money at all. It will take $18,000 to pay the members if we should sit sixty days; and then there is $3 a day extra for the dignity of the chair: $10 a day for the clerk; and there is the assistant, the door-keeper, and the sergeant-at-arms $3 or $4 each; and there is also an assistant messenger to be had. Besides all this, there is a good deal of paper to be used; and there is to be an account for wood, and evidently a large printing account which will not be a dollar less than $10,000. The gentleman from Nelson, my colleague, moved the printing of five hundred copies of his report. I did not see the necessity for any more than one hundred and twenty five, but I did not want to be troublesome. Now the gentleman from Caldwell proposes to expend $3,000 more for newspapers, and he puts it on the wrong basis—the rock that a great many men have broke themselves upon—that is, the idea that their avails are equal to their expenses. I had the misfortune, and I rather consider it so than otherwise, from time to time to have had a seat in congress, and I found I could not stand the sacrifice of the loss longer than for two or four years at a time. Then I had to quit and resort again to the practice of the law to repair the loss. I have at every session expended not less than $200 or $300 in the purchasing of documents to send among my constituents. I took care to buy something of value, important documents, good speeches, not too much or too little, and well made. I found this to be the only way. This paper business in congress is a most idle waste of $30 to each member.

I took with me copies of the poll book for every county in my district, and directed the little boys in the house to fold up my documents and gave them instructions to direct them from the poll book—giving A. one to-day, and B. one to-morrow, and so on. And perhaps A. would not get more than one copy during the session, for the poll book would hardly be got through with before the session was terminated. Now what can we do here? I represent, I presume, some 2,000 constituents. If I send only the papers to A., the balance of the alphabet will be vexed, and so mad that they will not read them at all.—Suppose I send the balance, through the alphabet, to my whole constituency. While perhaps each one would get a paper, they would not get more than one through the whole session. Will they get information through this source, of what we are doing here? They would each just get an account of what we do here on one day. There is scarcely a town in Kentucky where they do not have a printing press—doing a little job work, and publishing a little paper, perhaps not larger than my two hands. They will all publish our proceedings, and so will all the leading papers in the state—the Louisville Journal, Democrat, Courier, Chronicle, the Commonwealth, Yeoman, and God knows how many papers—all will publish them, and they will be read. I have never been a Gen. South in this house—I mention him with all reverence, for he is dead—who was always considered sitting on the strong box—but we are proposing to lay out I know not how many thousands. If the motion of the gentleman from Woodford should prevail, to print 2500 copies of the debates, that would amount to $7,500, and the present motion would make another $3,000—making $10,500 in all. And then if we go on and print all the reports and propositions made here, it would amount by the end of the session to $15,000 or $20,000. If I thought that any useful information could be diffused thereby, I would not care, but I declare most solemnly, that I cannot see that there is.—I suppose that in the course of the debates many valuable speeches will be made here—I do not expect to make any myself, but I see some of the ablest men in the house preparing to make them—and they will be the best things to be distributed, for the benefit of the people, as they will give a full view of each side of a question. As for the Daily Commonwealth, I do not consider it worth a cent or half a cent—I would not give a cent for ten millions of them.

Mr. MACHEN. I beg to state to the gentleman last up, that my little experience in Frankfort, in attempting to serve my constituents, justifies me in the supposition, that I shall have need of all the remuneration they give me, without appropriating any part of it for extending to them information. It may suit gentlemen, who have political aspirations for the future, to expend their individual means, in order to extend light to their constituents. I happen not to have those aspirations, and I do not believe that my constituents will require any individual sacrifices on my part, in giving to them information which they have a right to demand at the hands of this body. If I am correct in my estimate of the proceeds of the two cent tax, there will be ample for the purposes of this convention, and more than sufficient. There will be a surplus to go into the sinking fund, in order to relieve the embarrassments which our internal improvement system has drawn us into. The difference between the gentleman's estimate of the two cent appropriation and my own, is not very material. I have supposed that at least sixty thousand dollars would be raised under that appropriation, and the gentleman estimates it at fifty-six thousand. There will be, at all events, enough from this source to dispense this information, and I think that we can make no better application of three thousand dollars, than by devoting it to this purpose.

Mr. HARDIN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken, if he supposes that I have any aspirations. My friend from Caldwell, I have no doubt, is actuated by very laudable motives in advocating this proposition, but I do not think he will make many friends by the distribution of papers. Indeed I think he will make ten enemies for one friend. I have had occasion to examine the subject of our revenue several times, and no longer ago than yesterday, being in the second Auditor's office, I made an investigation, the result of which proves to me, that if there is no increase in the value of property, fifty-four thousand dollars will be all that can be raised under the two cent tax. If property should increase a little in value, there may be fifty-six thousand dollars raised. There will be a great deficiency in the sinking fund, and that deficiency must be made up in some way or other. It will take at least thirty-five thousand, to pay the expenses of this convention, if we observe as much economy as we can. I suppose that we shall sit about seventy days, and probably when we submit our work to the people, we shall not adjourn finally; but meet again after the people shall have determined to ratify or reject our work. If they ratify it, there will be a necessity for some action to be taken, in order to put the government in motion. If on the other hand, the people reject the new constitution, on account of some defect, it will be necessary to meet, in order to remedy that defect. We had better not be too profuse with this little remnant of appropriation.

The gentleman is entirely mistaken if he supposes that I can spare two or three hundred dollars for the purchase of newspapers to distribute among my constituents.

Mr. HARGIS. Since this matter was laid upon the table, I have almost come to the conclusion myself, that I would vote for some appropriation, perhaps to the extent of one thousand dollars for the purchase of newspapers, to be distributed. But I had a conversation with one of the public printers, (Mr. Hodges,) this morning, who said to me that he was very glad we did not order the thousand dollars worth, as it would be of no advantage to them. Having thought the matter all over, inasmuch as one thousand dollars worth would go but a little way, when distributed among the people, I came to the conclusion that I would not vote for the proposition if it should come up again. I accordingly purchased about forty papers, which I am now sending off. I think that for all the good we can do by making an appropriation of this kind, we had better not incur the expenditure. Not that I would oppose the dissemination of knowledge or information, but I think that information will be more readily extended to the people, by taking a different method. I shall certainly vote against any such appropriation.

Mr. T. J. HOOD. I am pleased that the gentleman from Caldwell, upon reflection, has concluded to move a reconsideration of the vote in this case, and am particularly gratified in having this proposition brought before this body in such close proximity with another measure just disposed of. A few moments ago, a resolution was offered by my friend in front of me, (Mr. Mayes,) dispensing with the printing of that multitude of resolutions, daily accumulating on the secretary's table, for the benefit of this body, except such as it may otherwise direct. Now, many of these resolutions present questions of great importance, and well worthy the serious consideration of every gentleman. Yet from the character and length of some of them, the suspicion may reasonably be indulged that the good people of Buncombe were not wholly lost sight of in drafting them. The object of that resolution was to curtail expenses, as the daily papers, laid upon our tables would furnish the same information. Still it was voted down. Now I am inclined to favor every proposition tending to retrenchment and reform, but they must not be partial in their bearing. We should not print alone for our own information or benefit, and withhold all intelligence of our proceedings from those who sent us here. For what purpose, sir, have we here assembled? Nothing less than to alter, amend, or remodel the organic law of the State—the constitution which will give tone and character to the very government under which they live—and they, as being so deeply interested in our deliberations, have a right to be informed of our reasonings and conclusions, and to see with what fidelity we redeem the pledges made, when candidates before them. When this proposition was up a few days since, gentlemen became alarmed at the expense to be incurred. We shall now see whether their ideas of retrenchment shall operate alone to withhold intelligence from the people as to our proceedings, whilst they themselves are unaffected by them. In order to ascertain this, I call for the ayes and nays.

Mr. MACHEN. I wish to make a single remark in reference to the observation of the gentleman from Morgan and Breathitt. The gentleman says, that his mind has undergone a change upon this subject. It seems to me, when I look at the documents that are before us, that I can readily see why it is that his mind has undergone a change; and his constituents, I imagine, will come to the same conclusion. They will think that there has been enough of printing at his suggestion for one session at least. I refer to the document presented by that gentleman.

Mr. HARGIS. The gentleman from Caldwell will excuse me, when I say that I think he is mistaken in saying that the document, presented by me, was printed upon my motion.

The yeas and nays were then taken upon the motion to reconsider, with the following result: yeas 53, nays 40.

Mr. MITCHELL said, if in order, I will now move to strike out ten and insert thirty. I regard ten dollars as altogether insufficient for the object proposed. Unless the sum be enlarged so as to furnish a sufficient number of papers for distribution to those distant parts where newspapers do not commonly reach, it will be altogether a useless expenditure. But it does seem to me, that if the appropriation be made large enough to accomplish that object, much good may be done. It is the case, I believe, in many counties that there are neighborhoods where newspapers do not reach. Those neighborhoods are within the knowledge of gentlemen on this floor, and by using that knowledge, and sending the newspapers into those neighborhoods, we shall have the means of extending information upon the important subjects which are agitated here, and enable the people to form their judgments respecting them.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is not in order. It is not in order to renew a motion that has already been made and determined.

Mr. WM. JOHNSON. I will move then to strike out ten, and insert thirty one.

The PRESIDENT. It is perfectly in order to move to amend, by striking out and inserting a new number.

Mr. MACHEN. I will ask the chair if the first step will not be a reconsideration of the vote by which ten dollars was substituted for thirty.

The PRESIDENT. That would be the regular order of proceeding. Some gentleman, who voted with the majority, should move a reconsideration of that vote.

Mr. BARLOW. I voted with the majority, and in order to test the question, I will move a reconsideration of the vote by which that amendment was adopted.

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays upon that motion, and being taken, they were, yeas 40, nays 52.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as heretofore amended.

Mr. MAYES. The original resolution proposes, or its object seems to be, to give to the people of the state correct information in reference to the action of the delegates to this convention during its session. The resolution, if adopted in its amended form, will give to each one of us some five copies of a daily paper, or in lieu of a daily, some twenty or twenty five copies of a weekly paper. Now my friend from Nelson represents some two thousand constituents, and the purpose of making the appropriation, is to keep our constituents apprised of the proceedings of the convention. That, as I understand it, is the object; that they shall be informed of every thing which transpires here; that they shall be put in possession of the reasons why we are in favor of a given proposition, or why we oppose it. Well, say that I take for the benefit of my constituents five copies of the daily Commonwealth, and send those five copies to the county of Graves. How am I, with only these five copies of the paper, to supply information to the seventeen hundred voters of that county? That the purpose may be accomplished, I must send to each person every day; for if I send to this man to-day, and to that to-morrow, there is in reality no information conveyed; because each man would have but a disjointed portion of our proceedings.

If any feasible plan can be adopted by which this information can be spread throughout the country, I shall be in favor of it; for I am the last man to withhold useful information. But I think, that the expenditure, as proposed, would be worse than useless. I believe it would utterly fail to accomplish the purpose intended.—

These are some of the reasons why I vote against it; not because I am opposed to giving information to the people. I should be glad to put them in possession of full information. But as the gentleman from Nelson very justly observes, if you attempt to impart information at all, you should make it extend impartially to all. If I send a paper to one man and send none to his neighbor, the latter will be offended, for he will conceive that he has as much right to receive information as the other.

I can see no reason why delegates should change the opinion they expressed the other day in regard to passing this resolution. No reason has been advanced, and the more I have heard gentlemen talk on the subject, the more I am satisfied that the appropriation of a [thousand dollars would be worse than useless.

Mr. ROOT. I would simply say to all those gentlemen who are in favor of a reformation of the constitution, that I hope they will vote for this resolution, however limited it may be in its character. Sir, the elections were scarcely over before the secret enemies of all reform were endeavoring to impose upon the more ignorant portion of our fellow citizens, by leading them to believe that no reform could be effected by the convention, and they are now preparing the public mind to condemn in advance whatever may be done by the convention. It is worse than useless for us to deliberate here, for one, two, or three months, bringing whatever wisdom there may be in the convention to bear upon the question of reform, while the enemies of reform are deceiving the great body of the people, and preparing them to condemn unheard whatever we may do. I am therefore, in favor of circulating this information. It is true, it is but little information that this resolution will disseminate, but it may be like leaven thrown into the public mind, which will produce its proper effect. Suppose I send twenty copies of a weekly newspaper into my neighborhood. The people at their usual gatherings will obtain the information which it is intended to convey; and they will be enabled thereby, to some extent, to meet the arguments of the enemy. They will be put in possession of the reasons by which we are governed, and when we place before them, at our return home, that which we shall have prepared for their adoption, the work will be well nigh accomplished; and it will be ratified by a triumphant vote. But if instead of doing this, you permit the evil disposed to pour into the ears of the people their vile fabrications, they will be filled with apprehension and they will not be prepared to sanction your work.

Sir, let us provide that the antidote go with the poison. The thing most feared by the enemies of reform, is that light shall be thrown out—shall be communicated to the people. Hence you find that every one who has been heretofore opposed to constitutional reform, is now for putting out the light, whilst all the friends of reform and of the people, are for circulating light. It is the light that has been circulated, which has brought this august assemblage of the people together. It is light that strengthens their hearts and their understandings, and which will enable them to receive the labors of the convention as they should be received.

I repeat, sir, I hope that every friend of constitutional reform will give his vote to disseminate this little pittance of light among his neighbors.

Mr. HARDIN. I am not going to make a speech Mr. President, but simply to protest against the opinion advanced by the gentleman from Campbell, that it is those who were opposed to the call of the convention, who are now endeavoring to prevent the dissemination of light, and to prevent the accomplishment of any good. I do not know at what time my friend over the way became a convert to that doctrine; but I will say to him as was said once in the United States Senate by a distinguished southern senator: "Before you say a thing is so, you should know that it is so." I opposed this appropriation on the ground that I do not believe it will do any good at all.

Mr. MAYES. I do not know that any portion of the delegates of this convention, are in favor of withholding light from the people, nor did I suppose that it ever entered the mind of any delegate, that those who oppose the passage of the resolution, appropriating a thousand dollars for the purpose of sending these newspapers through the country, were opposed to constitutional reform. For myself, I can say in regard to this subject, that I was an original convention man. I have been for it from the beginning, and am for it still; and as I remarked before, if I could see any good that would result from appropriating this money, in the way that is proposed, I would vote for it. But as I can see no good that is likely to result from it, I shall vote against it.

Mr. ROGERS. I only rise to say, that I have opposed no appropriation at all, that was intended to convey information throughout the country. And in reference to being a convention man, I will inform gentlemen, that I have been a convention man from the very beginning; and one of the reforms which I have been most in favor of, is economy. On the score of economy, then, believing that this appropriation can do no good, I shall vote against it.

Mr. TURNER. I have uniformly voted against incurring a large expense for printing and distributing papers; and my reason for doing so is, that the printing that is to be done hereafter is, I think, of much more importance. When we finish the constitution which we are about to make, I want to print a great many copies of it, together with the old constitution, and send them out to the people, that they may compare the one with the other, and make choice between them. My impression is, that we have a tolerably good constitution already, though I am for making a great many changes in it. Still we have done very well under the old one, and I wish the people to make a comparison, and say which they will prefer. Every principle embodied in the new constitution, ought to be compared with those of the old one, that the people may vote understandingly.

It is important that we should avoid incurring expense for printing, that may be dispensed with, in view of having this necessary item of expense, which will not be inconsiderable, to be incurred hereafter. Our printing bills will otherwise run up to an enormous amount. Will it not be more important that we should lay before the people the final result of our labors, than that we should give them ten dollars worth of the Commonwealth and the Yeoman? And, after all, how many individuals can you supply with that ten dollars worth? I tell gentlemen I have had some little experience in this business. On one occasion, previous to an election, I wrote letters to about twenty individuals, in different parts of the county, urging them to exert themselves a little for me, as my business would not admit of my personal attendance. — But I found, that by selecting individuals in this manner, I gave offence to others, and, in short, I made three enemies where I gained one friend. And if we send out papers in this way, we shall give offence to every man in the neighborhood, except the one to whom the paper is sent. And, when the appropriation is narrowed down to the sum of ten dollars, it will be found to be too limited to do any good. And there is another item which we shall have to pay: that is, a postage of three cents upon each paper, while the paper itself costs but two. So that in any point of view in which I can look at the matter, it seems to me to be highly objectionable. In the first place, it will do little or no good, if not positive harm; and in the next place, it will exhaust our means and prevent us from doing an important service hereafter, to enable them to vote understandingly upon the issue of our labors.

Mr. MACHEN. The expense to be incurred for postage is certainly erroneously stated by the gentleman from Madison. Put it at the highest price, and it is only one cent upon each newspaper, when sent by individuals. This I understand to be the post office law. But the intention was that the names of those to whom papers were to be sent, should be left with the publishers, and that the papers should go from the publishing office without this additional tax upon the sender.

Mr. GHOLSON. I certainly do not rise for the purpose of animadverting particularly upon the remarks of any one gentleman, or upon any thing in particular, that has been said. While all manifest a willingness that the people should be supplied with information, none suggest a better mode than that which they object to. Are we to be told that because this mode is not so good as might by possibility be devised, we are therefore to have none at all? Why do not its opposers present to us another? Do the members of this convention desire to keep their light hidden under a bushel? Are they unwilling that their constituents should know what they are doing here? Certainly not. No one will place himself in that dilemma. Then I call upon gentlemen to furnish us a plan for disseminating light among the people. I believe there is no one in the state who does not desire to be particularly informed of what is said and done here. It is due to the people that they should be informed. We are consuming daily and hourly their money, and shall we be told that we are not to give an account of our stewardship. Much has been said about being opposed to reform. I call upon those gentlemen, who assert that they are in favor of a reform, to place before the people, the means of refuting this calumny. And what other means so effective for doing this as disseminating the debates of this convention.

I admit that the sum of a thousand dollars is insignificant, and I shall vote against it. When nothing better than that can be done, I should prefer to pay the ten dollars myself. I was in favor of voting a hundred papers instead of sixty; but if you reduce it to ten dollars, I shall advise every one to vote against it, and pay the amount out of his own funds. It is altogether too insignificant a sum to do any good. If a reasonable number of papers were distributed, the people might be put in possession of the necessary information, but the present number is totally inadequate, and I shall feel constrained to vote against it altogether.

Mr. THOMPSON. I trust the gentleman from Ballard will not vote against this appropriation, because if the distribution of a large number will do any good, the distribution of a few will do some good. It has been intimated that those opposed to the original resolution wished to withhold light from the people. I have no such motive as that. When the constitution shall be formed, I am in favor of sending a copy to each voter in the State, so that he may be enabled to form an opinion regarding it. We have heard in this hall, that a large portion of the delegates in this convention are in favor of civil revolution. What do we propose to do? What do a majority of the people of Kentucky ask at our hands? It is to place in their hands the election of the remainder of the officers of government, beyond those which they now have.

I for one hope that those in favor of the original resolution for taking thirty dollars worth of the newspapers, will not vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, because if thirty dollars will do good, ten dollars worth appropriated in the same way will do some good. But the best plan, I think, for giving the people information is, when we have finished our work, to have a copy transmitted to each voter: and I fear not for the result of our labors when the people come to vote.

Mr. HARGIS. I would not trouble the convention with a single remark, were it not that in consequence of the remarks of the gentleman from Campbell, I would appear to stand in an attitude opposed to reform. As has been well remarked, gentlemen ought, before they make an assertion, to be well assured of its truth. I have opposed this appropriation from the beginning. I was opposed to so small and pitiful a provision for the dissemination of knowledge; because, in fact, and in truth, I believed it would be of no avail, while it would cost the state a considerable sum, and that it would create more dissatisfaction among the people than if we had not sent a paper among them at all. Suppose we distribute three thousand dollars worth. Who would get them? Why, the reading men, and great numbers would not be taken from the post office at all. And it is reasonable to suppose that those who are reading and enquiring men, will get the information at all events, without entailing this expense upon the state.

The gentleman is mistaken if he supposes I am not for reform. I want to send out a new constitution, from the beginning to the very last letter of it; and I want to embody in that constitution the reforms which the people of Kentucky require. And I not only want a new constitution, but I want that constitution submitted to the people of Kentucky, and while their vote is being taken let this convention adjourn, and if our labor does not please them, let the convention again meet and revise their work.

The gentleman from Ballard says, that none of us have proposed a better plan of giving information to the people. If the gentleman wishes his speeches published and sent forth throughout the state, or throughout the U. S., he can do it without burdening the state with the expense. The proceedings of this body will hereafter be of more interest to the people than they are at present. I have no doubt there will be speeches made, that will be of the very deepest interest. There will be speeches made in relation to slavery, in relation to the right of suffrage, in relation to the election of the judiciary and other subjects of equal importance, which will be well worthy of being published and disseminated, and well worthy of the public attention. I would rather see these published and distributed at the public expense than that a few copies of a daily paper should be irregularly distributed; which will convey no other information than the ordinary routine of business here, with the disjointed remarks of delegates upon various subjects.

The question being taken upon the adoption of the resolution, it was, upon a division, decided in the affirmative. Ayes 47. Noes 33.

COMMITTEE ON ELECTIONS.

The PRESIDENT. I will take this occasion to appoint the committee on elections.

They are, Messrs. Root, Huston, Ballinger, A. K. Marshall, and Garrard.

CONTESTED SEAT.

Mr. NUTTALL. If I am in order, I would like to make a few remarks to the convention, concerning the application of the claimant for my seat. I would like to know whether his petition has been presented to the committee.

The PRESIDENT. It has been referred, and the subject is now before the committee.

Mr. NUTTALL. I do not know whether this is the proper occasion to say anything in regard to this subject, but as it appears that there is not much business now before the convention, I would be glad, if it would meet with the approbation of the body, to make a few statements.

SEVERAL DELEGATES. "Leave, Leave."

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman can be heard, unanimous leave being granted, although it is totally out of order, there being no motion before the convention.

Mr. HARDIN. The gentleman is certainly entitled to be heard.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If the gentleman desires to be within the rules of order, he can move to instruct the committee, and then he will be entitled to address the convention.

Mr. NUTTALL. I would like to know whether the committee possesses the power to send for persons and papers.

The PRESIDENT. That power results necessarily from the appointment of the committee.

Mr. NUTTALL. I should like to have the committee instructed upon one branch of the question, and in order to elucidate my meaning, with permission, I will make a few remarks to the convention.

The first Monday succeeding the August election, my competitor notified me that he would contest my right to a seat here, upon the ground of illegal votes having been polled for me in that election. I sent him word back by the gentleman who served the notice, that if his friends would pay up their bets, I would run the election over again, and desired to know whether he intended to prosecute the contest in good faith. From that day until the opening of the convention, I heard nothing of the contest. No notice was given me that any depositions, or that any preliminary steps would be taken to contest my right to a seat here.

Now, surely sir, the committee ought to be instructed, not that I am afraid to meet my competitor on that ground, but not to go into that branch of the controversy, because I know that this convention cannot well spare me, and if they go into that investigation, I shall have to be absent about three-fourths of my time.

As to the other branch of the controversy, I pledge myself to the convention that I will occupy no seat here that the majority of my constituents refuse to give me. And further, that there is an apparent majority for my competitor upon the poll books, there can be no rational doubt; and that one of two things is as certain as that the sun shines in the firmament of Heaven, and that is, either that the officers of election for the county of Henry have been guilty of wilful corruption in giving my certificate of election to me, or that there has been most damnable forgery perpetrated upon the poll books. I will prove beyond a doubt to the convention by all the judges of election, that from twenty four to twenty five votes have been forged upon the poll book. I will prove by the clerk of election that those votes were never recorded. I will prove by the voters themselves, that they never cast their votes. If I do not prove this, I am willing to be set down by every gentleman on this floor, as a dishonorable man.

The PRESIDENT. There is no question before the convention.

Mr. NUTTALL. I am now through, sir.

Mr. HARDIN. I do not know any thing of the nature of the contest as between my honorable friend and his competitor, but from the experience I have had in contested elections, I am convinced that the gentleman who has the seat has a right to be heard upon that or upon any other point. The gentleman contesting the seat has no right to speak without special permission. I will, therefore, move that Mr. Lecompte be permitted to be heard also.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I think that very proper, and shall vote for it whenever the committee shall have made an issue by their report.

Mr. HARDIN. There may be some incidental point upon which it will be necessary for Mr. Lecompte to make some explanation.

Mr. IRWIN. I will simply suggest that the motion should be amended so that he may be heard, either by himself or counsel.

Mr. HARDIN. I would remark that I never saw a lawyer introduced in the case of a contested election.

The PRESIDENT. The question is upon allowing the contestant the right to be heard upon any point in connection with the contest.

The motion was agreed to.

The convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 10, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. JAMES submitted the following, which on his motion, was referred to the committee on the legislative department, and ordered to be printed:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to direct the general assembly to provide, by law, for the mode and manner in which the survivor of a duel, and his estate, shall be rendered responsible to, and be charged with, a compensation for the wife and children of the deceased whom he has slain.

2. Resolved, That no lottery should be authorized by this state, and the selling or buying of lottery tickets within this state should be prohibited.

Mr. TRIPLETT offered the following, and on his motion it was referred to the committee on the executive department for the state at large, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That whenever the governor shall remit a fine or forfeiture, or grant a reprieve or pardon, he shall enter his reasons for doing so on the records of the secretary of state, in a separate book; and on the requisition of either house of the general assembly, the same shall be laid before them, and published if they deem proper.

Mr. GRAY submitted the following, and on his motion it was referred to the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the mode of revising and amending the constitution ought to be as follows:

Any specific amendment, or amendments, to the constitution may be proposed in the senate or house of representatives, and, if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each of the two houses, such proposed amendment, or amendments, shall be entered on the journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and published for three months previous to the next succeeding election for representatives to the legislature, in at least one newspaper of each county, if any be published therein, and shall be submitted to the people, at said election, in such manner as the legislature may prescribe; and, if the people shall approve such amendment, or amendments, or any of them, by a majority of all the electors of the state qualified to vote for members of the legislature, such amendment, or amendments, so approved, shall be referred to the legislature chosen at said election; and if, in said legislature, such proposed amendment, or amendments, or any of them, shall be agreed to by a majority of all the members elected to each house, then it shall be the duty of the legislature to again submit such proposed amendment, or amendments, or such of them as may have been agreed to, as aforesaid, by the two legislatures, to the people at the next election for judicial officers, or members of the legislature; and if the people, at said second election, shall approve and ratify such amendment, or amendments, or any of them, by a majority of all the electors of the state qualified to vote for members of the legislature, such amendment, or amendments, so approved and ratified, shall become part of the constitution: Provided, That if more than one amendment be submitted, they shall be submitted in such manner and form that the people may vote for or against each amendment separately and distinctly; but no amendment, or amendments, shall be submitted to the people oftener than once in ——— years: And, provided further, That the article of the constitution concerning slaves, this article, and the portion which provides that no man's property shall be taken or applied to public use without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being previously made to him, shall never be amended or changed without the concurrence of two thirds of all the members elected to each house of the general assembly, at two successive sessions, and a majority of all the electors of the state, qualified to vote for members of the legislature, at two successive elections.

Mr. PRESTON offered the following, and on his motion it was referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That it be referred to the committee on the miscellaneous provisions of the constitution, to inquire into the expediency of amending the 16th section of the 6th article of the present constitution of Kentucky, so that:

1st. All judicial officers and all ministerial or executive officers, whose duties and powers are confined to counties, who may be elected under the new constitution, shall be chosen by ballot.

2d. In all elections by the people of governor, lieutenant governor, members of the general assembly, and officers whose duties relate to the state at large, and in all elections by the legislature, the votes shall be personally and publicly given viva voce.

Mr. KAVANAUGH offered the following, and on his motion it was referred to the committee on the county courts, and ordered to be printed:

1. Resolved, That provision should be made in the constitution for a court of probate in each county of the State, to consist of a sole judge, with a jurisdiction defined in the constitution and laws: Provided, however, That such jurisdiction shall, in no case, in the trial of civil causes, exceed the sum of ——— dollars.

2. Resolved, That the number of justices of the peace for each county of the State should be in proportion to the number of qualified voters in such county, which proportion should be prescribed in the constitution; and that the jurisdiction of justices of the peace ought not to exceed that now given by the laws of the State: Provided, however, That each county seat of the State ought to have at least two justices.

3. Resolved, That the county courts, as now established, should be abolished, and that the justices collectively of each county, constitute a board of county commissioners; and, as such, to have no other power nor jurisdiction than such as relates to the county revenue and its application, roads, passways, ware-houses, ferries, and mills, and to be regulated and governed in such jurisdiction in such manner as may be prescribed by law.

Mr. DUNAVAN offered the following, and on his motion it was referred, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the appropriate committee enquire into the expediency of adopting in the constitution a provision requiring the fiscal agent of the state, after the return to his office of the commissioners' books of the revenue tax, to make an estimate of the probable expenditure of the government for that year, and then to assess an ad valorem tax on the amount of property listed for taxation sufficient to meet that expenditure.

Mr. BOWLING offered the following, and on his motion it was referred to the committee on the legislative department, and ordered to be printed:

1. Resolved, That it is right and just that all property should be taxed according to its value; that value to be ascertained in such manner as the legislature shall direct, so that the same shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth. No one species of property from which a tax may be collected ought to be taxed higher than any other species of property of equal value—but that the legislature ought to have power to tax merchants, peddlers and privileges, in such manner as they may, from time to time, direct.

2. Resolved, That no article manufactured of the produce of this commonwealth ought to be taxed, otherwise than to pay inspection fees.

Mr. HAMILTON offered the following, and moved that it be referred to the committee on the legislative department:

1. Resolved, That within five years after the adoption of this constitution, the legislature shall appoint not less than three, nor more than five persons, learned in the law, who shall revise, digest, arrange and publish the laws, civil and criminal, so as to have but one law on any one subject, and to be in plain english, in such manner as the legislature may direct; and a like revision every ten years thereafter.

2. Resolved, That every law enacted by the legislature shall embrace but one object, and that shall be expressed in the title.

3. Resolved, That no law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title; but, in such case, the act revised, or section amended, shall be re-enacted and published at length; and all other laws on the same subject shall be repealed.

Mr. BRISTOW offered the following, as an additional resolution, and suggested that they should be referred to a special committee, having charge of the subject:

Resolved, That the legislature, at its first session after the adoption of the new constitution, shall provide for the appointment of three commissioners, whose duty it shall be to revise, reform, simplify, and abridge, the rules and practice, pleadings, forms and proceedings, of the courts of record of this state, and report thereon to the legislature, subject to their adoption and modification, from time to time.

Mr. HAMILTON accepted the amendment, and the suggestion to refer.

The propositions were accordingly referred to a special committee, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCURE offered the following, and, on his motion, it was referred to the committee on the executive for the state at large, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the committee on executive offices shall enquire into the propriety of changing, or so amending the existing constitution, that when the governor of this commonwealth shall die, refuse to qualify, move, or resign, in that event a new election shall be had for governor, instead of the mode pointed out in the existing constitution of filling his vacancy.

Mr. LINDSEY offered the following, and on his motion it was referred to the committee on the legislative department:

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to enquire and report on the propriety of inserting the following, as sections in the new constitution:—

"The ancient mode of trial by jury, in all criminal or penal prosecutions on behalf of the commonwealth, shall be held sacred, and the rights thereof remain inviolate; except the legislature may define the causes for which the commonwealth may challenge jurors, and allow challenges in her behalf without cause shown, not exceeding five in number—and may also allow three-fourths of the jury to render a verdict. And in civil causes, the legislature may lessen the number of jurors to seven, and allow five to render a verdict.

"The rights of bearing arms in self defence shall not be prohibited by the legislature; but the legislature may prohibit, by law, the wearing of concealed weapons in time of peace, and when not worn in self defence."

Mr. GARRARD offered the following, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the second Auditor be requested to transmit to this convention a tabular statement, showing the number of white males over twenty one years of age in each county in this State for the year 1849.

Mr. THOMPSON offered the following, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the power of the legislature to contract debts ought to be restricted, and the committee on the public debt of the State be instructed to enquire into the expediency of so amending the constitution as to place the above restriction upon the legislative authority.

CORRECTIONS.

Mr. TALBOTT, by consent, substituted the following for his third resolution submitted yesterday, in which some errors were found:

Resolved, That no specific amendment shall be adopted or convention called, under the constitution this convention may adopt, except upon the recommendation of at least two-thirds of both branches of the legislature for two successive sessions—and afterwards sanctioned and ratified by a direct vote of the people, a majority of all the qualified electors in the State voting for the same.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I desire this opportunity to correct what I conceive to be probably a natural misconception of the remark I made on the proposition of my colleague (Mr. Hardin) yesterday, on the motion to permit Mr. Leecompte to take a seat in this body, and be heard at any time he may think proper on any motion that may be made from time to time by the committee on the subject of his election. In the language employed in the short note made of the subject, I am made to acquiesce in that course.

My objection was, that I was unwilling to permit an individual to take his seat in the legislature, or in any body organized as this is, until after the committee who had the subject under consideration had examined and reported upon the facts. I interposed an objection to the order giving him the privilege of being heard in this body on any incidental question that might arise on the motion of the committee or of any member of the convention. The house however thought proper to give him that privilege, by a vote, but not with my vote or consent. I did not think it right then in regard to the body itself, nor do I think it right in reference to the sitting member. I barely wish to correct any misapprehension that I acquiesced in voting for that resolution.

SLAVERY.

Mr. MERIWETHER, from the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery, made the following report:

ARTICLE SEVENTH.

SEC. 1. The general assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of their owners or without paying their owners previous to such emancipation a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated, nor shall they exercise any other or greater power over the after born children of slave mothers than over the slaves then in being.

SEC. 2. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to this state from bringing with them, nor citizens thereof who may derive title by marriage, descent or devise, from bringing to this state such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States, or any territory thereof, so long as any person of the same age or description shall be continued in slavery by the laws of this state.

SEC. 3. They shall pass laws to permit the owners of slaves to emancipate them saving the rights of creditors and preventing them from becoming a charge to any county in this commonwealth. But they shall have no power to pass any law authorising the emancipation of any slave or slaves, without a provision for their removal from, and against their return to, this state.

SEC. 4. They shall have full power to prevent slaves being brought into this state as merchandise.

SEC. 5. They shall have full power to prevent any slaves being brought into this state from a foreign country, and to prevent those from being brought into this state, who have been, since the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty nine, or may hereafter be imported into any of the United States from a foreign country.

SEC. 6. They shall have full power to pass such laws as may be necessary to oblige the owners of slaves to abstain from all injuries to them, extending to life or limb and in case of their neglect or refusal to comply with the directions of such laws, to have such slave or slaves sold for the benefit of their owner or owners.

SEC. 7. They shall pass laws providing that whenever a slave or slaves are executed, a full equivalent in money shall be paid the owner out of a fund to be raised by a special tax on slaves levied for that purpose, and providing that when any slave or slaves shall be executed for the destruction of property, a pro rata distribution of the value paid for said slave or slaves shall be made between the owner of such slave or slaves and the owner of the property destroyed.

SEC. 8. They shall have power to provide by law, for the removal of all free negroes and mulattos now in this state.

SEC. 9. They shall pass laws providing that any free negro or mulatto hereafter emigrating to, or being emancipated in, and refusing to leave this state, or having left, shall return and settle within this state, shall be deemed guilty of felony and punished by confinement in the penitentiary thereof.

SEC. 10. In the prosecution of slaves for felony, no inquest by a grand jury shall be necessary, but the proceedings in such prosecutions shall be regulated by law: except, that the general assembly shall have no power to deprive them of the privilege of an impartial trial by a petit jury.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved that the report be referred to the committee of the whole and printed, and made the special order for Monday week, the 22d instant.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT announced the special order, being the resolutions of Mr. Turner in relation to the importation of slaves, set down by order of the convention for consideration to-day.

Mr. TURNER. I did not anticipate so early a report from the standing committee on the slavery question, when I moved a few days ago, to refer the resolutions I had the honor of introducing here, to a committee of the whole, to be the subject of consideration to-day. I suggested at the time, that probably there would be considerable diversity of opinion, as to the propriety of inhibiting the further importation of slaves—whether there should be a constitutional or a statutory provision on the subject—and that probably a considerable number of members were opposed to any provision at all in regard to it. I had desired that these propositions should be somewhat discussed before the committee reported, but as they have made their report, I consider it premature perhaps to take up my resolutions and enter upon their discussion, before that report is taken up for consideration. I do not therefore, think it proper to interfere with the motion of the chairman of the committee—and I suppose he made it under the instructions of his committee—to postpone the consideration of the matter until Monday week. I cannot concur in the report of that committee, and at the proper time I hope to be enabled with the assistance of other gentlemen who agree with me in opinion, to show that there are propositions in that report that we ought not to adopt. I understand, that according to the report the gentleman has made, there is never to be in this commonwealth the power of arresting the bringing in of slaves into the state for the use of the individual who may bring them.

Mr. MERIWETHER. If the gentleman will pardon me, there is no such provision in the present constitution.

Mr. TURNER. I do not understand it as a direct prohibition, but in substance it does so prohibit. I want no equivocation on the subject. I want the constitution expressly to prohibit it, or to recognize the power of the legislative part of the government to do so; for I think I shall be able to show, that it is against the interests of this commonwealth, that slaves should be brought here—that it is against our pecuniary interests, the light of the age in which we live, and the rights of humanity. I move that the resolutions I had the honor to present be made the order of the day, in connection with the report of the committee on slavery, for Monday week.

Mr. MERIWETHER. By a little modification of his motion, the gentlemen will get at the object he desires. If he will move to postpone the consideration of his resolutions, and to make them the special order for Monday week, they will come up at the same time with the report of the committee. In regard to the point dwelt on by the gentleman, we have copied exactly the provisions of the old constitution on the subject.

Mr. TURNER. I noticed that the provisions of the old constitution have been copied by the committee, and for myself, I never experienced any difficulty in declaring that the legislature had power to prohibit the importation of slaves. But if you go to one-third of the members in the legislature last winter, they will tell you that they voted to modify the law of 1833, because it was unconstitutional, and that idea weakened the force and effect of the law very much. Although the supreme court has decided that it is constitutional, yet a large portion of the intelligence of the country doubts it, and for that reason I prefer that if we do not prohibit the importation of slaves by the constitution itself, we shall have a provision, clear and unequivocal, that the legislature shall have the power to do so. All I desire in regard to the order of business is, that my resolution shall come up for consideration at the same time as the report of the committee.

Mr. IRWIN. As one of the committee on the subject of slavery, I wish merely to remark that I do not agree with this report. I like the amendment proposed, and am willing to incorporate the law of 1833 into the constitution of the state. I have always been opposed to the repeal of that law, because I saw that it worked very well, and I am satisfied that its incorporation into the constitution, would satisfy a large and respectable portion of the people of the country. I think it is unnecessary that slaves should be brought into the commonwealth for the use of our citizens, and for the purpose of preventing any cavil as to the power of the legislature over the question, I desire to see the prohibition incorporated into the constitution. I am perhaps far less inclined to do any thing on this subject than any gentleman here, from the great interest my county has in this question. There is about $1,600,000 in property of this description in Logan, and yet in that county there are many gentlemen, large slave owners, who desire to see this principle incorporated in the constitution.

The PRESIDENT stated that the proper form of the motion, was first that the committee of the whole be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution.

Mr. TURNER would submit it to the pleasure of the convention, whether his resolution should be considered at this time or not. As for himself, he would as soon say what little he had to say now as at any other time.

The convention then—the question being taken—resolved to go into committee of the whole, on the 6th resolution offered by Mr. Turner.

Mr. BARLOW was called to the chair, and the resolution was read as follows:

6. Resolved, That no persons shall henceforth be slaves within this commonwealth, except such as are now so, and the descendants of the females of them, and such as may be brought to this State by bona fide emigrants and the descendants of the females of them, and such as citizens of Kentucky shall derive title to out of the State by marriage, devise, or descent, and the descendants of the females of them.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. President: when I made the motion some days ago, to go into committee of the whole, I had not the resolutions that I had the honor to introduce, before me, and I supposed that the whole subject of slavery was embraced in the one resolution. I find, however, that there is a preceding resolution rather conducive to the one just read, or at least connected with the same subject matter; and as I believe that there is considerable liberty of debate allowed under the rules of the convention, in committee of the whole, I will take the liberty of reading it in connection with the one read by the secretary:

5. Resolved, That the general assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owners. They shall pass laws to permit the owners to emancipate them, saving the rights of creditors: Provided, The persons emancipated shall be sent out of the United States at the expense of the person who emancipates them, and be sold into bondage for the benefit of the public treasury, in case of their return to Kentucky.

It will be perceived that in this resolution, a portion of the old constitution—the clause which gives the power to emancipate by making just and previous provision to the owners—is omitted. I am opposed to taking the property of an individual, which he has acquired under the sanction of the law and the constitution, at all, unless with his free will and consent. I do not believe that it is consistent with the principles of our government to do so. The very first principle of the government of the United States, and of the State of Kentucky, and indeed one of the grounds assigned in the declaration of independence, as a cause of separation from the mother country, was that private property should be secured against the exactions of government. It has been the practice for ages past, in the government of England, in times of great exigency, to seize upon the property of individuals—to take it without compensation being made to them, or to leave them dependent wholly upon the will of the government, whether it should be done or not. Soldiers have been quartered on private individuals without compensation being made, and private property taken in various ways, under the ancient institutions of the country from which we derive all, or at least the greater portion, of our institutions. I therefore have regarded this principle of the right of property, as asserted in the declaration of independence, in the constitution of the United States, and in that of Kentucky; and I look to it as lying at the very foundation of our government, and as a moral principle which ought not to be violated under any circumstances, or in any way or shape. But still, if you are to make compensation it might be said, why not leave that clause in the constitution? If you take the property to use in time of war, or of great necessity, when the government of the country could not progress, and sustain our rights and liberties, then the principle of taking private property without the consent of the owner, or making him previous compensation therefor, would properly apply. But that is not the case in relation to slave property. I will not go into this question very extensively, as I think the opinion of the country is settled in regard to it. According to the Auditor's report of the last year, there was within a fraction of $61,000,000 of this property in Kentucky, and according to an estimate by the most distinguished emancipationist in Kentucky, it would take $50 per head to remove the slaves to Africa. This upon 200,000 slaves, the number I understand in Kentucky, would cost $10,000,000.—And further, upon these sums the interest would be about $4,200,000 per annum, a sum that it is not probable, and indeed it is almost impossible, that any legislature which shall ever sit in Kentucky, will levy upon the people in the way of tax, to pay interest upon a debt, with a prospect that the debt itself was to be perpetual.—That would be setting at liberty the slaves of the country, and enslaving the white race. I am for doing justice to both;—it is as necessary for the one as the other. I believe that the slaves in Kentucky are in a better condition now, than any in which you could place them—that they are in a better condition than the laboring population of any part of the globe—and I do not believe it will benefit them to send them to a foreign country, or to sell them to the south or any where else. But if it would benefit them, the question is, whether you would enslave the white men for the purpose—for you might as well do so as to impose upon them a tax of $4,200,000 a year, in addition to the taxation now necessary to carry on the government and pay the interest on the public debt. Besides I think that almost every plan of emancipation that has been proposed to the country, has been one of a compulsive character, and this I think entirely impracticable. Among the many distinguished and talented men of the country, who have written and spoken on this subject, there are scarcely two who agree as to the plan of emancipation.—There is no better test as to whether a proposition is right and practicable, than to ascertain whether its advocates agree. But as the opinion of the country has settled down against any of these plans of emancipation, I will not trouble the committee with any further remarks on this branch of the subject.

I suppose that some will call me an emancipationist, because I am going to occupy some of the grounds taken by the convention which met here on the 25th of April. I am not to be scared by names, for I have been against the importation of slaves for years. I believe that when you, Mr. Chairman, and myself were associated together in the legislature in 1841, we voted together in relation to this subject, and advocated the doctrine I am now advocating—that it is not for the interest of Kentucky to import more slaves. I know that the statute of 1833 has not been enforced to the extent it ought to have been, and that many slaves have been brought into the state notwithstanding its provisions, and for that reason, I am for incorporating it into the constitution. When in the legislature, I introduced a proposition similar to the one now under consideration, and it passed through the representative branch—that no persons should be slaves in Kentucky except such as were then slaves, and the descendants of such as were brought in by their masters, or by marriage, descent, or devise. This leaves the prohibition one against bringing in slaves here for merchandize, or for the use of individuals, and what is the effect of it? It is a proposition which will work of itself, and render it unnecessary to go to the commonwealth's attorney, or any other officer of the government in order to have it executed. And while I am as much against the increase of free negroes amongst us as any man in Kentucky, and believe it to be a curse to both races, yet I understand, that under the proposition which I advocate, any negro brought here in opposition to the laws, will be no slave. What will be the effect? No man in his senses will ever run the risk of bringing a slave here. If he does the negro can sue for his freedom. There would never be a slave imported into the state under that provision.

It may be said that this is occupying emancipation ground. If I do occupy such ground, it is the same as that occupied by the venerable commonwealth of Virginia, from which many in this house are descended, and who is looked up to as one of the strongest in the number of pro-slavery states. As early as 1777, she adopted in her statutory provisions a similar inhibition against the importation of slaves. The state of South Carolina, with Mr. Calhoun, the great ultra pro-slavery leader at the head, has a similar provision in her laws. The constitution of the slave state of Mississippi prohibits the bringing in of slaves there as merchandize, and gives to the legislature the power of putting the same inhibition on all importations into the state, except in the cases of slaves brought by immigrants, after the year 1845. I think when a Kentuckian only occupies the ground taken by the venerable state of Virginia, and the states of South Carolina and Mississippi, he can hardly be charged with not being a pro-slavery man.

The resolutions will show to you that I am willing that a man shall bring slaves with him if he comes here to reside; or if his relatives out of the state devise them to him, that he may go and get them. Or, if one of our young men marries in another state, and his wife has her domestic slaves—those with whom she is acquainted, and desires on coming into a foreign country to have around her some person to look upon, whose face she has seen before—I am willing that she shall bring them. But I am against the traffic in human blood in every shape and manner in which it can be brought here.

I think, rather than have the constitution open on this subject, we should incorporate this proposition in regard to emancipation into it. What will be the effect of leaving the matter open?—We see it in what has been the effect of the discussions during the last year upon the people.—Every time that you agitate the slave question, either in the legislature or during an electioneering canvass on the stump, you weaken the bonds of slavery, render the slave restless and insolent, and eventually, by deceiving him in his ignorance, cause him to suffer the loss of life, or be subjected to great cruelty. Would it not be better then, to put the prohibition in the constitution, than to suffer the question again to be agitated at the polls? In my part of the state, you can scarcely travel through the country that you will not see slaves who, although formerly, before the great discussions of last year, were peaceable and quiet, have now forfeited all their claims to good character, and have gone to jail or been sent abroad for insolence; thinking they were entitled to their liberty, they have rebelled, and have been sent to jail and probably punished with stripes, and rendered liable to be hung. Look at the scenes witnessed up the country here on divers occasions, and I think that a few months ago a similar scene occurred in the counties towards the Green River country. I believe that these scenes occurred through the agitation of this question, the consequent delusion of the slaves, and their mistaken belief that they were to be free. Therefore, I think the question ought to be tied up in the constitution, so that we may hear nothing of slavery or no slavery in future. Let it be a settled question as to the opinion of the country, whether slaves shall be brought here or not, or whether they shall have their freedom on any condition, in future, other than the will of the owner.

I differ from the proposition reported by the committee. I know it is not properly before us, but I believe that in committee of the whole, we are in committee of the whole world, and at liberty to discuss almost every thing. One of the propositions of the committee is, that the slavery question is to be thrown altogether into the legislature—and another is in regard to free negroes. Now I do not understand that under the constitution of the United States we have any power over those negroes already free. They are quasi citizens of this commonwealth, of this country, enjoying privileges recognized by the constitution of the United States, and we have no power to compel them, after they have obtained their freedom, to leave the commonwealth. That question has already been passed upon indirectly under a law in Delaware, providing for getting rid of their free negroes, and their transportation to Liberia. The proposition of the committee relative to those liberated hereafter by the free will of the owner of them, is, that laws shall be passed compelling them to leave the commonwealth. I think the provision should be that they ought not to be free until they do leave the state. I would go further and say that if they came back here, or even their descendants came back here—though I should regret it very much—that we should impose the penalty on them of being sold into bondage, and that the proceeds should go into the public treasury. I wish to make the prohibition against free negroes as stringent and extended in its operation as is possible. I wish in this matter to go to the verge of our power under the federal constitution. I believe that if there is a curse alike to the white and the black race, it is in having free negroes where there are vicious white men. They have none of the motives to raise themselves up and attain a higher state of morals and education that a white man has—and shut out from office and all the privileges of political life, they necessarily become a degraded race. They are made use of by vicious, wicked white men, for purposes, where the negro cannot be a witness against them. The white man can go and whisper in the free negro's ears, corrupt his morals, and induce him to steal, and yet he cannot be a witness against him, although he receives what he gets from the negro, and profits by it. You cannot show me one free negro out of fifty that is in equal condition, morally or physically, with him who has a master that treats him well. I shall therefore, at the proper time move to amend the proposition of the committee on the subject, for I do not think it gives us the proper security against an increase of the free negro population.

There is about sixty-one million of dollars worth of slave property in Kentucky, which produce less than three per cent. profit on the capital invested, or about half as much as the moneyed capital would yield. But suppose the nett profit to be three per cent., it is a proposition that is susceptible of demonstration, that it is not our interest to increase this property. I have made a little calculation which I will submit to the committee, and I believe, if there be any error in it, it will be found to be on the side of making slave labor more valuable than it really is, and by that calculation I cannot make the profit to be more than three per cent. There are about two hundred thousand slaves in Kentucky. Of these, about three fourths are superannuated, sick, women in a condition not profitable for labor, and infants unable to work, who yield no net profit. Show me the man that has forty or fifty slaves upon his estate, and if there are ten out of that number, who are valuable and available, it is as much as you can expect. But my calculation allows you to have three fourths, that are barely able to maintain themselves, to pay for their own clothing, fuel, house room, and doctor's bills. Is there any gentleman here, who has a large number of slaves, who will say that they are more profitable than that? I do not believe there is one. Well then, we have the one fourth left. This leaves fifty thousand laborers, and I put the value of their labor at sixty dollars each, per annum. This will produce three millions of dollars annually. But from this you must deduct at least twenty dollars per head for raiment, food, house room, and doctor's bills, and that amounts to a million of dollars. Is this deduction too little? Is there any individual here who will say that a grown, working negro does not cost his master, leaving out of the question what he steals from him and sells at the nearest town—is there any one that will say that an average expense of twenty dollars for this class of slaves, is too small an estimate. This then will make a million of dollars, and there will be only a profit of two millions left. You must also deduct about five per cent. from the value of all the slaves, for deaths: which leaves the net profit on the capital of sixty-one millions of dollars about one million, six hundred, ninety-five thousand, which is less than three per cent., or about half as much as the moneyed capital would yield; and this valuation is a very liberal one for the slavery importation side of the question—as every one must acknowledge, who has had any experience in the matter.—This estimate, is at least a fair one, applied to the part of the country where I live, and I believe that slave property is as well managed there, as it is any where. It is true the man may have upon his farm only such slaves as are able to work.—He may have no women or children among them, and he will, in such case, make a little more profit. But if you take the whole slave property together, the average will be as I have stated.

Well then, in a pecuniary point of view, as a mere calculation of dollars and cents, if I am right in my estimate, it is not our interest to invest more capital in slave property. It is against the interest of the commonwealth to do it; manifestly so, if I am right, or any where near right. Well, that is a considerable point gained; but there are considerations in connexion with this part of the subject, that have an important bearing upon it, according to my view of the matter. That white labor is the cheapest I have no doubt. I have never entertained a doubt on that point. I have never entertained a doubt that it is the interest of the great slave holding community of this state, to sell their slaves. If they were not attached to them, and if they did not dislike seeing those who have grown up with them and their children, driven into a bondage more galling, more oppressive, where their raiment and food would not be equal to what they now enjoy, and where, owing to the great amount of slave population, their restrictions would be greater, it would be of decided advantage to the owners of slaves here to dispose of those slaves and invest their capital in some other way.

It is the working portion of this Commonwealth, those who have to work their way up from small beginnings in order to gain a position for themselves and their families, it is this class of the community, who are interested in retaining the institution of slavery in this state; because the slaves keep out a pauper population; the emptying of the jails and the poor houses of Europe, the renegades from all parts of the earth, who come here and compete with the whole population in point of labor. Do not understand me as saying one word against that class of foreigners who ordinarily come here, because very few of those whom I have mentioned, the renegades of other countries, ever come to Kentucky under the purifying process of keeping negroes. In that respect they have a happy influence. The better class of foreigners come here, while the dregs of the emigrant population will be found in the cities. You will see them there in thousands, such men as make it hardly safe to walk the streets, unless you have your pocket-book secured. But nine out of ten of those who come here, I am willing to take by the hand whenever they declare their intention of renouncing their allegiance to a foreign government, and avow their attachment to our institutions and declare that they intend to live under them. What is the evidence of its being the interest of the owners of slaves to dispose of that sort of property? Because slave labor is the dearest. Why is it that your shoe and boot makers go all the way to Lynn and purchase the fabrics of free labor? Because they can be procured for one third the price, and after paying the expense of transportation they can undersell your citizens. Why is it that you obtain your cotton and woollen fabrics more cheaply abroad than you do at home? Why is it that even in the interior of the state, where I live, at a distance of a hundred miles from Cincinnati, you can send to that city and buy furniture and cabinet work and carry it round by the Kentucky river, a distance of a hundred and fifty miles, and all this at one third less cost than you can get it for at home? It is because our vocation is different; it is agricultural.

These with a thousand other considerations, convince me that free labor is cheaper than slave labor, and that it is the working portion of the community alone that is interested in keeping up this institution. We all know that the institution of slavery is the best in the world for keeping society from becoming fixed and settled. Look at those who were originally overseers in Virginia and Kentucky, at their first settlement. They have many of them become the proprietors of the very estates upon which they were at first employed as overseers. And their descendants now fill the halls of legislation and the courts of judicature of the country, whilst the descendants of the original proprietors have descended to a different level in the scale of society. Such revolutions in the condition of individuals do not take place half so often, where the institution of slavery does not exist where it is not recognized. Go to New York and to Massachusetts, and you will find many estates that have descended in the same families while the poor laborer is the poor laborer still. It is true, there are exceptions, but not the same number of exceptions as under our institutions. So you will see, though I am against extending this institution or increasing it, it has a wholesome effect in some respects, while it has in other respects a highly injurious effect. I believe that they, who are raised up where the institution of slavery exists, with some exceptions, have been uniformly distinguished. Who has ever seen such a constellation of great men as the Southern states have produced, since we have achieved our liberties? Look at the great men of Virginia, South Carolina, and of Kentucky, and where are the men who are worthy to be compared with them, in the free states of the north. We have had it is true, an Adams or two, a Webster, and a Wright, but they are few and far between. But you will find them in the great south. And sir, there is a nobleness of spirit, a feeling above littleness, a greatness of soul that grows up where the institution of slavery exists, that is scarcely to be found in any other country. One says it would be better that we should have more slaves, because there are not enough to perform the labors of the country, when the institution ceases. If you drive them out we shall be overwhelmed with a white population. For my own part I want a great deal of room. Look at some portions of the north where the population is huddled together in such a manner, that although perhaps, in their habits and customs they may be equal with us, the pestilence wherever it prevails is more fatal amongst them than with us. They are swept off in greater numbers than in those portions of the country where the population is sparse. And sir, if you bring in a dense population here, why as a matter of course, you decrease the prospect of the free laboring man to obtain high wages, the competition will be so great. I do not think it is the interest of slaveholders here, that they should emancipate rather than keep their slaves, because three per cent. is better than nothing. If you take them away altogether you sink sixty one millions of dollars worth of property, you sink one million eight hundred thousand dollars of net profits annually, that are derived from it, and I take it that we have the same right to the offspring that we have to the original property. It is all secured by the same law and by the same constitution, according to every principle that is right, proper, and just. I am, therefore, not for emancipation in any shape or in any manner, except permissive emancipation.

But there is another reason why slave property is not going to remain as valuable as it is.—Every man who lives on the border of the commonwealth next to Virginia, where slave property is secured by want of facility to travel, knows that slaves in the interior, even when forty, fifty, or a hundred miles distant from the other frontier, are less valuable on account of the facilities which they possess for escape, and on account of the interposition of the meddlesome abolitionists. Shall we then, as a matter of pecuniary interest, go on investing our capital in the purchase of this description of property, which is constantly becoming less secure and less profitable? Now, I make use of one observation which probably some gentleman may take exception to. I say there is no man living, that sees in the hand of Providence what I see, that does not perceive that there is a power at work above us, that is above all human institutions, and one that will yet prevail, even in Virginia, Maryland, and Kentucky. Yes, there is a power at work, which is above all human power, and one which we cannot resist.

I do not say that I desire this; but that it is coming—that it is as steadily marching upon us as we are marching forward to the grave, and that we do not know when it will come, is perfectly certain from the evidences around us; and should we go on investing our capital in this property we shall find this to be the case. Why sir, in the state of Maryland, there is already a great diminution in the value of that kind of property. I do not say that there is a positive diminution in the state of Virginia, but it ceases to increase to the extent that it did formerly.—The shadow upon the sun dial is advancing sufficiently to show that this is not growing or increasing in that state; at all events, that the increase is not so great as in time past. And the same thing has already commenced in Kentucky; and this proceeds from the power which we cannot resist. We may tie it up—I desire that it should be restricted by whatever legislation we may adopt upon that subject—but when the Deity has sent forth his fiat that this institution is to cease, it will cease, and no human effort can arrest it. I do not believe that the institution of slavery is going to exist for all time. I am convinced from the evidences around me, that it will not, and I cannot see how we can benefit the slaves, or better their condition by anything we can do. I have been unable to come to any other conclusion, and I have given the subject a careful examination. But that it is an institution that is not destined to endure, I think is most certain. We need not be afraid that this slave population will not increase, so as to keep up their numbers; though they do not increase in the same proportion as formerly. In 1831, there were one hundred and forty thousand and ten slaves in Kentucky. In 1848, there were one hundred and ninety-two thousand, four hundred and seventy, and I suppose there are about two hundred thousand now. There was an increase of the number of slaves during the seventeen years between 1831 and 1848, of fifty-two thousand, four hundred and sixty; consequently, an increase of the amount of capital of one hundred and forty thousand dollars. The increase has kept up in a reasonable ratio with the increase of the white population. And I think that those who believe that slavery will exist always, and do desire to have it exist here, ought to be content with this increase.

It is said, why prevent the poor man from owning this description of property, why prevent him from buying slaves where he can procure them cheapest? I do not think that the price of slaves will be increased by prohibiting bringing them into the state. The price is regulated very much by the price of our commodities in the south.

Well sir, as to the wealth of the country; under the statute of 1833, though it has not been very much enforced, let us see how the wealth of the country has run up. The taxable property in the state in 1831 was one hundred and twelve millions two hundred and eighty five thousand seven hundred and eighty dollars. In 1848, it amounted to two hundred and seventy two millions eight hundred and forty seven thousand six hundred and ninety six, an increase in seventeen years of about one hundred and fifty per cent. It is true, there have been some few subjects added to the taxable property in that period. The money capital has been made taxable property, and they have made some portions of the stock of the country taxable. But in 1831, the cash capital was exceedingly scarce, exchanges were against us; the merchants who went to the north had to pay something like five per cent. for funds that they could use in Philadelphia and New York. That was a heavy tax upon the country. Well what has been the influence of this wholesome law? Instead of bringing in slaves from Virginia and elsewhere, money has been brought into the country, and the effect is, that Kentucky, though a very young state, has become one of the moneyed states.—Exchanges are now in our favor, instead of being against us. We are not obliged every time we go out of the state for the purpose of purchasing an article that may be needed in our families, to purchase exchanges at a premium of five per cent. And this is so much added to the property of the state. And it is in this way that we have made this property more valuable than slave property, which brings but three per cent., and it is by getting clear of this difference in exchanges that Kentucky has become wealthy and powerful.

Now put this provision in the constitution, let it appear that this traffic is to cease so far as the investment of capital and the bringing in of slaves is concerned, and Kentucky will rise up and be still more powerful. But increase the number of your slaves and the product of your property will be less and less. A man who has three or four able bodied slaves may make them profitable, but when a man has forty or fifty, if he makes any thing, it is but a small pittance upon the capital invested. Increase them, and the product of their labor will be less and less.

Well, what kind of slaves do we get? You see almost every slave state, except probably Texas and Arkansas, are making negro raising a business to obtain a living by. It may be said that wheat is the staple production of Virginia; but I say that negroes are the staple production in reality. As to Tennessee, I am told that there was not a man elected to the legislature who was not pledged to support a measure against bringing in any more slaves into the state. Now what kind of slaves shall we get here? Shall we get those fine, honest servants, that we want to entrust with our property, or shall we get these scape-gallowses, rogues, and rascals forced upon us, not only ready to steal and burn our property, but to contaminate those we have already. It seems to me sir, that this will be the inevitable effect of opening the door for the admission of negroes, to be brought here in droves, and in chains. Gentlemen may say they do not think so, but when the fact stares them in the face they cannot resist it.

For myself, what few slaves I have, and those that are owned among my friends and relatives, why sir, they are endeared to me, and it ought to be so with every man. I feel that they are human beings, and that their morals should be attended to, and that they should not be made to associate with rogues and rascals. It appears to me to be in the nature of a punishment to the slaves to sell them. I do not want my slaves who have grown up with my children, and that have become attached to my family to be associated with these scape-gallowses and to be corrupted by them any more than I want the laboring white population to be mingled with the offscourings of Europe that are brought in here. Suppose we bring into this commonwealth twenty thousand of this kind of slaves, with their morals destroyed, and distribute them among our slaves, the whole amount you have, and those you bring in, would not sell to any man who appreciates morals as he ought, for the amount which those would bring which we have already.

The whole civilized world has turned its back upon the African slave trade; even Portugal is now coming into civilization and christianity upon this subject, if I may be allowed the expression; she is placing herself by the side of England, and of France, and of all the enlightened nations of the earth. And what is there in the African slave trade, that is worse than to go into another state and to bring slaves from thence, tearing mothers from their children, separating husbands from their wives, without any offence charged against them; driving them along in chains as if they were beasts of prey? Is it not a scene that human nature revolts at the sight of? Is it not a scene that no man, unless he is determined to engage in this traffic, can look upon without feelings, deep and powerful? But what is there in the African slave trade, which makes it more excusable? There, by the laws of war, as practiced among those barbarians, prisoners are brought in and sold as slaves.—Well, the captor has a right to the life of his prisoner, according to their laws of warfare.—He may kill him if he pleases. I am no apologist for this; but it is inflicting upon him a weaker punishment. There is suffering, to be sure, upon the passage; and there is suffering experienced by those whom we send out to Africa, but when they arrive here they get the benefit of civilization; they are placed in a more elevated scale than they occupied before. But nearly all of christendom—and the residue is coming in—have denounced this traffic, and put those who are engaged in it upon a footing with those who are guilty of the worst crimes that can be committed against humanity. They refuse them an honorable death, but hang them as robbers and pirates, and the committers of high treason. The slaves that are already civilized and christianized, do not derive these advantages. It is true, I believe, they are treated as well in Kentucky as in any state, which is the only point of view you can put it in, that will in any way or in any manner excuse us. And I suppose that in Virginia, where negroes are grown up for the purpose of sale, there is very little difference in the manner of treating them.

As this subject has been taken up a little out of its order, in consequence of the report of the committee coming in when I did not expect it, I have probably detained the committee longer than I ought to have done. But I will ask the committee one question before I stop. How would any gentleman here feel, if we were in the minority, and another race of people was to come, and without any offence or injury being committed against them by us—without any complaint, take the wife of one of these honorable delegates, and tie her in his presence, or his daughter, or his son, and chain them to a hundred other individuals who had committed no offence against God or man, and take them away where they could never be recovered? If there is any man who could look upon a scene of this kind—because they are human beings and have souls as we have—without feelings of the deepest remorse, I can only say that he is differently organized from me. I say that the state of Kentucky ought to be magnanimous, chivalrous, just, and humane; that our great constitutional charter should have affixed upon its face, upon its very front, an expression for posterity and for other states and nations to read that we do not believe in such a traffic, and that we set our faces against it in every way, and in every shape.

Mr. MERIWETHER. It will be recollected by the convention, that I suggested the propriety of postponing this matter, and making it the special order of the day for the day fixed upon for the consideration of the report of the committee. This suggestion, however, did not seem to meet the approbation of the gentleman from Madison. He has thought proper to proceed to-day, and feeling it incumbent upon me to show that the gentleman did misapprehend the report of the committee, and feeling a deep regret that he did not wait until he had examined that report, I will proceed to make a few remarks in answer to the gentleman.

I had the honor of a seat in this hall, as representative from the county of Jefferson, when the act of 1833 was passed, and voted for it. Had I been here at the last session of the legislature, I should have voted against its repeal. But I do object to placing the provisions of that act in the constitution; because it is evident to every member here, that if we do so we shall cause a heavy vote to be cast against that constitution, when it shall be submitted to the people.

We know that a large number of the delegates in this hall were members of the last legislature, and voted for the repeal of that law.—The repeal was carried, and it is but fair to presume that they reflected the will of their constituents. And will you incorporate in the constitution a provision that must inevitably cause a large and heavy vote to be cast against it?

I listened with a great deal of pleasure to many of the remarks of the gentleman from Madison. I listened, however, to other portions of his argument with rather different feelings. I imagined at one time that I was hearing the emancipation candidate who chased me through the county of Jefferson last summer. Indeed one friend suggested, why, is that Thomasson; another, no, it is Breckinridge from Fayette. If this convention will tolerate an anecdote, I will give them one in illustration of my feelings in reference to a portion of the gentleman's argument. There was a young man, who was for the first time empannelled upon a jury, and the case to be tried was for stealing a calf. When the plaintiff had got through his side of the case the young man hunched the juror next him, and remarked, "what a scoundrel the defendant must have been to steal his neighbor's calf." The defendant's counsel introduced his testimony, and then the young man said, "why I was entirely wrong, it is the plaintiff that has been trying to steal the defendant's calf." His friend said to him, "wait until you hear the speeches of the lawyers." The plaintiff's counsel addressed the jury. "I am wrong again," said the youth; "the defendant is the thief." The counsel for the defence then addressed the jury. "I am still wrong," said the young man. "Wait," said the experienced juror, "till you hear the charge of the judge." After the jury had retired, the old juror remarked, "well, Tom, what do you think of the case now?" "By —, I don't believe the calf belonged to either of them." That was precisely my case. First, I thought I was listening to a pro-slavery man; afterwards I thought I was listening to an emancipationist, and finally I came to the conclusion that I was listening to neither one nor the other.

The gentleman objects to the report of the committee, because he says that he is unwilling that emancipation should take place in Kentucky, even if the owners should be paid for their negroes. I beg leave to differ with the gentleman there. If it should ever become so palpably necessary for us to get clear of this description of property as to make the owners willing that emancipation should take place, and the people willing to pay for them, I am in favor of empowering the legislature to do so. It never will be done till the necessity becomes so palpable that there is no alternative left to them.

But, sir, if you should strike out the provision of the constitution which now exists, and which the committee have retained, do you not add to the strength and force of the arguments of the emancipationists? They will say, you have deprived us of the power of accomplishing the object, even at the expense of paying for the slaves. They will say to you, you have left us no alternative. But when the necessity shall arrive and shall have become so palpable that we must extricate slavery at some price, not having it in our power to get clear of the evil by paying for them, we must actually extricate them by death itself. Will not this, I ask, be a powerful argument in the mouth of the abolitionist? Will he not rouse the feelings of the community, and induce them not only to vote against the constitution, but rouse them so as to prevent such a provision from being contained in any other constitution that might be made?

But the gentleman wishes a provision to be inserted, which will make every slave that is brought into the state, free upon his arrival, except he be brought by an immigrant, or unless the title to such slave be derived by marriage, descent, or devise. What effect would this have? Why every man who lived in a neighboring state, who wished to manumit, and thus get clear of an old and unprofitable slave, would only have to bring him over into Kentucky, and then the slave would be free, and would remain here as a curse upon us. You will put it in the power of residents of other states to flood our country with a black population, to be made free, by sending them here without requiring bond and security for their maintenance and good behavior from the state whence they are brought. — Again, you enable every free negro who may choose to do so, to come into this state. A free negro resident in Ohio, or any other free state, has only to get some abolitionist to pass for his master, and then he may come into this state and reside here. I would fain hope at least that the gentleman wished to produce no such result as this.

The gentleman has gone into some statistical details, estimates I think he termed them, to show you that slave labor was not profitable. I will give the gentleman a few official returns, which I think will convince him that his estimates are wrong. We will take the last year. The increased value of taxable property was eighteen millions of dollars, speaking in round numbers. That may be taken as the increased wealth of the state. Now the State of Ohio, with a population nearly three times as great has had no such increase of wealth. The actual increase in the value of taxable property in the State of Ohio, which, as I before remarked, has three times the population and labor that produces wealth that we have, was but about eleven millions. The increased wealth of Indiana about four millions. Take Indiana and Ohio added together and they have about four times the labor, and yet the increased wealth of Kentucky has been greater than that of both those states, with Illinois thrown into the bargain. These facts are taken from the official returns.

But the gentleman says that white labor is cheaper than black. That may be true. Why is it so? It is because white labor in the free States is cheaper than black labor is here. The gentleman, I trust, will not maintain that white here is cheaper than black labor; and I ask if he wishes to reduce the value of white labor here, and put it upon a par with the labor of those free States? If he wishes to keep its value up, and slavery has that effect, why prevent the increase of slaves?

But the gentleman spoke of the horrors of the slave trade. He did it eloquently, and I agree with him in every sentence that he uttered upon the subject. But when he assumes the position that there is no difference between the African slave trade and the trade between the States, then I take issue with him. Is there no difference between subjecting a free man to slavery, and the removal of a slave, or a change of masters, when he has been accustomed to slavery all his life? — Can the gentleman see no difference? If he cannot, I imagine that I can distinctly see a difference. I will go as far as any individual to suppress the slave trade with Africa, and the slave trade between the States too. But the gentleman is mistaken, when he supposes that the report of the committee does not provide for this. It provides expressly that the legislature shall have power to pass laws to prohibit their being brought here as merchandise. They are not to be brought here in droves, chained together, as the gentleman remarked. They are to be brought here only by immigrants, who come to reside in the State, or when the title to such slaves is acquired by marriage, descent, or devise; or an individual may go out of the State and bring them in for his own use, if the legislature should see fit to permit this to be done. With these brief remarks, I will move that the committee rise, that the further discussion of this subject may be deferred until the day which has been fixed for the consideration of the report of the committee.

Mr. NUTTALL moved to amend the sixth resolution by inserting the following:

"Or that shall be brought into the state by bona fide purchasers for their own use."

Mr. NUTTALL. I shall make but few remarks on this proposition. If we wish to get clear of the much vexed questions that will arise from giving the legislature power to pass laws enabling the owners of slaves to emancipate them in this country, my proposition will save all the trouble and all the danger that will arise from adjudication in cases upon reserved rights, which will necessarily spring up when a free negro who has gone out of the state returns and asserts his rights here as a free man. I am not for giving any man the power to manumit his slaves in Kentucky. If he becomes so pious and as my friend would have it, so Godly given that he cannot consistently with his conscience live in the state in which he was born or which he has made the home of his adoption, and cannot hold slaves, let him leave the state; let him and his slaves together leave the commonwealth. Now what will be the result? A man frees his slaves, and he gives bonds that he will provide for their leaving the state of Kentucky, and actually does furnish the means to transport them into a foreign state, to Africa, or to Liberia. Well sir, the very moment the manumitted slave gets to Africa, or to Liberia, and is not satisfied with his lot, and chooses to come back, if he is a free man ipso facto, no qualification that we can attach to our enactment, will prohibit him from coming back into this state as a free man. But when he goes out of the state, and is not freed until he gets beyond the territorial jurisdiction of the commonwealth, then we may impose restrictions, so as to prevent him from coming back. Sir, I do not myself, look forward, I will say in reply to the gentleman from Madison, to the time when this commonwealth of old Kentucky ever will be a non-slaveholding state. I hope it never may be. And if the gentleman can see the finger of God, working out some great moral, religious, or sublime problem with regard to the slave question, why, sir, it is more than I can, and if I had such a vision as the gentleman has to perceive all these glorious things to be attainable, I would not attempt to thrust myself between God Almighty and the subject; because, sir, if He has determined that slavery shall cease to exist, all the restrictions on earth can never prevent or stay His purpose. The state of Kentucky has for all time to come to be either a frontier slavery, or a frontier non-slavery state, and the great question which her citizens have to determine is, whether she will separate from her old connections, her associates, those who are bone of her bone and flesh of her flesh, those who have been brought up with the same institutions, the same customs—whether she will forsake all these and unite herself with men who are foreign to us in interest, in purposes, and in all the associations of life. Kentucky, sir, will be ready for emancipation when she is ready to cut loose all her feelings for the South when she is willing to see the cotton fields of the south, sink back into their original quagmires and cane breaks—when she is willing to see the sugar plantations of the south return to the original forest. Then will Kentucky be ready for emancipation; then will she be ready to unite with our northern friends, and not till then.

I am, upon principle, opposed to establishing a slavery in this country; and against the incorporation of the law of 1833 into this constitution, I most solemnly protest. The gentleman is very willing, if a man is so fortunate as to be a distinguished gentleman, like himself, to raise up a distinguished son, who goes into a foreign state, and by a matrimonial alliance, acquires the ownership of five hundred slaves—the gentleman is very willing, I say, that all these should be brought into Kentucky. But if a poor devil like me, who had nothing to recommend him but his person, were to go into Virginia to marry, what sort of a chance would he have to acquire property in slaves? If you compel us to bow down to the slavery, we shall never have money enough on God Almighty's earth to buy a slave, for I am not over fond of work, and none of my kin is so fortunate, I believe, as to possess slaves; so that I have no chance of acquiring them by inheritance, and if I cannot acquire them by marriage, how can I get them? The Lord Almighty knows, for it seems there is no chance for the poor. Now, my rule would be about this: the rich have enough of the good things of this world—do let the poor have a chance. And I tell the gentleman from Madison, in language which he will understand, after the submission of the constitution to the people, that even the old county of Henry—though I do not know, as yet, that I have the honor to represent the people of that county—had it not been for the law of 1833, never would have been a convention county. If you send out the constitution with this provision, it will be rejected by forty thousand votes. The laboring men of Kentucky, the poor men, the men who never can expect to acquire slaves by marriage, or by descent, will see that it is a slavery, a tariff upon their labor, that they will not stand. It is a protection that no state can give in its fundamental law. I myself will vote against the constitution, if it should contain such a provision. I want to own slaves, and I want the privilege of buying them where I can get them cheapest, though I do not want to see them introduced in droves. I think I have as much of the milk of human kindness as any man, and I abhor the mere slave dealer, the trafficker in human blood, as much as any man in the world. Sir, we have not enough, or we have too many. Let us get clear of the whole concern, and have a free state out and out, or let every one have the chance to get slaves where he can for the best price, and of whom he pleases.

We must be either for emancipation or against it. There is no middle ground on the subject—and I was very much like my friend from Jefferson in regard to the member from Madison—I thought him here in disguise; but I know him too well to have any opinion of him of that sort. I give it as my opinion, that the best way to get rid of any future difficulty on the subject is to allow no man to emancipate his slaves in Kentucky. If he wants to get rid of his slaves, let him act upon the proposition I made the emancipationists. If you beat us, we will leave the good old Commonwealth of Kentucky, but if we beat you, then you shall leave it. I think now, that one of those two things ought to take place. We have beaten them, and a large majority of the people are with us, and now let them leave us.

Mr. TURNER said he would detain the committed but for a moment. So far as concerns the gentleman from Henry, and his fear of the finger of his maker, I will not put any more weight on him. The finger of a gentleman from his county is upon him, so strong now, that I think it would be cruel to put any more on him, until that is removed. The gentleman from Jefferson appears to think that I or somebody else—I do not know whether it was any one who was going to murder or assassinate the gentleman or not—had something against his person. I am very sorry that any gentleman here should think I had anything against his person.

Mr. MERIWETHER. The gentleman will pardon me but he seems not to have understood the purport of my remarks. I said that some gentleman asked me whether it was Mr. Thomason, my opponent, who was speaking, or another gentleman who canvassed Fayette in favor of emancipation, and was then rejected.

Mr. TURNER. Very well, I do not wish to permit the power of emancipation, even by paying for the slaves, and if the gentleman advocates the proposition that it shall be left open, I ask him upon whom he would impose the tax for the purpose. Would he tax those poor men who do not own slaves to pay for their emancipation? We have no right to tax those poor men who own no slaves to pay for ours. Would he then have those who owned and brought slaves here, pay for their emancipation? What would that amount to? Why, to a man's putting his hand in his right pocket to replenish his left.—They would only pay themselves. Every man, particularly in this convention, will at once say that it would be cruel and unjust to tax the great body of the people who own no slaves, to purchase emancipation. I consider myself a stronger pro-slavery man than the gentleman from Jefferson, for I have never advocated emancipation in any form. The gentleman says he voted for the law to exclude the importation of slaves. Where then, is the difference between myself and any pro-slavery man here? There is none. No gentleman in this convention is more decided than I am, against the taking of a man's property, or using its proceeds by the government, without compensating him for it. I am also against bringing any more slaves here. I do not believe it is for the interest of Kentucky, or that humanity or christianity tolerates it, or that there is any view of the subject, which will justify it, that any human being may take, according to my perception. I do not wish those who differ with me in opinion to think that I imagine they are inhuman. They have different light from me. Every man must act under his own light, and I intend to act on that which has been given to me. But my teachings of the rights and duties of humanity lead me to think that the traffic ought to be restricted.

The gentleman from Jefferson says that under my proposition, they would send here superannuated slaves to be freed. My proposition is only in outline, to elicit debate, and I supposed that a gentleman so distinguished as the gentleman from Jefferson, at the head of a committee, could draft a provision that would effectually prohibit this traffic, and this apprehended sending here of superannuated slaves. I was astonished too, at the gentleman's idea, that a free negro in Ohio would be brought into slavery and become a free negro in Kentucky! I supposed the gentleman to be a little farther along, a little smarter—I wish not to be personal, but the idea of a man in the state of Ohio, acknowledging himself to be a slave, and the abolitionists bringing him here and selling him, and then he getting his freedom, is one so absurd, that it never for one moment entered my mind. I am in favor of a constitutional provision declaring that no more slaves shall be imported into this state, or if a majority is not in favor of that, I desire that the question shall be divested of all the doubts which involve the clause on the subject in the old constitution.

Mr. MERIWETHER. The gentleman did not, I apprehend, comprehend the argument which I made, in supposing a case. I did not suppose that a free negro, wishing to emigrate to Kentucky, would come with an abolitionist, and permit himself to be sold. The gentleman's resolution does not provide for such a case. It is not necessary to sell the negro, but an abolitionist may come with him to Kentucky, or a resident in Kentucky goes to Indiana, and bringing the negro here, treats and claims him as his slave, and by the operation of the gentleman's proposition, the negro would be made free, and hence would have a right to remain here. I go as far as the gentleman, against taxing either the slaveholder or the non-slaveholder, for the purpose of manumitting the slaves of the state. The committee, I believe not a member of it, advocate no such provision, but thought it expedient to retain the provision of the old constitution without alteration, so that if any necessity should arise, which should become so imperative as to force us to get rid of our slaves, we might do so by devising some means of payment therefor. I again renew the motion that the committee rise and report the resolutions to the house, with a view of then moving that they be referred to the committee of the whole, and made a special order for Monday week.

Mr. DIXON. I am anxious at the proper time, to make some remarks upon the proposition contained in the resolutions submitted by the gentleman from Madison. I differ from that gentleman entirely in regard to the propriety of inserting in the constitution, the proposition he has submitted to the convention, and I desire at a proper time to give my reasons to the convention. I do not know that they will have any influence here, still I hold it is a duty to myself, and my constituents, that I should give my views on the important questions involved in the resolutions. I think the motion or the gentleman from Jefferson, to rise and report, is one altogether proper and right, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE suggested that the discussion had better continue at once, until the day when gentlemen come to vote upon it, when their minds would be fully made up on the subject. He moved therefore, that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again. The subject then could be taken up to-morrow, or if not, on the next day.

The motion prevailed, and the committee, through their chairman, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. McHENRY said that he noticed from the remarks of the gentleman from Madison, that another resolution of that gentleman, in reference to the same subject of slavery, had not been referred to the committee of the whole. He moved to refer the whole series to the committee of the whole.

This motion was agreed to.

QUALIFIED VOTERS—AUDITOR'S REPORT.

The PRESIDENT said that he had been presented by the Auditor, with a list of the qualified voters in each county of the state, in pursuance of a resolution passed this morning.

Mr. GARRARD moved the printing of 125 copies of the report, for the use of the members.

This motion was agreed to.

And then the convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 11, 1849.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. BARLOW offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the miscellaneous provisions of the constitution, be instructed to enquire into the propriety and expediency of making a provision in the new constitution about to be made, which will enable citizens of any of the United States, emigrating to this state, to exercise the elective franchise at an earlier period after such emigration than is now provided in the present constitution.

Mr. CHRISMAN offered the following, which was referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to enquire into the expediency of adopting in the constitution a provision declaring any collector of the revenue tax, or other disbursing officer of the government, or any officer thereof, who may have the charge or custody of the government funds, or any attorney or lawyer, or other collector, who may fail or refuse to pay over any money collected by him in his official capacity, ineligible to any office under said constitution, until they shall first have obtained a full acquittance and discharge.

Mr. HAY offered the following, and it was referred to the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery, and ordered to be printed:

1. Resolved, That the specific mode of amending the constitution, by submitting to the voters of the state one clause at a time, is the correct and best mode.

2d. That, in lieu of the mode pointed out in the old constitution for calling a convention, the following should be adopted: The legislature, whenever two thirds of both houses concur, may propose amendments to the new constitution, which proposed amendment shall be entered at large on the journals; and such proposed amendment shall be submitted to the people at the next general election, and if it shall appear that a majority of all the qualified voters of this commonwealth have voted in favor of the proposed amendment, the same shall be adopted at the next session of the legislature as part of the constitution.

3. That if more than one amendment is proposed at one time, each amendment shall be distinctly stated, so that the votes may be taken on each proposed amendment separately.

LECTURES IN THE HALL.

Mr. HARDIN offered the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That James D. Nourse, of Bardstown, have the use of the hall of this convention, at any time of an evening that he may choose, to deliver a series of lectures on the philosophy of history and society, especially with reference to the sources and progress of modern democracy: Provided, the convention or the committees are not then using the hall.

SLAVERY.

On the motion of Mr. BARLOW the convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. BARLOW in the chair, and resumed the consideration of Mr. TURNER'S resolutions, which were undisposed of when the committee rose yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN stated the question pending before the committee, and said that the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) was entitled to the floor.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE had not intended by the motion he made yesterday to entitle himself to the floor, nor had he given any intimation that he intended to participate in this discussion at all. He supposed that the gentleman from Henderson was entitled to the floor.

Mr. DIXON. I did not intend to address the committee on the resolutions submitted by the gentleman from Madison, at the present time.—I remarked yesterday, that I did not think this was the proper time to discuss that question, and I am still of that opinion, and have determined to postpone the making of any remarks which I may have to submit, until the time when the amendment to the constitution reported by the committee, shall come up for consideration. At that time I may submit some remarks on the principle contained in the amendments proposed, and also in reply to the remarks made yesterday by the gentleman from Madison. I do not design to address the committee to-day.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. As no gentleman seems disposed to address the committee, I desire that we shall proceed to vote on the amendment. If no one is ready to speak, all must be ready to vote, for I believe our minds are pretty well made up in regard to the question.

Mr. TURNER. As the gentleman from Henderson has indicated a desire to be heard hereafter, on these resolutions, and as no one seems ready now to speak on them, I move that the committee rise and report them to the house, that they may be referred to the same committee of the whole, to which the report of the committee was referred.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. It strikes me that the course proper for us to pursue in regard to this subject, would be to proceed with the discussion of the abstract question of slavery now. It is a topic which seems to be involved in the resolutions, as well as in the gentleman's speech of yesterday, and when we have terminated the discussion, we can take up and vote on the amendment proposed. I thought that was the course understood and indicated yesterday by the vote of the house. The present proposition, I understand to be, that the committee shall rise and report the resolutions to the house; but there is an amendment to the resolutions pending, and I do not know whether such a motion is strictly in order until the committee have disposed of the motion to amend. If no other gentleman designs to offer an amendment to the resolutions, it was my purpose, after the committee had disposed of the amendment of the gentleman from Henry, (Mr. Nuttall) to move to strike out these resolutions from the series introduced by the gentleman, with a view of taking a vote of the committee and reporting the result to the house, and if it was its pleasure then to postpone further discussion upon them, it could do so, for it would then be in order. I think the members of this house, considering the discussions which took place throughout every county and town in the state during the last summer, on this question of slavery—whether it be more useful or profitable than any other description of labor or property—the policy of interfering with it by the action of this convention, and disturbing the relation between master and slave—should regard these as questions which our constituents have settled for us. And if the papers told truly, they informed us that there was returned to this body, no; one favorable to the emancipation of slave property. I think therefore, that a discussion upon the abstract question; the right or wrong, the good or evil of slavery—the comparison of profits between servile and free labor—is one that belongs to the region north of Mason and Dixon's line, and not to the meridian of Kentucky, now, and within this hall. These were my opinions before the resolutions were discussed yesterday, and they have been strengthened by that discussion, however able upon the points touched. However, as the subject has been mooted, I desire that these resolutions shall be retained by the committee—that the committee shall express its sense upon them—and then, if any more discussion is necessary, it will properly come up when the report of the committee shall be under consideration.

Mr. TURNER. I do not wish to be troublesome on this subject, but some of the remarks of the gentleman make it necessary that I should notice them. Now, I came here avowing the same sentiments that I did at home. I am as much opposed to emancipation as the gentleman from Nelson, and I claim to be as sincere in my views as he can possibly be. I am utterly opposed to emancipation in every mode and aspect in which it has ever been proposed in Kentucky, and one of my resolutions is more ultra upon the subject, than any proposed by the committee, or any gentleman here, for it inhibits the emancipation of slaves compulsorily, even after compensation has been made. But in the region of country in which I live, and indeed, throughout Kentucky, it has been a question a great many years, whether the further importation of slaves was beneficial or not, and whether there was not as many here now as was profitable; and I suppose it to be as legitimate a topic of consideration here as before the people. There is not a single sentiment in my resolutions, or any sentiment avowed by me yesterday, which I have not avowed before my constituents, and which they do not fully understand. I am considered the most ultra pro-slavery man in my county, and the whole power of the emancipation interest there was wielded against me, to a greater extent probably than against any other candidate before the people. I come here to sustain the sentiments which I avowed at home. I maintain the inviolability of the slave property of the people of Kentucky, and at the same time my light leads me to believe that there is no necessity for its increase. And this also, is what I understand the people of the county from which I came, to believe.

It is a matter of indifference to me personally, whether this resolution shall be acted upon to-day or not. I have said most of what I expected to say, except that I may desire to reply briefly to the gentleman from Jefferson, which I had not time to do yesterday. I had intended to wait, before I should do this, until I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Henderson, as he has declared his opposition to the resolutions which I have introduced. There is one remark of the gentleman from Jefferson, to which, I perceive from reading the report of the proceedings of yesterday, I did not reply. This is, that the importation of more slaves would be beneficial to those persons who now owned none. Now, I have always believed that the more people, whether white or black, brought into a state to labor, would, by increasing the competition, lessen the value thereof. But I am not going to discuss that question now, my only desire is, that I may be put right before the convention and the people. I repeat, there is not a member of this house, who will go farther than myself in sustaining the institution of slavery. I do not believe that we would be justified under any consideration in interfering with the rights of the slaveholders of Kentucky. They have vested their capital in slave property under the sanction of the constitution and the laws of Kentucky, and I am opposed to taking it from them, even if it is proposed to compensate them for the loss. They purchased or invested their property, and they only have the right to dispose of it.

I believed before this debate came on that there was not a majority here in favor of the 6th resolution, and I so informed the people of my county last summer, while avowing myself in favor of incorporating the provision in the constitution. I have brought forward this resolution to ascertain what the majority were in favor of—whether of incorporating the provision into the constitution, or of giving the legislature the power over the subject. And really I thought it but right to ascertain upon which of these propositions the majority did agree, before the standing committee reported. As I said to my constituents before I left home, I suppose the majority here will go for leaving the power in the hands of the legislature, but for myself, I am pledged to go for inserting a prohibition against the further importation of slaves into this Commonwealth, in the constitution itself. I have said all I desired.

The CHAIR. Does the gentleman move to rise and report?

Mr. TURNER. It seems to me that it would be more respectful to those who wish to speak on this question, as well as to myself, that further opportunity should be given to discuss the question. I have no objection to its being laid on the table, to be called up when any gentleman desires to speak upon it.

Mr. DIXON. It is a matter of very little consequence to me, whether I debate these resolutions or not—in fact, were I to consult my own feelings and inclinations, I believe I should not debate them. I listened with a good deal of attention to the speech of the gentleman from Madison yesterday, and the views taken by him upon some abstract propositions connected with the subject of slavery, I thought demanded an answer and reply. I do not know what impressions the opinions advanced by him, as respects the institution of slavery itself, are designed to make on the public mind. I understand him to have laid down as a proposition, that slavery is a great evil, and that to permit the people of Kentucky to purchase for their own use, slaves out of the state, would be not only a great evil, but an outrage upon all the great principles of humanity. The resolutions of the gentleman I understand, propose that no citizen of the state of Kentucky shall purchase slaves out of the state for his own use. The legitimate course of the debate would be on that point alone, yet gentlemen in the discussion here, have taken a wide range, and discussed all the great principles connected with slavery—all the benefits which result to our civil institutions from the existence of slavery—and all the evils which are consequent upon it. I could not tell from hearing the speech of the gentleman, whether in his opinion—though he emphatically declared it to be an evil—slavery was really an evil or a blessing. I do not mean to say that in my judgment slavery is a blessing, or that, in my opinion, slavery as it exists in Kentucky is an evil. This is a question which I mean to discuss at a proper time—not abstractedly, but in reference to the condition of society as it now exists in the commonwealth of Kentucky. I would, if I had the power, make all mankind free. I would have no such thing as slavery or inequality. I would have equal rights measured out to all; but in the formation of civil institutions for the government of man, we are to look at the condition of things as they are—we are to adapt the laws to the condition of those to be governed. It is a question of grave importance, whether or not slavery as it exists in Kentucky, is not better for the slave and the master—and this is the great question, the only question, which can have any particular interest in this debate. I shall attempt to show that slavery is not a curse as it exists now in Kentucky, but that it is a blessing. I do not mean to say, as I remarked before, that it would not be better, if there was no such thing as slavery on the face of the earth. I do mean to say that as slavery exists in Kentucky—in view of all the circumstances around it—in view of the wretched condition of the slave, his relation to his master, the peculiar organization of the two races, the utter impossibility that the one can rise to an equality in the scale of morality and dignity with the other, the fact that the slave, whether you call him a freeman or not, is still but a slave, the wretched offcast slave—I say it becomes a question of grave importance to Kentucky, whether it is not a blessing alike to the slave and the white man, that he is a slave.—These are the questions which arise and present themselves, from a view of the condition of this commonwealth, and it was my intention at the proper time, to enter upon their discussion. I do not think it the proper time now. As I remarked before, I have no particular anxiety to discuss the question at all, nor do I know that I shall, yet I have thought it due to the country, and respectful to the gentleman from Madison, that his remarks should be replied to, and for that reason I was anxious that the resolutions introduced by that gentleman should take the course indicated by him.

Mr. TURNER. I do not wish to be troublesome, but this is a sensitive matter to the country, and I desire that my position shall be fully understood in regard to it. Those who will read my speech of yesterday will find there is not a word in it, against the condition of the slave in Kentucky, or even a suggestion that his condition could be improved in any way. I occupy the same position as the gentleman himself—that you cannot improve the condition of the slave in Kentucky in any way, and that the institution of slavery as it here exists is better for the white and the black man than any thing this convention or the legislature can devise. I do not go as far as the gentleman, and he is mistaken in supposing that I said that slavery as an original institution is an evil—though I will now say that I agree with him, that if we were forming a new commonwealth where no slavery existed, it would be better to get along without it. I agree with him in that, though I did not make the avowal yesterday. As an original question, if there never was a slave in the world, I would not introduce slavery into society, but I also believe that as it exists in Kentucky with the peculiar circumstances surrounding it, it is a benefit to both races. That is my position. I am opposed to bringing any more slaves here, because I do not believe that it is profitable or desirable in any way; and that is the only point on which I differ from the gentleman from Henderson.

Mr. CLARKE. I barely intend to indicate to the committee, my intention at the proper time to offer a proposition on the subject of the importation of slaves, variant from that reported by the standing committee, and that offered by the gentleman from Madison. It has been claimed, and during the recent contest between the different candidates for delegates to this convention, in many sections of the state, it has been urged that the act of 1833 was a concession to abolitionism in this state. I myself have heard gentlemen who are emancipationists in principle, and who had the candor to avow their principles before the people, declare that the act of 1833 was a concession to the spirit of emancipation in this state. During the last session of the state legislature, as I see by an examination of their acts, there was a modification of the law of 1833 adopted, and in the passage of that modification, it seems to me that the sense of the people was clearly and fairly indicated. And if we are to give any respect whatever to the opinion of the people, as expressed by their representatives last winter, and as expressed in the elections of last August, when the candidates for delegates were before them, if I am not mistaken, it is the sense of the people of this state, that there should be no restriction upon the citizen who may desire to import another slave into the state for his own use. I would go farther than the amendment to the act of 1833, passed at the last session of the legislature, for it is not broad enough for me. It requires the party importing a slave, to take a certain oath, that he was brought into the state for his own use, and that he will not dispose of him for five years. I would not go so far as to say that I am in favor of importing slaves into the state for the purpose of merchandize, but I would go so far as to say that the citizens of this state should not be restricted in the exercise of the right to bring slaves here. And I would propose to limit the time they should hold the slave, before they had a right to sell him, to twelve months rather than five years. Indeed if I know my own feelings, and what I believe is the sense of those I represent here, I prefer that there should be no restriction around the subject at all. The fifteen slave states of the Union compose one great family, dependent one upon the other, so far as the perpetuity of the institution of slavery is concerned, and I would prefer that there should be no restriction thrown around the citizen at all, but that he should be left free to exercise his own dictates in this matter. You cannot generate by legislative action, a moral principle in the bosom of man, by which he will be governed, and if there are those among us disposed to traffic in human blood, they will find means to do it, I care not what constitutional or legislative restrictions there may be.

At a proper time, I shall propose as a substitute for the 5th section of the report of the committee, that every citizen of this state shall be allowed to bring slaves into the state for his own use. And when I make this proposition, I trust that I shall be prepared to sustain it, at least so far as those I have the honor to represent on this floor, are concerned.

Now one more remark and I am through. It was suggested by the gentleman from Madison yesterday, that the states of South Carolina and Virginia had both passed laws prohibiting the importation of slaves within their territories. I have not examined the statutes of South Carolina, but I think it possible that my friend is mistaken on that subject. I am aware that during the canvass in the State of Tennessee the past summer, the question was put, and discussed liberally by all the candidates for both branches of the Legislature, and perhaps by the candidates for Congress, as to the propriety of passing a law which would prohibit the importation of slaves from other States into Tennessee. I beg leave to state to the committee that I am perfectly familiar with all the facts and circumstances connected with that move in Tennessee. During the last winter, the few emancipationists in this State had produced an excitement that alarmed the whole south. Kentucky now occupies a frontier position—the same position now on the subject of slavery that she occupied in times past and gone by, in reference to the dangers that might be apprehended from the incursions of the savages. She was then a frontier state, and still is, so far as the institution of slavery is concerned. The broad Ohio, rolling its waves from almost the southern extremity of the State to its eastern border, separates Kentucky from the free states, and her members of congress and the members of congress from every slave state in the union, felt that when that great natural barrier, the line of separation, between the slave and the free states was struck down, there was danger. They felt that there was scarcely a slave state in the union that would not go by the board in less than twenty years, if Kentucky abandoned her old friends who had stood by her in every emergency, and allied herself to those who had warred on her institutions from the beginning of the abolition agitation to the present day. Hence, a meeting of the members of congress from the slave states, was suggested by the members of congress from this state; and it was there suggested that the distinguished and leading men in each slave state in the union should be written to, and be urged to get up an excitement, if you please, upon the subject of prohibiting the importation of slaves from one state into another. And for what purpose? For no other than to prevent the emancipation of slaves in Kentucky, as every gentleman here can see. Hence, the move that was made in the state of Tennessee, upon the subject of a law to prohibit the importation of slaves into that state. We were aware that there was not money enough in Kentucky to purchase the liberation of the slaves of Kentucky, and that our people well enough knew the fact; and we were aware also, that when the balance of the slave states of this union had declared by their legislative action, that our slaves should not be purchased by their citizens, that it would operate as a terror upon those in favor of emancipation in Kentucky and put down the emancipation party. That was the motive.

I am not unwilling to declare here, before the state and the world, that I believe that slavery, as it exists in the slave states of this union, elevates the character of the white race, its dignity, and its morals, and I trust that we shall frame a constitution that will perpetuate slavery in this state for all time to come. When the proper time shall arrive, I desire to offer as a substitute for the 5th section of the report of the committee, a section that shall embody the principle that every citizen in this state shall have a right to import slaves into this state for his own use, and upon that proposition I desire to be heard.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have no desire to take part in the debate at this time, and I think that courtesy to the gentlemen who intend to do so as well as the nature of the subject itself, dictates that this matter should be postponed, and that it should come up with the resolutions reported by the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery. I had designed to offer an amendment to the report of the committee, but I shall be saved that trouble, because my resolution would have comprehended what my distinguished friend from Simpson has intimated to the house he shall do himself. I have no disposition at this time to enter into the abstract question of slavery. That I may do so hereafter, will depend very much upon the character which this debate may take. I have discussed already before my constituents, this law of 1833, and the question as to whether it should go into the constitution. It was a question that was made before the people, between the gentleman who opposed me in the canvass and myself; and the difference between us was upon that question alone. I am opposed to the law of 1833 going into the constitution; but while I avow this sentiment, I am not in favor of the slave traffic. I am not in favor of traffic in human blood.

I am opposed to the fifth resolution of the series of the gentleman from Madison, and I desire at the proper time to give my views upon the subject. I desire, with the gentleman from Simpson, that the citizens of this commonwealth should enjoy equal rights. I desire that every one should have the right to import slaves for his own use. And as I have declared heretofore when I had the honor of a seat in the legislature, I am not in favor of allowing the capricious will of the legislature to determine whether A. B. shall be permitted to bring in slaves, and a similar permission be refused to C. D. This is one of those inequalities of rights to the existence of which I am utterly opposed, and it is a point which I desire to discuss when my honorable friend from Simpson offers his resolution as an amendment to the report of the committee. When we give to the legislature the right to say whether a man shall bring slaves here for his own use or not, we give to them the right to judge of the expediency of importing slaves, and it will be owing altogether, not to the justice of the application, but to the particular phase and color which the legislature may wear at the time when the application is made.

I desire, in framing a constitution, to provide for equality of rights, as far as it can be done. I am led away, however, from the purpose for which I rose, which was to ask that the question be postponed, not only out of respect to the gentleman from Madison, but also through deference to the committee who have made a report upon the subject. I hope, then, that the committee will rise, and that the further discussion of the subject will be postponed until the day fixed for the consideration of the report of the committee.

Mr. TALBOTT. Much has been said here, and elsewhere, on this very exciting and important question. I concur with the gentleman that perhaps this is not the most proper time to enter into the discussion of it. What is said and done here is not only to affect us, but our posterity. Not only to affect us as a state, but to affect our sister states—not only to interest us at this time, but will interest us in all time to come.

I came here not for the purpose of inflicting upon this house frequent and long speeches. I came here, inexperienced as I am in the deliberations of a body like this, with a view, with the expectation, and with the desire to listen and learn. But sir, when I see a delegate like the gentleman from Madison, rise in his place, and under all the peculiar circumstances that are thrown around this particular question, declare to this body, and through this body to the world, such sentiments as he has expressed, I should feel that I was criminal, I should feel that I ought to be held responsible at the bar of my own conscience, that I ought to be held responsible by my constituents, that I ought to be held responsible at the bar of my God, on the great day of accounts, if I were to stand here with the feelings which I have, and the principles which I have advocated, and allow to pass unnoticed and uncontradicted, sentiments such as I heard expressed by that gentleman yesterday. We all know that it is impossible for this or any other assembly, to attempt to any time, or in any place, or under any circumstances to discuss these questions, either as original questions, or questions of expediency, without producing the most thrilling and the deepest excitement. I agree with the gentleman from Kenton, that this question had better be deferred, and I am willing for one to vote that it shall be deferred. But I rose to say a word in reference to the remarks made by the gentleman from Madison yesterday, in which he says that he considers slavery wrong in the abstract; that it is right for us to hold slaves, but that the principle is wrong—that the finger of God is not only upon it, but the will and law of God are positively and unequivocally against it. Now sir, if this be true, there is not a man here, not a christian man in the world who can enjoy his religion and hold slaves for one single moment. Sir, this is laying the axe at the root of the tree.

You may talk to me as much as you please about the expediency of slavery, about the profits and losses of slavery, about the convenience, or the luxuries of slavery, and every good that might possibly grow out of it; but if it is contrary to the will of my God, a sin, a great moral evil, and detrimental to the best interests of my country, I for one am willing to consecrate myself with all I possess to the principle; and to do or die, so long as I live, will be my watch-word, so help me God. Sir, I never will so long as my heart beats, preach one principle and practice another. If slavery is wrong in the abstract, radically wrong, where is the man, the christian man, the man who loves truth and justice in the world, who would for a moment be its advocate? I am ready to enter upon the discussion of the subject, and indeed I came here for the purpose of making a speech upon it to-day; but I am willing to wait until the day that is fixed for the consideration of the report of the committee, and then I hope that the house will do me the favor to hear me. Allow me to say to the gentleman from Madison, however, who speaks of the finger of God controlling this matter, that perhaps he is mistaken, he may however have received some new revelation on the subject. I merely wish to state to the gentleman, that I hold slavery to be neither a sin nor a moral evil, nor detrimental to the best interests of the State, and that I hold myself responsible to prove it, and when the opportunity occurs, I will prove it, not from any new revelation, but from the old fashioned Bible. I therefore waive all farther remarks for the present.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The disposition of the subject which I indicated, was predicated on the idea that it was not desirable to discuss the abstract question of slavery at the present time. But it seems that, in homely phrase, my friend from Madison has waked up a snake in this assembly; especially since we are told from the other side of the house that we are to have a sermon on the subject. I am willing to listen to gentlemen on this question, but I do not contemplate participating myself in any debate upon it. The gentleman can give such direction to his own resolutions as he may think proper, and if he desires that they shall come up in committee of the whole, together with the report of the select committee, it will only be necessary to allow the subject to pass by until the time fixed upon for the consideration of that report.

Mr. TALBOTT. I think it is due to the honorable gentleman from Madison that this matter be laid over. But I thought it proper to state what were my intentions, that nobody might be deceived, and that it might not, when it comes up unexpectedly. But I think it is due to every gentleman, when important principles are about to be controverted, to give time that he may be prepared for the discussion. I am, therefore, in favor of postponing the further consideration of this subject until next Monday week.

Mr. TURNER. I am afraid that I may be considered troublesome, but I am so little experienced in matters of this kind that it appears I have got myself into a hornet's nest sure enough. I have failed to make myself understood; but I can tell the gentleman that I am in no wise terrified by anything that has occurred. If gentlemen would understand me and understand themselves they would do a great deal better. There is not a gentleman who has made a remark upon any thing that I have said, except the two gentlemen on my left, who understand what I said yesterday—not one. I would recommend gentlemen, before they come here to answer a speech that has been made, to understand what was spoken. I never said that the finger of the Deity was against the institution of slavery. Never. I said that the hand of Deity was causing slavery to recede in Maryland, in Virginia, and in Missouri; that it was, at all events, not increasing with the increase of the white population, and that every thing we could do would not be able to prevent this. But that the Deity was against the whole institution, I never intimated or intended to intimate. But there is one thing I intended to intimate. I am not as well read in the gospel as I ought to be, and not so well, doubtless, as some gentlemen here; but I do not understand the teachings of the gospel as justifying this institution as it stands, and I never will advocate what I do not believe. I believe that the gospel applies to a state of things that does not exist at present. I believe in leaving to Caesar the things that belong to Caesar. The mission of the Apostles and Patriarchs of old was of a spiritual character. It related to things of another world.—They did not come here to interfere with the things of Tiberius or of Caesar. They came not to interfere with temporal prosperity, and it does not appear to me that any argument, in justification of the institution of slavery, as it now exists, is to be found in the sacred writings.—Still, I believe slavery, as it exists in the state of Kentucky, is a good institution. I do not intend to attack it. Let gentlemen read the speech that I delivered yesterday, and they will not find in it any such sentiments as the gentleman over the way has attributed to me. And I must correct the gentleman from Henderson (Mr. Dixon,) as well as the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe.) I did not mean to assert that the institution of slavery was an evil.

Mr. DIXON. I certainly so understood the gentleman.

Mr. TURNER. I said nothing of that kind. On the contrary, I attempted to maintain that it was a benefit to both races as it exists here, but I do not think it is profitable or desirable in any point of view to increase the number of slaves by importing them from other states. They have a prohibition against the importation of slaves into other states, and we shall only get the demoralized and debased portion, and this is not the description of slaves that I should wish to see mixed with our black population. I do not think it would be profitable because the more you introduce, the more competition there would be against free white labor, and the greater difficulty for white men to get employment.

Mr. BULLITT. Having been a member of the committee, which has made the report on the subject of slavery, and having concurred with that report, I shall stand prepared to defend it whenever it is called up for discussion; and I shall be opposed to the incorporation of the provisions of the act of 1833 into the new constitution. I differ from my honorable friend from Henderson. I am prepared to maintain that slavery is neither a moral nor a social evil, but a positive advantage to the white population and no injury to the black. Slavery must be viewed in two aspects. Treated as property, no discrimination should be made between that and other kinds of property. I shall not trouble the house at present with any further remarks; but whenever the report comes up I shall be prepared fully to explain my views.

Mr. TALBOTT. One more remark. The gentleman from Madison this morning denied that he made the assertion that the finger of God was against the institution of slavery. I certainly understood the gentleman yesterday as making that declaration, but he has the right to make his own explanation, and if he repudiates such a sentiment, I am willing to receive the gentleman's explanation. But I think that the gentleman has substantially reaffirmed the same sentiment, for he now says that the bible does not recognize slavery; consequently, as the bible is the revealed will of God, that will is opposed to slavery. Now I stand pledged before this house to prove that slavery has existed in every age of the world since the flood, and that it is justified and approved by the scriptures themselves.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is written that the apostle Peter, in the language of admonition to the church, said: "Be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you, a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear." And yesterday, just about the time that I had screwed my courage up to give this answer, my friend from Nelson made a remark which somewhat let me down. And that was, that this act of 1833 had not been much discussed in the election of delegates to this convention.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I can only say that if the gentleman had been better acquainted with me he would have understood the remark as being entirely ironical.

Mr. TAYLOR. I mean nothing offensive to the honorable gentleman. A man cannot always help his thoughts, but he may forbear expressing them. But when the gentleman from Nelson remarked yesterday, that this act of 1833 had not been discussed much for the last six months, I thought that if my friend Thomas S. Page, the second auditor, (and he is great in figures) should be directed to inform the house how much the discussion of that act has cost this commonwealth, it would be found to be, if estimated by its cost, the most valuable act that has ever slept upon the statute book of Kentucky, for 16 long continuous years. Have gentlemen forgotten the history of the convention movement in this proud and glorious old commonwealth of ours? Have they forgotten that the representatives of the people—and I say it with mortification and shame—when they passed the act authorizing the sense of the people of Kentucky to be taken on the propriety of calling a convention to amend the existing constitution, made a pledge and threw it out to the journeying winds, that this question of slavery was not to be agitated, and that in asking for reform they did not intend to interfere with the relations which existed between master and slave.

Among the most ardent advocates of reform in that portion of Kentucky which I have the honor to represent, was the humble and unobtrusive individual who is now addressing you. I have fought the good fight; I have kept the faith. What I mean is, that I lived up to the pledge given by those who sent forth the manifesto which I mentioned a moment since, and never during the discussion of that question, but on one occasion, did I allude to this question of slavery, and then I struck it gently as a lover strikes his mistress with a blossom. The good fight, as I said, was fought; the faith was kept; and out of 136,000 voters, 102,000 votes were cast in favor of a convention. Even the friends of constitutional reform looked at each other with perfect surprise, at the idea of the immense majority that they had obtained, and just like two conjurers they could not look at each other without a smile at the result. It was a glorious triumph which we were called upon to carry out and to secure. Our emancipation friends, where were they? I mean prior to the vote of which I have just spoken. Sir, not the tap of an emancipation drum, not the rallying sound of an emancipation bugle, not the challenge of a single emancipation sentinel was heard, as the friends of constitutional reform in solid phalanx were marching on without faltering. The battle, as I have said, was fought, a triumph was achieved, and victory perched upon our banners; and as Shakspeare says in Richard III, "Our bruised arms,"—and not much bruised either,—“were hung up for monuments; and our stern alarms,”—if there were any in the contest,—“were changed to merry meetings.” Thus far I have travelled in the record of this history, and now I am coming to another point to which I wish to call attention. Did you ever sir, in mid-summer, about night-fall, look upon a clover-field and see the fire-flies rising out of it? Just so when the people had determined to have constitutional reform, were our emancipation friends seen springing up and giving light and hope to each other. If I may use a strong expression, they had been until this triumph lying low and keeping dark. But when they found that the people were determined upon constitutional reform, then for the first time, to use a French expression, they began to fraternise. Or to use a school-master's word, they began to coalesce.

Sir, the pledge which had been given by the friends of the convention, as I said, has been faithfully kept. They did not in any wise agitate this question of slavery. They have made no allusion to the tenure or the right by which the master held his slave. Sir, there was a sort of implied pledge on the part of our emancipation friends, that they did not mean to agitate this question, and for two whole years while these battles were being fought, never was the click of their rifles or the tap of their drum heard; but when the friends of constitutional reform were triumphant, they began to fraternize, to coalesce. Then, for the first time, the emancipation party, as such, was formed. Do gentlemen recollect—let memory run back—what they first demanded—such a demand as could only proceed from the arrogance and insolence of power—that there should be incorporated in the constitution some sort of system of prospective emancipation? And I could not but fancy under the zeal and ardor with which it was pursued, that the time was not far distant when the slave population of this state, amounting to sixty millions of dollars in value, with their masters were to make a grand exodus from this commonwealth. They fired and fell back. I will show you exactly the position to which they fell back. They fell back, sir, under the protection and cover of this act of 1833. They fell back under the protection of another battery which is to be unmasked in this house ere long. I mean that of specific amendments to the constitution—the open clause. How do you know they fell back on the law of 1833? There is a paper in Kentucky, or at least there was—I do not know whether it is now in existence—I do not know but the council fires of our emancipation friends have been put out, and that they are disbanded—but they had adopted a paper called the Louisville Examiner, as the organ of their views, motives, and sentiments; and some times the curtain was lifted a little too high, and we had a view of the modus operandi and of the quo modo by which they were to direct public sentiment and achieve the glorious triumph for their party, which their fancy had painted. Well sir, this is the first legislative body in which I ever had a seat. It is the most novel situation in which I was ever placed, and if I had the moral courage I would resign this evening and go home. Permit me to read one extract, that we may see whether or not I have been indeed telling the truth. Let us see if the emancipation party have not fired and fallen back for protection upon the act of 1833. Here is a letter dated at the residence of my friend from Boyle—"Danville, Ky., March 19, 1849." Letter writers are leaky vessels. They sometimes let out secrets of the cabinet. But I tell you there is more light in this letter than the friends of emancipation wot of or desire. Let us see how the letter reads:

"The meeting above described was adjourned in perfect order—no undue excitement was produced. Opponents treated the meeting with respect, and there was less excitement than is often produced by the most ordinary political and transient topics. We trust the friends of emancipation will every where be encouraged to hold similar meetings. It wants but moral courage and prudence to do so with perfect success and public approbation. All has already been gained in this country that is desirable—a pledge on the part of each candidate for delegate to the convention, (three in number,) that he is in favor of the incorporation of the law of 1833 in the new constitution, and of a provision allowing specific additions or amendments to be made to the constitution by the legislature and the people, not excluding emancipation.

"These two articles in the new constitution being obtained, we have gained all for the present that we need desire—the rest will follow in due time. That it is perfectly in the power of the emancipationists to effect these two all-important provisions in the new constitution, there is not the shadow of a doubt, if they will use their influence aright. They ought not, unless where success is quite certain, to run candidates of their own, but to hold the balance of power between contending candidates, and to vote for that man who will go farther for their cause, unless his good faith may be suspected, or there exist other strong objections to him.

"If 'we are wise as serpents and harmless as doves,' we can hold the balance of power in the convention. Our opponents can be brought to terms: if not, a pro-slavery constitution can be rejected by a popular vote.

"The present aspect of public opinion and feeling gives us every reason to hope. All that is wanted, is moral courage and efficient action. Let every friend of emancipation in the state who can, attend the convention at Frankfort.

"I should have stated that the meeting here was composed of all parties both in religion and politics. Yours, &c., X. V.

"P. S. Since the above was written a candidate for delegate from this county for the convention, in favor of emancipation, has been announced. This movement, in my humble judgment, is injudicious and will not meet the approbation of the emancipationists of the county. The course above recommended, is the true course and the only one that holds out a reasonable prospect of success. If there be any county where a friend of emancipation has a good or reasonable prospect of being elected, a candidate ought undoubtedly to be presented. But surely it is worse than folly, to run one where we are certain of defeat, and where our influence and votes, if wisely used and cast, will secure us all we ought at present to want—an entering wedge to rive "the crooked and gnarled oak," which now overshadows our fair state with the pestiferous shade and blight of a curse, the greatest that a nation can produce."

"An entering wedge." Sir, as I said a while ago, a man cannot help his thoughts, but he may forbear their expression. I thought of the old hymn, which with a little alteration might read thus:

Ye slavery men come view the ground,
Where you must shortly lie.—(Laughter.)

If I had no other motive, and there were no other strong super-inducing reason why I should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Madison, I should want no other than that couched so strongly in this letter. They want it as an entering wedge. They want the act of 1833 incorporated into the constitution, only because it is the best they can procure; only because it is a sort of constitutional spring-board, by which they may hereafter vault into a position by which they will carry the question of emancipation altogether. Sir, I am a pro-slavery man. I am not willing to yield a single inch, to the emancipation party in any form whatever, and I never intend to vote for the incorporation of the spirit or principle of the act of 1833 into the new constitution, for the reason that the party call it an entering wedge, to rid this country of what they call a great moral and political evil. Well, I take issue with them upon that. But I am not going to discuss that question now, nor do I intend to discuss the act of 1833, as to its constitutionality or otherwise. This I will leave for a more fitting opportunity, if an opportunity should occur, and I can summon up courage to address the convention.

Sir, this act of 1833, as it is called, the spirit of which is sought to be incorporated in the constitution, slept, as I have said, upon the statute book, from 1833 to 1848. It was then re-pealed. Why do I use the term slept? Members of the legislature can answer that question. I will tell you the reason why I use the term. There was a continuous legislative dispensation from the operation of that act, and this certainly ought to be taken into consideration, when my friend Mr. Page comes to count the cost. There was a most catholic feeling on the part of the legislature, for granting a dispensation to every man who came before them in a lachrymose manner and asked for it. And year after year slaves were brought into Kentucky. I consider the act of 1833 to have been altogether inoperative, so far as any good effects were to flow from it, but if the people, through their representatives, could keep the act in existence from 1833 up to 1848, I can see no good in incorporating it into the constitution, except to gratify our emancipation friends, and to drive in a little the entering wedge to the accomplishment of their purposes.

There was one remark made by the gentleman from Madison, that struck me with a great deal of force, and it was this, that slave property in Kentucky was decreasing in value—sir, I suppose, like a lady's waist, growing "small by degrees and beautifully less." If it be so, and if the gentleman's statistics prove it to be a fixed fact, then I maintain that there is no necessity for the existence of the act of 1833 at all, and certainly no necessity for its incorporation in the new constitution. If the institution is in fact under the finger of providence, receding in Maryland, Virginia, and Missouri, and the other slave states of this Union, I am willing to leave it to the direction of providence. I am willing to trust that being who is said to be all-wise, and all-just from necessity rather than election.

The remarks of the gentleman from Madison reminded me forcibly of an old woman who had the misfortune to have her horse run off with the buggy in which she was riding. Fortunately, she escaped unhurt. When her friends were collected around the tea table and congratulating her upon her escape, one asked if she had not been greatly alarmed. "Why," said she, "I trusted in Providence 'till the breeching broke; and after that, I did not know what to do." I am beginning to doubt the sincerity of the gentleman from Madison when he says that he relies upon Providence. I begin to think he trusts more to legislative and constitutional breeching than he does to any thing else.

I said a while ago, that when the time should come and I could have courage enough to address the convention, I would like to be heard upon this point, that slavery, as it is asserted by our emancipation friends, is a great social and political evil. There has been a continual cry in this commonwealth about free labor being cheap, and that numbers constitute political wealth. I do not believe it. Continual fault has been found by our emancipation friends throughout this broad commonwealth, with the social condition of the people of Kentucky.—Sir, there are around us and among us evidences of the elements of greatness and content. For my own part, I am content with Kentucky as she is. I would not swap her off for ten of the brightest and most glorious commonwealths, throwing in our emancipation exemplar Ohio, into the bargain. Do you recollect what the preacher said, after he had exhausted his fancy in accumulating figures of speech descriptive of Heaven, after speaking of it as the residence of just men made perfect, after speaking of it as the place where it is said that the taking a still more upward flight, as a finale to all his figures, he said, it is a Kentucky of a place. Sir, there is a great deal of truth in that figure.

I do hope and trust, therefore, that this act of 1833, the spirit of it at least, will not be incorporated in the constitution. The people have rebuked its incorporation in any way, and if I want any reflex of public opinion on the subject, if gentlemen are still like Bunyan, in doubling castle, there was one vote given at the heel of the last session, which ought to satisfy their doubts. That vote was for the repeal of the act of 1833. It was a declaration of the people that the relation between master and slave should not in anywise be disturbed. I would say to the gentleman from Madison, and I say it in no spirit of disrespect obsta principiis, resist things at the beginning. When I see gentlemen endeavoring to incorporate the act of 1833 in the constitution—I say to the pro-slavery party that the wolf is on their walk and it is the province of wise men at least to beware.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I should not have said a word but for the remarks of the gentleman from Madison. He thinks, sir, that the committee should have waited and heard discussions on his resolutions before they made their report. With due deference, I beg leave to differ with the gentleman. Why should we wait? His resolutions assert abstract principles, and the report of the committee goes into matters of detail. Are we to wait and hear discussions here, and then report the opinions of the convention? No, sir, we are to report the individual and collective opinions of the committee. Why wait for discussion? This question of slavery has been discussed in all its bearings throughout the State of Kentucky. We could expect to elicit no new light on the subject by waiting for discussion. Therefore, it was thought expedient to make the report when the committee had come to a conclusion, and not to wait for an expression of opinion on the part of the house.

One other word to my friends from Madison and Simpson as to the fifth section. My friend from Madison wishes the report of the committee changed so as to incorporate the law of 1833. My friend from Simpson wishes it so changed as to prohibit the passage of any such law. They both profess to be friends of constitutional reform. Are they not aware that this new constitution must lose strength by the incorporation of the law of 1833, or by the denial of power to the legislature. If you incorporate the principle of the law of 1833 in the constitution, you at once throw the vote of those opposed to the law against the constitution. If you deny the legislature the power of passing such a law, you throw the votes of all the friends of that law against the constitution. And is it desirable to do this? Why not leave it as it stands at present? Why not leave it to the decisions of the courts, and not throw this great weight against the adoption of the constitution which will inevitably be the case if either of the suggestions of the gentlemen be adopted.

I will conclude by remarking that I cannot see how you can bring up the discussion of the gentleman's resolutions with the report of the committee. Although both should be made the special order of the day for the same day, one must have precedence over the other. If you now make the gentleman's resolutions the special order of the day for Monday week next, you give the report of the committee precedence, and that report must come up to the exclusion of the resolutions. They may be under discussion, it is true, but they cannot give rise to any action until the report shall have been acted upon.—Then, why not go on with the discussion of the resolutions until the day fixed for the consideration of the report of the committee.

Mr. CLARKE. My honorable friend from Jefferson I think begs the question. He seems to suppose that if the amendment, proposed by the gentleman from Madison, be adopted, it will array the pro-slavery men in the state against the constitution. Well, that is true, sir. He then argues that if the proposition that I intend to submit be adopted, it will array the emancipationists against the constitution.

Mr. MERIWETHER. The gentleman misapprehends me. I said the friends of the law and the emancipationists.

Mr. CLARKE. Yes sir, it will array the friends of the law of 1833 and the emancipationists against the constitution. That will be the result as the gentleman supposes. I am perfectly satisfied, though a vote upon my proposition will test that question, that there is no gentleman on this floor, who does not desire fairly, honestly, and faithfully to represent the will and feelings of those who sent him here. When the vote shall be taken on my proposition, if there should be a majority in favor of withholding from the Legislature the power to prohibit citizens of this State from bringing slaves into the State, I shall believe that there is in the State a will, reflected by delegates here, in favor of the principle that I propose. I am not willing to confer upon the Legislature the power to legislate upon the subject of slavery at all. I believe there is nothing more dangerous to the future peace and tranquility of this proud old commonwealth, than to confer upon the legislative department of the government for all time to come, the power to legislate upon the subject of slavery. What has been the effect, sir, as I suggested in the few remarks that I had the honor to submit for the consideration of the committee a few mornings ago, of the act of 1833? That act was regarded as a concession to abolitionism; and there has not, according to my recollection, since the passage of that act in 1833 down to its repeal in 1848, been one solitary session of the Legislature of the State in which the subject of slavery has not been either directly or indirectly discussed. We have had from 1833 to 1848 an experience of years as to the propriety of the principle incorporated in that act. We have had practical experience upon the subject of that act, its consequences on the prosperity, the well-being, the tranquility of the State, and I think sir that from the bare fact that the people last winter in the exercise of their sovereign will and power, returned to both branches of the Legislature of the State an overwhelming majority for the repeal of the law of 1833, we may arrive at the conclusion that a majority of the people of the State are in favor of allowing her citizens to import slaves for their own use. What better wedge, I ask in the language of the gentleman over the way, do the emancipationists want than that the constitution should confer upon the legislative department of this government the power perpetually to agitate the subject of slavery.

And upon principle, sir, there will be but a shade of difference between leaving the question open for legislative discussion and legislative action, and the incorporation of the open clause principle in the new Constitution. As I remarked before, I do not now propose to discuss this question, but there are innumerable reasons why this convention should withhold from the legislature the power to take any future action upon the subject of slavery. When the proper time shall have arrived, and I shall be permitted to have the honor to offer the amendment that I propose to offer, then I desire a patient and calm consideration on the part of this convention, of such arguments as I shall submit in favor of a clause that shall prohibit the legislature from acting upon the subject of slavery.

Mr. TURNER. I ask leave to say a word or two before the subject is postponed. So far as it respects the article which has been read here by the gentleman from Mason, it is one that I used all last summer myself, at least I used it as long as I was engaged in my canvass, and I used it for the purpose of warning pro-slavery men that they should be upon their guard against electing any man who was in favor of the open clause. I read that and other similar publications to the voters, to show that there was a purpose on the part of the emancipationists to divide up the two parties, in order to make an opening, and see if they could not get some individual who was a little soft, who would go a little secretly in favor of the open clause. I was considered the ultra pro-slavery man of the county which I represent. The emancipationists met here on the 25th of April last, and said that they were in favor of putting the principle of the act of 1833 in the constitution, but the county of Madison did not think she was bound to abandon her principles which she had advocated since 1833, merely because the emancipationists had taken them up. Out of fifty votes given in both branches of the legislature by members from the county of Madison, only three have ever been cast in opposition to this law of 1833. And before this question of emancipation was opened, the county of Madison always seemed to indicate that she was in favor of putting the provisions of that law in the constitution, and I was in favor of doing so myself. But I agree with my friend on my left, that this matter of slavery should be shut up in the Constitution, that it should not be agitated in the legislature, for that I consider near akin to the open clause itself. It should not be agitated, because, to disturb this species of property, injures its usefulness and value.

Now, I do not suppose that the gentleman from Mason intended to intimate that I had, in the views which I supported, any connection with the emancipationists. There are pro-slavery men here who are in favor of the open clause, which is greatly worse than incorporating the act of 1833; for I do not think that statute would produce any injury at all; on the contrary, I think it would be a benefit; but there are gentlemen whose opinions are entitled to as much attention as my own, who think it would be right to leave it open. It was urged upon me that inasmuch as the convention would not touch the subject of slavery, but would adopt the principle in favor of the open clause, I ought not to go against it in the canvass, and ought not here. But I told them that I was in favor of shutting it up for a period, longer than any man in my county was in favor of, and should endeavor to put it beyond the reach of any legislation for twenty or twenty-five years; that it should not even be brought up again for discussion before the people for that time. And now with my ultra views on this subject, because I think we had better not import any more slaves gentlemen seem to think that I have some kindred feelings with the emancipationists. Really, the condition I have gotten into here reminds me of a little passage between myself and Squire Wilcoxon. We were introduced to each other by the title of Squire, and he thought we were both squires by trade. I asked him how Jackson's administration was getting along. "Really," he said, "we have not got into a predicament to show our circumstance." But really I think I have got into a predicament to show my circumstance, but if they will give me fair play I do not care. The gentleman from Mason has taken hold of me, and the gentleman from Jefferson was about to do so. The gentleman from Boyle has not read my speech, and did not hear it well, and I was obliged to listen to a long speech in consequence of his misapprehending my position. Now sir, when I am properly understood, the gentlemen have not got the vantage ground of me. I am a pro-slavery man, but I think we have got enough of it. It is said we may have too much of a good thing. I admit that the slaves we have now are beneficial to us, and it is desirable to improve them, not to contaminate them by mixing them up with rogues and rascals. My county, I believe, is not for bringing in any more, and she is not willing to yield her principles, merely because the emancipationists have adopted the law of 1833.

Now I do not wish to use any language that would seem to be indecorous, but the proceedings of the emancipationists remind me of a circumstance that occurred some years ago.—One Barby Diggs came to me to get me to bring a suit upon a contract for land. I took his bond and told him to come again in two weeks. At the end of that time he returned, and having examined the papers in the mean time, I told him that he had no chance to get clear of the contract. He was very much disappointed. Said he, "can't you bedevil them?" "O yes, if that is what you want, but I shall charge you a pretty large fee." He very readily agreed to pay it, but wanted me to wait until the business was over. I told him no, he might play the bedeviling game on me. Now as for this matter of the open clause, I understand the emancipationists to say, if you will give us that we will ere long bedevil you till you agree to give up your slaves. Now sir, I throw myself into the breach at that point. I am against allowing them to play Barby Diggs on us in any way or shape, and I will vote side by side with the gentleman from Mason, and other pro-slavery men. There are some individuals who have got up to the highest notch, and are about to turn us out of the church here. I am here by the direction of the people of Madison, by the authority of twenty-six or seven hundred people of the commonwealth, and am not to be ousted by any man who may constitute himself priest or preceptor. I am here in obedience to the voice of the free-citizens of Madison, and I intend to advocate their principles fearlessly, let what will come. I came here through fire and brimstone, more perhaps than any one who has a seat upon this floor, and I will not bow to the emancipationists in any shape or manner.

Mr. NUTTALL here called attention to his amendment to the 6th resolution of the gentleman from Madison, and insisted that a vote should be taken upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to express the opinion that the resolution, of the gentleman from Madison should not be laid on the table as suggested by some here. There are a couple of literary gems in embryo here, twin brothers, that I would like to see developed to this house.—The first is the political, philosophical axiom that slavery is a moral blessing to both the slave and his master, and a political blessing to the commonwealth. The second is, the divine axiom that the Being who descended from heaven to free mankind from the shackles of sin came also to assist in riveting the shackles of human despotism. I hope a full and fair opportunity will be granted for the development of both these principles, so entirely new and strange as they are. And although we all may have come here to carry out the wishes and principles of our constituents, yet if members of this convention will be benefitted by the discussion of principles of this character, I hope that the committee will grant them an opportunity.

Mr. ROOT. I would not rise to speak but I should feel I had not discharged my duty, if upon the further discussion of this question, I should not endeavor to make the voice of a respectable portion of the state heard in relation to it. My constituency feel a deep solicitude and interest in the principles of the law of 1833. There was nothing said about emancipation or abolitionism when that law was placed on the statute book, and while it remained there quietly, there was no agitation in my part of the state. It strikes me that this question ought to be settled on wise and proper principles. It ought to be settled by a concession on the part of the ultra pro slavery men on the one hand, and as the gentleman says that the emancipationists require the principle of the law of 1833 to be incorporated into the constitution, there ought to be some concessions on both sides. The emancipation party in Kentucky is not only respectable, numerous, and intellectual, but its voice must and will be heard. It is impossible to stifle the principles embraced, and laid down by the emancipation party in this state, and it would be unwise to endeavor to stifle discussion, and to put a padlock upon the lips of the intellectual gentlemen who are in favor of some system looking to ultimate emancipation in this state. In my section of the country, no man believes in incorporating the gradual emancipation system in the constitution; but there are divers men, some of our most distinguished men, and slaveholders too, who look forward to the period when Kentucky shall be indeed redeemed and disenthralled by the irresistible genius of universal emancipation. It matters not whether it comes in ten, fifteen, twenty or a thousand years, they desire that our policy shall look forward to the period when Kentucky shall be redeemed—when she shall possess within her borders a numerous body of free laborers—and when we shall be in fact a free state. I desire to be heard upon some branch at least of the principles of the law of 1833. I come here as the representative of about two thousand voters—I know the feelings and opinions of those whom I represent—and is this too much to ask? Are we who have stood by the law of 1833, we who have battled for it for ten, fifteen, or twenty years, to recede from this position and in short is the policy and principles contained in that law, now to be abandoned because a little junto of immediate emancipationists or abolitionists choose to occupy ground that nearly the entire state has occupied for sixteen years? Are we to be driven from any position because our enemies get upon our platform? Are we desirous to make Kentucky the great slave mart of the United States, because the immediate emancipationists choose to get on the platform on which we stood fairly, fully, and quietly, until the last legislature chose to lay violent hands on that sacred law. The policy of changing the law was equivocal. The contest that was fought on this floor showed it to be of doubtful import, and the vote by which it was repealed exhibited the fact that there was a strong and powerful minority in favor of that law. This powerful minority will come up in judgment against the men who, uninstructed, disturbed the policy of the great commonwealth of Kentucky. Upon this point, therefore, I think that there is no friend of the law of 1833, who has anything to fear. I can bring up an array of great names, the very foremost in this country, who have stood up and advocated the law of 1833, and who were not backward in asserting these principles. Let then every friend of the ancient and settled policy of the state come up, and I believe not even the most ultra of the pro slavery men, will attempt to overthrow the new constitution, because it has the principles of the law of 1833 engrafted upon it. Does the law disturb any settled policy under the constitution and laws of the state? Does it unhinge any man's claims to slave property, or render it less secure? I maintain that it will render slave property more valuable, and that the repeal of the law will bring an influx of slaves here, and make the state the great slave mart of the Union—to the disgrace of the proud and chivalrous sons of old Kentucky, whose blood has been spilled upon a hundred battle fields in defence of the rights of man. I desire that this question may be postponed, so that the voice of the country may come up here and not be stifled on a question of such momentous importance. I move that the committee rise and report progress.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee rose and reported progress, and leave was granted for it to sit again.

And then the convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. THOS. N. RALSTON, of the Methodist church.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to report an amendment to the present constitution, which shall provide, that while the ancient mode of trial by jury be kept inviolate, the commonwealth shall in all criminal prosecutions, have the right of peremptory challenge to the same extent that shall be given to the accused.

2. Resolved, That said committee also report an amendment, which shall give to the citizen the right to carry arms for self defence, reserving to the legislature the power to pass laws for the punishment of those who carry concealed weapons.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have offered these resolutions, with a view to instruct the committee to make a report in favor of the instructions contained in the resolutions. To my mind these propositions are of such weight that it seems to me it would be useless to address arguments to the convention in their favor. It strikes me sir, that there is a very great defect in our system of criminal prosecutions, in regard to the manner in which jurors are selected, and that under the present mode of selecting jurors, in a trial of criminals, especially those charged with murder, and who are men of much property, there is a very great difficulty in convicting them. And in my judgment, the difficulty lies in the mode in which jurors are selected, and in the fact that the accused has the right to challenge peremptorily the number of 22 jurors, while the commonwealth is denied the right even to challenge a single juror.

With reference to the second resolution which relates to the article in our present constitution, which provides that citizens shall carry arms for self defence, permit me to say that in my opinion, that article has prevented the legislature from passing any law to punish individuals for carrying concealed weapons. Now while I am willing that every citizen should carry arms for self defence, it seems utterly wrong that every individual, who chooses, should carry a pistol or a bowie knife concealed, and go unpunished, and the resolution proposes to instruct the committee to insert some provision in the constitution, which, while it shall allow the citizen to carry arms for self defence, shall give to the legislature the power to punish those who carry concealed weapons.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I believe this is the first resolution that has been presented to require this house to vote positive instructions to a committee in the exercise of its duties. If it is the purpose of the mover of the proposition to have the subject investigated, scrutinized, and examined in all its bearings upon our personal rights, and the rights of the citizen, I have no objection that it shall take that course. I am not prepared myself, at this time, to give my vote, positively instructing the committee thus to change the rights which pertain to the citizens of this commonwealth—I allude to the rights pertaining to the accused, and the rights of the commonwealth in a contest between the commonwealth and a citizen charged with a criminal offence. I am not prepared at once to give my vote that there shall be such a radical change on this question, and I therefore hope that the gentleman will let the subject go before the committee for their examination, without positive instruction. However, if the question is pressed in the shape of an instruction designed to elicit the judgment of the house, I for one desire to interpose the expression of my opinion against the adoption of any such principle in the constitution.

Mr. HARDIN. I would suggest that the form of the resolutions is too peremptory, and requires a vote at once on as important a principle ple as can be brought before us. To enquire is one thing, but to instruct is to give a vote to change the most important part of the criminal jurisprudence of the country. I hope my friend will alter his resolutions so as simply to direct the committee to enquire into the expediency of reporting the provision. The committee on the circuit courts have that matter before them, and will consider it again this evening. It is worthy of consideration, for a great evil does result where the accused has a right to challenge twenty, and the commonwealth has no peremptory challenge. Our committee are enquiring into it, and I hope some of the other standing committees will also do so. This resolution is compulsory now, and if we are to give a vote on it, I hope it will not be done to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not insist on its going to the committee in the form of a positive instruction. I had not supposed there would be any objection to that form, but I will so modify the resolution as that the committee be instructed to enquire into the expediency of reporting an amendment.

The resolution was so modified.

Mr. NUTTALL. I have an amendment which I desire to have made to the resolutions. I want that committee to enquire into the fact whether the commonwealth shall not have the right to change the venue. The accused has frequently that right; and whenever it occurs that the commonwealth cannot have a trial, from the fact that every man in the county has formed his opinion for or against the accused, and that no jury can be found to try him, I desire that the commonwealth shall have the right to remove the case to some distant county, where a man shall finally be tried, and from the fact that he has committed so aggravated an offence that every man has formed an opinion, he shall not go unwhipt of justice. I throw out the suggestion that the committee may take it under consideration, and if they do not, I will bring it in some tangible form before the convention.

The resolutions were then agreed to.

Mr. IRWIN offered the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That in the reorganization of the government of this commonwealth, it will be expedient to divide each county into a convenient number of civil districts, to be designated first, second, third, &c., and that each district shall be entitled to two magistrates and one constable, to be elected by its qualified voters.

Resolved, That the revenue of the commonwealth ought not to be collected by the sheriff, but that a new officer for that purpose ought to be created, to be styled the revenue collector, and that this officer should be elected by the magistrates of the county.

Mr. IRWIN. I understand that the committee on the county courts has adopted much the same principle as that contained in the first resolution, and I simply wish to refer that resolution without being printed to the committee on the county courts. I notice that in Tennessee, the collection of the revenue is given to a collector and not to a sheriff. It seems that the sheriff, being elected by the people, seldom pays any money over into the treasury, and it seems necessary that it should be collected by an officer selected for the purpose. I therefore propose to refer these resolutions to the committee on the county courts.

They were so referred accordingly.

Mr. HOOD offered the following, which was referred to the committee on the executive for the state at large.

Resolved, That the committee on the executive for the state at large, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so qualifying and restricting the executive power to grant pardons and reprieves, &c., as to prevent its improvident exercise, under false or partial representations to the governor, by the friends of the convict or otherwise.

Mr. NESBITT offered the following, which was referred to the committee on the county courts.

Resolved, That in lieu of the county courts, there shall be elected in each county a probate judge, who shall discharge the duties of the county court, and the county court clerk, and for compensation shall have the fees of the clerk of the county court, and no other.

Resolved, That the latter office be abolished.

SLAVERY.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. BARLOW in the Chair, and resumed the consideration of Mr. Turner's resolutions which were undisposed of when the committee rose yesterday.

The CHAIR awarded the floor to Mr. Root, but that gentleman waived the right, saying that he would take some other occasion to address the committee, as the discussion should progress.

The question was on the amendment of Mr. Nuttall to the sixth resolution, proposing to allow any citizen of Kentucky, to import from another state a slave for his own use.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was adopted.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. chairman: I understand that the 6th resolution is intended to test the sense of the convention upon the propriety of incorporating into the constitution the principles there indicated; and in order that it may be done at once, I will now move to strike out of the resolution all after the word "Resolved." I am satisfied in my own mind that we shall not be able to put in this constitution, with any hope of its adoption, any such provision. I am equally satisfied in my own mind, that we shall not be able to put in the constitution any such provision as that indicated by the gentleman from Simpson, (Mr. Clarke,) yesterday, and that all we can do is to agree upon some general principle, and allow the legislature to exercise a sound discretion upon the subject. When our constitution was framed in 1798, we had the following provision in relation to slavery:

"The general assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owners, or without paying their owners, previous to such emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated." And in connection with that subject, in the 12th section of the general provisions of the constitution, we have this further provision, "nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use, without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being previously made to him."

The convention then based, by these two provisions, the foundations of the government on substantial justice, and put it beyond the popular will to take a man's property under the pretence of use without giving him a full and fair compensation. The first proposition, to clear it from all doubt and equivocation, they applied directly to slaves, in which they recognized property. In the further proposition they applied the principle to all property, leaving it to the legislature to control the laws of this government, but forbidding them to invade the rights of property. I trust when we come to form this constitution, that we shall follow that example—that we will reiterate those provisions—that we will take it from the power of the legislature to invade private rights, and that we will re-affirm the principles adopted by those who have gone before us, that private property is not to be invaded, under any pretence, without a fair and just compensation. We have in the present constitution, a further provision as follows:

"They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to this state from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States, so long as any person of the same age or description shall be continued in slavery by the laws of this state. They shall pass laws to permit the owners of slaves to emancipate them, saving the rights of creditors, and preventing them from becoming a charge to any county in this commonwealth. They shall have full power to prevent slaves being brought into this state as merchandize."

Under the latter clause of that provision the act of 1833 was passed, prohibiting the importation of slaves, and the constitutionality of that act was sustained by our appellate tribunals.—But in truth it fell almost a dead letter on the statute book. Kentucky was not the best market for slaves. There were more profitable markets—they have not been brought here except under peculiar circumstances; and Kentucky never has been a market for slaves, where they have been made a subject matter of merchandize.—And while we have the more profitable business of cotton planting, and sugar making in the southern states, Kentucky never will be a market for slaves. It is said that the act of 1833 was a concession to the emancipationists, and to some extent it was, for those who then desired emancipation in Kentucky desired to go further. They were content however with the act of 1833, and the subject was dropped in the legislature for several years. Our citizens upon the Tennessee line, however, became dissatisfied with it. Living upon almost an imaginary line, and desiring to make exchanges between one another—the citizens of Kentucky and Tennessee—they found inconveniences arising. The slaves on one side married the slaves on the other, and it became desirable, for the convenience of families, that there should be exchanges, and they from time to time petitioned the legislature to repeal this law, and to grant special laws, until leave was granted to all who asked, and though the law of 1833 existed upon the statute book it was no prevention, or if it was a prevention it was evaded by permission of the legislature, or by the act of the citizen.

I voted for the act of 1833, and I voted, too, against its repeal. I should have been content to have had it remain on the statute book, as the indication of the sense of the legislature that they discountenanced the bringing in of slaves here as merchandize; but it was the fate of this law, like all other laws that are against the sense of a large minority of the people, that it did not give peace upon the subject. That was the case, for the agitation continued and was repeated, session after session, and the representatives of the people continued, from time to time, to violate what I consider a great principle in legislation—that is, that the law should bear equally and uniformly on all the citizens, and that it should not be a prevention to one, while the legislature gave an exception and license to another. And it is better for a majority to yield the law that gives to a large portion of the citizens dissatisfaction, and is a cause of continued agitation, than to hold it at that expense, when, too, they are unable to enforce it, and when the representatives of the people yield to particular exceptions, year after year. It was modified or repealed at the last session of the legislature.—The minority that for years had been dissatisfied with it and agitated its repeal and procured licenses to violate it, had made themselves the majority.

The repeal of that law has been seized upon by those who favor emancipation in the state of Kentucky, as one step in advance upon the subject of emancipation, and they now seek to place it in the constitution. I do not charge the gentleman from Madison with being an emancipationist, although in this work he is doing their business, and has taken their steps in advance. Suppose that it should be the sense of this convention that slaves should not be brought into Kentucky as merchandize, would they, in view of that powerful, active, and decided minority that is agitated upon this subject, who have procured license from year to year to violate this law, and finally made themselves a majority, and repealed it, be acting wisely and discreetly to place such a provision in the constitution they are about to adopt, and thus add to the officeholders, and the spirit of emancipation which now threatens it, that additional force to procure its rejection by the people? for I take it for granted that whatever constitution we shall agree upon we shall present to the people for their affirmation, before we put it into operation.

Mr. Chairman, in forming a constitution as in passing laws, it is the part of wisdom to apply them to the sentiments, the feelings, and the disposition of the people, whose organic law is to be formed, or to the principles upon which the state expects her people to be governed. And though the philosopher in his closet may say this principle or that principle, this law or that law, would be better, we, in applying a constitution to the wants, and necessities, and feelings of the people, are bound to consult them. Therefore, in forming a constitution, upon this very identical subject, it is important that we should look at the sentiments long entertained, and firmly fixed, of the citizens of Kentucky; and what is against those feelings and sentiments is impracticable. And I say to the gentleman from Madison, it is impracticable to put his proposition into the constitution, with the sentiments of the people of Kentucky in relation to this matter staring him in the face. It is a consideration for us all, not only in regard to this subject, but upon others, that are to come before us.

Now I do not intend to go into the question, the abstract question, whether slavery is an unmitigated curse, or evil, or whether it is an absolute blessing to society. We are not in a condition to judge that question, for we are not clear from the influences which it casts around us. If there was no slavery in Kentucky, and we were debating whether we would have slavery, this question would be proper, and the lights of history, the experience of other nations, and if you will, the sanctions of religion, might fairly be invoked and brought into play, in the consideration of the subject. Slavery exists—it has been sanctioned by law, and by our organic constitution—it is in our midst—and we are to make a constitution in view of those facts. We are not at liberty then, to entertain this question. Though not a religious man, I have examined this subject so far forth as to satisfy my own conscience, that there is no sin in holding slaves under the constitution of Kentucky. And my reading of the gospel, and understanding of the mission of the Savior of the world is, that it was not against governments and the existing order of things, as found among the nations of the earth when the tidings were proclaimed, but against the sin of fallen man and for his reformation. Servitude, in one form or another, has existed in society from the earliest light that history gives us; and from the condition of society, and the light the history of the past is calculated to shed on the future, it will exist in all time to come. We are served in certain capacities and conditions by our slaves. The good people of Massachusetts are served by white people in the same menial offices, that we are served by our slaves. Massachusetts has about the same population as Kentucky, yet look at the difference in the number of poor sustained by public charity in each state. Taking the number in the county of Jefferson, as an average for each county in the state, we have some three thousand. Look at the statistics as returned by the state of Massachusetts, and it would be found that they had twenty-eight thousand! A wide difference. Here the master takes care of the aged and infirm, and we have a provision in the present constitution, that the legislature shall have the power of enforcing the discharge of the duties of humanity upon the master. I think it would be easy to calculate, when we look at the history of the crowded population of the old world, and compare it with the history of population in the slave states, that the mass of human misery, of crime, and degradation, is far greater, in those states with crowded white population, than it ever was or ever will be in the slave states. I believe that white labor, as it increases, becomes cheaper than slave labor, and I believe the capitalist employs but the best, and leaves the most deficient to charity, the cold hand of public charity, and that Massachusetts, with her 28,000 poor, as compared with Kentucky, so far as regards those who serve and those who do not serve, has a greater mass of human misery, degradation, and crime than we have in Kentucky, or ever can have under the existing order of things. So that looking at things as they are, and as in all human probability, they will be, we shall have no cause to reproach ourselves on the ground of humanity, or as having failed to advance the interests of society if we suffer this institution to remain as it has existed.

Mr. Chairman: There is an obligation resting upon every owner of a slave, that all sensible, correct feeling men, well understand. The slaves are born under our roof, reared with our children, and work in the same field and at the same labor that we do. They are parts of the same household, and if they are manumitted where are they to go? Some gentlemen would send them to the coast of Africa. I have looked into the matter, and I have satisfied my own mind and judgment that it is impossible to send them there. There is no country then to receive them—they have not the wisdom and knowledge and capacity to govern themselves—and further, we have not the means to send them there. I do not intend to detain the convention with the history and the facts that have brought my mind to this conclusion, for no doubt every gentleman here, has examined the subject for himself. Are they then to be free among us? I have satisfied my mind that these two races of people never can mingle and become one. Free them, and they become the Lazzaroni of the state. They will crowd to the cities—they will visit the country only on marauding parties—and they will become idle, vicious, and ungovernable. Look at those portions of Philadelphia and New York and other eastern cities where the free negroes congregate. Look at the records of their courts of criminal justice and you will find that they are embraced as idle, vicious, ungovernable, and in the annals of crime, a per cent. over that of the white race, of more than a hundred in crime. You may once in a while find an exception of one who is industrious, who accumulates property, but he never becomes an American. He is not one of the people, and can never aspire to an equality in our social relations. He never can, and if we free the two hundred thousand slaves that exist in Kentucky, it will be more difficult to govern them, than it is now. Instead of being productive of wealth, as they are now, they will be destructive of wealth. They will not be advanced in morality, but they will be advanced in crime. They will not be advanced in happiness, but they will be advanced in misery and in degradation. This is what has taken place in other states, and as sure as you withdraw the hand of the master from the slave here, as surely will the same thing take place among us.

We are to make a constitution for that people as well as for ourselves. They are now our slaves. The right of the owner is shielded by the constitution under which we live, and guarded by the same spirit of right, that guarded private property from the inroads of the public interest with the consent of the legislature and full compensation. You can enter into the feelings and the spirit of the man who, if we were clear of slavery, would vote against its introduction, but I think that those who entertain that feeling and that spirit and would overturn the institution as it now exists, have not looked along the whole line of circumstances that surround it. Do you thereby advance the happiness of your slave? I think not. You secure his degradation, and you make it more difficult to govern and to rule him. Though you place him on the footing of a free man, you cannot elevate him to the condition of the white man. It is an impossibility of nature, and we must have the distinction of races, the animosity, and the hatred, until the day comes, that one race shall expel the other. And when that day comes, it will not be a peaceable expulsion.

In forming a constitution we are to form it with reference to the existing state of things, and for the government of the people as they are, and I have satisfied my own mind that it is better for the slave and better for the white man, that while they remain in Kentucky they should remain in the condition of master and slave.

Those who hurl their anathemas against slavery from other states, do not understand our condition, the difficulties we have to encounter, and the obligations we are under in relation to this species of property, and are not capable of judging it. They have, therefore, no effect on my firm conviction on the subject, that it is better for both races that the relation between them in this state should remain as it is now.

I think, sir, we are not prepared to take what I have referred to as the step in advance. And though I do not charge the gentleman from Madison with being with these emancipationists, yet he is aiding and assisting them in this move. I think that many persons have acceded to the insertion of the act of 1833 in the constitution without due and proper reflection. Nothing is to be gained by it, and positive injury is to be the result in the work we have now undertaken. If we were to put its provisions in the constitution of Kentucky, we would be aiding and assisting in the emancipation movement. It would be holding out to them encouragement without doing any thing, and with almost a certainty, in my judgment, that we should thereby secure the rejection of our labors. There was an implied pledge on the part of those who passed the law to call a convention, in the address they made to the people of Kentucky, that we would not interfere with this subject, that it was not the design and intention of those who advocated constitutional reform in Kentucky to interfere with the relations of master and slave. And as the gentleman from Mason said yesterday, the voice of the emancipationist was not heard in the land until we had passed the Rubicon, until the convention was called. I am not sure that it was not raised, or assisted and carried forward by those who desired a rejection of the constitution, and hoped to fall back upon that instrument as it now exists. There is but one change that I would make in this constitution in relation to slavery. I would fulfill faithfully the pledge held out, and under which I believe the convention was called, that we would not interfere between the rights of the master and slave; and I would, in addition, prevent the emancipation of slaves to remain here. I would vote for that, because I think it is within the spirit of that pledge and the spirit of our system. I believe, from my knowledge and experience, that the emancipation of the slave is no advantage to the slave himself, while it is an absolute injury to the slave property, its owners, and to society at large. And the present constitution intends, in the emancipation of the slave, to guard the public from the support of him. It has the very principle that I would carry out, and it is the feeling I entertain upon the subject. In Kentucky, by the present constitution, we give every man the right to emancipate his slaves; and, by another provision, guarded the public and individuals against wrong and injury from the exercise of that right. I would throw a further guard over the public in relation to their emancipation, and prevent their remaining in the commonwealth of Kentucky to the injury of the slave property and of the citizens at large. And with that change, I think I should be willing that the present constitution should stand as it is, and that our pledge would be redeemed. I am satisfied that we cannot emancipate the slaves and send them to Liberia—and that we ought not, under the obligations which we owe to the slave himself, to drive him out against his will—because we would thereby make his condition worse.

I believe the principle that private property should not be taken without the consent of the representatives of the people, and without full compensation being first made, is a great fundamental one that should never be violated. When you teach the citizen to violate that great principle, you have undermined the principle that sustains all good governments.

If you set the example of violating this principle you but lead to the formation of bands of robbers, and set them an example of taking by force without a just right, that property which has been acquired under the sanction of the constitution and the laws—that is, the fruits of a man's labor—as well his lands as his household goods. It is under that principle asserted in our government more than any other, that the enterprize and the activity of her people have carried us forward in the progress of wealth, faster than any other government in the world. We have asserted in our constitution that it is beyond the power of the government itself to take from us the fruits of our labor—and every man feels that he is thus protected. The emancipationists would violate that principle. When we shall violate it in one instance, it will be but the first step towards other and greater violations. The day may come without the sacrifice of that principle when there will be a call for a division of estates, and when that call comes, we will come with a stronger voice and appeal to the selfishness of our nature, than does the subject of emancipation. Now it is only to take away the rights of a portion of our fellow citizens, in which alone they are interested, but when the demand comes for a division of estates in a popular government, where the voice of the majority is to rule, the example you have set of violating and breaking down this great principle.

ple, will add to the force and power of selfishness in guiding on those who are to participate in and to divide the profits of such a division. And then, what becomes of the fruits of a long and industrious life in the accumulation of comforts for a man's use in his old age or for the setting out of his children? You will have taken away the stimulus that induce the industrious accumulation, because when you have once broken down this great principle, no one can tell when these interested bands may rise and call for plunder. It is said that the first step in crime is the one that weakens the conscience and is followed with pain and remorse, but that a few steps more, and all pain and remorse is gone, and the adventurer is fairly started on a career of crime. It is the first step in breaking down the great foundations of justice in a community—the invasion of private right, that distracts the people and undermines the foundations upon which we must stand in the formation of a government.

I think no good can come from this discussion, as to the abstract right or the positive evils or the positive blessings of this institution. It is our duty in framing a constitution to see that it conforms to the existing state of things, and therefore I am against incorporating the act of 1833 in the constitution—or as I have before said, of taking the step in advance. I wish to retain in any new constitution the same great principle in relation to slavery and private property, that was adopted in the present constitution.

The gentleman from Madison says we are not able to pay for emancipation—that we are not able to pay even the interest on the debt that would thus be created. That many may be all very true, but this government, this state, I trust is to exist for centuries, and how this thing may be hereafter no man can tell. There is a time when slavery will cease. The Indian has receded before the Saxon, and still recedes. He is of an inferior race and lives by hunting, and as civilization marches on he gives place, and this I understand is according to the great laws of the ruler of the universe. In the march of population when white labor becomes cheaper and crowded, slave labor will yield to it. And the day will come when thus depreciated in value, and some country to which they may be sent is found, it may be the desire of those who shall come after us, to free their slaves, and to do it without a resort to revolution. And when that day shall come, I wish them to act as in their judgment is right, but I also desire to indicate to them in this constitution that the foundation of this government is laid in justice, and that property acquired under its sanction is not to be invaded without compensation to the owner. I am not one of those who propose to provide in this constitution for the perpetuity of slavery. I recognize the principle that every people have a right to form their own government, and to change, alter, or modify it, as they may deem the interests of society to require; and whenever those who may come after us shall desire so to do, I shall rest content that they, in their judgment, shall do what they deem right upon this and upon all other subjects. Therefore, I do not expect in this constitution to make slavery perpetual, and beyond the reach of those who shall come after us.

I desire to secure in it the rights of property, and to secure the people against injury from an accumulation of free negroes among us. And I desire, also, to let every man in the community who has slaves, whenever touched, either by religion or philanthropy, to manumit them at his pleasure, saving the commonwealth and the good people thereof from all injury or danger from setting them free; and I believe that can be efficaciously done only by their removal from the commonwealth. Now we have a maxim in law, the English of which is, see that you use your own rights so as not to interfere with the rights and property of others.—This is a very good rule, and a very good maxim. Now, if I have a right in property, in using that right, I am under obligations so to use it as not to interfere with my neighbors. If I own one hundred or one thousand slaves, I have the right of manumitting them. I do not wish to interfere with that right, but to prevent the exercise of it in a way that would injure the property of my neighbor or of the country at large; and I think we have the right to so limit and restrain it. And, hence, I would prohibit the emancipation of slaves, and the permitting them to remain in the state. There is no difficulty about it in my mind. We take private property for various uses after paying for it. We take slaves where they have been guilty of crime, and execute them for the same crimes for which we execute the white man. It is a public use of the property, and we remunerate the owner of him and take him. I do not wish the private interest of the owner to be stimulated to evade the public justice of the country by withholding him compensation when his property is used.

Mr. Chairman, I will indulge in a few remarks in connection with one branch of the subject of the slave trade, without intending to go into the slave trade as carried on upon the seas. I have stated that the bringing in of slaves to Kentucky as merchandise has never been practised to any extent, and never will be while there is a better market for them; but it strikes me that gentlemen who are so horror stricken with the trade as it exists in the United States, have stopped short of the mark, if they intend to prohibit it at all. They do but half their work unless they prohibit the sale of slaves and the carrying of them out of Kentucky. It is as much a separation of the husband from the wife, the parent from the child, and the slave from his country, where you sell a Kentucky slave to a Virginia planter, as where you purchase him in another state and bring him here. As the gentleman from Mason said, there can be no great crime in bringing him to Kentucky from another place, but it may be a much worse crime to take him from this state to another. In relation to this slave trade about which so much noise is made, as it exists in the slave states of the country, its horrors have been greatly exaggerated. Go into the interior of Kentucky; there are but few slaves sold out of the state, and they are mostly those whose bad and ungovernable disposition is such, that the master can no longer control them. The proportion of the white population that for bad conduct is sold into slavery elsewhere. I refer gentlemen to the counties in which they live and their experience upon this subject. The trade so far as sending abroad is concerned rarely reaches any other than the dissolute, the idle, and the unruly; and then, not in a greater proportion than our white population flee their country when they have lost their characters.

I think that we who have come here under the pledges held out to the people, who voted to call this convention, and who have chosen its delegates should regard it as our bounden duty to leave this thing where we found it. We cannot put in the constitution the proposition of the gentleman from Madison, nor do I think we can put in that of the gentleman from Simpson.—The great constitutional reforms that we desire and which the people of Kentucky have called for, if we intend them to be sanctioned by the people, will prevent either of those propositions from being incorporated in the constitution.—We have got to make up our minds as to what the people want and desire, and as to what will be the effect of each proposition. If I had pledged myself upon this act of 1833 and the open clause, I would have had a high road to this convention; but knowing the condition of the country, and the obligation the delegate would be under to consult the interests and feelings and wishes of the whole state, I was unwilling, and refused to make a pledge on the subject, and I had difficulties in the way. And though we may have difficulties in the way in relation to the constitution that we may make, if we come together in the right spirit of concession, to carry out what the people of Kentucky designed in calling this convention, I doubt not we shall unite and frame an instrument that will be acceptable to them.

Mr. Chairman, I will add no more, for I have no doubt that every delegate has made up his mind, and I do not expect that any one will forbear giving his full and free views upon the subject. And it is right and proper that he should do so. I call upon those who favor constitutional reform, to look steadily at the difficulties to be encountered if we incorporate the proposition of either one gentleman or the other in the constitution. Something is to be left to the legislature of the country, the representatives of the people. I only desire to lay the foundation of this government in justice and wisdom, leaving the representatives of the people to carry it out.

Mr. DIXON. When the gentleman from Madison, yesterday, rose in his place, and announced to this convention that he was an ultra pro-slavery man, I thought it altogether just to him, that whatever misunderstanding I might have come to from listening to his remarks, delivered on Wednesday, should be corrected. I very promptly stated to the gentleman that I retracted any remarks which had been made by me calculated to do him injustice on that point. The gentleman, I have no doubt at all, is in feeling a pro-slavery man, but that is not the question he has offered to us to settle or discuss in this convention. His motives and feelings, he says, are with us; and for my own part, I have charity enough to allow that such is the fact. But the great question is, what is the tendency of the proposition he has submitted, and what are its effects upon the slaveholding interests of Kentucky; and upon that question I design submitting a few remarks before I have taken my seat.

The gentleman's proposition in substance is, that a citizen of Kentucky shall not purchase slaves out of the State for his own use.

Mr. Chairman, there are three classes of persons in the State of Kentucky, and in the United States, who are the advocates of the proposition of the gentleman from Madison. There is a powerful party outside of Kentucky who are the advocates of his proposition. There are a great many persons in Kentucky who are pro-slavery men, and the advocates of his proposition. There are in the State of Kentucky a great many gentlemen who are of the emancipation party, and the advocates of his proposition. The gentleman from Madison belongs to that class of the people of Kentucky, who, although pro-slavery men, believe it to be right and proper that the measure he presents to the house should be incorporated in the constitution of the State. The gentleman is influenced by one motive, such as he describes to this convention; the other gentlemen are influenced by different motives, such as will finally result in the emancipation of the slave. There is a powerful party, not in Kentucky, looking most anxiously to the deliberations of this body, and who are most anxious that there should be some lodgment in the constitution on which they may build their hopes of ultimately bringing the state to emancipation. There is a powerful party in the state looking anxiously to the deliberations of this body, and trusting to see some provision in the constitution which will be, to use the language of my friend from Mason, the entering wedge for a great system of emancipation. This is the classification of parties.

Under the constitution of the United States, those who live outside of Kentucky and who inhabit what we call the free states, are under the most solemn obligations, whenever slaves belonging to Kentucky, or any other state, shall take refuge within their limits, to return them safely to their owners, or to aid and assist at least, in surrendering them up to those entitled to their services. There is a party in the United States who regard that great principle in the constitution as null and void, and who consider they have a right to set themselves up in violation of it, and nullify it. That party is denominated the abolition party, and they are uniting with all parties who seek the emancipation of the slaves within the limits of the slave states.—I do not mean to say that the emancipationists of Kentucky are in any respect abolitionists, because I can clearly perceive that a difference exists in principle; but I do mean to say that the results of the action of those who term themselves emancipationists, and those who proclaim themselves abolitionists, are in effect the same; I do mean to charge on the gentleman from Madison, that this proposition of his, is one of a great series, which if carried into full effect will finally result in the emancipation of all the slaves in this state. All are acting together, and all their measures are tending to the same result.

Let us for a moment examine this great question, and see whether such is not the fact. An effort is making to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. Why is it? It is that there may be a place of refuge for the slaves to flee to, from the service of their masters; that there may be a place where the constitution of the United States imposes no obligations upon the citizens to surrender any slave who has escaped from his owners. There is an effort in the Congress of the United States to abolish slavery, so far as it may exist within such places within the limits of the slave states, over which Congress may exercise exclusive jurisdiction—within the limits of all docks, and arsenals, and places of that description. What is the object of it? It is to provide a place of refuge for the slave when he shall flee from his owner. There is a party to be found within the limits of every free state utterly opposed to passing any laws, or to the enforcement of any laws, by which the slave shall be restored to the possession of his owner. Did we not see but a short time since, the state of Ohio repealing all laws, the object of which was, to assist the master in reclaiming his runaway slaves? Do we not in addition to all this, see that the very courts have set themselves up within the limits of these free states to assist in the escape of the slave from his master. But a short time since, one of the courts in the state of New York decided, that if the owner of a slave used any force whatever in his attempt to recover him, it should be regarded as a forfeiture of the slave. And if the owner of a slave, exercising his sound discretion, should place him within the precincts of a jail for greater safety, it should be regarded as the forfeiture of his right to the slave. All this was done to break down the institution of slavery within the limits of the slave states. That is the object and design. Now what does all this tend to? In the first place, the runaway slave from Kentucky, finds a refuge in those places, in which it is declared by act of Congress, that slavery shall no longer exist; and secondly, in the protection of those who are determined, in violation of the constitution of the United States, to aid the slaves in escaping from their masters.

And you find, sir, that even the people themselves, under the sanction of law, formed themselves into bands for the purpose of enabling slaves to escape. Now, all these things are calculated to weaken the tenure by which slave property is held, and to render that kind of property less secure. This is the course pursued by those outside of the limits of Kentucky.—Now let us come to the state itself and see what is the course that gentlemen, anxious for the emancipation of the slaves, are pursuing. First, there are those who are for emancipating the slaves without making any compensation to their owners. This is rather a startling proposition, and I say it with all due deference to the great mind who conceived it. That emancipation should take place upon the slave's attaining a certain age, and that he should then be hired out for three years, and that the proceeds of his labor should be applied to his transportation to such place as might be chosen as his future home. It is a very great question—I mean the question which the distinguished gentleman from Louisville has argued with great ability as to the power of the State of Kentucky to take from her citizens—for I take it for granted, the right of property in slaves is the same as the right to any other sort of property—to take from her citizens the property that is secured to them under the sanction of the constitution of the state. The first great question is, as to the power of the government of the state to do this. Does that power exist? Is it within the power of the state to take the property of her citizens and appropriate it to the public use without making any compensation for it? This is the great and important question. Sir, what is the relation which exists in Kentucky between the master and the slave? How does it exist? Was it not an agreement among those who formed the old constitution under which we are now living, that the master should enjoy the labor of his slave? And if there be this solemn agreement existing between the sovereign power of Kentucky and the citizens of Kentucky, can that agreement be violated? The gentleman from Louisville read from the constitution in reference to this great question; I will barely call the attention of this convention again to it:

"No person shall, for the same offence, be twice put in jeopardy of his life or limb; nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use, without the consent of his representatives and without just compensation being previously made to him."

That is the great point; nor shall any man's property be taken for public use without his consent, or without compensation being made to him. What is the manifest interpretation of this? Is it not an agreement between the sovereign power of Kentucky and the people of the State? What is that agreement? That the people shall not be deprived of their property, without compensation being made to them.—Now, if this be so, what is the tendency of the proposition of the gentleman, or at least the argument of the gentleman? It is, that this solemn agreement shall be disregarded. But admitting that you have the power to violate this agreement, ought such a power to be exercised? I deny that we have the power to pass any law, whether in convention or in the legislature, by which the solemn contract contained in the constitution, securing the rights of property to the citizen shall be violated. What is the language of the constitution of the United States?

"No state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract."

This is the emphatic language of the constitution of the United States; not that no legislature shall do so, but no state shall. What do we propose now to do? To pass a law violating the solemn contract between a sovereign State and its citizens. I beg to refer gentlemen to a judicial decision given by that illustrious man, chief justice Marshall, and I apprehend that after referring to it, there can scarcely be a doubt remaining on the mind of any gentlemen here, that the state of Kentucky has not the power to take from the citizen the property that is vested in him under the constitution; and it is upon this point that I differ from my honorable friend from Louisville. The case to which I refer is that of Fletcher vs. Peck.

Sir, we are citizens of two great sovereignties.

We are not only citizens of Kentucky but we are citizens of the United States. Kentucky is a sovereignty, but she is not an absolute sovereignty. She is laboring under disabilities, and one of those disabilities is, that she cannot pass a law impairing any contract. And that is the ground upon which the former chief justice of the United States—I mean chief justice Marshall—places this great question. In a case growing out of a suit for lands in the state of Georgia, in which land had been granted by the state to a citizen of that state, when the party held under a grant from the governor of the state which was issued in pursuance of an act of the Assembly, but which was abrogated by a subsequent act of the Assembly, chief justice Marshall, in pronouncing the decision of the court, used this language. "The sovereign power of a state is not precluded from making a contract with a citizen of the state; and having made such contract, is not the sovereign power of the state under the same disability to violate that contract that the citizen is placed under?" The conclusion at which he arrived was, that the disability in both cases was the same and that it was out of the power of the state of Georgia, after she had granted lands to a citizen of the state to divest the citizen of his title. Now this is the great question presented here. Has the state the power to divest the citizen of his right to property which is guaranteed to him by the constitution of the state? I maintain boldly that she has not the power. In the first place I do not believe that the power exists, and in the second place, I believe that it would be a fraud upon the citizen if attempted to be exercised. The citizen rests upon the guarantee of the right of property that is contained in the constitution, and if the state seizes upon his property and converts it to the public use, it at once sinks the character of the government to the level of dishonesty. But there is another great question. If the power does exist, would it be right and proper that it be exercised? What do you propose to do? To strike out a great principle which lies at the foundation of free government, that principle which has agitated the whole of Europe, which agitated England to its foundation and elicited the great charter of the people's rights, called magna charta, that great principle which lies at the foundation of the liberties of this country. It was the determination of England on the one hand to seize the property of her subjects unlawfully, and the resistance of the colonists on the other, that led to the establishment of our free institutions. It is a principle that has been consecrated by blood, and which never will be forfeited by those who desire to preserve their freedom. It is a principle that is incorporated in the constitution of the United States, and one which enters into the organization of all the state governments of this Union. What will be the consequence of abrogating this principle? What will be the consequence of permitting it to be understood, that Kentucky in her sovereign capacity can take away the property of her citizens? Let this once be proclaimed abroad throughout the free states—let it be understood that the refuse of the population of every country on the face of the earth, may come here, and help to swell the majority whose vote may take away the property of the citizen—let it go to the pauper population of Ireland and of Germany, and all other countries where misery walks abroad unprotected, and here they will come, form themselves into voters and employ their votes to deprive the honest citizen of the property that he has gathered by a long life of toil. This will be the result of striking out of the constitution this sacred guarantee that a man's property shall not be taken away from him, without compensation first being made to him. Let us examine a little further this project of emancipation. I maintain that it cannot be done. Yet there are others who hold that it can. Let us trace it a little further. All the slaves are to be made free, and after having served for three years, are to be sent to Liberia, and the expense of their removal to be defrayed from the products of those three year's labor. What in the name of heaven will become of them then? From eight to ten thousand negroes sent from the state of Kentucky to a distant shore, without the means of providing for themselves when they arrive there! And all this in the name of humanity, of justice, of liberty! They are to be torn from their families, the husbands separated from their wives, the parent from the children, all the associations of life broken up, thrown upon a distant shore without any means of support except six months provisions. What will become of them when those six months have expired? Ten thousand people sent to a foreign country, the wild and the vicious, the weak and impotent, the old and dying, the lazy and the idle, the vagabond and the pauper, mingled together in one common mass, what will be their condition when you have got them there? Will they have houses to shelter them? None. Lands to cultivate? None. Implements of husbandry? None, nothing but six month's provision, and after that, starvation, ruin, desolation staring them in the face, meeting them at the very threshold of their new home. This is the plan of those who are the advocates of this system of emancipation. Sir, it cannot be done. It will not, ought not to be done.

But again, let us examine another plan. It is that of a distinguished gentleman of Kentucky, who proclaimed it as the firm conviction of his judgment that this system of keeping the negro race in bondage ought not to be continued. That humanity and religion call aloud for its suppression. What is his plan? Why, that all, after arriving at a particular age, shall be free, and unless taken from the State before that time they shall be transported to Liberia.

Do the teachings of humanity instruct you that it would be right to sever the relation which exists between me and my servants, and between them and all that is dear to them? Yet all this, the gentleman says, is consistent with his ideas of religion and humanity. Sir, it is utterly impracticable. It would be a violation of all the great principles of humanity, and the country itself, unless it sink far below the standard of religion and humanity, which I have attributed to it, will never sanction such a proceeding. All these plans may be regarded as impracticable, and have been abandoned. And what have we next? A convention assembled in Frankfort for the purpose of devising some new mode of emancipation. And what is the plan that was proposed there? Why give us some principle in the constitution by which all further importation of slaves into the state shall be prevented. And let not gentlemen, who are in favor of that proposition in this convention, suppose that I attribute to them any participation in the designs of the emancipationists. But concede to them the open clause and the gentleman's proposition, and the question will be agitated at all times hereafter; you will weaken the tenure by which slaves are held, and induce the master to fly with his slaves to a place where he will be more secure in the enjoyment of his property. And a further result will be, that we shall have no slaves brought into Kentucky. The effect will be, as every body must at once perceive, that no one would think of removing to Kentucky, except from those states where it has been determined that slavery shall no longer exist. Virginians and Carolinians will not come here. The only person that will come, will be those who are in the habit of agitating the question of emancipation, and they will continue to agitate until the people become alarmed, and some will leave the state, while the rest will be anxious to get rid of a species of property that is held by an uncertain tenure.

In regard to the plan of the gentleman from Madison, do we not see that it is one of a series, the tendency of which is, toward the final emancipation of all the slaves? He says, let no man be permitted to go abroad and purchase slaves, and bring them into this State, for his own use. I am as much opposed to dealing in human flesh as any man can be, but there is a solemn obligation resting upon me, as well as upon every man, to aid in carrying out the laws of the country. The gentleman's proposition is, that we shall not bring slaves into Kentucky from any foreign state, for our own use.—Now you will see at once the effect of this, if it has any effect.

According to the position assumed by the gentleman from Madison, another effect of engrafting into the constitution his proposition, would be to enhance the value of the slaves already in the State, and of securing to a few the monopoly of slave labor. Admitting this to be correct, it is clear that the tendency of the gentleman's measure would be to excite in the mind of the non-slaveholder, a prejudice against those for whose benefit alone the institution of slavery would seem to have been established, and to array him with those who are interested in bringing about a system of emancipation. But the effect of the principle would not stop here. It would be disregarded by a large portion of the people of the State. Those who chose to go to Virginia and Maryland and purchase slaves for their own use would not be held responsible, for no law can or will be enforced to which the public sentiment of the country is opposed. It is true that the conscientious portion of the community would not violate it, but the unscrupulous would not hesitate to do so. Many good and honest citizens who wish to purchase slaves for their own use, would not act in contravention of the constitution, and would prefer purchasing from those who have them in market, where they would be left by the negro traders, men who purchase for speculation and without regard to the character of the slaves. The vilest description of slaves, those who had been guilty of crimes probably, would be brought into Kentucky, because they could be purchased at a low rate by the speculator with the prospect of obtaining a high price here. Allow the honest farmer, who wishes to go abroad and purchase slaves for his own use, to do so, and the case will be far different. He will be cautious in the selection he makes, and will bring in only such as have good characters for honesty and industry.

Those who call themselves emancipationists ought to understand what that effect is. They wish to incorporate into the constitution of Kentucky what is called the open clause. I am not for giving them any such advantage. Give us, say they, an entering wedge, and when you do that we will split the timber in such a way as will suit our own views. I am not for giving them that advantage. The gentleman's proposition then, taken in connection with open clause, if it amounts to any thing, will have a tendency to lead to emancipation.—I feel bound then, to oppose it at the very threshold. I shall oppose it here and every where. If the gentleman wishes to place it upon the statute book, let him place it there. I do not want it here—it is one of that series of plans which are expected to result in emancipation.

Sir, I do not mean to say here or elsewhere, that I am the advocate of perpetual slavery. As I remarked yesterday, I would to God that it were possible for all mankind to be free. If in my power, I would break the shackles that bind the most low and contemptible being that crawls on the face of the earth. But we must look at the condition of society in Kentucky, as it is. Sir, you cannot dignify the African race by emancipating them, you cannot raise them to your own level, you cannot give them the civil rights of freemen, you cannot elect them to fill the civil offices of the government. You cannot bring your manumitted slave to your fire-side and to your table, you cannot introduce him to the social circle with your family, you cannot allow him to enjoy with you those privileges which fall alike to the humblest and the most exalted of your own race, and when you proclaim that the shackles of the slave are broken, when you have said to him, "you are free," what is the advantage that you confer upon him? Is it to breathe the pure air of heaven, is it to drink from the limpid stream which is free to all, is it to walk abroad and proclaim his new-born liberty? Sir, when you fail to give him the civil rights of freemen, degradation follows him wherever he goes. He sinks in the scale of humanity far below the slave who now excites the sympathies of gentlemen. Cut him off from all the privileges of a participation in the affairs of government, and you take away from him the inducement to be honest, you drive him to a violation of the law; he becomes a robber and a vagabond; he becomes a man of crime. This will be his condition; it cannot be avoided.—What then are we to do with him? If we convey him from the State, will his condition then be improved? Here he has house and raiment; here he has no wants that are not supplied. Sir, he is a happy man, infinitely better off than the miserable, wretched vagabonds, the pauper population of other States and countries, whom you call free. Will the gentleman tell me that the system of laws which is to sink him below the brute and deprive him of all the privileges that belong to freemen, which will shut him out from human society and render him a robber and a man of blood, is the proper system? Will he not rather tell me that the system of laws which bind the master to the slave and the slave to the master, is much better than any theory of government that the visionary minds of the emancipationists have or can devise? Sir, there is no doubt in my mind as to what would be the effect of such a theory. It would be ruin to the slave, and ruin to the master. That sir would be the ultimate and certain result. My own opinion is, that in view of the relation which exists in Kentucky between master and slave, considering the abhorrence on the part of the white population at establishing an equality between themselves and the blacks, it is better that the institution should be continued. Contrast the condition of our slaves with that of the pauper population in other countries. Here, the master protects his slaves; there, the man exists in a state of destitution, and is unprotected, his wants unrelieved except by the cold charities which the law metes out to him in stinted and parsimonious portions. Go to the populous cities, and there in the midst of profusion, wretchedness and misery stare you in the face. Magnificent palaces present themselves to the eye, while the needy mendicant goes unrelieved by the lordly occupant. What is it to him who revels in those palaces, and enjoys the wealth of a John Jacob Astor, that thousands of his fellow creatures perish with hunger? It is by oppression, that a great system of aristocracy is created. It is reared upon the ruin of the miserable population who are falling prostrate at the feet of power. Cast your eyes upon the wretched and starving population of Ireland, and do you not hear the wretched and suffering child crying to the mother, "give me but three grains of corn." Are such scenes witnessed in Kentucky? Where is the pauper who does not meet with the sympathies of those around him? Where is the man, who is suffering with want, who is not relieved? Rarely does an instance of real want present itself under the benevolent system of our government.—Such cases do not exist. We are the happiest people on the face of the earth, and we are the proudest people on the face of the earth. I will not say that we are the most chivalrous people, but I will say, that in this respect we are not surpassed.

There is no reason, in my judgment, why the relation between master and slave should be severed. I do not think it ever will be. It ought not to be until a plan can be devised, by which the condition of the slave can be improved, and no injustice done to the master. I would give up my slaves willingly, if such a plan could be devised, but I shall not yield them up under the false systems of philanthropy and humanity which the wild fanaticism of those who call themselves emancipationists propose. I have no right to murder my slave. I have no right to do him wrong. The principles of philanthropy, of religion, and of law, forbid it. And I utterly abhor and detest the system of philanthropy which proposes the sacrifice of the slave for the benefit of the white man. And yet these gentlemen tell me, that humanity and religion require the sacrifice. I should not like to be the priest of such an oracle, nor would I be the priest to preside at the altar of such a sacrifice.

Mr. IRWIN. I shall detain the committee but a very few moments, for I am sure that there is no gentleman who attempts to address the committee, who requires more of the indulgence of the house. As I am not much in the habit of public speaking, my rising to do so is attended with some degree of nervousness.

I should not on to-day have said a single word if it had not been for the remarks, which fell from our honorable President, and if I am to fall in this contest, I would prefer to fall by his hand rather than by that of a more ignoble foe. He insinuated that those who are in favor of the law of 1833, to some extent were attaching themselves to the emancipation party in the state, and that the object of that attachment, was to bring about the defeat of the constitution which we are about to make. Now I have ever opposed this convention, and upon no other ground in the world than that I believed that this question of emancipation would be brought up. But this is not only a great question in Kentucky, but it is becoming a paramount question every where, and it seems to me, that the movement, not only here but throughout the whole Union is calculated to build up a great party which is to operate upon the future elections in this country. Have we not seen lately one of the most distinguished personages in the United States, permitting himself to be a candidate for the Presidency of this Union, surely with no hope of success, but that he might form a nucleus around which the free soil party or abolitionists of the north might gather. Have you not seen very lately a distinguished Senator in Missouri taking the same ground, not now "solitary and alone." And again, we have seen a distinguished Senator from Kentucky, whom I have ever admired and for whom I have voted, and for whose success I have felt a deeper interest than for that of any other politician, coming forward and attaching his name to the emancipation movement in our own state. And I fear that I may live to see the day when these distinguished Senators will be found fighting under the same banner. I believe that the emancipation movement in Kentucky has been mainly brought about by a union of the emancipationists and the democracy with the office seekers. It is true, the emancipationists of this country never opened their mouths upon the subject until it was decided that this convention should be called; but the very moment the call of the convention was decided upon, they did open their mouths, and had unfortunately the sanction of the name of the distinguished individual I have alluded to. But even with his potent name and influence they have failed to elect one single delegate to this convention.

What, you may ask me, was the object of the democratic party in attaching themselves to the emancipation party? I do not say they did so for the purpose of advancing the interest of the emancipation party, but mainly for the purpose of advancing their own interest. They knew very well, that unless they could create new issues, they never could get a majority, but from the time of calling the convention up to its meeting, the democracy have determined to seize upon all the popular points and principles to be inserted in the new constitution, to give themselves the ascendancy. The son of a very distinguished gentleman has said that whiggery and democracy were demolished, that those parties never could again exist in these United States. I firmly believe the remark to be true. Will not the democracy and emancipationists unite, and if they do so unite, may they not engraft principles in the new constitution which may cause it to be rejected. This discussion has arisen upon a single proposition. What is that proposition? That the principle of the law of 1833 shall be engrafted upon the new constitution, and the gentleman from Louisville, our distinguished President, has voted for the passage of that law in 1833, that he regarded it as correct in principle. And now forsooth, he is willing to abandon it. Why? Not because it is bad in principle, but because the popular will has been indicated by the last legislature, and he yields to popular will rather than to his own convictions of right and wrong. Does he abandon it then to become the leader of the pro-slavery party in Kentucky? Perhaps it does not become me to say that he desires to become the leader of the pro-slavery party, but new issues are to be seized upon, which will advance the interests of the party of which the gentleman is a distinguished member.

I think gentlemen have lashed themselves into a great fury upon a proposition simply to engraft the principle of the law of 1833. But with due deference to the gentlemen, their arguments have had but little to do with it. It seems to me that the question is simply, will the engrafting of the principle of the law of 1833 upon the new constitution, advance the interest of the emancipationists. If I believed it would, I would be the last man to sanction it. But I do not believe it. That law has been upon the statute book for sixteen years, and has the emancipation party accomplished any thing? Have they succeeded in electing a single delegate to this convention? They have not. Then why not incorporate the principle of the law of 1833, since it has not advanced their interest? There have been immense changes in reference to this matter. The people of the part of the country which I in part represent, have been uniformly in favor of the repeal of that law, and the people in the north part of the state have been opposed to such repeal. The gentleman says he voted against its repeal, but he objects to the incorporation of its principle into the new constitution, not because the principle is bad, but because public sentiment has changed. I think the gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that public sentiment has changed. How will the incorporation of that principle be an entering wedge by which the interest of the emancipation party will be subserved?

The present slave population in Kentucky amounts to about two hundred thousand—the annual increase of which alone amounts to about six thousand. I venture to predict that this natural increase will, in twenty years, increase the slave population in Kentucky to three hundred and fifty thousand. And I ask, will not that be an increase of the slave population quite as large as the gentleman desires? Do gentlemen wish to bring in more slaves? Why? Is it that every gentleman shall have an opportunity to have a slave for his own use? The gentleman from Henry remarked that unless they were the sons of nabobs, there was no use in going to Virginia to get them. I would say to gentlemen, that in many instances, it would be better if none of us had one. I regard them as no blessing. From the speeches of gentlemen, you would suppose their was some proposition to bring about gradual emancipation. There surely is nothing of that sort proposed. When this constitution goes before the people, if the law of 1833 shall be incorporated in it, it will be seized upon by the demagogues of the country, and it will be represented by them that we have formed a constitution which will deprive the people of the privilege of purchasing negroes out of the State for their own use, when in truth and in fact there are slaves enough in Kentucky for all practical purposes. I honestly believe that if this principle be incorporated in the constitution, the emancipation party, seeing their position, that Kentucky is bound to adhere to the south and to southern institutions, you will never hear one word of complaint in reference to this proposition again. So far from producing disturbance or disquietude, I firmly and honestly believe it will give peace and happiness and quiet to the whole country.

There have been some singular positions taken by the gentleman from Henderson, and I will make a single remark in reference to one or two of them. He very benevolently desires that foreigners shall have equal privileges with natives in the exercise of the elective franchise. This may be right. He would make no invidious distinctions, as proposed by the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon (Mr. Davis,) but I infer from his argument that if the negroes may be permitted to be brought in, the consequence of which is the foreigners will be kept out. This is a very strange position. By what logic can he reconcile it? Again, he says you cannot elevate the negro—you cannot bring him to your fire sides—you can't make him Governor—he has no incentives to be an honest man, and he has no incentive to work. Yet his argument is in favor of bringing in more of this unfortunate race, a consequence of which will be that foreigners will be kept out, against whom no such disabilities obtain. This is not the time to discuss which would be the best policy, to bring in more negroes or foreigners. That will be a contest more appropriate to the gentleman from Bourbon and Macduff himself. But it seems to me that if the gentleman from Henderson shall be able to reconcile the principles which he has asserted to day, he will be compelled to vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon. For myself, when the proper time arrives, I shall vote for the incorporation of the principle of the law of 1833. I did so in committee, and did not agree with the report of the committee on slavery, in some of its most important provisions. I was for incorporating the 7th section of the present constitution, exactly as it is with the exception that free negroes shall be sent out of the commonwealth, believing that that principle and the law of 1833 would give universal satisfaction.

In conclusion, it is my determination to adhere to the south and to southern institutions, whatever change may be produced by party changes in Kentucky or elsewhere. I regard the preservation of the Union itself as being dependent upon the maintenance of southern interests and southern institutions.

Mr. DIXON. The gentleman says he does not see how I can reconcile the two propositions—the one contained in the resolution which I had the honor to offer on the subject of naturalized citizens, and the proposition which I make here, that it would be wrong for a bare majority to take away a man's property. I do not intend to assert that a bare majority ought to have the right to take away a man's property. I do not mean to admit that principle; nor do I mean to admit the principle, that the citizens of Kentucky, together with naturalized foreigners have the right by their votes, to take away the property of citizens. I would give to naturalized citizens the same rights that are enjoyed by the natural born citizens; but I would deny, in both cases, the right of a mere majority to deprive the citizen of his property.

Mr. NUTTALL moved that the committee rise and report progress.

The motion was agreed to and leave was granted to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 13, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. GEORGE W. BRUSH.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE offered the following:

Resolved, That the committee on the miscellaneous provisions of the constitution be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing and requiring the legislature to change the punishment, now prescribed by law, for felonies, other than murder or rape, committed by persons of color, to that of expatriation, or to the forfeiture of liberty and sale into bondage.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I desire to submit a resolution of inquiry in relation to free negroes to one of the committees. I think, from what we have heard expressed here, that all sides would be very glad to get clear of them from Kentucky. I have devoted some reflection to the subject and to the various expedients suggested to attain that object, as well as its connection with our relations as a state arising under the federal constitution. I propose, as a subject of inquiry, for the committee on miscellaneous provisions, the propriety of substituting, in lieu of the punishment now imposed on that class of people for crimes other than murder, the penalty of exportation, or of being sold again into bondage. I think it is worthy of inquiry; and it strikes me, if it has no other effect, it will at least have the tendency of keeping this class of persons out of the state; and it may be the means of inducing others to leave it voluntarily. It is a subject worthy of inquiry, and I offer it in that shape.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN offered the following, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on education be requested to prepare and report a clause or provision for the new, or amended, constitution, securing the present school fund, together with the proceeds under an act of the late legislature, entitled "an act for the benefit of common schools," as a permanent and perpetual school fund, applying the interest of said fund, invariably, to the establishment and encouragement of common schools throughout the state, and prohibiting the passage of any law by the legislature, authorizing the use of said fund for any other purpose than the use and encouragement of common schools.

SLAVERY.

The convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. BARLOW in the chair, and resumed the consideration of Mr. Turner's resolutions which were undisposed of when the committee rose yesterday.

Mr. NUTTALL was entitled to the floor and he spoke as follows:

The opinions of this convention, as indicated by this discussion, seem to be divided into three classes. The gentleman from Madison, who I have no doubt will have some followers here, desires to incorporate into the constitution the law of 1833. The proposition which I had the honor to introduce is directly antagonistical to his. It proposes to allow the citizen of Kentucky, who in good faith goes to a foreign state and buys a slave for his own use, to bring him here. There is another class of pro-slavery men on this floor who entertain a different opinion from both of us; and that is, that we should leave the clause in the present constitution as it now stands, with a small emendation to the effect that persons in this state shall have the power to emancipate their slaves, providing at the same time for sending them beyond the limits of the commonwealth.

The motion of the honorable President of this body, if it prevails, effectually destroys the proposition of the gentleman from Madison as well as my own, and leaves open for discussion, the proposition to which he referred so ably in his remarks. I am not tenacious of any opinion that I entertain on this subject. I am not satisfied myself, that I am right. But I believe for all wise purposes, that in all probability, the proposition which I had the honor to introduce, is the best for the country; though as I before remarked, I am not certain of the fact. The great object of this convention in my opinion should be to build up a constitution, that will be most acceptable to the people of Kentucky, and that will tend to quiet agitation upon every subject embraced in it. There is danger, I confess, great danger, that the friends of constitutional reform, in elaborating and framing an organic law for the people of the commonwealth, will do too much, will run too far into detail.

With regard to the organic law of Kentucky, and the reformations that we should make, there are almost as many opinions in the country as there are faces. There is no earthly doubt of this, and there is great danger that the friends of reform will burthen the result of their labors with too much matter, and that when we submit it to the people for their judgment and verdict upon it, we shall have multiplied so many objectors to it, that if they coalesce the constitution is sure to be rejected.

I am entirely satisfied that if the gentleman from Madison succeeds in engrafting upon any constitution we may frame, the law of 1833, it will fall. That such will certainly be its fate, I have no doubt. I never did, I never can bring myself to question the motive of any gentleman on this floor. I think they came here as pure minded and as clear of guile as I came myself, and I have no doubt that his conduct on this occasion is superinduced by an ardent patriotism and devotion to the best interests of his country. But the question is not, what good purpose the incorporation of that clause will subserve, but whether it will secure certainly for the constitution, when framed with that clause in it, the approval of the judgment and the sober understanding of the people of this commonwealth. That is the question—whether it will have that effect, or whether it will have a contrary one. I oppose the principle involved in the provision, and even if it was abstractly right, it is one to which I would never subscribe. What is it? It is, that slavery, as it now exists in Kentucky, and to the extent to which it exists, is well enough, is right, and he is not disposed to interfere with it; that it is the source of great wealth; that it aids in the agriculture of the country, and adds to the revenue of the government; but that all those who are blessed with this description of property now, are to retain possession of it, and it is not to be increased by artificial means hereafter. Now, upon two grounds, I am in favor of a different plan. I oppose, and shall ever oppose while I entertain the views I do, the principle of conferring especial immunities upon one class of citizens. And you might as well do it at once, by legislative enactment, as to say that what the citizen now possesses he shall retain, and throw around it the additional safeguard, that no man shall hereafter hold that description of property unless he becomes able to purchase it from those who now enjoy it, and who indeed may be unwilling to sell it. Such is the effect if you prohibit the citizen from going elsewhere to get this description of property, at the best possible price—of whom he chooses. I oppose it upon another ground. It will be recollected that five black men in Kentucky are equal to three white men in another state. They may say as much as they please outside of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and in the non-slaveholding states, upon this subject, but if five of our black men amount to as much as three of their white men, I am perfectly satisfied. And with regard to our future strength and weight in the councils of the nation, if you consult the future growth, and strength, and greatness of the commonwealth of Kentucky, every avenue that can be opened for the introduction of this property, save for the purpose of merchandise, ought to be opened for this object. Are gentlemen willing, when they have seen this great struggle arising all around us in the non-slaveholding states, to consult merely their own wishes, their feelings, and views, when thereby we weaken our future growth and strength? I think that this is a strong reason why the law of 1833 should never be incorporated in the organic law of this state.

Now if it was there incorporated, does the gentleman suppose, for a single moment, that it will quiet agitation upon the slave question and upon the question of emancipation? It will not do it. My reading has taught me it is always best to defend the outposts, and never be driven to the defence of the citadel while we have a chance to meet the enemy at the threshold. And if our political adversaries have come and placed themselves on what is said to be the platform adopted by the original convention men, I can only say that, for one, whenever I see my enemy ranging himself under my standard, I begin to doubt whether I am sailing under the right kind of colors.

Now my proposition, which will, in effect, be destroyed, if that of the honorable President of the convention succeeds, I think will not only secure to these men the rights they now enjoy under the constitution of Kentucky, but will quiet agitation. What will the emancipationists have to gain by further agitation? What can they do on this subject? They can do nothing unless they are willing to take the high and responsible ground, when the majority of their countrymen, in one of the most triumphant votes that has ever been given on any subject, have voted them down, of continuing to agitate the same question. Are they still going on to agitate the subject? Are they about to assume the character of those incendiaries who are willing, at all times and under all circumstances, to light the torch of civil war here, which will result in the burning of our houses, and in the bedewing of our hearth-stones with the blood of our wives and children? It is right and proper that every man in the commonwealth of Kentucky—no matter what his creed, faith, or notions in religion or politics on this subject may be—when the majority have voted him down, should, as a good citizen, submit to their decision.

Now for myself, I have set out with the determination never to yield one single inch to any spirit of fanaticism; because whenever you concede them any ground, they will be sure to desire to go one step further and occupy a more prominent position. My proposition is intrinsically right in itself. It secures to all grades, and conditions in life, if they have the means of purchasing this kind of property, the right to do so whenever they choose. In a mood of merriment which often comes over me, and perhaps too often for my own good, I happened the other day to refer to the fact that some gentlemen were exceedingly lucky, but that the class in which I was born and raised, and in which I hope to die, have never been so fortunate. We make no calculation, as I remarked on that occasion, to have any of this kind of property come down to us by descent, by gift, and least of all, by marriage. If some gentlemen are so fortunate, or rather unfortunate as to have the opportunity of marrying some four or five times, and every time marrying negroes by the acre, it has not yet, and I trust in God it never will fall to my lot. Of all things on the earth, a mercenary marriage is the most detestable in the sight of God, and the holy angels that cluster around the throne of Heaven. I certainly do not expect to acquire property in this way.

Now if a man who pursues agriculture, a working man—after he has made money enough and when he and his helpmate have clambered up the hill of life and are ready to descend on the other side—should desire to buy some one to wait upon him in his old age, is it not right that he should have the privilege of doing it at the cheapest possible rate? I know a great many hard working men in this state, my neighbors—and I have as good neighbors as any gentleman on this floor—who have expressed such a desire, and it is but right they should have the privilege of its gratification.

Now let me ask the slaveholders of this body, why it is that you see the non-slaveholder clinging around the institution of slavery in this country? There are various reasons why. They know from experience that somehow or other—but from what cause, perhaps I cannot tell—the character of a non-slaveholding man in a slave holding country, is elevated to the highest pitch and that he stands on the platform of universal equality with his neighbors, whether he owns slaves or not.

I recollect, during last summer to have seen a manifesto from the city of Louisville, the head quarters of abolitionism and emancipation—which was thrown out like a gilded bait to catch the non-slaveholding interest of the country—laying it down as an undeniable proposition that slavery was a curse to any country, and at the same time classifying the counties in the state, showing that the whole of it existed in but some eighteen or twenty counties, and that those on the frontiers had scarcely any slaves in them. They had two objects. Now it occurred to me that if slavery was this blighting mildew, if it was this mill stone which hung round our necks, they should have referred to the further fact, more undeniable even than any thing they have laid down, that right in the centre of Kentucky, we have the richest, the most intelligent, and the most patriotic people—not excluding our frontier brethren—on the face of the globe. And here where we have more slaves than in any other part of Kentucky, by ten to one, if it is such a curse, how does it happen, that under that curse, under that blighting curse, which blasts and pollutes every thing that it touches, we have the most enlightened, the richest, and the most cultivated people upon the face of God Almighty's earth. Yes, here, surrounded with this curse, this vast curse, this mountain, that would crush any other people and bear them down on the face of the earth, how does all this happen?

I can throw my recollection back to the period when from the town of New Castle to Shelbyville, there was scarcely a log cabin for the wayfarer to stop and slake his thirst. Now, there runs a continuous lane from my town to Shelbyville, and if a lady were riding by herself, she could not break herself a switch. On the one side the traveler sees the wheat-fields in harvest time groaning under the weight of their heavy yield, and on the other, the green pastures with their thousands of cattle. And all this right in the midst of this curse of slavery! It is all a mistake—slavery does not, will not, and cannot produce such a moral or physical degradation as gentlemen seem to imagine.

Well, as I said, I believe that my proposition is correct, but I am not fastidious upon the subject. I have asserted that slavery is not an evil, and I want rather more of it. If it is the thing I think it is, and if it works out such wonders in this country, as I perceive it does, I am willing to have rather more of it. And gentleman may pass laws either inviting this agitation or putting an end to it; but if every man here was an emancipationist, they could not, if they were so disposed, incorporate a clause in the constitution taking from me my right of ownership in the slaves. Let us try this question. I do conceive that the present constitution of Kentucky conferred upon the citizen unlimited and unrestricted rights, either as to time or any thing else, in his slave property. If that is the fact, then how could this convention, without impairing the obligations of contract, incorporate any clause in the constitution that would authorize the legislature to take the property of the slave owner without paying him a just compensation, or even then without his consent? Are there not many banks chartered in the commonwealth of Kentucky whose charters extend beyond the sitting of this convention or the period previous to the adoption of any constitution which we may frame, and is there any gentleman here who will attempt to assert that this convention has a right to say to those banks that their charters shall now expire, and that it shall depend upon the legislature, whether they shall be renewed? A gentleman gives me his note payable three years after date, and it falls due two years after this convention has adopted a constitution. Can this convention say that the bond shall be null and void? Would it not conflict with the provision of the federal constitution declaring that the state has no power to impair the obligation of contracts? I buy a negro from one of my neighbors. He conveys him to me by a bill of sale, and vests in me all the rights of property that incorporations can have vested in them by charter, or that you can vest in the obligee of a note by writing your obligation to him. And can your constitution set my negro free without my consent, whether it pays me or not? Would it not impair an obligation and seek to vitiate and render null by constitutional enactment, a vested right in me? Is not all this true?

Now I have given my views upon this question, and I shall not seek to elaborate them any further. I would like to know one thing before I sit down—perhaps I ought to leave the enquiry to other gentlemen on this floor—but I should like to know from my friend from Logan, when and how it was Mr. Clay became the great leader of the democratic party? Now, I never have said, in all my life, one word against the personal character of Mr. Clay, or made any vile or false accusation against him. I have looked upon him as one of the most stupendous intellects the world ever produced—as an orator, never equalled, and as a great man who has scarcely ever been surpassed. I have never admired but one kind of aristocracy, and that is of mind, and I have always been ready to render at all times homage where homage is due. The gentleman from Logan, who tried his hand in one county and could not quite come it, and went to another county and now has come into this convention, I think has attempted to reach over or around the shoulders of an old friend to stab his old political enemies. If such is his intention, I yield to him all the honor and pleasure of such a triumph. I myself have never in my life thrust around the side of my friend to stab or wound an enemy. It may be, and I think it is, true, that “Old Bullion,” in his old age and dotage, is seeking himself to become the great free-soil leader, and competes for that honor with both Mr. Clay and Mr. Van Buren. Mr. Clay, defeated, writes his bulletin on the field of battle, and seeks the north for the restoration of his health. Mr. Van Buren artfully pretends to be seeking to, heal the breach in the democratic party in New York, and yet, as I think, is all the while artfully tearing it asunder. Old Bullion, soldier as he is, and has been, standing alone among southern men, comes out and proclaims free-soilism, returns to Missouri, rolls up his sleeve and enters the thickest of the fight. I think it will be found that Old Bullion will head the great free-soil and whig party, with my friend from Logan right at their heels, in 1852. I know that the emancipationists of Kentucky say, and I suppose they will do it, that when this constitution is submitted to the people, they will unite with my friend from Logan, and others, to break it down. It is a great pity, I think, that this should be the case with so popular a gentleman, who, after trying it in one county and failing, can go to another county and come it after all. It was with great difficulty that I could come it at all. [Laughter.] Well, though he did do this thing, I think it a great misfortune to this convention that any anti-convention men were elected to this body at all—and I am afraid there are too many of them.

But let us unite and make the very best constitution that we possibly can. For myself, I am going to take the views of the elders of this church—of those men who understand this subject better than I do. I have my projects, and I have presented them for the consideration of this convention. If they vote them down it will be a matter of no regret to me. I want them but to do right; and when they satisfy me that they are doing right, I am going right along with them, hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder.

Mr. TALBOTT. On a former occasion I promised at some proper time to give my views upon a particular branch of the great subject of slavery, and I rise this morning, in obedience to that promise, for the purpose of redeeming that pledge. I do not indulge the hope that I shall deliver myself in a very happy and felicitous manner, nor do I expect to charm the members of this body by my eloquence, by my oratory, or by my rhetoric. But I intend to deliver my views in as brief and comprehensible manner as is possible. I do not expect, upon this or upon any occasion, to shed any light upon this or any other subject, and I rise not so much for the purpose of enlightening this assembly, upon this grave and important subject, as for the purpose of assigning a reason for occupying the position I do upon this subject.

I will now proceed to the investigation of this subject in a moral and religious point of view—I mean the question of slavery. And the first thing that will be necessary, will be to define, clearly and distinctly, the question to be proved, and the point at issue. And here permit me to remark that I will not attempt to prove; or to investigate the question, whether slavery as it exists in this state, or in any other state, is right or wrong, but whether slavery is right or wrong, consistent or inconsistent with the law of God, in this or any other country, or in this or any other age?—whether it is right for any individual, at this or any other time, under existing or any other circumstances, to hold property in man? That, sir, is the question.—And here I ask, what is the ground assumed by the opposition? I do this in order that we may have the true issue before us, in a manner so clear that no gentleman can misunderstand it. And as the delegate from Madison repudiates the sentiments which I understood him to have expressed, and which was the foundation of what I then said, and what I am now about to say—that slavery was wrong, and that the finger of God was upon and against it—I beg leave, to read a paragraph from what purports to be an address to the Presbyterians of Kentucky, for the instruction and emancipation of their slaves—by a committee of the Synod of Kentucky—and published in the Examiner, a paper which I believe is endorsed and patronized by the emancipation party, throughout the state. It reads as follows:

“We all admit that the system of slavery, which exists among us, is not right. Why then do we assist in perpetuating it? Why do we make no serious efforts to terminate it? Is it not because our perception of its sinfulness is very feeble and indistinct, while our perception of the difficulties of instructing and emancipating our slaves is strong and clear? As long as we believe that slavery, as it exists among us, is a light evil in the sight of God, so long will we feel inclined to pronounce every plan that can be devised for its termination, inexpedient or impracticable. Before, then, we unfold our plan, we wish to examine the system, and try it by the principles which religion teaches. If it shall not be thus proved to be an abomination in the sight of a just and holy God, we shall not solicit your concurrence in any plan for its abolition. But if, when fairly examined, it shall be seen to be a thing which God abhors, we may surely expect that no trifling amount of trouble or loss, will deter you from lending your efforts to its extermination.

“Slavery is not the same all the world over, and to ascertain its character in any particular state or country, we must examine the constituents and effects of the kind of slavery which there exists. The system as it exists among us, and is constituted by our laws, consists of three distinct parts—a deprivation of the right of property, a deprivation of personal liberty, and a deprivation of personal security. In all its parts it is, manifestly, a violation of the laws of God, as revealed by the light of nature, as well as the light of revelation."

It will be seen at once sir, that the ground assumed here is, that slavery is wrong in its institution and evil in its tendencies—a thing which God abhors—a sin in his sight, and in all its parts a violation of his law, a great moral evil, and as a matter of course, in all its tendencies and consequences, ruinous to the best interests of a state. If this be true sir, no man has a right to hold property in another, and no christian man should do it. I am a pro-slavery man sir, but convince me of the truth of this assumption, and I would at once renounce it all, and I would not let the sun go down upon my sin. I would give up my slaves, join the emancipationists, and help to pay for the balance. I would throw myself into the fight, and do battle for God and liberty. And what I am most surprised at is, that men who profess to believe all this, do not practice what they preach. If they would sir, they could then say to us with an uplifted front, "go and do likewise," or come and "go along with us and we will do thee good." But let us see if these things be so. Let us see if under the laws of God, as revealed in the Old and New Testaments, and as recorded in our old-fashioned family Bibles, a man may not own property in man—whether he may not, with money purchase slaves as we do here, and hold them forever, or for life, and still live in favor with God, or without committing a sin in his sight.

Just here sir, before I proceed farther in this investigation, I will remark, that as to the sinfulness of slavery, if any gentleman here or elsewhere, now or at any other time, will show me, in our old-fashioned family Bible, a solitary chapter, paragraph, or verse, which says that one man shall not purchase and own property in man, or that slavery in this form is a sin and abhorrent in the sight of God, I will give up the question. But if there is no law to be shown, there is none to violate; then there is no transgression, and consequently no sin—for there must be transgression before sin. This sir, I think settles the question as to the sin of slavery.

But let us look farther into a different branch of the subject. Let us see, if we can, when and how, and by what authority, slavery was first instituted. Turn sir, to the 9th chapter of Genesis, 24th verse, which reads as follows:

"24. And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done with him.

"25. And he said, cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren.

"26. And he said, blessed be the Lord God of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant.

"27. God shall enlarge Japhet, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant."

This sir, is the prophetic denunciation of Noah, on one branch of his family, spoken by the immediate inspiration of God, and has been fulfilled, and is now being fulfilled, as I think will be proven in the sequel, as clearly as history, reason, and revelation can go to prove any thing. Before I inquire into what the denunciation is, the first question arises, was Noah authorized to pronounce it. And here sir, I beg to read from Matthew Henry's notes on these verses:

"The spirit of prophecy comes upon him, and like the dying Jacob, he tells his sons what should befall them." ch. 49, v. 25.

And again sir, I beg leave to read from Bishop Newton, another standard work in all the churches:

"In consequence of this different behavior of his three sons, Noah as a patriarch was enlightened, and as the father of a family, who is to reward or punish his children, was empowered to foretell the different fortunes of their families; for this prophecy relates not so much to themselves, as to their posterity, the people and the nations descended from them. He was not prompted by wine or resentment, for neither the one nor the other could infuse the knowledge of futurity, or inspire him with the prescience of events, which happened hundreds, nay thousands of years afterwards. But God, willing to manifest his superintendence and government of the world, endued Noah with the spirit of prophecy, and enabled him in some measure, to disclose the purposes of his providence toward the future race of mankind."

From both of these authorities it appears, that Noah spoke, not as some have supposed, from the vindictive feelings of a drunken old man, but by the immediate inspiration of God. If this is true, then; what he said was right and proper, not contrary to, but in strict conformity with, the will of God. None, I presume will deny that the curse here pronounced was personal servitude, or slavery. Then sir, we have the curse of slavery pronounced on some one by the authority of God, and the question now is upon whom was it pronounced? And here sir, I beg leave to read from Newton on the prophecies, page 15:

"The curse of servitude pronounced upon Canaan, and so likewise the promise of blessing and enlargement made to Shem and Japheth, are by no means to be confined to their own persons, but extend to their whole race; as afterwards the prophecies concerning Ishmael, and those concerning Esau and Jacob, and those relating to the twelve patriarchs, were not so properly verified in themselves as in their posterity, and thither we must look for their full and perfect completion."

"Hitherto we have explained the prophecy according to the present copies of our bible; but if we were to correct the text, as we should any ancient classic author in a like case, the whole perhaps might be made easier and plain-er. Ham the father of Canaan is mentioned in the preceding part of the story; and how then came the person of a sudden to be changed into Canaan? The Arabic version in these three verses hath the father of Canaan instead of Canaan. Some copies of the Septuagint likewise have Ham instead of Canaan, as if Canaan was a corruption of the text. Vatablus and others by Canaan understand the father of Canaan, which was expressed twice before. And if we regard the metre, this line "Cursed be Canaan," is much shorter than the rest, as if something

'was deficient. May we not suppose therefore, (without taking such liberties as Father Houbi'gant hath with the Hebrew text,) that the copy-
'ist by mistake wrote only Canaan instead of 'Ham the father of Canaan, and that the whole 'passage was originally thus? And Ham the 'father of Canaan saw the nakedness of his father,
'and told his two brethren without. And Noah
'awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger 'son had done unto him. And he said, Cursed be
'Ham the father of Canaan; a servant of servants
'shall he be unto his brethren. And he said, Bles- 'sed be the Lord God of Shem; and Ham the father 'of Canaan shall be servant to them. God shall 'enlarge Japheth; and he shall dwell in the tents of
'Shem; and Ham the father of Canaan shall be
'servant to them."

From this it appears that the curse was not only upon Ham, but upon his posterity to the latest generations. The next question then is, who was Ham and his posterity to the latest generations to serve? It appears from the very face of the decree itself, that they were to be servants of servants to their brethren Shem and Japheth. But Newton, page 15, goes to show that they were not only to serve Shem and Japheth, but their children to the latest generation. And now, sir, let us see the fulfilment of this prophecy. And here I read from Newton, page 19, 20:

"Ham at first subdued some of the posterity of Shem, as Canaan sometimes conquered Japheth; the Carthaginians, who were originally Canaanites, did particularly in Spain and Italy; but in time they were to be subdued, and become servants to Shem and Japheth; and the change of their fortune from good to bad would render the curse still more visible. Egypt was the land of Ham, as is often called in Scripture; and for many years it was a great and flourishing kingdom; but it was subdued by the Persians, who descended from Shem, and afterwards by the Grecians, who descended from Japheth; and from that time to this it hath constantly been in subjection to some or other of the posterity of Shem or Japheth. The whole continent of Africa was peopled principally by the children of Ham: and for how many ages have the better parts of that country lain under the dominion of the Romans, and then of the Saracens, and now of the Turks? in what wickedness, ignorance, barbarity, slavery, misery, live most of the inhabitants? and of the poor negroes how many hundreds every year are sold and bought like beasts in the market, and are conveyed from one quarter of the world to do the work of beasts in another?"

"Nothing can be more complete than the execution of the sentence upon Ham as well as upon Canaan."

"God prefers Shem to his elder brother Japheth, as Jacob was afterwards preferred to Esau, and David to his elder brothers, to show that the order of grace is not always the same as the order of nature. The Lord being called the God of Shem particularly, it is plainly intimated that the Lord would be his God in a particular manner. And accordingly the church of God was among the posterity of Shem for several generations; and of "them (Rom. ix. 5,) as concerning the flesh Christ came."

But still Japheth was not dismissed without a promise. (Gen. ix. 47.) "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be servant to them," or their servant."

"So it is said here "God shall enlarge Japheth," and the name of Japheth signifies enlargement. Was Japheth then more enlarged than the rest? Yes he was both in territory and in children. The territories of Japheth's posterity were indeed very large, for besides all Europe, great and extensive as it is, they possessed the lesser Asia, Media, part of Armenia, Iberia, Albania, and those vast regions towards the north, which anciently the Scythians inhabited, and now the Tartars inhabit; and it is not improbable that the new world was peopled by some of his northern descendants passing thither by the straits of Anian."

I will now read from Keith on the Evidence of the truth of the Christian Religion, as follows:

"Not only do the different countries and cities which form the subjects of prophecy exhibit to this day their predicted fate, but there is also a prophecy recorded as delivered in an age coeval with the deluge, when the members of a single family included the whole of the human race—the fulfilment of which is conspicuous even at the present time"

"But whatever was the occasion on which it was delivered, the truth of the prophecy must be tried by its completion:—"Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren. Blessed be the Lord God of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant. God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem, and Canaan shall be his servant."

"The historical part of scripture, by its describing so particularly the respective settlements of the descendants of Noah, "after their generations in their nations," affords to this day the means of trying the truth of the prediction, and of ascertaining whether the prophetic character, as given by the patriarch of the post-diluvian world, be still applicable to the inhabitants of the different regions of the earth which were peopled by the posterity of Shem, of Ham, and of Japheth. The Isles of the Gentiles, or the countries beyond the Mediterranean, to which they passed by sea, viz: those of Europe, were divided by the sons of Japheth. The descendants of Ham inhabited Africa and the southwestern parts of Asia. The families of the Canaanites were spread abroad. The border of the Canaanites was from Sidon. The city of Tyre was called the daughter of Sidon; and Carthage, the most celebrated city of Africa, was peopled from Tyre. And the dwellings of the sons of Shem were unto the east, or Asia. The particular allotment, or portion of each, "after their families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations," is distinctly specified. And although the different nations descended from any one of the sons of Noah have intermingled with each other, and undergone many revolutions, yet the three great divisions of the world have remained distinct, as separately peopled and possessed by the posterity of each of the sons of Noah. On this subject the earliest commentators are agreed before the existence of those facts which give to the prophecy its fullest illustration. The facts themselves by which the prediction is verified are so notorious and so applicable, that the most brief and simple statement will suffice. Before the propagation of christianity, which first spoke peace to earth, taught a law of universal love, and called all men brethren, slavery everywhere prevailed, and the greater part of the human race, throughout all the world, were born to slavery, and unredeemed for life. Man can now boast of nobler birthright. But, though long banished from almost all Europe, slavery still lingers in Africa. That country is distinguished above every other as the land of slavery. Slaves at home, and transported for slavery, the poor Africans, the descendants of Ham, are the servants of servants, or slaves to others. Yet so unlikely was this fact to have been foreseen by man, that for centuries after the close of the Old Testament history, the inhabitants of Africa disputed with the Romans the empire of the world. But Hannibal, who was once almost master of Rome and of Europe, was forced to yield to, and to own the fate of Carthage."

I have here read from Bishop Newton, Matthew Henry, and Keith, men of high standing, much piety, and great learning, and who had no interest in telling a lie, or publishing that which they did not believe. They have all testified, positively and unequivocally, that the prophecy was by inspiration of God that the denunciation upon Ham was personal servitude or slavery, and that it has been, and is now being fulfilled, literally and certainly, not only upon Ham but his posterity, and that the promise of blessing to Shem and the promise of enlargement made to Japheth have also been, and now are being fulfilled, just as certainly and as literally as the curse upon Ham. Sir, they all testify clearly, explicitly, and positively, the place where, the time when, and the manner in which, the curse was inflicted, the blessing enjoyed, and the prophecy fulfilled upon them and their whole posterity up to the present time. This, sir, should give, to this part of God's word, a just claim on every man for his faith. This prophecy and its literal fulfillment should command the confidence and credence of every man who loves the truth and who takes no pleasure in unrighteousness. Now sir, what next? Some are ready perhaps to say that "this may do pretty well; but can you show that Ham was black or that the present African race are the descendants of Ham?" I think if you will hear me a moment this will at least seem to be the reasonable inference. Now read the 9th chapter of Genesis, 18th, 19th, and 20th verses, and you will find what has been already stated, that Noah had three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth, and by them was all the earth over spread; and from the context and all history it appears they divided the then known world as follows: Shem went into Asia, Japheth into Europe, and Ham into Africa. Africa is frequently called the land of Ham in the sacred scriptures. Now sir, we have the fountains let us see if we can follow the streams. You know then the blessing was to Shem—of him and through him concerning the flesh was salvation or the Saviour to come.

I here call again the attention of the house to the extracts which I read from Newton, page 20, in which he states, that nothing can be more complete than the execution of the sentence upon Ham as well as upon Canaan—(alluding to the curse pronounced by Noah). And now let us see the promise made to Shem and Japheth, from which it appears, that God preferred Shem to his elder brother Japheth—as he did Jacob to Esau—and from Shem, as concerning the flesh, Christ came, (Rom. 9, 5.) Now, sir, the question is, do you believe this? Do you believe, as concerning the flesh, Christ came through Shem? This, sir, is an important question, and has much to do in helping us to form a correct conclusion in the investigation of this great subject. Do you then believe it, sir? If you do, why, let me ask do you believe it? Surely it is not because Christ said it himself—for, said he, If I bear witness of myself, my witness will be of no avail; there is another that beareth witness of me. Search the scriptures, said he, to the unbelieving Jews, for in them you think you have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me. I need not then ask you, sir, if you believe Jesus Christ, the son of God, concerning the flesh, is the son of Shem. This, sir, we all acknowledge. This we all believe. But why do we believe it, is the great question in this investigation.

Is it not, sir, from reason, revelation, and history? Is it not from the numerous prophecies? made in ages past concerning him, and their wonderful and literal fulfilment? Is it not from reason, revelation, and history, that you have been forced to this conclusion? I ask you, sir, if it is not from reason, the revelation and word of God, as recorded by Moses, declared by the prophets, and preached by the apostles, that you have been driven, irresistibly, to this conclusion? If so, sir, I would ask you if it was not the same spirit of prophecy that proclaimed the one, that declared the other? If it was not the same historian that recorded the one, who wrote the other? And if, sir, it is not the same reason that understands the one that comprehends the other? Where then, sir, is the difference? It seems to me there is none. The conclusion is inevitable. If you believe that Adam existed, you must believe that Noah existed. If you believe that Noah existed, you must believe that Moses, and John, and Jesus existed. And if you believe that Jesus existed, you must believe that he was the son of Shem. And if you believe that Jesus was the son of Shem, you must believe that we are the sons of Japheth, and if you believe we are the sons of Japheth, you must believe that the Africans are the sons of Ham, for we have the same witness, the same testimony, the same revelation to show, the same record to read, the same reason to understand the one that we have to show, to read, and to understand the other.

The conclusion therefore, is clear, and the question established, that God did, for purposes unrevealed, and unknown to man, doom Ham and his posterity to the latest generation, to personal servitude or slavery, and that too, to his brethren, Shem and Japheth, whose children we are, and their posterity. If this be true, what follows? Why, in vain may we talk about slavery, or the abolition of slavery? In vain may we talk about slavery in this state or in that state. In vain may we talk about slavery in this form or that form. It will all be idle. If God has decreed, it will be so. What is man, that he can resist the decrees of Jehovah? We may change its place, but we cannot break down the institution. It has existed in every age of the world since the flood, as I have shown. And it has been incorporated with every dispensation of religion, Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian, as I will now proceed to show. First then sir, I will refer you to the 14th Gen. 14th verse, and you will find that Abraham the father of the faithful and the friend of God, had 318 servants born in his own house, reared by his own hand, and subject to his absolute control, in war as well as in peace. This sir, does not look as if slavery was a sin. Go a little further, and what do we find? We find Sarah his wife, the brightest, the purest, and best of women, fit emblem of the blessed virgin, associated with Abraham in this matter. This still does not look as if slavery was a sin. Go still further, and we find the angel of the living God, talking to Hagar, who had run away from her mistress Sarah, Abram's wife. And what does the angel of the Lord say to Hagar? Does he tell her to run away from her mistress? Does he tell her that slavery is a sin, a thing abhorrent to God, a great moral evil, and that she should not be held in bondage? No sir, no such advice was given, no such principles were inculcated. He told her to go back to her mistress, and submit to her will. Just here, sir, I would like to indulge the idea for one moment, as to what would have been the advice and the conduct of a northern abolitionist on such an occasion—but I will forbear. But this, Mr. Chairman, does not still look as if slavery was such a great outrage against God and religion.

[Here Mr. T. remarked, that feeling very much indisposed, having been so for several days, he would be obliged to waive the further discussion of the subject for the present. He had made all his points, and the elaboration of them he should perhaps ask the indulgence of the committee for another opportunity to present.]

Mr. CLARKE moved that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion prevailed, and the committee accordingly rose and reported progress.

The question being on granting leave to sit again.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE proposed to give the committee leave to sit again on Monday week. On Monday the report of the committee on the court of appeals, would, under an order of the committee, come up for consideration, and he was exceedingly anxious it should be then taken up, progressed in, and as he hoped, finished during the coming week. It was possible he might be called away from the house for two or three days the week after, and he could not very well leave until he knew what disposition had been made of the report of the committee of which he was chairman.

Mr. CLARKE. I submit to the consideration of the house whether it is not better, as we have taken up this subject of slavery, that we should progress with its discussion until it shall have been gone through with. If we waited until the report of the committee on slavery was taken up we should have to go over the very same ground, that has been traveled over for the last three or four days, before we could take any ultimatenation on the report. Let the discussion now proceed, and terminate, and when the report of the committee does come up, we shall be ready for decisive action.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not desire to discuss it myself, but it is not yet 12 o'clock, and I perceive indications on the part of several gentlemen around me of a desire to do so. I do not feel disposed to withdraw the proposition I have made, that the committee have leave to sit again on Monday week. In the meantime we can make some progress in another branch of the subject, and one which is not less important.

Mr. HARDIN. The committee on the circuit courts and the committee on the county courts also, have been in session for some time, and there is a prospect I believe of harmonious action in regard to the organization of those courts. I give notice, therefore, that on Wednesday next, if the subject be not sooner disposed of, I shall move that the convention refuse leave to the committee to sit again, and that the resolutions be laid upon the table. I am getting very tired of this discussion.

Mr. TURNER. I am not anxious that my resolutions should be debated to the exclusion of other business.

Mr. HARDIN. My desire is not to prevent the discussion of the gentleman's resolutions, but simply to make an order of business for Wednesday.

Mr. TURNER. A great deal of matter has been introduced for the purpose perhaps of getting up a little ephemeral popularity—which has no connection with the subject. All that I desire is to have an opportunity to reply to the arguments which have been advanced against my proposition.

Mr. CLARKE. However much I may be opposed to the principles contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Madison, nevertheless as far as I understand parliamentary rules, and the rules of decorum, it is due to the gentleman that he should be heard in defence of his proposition, and in reply to the arguments that have been adduced against it.

If the proposition indicated by the gentleman from Shelby should prevail, I do not know what the condition of other gentlemen in this convention would be, but as far as I am concerned it would be rather an awkward one. When I indicated the other day that I intended to offer a substitute for the fifth resolution, I accompanied the intimation with some declarations of sentiments, which have since been animadverted upon; and it is due to myself, and to those whom I represent on this floor that I should be heard in defence of those sentiments. Therefore I trust the house will entertain the motion that I first made, that the committee have leave to sit again.

The subject of slavery is one which deeply interests the whole of the people of this state; and not the people of this state only, but the whole of the people of this union have been excited more or less upon the subject. It is a subject, sir, that ought to be discussed; and so far as the proposition which I have indicated is concerned, I desire to discuss it; and I hope, therefore, that the committee will have leave to sit again on Monday next.

The question being taken first on the motion of the gentleman from Nelson, that the committee have leave to sit again on Monday week, it was, upon a division, negatived; ayes 21, nays 49.

The question then being upon the motion of the gentleman from Simpson, that the committee have leave to sit again, it was agreed to.

The convention then adjourned.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LANCASTER, of the Catholic church.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. TURNER, from the committee on the executive and ministerial offices, for counties and districts, made the following report:

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. There shall be elected a commonwealth's attorney for each circuit, and a circuit court clerk for each county, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the circuit judges; a county court attorney, clerk, surveyor, coroner, and jailer, for each county, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the presiding judge of the county court.

SEC. 2. No person shall be eligible to the offices mentioned in this article who is not, at the time, twenty four years old, a citizen of the United States, and who has not resided two years next preceding the election, in the state, and one year in the county or district in which he offers his services. No person shall be eligible to the office of commonwealth or county attorney, unless he shall have been a licensed practicing attorney for two years. No person shall be elected clerk unless he shall have procured from the court of appeals a certificate that he has been examined by their clerk, under their supervision, and that he is qualified for the office for which he is a candidate. But the office of sheriff or constable may be filled by persons who have attained the age of twenty one years.

SEC. 3. The commonwealth's attorney and circuit court clerk shall be elected at the same time, and in the same manner as the circuit judge. The county attorney, clerk, surveyor, coroner, and jailer, shall be elected at the same time, and in the same manner, as the presiding judge of the county court.

SEC. 4. Sheriffs shall be elected in each county, at the same time and manner that associate judges of the county court are elected, whose term of office shall be two years, and they shall be re-eligible for a second term; but no sheriff, or deputy, who qualified under him, shall, after the expiration of the second term, be re-eligible for the succeeding term.

SEC. 5. A constable shall be elected in every justice's district, who shall be chosen at the same time, in the same manner, and for the same term, that justices of the peace are elected. He may execute the duties of his office in any part of the county in which he resides.

SEC. 6. Officers for towns and cities shall be elected for such terms, and in such manner, and with such qualifications, as may be prescribed by law.

SEC. 7. Vacancies in offices under this article, shall be filled, until the next ensuing election, in such manner as the legislature may provide.

SEC. 8. All officers provided for in this article, shall reside in their respective counties or districts, during their continuance in office.

SEC. 9. Clerks shall be removable by the appellate court, only for breach of good behavior; which court shall be judges of law and fact. Other officers, whose removal from office is not provided for in this constitution, shall be removed in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

SEC. 10. When a new county shall be erected, officers for the same, to serve until the next stated election, shall be elected or appointed in such way, and at such times, as the legislature may prescribe.

SEC. 11. Clerks, sheriffs, surveyors, coroners, and jailers, shall, before they enter upon the duties of their respective offices, and as often thereafter as may be deemed proper, give such bond and security as shall be prescribed by law.

SEC. 12. The legislature may provide for the appointment of such other county or district ministerial and executive officers as shall, from time to time, be necessary and proper.

Mr. TURNER. The report is the result of the deliberations of a majority of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman. I did not myself nor did other members of the committee concur in all these provisions. I think that there are several little officers that might as well be appointed without the trouble of going through an election; but in this, one member, and there were probably others, did not concur, because they believed that the people ought to have unlimited power, without any restriction as to age or anything else, to select their officers. It will be seen that the report is rather incidental, and runs into both circuit and county courts, and it will not therefore, be expedient for us to act upon it, until the reports of those two other committees should come in. I move therefore, that it be printed and sent to the committee of the whole, and I will at some future day, fix upon a time for taking it up.

It was referred and ordered to be printed accordingly.

RESOLUTIONS OF INQUIRY.

Mr. JAMES offered the following, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to inquire into the expediency and propriety of amending the constitution, so as to prohibit the legislature from passing any law which shall suspend or alter any of the legal or equitable remedies for the collection of debts and the enforcement of contracts, so as to operate retrospectively.

Mr. W. N. MARSHALL offered the following, and it was agreed to:

UNIVERSITY

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions be instructed to inquire into the propriety of incorporating into the new constitution, a clause exempting from execution, to each bona fide occupant of land, a homestead of from fifty to one hundred acres, not to exceed in value, the sum of $500, and not to affect any debt created before the new constitution goes into operation.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. RUDD called the attention of the convention to the fact, that some days ago he offered a resolution concerning cities, towns, and counties, which was referred to the committee on the legislative department. He had since ascertained that that committee thought it did not come within their province; and hence he now moved that the committee on the legislative department be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and that it be referred to the select committee on the public debt, of which the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin,) was chairman.

The motion was agreed to.

SLAVERY.

Mr. DIXON offered the following:

WHEREAS, The right of the citizen to be secure in his person and property is not only guaranteed by all free governments, but lies at the very foundation of them: and whereas, the powers derived to this convention immediately and collectively are directly from the people, and although not expressed are implied, and that among these is the power so to change the existing constitution of the state as to afford a more ample protection to the civil and religious rights of the citizen, but not to destroy them: and whereas, the slaves of the citizens of this commonwealth are property, both those that are now in esse and those hereafter born of mothers who may be slaves at the time of such birth. Therefore,

Resolved, That this convention has not the power or right, by any principle it may incorporate into the constitution of the state, to deprive the citizen of his property without his consent, unless it be for the public good, and only then by making to him a just compensation therefor.

Mr. DIXON. My object in offering this resolution, is to call directly the attention of the convention to the great and important principle that is embodied in it; I mean the right of a bare majority of this convention, either as it is now constituted, or in any other form in which that majority can possibly constitute itself, to take from the citizen the property which belongs to him, without making any compensation therefor. That is the great question which I want to present for the consideration of the convention, and of the people of Kentucky; and it is a question upon which doubts are entertained by many persons, which doubts ought to be set at rest by the action of the convention. I hold it to be a principle that cannot be controverted, that every citizen has rights in every well organized community, under a free government, which he cannot be deprived of unless by revolution or by actual force. I maintain that the obligation on the part of the government, and on the part of the governed is mutual; that whilst the governed have a right to demand protection, the government has a right to demand obedience. It is a mutual agreement that cannot be violated by either party. The citizen cannot violate it, nor can the government violate it. The principle embraced in the resolution, lies at the very foundation of society, that the right of the citizen—the right which is secured to him, which is admitted to belong to him, the right of property and of liberty—cannot be taken away from him by the government. That right I say, lies at the foundation of society, and is independent of the organic law of the country, is independent of municipal regulations, of statute law, or of any thing which may have been agreed upon by the state for the governance of her citizens. It is an original element, which lies at the foundation of all society.

I desire more particularly to explain my views on the subject, by reading from the first volume of Blackstone's commentaries, a passage which clearly points out and sustains the principle, which is essential in this resolution.

"Though society had not its formal beginning from any convention of individuals, actuated by their wants and their fears; yet it is the sense of their weakness and imperfection that keeps mankind together; that demonstrates the necessity of this union, and that therefore is the solid and natural foundation, as well as the cement of civil society. And this is what we mean by the original contract of society, which, though perhaps in no instance it has ever been formally expressed at the first institution of a state, yet in nature and reason must always be understood and implied in the very act of associating together: namely, that the whole should protect all its parts, and that every part should pay obedience to the will of the whole; or, in other words, that the community should guard the rights of each individual member, and that (in return for this protection) each individual should submit to the laws of the community; without which submission of all it was impossible that protection could be certainly extended to any."

There is the sum and substance of the whole thing. This is the commencement of society, that the whole should protect all its parts, and that the parts should pay obedience to the whole.

Here was a mutual compact existing before this convention was formed. When it was determined to send delegates to this convention to form an organic law for the state, this principle lay at the very bottom of the action of the people; that the government should protect the rights of individuals, whilst individuals are bound to render obedience to the government. The great principle embraced in the resolution which I have offered is, that it is the right of the citizens of every free government, to be secure in their persons and property, and that this right lies at the very foundation of society itself, and constitutes the very elements of it; that this convention has been assembled with powers delegated from the people themselves, and that those powers, though not expressed, are nevertheless limited in their character, and that the convention is expected to protect those great rights, which lie at the foundation of society and not destroy them.

Then I assert another proposition, that slaves are property, as well those now in existence, as those who may be born hereafter of mothers, who at the time of birth are slaves; and I maintain that a bare majority of the convention, nay that the whole of the convention has not power to take from the citizen his property, without his consent, or without making him compensation for it. Not that the legislature shall not have power, but this convention, this assemblage of the sovereign of the state, is limited in its power, is controlled by the great principle which lies at the foundation of society—by that great principle, which when it is lost sight of, sinks the people into the condition of slaves.

I have presented this resolution, because I desire to call the attention of the people of Kentucky to it. I have proposed it, because I am myself utterly opposed to surrendering into the hands of this convention, or any other convention hereafter to be assembled, the right to seize upon private property and appropriate it as the convention may think proper, without regard to the public good. And finally, when the public good demands it, I insist upon it that it cannot be taken unless compensation be made for it.

I do not mean to discuss the question now, nor do I know that I shall discuss it at all. I will move, however, that the resolution be printed and that it be referred to the committee of the whole, because it contains an important principle, with the view of giving to my honorable friends who may wish to discuss the question, an opportunity of turning their attention particularly to it.

Mr. TURNER. I do not know that the resolution should be printed and referred to the committee of the whole. I suppose every member of the convention is in favor of the proposition contained in the resolution. I do not think there can be a doubt on the part of any delegate as regards the correctness of the sentiments laid down in it. It is a proposition, I think, about which there can be no doubt, either on the part of members of the convention or of those who sent us here.

Mr. TALBOTT. I hope the gentleman from Madison will withdraw his opposition to the printing of the resolution. I do not believe there is a subject in the world the discussion of which is so well calculated to enlighten the convention and the country as that contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Henderson. I want to obtain information in regard to it. I know there are thousands, and tens of thousands of people in this state, who dispute the proposition, and I want light upon the subject. I do hope the resolution will be referred to the committee of the whole.

Mr. HARDIN. I understand the resolution to be nothing more nor less than this, that the convention has not the power, under any state of things, to emancipate the slaves. For one, I maintain that they have this power.

Mr. DIXON. The gentleman will see that he is mistaken, if he will examine the resolution. It asserts this principle, that it is in the power of this convention, to take the property of the citizen, when the public good requires it, but that it must compensate the owner therefor.

Mr. HARDIN. The real meaning is, that we have not the power to emancipate the slaves that we have now in existence, nor to emancipate them in prospective. We have that power if we pay the owner for his property. I agree with the gentleman from Henderson, that it should not be done. I will not consent to do it; but we have the power to do it. We have the power to do any thing that a nation can do, unless forbid by the constitution of the United States and the laws of Congress made in pursuance of it, and treaties made by the United States in pursuance of the treaty-making power.—There is no restraint upon us except so far as regards these, and if it were not for the constitution of the United States, we might declare any gentleman of this convention King or Emperor to-morrow, and he would be King or Emperor until the people saw fit to dethrone him, which I suppose they would do very quickly. Well, can we not set the negroes free if we choose? I should think so, compensation or no compensation, those now in existence, or those hereafter to be born. But I deny the policy of doing so. I agree with the gentleman. I am against setting them free, but I do not want to pass a resolution declaring that we have not the power to do it. I hope the resolution will be deferred, and when we come to the time for action on the subject I would give all such resolutions a handsome go-bye, by laying them upon the table and refusing to act upon them. That is what I should call a handsome berth for them, and I hope it will be given to them. It is well to correct the views of all the gentlemen of this convention in regard to this subject; but I do not think it would be expedient to take any action upon it.

While I am up I will only further remark, that we came here with a view of making three or four essential changes in our organic law.—One is, to take the appointing power from the executive and give it to the people; and another is, to destroy the life tenure of office, because the holders of office for life, or during good behavior, are virtually under no responsibility whatever, the tenure of their office being in the nature of a life estate; for, as Jefferson well said, "they never resign, and scarcely ever die."—Another object is, to make the holders of office more immediately responsible to the people; and another object—one which I had particularly in view, though I don't know how it is with other gentlemen—was to prevent the state from contracting any more of those enormous debts which we have been in the habit of doing.—And when we have done this, we shall have attained the great object for which we have assembled. I hope we shall do it in the best possible way. I recollect hearing an anecdote, thirty years ago, of a poor man going to buy a hundred acres of land from a land speculator, who declared that he had an excellent title, and produced, as the evidence of his title, a record against the unknown heirs of A., and a record against the unknown heirs of B., and was proceeding to produce other evidences of title of the same character, when the buyer said, "no doubt your title is a good one, but there is so much of it, I shall never be able to read it," and he declined making the purchase. Now, I cannot agree with the gentleman that we ought to declare that we have not the power to make such disposition of this subject as we please. There is a wide difference between having the power, and considering it expedient to exercise it. We may incorporate, if we choose, the law of 1833 into the new constitution, but it shall not be done with my consent, and I presume there are not twenty delegates in this house who desire that it shall be done. We have ample power, but we are not going to exercise it. I hope that the convention will give to this resolution the destination which my honorable friend proposes, and that we shall hear the sentiments of delegates upon the subjects embraced in it. But I want to adopt no negative declaration as to our power.

Mr. PRESTON. If I rightly understood the resolution, it does not bear the interpretation which the gentleman from Nelson puts upon it. I was very glad to see the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Henderson. It embodies, in effect, the same idea which is contained in a part of the report of the committee, and which will naturally come up for consideration in the report itself. I understand the resolution as asserting two principles. One is, the declaration that we came here under an implied understanding, that we would not violate the rights of persons or of property, and with the implied understanding between the people who elected the delegates to this convention and those delegates, that the rights of property should remain undisturbed.

There is another principle asserted in the resolution, and it is, that this convention has no power whatever to pass a post nati law, or any constitutional provision for freeing the children to be born hereafter, descendants of the slaves. I do not believe that this house is willing to accord to the proposition that the state of Kentucky has the right to exercise such a power. I do not believe myself that we are in a state of revolution. I do not believe myself that full and plenary power is possessed by this house. I do not believe that we came here with all the powers of sovereignty. I do not believe, but if this house consisted of one hundred and fifty delegates instead of one hundred, we could come here as a legally constituted convention. I believe we were called here in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, which provides for its amendment, which stipulates that it should be done in a certain manner, and that when we do come together for that purpose, we are not in a state of revolution, not at liberty to carry power to the extreme limit which the gentleman from Nelson seems to think; but that we do come here for the purpose of carrying out the views of the people, under the implied obligation which is set forth in the resolution of the gentleman from Henderson.

There was no principle more strongly argued than the one which asserted that there should be a provision inserted in the constitution which we are about to form, which would provide for the future emancipation of slaves. They declared that we should insert in the constitution, either a provision that would permit the emancipation of the slaves now, or a provision for their gradual emancipation. I do not know whether any gentleman in this convention entertains such an opinion. I understand there are one or two who do; but I know that twelve or fifteen thousand votes were cast in the state, asserting that they believed in the existence of the right to do so. There are as many as fifteen thousand persons in the state then, who do not think that such a provision will be altogether useless, and who would consequently be opposed to inserting in the constitution a provision declaring that the slaves should not be manumitted, without a compensation being paid to their owners. I recollect reading with a great deal of interest the speech of a distinguished gentleman of this state (Judge Underwood,) regarding the emancipation of the slaves, in which he advanced the opinion that we should insert such a feature. But he afterwards receded somewhat from that position. We know, however, this fact, that some twelve or fifteen thousand of the people of this state believe that such a feature should be inserted. I do not believe that it can be justly done. I agree with the gentleman from Nelson, and I believe there is no man within the sound of my voice who will maintain that private property, other than slaves, can be taken without compensation; but we all know that there has been one constant clamor from the north asserting that slaves are not property. I have heard it asserted in Louisville that man could have no property in man. I have found an opinion prevailing throughout the country to a great extent to the same effect. The whole mind of the country in fact is directed to this question. It may not be the case in this house, but a difference of opinion does prevail in the country, and the question should therefore be met; it should be considered and determined. What do they say? That slaves are not like other property, but that they are property sui generis. The State of New York passed anti-slavery laws, and I have yet to learn, that she had no right to pass such laws, though she did it under no constitutional sanction. Her example was followed by other states, and if we let this constitution go out without some such provision, may it not be subject to judicial enquiry whether subsequent action of the legislature can control this property.

In February last, in conversations with pro-slavery men, they declared that the present constitution contained a guarantee for the continuance of slavery in reference to existing slaves; but they seemed to yield the point that it would be just and proper, and no invasion of right if a provision were inserted for the emancipation of those who are not now in esse. As the matter was discussed, the question began to assume a different aspect, the people began to regard the increase of slave property in the same light as the increase of real estate; and they began to be of opinion that the convention had no more right to declare that the offspring of slaves should be free, than they had to declare that the profits of real estate, or of stocks should not belong to the owners of such property. I know there are individuals who are averse to the discussion which the emancipationists have raised in Kentucky. I know it is a prevalent opinion that you can no more take away the future born children of slaves from their owners, than you can the existing slaves. But we are a transient body, we shall pass away, and if we adjourn without the expression of our opinion, all traces of the opinions we entertain will pass away with us. They will endure only so long as the minds which entertain them. I agree therefore with the gentleman from Henderson, that we should leave an imperishable record of the great truth, that the great barriers which are thrown around other property apply equally to our slaves; and the expression should go forth to the country, that it not only applies to slaves now in existence, but that it equally applies to those who shall be born of slaves hereafter. I see no intuity about it. On the contrary, I see great utility. I have heard other matters that are certainly not so pertinent, discussed with much ability in this house. I do not regard it as useless; I regard it as a cardinal hinge on which the decision of this question is to turn hereafter. There is no gentleman within the sound of my voice, but will recollect that when this point was pressed by the emancipationists it was the greatest difficulty presented.

I certainly have shown no disposition to trespass on the patience of the house. Among the youngest members in it, I shall never speak unless when I consider there is a great and important principle at issue. I have great respect for the opinions of the gentleman from Nelson, but I have perceived within the last week, that there have been questions discussed, that are of less importance than this. It will naturally come up in the report of the committee on Slavery, a report to which I have many objections. That report provides that the free negroes, who are at present within the state, are to be torn from their homes, and sent away, as I believe against law and right. By adopting this, we adopt a provision that involves in it inhumanity; one which involves a proposition that every one who advocated the pro-slavery cause found the strongest he could use, for I maintain that there is no argument that the people listen to with more sympathy than the declaration that by the contemplated scheme of emancipation, if they could carry it out, a hundred thousand human beings would be torn from their homes and landed upon a distant and inhospitable shore. If there was one argument which pressed harder than another, against the emancipation party, it was this. I myself feel a deep and vivid interest in it. I believe the principle is a cardinal one, and I believe it should be distinctly understood and declared by this house, that private property shall not be taken, without full compensation being made to the owner. I think we ought to assert the principle distinctly, and that we should declare that it extends to slaves, and not only to the slaves who are now in esse, but to the descendants of those slaves. That is the principle, as I understand it, for which the gentleman from Henderson contends. So far as power to act upon the subject is concerned, I do not understand the resolution of the gentleman as doing more than conveying the idea, that there is an implied understanding that the right to private property shall not be violated, and that understanding becomes a motive so strong as to govern the exercise of power by this convention, that they will not violate that class of property, but that they will provide for its future protection. If I understand the gentleman aright I will support him in it.

Mr. DIXON. The gentleman certainly understands my position, at least in part. I assert two propositions; first, that according to the original contract between the members of society, the whole have a right to govern the individual members of the society; but they have a right to do it on this condition, that they do not violate the rights of individual members of the society. That is one proposition which I assert. The next proposition is this; that the powers of this convention, a body which is the representative of that society, and whose powers are derived from that society, are limited by the implied understanding existing betwixt the members of that society, which constituted this body, to the extent that this body would not violate the original understanding betwixt the members of the society and the community composed thereof. It was, that the whole might govern the individual members, but with the express understanding that they should not deprive the individual members of those rights to which they were entitled. Therefore the resolution goes to the extent that the power does not exist in this convention, because whatever powers it possesses, the resolution insists upon it, are derivative, and that we ought not to transcend those powers. The powers possessed by this convention therefore, do not go to the extent of violating that principle, and if we assert it here by any act of ours, it will be in violation of what I believe to be the original contract between the people and their representatives. That is the proposition, that it is not in the power of the convention to take away private property without compensation being made therefor; that slaves are private property, and that the rule applies as well to them as to any other property, and applies as well to future born slaves, as to slaves at present in existence.

Mr. PRESTON. I understand the main part of the gentleman's resolution. Its practical bearing as I conceive is, to have an expression of this convention that they will not, in the constitution which we are about to form violate either the right of property in slaves, as it now exists, or the right of property in those hereafter to be born.

The reason why I rose to make any remark, is that I hope the resolution will come up for consideration at the time the gentleman has indicated. If the whole house, as the gentleman from Madison says, is willing to accord to this proposition, let them do it now, and the object will have been achieved. And if any gentlemen entertain different sentiments, I would like to give them an opportunity to be heard, the last perhaps, that they will have for many years to come. I hope therefore, the resolution will be allowed to take the direction indicated by the gentleman.

Mr. TURNER. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If this were a proposition to insert in the constitution a clause, declaring that the legislature shall not exercise the power of emancipating the issue of future born slaves, I should have no hesitation in yielding it my unqualified and ready support, but if I understand the resolution in connection with this preamble, it asserts a principle to which I cannot yield my assent so readily as the gentleman from Madison has done. It is intended to assert the principle, not only that this convention has not the power, but consequently no other convention which can be assembled by the people of Kentucky will ever have the right to exercise the power to provide any means or mode of emancipation of the slaves in this commonwealth, either those now in existence or those hereafter to be born.

I am perfectly willing, as I remarked before, if it be thought desirable to insert in the constitution a declarative clause denying the power of the legislature to act upon the subject, that it shall be done. I am willing to place that which is already to my mind, sufficiently plain in the existing constitution, beyond cavil or doubt, in the one which we may substitute for it. But sir, I cannot yield, understanding the resolution with its preamble, to the proposition that there exists no power in the people of Kentucky, to declare now, or hereafter, that slavery shall be discontinued, because if the position of the gentleman be true, there cannot be exercised any power of the sovereign people of Kentucky in any shape except by civil and violent revolution, to secure the means of adopting that which our fathers thought they did possess when they formed the existing constitution, that is a system of emancipation, to take place at some convenient time without injury to the rights of private individuals.

Yielding my full assent to the position that slaves are property, and entitled to the same protection which is guaranteed to other property under the organic law, the enquiry necessarily arises, how came slaves to be considered property? Was it by constitutional provision and organic law, speaking it into existence by the authority of the people, exercised in their convention, and carried out by legislation.—The property in slaves is guaranteed by constitutional law, no matter how originally acquired; and the same power (the people,) which gave the constitutional guaranty, if they elect to do so, may withdraw that guaranty in any re-construction of the government which they may choose to make. I do not say it would be just to do so; but they have the power to do so; and the constitution of the United States does not inhibit the people of a state from the exercise of such a power. Is it contended that the same people have not the power now, or they shall not hereafter exercise it in the same manner? They have the same sovereignty, and the same power to declare what shall and what shall not be property within this commonwealth. The rights of property depend upon law, and its security is the protection which the constitution and laws give to it. If you acquire property in slaves by your organic law, I cannot yield myself to the principle that the same power which spoke the law into existence cannot retrace its steps at the proper time.

Now these are the reasons why I cannot yield my assent to the proposition. I am prepared to go as far as any man to say that the Legislature shall not have the power to emancipate existing slaves or their future increase. But I am not prepared to say that if the people of Kentucky choose, assembled in this hall, or in any future convention which they may organize, in their sovereign capacity, to adopt some system of emancipation, they have not an unquestionable right to do so. I am indifferent what course the resolution takes.

Mr. TRIPPLET. This is a mere abstract resolution, and while there are probably nine tenths—one gentleman says four fifths—but I think I may safely assert there are nine tenths of the delegates in this convention who will agree to the proposition that both slaves that are now in existence, and those post nati must continue to be slaves so long as it is the will and pleasure of the people of Kentucky that they shall be so. I deny the capacity of this house to put a limitation upon its own power. Why? Simply because by admitting that, you admit that you can put a limitation upon the powers of the people from whom the members of this house derive their power. Pass this resolution, and put into the constitution a declaration that this convention has not the power to do this or that, and you thereby declare that the people themselves have not the power. Now where do you land? It is the unanimous intention of the convention, I believe, that the new constitution, when formed, shall be placed before the people for their ratification, and they will ratify it, and it then becomes the act of the people. I ask you then, this plain question: have not succeeding generations the same power that this generation has? and if they should change their opinion, how are they ever to express that change, provided you put this declaration in the constitution? You come to this plain proposition at last, that if there is no method of amending the constitution, to arrive at their object, you throw them upon something ulterior and beyond it—you throw them upon revolution. I am a pro-slavery man—meaning just what I say. I am for slavery for the sake of slavery, and I will here avow, that if there were now no slaves in Kentucky, and they were in other states as slaves, I for one would say bring them here. If they are a blessing, I want our portion of that blessing; and I believe that they are a blessing, a moral blessing—whether a religious blessing or not I do not exactly know, and therefore do not intend to give an opinion on the subject. I believe religion has little to do with the question. I am a pro-slavery man for the sake of slavery, but how do I know that my children will be of the same opinion? And while I lay down the proposition and maintain it side by side with the gentleman from Henderson, I cannot go so far as to say that my descendants shall not be free to follow their own inclinations. I cannot deny to them the same right to determine for themselves this question, that I claim for myself now.

You put into the constitution a declaration such as this, if they want to remedy it you throw them upon revolution. That is one reason why I am opposed to its insertion. But there is another. I ask if it is good policy when it seems to be the unanimous opinion of the house, and when as I believe, there are but three or four, in fact, in the convention in favor of emancipation—but fifteen or twenty in the convention who regard slavery as wrong in the abstract, including all the terms you choose to apply to it. One thinks it wrong morally, another religiously, and another politically. Why combine all these elements together and show its strength abroad? There is no necessity for this. Divide and conquer! Why amalgamate all this mass? Why combine those who differ with us upon the abstract proposition? To say the least, it is bad policy; because the expression of opinion, whether given by your reporters and going out into the State, or put into the constitution, let it be as it may, will have a powerful influence in Kentucky. And I do not want an opinion, when formed and expressed here, to be so formed that the people of Kentucky or the people out of Kentucky may see that upon this great question of slavery there is a great difference of opinion in this house.

Upon the single question of slavery, there is very little, if any, difference in this house, but upon the abstract proposition, whether we have the right to prevent emancipation by future generations, I am inclined to think there will be great diversity of opinion. The emancipationists in Kentucky, and out of it, will claim every one of those who differ with the gentleman from Henderson, who is seldom wrong: they will class every one in this house who differs with him on this question, as being, to some extent, an emancipationist. I am not very certain that I can agree with the whole of the proposition myself.

Our constituents, throughout the state of Kentucky, have 'sworn the peace' against the emancipationists, and they have required us to take from them bonds that they will never hereafter, disturb the peace and harmony of the state, by their tampering with this property or agitating this question. And we are here now to say what those bonds shall be. You may put the penalty as high as you choose, but do not put in, as a condition to the bond, a mere matter of opinion. Nine-tenths of the people are now with us, and they may turn round and say, "that is not the penalty we required you to take;" and it may prevent the people of Kentucky from sanctioning that bond.

I rose hastily and more for the purpose of begging that the resolution might be allowed to take such direction as was indicated by the mover, that we may see whether he will abide by all the propositions contained in it. I know that he is supported by the celebrated case from Georgia, in four fifths of the ground he intends to occupy; but as to whether he will be supported in the whole ground, there will probably be a great diversity of opinion. Wherefore then press the subject, for every man who does not agree with the legal proposition, will be compelled to vote against it. I do not say I shall be of the number, because I have not had time to examine the subject calmly and deliberately. I desire, however, with the gentleman from Henderson, to seal up the mouths of the abolitionists. I will go as far as he will to do this, but I do not want to vote for an abstract legal proposition, with all of which I cannot agree.

Mr. BULLITT. I wish to correct the gentleman's misapprehension of the report of the committee on slavery as regards free negroes. There is nothing compulsory in that report. It is a simple proposition to authorize the legislature to remove them at a future time, if they should see fit. I conceive it is important that they should have that power, because the time may arrive—and it is hoped and believed that we are going to make a constitution that will stand the test of time—when the subject will present a different aspect from that which it now presents. It may be for the good of both races, it may be consistent with humanity and good policy to transport them to Africa. I wish the convention not to be led into error by the remarks which the gentleman has made, but to recollect that they are not compelled by this report, but that simply power is given to do it, if it is considered best. And I, for one, have full confidence in the legislature of the state of Kentucky, that they will never exercise the power in a spirit of cruelty and oppression. I am as much opposed to this forcible emancipation, to driving them out to die on the sands of Africa, as the gentleman can be; and when the report comes up, I shall stand ready to defend it. I merely rose to take issue with the gentleman from Nelson upon what I conceive to be a great and radical mistake on his part, in saying that slaves became property under our organic law. Upon this point I take issue confidently. What was the first organic law which established this institution? The decree of the Almighty himself, as recorded in the sacred book. I will refer the gentleman to the passage where the Almighty declares that the Hebrew slaves should be emancipated at the end of every seven years, and that all prisoners of war should be held in perpetual bondage. Has the gentleman overlooked his bible, that he goes to organic law. Well, then, I ask, is there any organic law in the United States to establish slavery? I deny the assertion, and call for the proof. Slaves were brought into this country like all other property. But if the gentleman can lay his hand upon any organic law that establishes slavery, I should be glad to be informed where it is. They were brought here like all other property, like every thing that has been made the subject of property, and he will find, laws without number, recognizing that species of property, but none establishing it? It did not require the recognition of any organic law. It is precisely like all other property, and was so regarded in all countries to which it went. If it had not been property, when the first ship load came to Virginia, were there not lawyers there who would have taken out writs of habeas corpus and manumitted the slaves? Yes, sir; but that was never thought of. It is a new idea altogether, one that has sprung up in this modern age to make a distinction between slaves and other property. They were property like every thing else; and if there was any property on the face of the earth, more particularly recognized than any other, it was that property. Let the gentleman examine the bible, and show me where there is a greater sanction given to any property.

But it seems to have become the fashion of the day, without examination, to point this out as a moral, social, and political evil. I did not intend to trouble the house on this subject, but when I heard so extraordinary a position advanced by one of the ablest men of the state, a man of great legal ability, I thought it time at least to enter my protest. And as I am upon the subject, I take the position that it is neither a moral nor a social evil. I might be inclined to favor emancipation, however, if I could see a mode pointed out by which the African could be rendered more happy. I am firmly persuaded that the negro slave of Kentucky is in a more happy condition than he ever has been, or can be placed in, in any part of the world. We all know that he is far better off than he was when serving as a slave, in the country whence he came. He is in a much better condition than the free negro now in this country; in a far better condition than the emancipated negro in Jamaica and St. Domingo. Then, being satisfied it is doing no injustice to the slave, I say it is neither a moral nor a social evil, but a decided political blessing. How do you make it a moral evil? In the northern states, the time is rapidly approaching, when the white man and the white woman must work for their mere subsistence and clothing. There, the employer pays in money, or perhaps in trade. If he misbehaves he is turned off without a recommendation, and is left to shift for himself in the best manner he can. Now let us draw a comparison. Here, the slave receives his food and clothing, and is well taken care of. If he misbehaves, he is corrected in a humane manner, and is coerced to do his duty. Where then is the difference but in name? If one of those hirelings at the north gets sick, he is sent to the hospital, he is left to the cold charities of a public institution. Here, if the master have not sufficient humanity, the law compels him to give his slave medical aid. Where then I ask, is the difference? The slave occupies here precisely the same attitude as the hireling there. Being then, as I conceive, neither a moral nor a social evil, I say it is a political blessing. I am speaking of it now, as applicable to Kentucky. The free states do not, and will not raise hemp and tobacco. Kentucky and Missouri have the monopoly of this great article, hemp. This, as long as slavery remains, must be the case. The southern market will always keep our slaves down to a healthy point. The emancipation which has taken place in the West Indies is destroying the tropical products. They will necessarily be increased in this country. With the growth of our navy, and our mercantile marine, will increase the demand for hemp. Take away slaves, and you destroy the production of that valuable article, which is bound to make the rich lands of Kentucky and Missouri still more valuable. But examine the subject in another point of view. What is the great evil which is bearing down all Europe at this time? An excessive population.

Do we not know that slaves keep out an excessive population. They keep it out in this way. In a slave country, the low and worthless cannot find employment. Those foreigners or abolitionists from the north, who are so worthless and degraded that they would be willing to black my shoes, or to wait on me, cannot find employment here. They are compelled to go to the free states, while only those whom we desire to have among us find any inducement to come. The mechanic, the man of intelligence and of character, whether native born or foreigner, finds it better for him to come here than to go to the free states. I would refer you to Louisville where there are foreigners of the better and more industrious class. There you may find foreigners who are among the best horticulturists in the country, and the land is raised in value in consequence of their labors, from fifty to a hundred dollars per acre. Our slavery system invites this description of emigrants, while it keeps out the worthless and the abandoned. If foreign nations are disposed to send their paupers to us, slavery necessarily keeps them out of our state. While, at the same time, if the south is true to itself, we shall never be burthened with a redundant slave population. Perhaps the greatest evil to be feared from an excessive population is, that in time it must destroy republican institutions themselves. When we become two hundred millions of people, when the northern states become crowded to starvation, is it not as certain as that the sun rises and sets, that when this vast body, this living mass, thrown off from Europe, arrives here they will not only destroy republican governments, but destroy itself. Hence must arise an armed despotism, in order to protect property. Look at France, whose people at this time, after having waded through seas of blood for the last fifty years, have at last established a republic, where every man, black, white, or yellow, of twenty one years of age, is entitled to vote. They elected a convention, and in less than thirty days after their meeting their lives were in danger and they had to call in the aid of from sixty to a hundred thousand troops!

That is one of the results of an excessive population, yet forsooth the institution of slavery—an institution which has the effect of preventing an excessive population, is pronounced to be a great moral and social evil. Every man who is opposed to slavery, promises great good to the country by destroying this institution—the only one that can secure, for a long period of years, the safety of our government. I believe the time will arrive, in how long, no human foresight can tell, when the northern republics will be destroyed by a redundant population, and despotisms will prevail. But that time, if it does arrive, will be more distant in this country. Kentucky, and some few other middle states, have peculiar advantages by opening the markets of the south, to keep out a redundant and useless population. And such population being kept out, she will remain to the end of time in a happy condition.

Mr. HARDIN. I regret extremely to say a word upon this subject, but I feel compelled to do so. The only proposition that I intended to assert was this, that it was in the power of the convention to do anything and everything that the people could do in the formation of their government, unless restricted by the constitution of the United States, by acts of the congress of the United States, or by treaties of the United States made in pursuance of the treaty making power. Except so far as restricted, we have every power that the people have in the organization of the government. We cannot make a monarchy, because the constitution of the United States guarantees a republican government, and requires that a republican form of government shall prevail in every state. We are obliged, of course, to conform to this requisition in the constitution of the United States. There are a great many things that are entirely restricted to the states, in the constitution of the United States, and there are a great many powers that are concurrent, to be exercised by the congress of the United States, and by the legislative power of the several states. But whenever congress acts upon those powers, that are concurrent, then the states cannot act in contravention of that action of congress.

If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Henderson, it is this, that the convention cannot adopt any rule or regulation, or organic principle of government, to set negroes free that are now in slavery, or those that may be born hereafter of mothers who are in slavery. That is, he disclaims the power of this convention, or of any other, that may be hereafter assembled for hundreds of years to come, if we should so long exist as a government, to pass any rule or regulation for the emancipation of slaves without making compensation to the owners of such slaves. What is the power of the legislature? The legislature can do any thing and every thing that a sovereign people can do, unless forbid by the constitution of the United States or by the constitution of Kentucky.

Why was it then, that the framers of the constitution of 1799 put in this provision: "That the general assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owners, or without paying their owners previous to such emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated." Do you not see, sir, that the very powers are prohibited to the legislature, which the gentleman now asserts this convention cannot exercise? Why did the convention of 1799 put such a provision in that constitution? Because without it the legislature would have had the power from the very nature of government.

While I am up I will make one or two remarks further, though a little out of the issue. Indeed nine-tenths of the debate upon any question is out of the issue. I agree with the gentleman from Henderson. I would not exercise the power, and I disagree with the gentleman from Campbell, I would not put the law of 1833 in by any means. I always opposed that law as senator in the state legislature. I opposed it upon several grounds. One was, that I thought it a violation of the constitution of the United States; because the constitution of the United States contains a provision for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states and with the Indian tribes. I have taken it for granted that if a horse was an article of commerce in Virginia and Kentucky, Virginia could not prevent the introduction of horses there; and if a hog was an article of commerce, Virginia could not prevent us from driving hogs across the Big Sandy river; and if negroes are articles of commerce, I know of no prohibition against their introduction where they are so regarded. That was the reason why I opposed the law of 1833, for several sessions, and it passed at last by a compromise.

The gentleman last up, from Jefferson, and the gentleman up the other day, from Boyle, inquire by what right we hold our slaves. The gentleman from Boyle then goes back to the bible, and referred to the punishment inflicted upon Cain for killing his brother Abel, as the origin of slavery.

Mr. TALBOTT. The gentleman is mistaken. I never alluded to Cain and Abel.

Mr. HARDIN. Well, I understood it to come from either him or the gentleman from Jefferson. I know the gentleman from Boyle broke down this side of the flood, and I do not hear very well. [Laughter.] However, the Bible or the Testament does not authorize slavery; it only recognizes it as in existence—that is so far as I know. I am not very well acquainted with the Bible, though I do read it occasionally, and particularly the books of Job and Isaiah, which I consider the most eloquent I ever read, except the 23d chapter of Matthew, where it takes hold of those it calls pharisees, hypocrites and scribes, and says: "Wo unto ye scribes and pharisees," &c.

The gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Bullitt,) last up, I think does not understand the manner in which slavery was originally brought into this country, or else I do not. Slavery exists in Africa now, as it did in Europe two thousand years ago. The conquerer claims and exercises the right of making subjects of the conquered, of making slaves of them, or of putting them to death. And the slaves that were bought, and are now bought on the coast of Africa, are not bought by the men who brought them here, so that freemen are made slaves—they are in fact bought from slave owners. And that trade in slavery keeps up a continual and perpetual war between the countries there, and even between towns in sight of each other. That was the argument Wilberforce urged in the British parliament, why the slave trade should be put down. And Africa was in a state of war, a little predatory kind of war, beginning south of the Orange river, in about 35 degrees, and running clear to the southern part of the great desert of Sahara, and clear across the African continent. They did attempt to put it down, and Great Britain now has vessels on the African coast to catch slaves, and America has, and France also has, but it does not answer the purpose. There is a large slave market through the desert, in Africa itself, in Morocco, Tripoli, and Tunis, and Egypt, as well as a slave trade through Madagascar and along there to the north. And there is no way to put it down, other than to make war upon it, to go to the Emperor of Morocco, the Beys of Tripoli and Tunis and to the Governor, whoever he may be of Egypt, and to Brazil, and tell them that the trade must stop. I wish to God that it was stopped. Was it asked by what right they held negroes in Virginia? They were bought as slaves, and from the owners of slaves on the coast of Africa, beginning at about the Bight of Berrin and going south to the Orange river. They were bought as slaves from those who owned them, and had a right to own them. The same right existed at that day as it exists in this. That is the ground upon which we hold them, and our constitution and laws recognize it on that ground. In the name of God, have I the right to hold you in slavery without some great natural principle, just as if it grew up by accident? It was not established or authorized by the laws of either Kentucky or Virginia, but by the slave merchant who bought them from the slave merchant in Africa and brought them here.

The gentleman from Jefferson who spoke some time ago does not seem to understand our powers. What powers have we? Have we not as much in this convention as if we heretofore had been a territory, and were now, for the first time, making a government. Why certainly—just as much. In our new territory in California, they are now attempting, by convention, to make a new government, and have we not as much power here as they possess; they made a constitution here in '92, and have we not as much power as our predecessors had then? We have. Have we not as much power as the people of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, or any other state? Just as much. But, says the gentleman, the exercise of the full plenitude of power here would be a state of revolution. I am not to be alarmed at that raw head and bloody bones cry of revolution. I have heard it often, and have never attached any importance to it. We come here to make our government just as we please—and how shall we do it. We can adopt the present constitution as it now stands; we can alter and change it as we please, or make a new one out and out. I do not care if we are in a state of revolution, still we retain that power, and I shall not be driven under the bed like a cross child by this raw head and bloody bones outcry. I, for one, would not exercise the power, and I have no idea of setting my negroes free at all. I pity their condition as much as any man in the country, and I shall do all that I can, as a master, to make their situation a happy one, and I hope that every other man will do the same. They fare better than I do, and every man's negroes should fare as well as is consistent with the policy of keeping them in slavery. But here they are, 200,000 of them in Kentucky. Turn them loose, and I would not live a month in the country. We cannot intermarry with, or give them any right, civil, political, or social, that we enjoy. We can give them every religious right we have, and that is all we can do. Turn loose the 200,000 negroes free among us, and what will become of them? Will you hunt them away to another state? No; they would not move ten miles from home; and in that they would act sensibly, for if they did they would be caught up and sold. They would have no encouragement to work, none at all, and would at most work out one day as a matter of appearance, and then steal during the other six.

I would not give up the slaveholding people of Kentucky for any people on earth. I recollect when a boy of reading Mr. Burke's and Lord North's arguments in the British Parliament, in reference to the course to be pursued towards the American colonies—and when Lord North in recapitulating the means and powers of the government, finally went into a comparison between the British soldier and the American, and said that one of the former could whip ten of the latter, ten a hundred, a hundred a thousand, and a thousand a hundred thousand, and denounced us as slaveholders. I never can forget the answer: "Where no slavery is tolerated, there the people look upon liberty as a political right, but where slavery is tolerated, there they look upon it as a high personal privilege, and will die before they give it up." And I believe in that doctrine, and if the whole of Europe was to invade us, I have no doubt that the last gun for liberty would be fired in a slaveholding state. It is a generous, a manly population, and any law that goes to alarm or drive out the slave owners, brings in a people in their stead not very agreeable to my taste. We should have, as they do at the north, the outpouring of Europe, and all the vagabonds, rapscallions, and miserable beings of the world let loose upon us. And are we to exchange the generous slaveholder for this class of people? I would not exchange one for a hundred of them. I believe we have now in Kentucky the best population to be found any where, from the rising to the setting of the sun, and from pole to pole. This is the language of a Kentuckian, and of a Native American. I do protest against any restriction upon our powers. We have the power, but I do not want to exercise it—God knows I do not. The gentleman's proposition does assert that we have no power, and I say that we have.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. I feel obliged to the gentleman from Henderson for introducing his resolution. There are two considerations which operate upon my mind, and make it an important matter that this resolution, in its real meaning and intent, should be discussed in this house. We have been in session two weeks, and we have indulged in a course of erratic debate, and upon any question that had any affinity whatever to the absorbing topic of slavery. We have had it brought upon us in all its various guises, until the house has become so distempered, irritable, and sensitive, in regard to the subject, that it seems to me it is almost incapable of looking at any thing that can, by a forced construction, be made to affiliate with slavery. I apprehend this is a state of feeling exceedingly unfortunate for the wise results that are expected by the people at our hands. Most exceedingly unfortunate will it be to the great abstract principles, which in their consequences are important to us and to our generation forever, should it be decided by being viewed from a promontory which does not give the mind the ability to arrive at just conclusions. And among the subjects of the greatest importance for the discussion of this house and the information of the people at large, I class the resolution which the gentleman from Henderson has offered, and for which I tender him my most sincere thanks.

The PRESIDENT announced the arrival of the hour of twelve, when by the direction of the house, the orders of the day were to be considered.

Upon motion the order was dispensed with, that the gentleman might continue his remarks.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. I am sincerely obliged to the house for the compliment they have thought proper to pay me, and I shall not trespass long upon their patience, because my remarks will be confined to the legitimate subject under consideration. I will read the resolution offered by the gentleman from Henderson without the preamble.

"Resolved, That this convention has not the power or right, by any principle it may in*corporate into the constitution of the state, to deprive the citizen of his property without his consent."

I have read the resolution thus far, and I ask is there a principle contained in it, that is not absolutely essential to society itself, and without which can society exist at all? The necessity for society has originated society. The necessity which mankind labored under to have such established institutions as would secure their property and liberty has originated society. It was not the wild and licentious idea of liberty that originated society—it was that the liberty which is in a manner enjoyed by mankind without society, should be so framed and regulated as to be consistent with order and with property. It was that order and freedom should be made to exist in some system of laws denominated a social compact. Necessity, the mother of wisdom, urged mankind into this association, and the standard principle of that association is declared to be property and order. Property is but an element of personal liberty. In a social compact there can be no such thing as liberty without property being sacred and inviolate. It then becomes a standard principle of a social compact, that the right of property shall be sacred; and in order to that end, it is necessary that we should give up some of our liberty when it comes in conflict with this society. That position, I am very well convinced, will not be impugned by either of my friends from Nelson, to whom I listened with great pleasure.

The principle then being conceded, it shows that there are such standard principles necessary for the maintenance of social order, and that each disregard of those principles dissipates social order and destroys the very object man had in view, when urged by necessity to adopt a social compact. Then one of these standard principles must be taken into consideration here, in view of the powers of this convention. Has this convention a sovereign right to overturn the social compact which binds mankind together? They have no right to anything that will infringe on the standard principle upon which this social compact is based; and whenever they do usurp that power, just then do they do what seems to have excited the risibility of my friend from Nelson—just then do they enter upon the confines of a revolutionary proceeding. And although to the gentleman this term revolution seems a bug-bear and a scare-crow—yet with all the respect I entertain for him and his abilities, a respect which I entertain second to no man in the house, I must differ with him in that position. What does this resolution declare but a standard principle of society, one without which society cannot exist, and which, if this body undertakes to trample under foot, they undertake to do that which never entered into the minds of the people who sent them here. What is it—"Resolved, That this convention has not the power or right, by any principle it may incorporate into the constitution of the state, to deprive the citizen of his property without his consent." A standard principle, without which society cannot exist—and the invasion of which will create a sensation throughout this land, I think highly honorable to the people whom we represent. Let us see for a moment the consequences of a position antagonistic to this. Does the gentleman, or either of them, from Nelson, regard it as the right of this house to take away private property without the consent of, or compensation to, the owner? When you establish that principle, do you not perceive you have established and declared the right to divide our lands, and to do every thing not inconsistent with the constitution of the United States, in regard to the obligations of contract. If you have the right to emancipate a slave without consent and without pay, then you have the same right over every other species of property that it has been the pleasure of God to give us. I can perceive no difference. And if you reject this resolution and adopt the opinion of the gentleman from Nelson, do you not incorporate in the constitution the idea that the sovereignty of the people is to unite to take from the weak and give to the strong. You take from the rich and give to the poor, and you break down those standard principles upon which the temple of society is based. Vote against this resolution, and adopt that of the gentleman from Nelson, and that is the position the members of this convention will be bound to occupy. This is a position I am not prepared for. You have no power to do so. You have only power to perfect into detail the great object of a social compact, and to carry out the object of association.

This social compact is exhibited in different parts of the world under different phases. The manner of carrying out the object of society varies in a monarchy, a despotism, and in a democratic government. These are mere illustrations of power which are to be exercised in harmonious consistency with the great standard principle of a social compact. We happily have succeeded in achieving for ourselves the proud institutions of self government. What we have to do now is to carry out into detail the great design upon which the social compact is based, and we have not the least right to break down the barriers of the standard principle in the social compact. If we take the Autocrat of Russia as representing the extensive empire over which he presides, and he should strike at the rights of property, society would cease to exist, the end of all social order would be determined, and the result would be that the nation would not be so prosperous as it is. The manner of carrying out this idea of a social compact in the various countries of the world was always governed by the circumstances around those countries. The circumstances under which the august power of Great Britain is exercised, makes her adopt a certain mode of carrying out the social compact. And so with regard to all nations of the earth, including ourselves. We are here to adopt a mode and system, and while in that condition we are asked to reject a resolution embodying the basis of society. Am I understood?

Well sir, "this convention has not the power or right, by any principle it may incorporate into the constitution of the state, to deprive the citizen of his property without his consent, unless it be for the public good, and only then by making to him a just compensation therefor." The first position I assume to be adapted to the second, and only makes it practicable or rather only illustrates it by a detail of its practical operation. Your object is not to take away private property except for the public good, and it is not reasonable that you should have a contrary imputation cast upon you. Then you may be answered on the subject of emancipation, that it is only suggested by the idea of public good. On this subject I wish to say but very little. I stand here fully convinced of the untenability of any such scheme as an emancipation of the slaves of Kentucky at this time. I stand here determined to give expression to any opinion which I may here entertain. I stand here elected by an intelligent constituency, who entertain the views in regard to the practical untenability of emancipation that I do, and who entertain the view in regard to the abstract question of slavery that I do, and who also entertain the views that I do in regard to justice. I believe that if it was an original question whether slavery should now be introduced among us—the subject being dis-embarrassed of the jealousy which has naturally arisen from it by the course the agitation has taken, and various other reasons—then, on this floor I say, I would never introduce slavery into Kentucky. But viewing Kentucky as being already a slave state, as having within her borders that species of property, which citizens were induced to obtain at the expense of their money by the encouragement of the whole people of the state, the question presents a different aspect entirely to the consideration of my mind. The people of this state induced the slave holder to purchase and bring into the state, his slaves. It has been guaranteed under the constitution of 1792, and the convention of 1798, that slave property should be as sacred as any property which a man could hold in this state. They have been induced to purchase it by the non-slaveholders, for by a reference to slavery statistics it will be seen that though slavery has increased, still the non-slaveholding population has increased in the ratio of 110 to some 25 or 30 of the slaveholding. And nothing protects the resolution, according to the position assumed by my friend from Nelson, but the mere vote of these 110, and their attachment to it. Nothing prevents it but a wholesome public sentiment, and the traditional recollection in the hearts of the people, that if there is any wrong in the holding of the slaves, it is not on the side of the slaveholder, but rather the fault of the institutions of the country which perhaps encouraged him to obtain them. And justice, when submitted to the proper tribunal, is never silent. And hence the dread and jealousy the people entertained that this principle of justice might be disturbed, has secured the return of not a single emancipationist here. Nothing else but a sound public sentiment on the subject of slavery has made this house what it is. Yet if you do not adopt this resolution, you will jar that public sentiment, and you will make people think that there is something in view of this convention, to do the majority the wrong of disturbing this element of justice.

Apart from the proper title to the slave, we hold our title to our slaves under the constitution of 1792, and under none other. That constitution was made while we were in a state of society, when we owned slaves, the result of the relations of law which existed at the time that constitution was made. I would ask any gentleman whether it comports with his idea of law and right, that the convention of 1792 in forming this constitution had a right to free all the slaves in Kentucky without compensation or without consent? It is a proposition perfectly inconsistent with any idea of justice, or with any state of society. Did the convention of 1792 have the right to proclaim all the slaves of Kentucky free? If they had not, why? Because it would be inconsistent with the principles on which society is based—those principles which are always harmonious with justice.

The resolution declares that the property of the citizen shall not be taken without his consent unless for the public good, "and only then by making to him a just compensation therefor." Now, if as time rolls on, slavery becomes so mischievous in the bosom of Kentucky that the people are perfectly convinced that it ought not to exist, and having found the means of abolishing it without allowing the slaves to remain among us—who can doubt their right in the exercise of the sovereignty of the country, to rid themselves of what they may then consider to be a great evil? Say that experience has changed the mind of gentlemen here, or that a resort to her bibles or to other sources, has convinced them of the evil tendency the institution has exerted, and that public sentiment has arrived at a full conviction that it ought to be got rid of, would they not have a right to do so? Is it not an element of sovereignty to be able to protect yourselves? It is one of the most necessary for self-preservation, and any attempt to interdict it by constitutional provision would be a dead letter, whenever circumstances arose requiring its exercise. And that time would arrive when public sentiment became generally and heartily satisfied that slavery was mischievous, and a political and moral evil to the body politic of Kentucky. Then what will they do? But two things present themselves to my mind. One is very doubtful indeed—the other is in no doubt. I have no doubt if such is the sentiment of the country, that slavery is an evil too great to be borne—admitting it to be true, even those who do not believe it—still if time convinces them of their error—they will agree to be taxed and give a just compensation. They will inquire into the humanity of the matter, and a system of emancipation will be adopted where the two elements, justice to the master, and humanity to the slave, will be reconciled and combined. That state of things cannot exist unless brought forth by the operation of moral and physical causes. The physical cause must be acted upon by the moral cause, and the moral cause must be governed by justice and the nature of things, and when that time comes, slavery ceases to exist in Kentucky. That state of things does not exist now. There are times in society, when subjects are agitated of great importance to the people—that then prejudices become so excited, that the question does not receive from them an impartial consideration—yet there was a still calm voice in the bosom of every man, which, when those prejudices and extraneous considerations ceased to operate, would be heard. And whenever that still small voice does decide in favor of the emancipation of the slaves, then the most perturbed mind will acquiesce in it, and slavery here ceases forever.

I have never entertained an opinion which would go to interfere with the rights, or of the claims of the slave to humane consideration. I am here to vote, and will vote against any proposition that will even indicate a tendency to emancipate the slaves. I am here and will vote for every proposition that will go to lessen the number of free negroes in the state. I am here, and will vote to tax slave property, and I am a slaveholder myself, that will have a tendency to make the slaves less mischievous and troublesome to the country than they are now, and to prevent them from fleeing away from us. All these positions I entertain in this body. I am here to go as far as any one to protect that property, and to make the institution of a character, that it will be sustained by the public sentiment. I am here, declaring that it is the offspring of law, and that it exists and is based upon public sentiment, and the only way to perpetuate it, is by adapting it to that sentiment. The result of the laxity of discipline on the part of the master, is, that the slave population is becoming mischievous to a very great extent, and thereby an imposition on the non-slaveholding portion of the community. This should cease. The time will come when these people who own no slaves will feel sensitive under this burthen, and enquire why it is they are compelled to bear all their evils. I am willing to go all lengths to obviate this condition of things, so that even in such a matter public sentiment shall be fully satisfied. I have said all that is necessary and all that I expected.

The convention then went into committee of the whole, Mr. BARLOW in the chair, on the resolutions of Mr. TURNER in relation to slavery.

The CHAIR awarded the floor to Mr. CLARKE, who waived it to Mr. TALBOTT, that gentleman expressing a desire now to finish the remarks he was compelled by an attack of illness to forego on Saturday.

Mr. TALBOTT rose and spoke as follows: I arise this morning to conclude the remarks which, from indisposition, I was compelled to discontinue on Saturday. At that time I had just concluded the proof, as to how, and when, and by what authority, the institution of slavery was first established; showing clearly, as I think, from the context and the proof then adduced, that God did, by the prophetic denunciation of Noah, doom Ham and his posterity to the latest generations, to personal servitude or slavery to his brethren, Shem and Japheth, and to their posterity, as appears in the 9th chapter of Genesis, from 24th to 28th verses. The question then was, as to the institution, and the question now is, as to the privilege and practice of slavery. And my object, on the present occasion, will be to show, if I can, whether there is any law, either in the old or new testament scriptures, allowing or forbidding the privilege or practice of slavery to the Patriarch, the Jew, or the Christian; to show whether slavery is compatible or incompatible, consistent or inconsistent, contrary to, or in conformity with, the will or law of God, as revealed in either or both testaments; whether a man has a right to purchase, own, and hold property in slaves, at any time, or under any circumstances, without committing a sin in the sight of God, and incurring his righteous displeasure. We will then, sir, see what was the practice of the wisest and best men in the patriarchal age. And I refer you, first then, to the 14th chapter of Genesis, 14th verse, which reads:

"And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained servants, born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them unto Dan."

From which you see that Abraham, the father of the faithful, and the friend of God, had three hundred and eighteen servants, raised in his own house, reared by his own hand, and subject to his own absolute control, in war as well as in peace—a privilege much greater than any in our country either exercise or enjoy. And, so far from being considered a curse in those days, one of the strongest arguments by Eleazer, when urging Rebekah to marry Isaac, the son of Abraham, was, that the Lord had greatly blessed his master with houses and lands, and silver and gold, and men servants, and maid servants; and all, said Eleazer, that my master hath, he has given to his son Isaac. Rebekah could not have been an abolitionist, or have believed slavery to be a sin, for she very readily agreed to take Isaac with all his slaves.

If you will turn now to the 20th chapter of Exodus, 17th verse, you will find slavery is put, by God himself, in the same category with all other property: "Thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's house, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's wife, nor his man servant, nor his maid servant, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor any thing that is thy neighbors." Here, sir, you see the right clearly acknowledged by the law itself, that your neighbor has to his servant, and you are positively forbid to covet them, just as you are, to covet his ox, his ass, or any other property that is your neighbors.

Turn now, sir, to the 21st Exodus, 20th and 21st verses, and you will find slavery positively affirmed to be money: "If a man smite his servant or his maid with a rod, and he die under his hand, he shall be surely punished. Notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished, because he is his money." This, sir, does not seem as if the people, in those days believed slavery a great sin, or that a man has no right, under the laws, at least of that dispensation, to purchase and hold slaves.

Turn now, sir, and read the 17th chapter of Genesis, 12th, 13th, and 14th verses, and you will find slavery incorporated with the institution of circumcision:

"And he that is eight days old, shall be circumcised among you, every man child in your generations; he that is born in the house or bought with money from any stranger, which is not of thy seed.

"He that is born in thy house, and he that is bought with thy money, must needs be circumcised: and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant."

Turn now, sir, to the 12th chapter of Exodus, 43d, 44th, and 45th verses, and you will see slavery incorporated with the institution of the passover:

"And the Lord said unto Moses and Aaron, this is the ordinance of the passover: there shall no stranger eat thereof:

"But every man's servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof.

"A foreigner and a hired servant shall not eat thereof."

Now, sir, here are two instances, where, under the express direction of God, slavery has been recognized and incorporated with two distinct institutions—and, in one, the bondman, to the express and positive exclusion of the hired servant.

We have now seen the practice of slavery, and let us see if we can find the privilege.

Turn then sir, to the 21st chapter of Exodus, from the 1st to the 7th verse, and you will find, the children of maid servants went with their mothers.

"2. If thou buy a Hebrew servant, six years he shall serve: and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing.

"3. If he came in by himself, he shall go out by himself: if he were married, then his wife shall go out with him.

"4. If his master have given him a wife, and she have borne him sons or daughters, the wife and her children shall be her master's, and he shall go out by himself.

"5. And if the servant shall plainly say, I love my master, my wife, and my children; I will not go out free:

"6. Then his master shall bring him unto the judges: he shall also bring him to the door, or unto the door-post: and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl: and he shall serve him for ever."

Turn then, sir, to the 25th chapter of Leviticus and read from 39th to 47th verses.

"39. And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee; thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bond-servant:

"40. But as a hired servant, and as a sojourner he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee:

"41. And then shall he depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return.

"42. For they are my servants which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt; they shall not be sold as bond-men.

"43. Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour, but shalt fear thy God.

"44. Both thy bond-men, and thy bond-maids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bond-men and bond-maids.

"45. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession.

"46. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession, they shall be your bond-men for ever; but over your brethren the children of Israel, ye shall not rule one over another with rigour."

I presume now, sir, after reading these verses, that no one under the influence of right reason, will pretend to say that the Jews, under this law, had no right to purchase, and own, and hold slaves—the Hebrew, till the year of jubilee, and the heathen and stranger forever, or for life, and to entail them upon their families as an inheritance. All admit, that under this law, the Jews had a right to own slaves, bondmen and bond-maids. Some say the Jews had a right to hold them for life, and transmit them to their children, but that we have no such right, the law having been long since cancelled or repealed. If it has, I do not know when or where, or how, or by what authority; but if it ever has, it devolves upon the opposition to show it. Here is a perfect right until a better one can be shown. I believe it is a principle universally acknowledged, and one established in all our courts, that in every suit of ejectment, the complainant has to prove his title good before he can recover, whether the occupant has any right or not. And it does seem to me sir, unless the emancipationists can show some law equal in dignity and authority, some express statute of Jehovah, or some act of the creature by which this express privilege granted, has been, either by operation of law, abrogated, or by statute repealed, they should forever after hold their peace. But more of this sir, after a little. Others say, the privilege here granted to purchase slaves or bond-men, and hold them forever, means, and never meant anything more than that they might buy them and hold them, till the year of jubilee. That forever and jubilee mean one and the same thing, or that they are synonymous terms. This idea sir, I think will prove to be very absurd if you will look for a moment to the 29th verse of this same chapter. Let us read:

"29. And if a man sell a dwelling house in a walled city, then he may redeem it within a whole year after it is sold; within a full year may he redeem it.

"30. And if it be not redeemed within the space of a full year, then the house that is in the walled city shall be established forever to him that bought it, throughout his generation: it shall not go out in the jubilee."

And what do we find here sir. Not that jubilee and forever are synonymous, or mean one and the same thing, but the contrary. It expressly declares that if a house in a walled city be sold, it may be redeemed within a whole year, but if not redeemed within a year, it shall positively be the property of the purchaser forever—it shall not go out in the jubilee, so that I think the question, that jubilee and forever, in this connection, are not synonymous, and do not mean one and the same thing, should now be considered as settled. But, to prove still more clearly, and if possible, that the bondmen here named, purchased of the heathen and the stranger, did not go out in the jubilee, but were to continue the property of the masters forever, I beg leave to read from Matthew Henry's note on these verses, which reads as follow:

"That they might purchase bondmen from the heathen nations round about them or of those strangers who sojourned amongst them, (except of those seven nations who were to be 'destroyed)—and might claim a dominion over them, and entail them to their families as an inheritance. For the year of jubilee should give no discharge to them."

Again, you discover one thing very plainly here from this 39th verse of Leviticus, that no Israelite or Jew was to be made bondman or slave for life, and why? Because it was of Shem, through the Jews, concerning the flesh, Christ or the Saviour was to come, as he did, and as was shown in the remarks concluded on Saturday. And hence the importance that no Jew should be sold as a bond servant forever, or for life, as in this way the nation would have lost its identity, as they would have been sent, in this condition all over the world, as the Africans, the descendants of Ham have been; and mixing as slaves with the descendants of Ham, in every age of the world, they would have so amalgamated as to destroy the identity of both nations, which would have defeated the intention of the God of heaven, to-wit: to keep the line of three distinct races of beings—to show in all time to come the exact fulfillment of the prophetic denunciation of Noah, in 9th Genesis, not only of the curse of Ham, but the blessing of Shem and enlargement of Japheth, which never could have been done if God had made common slaves, or slaves in common of the children of more than one of them; and hence the prophecy concerning each was different, and has been executed, and can and will continue to be, just as it has been under this arrangement in all time to come, or the setting up of a new dispensation. This is God's purpose, and this is his plan, as appears from the evidence adduced, for reasons unrevealed and unknown to us. Read again the 46th verse. Now you see here is a positive law, granting the privilege in so many words, to buy and hold slaves for life, or forever. But notice sir, it tells who you are to make slaves for life. Now, sir, there is a very important question just here, one which I think may shed some light on this subject, and it is this, sir. Do you believe the provision in the 39th verse of this chapter, that no Israelite or Jew was to be made a bondman for life, that they were to serve six years, and go out in the seventh? I ask, sir, do you believe this? If you do, sir, you are bound to believe the provision contained in the other, to-wit: that they might buy bondmen of the heathen and strangers, who were to be slaves forever, and be transmitted from generation to generation, or until at least the setting up of a new dispensation, for the law that establishes the one grants the other. Sir, this view is clear to my mind, and the conclusion inevitable, to-wit: that the prophecy of Noah was of God, and its fulfillment of God—and that the curse of Ham was slavery to the latest generations.

Now this certainly settles the question, and I will so consider it, unless some more authoritative law is found to inhibit it; for here is the privilege to purchase, to hold, and transmit to your families after you.

But 'tis said that the New Testament is against it. Let us see if this be true.

Paul, in his letter to 1 Corinthians, 7th chapter, 20th, 21st, 22d, 23d and 24th verses, says:

"20. Let every man abide in the same calling wherein he was called.

"21. Art thou called being a servant? care not for it; but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather.

"22. For he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's freeman: likewise also he that is called, being free, is Christ's servant.

"23. Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men.

"24. Brethren, let every man, wherein he is called, therein abide with God."

Again: Paul, in his epistle to the Ephesians, 6th chapter, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th verses, says:

"5. Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of your heart, as unto Christ;

"6. Not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart;

"7. With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men;

"8. Knowing that whatsoever good thing any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free.

"9. And, ye masters, do the same things unto them, forbearing threatening: knowing that your Master also is in heaven; neither is there respect of persons with him."

Again: Paul, in his epistle to the Colossians, 3rd chapter, 22nd, 23rd, 24th, and 25th verses; says:

"22. Servants, obey in all things your masters according to the flesh; not with eye-service, as men-pleasers; but in singleness of heart, fearing God.

"23. And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily, as to the Lord, and not unto men;

"24. Knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance: for ye serve the Lord Christ.

"25. But he that doeth wrong, shall receive for the wrong which he hath done: and there is no respect of persons."

Again: Paul, in his first epistle to Timothy, 6th chapter, 1st and 2nd verses, says:

"1. Let as many servants as are under the yoke count their own masters worthy of all honour, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed.

"2. And they that have believing masters, let them not despise them, because they are brethren; but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit. These things teach and exhort."

Again: Paul, in his epistle to Titus, 2nd chapter, 9th and 10th verses, says:

"9. Exhort servants to be obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things; not answering again;

"10. Not purloining, but shewing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things."

Again: Paul, in his first epistle to Peter, 2nd chapter, 18th, 19th, and 20th verses, says:

"18. Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.

"19. For this is thank-worthy, if a man for other, have established a legislative despotism for our state, in my mind the worst of all despotisms.

Mr. HARDIN. I have been looking forward to the contest which is now approaching. I have been expecting it for months. This is the very point upon which we are to show our hands in some way, shape, or manner. Sir, what is required to insure a good government—a real good, popular, democratic government? It is that the people shall govern themselves, imposing on them a few wholesome salutary restraints. Well, now are they to govern themselves? They cannot meet as the people were accustomed to do in the republic of Athens and vote upon every law. They are spread over a surface of country in this Union which embraces now about three million three hundred thousand square miles. They can only meet by their representatives. The people of the United States can only assemble by their representatives. The people of Kentucky, spread as they are over an extent of forty thousand square miles, comprising a population of eight hundred thousand, can only meet by their representatives. As we cannot have democracy then in its original character, we must approach as near as we can to it. How is this to be attained? Why, the people are to send men here to represent them. These men are to speak the will of the people. In what way, sir, are we to conduct this government? By taking the election of all the officers of the government into our own hands; to proclaim to the world and have it well understood, that we deem ourselves in this enlightened age competent to all purposes of self-government. The world has advanced in sciences of every kind, and it has greatly improved in the science of government. I for one am ready to proclaim to the world that I believe the people of the United States are competent to govern themselves, and no state stands more prominent in its character, in its republican character, than the state of Kentucky. There are those, who under the principle of conservatism, would provide the means by which people may have some way to take care of themselves. Is it the elective principle that insures it? No sir. What is it then? It is the elective principle coupled with practical responsibility. That is what does it. Let us vote for every officer of this government from a governor down to a constable. Let us take the elective franchise into our own hands, and let the same power, the majority that elects a man to office, have a right to say to him whenever they believe that he misbehaves, you shall leave the office. Did not the people of Rome elect the worst men upon the face of the earth as Emperors? They elected a Nero, a Domician and a Tiberias, the very worst scourges by which mankind was ever afflicted; and why did they act as they did? Because there was no power to call them to an account. Did not the people of France elect Bonaparte Emperor? Yes, every man of twenty one years of age, gave his vote to elect an Emperor who put his foot upon their necks. Why was it that he had such power over France that he could make thousands bleed at his pleasure? Because the people of France had no way by which they could make him accountable. It is the elective franchise, exercised by a majority, that makes a country to that extent a republic.

It is the controlling power of the majority that carries out the republican principle, which without that power would not be carried out.

Sir, says the gentleman, what would have become of the old court, if this principle had not been adopted? Yes, and if the two thirds principle had not been in, what would have become of that miserable old magistrate out in Greenup, who was brought before the court, a few years ago, for the worst kind of offence? If it is established that a majority can appoint, a majority should also have power to remove; not the majority of a quorum, but a majority of all those elected, a majority of the whole state. Sir, we set out in this business about four or five years ago—I mean this convention business. It was proclaimed from one end of the state to the other that there must be more practical responsibility, or we should cease to be a republic. Well, sir, a meeting was held in the senate chamber, a chairman was chosen and a certain gentleman was appointed to draw an address to the people of Kentucky. He drew it up, and we met again, a small band of us; we did not like the address exactly in all its parts, it was sent back to be remodeled, and was again brought up and read. Several gentlemen stood off and would not put their names to it. There was something of conservatism about them and they would not put their names to it. At last the people began to take the matter up and names began to be attached to it; first one man and then another put his name to it; we saw then how the wind was blowing and we all pitched in. The men who had before stood off then signed their names. Those who stood aloof when I wrote my name, and would not sign, afterwards did so. Well, upon the first vote for a convention the question was carried by a majority of forty eight thousand. The second year there was a majority of eighty thousand. Well now what was the principal change that was to be made by the convention? It was, that all the officers of government should be elected by the people, and that they should all be held responsible to the people, that every officer should be responsible to the same power that elected him; that is, a majority of the people. Without this, I say it is not a republic at all. Ah, says the gentleman, the people will act incautiously, they will act under excitement; it is not to be suffered that a majority shall have power to displace an officer of the government. That is the language of monarchists, the language of courtiers. The people, he says, must be saved from themselves, they must not be entrusted with this power, they must be guarded by this principle of strong conservatism. If the people are not to be entrusted with the management of their own affairs, let us go back to monarchy, let us go back to Great Britain at once and send for Victoria to rule over us.

I set out in favor of this identical principle, and I would not give a ninepence for the constitution unless this was in it. We are to be saved from ourselves, because we may do wrong. I am a bad manager of my own affairs, as every body knows, particularly of my money matters; but managed right or wrong, I would rather have the management myself than to have any one else manage for me. There is something plea-ant in the thought, that I may manage my affairs as I choose, and if this be really a republican government, let a majority of the people manage the affairs of government. Suppose the majority do wrong, who is to suffer? That very majority, and they will soon right themselves. I recollect I once went out when I was about thirteen or fourteen years old, upon a mill pond in a canoe, with three other boys. We commenced rocking the boat. We shall be drowned if we upset, said the three boys, for we cannot swim a stroke. We upset sure enough. I could swim pretty well, so I was not alarmed. I called out to them to hold on to the side of the boat and keep their chins above water, while I swam ashore with the rope so as to drag the boat ashore. They caught hold of the boat. Lord, how they did spread themselves to keep afloat! The instinct of self-preservation made them exert themselves, and self-preservation will make us careful to do right. If we had to cross the Mississippi in a skiff, would we besuch fools as to turn over when we knew that we must all be drowned? Not at all. Let us trust ourselves. I came here for the purpose of endeavoring to establish this principle in the new constitution, and if we do not do that, we shall have accomplished nothing. Save us from ourselves! That may be the doctrine of some gentlemen, but it is not my doctrine. God save the people, and let them govern themselves—that is what I say. I never court any man-power, though I court now and then the people. I look to the sovereignty of the people—to that I have looked all my life—I am willing to trust them. I have no idea that a man shall be made a judge unless duly qualified, and I shall vote for the guard of eight years practice at the bar, as a qualification. I will vote for the further guard that the age of thirty years shall be required of the candidate for a judgeship. Nay, I would go further, and make it thirty-five years. But as to responsibility, I want to hold him responsible to a majority of all the people of Kentucky. That is the responsibility I ask.

I have no doubt I shall meet a good deal of opposition upon this point, because it is a leading feature among the purposes for which we are assembled. I hope it will be well weighed by this house before they adopt the two-thirds principle. If we adopt it in reference to the judges of the court of appeals, we must adopt it with reference to every other officer of the government; and I now call upon those who are in favor of reform, those who are of the old convention party, to bear in mind that this was one of the principal objects for which the convention was called.

MR. PRESTON. I know very well the age and experience of my honorable friend from Nelson, and I am aware of the deference that is due to him on a subject of such magnitude as that which he has this moment discussed. It was with some amazement that I heard the proposition, as I had not anticipated that any one in this house would advance the principle, or contend for it, or seek to engraft it in the constitution which we are about to frame. I am at present too, on account of the novelty of the position, unprepared to meet it except by those apparent arguments, which I believe, address themselves to the mind of every member of this house upon the great innovation which the gentleman from Nelson proposes to make. I believe, however, that there is fallacy at the bottom of his position, so clear and so palpable, one so destructive of every true principle of government that a mere tyro in the science, destitute of the knowledge or experience that he possesses can clearly discover it. It is not requisite that one should be deeply instructed, in order to find out the monstrous consequences to which it would lead. I take issue with the gentleman boldly and pointedly. If we stand here for the purpose of dragging all the powers of government, bound and manacled to the feet of the legislative power, delusively called, by the member from Nelson, the people, I, for one, am not prepared to go such lengths. The people, the people, the people, is the constant cry, and when the gentleman defines what is meant by the people in this case, it appears that it is the address of a bare majority of the legislature of the state. This is what he styles the people. I deny the proposition; the legislature are not the people. It may be deemed presumptuous in me to set my opinions in opposition to those of a gentleman from whom I received much instruction in youth, and from whom I imbibed many of the principles which I entertain in manhood. But in regard to this subject I feel that I stand upon the true ground, and that ground I am ready to maintain, assisted or unassisted in this convention.

What is the provision in the report, in reference to the removal of the judges of the appellate court? It is this:

"But for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them, on the address of two thirds of each house of the general assembly."

Now sir, the question is, shall we permit a mere majority to exercise this right. A majority of the legislature are to expel ignominiously from office, session after session, the very judges chosen by the people, and yet it is to be done under a false and pernicious political pretext, and in the name of the people. The French convention, when they appointed the committee of public safety, announced the principle, that the people possessed the supreme power. The convention of France, when constituted however, assumed to hold all the power in their own hands, and declared itself was the people. My belief is, that the tendency would be the same with regard to the legislature of Kentucky. If I understand any thing of the feeling which prevails in this house, in regard to the powers of the legislature, that feeling is in favor of curtailing those powers. Look upon our tables, see the multitude of propositions with which they are loaded, until they seem like the moon, described in the poem of Ariosto, a place in which the lost wits and crude ideas of all the world were collected. It is already proposed in this convention, that the legislature shall not be permitted to grant any banking privileges, that they shall not be permitted to meet oftener than once in two years, that they shall not be permitted to run the state into debt, and a multitude of provisions such as these are advocated by distinguished gentlemen. And yet it is now proposed that they shall have the right to bind and manacle the judges and compel them to retire from office whenever the legislature may see proper so to direct.

Is it possible that gentlemen can suppose that the people of Kentucky will be satisfied with the provision, which directs that the judges shall hold their offices at the will of the legislature. If this principle be applied to the judges, it must be applied also to all the other officers of the government; and the address of a bare majority of the legislature is not only to expel the judges from their office, but to expel the governor of the state from his office, and place the executive and judicial departments under the absolute dominion of the legislature. Would this be in accordance with the wishes of the people of Kentucky? Are gentlemen of this house reduced to the miserable and farcical pretext—and I say it with all respect to my honorable friend from Nelson—of asserting that, when they are imposing limitations upon the powers of the legislature, crippling their authority, saying that they shall have no pay after sixty days, or that it shall be reduced one half, and taking away from them the power to act upon certain specified subjects, that it is necessary to place, at the same time, the judiciary within the grasp of a merciless legislative majority. Sir, the historical examples that were cited by the gentleman were, if my recollection be correct, entirely different in their tenor from that which he supposes. The people of Rome, the gentleman says, placed upon the throne Caligula and Nero, and he says that the tyranny endured by Rome under those Emperors was on account of the people not having a proper control over them. If he will tax his memory a little further he will find that it was the corrupt legislature that elected from time to time the Emperors, and combined with the Pretorian guard, elevated men into power and made sale of the empire to replenish their purses, that caused the destruction of Roman liberty. If he will turn to a more recent instance—to the French assembly to which he has alluded—he will find, that when that assembly had been called together by the people, they abrogated the executive power, and made their own sitting almost permanent. They first declared a constitution, and gave the monarch the right to veto. When, in the time of Louis the 16th, confiscation of the church property was determined on, it was then the assembly cried out against the executive veto. The legislature deprived the executive of that protection, and the king's head fell. The independence of the judiciary soon sunk under the invasions of the same body. A revolutionary tribunal, with Fouquier-Tinville at its head, arose based upon its ruins; bill after bill of attainder was passed and a committee of public safety was appointed. When that committee was established, of which Carnot was a member, Fouquier-Tinville directed, day after day, long lists of accusations and proscriptions to be prepared, and made the streets flow with blood, long processions of carts filled with unfortunate noblemen, were driven along, and when lesser victims failed the lower orders of the people were sacrificed.

Danton remarked that the revolution was endured as long as it operated only upon the aristocratic classes, but after a time the guillotine began to work upon the people themselves, and it was found then that the evil was intolerable.—The revolution, he said, like Saturn, ended by devouring its own children: so it will be with any single department of government in which you place the supreme power. I believe firmly and conscientiously that if the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson be adopted, it will have that effect. I do not mean to say that it will plunge the people immediately into bloody revolutions as in France, because the same oppression does not exist here, and the rebound would not be so terrible. I do not mean to say that it will lead to any such sanguinary results at this moment, but I do assert that if we adopt this principle, the independence of the judiciary of Kentucky will be destroyed. If I were compelled to trust my life, liberty, and fortunes, and those of my children, to the caprice of an unchecked legislative body, I would not hesitate one instant to seek refuge under the safer protection of a limited monarchy. Divide the responsibility of such powers among a hundred legislators, and you limit it in such a manner that it is exercised without restraint or conscience. Rather than go back to such a state of things, it would be better to trust our lives and property to popular assemblies, like the Athenian democracy, collected in the grove of the academy, or to the hundred thousand men who assembled, sword in hand, upon the plain of Volo to decide upon the destinies of Poland. Never let us trust ourselves to the tender mercies of an unscrupulous legislative majority.

I do not believe that this convention is prepared to go to the extremity that the gentleman desires. If it be, the stump will be assumed and God only knows what fortune may await Kentucky. Her people, who have lived for fifty years under a happy constitution, may possibly in a phrensy adopt his propositions. But I know that there are good and patriotic men in this assembly, and throughout the land who will at least lift their warning voices against the measure—a measure which will tend to destroy the whole foundation upon which the independence of the judiciary rests. I am convinced, myself, that if we do so, in a few years the evil will become so intolerable that it will correct itself. I feel confident that it will be repudiated and denounced by the whole people of the state. But I cannot think, Mr. Chairman, that the convention will adopt it. I know full well how inferior is my experience in public life; but if I were the only man in this house to stand up in opposition to this measure, I would feel that I occupied invulnerable and impregnable ground, and never should such a proposition be made and carried in this convention, without my protest being entered against it.

Mr. BULLITT. I agree fully with the gentleman from Nelson in the proposition, that in this government and indeed all governments, a majority should rule in every case where it is practicable. And while I have a particular deference for the great talents of the gentleman, I must enter my protest against his application of this rule. I will endeavor to show the gentleman, that when you come to apply the rule, it will be found to do away with the very principle for which he contends. Before I enter on the main proposition, however, I will endeavor to answer that portion of his argument in which he refers to the election of the Roman emperors, Cæsar, Tiberias, and Caligula. He says they were elected by the people, in order to secure good government, and the enormities which they committed, the people were unable to restrain for the want of proper checks and balances, for the want of a proper means of controlling them. I set out with this proposition which I think is unanswerable, that the reason why our government is superior to all others that have existed before us is this. It is a cardinal principle that has been established first in America, that the powers of government should be divided into three separate and distinct departments, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial; and that no one of these department should exercise any power belonging to another. Grant all the powers of government to one department, and you make it a despotism.

While I agree with the gentleman in the principle that a majority should rule, I hold that he is wrong in its application. What does it lead to? He says the legislature possesses the powers of the people. But the legislature is only one department of the government, whereas the people in a republic have the supreme power. It is the business of this convention to make an organic law, separating this government into distinct and separate departments. I have never heard it suggested, that we should dispense with any of the departments I have named, and it is a well settled principle in our government, that one department should not infringe upon the powers of another.

The gentleman is in favor of allowing a majority to rule. So am I. But I am not for giving the legislature that power in the name of the people. Sir, the legislature is not the people. It is a department of the government, and it is that department which has a tendency to swallow up all the others. Now see in what a delicate position you place your judiciary. Here are representatives of the people from every county, assembled in their legislative capacity. They, through party organization, or from particular motives, influencing them, pass a law violating the constitution of the United States, or the constitution of Kentucky. That law is brought before a judge, and the judge is compelled to decide that it is unconstitutional. When he so decides, will not the majority who passed the law almost instantly remove that judge? Is such an act for the good of the people?

But, sir, when you establish the principle that a bare majority of the legislature may remove the judge, you at once take away the great and cardinal principle of our government, that the various departments of the government shall be independent of each other. Any act of the government has first to go through the ordeal of the legislature, then it is subjected to the veto power of the governor, and afterward, as far as constitutionality is concerned, it must be subjected to the veto of the judiciary. But, sir, establish this principle, and you take this very qualified veto from the judicial department.

Now, sir, it seems to be a clear proposition, that if you adopt the principle which the gentleman proposes you will effectually destroy the power of the judiciary. Apply the same principle to the governor, take away the veto power from him, and you put all the powers of the government in the hands of one body. When you do that, your government becomes a despotism, inevitably, call it by whatsoever name you will.

Mr. CLARKE. This proposition has been sprung upon the house somewhat suddenly, but I am satisfied from the little examination I have given the subject, that not less than two thirds of the legislative department should possess the power to remove a judge from office. So far as my reading of history has enabled me to discover, I know of no instance where tyranny has prevailed in any country save by the operation of law. Tyranny and oppression never have existed any where except by the operation of law. No tyrant has ever unsheathed his sword, and from the humble walks of life marched to a throne except by the operation of law. No people have ever been cast down from the elevated position of enlightened freemen, to the degrading position of slaves, except by the operation of law.

It has been well remarked by the gentleman from Louisville, that it is not proposed by any person on this floor to arrange a government on any other principle save that which divides it into three independent and distinct branches, and these to be independent each of the other. What is the principle contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson? It is destructive of the independence that belongs to the judiciary department of the government, and places it at the will, pleasure, and disposal of the legislative department. They are to be sure, separate, or independent, the one of the other, but in what does that independence consist? If you place the judiciary department under the control of the legislative, why not place the executive and the executive department under the same control? And when you do that you have merged all the different departments of government in the legislative department—the very department in every government from which oppression and tyranny has sprung. Why is it that in the constitution of the United States we see a provision that no law shall take effect after it has met the disapprobation of the executive until two thirds of both houses of congress shall give it their sanction? Because it is necessary that the executive should be clothed with the power to shield and protect himself from insults and encroachments on the part of the legislative department of the federal government: and for the purpose of keeping up that independence which is necessary for the wholesome and the healthy operation of the government itself. I am one of those who entertain the opinions expressed by my honorable friend from Henderson, (Mr. Dixon,) that there are things in government bearing on the social relations that exist between the citizens and the relations that exist between the citizens and the government that cannot and ought not to be done by majorities. And the very moment you lay down the principle that a majority of the legislature may, at its will and pleasure, remove a judge, that very moment you lay down the principle that the same majority may remove the executive officer of the state, and you have thus centered all the powers of the government in the hands of one department. Therefore the idea of three distinct departments of government is repudiated in the practical operation of the principle proposed by the gentleman from Nelson, and I desire to enter my protest against it. When I am aware from the history of the past, that no country has ever lost its liberties except by the operation of law—and the legislative department is the law making power of government—I am unwilling to vest in that department of government whose instincts incline it to encroach on the rights of the other departments—a power that will place them at its mercy.

As I before remarked, this question has been sprung upon us suddenly, and perhaps but few on this floor are prepared to give a vote upon it understandingly and upon mature deliberation. I have only risen to enter my protest against a proposition that a bare majority of the legislature of Kentucky may remove a judge from that position to which he has been elevated by the people. If the power is conferred at all, as perhaps it correctly ought to be, I would withhold the exercise of it until it has the concurrence of two thirds of the representatives of the people.

THE PRESIDENT. I believe in the power of the people to govern themselves wisely and discreetly. I believe in their power to frame organic laws to guide and direct the legislature, and to define the judicial and executive departments and to prescribe their duties. I come here as one of the people and from the people, to give my aid and support in establishing, or rather of re-modeling such a government. I expect to vote to place in this constitution the provision that is in the present constitution, declaring that "the powers of the government of the state of Kentucky shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to wit: those which are legislative, to one; those which are executive to another; and those which are judiciary, to another." And I expect to vote to restore the appointing power to the people, in all respects, that was confided to their agents by those who framed our present constitution, and that the judiciary, as well as the executive, shall receive their appointment and authority to judge this people from the people themselves, and from no intervening agent. I came to do it, and I shall do it unshrinkingly, without the shadow of a doubt or question of the intelligence, the capacity, and the right of the people to choose these officers. And it is a trust better confided to them, than to any other power that it is possible for us to select. We have confided the appointment of our judges to the executive, and of our clerks to the courts, and the various inferior officers to other agencies without the immediate and direct action of the people. I expect the people of Kentucky to take one step further in advance in the principles of free government, and to give my vote to restore all these appointments to the people. And when they shall have appointed all these officers, I expect to provide in this new constitution, by my vote, a responsibility to the people immediate and direct, by bringing them again before the appointing power in a limited period of years, so that the people shall have a right to say, "well done, good and faithful servant"—or to dismiss those that have proved unworthy, and to select other and better qualified individuals. And that is the responsibility to the people that I believe in—the majority of the people—and the majority of no other department in this government that we shall create. It is a direct responsibility, and that is the advantage and benefit that will grow out of a limited term of office. If gentlemen want other responsibilities—if a judge or other officer has been guilty of acts worthy of impeachment, provide for that impeachment. Let the judgment of the impeaching tribunal have the effect as it now has, of removing them from office. That tribunal we have provided in the constitution of the state, and in that same instrument we have also provided, in obedience to the principle that requires the conviction of an individual in the civil tribunals to be by the voice of the whole, a change in relation to impeachments, and require the conviction to be by two-thirds of the judging body. If that is not sufficient to remove these officers, then I will go further, and allow the address to be spread upon the records of the general assembly; but I will not vote that less than two-thirds shall remove an appointee of the people. The office comes from the people, and let them provide the responsibility of a limited term of years. If the incumbent becomes worthy of impeachment, I am willing to provide a tribunal, and to follow in the footsteps of those who have gone before us, and to let that tribunal be the house of representatives impeaching for the people, and the senate judging for the people. I am willing to go further. I am willing to allow an address of both branches of the legislature to enable the governor to remove, but I am not willing that a bare majority shall do it.

The President here waived any further remarks, and on motion of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE the committee rose and reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

Leave was granted, and

The convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 18, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. STUART ROBINSON.

Mr. CHAMBERS offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to enquire into the propriety and expediency of holding the annual elections on some day other than Monday, and in some month other than August; and, also, that said committee enquire into the propriety and expediency of permitting each free white male citizen, who at the time being shall have attained to the age of twenty one years, and shall have resided in the state one year, and in the county three months, next preceding the election, to exercise the right of suffrage in all state, county, and district elections—and that said committee report, &c.

Mr. THOMPSON offered the following, which was agreed to:

WHEREAS, great public inconvenience has arisen from the suspension of the enactments of general laws. Therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on the miscellaneous provisions of the constitution be instructed to enquire into the expediency of making the following amendment to that part of the constitution to them referred: The legislature shall have no power to suspend any general law for the benefit of any particular individual, nor to pass any law for the benefit of individuals inconsistent with the general laws of the land; nor to pass any law granting to any individual or individuals rights, privileges, immunities, or exemptions, other than such as may be, by the same law, extended to any member of the community who may be able to bring himself within the provisions of such law: Provided always, the legislature shall have power to grant such charter of corporations as they may deem expedient for the public good.

COURT OF APPEALS.

On the motion of Mr. BARLOW the convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, on the article reported by the committee on the court of appeals.

The PRESIDENT. Mr. Chairman, at the concluding part of the remarks which I submitted to the convention yesterday, I said, that I was opposed to the proposed amendments. I hold that in all that is essential to the peace of society, to the public justice of the country, the security of the persons, the lives, and the fortunes of the citizens, the judicial department is the most important branch of this government; and one, that in laying the foundations of this government, we should be the most careful, the most prudent, to lay in wisdom. It is the proud privilege of this people to live under a government of laws—laws enacted in the form of constitutional provisions, which are a barrier to the legislature, a barrier to the judiciary, that secures to every man the blessings of liberty, the pursuit of happiness, the enjoyment of the fruits of his industry, and to the high and the low with equal hope of justice. And, in selecting the officers who are to apply that law to the people, more regard, more care should be taken that it be confided to able, correct, independent, honest men, than in the selection of those put in charge of any other branch of this government. It is the confidence of the people in that branch of government that gives happiness and repose to society; and there can be no confidence where there is not integrity, where there is not independence, where there is not ample intelligence to apply those powers wisely, discreetly, justly, efficiently, without favor and without affection to the lowest man, and to bring the highest to that equal tribunal of right, which it is the privilege of a free people to secure to all the citizens. In restoring the appointment of these officers to the people, I do not desire to lessen the chances in the remotest or smallest degree, of the selection of the description of men to fill those offices that I have alluded to. I want them to possess that independence that flows from intelligence and integrity; that independence that is characteristic of our people, and to know no man in the tribunals of justice; but to regard those considerations alone in the decisions they shall make. But in making them thus independent in the sight of the people, and in their own consciences, I desire that they shall be responsible. Responsible to whom? They, as all the other officers that we shall choose, to carry out the government of this people, are only the agents of this people. As agents, they should be faithful and intelligent in the fulfillment of their duties. As agents, I would have them responsible to the people, who created them for purposes of public justice; and I would make them responsible in no other way. We propose to restore the appointment of these officers to the people. Heretofore, we have selected the governor, as a trustee, to nominate most of these officers, confiding to him a trust, which now, in the name and by the authority of the people of Kentucky, we have come here to resume and give back to those who gave the trust. We propose to make them responsible by bringing them periodically before the people, when they will be required to render an account before that people, who are to pass upon them. Heretofore, we appointed these officers through the agency of the governor, during good behavior. We subjected them to impeachment for crimes and great misdemeanors, because it was unseemly and improper, that those who presided in the tribunals of the public justice of the country, should be stained or suspected of the crime of violating the laws of the land. And in order that public justice might flow pure, untainted, and unsuspected, we subjected them, when charged with crimes and great misdemeanors, to impeachment, to removal from office, and left them subject to the laws of the country by indictment, as all other citizens are left. We did more, sir. We provided that upon an address of two-thirds of both branches of the legislature, the governor might remove for other causes less than impeachment. And the cause of removal is required to be spread upon the journal.

The wisdom of that provision I acknowledge. If a judge became insane, it was no crime, no misdemeanor. He was not liable to impeachment—it was a visitation of divine Providence to which the whole human family are liable. If he became imbecile, he was not liable to be impeached. Even if he failed to do the duties of his office and continued the docket, it was hardly to be considered a great misdemeanor, or subject matter for impeachment. For these, and perhaps other causes, he being incapable of fulfilling the duties for which he was selected, or failing to discharge the trust, there must be some power somewhere to remove the officer, and supply his place. And hence the provision, that for causes less than impeachment, the officer might be removed upon the address of two-thirds. The constitution of the United States provides for impeachment, and that by two-thirds; and the senate shall be the body to try, and two-thirds of the representatives shall prefer the charges against these officers. And of the thirty states which constitute this union, twenty-seven of them have adopted that principle. Some twenty of them have the provision requiring two-thirds to remove on address.—

Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and one other state do not fix what number shall constitute that concurring verdict in case of impeachment; and some of them have failed to put in their constitutions the provisions for removal. Now, these provisions, by all these states, requiring, with so great unanimity as they do, a concurrence of two-thirds for impeachment, and two-thirds for address, are causes for reflection and consideration—just for what they are worth before this body. There are but few states of this union that have restored to the people the right to select their judges; and if we were to take the example of the majority, and make it conclusive on us, why, we would decide against this restoration. And, perhaps, if you were to take the whole of the nations of the earth, you would decide against the capacity of the people for self-government. Take the whole acts of all the people upon the earth, and you would decide against their competency to govern themselves. Still, the concurring acts of so many of the state governments, requiring the verdict of two-thirds in impeachment in a criminal offence, and two-thirds in an address to remove, is evidence furnished by the acts of a free people, of the extreme caution with which they have given the power to one department of the government to invade that of another. And we may look into human nature and draw our own conclusions in relation to the cause.

Now, I am opposed to the first amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nelson, to strike out the words "for cause less than impeachment," which would have the effect of allowing them to remove for all and any cause.—And I am also opposed to striking out the words "two-thirds," which would give the power to a majority of a quorum, or a majority of all elected. These officers are to be selected by the people, and we are to calculate that for these high, sacred trusts, that entwine themselves with the interests of all society, men of character, men of intelligence, men of capacity and learning for the particular description of business they are selected to perform, will be chosen.

My reading of the history of democracy in America, and the lessons which it gives us, persuade me that the intelligence of the people will induce them to select for all their offices, men capable from their age, their experience, and their talents, their knowledge, their information, and their integrity, for the particular office in question. Take the galaxy of distinguished individuals who have filled the presidency of the United States, elected by the people themselves, and a better example of the intelligence and capacity of the people to select for that high and distinguished office, cannot be produced in the annals of the world. And it is one to which we may appeal in relation to these officers, that in proportion to the importance of the office, and its application to the great interests of society, will the people be interested in filling it with talented and competent men; and they will bring their intelligence to operate here, in proportion to the interests at stake. In all the State constitutions, the principle is recognised that the wisest provision in relation to the organization of government, is that its powers be confided to three descriptions of officers; those which are executive, those which are judicial, and those which are legislative. That principle is recognised in them all. The principle is also recognised, that they should be separate and distinct, and that no one of these departments of government should be placed under the control of another. They all flow from the people. They are all the agents of the people to whom the different trusts are confided; and no one of these departments should have the power of reducing, controlling, directing, or influencing another. Their duties are clear, separate, and distinct. Their responsibility should be to the authority which created them. What does the gentleman propose to do by this amendment? To strike out! And the effect of it is, to strike out impeachment for crime against these officers; and in the conviction of them for these crimes, which is to remove them from office, the tribunal that is to try them is not to be sworn. In all impeaching tribunals, an oath is taken of the sacred character that is administered to a jury when it tries a man for his life or his liberty; or even in a case between individuals, that relates to the property of the one or the other. But in this instance, the sanctity of that oath is proposed to be dispensed with.

Mr. HARDIN. The gentleman does not understand me, or I do not understand myself. If the gentleman will permit me, I will explain. It is not to strike out the article for impeachment, but to provide for removal by address.

The PRESIDENT. I understood the gentleman exactly. If they are not to proceed by impeachment, if they may choose between the two modes of proceeding, if they may drop the impeachment and take address, my argument is applicable. If I desire to attain a particular object, and if there are difficulties in one mode of accomplishing it, I will take that course which will bring me more directly and more surely to the accomplishment of my end. And if I desired to remove a judge, and the sanction of an oath stands in the way of such removal in one method, I should certainly avail myself of the privilege and remove the case to a tribunal where no oath is necessary, where I should not have to ride over the consciences of men to accomplish the end. I understood the gentleman right, for the effect of his proposition is to do away with the impeachment and place it within the power of the two branches of the legislature to remove, and stain by that act, the character of these high functionaries that the people have called to their tribunals to administer the justice of the country. Therefore, I am opposed to it.

The legislature are to spread upon the records, the causes of the removal. They are to judge of the evidence which is to satisfy their minds. Indeed, it is not apparent that there is to be any evidence. They make the indictment for themselves; they spread it on their records, and they are to judge of the evidence. They may judge of the evidence from public rumor, or they may not. They may give notice, they may call evidence; but in the address there is no obligation to do so, and then these high functionaries, created by the people, indicted by one branch of the legislature, tried by that branch, with or without evidence, are at their will and pleasure, removed from office, and sent back to the people that elected them. That is the effect of it.

The people may return them again, and the power of this legislature is to be like that of the British Parliament, which repeatedly sent back Mr. Wilkes to his constituents, declaring that he was not fit to be the representative of the people that had chosen him. And this is to be accomplished when you strike out the two thirds, by a bare majority!

Why, in Athens, we read that they banished Aristides from the commonwealth for no other reason, and for no other cause, than that they were weary of hearing him called "the just." Take deliberative assemblies from the earliest period from which you can trace their history, and you will find there are times when passion, when prejudice, when party rule is triumphant, and justice is lost and never heard of in their courts. I will not refer to the bloody scenes of the French revolution. It were enough to look at the blood of patriots sacrificed by a British parliament, at the frown, or at the instigation of the king. They were the representatives of a free people—they boast the freest in the world. And yet these representatives of the people, by their proceedings exhibited their readiness to shed the blood of patriots.

We bring the actions of men to the tribunal of public opinion, and whilst that tribunal is sound, there is no fear. But will it always be sound? Is there no suspicion in the breast of the patriot, that even here, in this enlightened age, in this land where we boast of our independence, and our liberty, that passion, prejudice, and party feeling, will trample on the rights of individuals and upon the public justice of the country? And are we sure that the time may not come when this very intelligence, this very freedom, may grow into licentiousness, and that the intelligence of the country may be united to lead the passions and feelings of those who are not so enlightened, astray on many subjects? Now there is a great example to which I will refer, for no further purpose than for illustration. It is sufficient cause in the minds of intelligent statesmen, to turn a man out of office because he is not one of the same party. It is not confined to one party, or to another, and in the progress of this government it will not be confined to one or the other; for so sure as one party prevails over another, and that has acted on that principle and been sanctioned by the intelligence of the people, or by their passions or prejudices, and upheld on party grounds and party distinctions, so surely and so certainly, when they come into power, they will turn out and replace those they find in office with their own partizans.

I hope that in framing this constitution of Kentucky, in giving these offices to the people, that we will constitute no tribunal, who acting on that principle, on vague rumors, or false reports, will let the vengeance of the majority in this state fall on the innocent, and turn out for alleged incapacity the officers whom the people have selected. I tell you we should never give the power to permit it to be done. I hold we have all the power in our hands for the purpose of making this constitution. We are the people; we represent them. They have given us all the power. For what? To lay the foundations of this government in wisdom and in justice, to restrain the legislative department, so that by passion or by prejudice, or unawares, and without due reflection, they shall not pass those boundaries that we in the name of the people, may prescribe for them. And tell these judges, whom we select to decide upon all the great interests that a free people can have in a government like this, and who are the coercive powers that give life, action, and being to the government itself. That they shall only be responsible to the people, that they are subject to nothing else, so that no passion, or prejudice, shall turn the judiciary aside from the great ends for which we established it. Is there a gentleman on this floor who, were it proposed that a man should be indicted for a crime, would contend that the tribunal should not be sworn, should hear no evidence, should decide without the obligation of an oath, consign to infamy, or consign to banishment any citizen of this land would not start back from it? I would fain persuade myself that the gentleman from Nelson has not fully regarded the consequences of this thing. I know that he is an able lawyer; I know that he is far more familiar with statesmanship than I am. I have great confidence that his heart is in this movement, and that he desires to restore these offices to the people. And verily, I believe in my conscience that to him more than any other man is attributed the great unanimity with which we now meet in favor of the restoration of these offices to the people—for he early and boldly and decidedly placed himself on that ground and has not wavered.

I should be sorry, as he intimates, to part with him here. A great principle is involved in this question—a great principle of responsibility. Responsibility to whom? To the people? The term of office is the great responsibility to which I look. The reward the people are to bestow after he has served his term, when he and his friends may be greeted with the proud certificate that a re-election will give him, for the able and efficient manner in which he has discharged the duties of his trust, will give to the officer a stimulus to increase his intelligence, to guard his integrity and his impartiality in the distribution of the public justice of the country. It is to that reward he should look.

It is to the approbation of a free, intelligent, and patriotic people that the patriot looks as the brightest reward for the services and dangers he has encountered in the service of the people, sure that that approbation, following an upright, virtuous, correct, and impartial conduct is better calculated than any other, to make him live in the pages of history. I want to hold out to these judges that approbation, that encouragement, that security, and bind them by the hopes of that reward to a faithful and true discharge of their duties. I do not wish these judges to be looking before their offices have expired, as a celebrated statesman looked, when he asked where he was to go when his term was out. For these reasons I am opposed to striking out these provisions. I am disposed to leave in this constitution the power of impeachment, to get clear of those who have been guilty of crimes and high misdemeanors, and remove them from the judiciary. And, I expect that in this constitution a provision will be inserted, that when the great inquest of the state of Kentucky, constituted of the representatives of the people, shall find an impeachment, that provision will be made for the appointment of an officer to discharge the duties during and after the trial. I expect we shall put a provision of that kind in the constitution, so that the tribunals of justice, after such inquest, shall not be filled with men suspected of crime and of great misdemeanors against the laws of the land. I expect when accidents happen which render a judge incapable to, or improper that he should, discharge his duty, that by address he may be removed and another put in his place. I am willing to trust this qualified power to the legislature. It is not the power of appointment, nor the power of removal, except in a qualified mode. And, whenever a man is guilty of crime, and is convicted, he ought to be removed; and we direct the legislature in the place of a grand jury, as a grand inquest of the state, to find the grounds of impeachment. We trust to our senators, men whom we elect for their age, and whom the people choose for their intelligence, their probity, talents, and character, to be the triers. And, in these cases of removal, I expect that the representatives, and the senate, and the executive, combined, will remove.

No man on this floor feels more firmly decided, or desires more anxiously than I do, to give the appointment of all these officers to the people. There is no man sees more strongly the necessity, the importance, the propriety of the independence of these judges from the power of the executive, and from the power of the legislative department than I do; yet, if these officers should be guilty of crime or misdemeanor, elected as they may be—for no man can tell when crimes shall be brought to his own door—by the frailty and temptations of life—they shall have a tribunal fair, honorable, and such as is worthy of a free people to try them. They shall not be removed unless it is manifest and clear to two thirds of both branches of the legislature and the executive that they ought to be removed. And I think there is no danger in making this requisition, and that we should be traveling in the path that has been traveled by other states of this union.

I think the proposition of the gentleman will have the effect, in high party times, when great clamor is raised against an individual, to sacrifice the office to party, prejudice, and clamor, instead of his falling under the justice of his country; and for this reason I am opposed to striking out both provisions.

The gentleman says, there is a place where two parties in this convention are to separate, and intimates very strongly that if this proposition is not sustained, many of us will part. I came here to make a constitution. I never expected to get it exactly my way. I calculated to yield to the better judgment, to the sounder experience of others; and if, upon the whole, when the constitution is made, I believe we have made a step in advance for the benefit and prosperity, and happiness, and for the advancement of the public justice of the country in all time to come, I intend to give it my signature and my support. And I trust that the gentleman from Nelson, if he should chance to be in a minority, will consider that this is not the place where the friends of constitutional reform in Kentucky should part. I trust that he who struck the hardest and strongest blow against the central power, and in favor of distributing and giving it to the people, will reconsider and go with us.

I go with every gentleman who can obtain the sanction of my judgment in relation to his measures. I go for compromise, when compromise is essential to gain a portion; but the man who secures my vote for his proposition must first obtain the sanction of my judgment. This the gentleman's proposition has failed to do.

Mr. STEVENSON. There is not a member upon this floor who would be less pleased to hear the sound of his own voice reverberating in these halls than myself, but I consider that no more important question will be presented to the consideration of this convention than the principle involved in the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson. Equally important ones may be presented and are perhaps in embryo for the consideration of this house, but none more important, none more vital for the preservation, in my humble judgment, of civil liberty itself. I therefore throw myself upon the indulgence of this house, to express the grounds upon which my vote will stand recorded upon the journals of this convention. I yield to no man in the advocacy of the calling of a convention in this state, and while I cheerfully acquiesce in the distinguished ability of the gentleman from Nelson, and yield to him with pleasure the position of leader in that contest—I yield to no man here in the advocacy of what I believe to be the true democracy of the country—that democracy which recognizes equality of rights, equality of liberty, and security of property. And while I say this, I have, at least, brought my own mind to the conclusion that the adoption of the proposition of the gentleman would be striking at, if not the corner stone, one of the great principles upon which democratic government rests. No man entertains a more exalted respect or a greater friendship for the mover of this proposition than myself; and though I am compelled to dissent from him, and to enter my protest against his proposition, I know and I believe that he has been led in an error by a too zealous and exaggerated love for the rights of the people.

The history of all governments, from the foundation of the world to the present time, has shown that the people themselves, to secure a good government, have deemed it necessary to put certain limitations upon their own power. The history of Athens has been quoted in this discussion; and why was it that the people of Athens did not meet in mass to enact their own laws and take into their own hands the government? Why has the axiom been handed down to us, that if every Athenian was a Socrates, yet then every Athenian assemblage would be a mob? It was because they could not trust themselves to the excitements which weak humanity is heir to; and they were afraid to trust themselves to the charmed tongue of some wild demagogue—some ambitious marplot, who, commencing a demagogue, never fails to end a tyrant.

The very foundation of government rests upon the restriction upon popular rights, and the people wisely have determined to take the authority of the masses and to confer it upon certain agents, under certain written restrictions and boundaries by which it is to be marked, and beyond which these agents have no right to go. One great error of the gentleman consists in supposing that the legislature constitutes the people. During the canvass last summer, and upon every stump in my county, when the subject of the open clause was discussed, I undertook to battle this ground with my opponent, and one of the grounds, the impregnable ground upon which I stood, was that the legislature was not the people. Is it necessary for me to take up the time of this convention to undertake to prove a maxim which seems to me almost axiomatic? Why when I was a boy, the first great leading state paper which I saw in my own native state, was a celebrated report issued in 1812, setting forth that the doctrine of instruction was the cardinal doctrine of the democratic party. The object of that paper was to elucidate and to explain the responsibility of those agents of the people to the source from whence their power was derived. But now it seems that great cardinal doctrine is to be overthrown and to be subverted, and we are told that the legislature can do no wrong—that a bare majority of a legislature shall have the right to violate a still more fundamental principle of the government—that the three great departments of this government shall be kept, as far as can be, into distinct and separate departments. Give the gentleman his proposition, and allow a majority of the legislature—whether actuated by political excitement, whether carried away by some momentary phrenzy, or whether, like myself, charmed by the eloquent tones and able arguments of the gentleman who stood there yesterday, advocating this very doctrine, and throwing around it a soft silvery tinsel, to be carried away by such arts as these—and do you not bring suppliant at their feet, the judiciary of this land? The gentleman cited, in support of his position, the case of a magistrate from the county of Carter, I believe. I had the honor of occupying at that time this seat in the legislature, and the house of representatives with a unanimity, perhaps scarcely ever witnessed on any other question, considered him unworthy to hold public office in Kentucky; but the case went to the other branch, and there personal prejudice or political feeling so blinded a number of the senators as to render our action nugatory. Does the gentleman know how often he has quoted the axiom, “that it was better that 99 guilty men should escape than one innocent man suffer”—and has he considered that the same motives which kept them from doing justice then, might on another occasion urge them to destroy the very pillars upon which our government rests?

I am guilty of no affected diffidence when I say that I have never before felt the responsibility I feel now. One of the youngest members upon this floor, I find myself engaged—not in the passage of laws, not in that action which we can do to-day and undo to-morrow—but in that important and sacred work under which we at least, and our children after us are to live. It has been said, and said truly, that “the ill that men do, lives after them, but the good is too often interred with their bones.” And when I come to consider that one false step in the building up of this great work may bring upon those who sent us here misfortune, ruin, and destruction, I say that I do feel, feel sensibly, the sense of the responsibility under which I act.

Is it not true that, if a majority of the legislature have a right to remove a judge, we lessen the independence of one department to the other? And do we not, if we adopt the gentleman's proposition, bring down the judiciary to the very feet of the legislative department? The legislature, coming from different counties fresh from the people, to the discharge of their duties here, have an influence over the people that neither of the other two departments from their position and their duties can ever attain. They live among them, they are with them, and they come here only for a short period to discharge their duty. The governor is at the seat of government, where he is naturally withdrawn from the people. The judges, from their close application to business, and their residence here, are also withdrawn from the people, and they have none of that affection of the people brought about by the daily and common intercourse of man with man.

In the legislature there invariably springs up an unnatural jealousy towards both the executive and the judiciary, and prepossessed with those feelings, some new question arises; the democrats are in a majority and they want to get rid of a judge in the north or the south of the state. They commence by throwing out all sorts of insinuations against his capacity, his personal integrity, or against, if you please, his political opinions. A flame of discord is excited here, and soon is found some eloquent, daring defender of the people's rights, who intoxicates the house by his eloquence and his logic, into a belief that really the safety of this government, the safety of the party, the integrity of our judicial system itself requires that the head of that judge should be off. We can justify ourselves before the people—we can go to them and influence them; they know us as vigilant defenders of their rights—they do not know these judges, these aristocrats at the seat of government who have never met with the people, and who never know them if they do. They will say this, and they say further: this is the judge who decided the case by which you lost your land—or, this is the man who met you in Frankfort and did not know you. This popular appeal is made to the people, and they might or might not sanction it. And what have you done even if they do not sanction it? You have placed on the records of your land, that will live forever, this man as disgraced and dishonored—a plague spot on his fair fame as a heritage to his children, through generations to come. And ten thousand reprobations of the people would not alter or diminish the dishonor of that act. And suppose the people did sustain him, the transaction would be very far from being right. I think, talking about democracy—and my friend made many zealous appeals to democracy—that a few years ago I heard somewhere that there was a sober second thought of the people. What was meant by that sober second thought, but that the people themselves, whenever they would act wisely, would reflect and act coolly. Not under impassioned appeals or excitement, but coolly they should hear, and still more coolly they should determine.

But there is another great objection to this doctrine. I have heard another maxim—that all governments should be permanent—that we should not change for light and transient causes that government under which we live. But supposing, as the honorable gentleman says, the legislature should carry out the will of the people and should appeal to them—what sort of equilibrium could exist in any government when the legislature can appeal to the people on a constitutional question. What sort of equilibrium and permanency in any government can there be, when on the very fundamental principles of the constitution you can give to one department of government the right to appeal to the people, and allow them, from day to day, or year to year, to change, undermine, or destroy it? It is at war with the permanency of any government and tends directly and immediately to destroy it.

Why has it been in all governments, that certain guards were thrown around each of its various departments? Was it not to protect it from the assaults that might be made upon it? Was it not to give it that independence and that security against the assaults which the other departments, either by a combination or singly, should make upon it? I have always so understood and always so regarded it. And when a gentleman tells me that the people themselves are not subject to these passions—that the legislature can do no wrong—I point him to all past history as a perfect and complete refutation and condemnation of this doctrine. Look at France and you see her daily expiring from the very excess of liberty. Look at our own government, and you will see, not only in our own constitution, but in the constitution of every state in the Union, certain restrictions, placed around each and every of its departments. And the surrender of power by the people themselves, in the constitution or organization of a government is itself a restriction upon them to a certain extent. I cannot for myself see upon what ground or in what way the gentleman can hope to carry through his proposition. It strikes me as perfectly destroying the very independence of the judiciary. It strikes me as bringing down the emine of judicial integrity into the conflicts of the hustings—destroying first its independence, and then covering its purity with the dirt of personal detraction or political malice. It cannot be supposed if the gentleman's proposition prevails, and any succeeding legislature that may convene here, undertakes to remove two or three of these judges, that they will not seek to defend themselves against these attacks, and that they will not go before the people to justify their conduct? In the destruction of the reputation and character of a judge, we will suppose the case that the people themselves do not sustain their representatives, and that the judge thus assailed is re-elected some years afterwards to make some slight atonement for this indignity. Or if, as I understand the proposition is likely to be amended, the matter is to be submitted at once to the people, and the act of ostracism by the legislature is not to go into effect until approved by the people, still I must make objection to it, because then the judge appeals to the people, and we have on the hustings of every county, the accuser on the one side, and the judges on the other. The people perhaps sustain the judge, and do you think that judge would be competent to sit in those counties, and decide between these accusers and their rights. Admit that it is gratifying to see high judicial integrity, the spotless ermine of our country drabbed, soiled, and trodden under foot, in the country, and then the popular voice raising it up again, what Kentuckian is there in the land who would not feel dishonored and humbled in the dust thereby? What man, after having passed through a conflict of bitter passion, in which his honor, and reputation, and the interest of his family had been insulted, and had suffered under the slanderous tongue of some ambitious demagogue, could trust himself to ascend the judicial tribunal and decide between the rights of these men? I felt almost charmed to the spot by the eloquent remarks of my distinguished friend yesterday, but that very eloquence shows me the danger of the doctrine it supports, and was to me a convincing argument against subjecting judicial reputation and integrity to the assaults of those artful demagogues who, with eloquence to support them, might choose to assail it.

Nay, sir, charmed as I was, I heard the speech more in sorrow than in anger—with a sort of pleasant melancholy mourning to think that the gentleman should be willing so far to go on in the course which, without the slightest disrespect to the gentleman, I regard as the very perfection of radicalism. The sentiments delivered by him, it must be remembered, will have their effect. I have seen how far party has carried this excitement in Kentucky, during the past summer, and a still more striking example of how high excitement upon local questions can rise. You know, sir, and every member within the sound of my voice will recollect how Kentucky heaved and tossed like an agitated ocean whilst the slavery discussion was going on. In the height of that excitement, in several of the counties, the great doctrine seemed to have been forgotten that "error ceases to be dangerous when reason is left free to combat it." When you touch a man's property—when you touch the doctrine which invades, as he supposes, either his liberty or the sanctity of his fireside you almost dethrone his reason. The people themselves can be led on, where questions, excitable in themselves, are agitated by the wily tongue of the ambitious, though they lead us to extremes on every subject. Suppose, if you please, that you have a pro-slavery legislature, and I trust in God no other will ever sit within these walls, and some gentleman holding the position of a judge, in the exercise of his reason and under the sanction of his oath, chooses to give an honest expression of his opinion, and we will suppose that expression of opinion is wholly and entirely opposed to the legislature. Sir, you can imagine from even the glimmerings of the scenes of last winter what a fire-brand such an expression of opinion must throw into the legislature. What security then will there be for the independent exercise of the functions of the judiciary? How perfectly fragile and crumbling must be the organization of any of the departments of this government when it is to depend on the mere temporary comprehension of the legislature itself. Why, sir, you have no right to suppose that this legislature will bring from their constituents an expression of opinion in regard to their action in the investigation into the conduct of an officer against whom charges may be preferred. Cases must spring up, which will require legislative interposition, long after the time when the members of the Legislature shall have been elected. Yet you will undertake to give to these men, uninformed as they must be as to the wishes and opinions of their constituents on this subject, the right to remove any judge and to destroy his reputation—to strip him of his office, and when the people themselves ask the reason, you can only say to them, "we did what we supposed to be right." Yet they may have been deceived. I mention these examples merely to show, in the first place, that I do not look to the legislature for correct action in such cases. All history attests that the legislatures of all the states, have at times run counter to popular sentiment. Why, sir, how many times have you witnessed on this floor less than one third of the members who are returned here, and I believe one instance is on record in Virginia, where, perhaps, two thirds were, after having given a particular vote, defeated before the people. It seems to me that the principle embraced in the proposition strikes at the very root of this government—it strikes at its stability—it disturbs its equilibrium—it is really bringing both the judiciary and the executive at the footstool of the legislature. It is constituting them the great sovereign power of the land, and I understand the gentleman to say, that he not only does not confine the principle to the judges, but that he carried it from the governor down to a constable.

I have given, very imperfectly, the reasons in addition to those delivered with so much ability, both by the distinguished President of this convention, and by my honorable friend from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe), why I am opposed to this proposition. I shall never, sir, were I to live to the age of Methuselah, place my hand upon my heart and give a vote, upon the correctness of which I could not stand at all times. I came here sir, to form what I hope will be a conservative constitution. I came here to stand up for those principles of government which have been instilled into my mind from the earliest moment of my recollection; and if I fall, I ask no prouder epitaph, than that I fell at the foot of what is believed the fundamental principle of a civil and religious government. I shall never seek to gain office by pandering to the prejudices of the populace—call them people—or call them what you please. I am a believer in popular government, and I believe in the good sense of those who sent me here, to give me at least an opportunity to defend myself upon every vote I give here; and when I go before them, should I be called on to give an account of my stewardship, I shall very readily be able to satisfy them that I pursued the dictates of my conscience and my honest judgement. I know them too well to believe that they will ask me to sacrifice my honest convictions, and I hope that they know me too well to expect it of me. No sir, I believe that one of the greatest errors of this enlightened age is, a disposition on the part of gentlemen not to trust enough to the good sense of the people—not to profit by their own wisdom and experience and to do what that wisdom and experience shall dictate. It is better that gentlemen should rely upon their own ability to justify their conduct, instead of pandering to popular opinion. I mean this for no gentleman on this floor. I recognize the ability of the distinguished gentleman who offered this amendment. I concede to him entire honesty of purpose, though I frankly say that I do think him wholly and entirely wrong. I have detained the committee longer than I intended, and I can only return my thanks for their attention.

Mr. NUTTALL. It is not sir that I expect on the present occasion to throw such light on the subject as will influence the committee to render their verdict in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin.) To judge from present appearances, at least, the supporters of the amendment which he has proposed will in all probability be "few and far between." I am never myself startled by such considerations. I have but one rule of action—one principle for the government of my conduct, and that is to form my opinions myself in all cases and in all times, and to advocate them on all occasions to the best of my ability. I was extremely gratified to hear the honorable President of the convention, for whose talents I have a high regard, after having last evening exhibited a degree of temper which almost induced me to think that he had fallen out with all mankind—I was gratified I say, when he resumed the stand this morning, to find that he was restored to his customary good humor, and that he was disposed to discuss this question with that clearness and ability for which he is so distinguished. Now, sir, gentlemen have defended their positions with regard to this question of constitutional reform—they have indicated the attitude which they assume towards this great question. Although there are older men on this floor than myself, I can date back my advocacy of the measure to the year 1823. Save the gentleman from Madison and the gentleman from Nelson, I suppose I am the oldest advocate of a convention upon this floor—not that I think the gentleman from Madison would ever have taken the sense of the people whether they would amend the constitution or not. And I would like to know, sir, what new lights have dawned upon his mind, and how long it is since he became the advocate of constitutional reform. And I think there are many others on this floor who have become new converts. I can trace their increase from that day to this, in every election in which I with feeble powers advocated the propriety of calling a convention; nay, sir, I go further; I can say what no other man in this house can say, that when the question was submitted to the people a year ago whether they would revise the constitution or not, and my own father was a candidate in opposition, I went to the polls like a freeman and voted against him. I think, sir, whatever may be the judgment of this house in regard to myself and the position which I occupy, I can show to my countrymen that I have at least been consistent through life upon this question.

I think that gentlemen have misunderstood or misinterpreted, at least, the effect of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Nelson. I understand sir, that the partition of the powers of the government provided by the article reported by the chairman of the committee, is pretty much in the language in which the old constitution of Kentucky is couched. Am I wrong?

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will answer the question. The committee have made in their report no partition of the powers of government. They have looked forward with hope and confidence that the partition of those powers already to be found in the existing constitution, and which lies at the foundation of every free government would be retained or re-adopted in the constitution which we may form. If the gentleman means the three departments of the government, the legislative, the executive, and the judicial, with the duties belonging to each committed to a separate body of magistrates, acting independently in their own spheres, we considered that no alteration would be made in that respect, and have made no such partition because we thought it unnecessary.

Mr. NUTTALL. Well then, I take it, if that is to stand as it ought to stand, that this government is divided into three separate, distinct departments, the legislative, the judicial, and the executive, and that neither of these departments is to exercise the powers properly belonging to the others. That is the true ground. That is the doctrine for which I mean to contend, and now sir I would like to know how it is, and upon what principle, if you make the judges removable by the address of a bare majority, that it conflicts with any provision in the order of government. Does it interfere with the judicial department of this government merely to give the power to the legislature, by a fair address, to remove a judge from office in consequence either of misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance in office. I say sir, it will not and cannot be construed by a reasonable interpretation into a conflict with any provision of the constitution which regulates the powers of government. I have listened with great pleasure and have been perfectly enraptured by the eloquence of the gentleman from Kenton. He reminded me very much of the poet whose tongue was strung with golden sinews, whose honied accents could tame down tigers, and cause the huge leviathan to leave the unfathomed deep to dance upon the sands. But my judgment has not been convinced.

What is it that has done this thing? What portion of this convention? I do not mean to particularize. Who, sir, are endangering the pillars of this temple of civil liberty, the right arm, the stay, the prop, the anchor of our safety? I will not say that it is those who have gone before the people and attempted to destroy the independence of the judiciary, and drag them down by popular clamor, by contending for the election of the judges by the people.

Now, sir, I may live to see the day, though I trust in God I never shall, when the issue which gentlemen talk about will be made; when you will try a judge and turn him out by a bare majority, and then have an issue between the judge on one side and his accusers on the other. But do not gentlemen see that they will place the government in more danger—that they will throw the vessel of state upon a more dark and tempestuous ocean of confusion, by allowing the people to elect the judges than by allowing them to be removed by a bare majority? I hope I may never see the day, when a judge, being removed from office, will mount the stump; when, a great constitutional question having been decided by him, or a great and important question involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, he will be compelled to canvass before the people the question involved in his decision. But who will be to blame in this? Sir, I am for the independence of the judiciary. My position was before my constituents, until the popular clamor, which gentlemen so much dreaded, had swept over this commonwealth, and had swept off every man who was disposed to stand up for the independence of the judiciary of his country.—We all had to give way; we all had to recede from our position. I intend to vote for an elective judiciary. But sir, while I do that it is in obedience to the commands of those who sent me here. I have always had my misgivings with regard to an elective judiciary, and I am willing that it should be entered upon the records of this house, upon the journal of our proceedings, and that it shall stand for all time to come, to show whether I rightfully prejudged the case or not.

There never is any danger, there never can be any danger where the judges have a revisory tribunal to correct their errors and rectify their erroneous judgments. We have no difficulty on this point. But to some extent, and to a very great extent, the judges must be vested with enlarged discretionary powers, and then, sir, when those poor men of whom the gentleman from Kenton spoke, on one side, and the rich and powerful on the other, come up before the local judge who has the right to exercise this discretionary power, to which side will the decision incline.

Well then, sir, the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, is the only proposition that can meet a contingency of this sort. The judge is to be in office eight years, according to the present plan of government, and if whilst in office he abuses this discretionary power; if he is guilty of misfeasance, malfeasance, or nonfeasance in office, then, sir, a bare majority of the legislature has the right to address him out, spreading upon the journal the cause for which they do so. And I know it was never contemplated by the gentleman from Nelson that these judges should be tried without witnesses. I think that delegates in this convention have conjured up a great bugbear here as a make-weight. I do not think that the gentleman from Nelson ever did or could conceive of such a preposterous proposition, as that they should be tried without witnesses. Now I intend to show my constituents that their wishes shall be carried out. I intend to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, even if it gets no other vote than mine; and in doing this I preserve the great landmarks of republican liberty. I shall stand by those landmarks, for I do not want in after years to have some surveyor go hunting up landmarks for me.

The doctrine I set out with is that which I mean to maintain, that the people have a right to govern, and ought to govern in this free country. That is where I stood, sir, twenty three years ago; and if the people of the state will be consistent, and upon sober reflection just alter the tenure of office of the judges, and uphold in their elections the removal by a bare majority, they will have a system which I doubt not will work better than the present.

I do not wish to be understood as being opposed to an elective judiciary. I only throw this out for the benefit of gentlemen who may not have known my position heretofore; and I intend to occupy that position so long as I have any thing to do with public life.

It all goes back to this; every argument that I have heard from able, learned, and talented gentlemen here, runs right back to the old doctrine of monarchists, that the people are not capable of self-government. You may govern yourselves say they, but we will throw restrictions around you, for you may be led away by demagogues, and not form a correct judgment. And my friend from Kenton gave as an instance, that at some future day the democratic party might have a majority! Great God! that I should throw out such an insinuation in regard to the party to which I belong; that the great democratic party is so steeped in iniquity and immorality that they would be guilty of such scoundrelism; that a period could arrive in this country, when, for mere party purposes, a democratic majority of the legislature would turn out a judge. Great God Almighty! if I belonged to a party who would act thus, I would turn my back upon them in five minutes, and never unite with them again on the face of the earth.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not speak of the democratic party. I said that gentlemen who came here professing to be democrats, might disregard the popular voice when they get here. There have been gentlemen who professed one thing on the stump, and pursued a different course when they came here.

Mr. NUTTALL. Well I think that may be applicable to the gentleman from Kenton, but I know it is not to me. I go upon the principle, that our constituents throughout the length and breadth of this great and patriotic state are enlightened men. I dare any gentleman to go home and take the stump and say there are men living at the seat of government who understand these matters better than you do; men who can form a correct judgment in relation to the affairs of government, whilst you who live in seclusion, who know nothing of the refinements of city life, who have never heard the tones of a piano, or seen tables groaning under loads of sweet-meats, are not capable of forming an opinion. I do not pretend to much refinement myself; I am one of the people, a demagogue, if you please, but sometimes, when I meet before the people men who have considerable pretension on the score of attainments, I do assure you I make their hair stand on end. But sir, I have read an old adage which I will give you presently. When a set of gentlemen want to put down any great measure, they always refer us to the manner in which the governments of antiquity have all run the road to ruin. The free governments of Rome and Athens are pointed out, as an index, as a beacon light to show us where the rocks and quicksands are situated. Well, I have read some little myself in Dilworth's spelling book, but I do not think that I ever saw in all my reading, any description of a government that comes up to my idea of a free government, except our own. And when a gentleman comes here, like the gentleman from Kenton, who is on his first legs, or like my honorable friend from Louisville, when the lobbies are crowded with ladies, they like to talk about Greece and Rome, and make a display of their learning. I don't wish to make any display. I think even if my wife were to die and there was ever so much attraction in the lobbies—I take that back.—Mr. Chairman; but a great many men certainly do come here to extinguish themselves. [Irrepressible laughter throughout the house, as well as much merriment in the galleries, was elicited by the quaintness of the honorable delegate.] But I never saw anything in this Greece and Rome business to alarm me. I have no doubt there are some gentlemen who know more about those countries than I do; I never was there, and never expect to go there; and never having read more than Dilworth's spelling book, I never expect to know more of them than I shall hear in oratorical displays in this house. I had thought, however, or perhaps dreamed that free governments always fell from the fact that a few men get into power, whether by demagoguery or not, and by degrees destroyed the foundations of the government, and stole away the liberties of the people. I may be wrong. But, sir, it is a very favorite topic. If gentlemen want to break down measures which a few men like myself advocate, in order to give strength to the other side of the question, they cry out demagoguery—demagogism. Well, I have no idea that any gentleman who has used this expression has tried to give it point towards any member of this body.

I am determined, as far as my action is concerned to preserve the great land mark, that a majority shall rule, and I do not fear that the constituents of any man in this country, in this enlightened age, ever can or will be influenced by demagogues, first to elect an improper person as judge, and then to elect a man to the legislature who is incompetent to determine whether the judge has committed an offence for which he ought to be removed. I do say sir, that it is underrating the intelligence of the people; it is not a proper appreciation of their general intelligence to say that any state of things, in this our day, can arise, in which the people can be misled; because if they suffer themselves to be deceived it is they who must suffer the ill consequences resulting therefrom. But I do humbly conceive from the fact that all the important officers of the government are to be elected by the people, that they will be cautious, that they will act with judgment, and certainly not permit themselves to elect to important offices, such persons as are incapable of administering the government. I think they will at all times rise superior to the charge which gentlemen have seen fit to throw out against them. That is my doctrine.

I do not know how much I am influenced by what may be laid up at home against a man, for his acts in this convention; but in very few words, in conclusion, I will give you my opinion as to what we ought to do. And first, I will say that if this amendment does not succeed, I am still with the convention party. I am going for the amendment in good faith, and whether successful or not in this, I am still going for other amendments in the constitution; and if we can fix up a constitution that will suit a majority of this house, my signature shall be attached to it, whether I coincide in the amendments that are made or not. I intend to be consistent. Although my own notions may not meet the views of a majority here, yet if you secure the great object for which we have assembled by forming a constitution that will be acceptable to a majority, I am with you. When you secure an elective judiciary, and secure to the people the election of all the other officers of the government, you will have effected one of the great objects which the people had in view in ordering this convention. If only this shall be accomplished, I shall vote for the new constitution. I do not know how long my friend from Nelson and myself will continue to vote together. I suppose that if his amendment should be rejected, he will part from most of his old friends, by putting himself in opposition to any constitution that may be made.

I believe I have said all that I designed to say, and perhaps more than I ought to have said. As the preacher says in winding up his sermon, if anything has been said that is out of the way, I hope the house [I will not call upon the Lord, for I am not good enough for that,] will have mercy upon me.

Mr. MACHEN. I do not rise, sir, with a view of detaining this house, or of attempting to enlighten it, by presenting this subject in any new light. I feel it due to myself, however, and to those whom I represent, to give a reason for the action which I shall take, when we have the privilege of attempting to dispose of the question which has been under discussion. I have seen sir, heretofore in this house, the shafts of ridicule attempted to be hurled, where there was no argument to sustain the position which the party was endeavoring to advocate. But sir, the shafts of ridicule, I trust, will always fall harmless upon the ear of every speaker in this convention. We are here for high and important purposes; and I conceive that the action of this convention upon the question which is now before it, has a great deal to do in carrying out those purposes for which we are here assembled.

I, sir, claim to be as fully initiated in the spirit of democracy as any man upon this floor. I claim to have gone as far in all my past history, in endeavoring to sustain those great principles, which I believe lie at the foundation of all republican governments as any man on this floor. But sir, for the first time in my short existence have I learned that the representatives of the people assembled here, constitute the people themselves. It is a new doctrine to me; and sir, I conceive it to be fraught with error which is so fundamental, that if sustained by the action of this convention, all our institutions will be overturned, and the legislative department of our government will, as has been frequently stated by gentlemen on this floor, be the great fish which is to swallow up all the other departments. I know that the argument made by the venerable gentleman from Nelson was well calculated to lead us astray; it was well calculated to deceive the unwary; and at the first blush might be supposed to carry with it a power, which in reality it did not possess. Ah! sir, it was like a bed of beautiful roses, inviting to the eye, but it contained within it an asp, and if we lay our hand upon it the poison of the asp will be felt.

It is attempted to be maintained that the legislature are the people themselves. I ask you to look back for a few years at the action of our legislature, and then say if the people, regarding the legislature as the people, are capable of self-government. I say the position cannot be maintained, if we take the action of the legislature for the action of the people themselves. What is the fact? One year the legislature is here assembled, engaged in enacting laws by which the commonwealth is to be governed. They return to their constituents; and, as remarked by the gentleman from Kenton, it frequently happens, that not one-third of those who were engaged in enacting those laws, are returned to the next legislature. Their constituents say to them, you have not been good and faithful servants; we must elect those who will carry out our views.

One of the great disadvantages of a republican government is, that we have to delegate our authority. We are here representing the people of Kentucky, but are we the people? No sir, we are acting with delegated authority. If we do their will, we shall receive their approbation, and our work will be sustained by an overwhelming power in the commonwealth. But is it not a fact, that the people from one end of this great commonwealth to the other, have looked and are still looking upon our action here with great jealousy? That is from the fact that our power is delegated to us; that they have entrusted to the action of a few men, the interests of this great commonwealth.

The gentleman who was last up presented this to my mind in rather a startling point of view. He says that his voice is for maintaining the sovereignty of the people; that he has full confidence in their capacity for self-government.—And how does he demonstrate this? He says he believes that the power to elect the judiciary ought not to be entrusted to their hands. What was it that led him to this conclusion? He says that the people will demonstrate their imbecility; that when the election of the officers of government is thrown upon the people, their imbecility will be demonstrated in their action. I believe that the people have the capacity to elect any of the officers of the government.

Mr. NUTTALL. I wish to be distinctly understood in regard to this matter, because it is to be a matter of record. The ground which I took before my constituents, and which I take now is, that the people are qualified to elect every officer of the government, from the president down to a constable; but that in the case of a judge, though the people are not disqualified to elect him, yet from the fact of his receiving his appointment in that way, it operates as a disqualification upon him. That is the ground I take.

Mr. MACHEN. I understand then, that the spirit of the proposition which I made has not been controverted. If, sir, the exercise of the power that is here intended, as I trust, to be placed in the hands of the people, is to operate as a disqualification of those who are to carry on the operations of the government, I affirm that according to any system of reasoning with which I am acquainted, it must result in a disqualification of the people themselves to control the government. Now, what is to be the effect of the adoption of this principle? The gentleman from Nelson has clearly indicated that he intends that the principle shall extend to all the officers of the government, from the governor down to a constable. What will be the condition of the governor under such a system? The legislature meets and passes a law, which on account of a constitutional objection, the governor is compelled to return to them without his sanction. What will be the action of that body? They will say, "sir, you have stepped in between the rights of the people and the interests of those for whose benefit the law was passed; you shall no longer be governor." And what is to be the remedy? Ah, gentlemen say, go back to your constituents and defend your conduct. Will that restore the governor to his position? Will that secure you against the evils which are incident to such a power in the legislative department? No, sir, it will not do it.

I did not intend when I rose, to detain the house as long as I have. I have not attempted to arrange what few ideas I entertain on the subject, in any thing like a correct form. I know that upon my tongue there is no syren sound, that is calculated to attract those who listen long. I have lived long enough, however, to feel that this is one of those important principles upon which will depend the good order, or the confusion, attendant upon the operations of the government. It is important, if you would secure harmony and good order, that each department of the government should be kept separate, and made to feel its independence. There are many ways in which, if this principle be carried out, it will operate injuriously to the interests of the people. It is not necessary to specify them; the intellectual vision of gentlemen will readily suggest them. I shall vote against the motion to strike out, for it is my firm conviction that the power here contemplated to be given to a majority should never be exercised, unless two-thirds at least of the assembled wisdom of the state pronounce in favor of it, and this is what the people will sanction.

Mr. THOMPSON. The proposition before the committee is this: whether, when a judge is brought before the legislature, it shall require a vote of two-thirds to remove him, or the vote of a bare majority. Now who is it that proposes this tribunal to remove a judge? From the arguments that I have heard here, I apprehend it is supposed that the legislature is subject to all the improper influences that can be brought to bear upon man. Who is it that proposes that this power shall be placed in the hands of the legislature? Why, the proposition came from the committee on the judiciary. If that department is not the proper tribunal to exercise this power, why did you propose it? why did you not propose some other, if the legislature is not to be trusted? This power has existed in the legislative department of the government from the year 1792 under the old constitution and under the present constitution up to this hour; and I call upon gentlemen to point out an instance when this two third power has ever been carried into effect. Sir, it has remained a dead letter in both the old and the present constitution. What is the effect of it? Suppose the legislature is liable to all the improper influences suggested by gentlemen. There are one hundred and thirty eight men in the two houses. A judge is brought before them for malfeasance in office. Ninety one say that he is guilty, and forty seven say he is not. How does the rule operate? Why, according to the proposition of those who advocate the two thirds system the forty seven are to rule the ninety one. Is this republicanism? I say it is not. Are not the forty seven more liable to improper influences than the ninety one? Most undoubtedly. Sir, the same argument that I have heard urged in favor of this two thirds rule I have heard urged against the election of the judges by the people. I have no doubt if you take the vote of the judges on the subject the two thirds rule will be adopted; but if you carry it to the people they will decide that a majority shall rule. That is the principle that should be carried through every department of the government. If the legislature is not the proper department to be entrusted with this power, then select some other; but if it is the department that is to exercise the power, then let the republican principle apply, that a majority shall rule.

On motion of Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. ROBINSON.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted a resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That after Monday next this convention will hold a morning and an evening session, the evening session to commence each day at 3 o'clock.

He said he did not deem it necessary to say any thing in favor of this resolution. It was well known to the whole country that one of the objects in calling this convention was, that there should be economy secured in the expenditures of the state. This convention had already spent much time in the discussion of abstract principles which had been well settled in the primary assemblies of the people. He hoped the convention would adopt the resolution, that they might be enabled to do the business for the state of Kentucky, to do which the people had sent them here. On the resolution he called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOYD suggested an amendment, so as to provide that the morning session should commence at 9 o'clock.

Mr. PROCTOR accepted the amendment, and the resolution, as amended, was as follows:

Resolved, That after Monday next the convention will hold a morning and evening session—the morning session to commence each day at 9 o'clock and the evening session at 3 o'clock.

Mr. IRWIN was as desirous to secure economy as any gentleman on this floor, and he was as anxious that they should get through the labors which devolved upon them here. He was anxious to return to his own business, which required his attention, but the people of the state of Kentucky had entrusted to them the important duty of making a constitution under which they were hereafter to be governed, and so important a work should not be done in a hurry. It was not only necessary to do their work, but to do it well, and thus to guard against some of the consequences of unnecessary haste. And what was the state of things here? Why, from several committees, the convention had, as yet, received no report. These committees were in session daily, and their hour of meeting was three o'clock. How then could they meet here at three o'clock, without interfering with their business in the committee room, on which the progress of business in the convention so much depended? The committee on contested elections would meet to-day at three o'clock, which many members of the convention were desirous to attend. This was a fact which would show the convention that all its business was not confined to this hall; and he was well satisfied that it was too early a period to adopt the resolution which had been just offered.

With respect to the call for the yeas and nays, which he presumed was to affect individuals at home, by showing that certain delegates were more anxious than others to secure economy in the expenditures of the State, he would merely observe that he was not thereby to be driven from giving such a vote as in his judgment he believed to be right. No effect to be produced by it hereafter would change his course of action, when he conscientiously believed that evening sessions at this time would rather retard than facilitate the business of the convention. He really thought that the resolution ought not to be adopted.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE thought he should be prepared to vote for this resolution a week hence, but at present there were some two or three standing committees which had made no reports.—These committees met at three o'clock in the afternoon, but in the course of a week he thought they would be prepared to devote more time to business in convention. If he had any particular reputation it was that of being a laborious and industrious man; and he was as anxious as any gentleman to make rapid progress with the business which they had come to accomplish; but at present they were not prepared for the adoption of this resolution. He would therefore move that this resolution be postponed until Monday week, when he would call it up again if nobody else did.

Mr. HARDIN remarked that it had been suggested to him that the three committees on the various branches of the judiciary—the court of appeals, the circuit courts, and the county courts—should, after they had finished their several labors, have a joint meeting for the purpose of attempting to unite upon some harmonious system as a whole. The reports as they now stood, did not harmonize. He thought it a very sensible suggestion and hoped it would be acted upon, and that the discussion on the judiciary should cease until the result of that action was known. All he desired was to secure that harmonious action which would produce the best possible system. All came here for that object, and all seemed to concur on several of the prominent principles that were to be acted upon by this convention. He hoped they would harmonize, and the result be, that they would give to the people such a constitution as that generations for time to come would say, "God bless the convention of 1849."

Mr. PROCTOR was as anxious as any one that full time and deliberation should be allowed in the performance of the labors of the convention, but from his observation of the proceedings, he thought his proposition would afford ample time to the committees for any such purpose. If every subject was to be discussed to the extent which those under consideration had been, he did not believe they would get through their labors until after Christmas, unless the convention sat more hours daily. In calling for the yeas and noes his object was not to influence any gentleman in his vote, and he presumed the call would exert no such influence. As gentlemen of more experience than himself seemed to regard it as the best plan, he had no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Wickliffe.)

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said that the suggestion to which his colleague had referred was based upon the idea that the great principles upon which this new system of a judiciary was to be organized, should be first determined by a vote of the house. The committees could then harmonize so far as its details were concerned. He did not wish to be understood as desiring that the committees in joint meeting should settle upon the principles, because it would be no final determination if they did, as the matter would still have to be decided in the house. He hoped the resolution would be postponed. While he was willing to second all efforts to further the business of the house, he did not want to act hastily on a work of so important a character as this. It was not like the ordinary legislation of this country which could undo on one day what had been done the day preceding.

The resolution was by consent postponed until Monday week.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. BARLOW, leave of absence until Monday week was granted to Mr. Hamilton.

PROPOSAL TO TERMINATE DEBATE.

Mr. KELLY moved that all debate in committee of the whole on the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) to the report made from the committee on the court of appeals, be terminated at 1 o'clock this day, and that the committee shall then proceed to vote thereon. He said he made this motion with a view to expedite the business of the convention. In the course of a few days it might be necessary that he should be absent for a brief period, and as it had been suggested that the question involved a greater responsibility than any other that had arisen during their deliberations, he desired the opportunity of voting against the amendment. He called for the yeas and nays on his motion.

The PRESIDENT had some doubt whether the motion was in order, for the report referred to was in the possession of the committee of the whole, and was not now before the convention. He did not see how they could reach it while it was in committee of the whole.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE suggested that the motion would be in order, if made so as to instruct the committee to rise and report upon the amendment at a certain hour. The committee certainly were bound to obey the instructions of the house. But he should vote against any motion to arrest debate, believing that, although it had consumed something like two days, it had not been unprofitable to the house and the country. It was too important a question to decide without full debate, and as the mover of the amendment, and others desired to be heard upon it, he believed they should have that opportunity. Like the gentleman he was anxious, and indeed he was compelled to be absent for a few days, but if public duty required him to stay, his individual interests must take their chance.

Mr. HARDIN would do any thing in the world to accommodate the gentleman from Washington, but it was impossible that he could get a vote on the amendment at one o'clock today. The whole article had to be gone through with in committee before it was reported, and the ayes and noes could only be called after it had come back to the house. By that time both gentlemen would have returned to the house. There were a great many propositions connected with this article that would elicit discussion. There was the question in relation to the four judges—another in relation to the eight years term—and then there was the question of eligibility on which undoubtedly there was a formidable battle to be fought. That was the place where he meant to make a stand if he had to die in the ditch. This was the leading bill of the house, and opportunity ought to be afforded for a full discussion upon it. He did not know whether he should speak again on the subject or not, such was the feeble condition of his health, but he was willing to forego any remarks on that point. But on the great question of eligibility or re-eligibility, he did desire to be heard at some length. He desired also to be heard on the question as to the manner of voting. He was in favor of the viva voce system and wished it applied to all officers that were to be elected. He had no idea that the manner of voting for a judge should be different. They were not the sun, that we were obliged to look at them through a smoked glass, and he was willing to look them in the face and vote aye or no, as he chose.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, said that his colleague had taken the occasion in his own peculiar way, to give notice of his future opposition to the bill. For this he was very much obliged, and had the gentleman given the same notice on the question under consideration, he (Mr. W.) would perhaps have been better prepared to meet the subject than he was when it was sprung upon him the other day.

Here the conversation dropped without any action on the motion, the President having decided that it was out of order.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. McHENRY, from the committee on miscellaneous provisions made a report as follows, which was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed:

PREAMBLE.

We, the representatives of the people of the state of Kentucky, in convention assembled, to secure to all the citizens thereof the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and property, and of pursuing happiness, do ordain and establish this constitution for its government.

ARTICLE 1.

Concerning the distribution of the powers of the government.

SEC. 1. The powers of the Government of the state of Kentucky shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to-wit: those which are legislative to one; those which are executive to another, and those which are judiciary to another.

SEC. 2. No person, or collection of persons, being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention then again resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the report of the committee on the court of appeals, Mr. HUSTON in the chair.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE. I have been a listener during the whole sitting of this convention, and I have derived much more gratification thereby, than I expect to impart by speaking any crude notions of my own. The committee on the court of appeals have submitted their report proposing some very serious innovations upon our present judiciary system. They propose to elect the judges, to fix their term of office at eight years, and to make them responsible to at least two-thirds of the legislature. The gentleman from Nelson in his amendment now under consideration, proposes to make them responsible not to two-thirds of both branches of the legislature, but to a majority of both branches. I shall vote for that amendment, and I shall vote also for the proposition of the committee to elect the judges. As a part of the means to secure that responsibility of the judge, heretofore needed, the committee propose to elect him for the limited term of eight years. For the purpose of securing a more immediate and practicable responsibility than that limited term of office of itself provides, the gentleman from Nelson has proposed his amendment. I shall vote with the committee to elect the judge, and with the gentleman from Nelson, to secure a more efficient and practical responsibility. In giving either or both of these votes it is possible that I shall differ from those who give me authority to vote at all in this convention. I was elected here, like some other gentlemen perhaps, upon another issue; a question which at the time was thought to involve danger, fearful and threatening enough to obliterate all the ancient landmarks by which parties have been characterized. The subject to which I refer, has engaged the attention of the convention for the last ten days, and it is a question which I had thought was settled, eternally settled by the popular voice in a manner so decided as to leave no room for cavil. When it comes up again, I may desire to say something upon it—and I allude to it now, only for the purpose of showing how it was I came here at all, and why it is that on these questions of an elective judiciary, and judicial responsibility, I may differ from my fellow-citizens whose good opinion I so deeply regard. But whatever may be the effect of the vote I may give, I have this to console me—that I never practised any concealment to secure their suffrages. I was guilty of no hypocritical pretences to secure a seat on this floor. So far from that, day after day, during the canvass, it was imputed to me that my views on particular subjects, were of too radical and revolutionary a character, as I believe my friend from Bourbon has designated them. If, therefore, I differ from the people of Fayette county, it will be a fair difference of opinion between them and me, and presenting on my part no violation of pledged faith, no broken promises, or disregard of understood obligation. I say it is possible I may differ from them, but the question is one which has never been much discussed in that county. A few years ago, a man would have been laughed at, if he talked about electing a judge, or of securing that responsibility for the faithful discharge of his duties that is proposed by the gentleman from Nelson. And at first blush we all shrink from the idea. There is no principle more universal in the human breast, than that which induces us to shrink from any change that trenches on those systems of labor and habits of thought, to which we have been accustomed for years, and which are hallowed perhaps by the memories of past days. But this is not the age, nor is this the people to be content with the argument that because a thing has been, therefore it must be.

It is a misfortune, or a fact whether it be a misfortune or not, that the profession of which I have the honor to be a member, learned as it is, honorable as it is, and ancient as it is, is always the very last to give up any antiquated theory or practice, connected with the judicial department of the government. Whenever it undergoes any reform, the duty has to be done by those outside the court house, and without the co-operation of those who minister at the altar of justice. Instead of our leading, as we are apt to do, in regard to all other great and salutary reforms, we here have to follow in the wake of those who originated this great principle, and to whom will belong all the honor, if it is successful.

Now it is useless to allude to the causes which produce this state of things. There are many of them, but perhaps the most obvious one is this: the very first book we read reveals to us some political notions that may do very well for the country we came from, but which is found to be utterly false when we come to apply them to the organization of government as it exists among us. We read in Blackstone about an independent judiciary, and we have heard of it in this hall from all the distinguished gentlemen who have addressed the committee. We read about an independent judiciary, and whenever any attempt is made to infuse an element of responsibility into that department of the government, like that proposed by the committee, or by the gentleman from Nelson, it is always met with the cry, you are violating that sacred principle so essential to the safety of the government, and the independence of the judiciary. The words "independence of the judiciary" have a meaning, a full meaning in England. There is not a page of British history—full as it is of deeds of renown, both civil and military, that give character and dignity to the race from which we sprang—brighter than that which records the struggles of the English judiciary in behalf of English liberty. The king formerly appointed his judges, for they were called his judges—to hold their offices during his will and pleasure, and they were paid by him, and were responsible to no body else. And now refer to the statute books of England and see the number of crimes which the subject is capable of committing against his royal majesty, and you will not be surprised that the king was in constant struggle with his people. And who could doubt the result of such struggles where the king had only to point to the subject and nod to the judge? What was the first great struggle for English liberty? It was to change the tenure by which the judge held office during the will of the king to the right of holding it during good behavior. That was the great struggle for English liberty.

And it was not fully achieved until as late as the reign of William and Mary, after the revolution. But mark you now, the very men, and they were wise and great men, who made this change—that he should hold during good behavior—also fixed the responsibility of the judge not to the king but to the parliament—where men speak their minds according to the definition of the word and not to two thirds but to a majority, both houses concurring. That is what they did. What did they do next? When the king died, the judges' commission became vacant, and thus the officer was still made dependant on the crown. And when the new monarch ascended the throne, this power to re-appoint the judges gave him a vast patronage, and enabled him to create on the part of the judge some feeling of obligation to the crown. It became then another struggle of English liberty to rectify that error, and that was not achieved I think until the time of George the Third. Then the act was passed continuing the judge in office, notwithstanding the king should die, and the independence of the English judiciary was fully established. It was in this way that it became entitled to all the endearing recollections, with which we regard it at this day. No page of British history—no period in all the English struggles for liberty—not even that when the barons forced king John at Runnymede to sign magna charta—not even all the wars against all the kingly prerogative which ended in the revolution, and the decapitation of the king—none present an instance where the ancient spirit of old English liberty was more indomitably and triumphantly developed than in stripping the king of the power he had over the judiciary. No longer could he prosecute and punish in a court of his own contriving, and before a judge of his own appointment, either for cause or upon pretext, the subject whom he might think dangerous to the throne.

Here ended the struggle of English liberty. It ended too soon, as we think in this country, and as I believe it has always ended in England. When they forced king James to resign the crown, they simply submitted to the house of Hanover. When we rejected the authority of George the Third, we did not import a Dutch Stadtholder to reign over us, but we went to work and formed a republican government in which we infused these elements of English liberty. But mark you, we commenced at the point where the struggle for English liberty had left this thing. They left the power of appointing the judge in the hands of the king, the executive branch of the government, to hold for good behavior, with responsibility to the parliament. We copied in this particular from England, leaving the power of appointment in the hands of the executive, the judge to hold his office during good behavior with responsibility to the legislature. We, however, went even beyond the British parliament, and vested the responsibility in two thirds of both branches of the legislature instead of a majority. The amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, as I understand it, seeks to restore the responsibility to the majority as it exists in the British parliament. Now it is proposed to take the power of appointment from the executive and to give it to the people—the judge to hold, not during good behavior, but for a limited term, and then to be responsible to the people in their representative capacity. And I see every thing to justify the principle of making them responsible to a majority, and there is nothing whatever in what I have heard, that is not as fully applicable to the very principle of electing the judges.

We have had a great deal of new light upon this matter of progress in constitutional reform. It is a curious fact that the wise men who framed the federal constitution—pure as they were—coming as they did just from the very fires of the revolution—did not think that the people were competent to elect a president. They looked to the past, to the turbulent, violent democracies of ancient times, and that brought them to the melancholy conclusion that the people were unsafe depositories of power. Hence it was that they interposed the body of electors between the people and the candidate. What are they for? It was intended to be a deliberative body, with power to choose a president for the people, but in fact the practice is otherwise. They have become a mere ministerial body, to do simply what the people have called them to do. I am in favor of so amending the federal constitution as to dispense with all that machinery, for it is perfectly useless. And there is some danger that after a while it may be perverted to harm, through the faithlessness of some man to the trust which the people have reposed in him. I have merely referred to this as showing you the apprehension entertained at one time as to the capacity of the people to elect their officers.—Now, I believe there will not be much controversy as to the propriety of the people electing even their judicial officers. And why is it proposed that the people shall elect them? Was it not for the purpose of securing some responsibility on the part of the judiciary to the people, whose representatives they are? And if they are to have so long a term as eight years, would it not be a more efficient and practical responsibility if they were held accountable to the legislature? Gentlemen here have denounced the legislative department of government, and why that particularity? Has the judicial department of government always been so pure and immaculate that it ought not to be held to accountability to any body? How were they in the times of the children of Israel of old? We are told that they became corrupt and were deposed! We are told, too, that in the Roman empire, in the days of Cicero, the judges became so corrupt and bribery so common, that they actually boasted of the amounts they had received to decide causes in a particular way! How was it in England before the revolution? Were they not hanging and banishing them for a long time? But since the tenure was changed to good behavior, with responsibility to the representatives of the people in parliament assembled, they have had, with but few exceptions, the best judges in the world. And in opposition to all these facts, gentlemen were constantly referring to the excesses of a single popular assembly in revolutionary France, as showing the dangers to be apprehended from the legislative department. And they propose too, to give these judges an eight years' term of office, with no other responsibility than that they shall come back at the end of that time to the people, or to require two-thirds of both branches of the legislature to bring them back there before that time. This Mr. Jefferson long since pronounced a mere scare crow, and the history of the country shows that it is so.

We are told that to make them responsible to a majority of the legislature, would be to destroy the independence of a department of the government. I do not understand that each department in your government is independent.—When you say in your constitution that the government shall be divided into three departments, you mean that no body of men in one shall exercise the powers properly belonging to the other; but not that they shall all of them be irresponsible. How is it now? A judge has the power to strike your legislative act dead. Was that not an interference with the legislative department? The president of the United States has a qualified veto on the acts of congress, and a large and intelligent body of gentlemen think that to be wrong, although he is elected by, and is the representative of, the people! Congress may, however, pass an act notwithstanding the objections of the president, but the judge in the judicial department of the government, not responsible to the people, has an absolute and unqualified veto upon every act of congress. In the name of God, is not that enough? They are said to be co-equal and co-ordinate, but I do not think so. I think with this vast power in its hands, of striking every act of the legislature dead, the supremacy is clearly on the side of the judiciary. And if we are to give them a term of office of eight years duration, we must provide some other checks upon them. You can have none other than the legislature. All say that they are willing they should be made responsible to the people—but that would clearly be no responsibility at all, because you cannot assemble the immense body of the people to act upon it. The only place, then, where you can delegate this responsibility, is clearly with the legislative department of the government.—They are the representatives of the people, and elected every year by the people, as I trust in God they will continue to be, for I am not in favor of biennial sessions. Frequency of political elections is a cardinal doctrine with me in political faith; and I am not to be led off from it by the mere consideration of the cost of assembling the legislature every year. Nor can I consent that these judges shall be elected by ballot, and nobody else. I am for the ballot, and I would apply the principle to the election of every officer in the government. I would make no distinction—and permit me to say that the remark of my distinguished friend was a sad one on that subject. He thought that it was necessary to restrict the ballot for the purpose of preserving a peculiar institution in Kentucky! I have never heard such an argument before.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The gentleman will pardon me, but he neither could have heard me or read my printed speech. The remark I made was, that I was attached, from long habit, to the viva voce system of voting; and that the reasons which perhaps had induced other states to adopt and practice the system of voting by ballot, did not, and would not exist here, as they were supposed to exist there, so long as we cherished and maintained our present domestic institutions.—Not that the viva voce system was necessary to maintain these institutions, but that the maintenance of them would obviate the necessity for the existence of those causes which have driven other states to the adoption of the ballot system.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE. I am very happy to hear the explanation of the gentleman, for I certainly would not like to have such an idea go forth with the sanction of the distinguished gentleman from Nelson. We have had enough of appeals to the non-slaveholder against the slaveholder in Kentucky. There was not a county in the state in which such an appeal had been successful, and what was it that had composed this body as it is, with the sentiments they entertain on this subject? What was it but a sense of justice in the public mind? I go with the gentleman from Henderson, (Mr. Dixon) and I expect to vote in favor of his resolution, declaring that you have no right to take the property of the citizen without paying him for it. You have no more right to take it without due compensation, than the non-stockholders in a bank have a right to seize on the bank's money—and there is not one man in five hundred who is a stockholder in a bank.

Gentlemen have frequently made allusions to the ancient democracies, and drawn largely from those sources for illustration. But there is a principle, it should be recollected, the discovery of modern times, of which those democracies knew nothing. That is the representative principle. The people here do not meet together now, as they did in olden times, even when it is possible for them to do so. There is not a village in the state, in which the people might not meet and adopt their municipal regulations.—Yet do they not elect trustees to whom they confide their business? The principle has become so interwoven with the hearts and customs of the people, that they exercise it even in those cases where they could easily meet en masse, and transact their business. But along with that principle has come another, and without it the system would all end in despotism. That is the principle of periodical responsibility on the part of any man delegated to office, to those who delegated him. It is responsibility on the part of the public agent, not only to the people themselves, but to those who come directly to the people, and who alone are competent to bring him to the public scrutiny. That is the principle, and hence I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson. Then we shall have responsibilities directly to the people at the end of eight years, as provided by the committee, but another, and a better, and more efficient responsibility to the people's representatives.—I do not contend that the legislature is the people. But they are the representatives of the people, elected every year, and coming fresh from the people, and they are the proper depositaries of the duty of holding to accountability all other officers.

I had not designed to occupy much of the time of the committee, and I rose merely for the purpose of indicating my views in regard to an independent judiciary. I have done so frankly, though perhaps the people of my county may not entertain the same views that I do. They may be, for aught I know, governed by the views of a distinguished gentleman in Clarke, who is writing and circulating, through the public press, a series of essays in which he takes the very grounds in arguing against an elective judiciary—the same melancholy strains that gentlemen do here, against the principle of providing a responsibility on the part of the judiciary to the legislative department of government.

I shall add no more, though perhaps I may avail myself of a parliamentary privilege, if I think proper, and write out my views a little fuller on this subject than I have here delivered them.

Mr. GRAY. I desire to occupy for a few moments the attention of the committee, while I give the reasons that will induce me to dissent from the proposition of my respected friend from Nelson. I have been taught, from my earliest infancy, to receive whatever should come from his lips as being dictated by the purest principles of patriotism, and as having been suggested by great and superior wisdom and experience. And I am very sorry that on this occasion, I cannot give my assent to the proposition which the gentleman has suggested. What is that proposition? Why, if I understand it, it is to strike out of the third section of the report of the committee on the court of appeals, the words, "that shall not be sufficient grounds of impeachment," with a view if I understand correctly, that we may so alter and so frame this constitution which we are called upon to make, that there shall be no distinction in right of the legislature to remove the judges from office, whether by address or by impeachment; and that for any matter for which a judge shall be subject to impeachment and trial by a court that is to consist of the Senate upon oath, he may also be removed by a bare majority of the legislature. Not only judicial but executive officers, as I understand it, from the highest to the lowest are to be subject to this same tribunal. That is the question that we are now called upon to consider. And I ask you, in considering this question, if it is not necessary to understand why we have three great departments in this government? Why is it that the wisdom of our fathers, who framed our general government, and the wisdom of those who framed all our state governments, have thought proper to divide and distribute the powers of government into three distinct departments, and to give to each department a separate body of magistracy? If I understand the great principle that has made this experiment of a free government successful, it is that there has entered into it the provision which never before entered into any government: that these three departments should be separate and independent. And this too notwithstanding the position of the gentleman from Fayette, (Mr. R. N. Wickliffe,) that they cannot be independent of each other. It has been my learning that these departments of government operate as checks and balances on each other, and thus the one would prevent the other from exercising any power which did not properly belong to it. If these are true principles, if they lie at the foundation of our government, and are worth maintaining and preserving in the constitution that we are called upon to frame, I ask you if the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson is not calculated to subvert and destroy them. It seems to me they would crumble into dust. Now, what are the arguments that gentlemen offer in support of that proposition, and what reasons do they give here, why this principle should be changed—a principle which has been sanctioned by the authority of every state in the union, and by the constitution of the United States itself. I ask, sir, what reasons do gentlemen give for going thus against the experience and the history of the country from its foundation to the present time. Why, the gentleman says this is a republican government, and here the great republican principle is that the majority must rule, and that they can do no wrong. That is the only position, the only principle that my honorable friend has urged as a reason for making this radical change, as I conceive it to be in the principles of our constitution. I will go as far as any man, in saying that a majority of the people have the right to rule, and to frame and fashion their government as they think will best secure their rights, but how and when are they to do it? Here is the place, and we are delegated to do it. Here the majority of the people are heard, and they have a right to frame, and I trust we shall frame such a government as a majority on this floor will approve, and when we submit it to the people that a majority will ratify it.

Then can that objection prevail if the people, acting here in their sovereign capacity through their representatives, think that the great ends of government, the security of the life, liberty, and property of the citizens of the state, will be better attained by having the provision in the constitution, that one department of the government shall not be interfered with or removed by another department—although it may be as the gentleman has said the representatives of the people, unless they can get two thirds of their number to concur therein. We have the same right to engraft that principle on the constitution, and it will be as republican, as if they thought proper to place it in the power of a bare majority of the legislature to override and control the other departments of the government.

It seems to me that all the reasons that gentlemen have offered for this change, amount to nothing more than that. The honorable gentleman from Fayette has gone into a history of the judiciary of England, to state and show us that the judiciary there, is independent. Why, from the gentleman's speech, I presume that he thinks that it is far better and more independent than any judiciary we have here now, or that we will have, after we have organized it on the plan proposed in the report now under consideration. He tells us that the judges there are subject and responsible to a majority of the parliament, and not to two thirds. He told us at the same time, that these judges derive their power and authority by appointment from the king. Is there no difference here? Is there no difference in the proposition that is now before the committee? Do we propose that any king shall bestow this appointment upon the judges, or that any other one individual shall do it? No, sir, the proposition here is that the people in their sovereign capacity shall elect these judges. And I ask if it would not be the height of folly and absurdity when they give them the right to elect their judges, to say we will give to a bare majority, an accidental one perhaps, of the legislature, who are elected by the same power, not for the purpose of making judges, but to attend to the legislation of the country, the right to turn out all the judges in the commonwealth, for some difference in opinion that they may conceive to exist between them. It would seem to me, that instead of this responsibility that the gentleman speaks of, he is building up a power to tear down and destroy what the people themselves have set up. If they are qualified to elect men to discharge the duties of the office of judge, ought there to be a power above the people, a bare majority of another department of this government to undo, to tear down and demolish that which the people have built up. It seems to me a strange fallacy that has got into the heads of some of my friends. But the gentleman says there will not be a sufficient responsibility to the people, or to any other appointing power. Now, would it not be quite as proper that the people should appoint some power to regulate the legislature? They are both selected as the agents of the people. And would it not be quite as plausible to say that there should be some tribunal to overrule and investigate the acts of the legislature before they should operate on the people. This very provision requires that all these judges shall go out at the end of eight years; and if you adopt the report, one of them is to go out at the expiration of every two years. Is not that a responsibility directly to the people, and one that will affect them as soon as the responsibility of the representatives in the legislature will be thrown back upon them? I presume my friend from Fayette is the only gentleman here who is in favor of annual sessions of the legislature. If there was any thing that did most to bring about this convention in my section of the country, it was the fact that the people complained of the legislation of the country—that there was too much of it—that the legislature met here annually, and were engaged in passing all manner of laws which before they could be fairly understood, or their effects tested, were half of them modified, changed, or repealed, until the gentleman himself, with all his legal knowledge, would find it difficult to trace out the law on some particular subject. It seems to me that this was one of the reasons why this convention was called together. And it will certainly be engrafted on the constitution that the legislature shall not meet oftener than once in two years.

And then the same responsibility would exist in regard to one of these judges as there would in regard to the legislature itself. They would be directly responsible to the people, (both the judge and the legislature,) and within the same period of time. But what are the bad effects that would result from the proposition of the gentleman? Why, whenever a legislature should come here, instead of going about the business the people entrusted to them, the legislation of the country, we should have agitation all over the state in regard to the removal of the judges. Here would be a judge in one section of the state, who was not acting in a manner suited to the notions of some particular representative, he having, perhaps, decided some case under a particular law against him or his friend, and on that principle you might combine members from all parts of the state, and consume more of the time of the legislature in trying these judges than might be required in passing all the laws that were necessary and proper. And if there should be any law passed involving any great constitutional question bearing upon the people at large—any thing which would excite and divide the people into parties, no matter what sort of parties, I ask gentlemen if these party feelings would not come into conflict here and operate on these judges? These judges are appointed to restrain the action of the legislature—to confine them to the principles and powers as defined in the constitution we may adopt. Do you not immediately excite a jealousy between the legislative power and the judicial power, when the judiciary, in the solemn discharge of the duties imposed on them, decide on the constitutionality of the law adopted by the legislature? I ask you if a bare majority of the legislature, that passed the law, should have the power to remove the court? I ask if the court would not be swept off, notwithstanding its decision might be right, and the people themselves might approve of it? The people, at one time, might be wrong, and we know the majority of the people change, and that the majority is not always right; and would it be right then, to subject the courts of the country, the tribunals that are to decide upon the rights of every citizen, to any popular whim, any mere freak that might come over the people? We have had some experience in this country on this subject at the time the new and old court parties divided the people. We know that the people were in favor of sustaining some of the laws that the court declared to be unconstitutional, and if a majority of the representatives of the people then could have reached the court, we should have had the sacred principle in our constitution, that the obligation of no contract should be impaired, obliterated, and in effect destroyed.

Now, when we see the bad effects that may result from this principle, ought we not to hesitate? Is it not better, as the gentleman says, that we should stand by the old landmarks which have been regarded in all the states, and which have proved successful for the purposes for which they were intended? I believe, that in the state of Illinois, which is certainly democratic enough for any man on God's earth, and where I am told that the candidates for the senate of the United States canvass the whole state as the candidates for governor do here—they modified their constitution only two years ago, and we find that this same principle of requiring two thirds of the legislature to remove a judge, is preserved in it. I ask then, if we shall obliterate it here, unless gentlemen can give us some good reason, or show some great danger that is to result from its retention. I think it is a principle that has been tested by time, and that no inconvenience can result from it, while great inconvenience may result from its being changed as the gentleman desires.

Mr. ROOT. It is with the greatest diffidence that I rise at any time, to address this convention, and my only apology for doing so at present is, that I look upon the subject which is now before the convention as one of very great importance, and I am desirous therefore, that my views in relation to it, however humble they may be, shall be known to my immediate constituents.

Since the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson has been presented to this house, gentlemen upon this floor, both on my right hand and on my left, gentlemen of acknowledged ability, and gentlemen who are abundantly able to argue the question, and to show clearly all the pros and cons, have seemed to magnify the subject as though the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson was to incorporate a new principle into the report of the committee. I will notice what principle is proposed to be incorporated, and in the mean time, sir, as gentlemen have defined their positions on the subject of their early advocacy of the convention principle, I too will venture to announce my course on this subject.

I am an original convention man. I contended for it in my county and in the adjacent counties, when the principle was unpopular. In 1844 I stood upon this floor, and introduced the bill for a convention, and I stood solitary and alone. I was unsupported, save by one individual who had the temerity to stand up and denounce the iniquity that existed under the old constitution, and to apprise the people of Kentucky of the oppressions they had been laboring under for fifty years, and of the amount of money that might be saved to them, if the administration of the government of this commonwealth were carried on under a different system. I have therefore, a right to have some idea of what the people of my section of the country desire shall be incorporated in the constitution.

The committee, in their report, have proposed to give to the people the right to elect their judges. That is the principle that is contended for by nearly every gentleman on this floor; but the report of the committee goes on, and proposes to incorporate in the new constitution the two thirds principle. Sir, the two thirds principle is the identical principle, about which the public mind in Kentucky was awakened to a sense of the iniquitous system that was resting upon us. It was upon this ground that I stood impregnable before the people—the responsibility of the judges and other officers of the government to the people. You elect your judges for eight years. The judge whom you elect may be a man of fifty or sixty years of age; he does not anticipate a re-election for a second term, and during that long period of eight years, he will be as irresponsible to the people, as he would under the old system. And, sir, we have the lights of past history before us to show that in all times, and particularly in Kentucky, for the last fifty years, the time has not been when a solitary judge, or magistrate, or any other individual holding office, could be brought before the legislature with any probability of his being removed from office for any cause whatever.

There is a sort of hallowed dignity surrounding the emine of the judge, that our legislature dare not tamper with. Sir, a judge ought not only to be pure, but he ought to be like Caesar's wife, clear of all suspicion. Can the committee suppose for a moment, that a judge, with all the influence which he possesses, and with the elevated character which the people have given him, by electing him, will have injustice done to him by one hundred and forty of the representatives of the people of the State? Is it possible that a majority of the house of representatives, and of the senate, responsible immediately to the people as they are, will turn a man out of office, unless there be some just cause for which he should be removed? If it becomes a doubtful contest, whether a judge may be legally turned out of office for malfeasance or misfeasance, or for any capital crime that he may have committed, he ought to be turned out by the people themselves, for in no case should a judge be retained in office, even if a breath of suspicion rests upon him. The judiciary of a country ought to be kept pure; and in order that it may be, you ought to elect a tribunal for the express purpose of taking cognizance of such cases. Incorporate the two thirds principle, and go back to your constituents, and declare to them what you have done, and they will tell you that you have adopted the old system of no responsibility, for it amounts to none. Have we never had a judge or a magistrate in the commonwealth, that ought to have been turned out of office? Yet where is the power that has ever arrested their course, in cases where they have done wrong? There has not been a solitary instance.

Look at the case that has been referred to in the county of Greenup—a case in which the magistrate ought not only to have been turned out of office, but damned to eternal infamy.—But when brought before the legislature, there was not virtue enough in the two-thirds principle to relieve the public from this incubus that was resting upon them. The majority principle is the principle of republican liberty—the principle that runs through every avenue throughout this broad land. And it is a safe basis on which the people may rest. If you go into the court of appeals, there a majority of the judges assembled, will decide your case, though millions are depending upon it. If you go to congress, where the great interests of the nation are discussed, and where the solemn arbitrament is made upon the destinies of a free people, there a majority of the representatives assembled to decide upon the great interests of the nation. And is there anything peculiarly sacred or holy that surrounds the character of a judge, rendering it proper that he should not be held responsible to the people? To the people I say, he ought to be held responsible; and in order to make him so, it is necessary to strike from your constitution the two-thirds principle.

Sir, there is no danger of the people, through their representatives, doing any injustice to the people's judges. Would any man having the character of a representative of the people, blast his own reputation and put a blot upon his own escutcheon in order to reach the judge of his particular district and to turn him out upon political grounds or from malevolent motives?

Sir, admitting that all the representatives from the tenth judicial district shall conspire together in order to place A in the office to which B has been elected by the people; or admit that B had rendered himself obnoxious to a gentleman who possesses great influence and power throughout the judicial district, are there not one hundred and thirty five representatives of the people from other parts of the state who will constitute a check upon the designs of the representatives and others of that particular district? In short are there not checks enough in order to hold the scales of public justice even? I apprehend that the two thirds principle, instead of making votes for your new constitution, will be the paramount cause why it will fall before the people.

Sir, the gentleman who last addressed you rested the whole case upon this—that the judges may decide a law of a certain legislature unconstitutional, and hence he supposes that all the representatives of the state will be lashed into a fury, and that they will come up here and in the face of the constitution will be for hurling the judge out of his seat. Sir, let us look at the history of Kentucky for the last fifty years. If you turn over the journals you will find that but few of the men who were assembled here any one year in the legislature, are returned the next year.

Sir, the responsibility to a majority of the sovereign people, or the representatives of the people, is the only true criterion of responsibility that I know of. The same principle, as noticed yesterday, and which my honorable friend from Fayette has elaborated, is the law of England, when a majority of parliament can depose a judge. Yet gentlemen, who have relied so much in this discussion upon English precedent and authority, array themselves against the republican principle of the right of the majority to rule. Sir, why adopt a two thirds principle in relation to judges and not to other officers? Why not say that the President of the United States shall be elected by a two thirds vote? The President of the United States unites in his hands more power over the destinies of this country, than any other officer in the land, and yet he is elected by a majority vote. Sir, the principle is not tenable; and in my conception it is not consonant with republicanism. It is not such as I desire to see incorporated in the constitution.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. It is with great difficulty that I have brought my mind to the point of addressing this committee, and giving the reasons that will influence my vote, both to the committee and to the country. But sir, the attitude which I occupy here, and the relation which I sustain to the constituency which sent me to this body, make it necessary that I define the reasons that shall induce me to give the vote which I shall give upon the question, which is now under consideration. That there have been great and general complaints throughout the state of Kentucky, as to the non-responsibility of the judiciary of the country, cannot be contradicted. There is scarcely a dissenting voice among all those with whom I have conversed on the subject, that there is no practical responsibility, so far as the judges of the courts are concerned, and I myself have ever been in favor of an efficient mode, if it can be devised, of reaching the judiciary of the country, for any malfeasance in office. I took that position before my constituents, and came here with the understanding, that so far at least as the county officers were concerned, my views and those of my constituents were with the report of the committee on that subject. But with regard to other classes of officers than the county officers—and we have the question now to meet in regard to the judges of the court of appeals and the circuit court. Where is the tribunal to try them? I have heard many suggestions as to the proper tribunal. However, the only question now before the committee is, whether they shall be tried by a simple majority of the legislature, or by a majority of two-thirds. That is the question. And sir, one word upon the responsibility principle, which has been spoken of by almost every gentleman who has addressed the committee upon this subject. I yield to none, sir, so far as devotion to the call of the convention is concerned, from the very beginning. I yield to none sir, so far as regards a desire and intention of restoring back to the people those rights, which they have conveyed to a corps of agents in the commonwealth, and restoring back to the people the election of their own officers. I was originally a convention man. I went for it throughout. The question as to the right of the people to rule by a majority, is not the question we have now to consider. As far as I understand, the people have a right to say what agents shall decide this question or the other question. Now when the legislature of Kentucky is convened for the purpose of passing upon the judicial officers of the commonwealth, they are sitting as a quasi judicial tribunal, they are made the judges of the law and the facts of the case.

Suppose you incorporate into the constitution the principle that a bare majority of the legislature shall turn a man out of office? What do you do sir? You go in the very teeth of the practice that you have pursued from the commencement of the government of this commonwealth; you say in effect, that although the question is doubtful, whether the officer is competent to discharge the duties of his office or not, or whether he has been guilty of malfeasance in office or not, a bare majority shall remove him from office. I ask you if that is not contrary to the principles of every free government?

Now, what has been the practice of the commonwealth of Kentucky? A jury decides the facts of the case, and your judges the law of the case. Questions of fact are much more difficult to be decided than questions of law. You require the unanimous verdict of a jury to determine the title to property, or to pass upon the life of an individual. That is right sir. I know that in some quarters of this house, there is an intimation given out in favor of a majority verdict of a jury. I am for the old method.

But to return, you come to this question as a judicial tribunal. When a judge has been elected by the people of his district, if he discharges the duty as he ought, he holds the office till the time for which he has been elected has expired. Yet here you propose to remove him, and not only to remove him, but to fix a blot, a stain upon his character, which cannot be wiped away. That is the course that is proposed to be pursued. I came here ready to go for any proposition which would meet the two questions into which this whole matter is resolvable, and that is convenience and justice. A convenient mode of reaching your officers, and a mode which will, at the same time that it is convenient, square with the ends of justice. But sir, what has been the practice of this commonwealth, so far as this power of impeachment and address is concerned? We are told that at no time have judges been addressed out of office, or impeached out. That is all true.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If the gentleman will allow me, I will correct him in regard to this. If he means to apply his remark to the old jury court, he is mistaken. The records of the court show that judges have been removed by impeachment, and disqualified from holding office. I allude to the magistrate from the county of Logan.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. As far as that is concerned, I have not examined carefully the whole proceedings of the legislature on the subject. And as far as the recollection of the gentleman extends I stand corrected. I make no doubt he 'conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrongfully.

"20. For what glory is it, if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God."

Why did Paul send Onesimus home to his master, stating that he hoped he who had hitherto been an unprofitable servant, would now be profitable? Why did he not say to Philemon that slavery was wrong, that it was a sin, that it was a thing which God abhorred, a corroding cancer on the body politic, and would certainly destroy it if it was not healed? Why, I ask, if slavery be the evil complained of in the article read from the Examiner, did Paul not tell Philemon that he had best set Onesimus free, and turn abolitionist. Why, I ask again, sir, if slavery be, in "all its parts" evil, and in all its tendencies, consequences, and effects ruinous, and in itself contrary alike to the laws of nature, reason, and revelation, is it that our Saviour did not condemn and abolish it. His mission was love, his object to condemn sin, and redeem men from its bondage. He did it in every other, why not in this? Was it because the sin of slavery was too small a matter? Oh no. Why, if what the emancipationists say be true, it is the greatest sin in the world. What sir, take your equal, and vi et armis, drive him off into the lanes, and ditches, and gutters, and dens, and hog wallows, and chains, and drag, and drive, and whip, and cut, and beat, and rob him of his liberty and his property; why 'tis the worst sin in the world. Why then sir, did not the blessed Redeemer condemn it; did not in a manner not to be mistaken? Was it because his sympathy was not as great as that of the abolitionists, or his love of truth and justice weaker? Sir, his mission was love, love to each, and love to all. If he loved all alike, why then would he leave any in bondage who were entitled to their freedom, when his great, governing principle was, "render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's." Sir, if slavery be the thing assumed, the course pursued by our Savior is wholly irreconcilable, to my mind, with his mission, his life, his death, his resurrection, his religion, or his attributes. He came to do the will of his father, and if slavery be a thing that God abhors, it seems to me, sir, he would certainly have abolished it, especially as it would have been an end so easily accomplished by one who said "let there be light, and there was light." But it is said by some, but I think falsely said, that he could not have established his kingdom if he had interfered with the domestic institutions of that day; and that from motives of policy, or fear, he did not do it though his head, his heart, his father, his religion, and all was against it. Sir, did you ever hear such an infamous and blasphemous sentiment! The king of glory, actuated by a principle of fear, or governed by motives of policy! He who spake as never man spake! He who in the beginning was with God, and was God! He by whom, and for whom, all things were made, and without whom was not any thing made that was made, governed in a great question like this by a principle of policy, to the neglect and total abandonment of all justice, mercy, and truth! It is too bad. Sir, to impute such a motive to such a being, on such a subject, is infamous; it is blasphemous in the extreme. I know men, sir—I speak nothing invidiously—who have said—and I have heard of their expressing the sentiment—teach them to believe that God and religion tolerated and established slavery, and they would renounce it, and forever after go against it, and the principles it inculcates. Sir, this shows that the object such an one would have in ascertaining the will of God, would not be to execute and carry it out, but to see how far he can make it subserve his own peculiar views. But, sir, convince me that God the Father, God the Son, and God the Spirit, all in one, would for thousands and thousands of years, in every age, and under every dispensation of religion, and amongst all nations, permit an institution so outrageous as the one of slavery is represented to be by our opponents. I confess it would shake my faith. Sir, I do not, I cannot believe it.

Now, sir, I have gone through, in my crude way, with this whole subject, and I have shown, I think, that God did ordain and establish slavery by the prophetic denunciations of Noah and his son Ham, and his posterity, in the very dawn of time. I have shown that he permitted Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, all to have hosts of slaves, while in full fellowship with Him and with one another. I have shown that God authorized the Jews, through Moses, to purchase with money, and hold slaves forever. I have shown, also, that he incorporated it with the institutions of the passover and circumcision, thus identifying it with, and incorporating it in, both Patriarchal and Jewish dispensations; showing, clearly and conclusively, that slavery is not, as is contended by the opposition, contrary to, but compatible with, the law of God, and consequently cannot be a sin in his sight. Sin being an institution or act contrary to, and in violation of, God's holy law, and God having ordained and established slavery, it cannot be immoral, either in its institution or tendency. A bad tree cannot bring forth good fruit, nor can a good tree bring forth bad fruit. I have farther shown that it is not the use, but the abuse of slavery that brings wretchedness and ruin; that where slavery abounded and was properly regulated, prosperity did much more abound and continue,—thus clearly showing and establishing what was to be proven—that slavery is neither a sin in the sight of God, a great moral evil, or detrimental to the best interests of a state; that it has existed in every age of the world since the flood, and has been incorporated with every dispensation of religion—Patriarchal, Jewish, and Christian.

And then, on motion of Mr. CLARKE, the committee rose and reported progress. Leave was granted for it to sit again, and

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, from the committee on the court of appeals, made a report as an amendment of the report heretofore made from that committee, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed, as follows:

Sec. 5. Line 2, after "state," add "by counties." Sec. 5. Line 2, after "districts," add "as nearly equal in voting population, and with as convenient limits as may be."

Sec. 13. Add the following: "provided, that when a vacancy may occur from any cause, or the clerk shall be under charges upon information, the judges of the court of appeals shall have power to appoint a clerk, pro tem, to perform the duties of clerk until such vacancy shall be filled, or the clerk acquitted."

Add the following: Sec. 15 "All elections of judges of the court of appeals, and the clerks thereof, shall be by ballot."

Mr. BRISTOW, from the committee on the county courts, made a report which was referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered to be printed, as follows:

ARTICLE —.

Sec. 1. There shall be established in each county now, or which may hereafter be erected within this commonwealth, a county court, to consist of a presiding judge and two associate judges.

Sec. 2. The judges of the county court shall be elected by the qualified voters in each county, for the term of four years, and until their successors shall be duly qualified, and shall receive such compensation for their services as may be fixed by law, to be paid out of the county revenue.

Sec. 3. At the first election after the adoption of this constitution, the three judges shall be elected at the same time, but the associate judges, first elected, shall hold their offices for only two years, so that, thereafter, the election of the presiding judge, and that of the associate judges, will not occur at the same time.

Sec. 4. No person shall be eligible to the office of presiding or associate judge of the county court, unless he be a citizen of the United States, over twenty one years of age, and a resident of the county in which he shall be chosen one year next preceding the election.

Sec. 5. The jurisdiction of the county court shall be regulated by law, and, until changed, shall be the same now vested in the county courts of this commonwealth.

Sec. 6. The several counties in this state shall be laid off into districts of convenient size, as the general assembly may, from time to time, direct. Two justices of the peace and one constable shall be elected in each district by the qualified voters therein. The jurisdiction of said officers shall be co-extensive with the county. — Justices of the peace shall be elected for the term of four years, and constables for the term of two years; they shall be citizens of the United States, twenty-one years of age, and shall have resided six months in the district in which they may be elected, next preceding the election.

Sec. 7. Judges of the county court, and justices of the peace, shall be conservators of the peace. They shall be commissioned by the governor. County and district officers shall vacate their offices by removal from the district or county in which they shall be appointed. The legislature shall provide, by law, for the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns of all elections of judges of the county court, justices of the peace, and constables, and for determining contested elections; and also provide the mode of filling vacancies in these offices.

Sec. 8. Judges of the county courts, justices of the peace, and constables, shall be subject to indictment for malfeasance or misfeasance in office, in such mode as may be prescribed by law, subject to appeal to the court of appeals; and, upon conviction, their offices shall become vacant.

Mr. GHOLSON, from a select committee, as its chairman, made the following report, which was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed:

ARTICLE —.

Sec. 1. Within five years after the adoption of this constitution, the legislature shall appoint not less than three nor more than five persons learned in the law, who shall revise, digest, and arrange the statute laws, civil and criminal, so as to have but one law on any one subject, to be in plain English, in such manner as the legislature may direct; and a like provision shall be had as often as shall be found necessary.

Sec. 2. Each law passed by the legislature shall embrace but one subject matter, which shall be expressed in the title.

Sec. 3. Every amendment of a statute shall include that part of the old statute intended to be retained, as well as the amendment or addition thereto.

Sec. 4. The legislature, at its first session after the adoption of the new constitution, shall provide for the appointment of at least three persons learned in the law, whose duty it shall be to prepare a code of practice for the courts in this commonwealth, by revising, abridging, and simplifying the laws in relation thereto, and report the same to the legislature for their adoption, and modification from time to time.

Sec. 5. The mode of taking evidence in this commonwealth shall, in all civil suits, be uniform and the same, and each party shall have the right to make a witness of the opposing party.

Mr. GHOLSON, from a minority of the same committee, asked and obtained leave to make a report differing in some of its details from the report of the majority, with which he said he was unable to agree. On his motion it was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed, as follows:

ARTICLE —.

Sec. 1. At its first session after the adoption of this constitution, the legislature shall appoint not less than three nor more than five persons learned in the law, whose duty it shall be to revise and arrange the statute laws of this commonwealth, both civil and criminal, so as to have but one law on any one subject.

SEC. 2. And, also, three other persons learned in the law, whose duty it shall be to prepare a code of practice for the courts in this commonwealth, by revising, abridging, and simplifying the rules of practice, and laws relating thereto—all of whom shall, at as early a day as practicable, report their labors to the legislature for their approval, amendment, and adoption. A like revision of the statutes and rules of practice shall be provided by the legislature every years.

SEC. 3. When the legislature shall amend a statute, the whole of such statute, as amended, shall be published.

SEC. 4. No law passed by the legislature shall embrace more than one distinct object, or subject matter, which shall be expressed in the title.

SEC. 5. No petition or declaration shall ever be made necessary to the issuance of process, on accounts or notes for the payment of money or property.

SEC. 6. No civil suit shall be dismissed for lack of technical form or specifications; but every citizen shall have justice freely without sale, promptly, without denial or delay, and a trial upon the merits of his case. To this end, the legislature, at its first session after the adoption of this constitution, shall provide one general form of action in which all civil suits shall be brought.

SEC. 7. In all civil suits the witnesses shall be examined orally, and in open court, except in such cases as, from necessity, the legislature shall otherwise order and direct; and either party shall always have the right to make a witness of the opposing party.

SEC. 8. Seven years peaceable possession under a title, either legal or equitable, shall quiet the titles of the occupants of lands in this commonwealth, as to the adverse claim or claims of all and every person or persons—infants, idiots, and persons of unsound mind excepted.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. JAMES, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Talbott until to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT announced that he had received a note from the delegate from Franklin county (Mr. Lindsey) stating that he was detained from his seat, without leave, by the illness of his father.

SLAVERY.

The resolutions offered yesterday by Mr. Dixon, affirming the inviolability of slave property, came up as the unfinished business.

Mr. TURNER resumed the discussion, and spoke as follows:

Mr. President: When the gentleman's resolution was read yesterday morning there was such confusion here that I did not at once draw the distinction between the propriety of doing what he desires, and the power of doing it, and I therefore said that I hoped the vote would be taken immediately, for I am sure that not a member wishes to interfere with the right of property. After it was read a second time, the elder gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) got the floor, and I had not the opportunity of making the remarks I desired. I concur in what was said by that gentleman with one exception, and I do not at present intend to discuss the merits of the resolution of the gentleman from Henderson, except in part, as I understand it is to be amended. I am extremely anxious that we shall all come to an agreement on this subject, and to such a one as will not go out to alarm the people of the commonwealth. It is true there can be no dissent from the proposition that we ought not to interfere with the vested rights of the citizens of Kentucky. Yet, however alarming it may appear at first blush, I have not the most remote doubt that we have the power to interfere with those vested rights, so far as respects the slave property of the commonwealth. I hope the day will never come—it certainly has not now come—when there will be a disposition to exercise this power, either by us or by those who may come after us.

There have been two propositions assumed in this debate, in relation to the influence of the Federal Constitution on this subject of slavery, upon which I wish to express an opinion, and to read some authorities. There has been an opinion expressed here, that the constitution of 1792 and 1798, was a contract between the citizens of, and the government of the state, that they should hold slave property, and that therefore it was guarantied by that provision of the constitution of the United States, which secures the inviolability of contracts. I do not think that is a correct doctrine. I do not believe that the tenure of our slave property is held in any way under prohibitions or grants of power in the United States constitution, except so far as the provisions of the constitution in regard to runaway slaves, and one other similar matter, may be connected with it. I do not consider a constitution, any more than a law, to be a contract. Is every law we pass a contract between the government and the citizen? And the constitution is nothing more than law. It is supreme, and other law yields to it as inferior law, but still it is a mere law, and rule of action prescribed by the sovereign power. It is a sovereign law in its sphere of action, and where it is not restrained by constitutional power superior to it; but whether it be constitution or law, there are no rights of contract arising from it. If that was the case, then the repeal of the law would leave all the rights under it just as if the law was not repealed. And if we concede that slave property in this country is regulated by, or held in any manner under the federal government, what does that concession amount to? It is the very concession that the wildest advocate of abolitionism desires us to make for them. Instead of the institution being entirely under the protection of our own laws and regulations, it would be entirely under the control of the federal government. It may be said that there are guaranties with regard to it under the federal constitution, but are we not increasing the free states to such an extent that soon two thirds of the Union will be free states, who could at any moment attack those guaranties by way of amending the constitution, and take our property away from us. That would be the goal to which we are driving, and I protest against the assumption of the existence of any such power in the federal government.

It has been said also, that the slave property is further protected because the constitution of the United States declares that private property shall not be taken without compensation—a similar provision to the one existing in our state constitution. It is not addressed to the state power or authority at all, but it is addressed entirely to the exercise of the power in the federal constitution by congress sitting under it. It has nothing to do with the state institutions or the exercise of state power at all. I will read the decision on this point in the case of Barrow vs. the Mayor of Baltimore—7th Peters, page 243.

"The provision declaring that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation, is intended solely as a limitation on the exercise of the power by the government of the United States, and is not applicable to the legislation of States. Limitations of power, if expressed in general terms, are necessarily applicable to the government created by the instrument, and not to distinct governments formed by different persons and for different purposes."

As to the remarks of the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) I concur in all he said in relation to the origin of our title to slave property, and indeed in every thing he said to which he gave the sanction of his opinion. But does he wish to have the idea inferred from his argument, that the delegation of the commercial power in the federal constitution—the power to regulate commerce between the several states, Indian tribes, &c.—places a restriction upon our power over our slave property? I did not understand him as giving his opinion that such was the fact, but only as referring to it as an argument, which he used in 1833, when we were both much younger than now, to keep the non-importation slave law from being passed. The gentleman is too good a lawyer, and too enlightened and candid a man, to say to this house, that he believes that the clause of the constitution of the United States applies to this subject, and reaches the matter of commerce in slaves. He would never throw the weight of his character and judgment into that scale. The federal constitution, when speaking of the regulation of commerce between the states, refers to the ordinary subjects of commerce. It does not apply to "persons," as negroes are designated in that instrument, and they are not within the scope of the federal power. Why, if Congress can pass an act permitting us to bring slaves into Kentucky, can they not also pass a law prohibiting us from doing so? Suppose this was a new state—that there were not an hundred slaves in its whole population, and that we desired to have slavery, can the congress of the United States, legally under its constitution, say that we shall not bring them here, notwithstanding every body desired that we should? I deny that congress has any power over the subject, derived either from the commercial clause in the constitution, or from any other source. The negroes of the southern country are going into Texas in great numbers, and is there any one who will say, that notwithstanding she is recognized as a state of the Union, the federal government has a right to prohibit those slaves from being brought into that state? Is it not an institution clearly under her own control, over which the federal government has no power? If not, if we admit that congress has that power, under the commercial clause, it is putting the slave institution in the states, entirely under the control of the federal government.

If this power extends to one state, under this commercial clause, it must extend to all. That Congress should have the power to say what shall or shall not be brought into Kentucky, but shall not have the same power with regard to Indiana or Ohio, is a proposition that will not bear even a moment's scrutiny. Wherever they have any power under the constitution it is unlimited in its exercise within the sphere of the limits of the United States, and can be applied to every state, territory, and nook, and corner in this nation. The power is not subordinate to that of the state; the state power always, when it comes in conflict with that of the federal government, is subordinate and succumbs to it. In the great case of Graves vs. Slaughter, which went up to the United States supreme court from Louisiana, this part of the constitution was touched upon and argued in a manner so able as to draw forth the highest encomiums of the court. Judge McLean on this subject said:

"Can the transfer and sale of slaves, from one state to another, be regulated by Congress, under the commercial power?"

"If a state may admit or prohibit slaves at its discretion, this power must be in the state, and not in Congress. The constitution seems to recognize the power to be in the states. The importation of certain persons, meaning slaves, which was not to be prohibited before eighteen hundred and eight, was limited to such states, then existing, as shall think proper to admit them. Some of the states at that time prohibited the admission of slaves, and their right to do so was as strongly implied by this provision as the right of other states that admitted them."

"The constitution treats slaves as persons."

* * * "The character of property is given them by local law. This law is respected, and all rights under it are protected by the federal authorities; but the constitution acts upon slaves as persons, and not as property. * * *

"The power over slavery belongs to the states respectively. It is local in its character, and in its effects; and the transfer or sale of slaves cannot be separated from this power. It is, indeed, an essential part of it."

"Each state has the right to protect itself against the avarice and intrusion of the slave dealer; to guard its citizens against the inconveniences and dangers of a slave population.—The right to exercise this power, by a state, is higher and deeper than the constitution. The evil involves the prosperity, and may endanger the existence of a state. Its power to guard against, or to remedy the evil, rests upon the law of self-preservation; a law vital to every community, and especially to a sovereign state."

I will now read a short extract from Chief Justice TANEY:

"I had not intended to express an opinion upon the question raised in the argument in relation to the power of congress to regulate the traffic in slaves between the different states, because the court have come to the conclusion, in which I concur, that the point is not involved in the case before us. But, as my brother McLean has stated his opinion upon it, I am not willing, by remaining silent, to leave any doubt as to mine.

"In my judgment, the power over this subject is exclusively with the several states; and each of them has a right to decide for itself, whether it will or will not allow persons of this description to be brought within their limits, from another state, either for sale or for any other purpose; and, also, to prescribe the manner and mode in which they may be introduced, and to determine their condition and treatment within their respective territories; and the action of the several states upon this subject, cannot be controlled by congress, either by virtue of its power to regulate commerce, or by virtue of any other power conferred by the constitution of the United States. I do not, however, mean to argue this question; and I state my opinion upon it, on account of the interest which a large portion of the union naturally feel in this matter, and from an apprehension that my silence, when another member of the court has delivered his opinion, might be misconstrued."

One of these judges, Mr. McLean, was from a free state, although I believe he is a native of Kentucky, and I have always understood that he grew up to manhood in Lincoln county, where my father knew him as a boy. He was, therefore, reared in a slave state. The other, chief justice Taney, is a citizen of Maryland, where slavery exists. Thus we have the weight of authority of two judges, each residing in different sections of the union, the non-slaveholding and the slaveholding state both concurring. There was no dissent expressed in the court, I believe, except by judge Baldwin, who seems to think the power is vested under the commercial clause.

Mr. DIXON amended his resolution by striking out the words "power or" before the word "right." So that it will read as follows:

Resolved, That this convention has not the right, by any principle it may incorporate into the constitution of the state, to deprive the citizen of his property without his consent, unless it be for the public good, and only then by making to him a just compensation therefor.

He then spoke as follows:

Mr. President: I have listened, and I will reply very briefly, to the remarks of the gentleman from Madison and the positions which he has assumed. The proposition which was thrown out by me in the remarks which I had the honor to address to this convention in committee of the whole on another question, is, that there is such a thing as a contract being entered into between the state in its sovereign capacity, and the people in their individual capacities. That was the proposition I then assumed, and which I am prepared now to maintain, not only by arguments which I think ought to be conclusive, but by authorities as high as those the gentleman read to this convention, and the decisions of the same courts. Now let me understand the proposition contained in the decision, which the gentleman has read to this convention, and upon which he seems so triumphantly to rely as establishing this great fact, that the state has the sole power of controlling its slave population, and that it in no respect belongs to congress and the government of the United States. No body doubts that proposition. The State of Kentucky has the exclusive right to control the slave property of the state—and the gentleman might have gone a little further, and said that the state has the sole and exclusive right of controlling the landed property of Kentucky. It is perfectly clear that congress has no power over the landed property of the commonwealth, nor has it any more power and control over the slaves of the state, or over any right which the state has to control that population. No body ever contended that they had—nor was it ever so contended in the proposition which formed the basis of the decisions to which the gentleman has referred.

But here is the true and the great question: Although congress has no power to control slavery, yet the constitution of the United States lays the state under an inhibition, so far as respects the violation of contracts which it may make with individuals. In regard to abolishing slavery, or of preventing the people of Kentucky from abolishing slavery, congress has no power, but the constitution of the United States lays the state under an inhibition in respect to the right to violate the obligations of contracts. I agree with the gentleman from Madison, that the clause of the United States constitution in regard to the taking of private property, refers alone to the exercise of that power under that instrument, and not to any action of the state.—But this is not the question here. The question which I desire to present, comes up under the resolution I have offered. Can the state enter into a contract with regard to the right of property? The gentleman, if I understand him, says it cannot. Do I understand him to say so or not?

Mr. TURNER. No sir; my position is, that neither the constitution nor the law is a contract, unless it is in the nature of a charter of a bank, or something of that kind.

Mr. DIXON. Well then, the gentleman's proposition is, that there is no such thing as a contract in law, or resulting from a contract, unless it is a bank charter or something of that kind. I take issue directly with the gentleman, and maintain it as a proposition clear and conclusive, that there is a power in the legislative department of the government—nay, in this convention itself—to make a contract with the citizens in regard to every right of property.—Suppose the legislature grants land to the people of the state—there are various modes by which grants are made—either by the direct act of the legislature, or by the governor authorized so to do in the name of the commonwealth. There was such a grant as that mentioned by the legislature of Virginia, to Richard Henderson & Co., granting 200,000 acres of land, not by any patent, but directly, commencing, I believe, at the mouth of Green river. It was a direct grant through a legislative act. I mean to tell the gentleman, and maintain it too, that grant was an obligation or contract, between the state of Virginia, who granted it, and the grantees under the act. I mean to tell him it was a contract which the legislature of Virginia had not the power to rescind or impair. What is that contract? It is the contract on the part of the state, that it will not re-take from the grantee that which it has granted to him. That is the contract. I bring up the question here, whether it is in the power of this convention to impair that contract, and to declare its obligations void?—That is the question I present to the gentleman. This state can also make a contract with its citizens, that it will not take the property which it has recognized as theirs, without making them compensation therefor. And I maintain that the state did make a contract, a most solemn one, that it would not take the property from the citizen, under the constitution of the years 1792 and 1798. It guaranteed this property, and that guarantee is a contract. What is it? The state invited the citizens of Virginia to settle in Kentucky, then a territory, and the people then living here she invited to remain here, as their future home; and held out to them all the beautiful prospect which spread around them, as a reason why they should emigrate here, and why those living here should remain. And it held out another inducement. It was that their property should be protected. Yes, this was another great inducement held out, that their property should be protected and not violated, and the state entered with the citizens, into this contract; this agreement:

"No person shall, for the same offence, be twice put in jeopardy of his life or limb; nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use, without the consent of his representative, and without just compensation being previously made to him."

Now what is the contract? "Nor shall any man's property be taken, for the public use, without his consent, and without compensation being made to him." In this the state agrees with the citizen, that it will not take his property without his consent, or without compensation to him. What does the citizen agree with the state? Why, that if the public good requires it, you may take my property by making compensation for it. Here is the agreement, clear and specific. It is a solemn contract between the state and the citizen; the state guaranteeing and binding itself, that she will not take his property without paying him for it, and the citizen binding himself, that if the public good requires it, the state may take it from him on payment therefor. And will you tell me that this is not a contract? What is it, if it is not a contract, an agreement, a promise; a solemn pledge to the people, which can never be violated without sinking the character of the state into that of dishonor and degradation? Judge Underwood, a man of talents and an honor to Kentucky, although an emancipationist, has said, that this obligation cannot be violated without dishonor or fraud.

Could the people, or will they ever in Kentucky, violate it, unless mobocracy shall be supreme, unless reason itself shall be dislodged, unless the spirit of the institutions of the country fail in their character, unless that wild spirit of fanaticism which, under the reign of terror, drove the French people to desperation, and induced them to parade through the streets of Paris that singular goddess of reason and worship her in preference to the holy religion, that great spirit which lies at the foundation of law, and which gives strength and value to all that we hold dear on earth, and the results of the disregard of which were exhibited in the bloody rule of a Robespierre, a Danton, a Murat—never, unless influenced by these impulses, could the people of Kentucky arrive at such a conclusion. And it was to guard against this, against the outbreaks of fanaticism, and the terror of a wild mobocracy, who might, in a moment of desperation, seek to impair the obligation of contracts, that these great principles were thrown around the constitution to protect them. This was the object of inserting this provision in the constitution, and I will demonstrate it by the opinion of those who will have weight with all within the sound of my voice. I refer to the great case of Fletcher against Peck, which went up from the state of Georgia to the United States supreme court, and I intend to show by the arguments and decisions on that occasion, that the section of the constitution of Kentucky alluded to, is a solemn contract between the state and the citizen, which is not to be disregarded or violated, I believe the gentleman from Madison holds that the state can make no contract as a law, unless with regard to a corporation, or something of that sort.

Mr. TURNER. What I said was, that ordinary laws were not contracts. They were such when release of lands and powers were made by the state to individuals, but the commonwealth never owned the negroes, or the personal property of the country.

Mr. DIXON. I make no point of it then. I never dispute with a gentleman if he agrees with me. If the gentleman does I am glad of it as it takes from me the duty of meeting his remarks. I hope the convention will attend to me in the reading of this decision, as it is very important and bears directly on the whole question. It is due to themselves and to the whole country, that this question should be understood. I will read:

"The legislature of Georgia was a party to this transaction; and for a party to pronounce its own deed invalid, whatever cause may be assigned for its invalidity, must be considered as a mere act of power, which must find its vindication in a train of reasoning not often heard in courts of justice.

"If the legislature be its own judge in its own case—[that is the very power which I deny here] it would seem equitable that its decision should be regulated by those rules which would have regulated the decision of a judicial tribunal. The question was, in its nature, a question of title, and the tribunal which decided it was either acting in the character of a court of justice, and performing a duty usually assigned to a court, or it was exerting a mere act of power in which it was controlled only by its own will.

"If the legislature felt itself absolved from those rules of property which are common to all the citizens of the United States, and from those 'principles of equity which are acknowledged in all our courts, its act is to be supported by its power alone; and the same power may divest any other individual of his lands, if it shall be the will of the legislature so to exert it.

"It is not intended to speak with disrespect of the legislature of Georgia, or of its acts. Far from it. The question is a general question, and is treated as one. For though such powerful objections to a legislative grant, as are alleged against this, may not again exist, yet the principle, on which alone this rescinding act it is to be supposed, may be applied to every case to which it shall be the will of any legislature to apply it. The principle is this, that a legislature may, by its own act, divest the vested estate of any man whatever, for reasons which shall, by itself, be deemed sufficient."

Now you have the whole case spread before you. The legislature may, by its own act, divest any right in this commonwealth of which they may think proper to divest the citizen. I deny that, and maintain here that it cannot be done under that clause in the constitution of the United States declaring that the states shall pass no law impairing the obligation of contracts.

"In this case the legislature may have had ample proof that the original grant was obtained by practices which can never be too much reprobated, and which would have justified its abrogation so far as respected those to whom crime was imputable. But the grant, when issued, conveyed an estate in fee simple to the grantee, clothed with all the solemnities which law can bestow. This estate was transferable; and those who purchased parts of it were not stained by that guilt which infected the original transaction. Their case is not distinguishable from the ordinary case of purchasers of a legal estate without knowledge of any secret fraud which might have led to the emanation of the original grant. According to the well known course of equity, their rights could not be affected by such fraud. Their situation was the same, their title was the same, with that of every other member of the community who holds land by regular conveyances from the original patentee."

But according to the power asserted here by gentlemen in this convention, they occupy no such attitude. The innocent purchaser under the grant of the state of Virginia, before the convention of Kentucky in its sovereign capacity organized a constitution, occupied the very identical ground, so far as taking from him his vested rights is concerned, as the individual who purchased of him, who was guilty of the fraud imputed to the grantees under the patents issued by the state of Georgia. There is no difference between them. And that is the argument that gentlemen proclaim in asserting the right of the sovereignty of Kentucky to seize upon private rights and use and apply them in whatever manner they think proper, and which they ask the convention to assert and proclaim throughout the country. The great point is this—has the state of Kentucky, in its sovereign capacity, the power to take from me those vested rights which it has been instrumental in bestowing upon me, or of violating any other agreement which it may enter into with me in the form of a constitutional or statute law? That is a power which I utterly repudiate and deny. Here the discussion comes right to the point.

"Is the power of the legislature competent to the annihilation of such title, and to the resumption of the property thus held?"

The state granted to the citizens all the great landed estates, and has no power to divest them of it, and to resume them. Has it the power to do it? The gentleman maintains that it has the power—that this convention stands as the representative of the sovereignty of the people of the state, and that its powers are unlimited in regard to any extent it may think proper to exercise it:

"The principle asserted is, that one legislature is competent to repeal any act which a former legislature was competent to pass; and that one legislature cannot abridge the powers of a succeeding legislature."

What has been done under the constitution of Kentucky, the great organic law of the state? Negroes were brought into the state under it, and it was an act done under the sanction of law, Negroes have been purchased under it, and that was an act done under the law. If I purchase one from you, the title to the negro is to be broken up—the obligation between you and me, you being the grantor to me, is to be violated, by this all-sweeping power of the convention of Kentucky. Because you must violate the obligation of the man who makes the sale, if you declare that the title derived from you is not binding. The obligation can be severed, or our action amounts to nothing at all. For the state of Georgia, in conveying the lands to her citizens, acted on the implied obligation that she would not take back that property. It was so regarded by the Judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and to which the inhibition in the section which declares that no state shall pass laws impairing the obligations of contract, was intended to apply. If that implied obligation came within that inhibition, is it not clear that it applies as well to your interference with obligations between the citizens, as to obligations between the citizen and the state? The gentleman strikes at that, and in any attempt to break down the titles to slave property, he must destroy the contract between individuals; because, in the act of manumission, you destroy the title to the property you set free, as derived from the laws of the state, and being derived also from another individual, it becomes a great question as to the power of the state of Kentucky to impair the obligations between another individual and me. But I will not argue that point now, but confine myself to the question between the state and its citizens:

"The correctness of this principle, so far as respects general legislation, can never be controverted. But, if an act be done under a law, a succeeding legislature cannot undo it. The past cannot be recalled by the most absolute power. Conveyances have been made; those conveyances have vested legal estates; and if those estates may be seized by the sovereign authority, still, that they originally vested is a fact, and cannot cease to be a fact."

Now you will understand that the proposition before the supreme court was to take away from the person who purchased the property, the title which the state had granted, and to take away subsequently the same property to which individuals had acquired a title under the recipients of the state grants. Two propositions arise—first, the power to abrogate the contract between the state and the citizen, and next the power to abrogate the contract between the citizens themselves—the one purchasing lands through a contract with the other. And you will find that the decision of the court is, that the sovereign power of the State of Georgia cannot deprive either one nor the other of his property. I will read it:

"When, then, a law is in the nature of a contract; when absolute rights have vested under that contract; a repeal of that law cannot divest those rights; and the act of annulling them, if legitimate, is rendered so by a power applicable to the case of every individual in the community."

Does the gentleman mean to maintain that absolute rights are not vested under the contract in the constitution of Kentucky, solemnly entered into with the citizens of the state? I will not say that you may not repeal the constitution of the state, but I do maintain that when you have done that, you have not destroyed my rights of property, and upon this proposition I will make a few remarks presently.

"It may well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government does not prescribe some limits to the legislative power; and if any be prescribed, where are they to be found, if the property [the word property is used here] of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation."

"To the legislature all legislative power is granted; but the question, whether the act of transferring the property of an individual to the public, be in the nature of the legislative power, is well worthy of serious reflection."

"The validity of this rescinding act, then, might well be doubted, were Georgia a single sovereign power. But Georgia cannot be viewed as a single, unconnected, sovereign power, on whose legislature no other restrictions are imposed than may be found in its own constitution; she is a part of a large empire; she is a member of the American union; and that union has a constitution, the supremacy of which all acknowledge, and which imposes limits to the legislatures of the several states, which none claim a right to pass. The constitution of the United States declares that no state shall pass any bill of attainder, ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts."

"Does the case now under consideration come within this prohibitory section of the constitution?"

"In considering this very interesting question, we immediately ask ourselves, what is a contract? Is a grant a contract? A contract is a compact between two or more parties, and it is either executory or executed. An executory contract is one in which a party binds himself to do, or not to do, a particular thing; such was the law under which the conveyance was made by the governor. A contract executed is one in which the object of the contract is performed; and this, says Blackstone, differs in nothing from a grant. The contract between Georgia and the purchasers was executed by the grant. A contract executed, as well as one which is executory, contains obligations binding on the parties. A grant, in its own nature, amounts to an extinguishment of the right of the grantor, and implies a contract not to reassert that right. A party is, therefore, always estopped by his own grant."

Since then, in fact, a grant is a contract executed, the obligation of which still continues; and since the constitution uses the general term contracts, without distinguishing between those which are executory and those which are executed, it must be construed to comprehend the latter as well as the former. A law annulling conveyances between the individuals, and declaring that the grantors should stand seized of their former estates, notwithstanding those grants, would be as repugnant to the constitution as a law discharging the vendors of property from the obligation of executing their contracts by conveyances. It would be strange if a contract to convey was secured by the constitution, while an absolute conveyance remained unprotected.

If, under a fair construction of the constitution, grants are comprehended under the term contracts, is a grant from the state excluded from the operation of the provision? Does not this settle the fact conclusively, that if the state of Kentucky, in her sovereign capacity attempts to annul a contract entered into between the president of this convention and myself for a sale of lands, she is debarred from so doing by the constitution of the United States? If she cannot destroy the title to lands, she cannot destroy the title if the president had granted to me slaves or any other description of property, which, under the laws he might be entitled to do. And the act of manumission that some are attempting to impose upon the state, what is it but striking at the contract entered into between two citizens, the one selling to the other. I would be striking at every title in Kentucky. I will read further on this point:

"Is the clause to be considered as inhibiting the state from impairing the obligation of contracts between two individuals, but as excluding from that inhibition contracts made with itself? The words themselves contain no such distinction. They are general, and are applicable to contracts of every description."

"If contracts made with the state are to be exempted from their operation, the exception must arise from the character of the contracting party, not from the words which are employed."

"Whatever respect might have been felt for state sovereignties, it is not to be disguised that the framers of the constitution viewed, with some apprehension, the violent acts which grow out of the feelings of the moment; and that the people of the United States, in adopting that instrument, have manifested a determination to shield themselves and their property, from the effects of those sudden and strong passions to which men are exposed. The restrictions on the legislative power of the states are obviously founded in this sentiment; and the constitution of the United States contains what may be 'deemed a bill of rights for the people of each state.

"No state shall pass any bill of attainder, or ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts.

"A bill of attainder may affect the life of an individual, or may confiscate his property, or may do both.

"In this form the power of the legislature over the lives and fortunes of individuals is expressly restrained. What motive, then, for implying, in words which import a general prohibition to impair the obligation of contracts, an exception in favor of the right to impair the obligation of those contracts into which the state may enter.

"The state legislature can pass no ex post facto law. An ex post facto law, is one which renders an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed. Such a law may inflict penalties on the person, or may inflict pecuniary penalties which swell the public treasury. The legislature is then prohibited from passing a law by which a man's estate, or any part of it, shall be seized for a crime which was not declared, by some previous law, to render him liable to that punishment. Why, then, should violence be done to the natural meaning of words, for the purpose of leaving to the legislature the power of seizing, for public use, the estate of an individual in the form of a law annulling the title by which he holds that estate? The court can perceive no sufficient grounds for making this distinction. This rescinding act would have the effect of an ex post facto law. It forfeits the estate of Fletcher for a crime not committed by himself, but by those from whom he purchased. This cannot be effected in the form of an ex post facto law, or bill of attainder; why, then, is it allowable in the form of a law annulling the original grant?

"The argument in favor of presuming an intention to except a case, not excepted by the words of the constitution, is susceptible of some illustration from a principle originally engrafted in that instrument, though no longer a part of it. The constitution, as passed, gave the courts of the United States jurisdiction in suits brought against individual states. A state then, which violated its own contract, was suable in the courts of the United States for that violation. Would it have been a defence in such a suit to say that the state had passed a law absolving itself from the contract? It is scarcely to be conceived that such a defence could be set up. And yet, if a state is neither restrained by general principles of our political institutions, nor by the words of the constitution, from impairing the obligations of its own contracts, such a defence would be a valid one. This feature is no longer found in the constitution; but it aids in the construction of those clauses with which it was originally associated.

"It is then the unanimous opinion of the court, that, in this case, the estate having passed into the hands of a purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, the state of Georgia was restrained, either by general principles which are common to our free institutions, or by the 'particular provisions of the constitution of the United States, from passing a law whereby the estate of the plaintiff in the premises so purchased could be constitutionally and legally impaired and rendered null and void. In overruling the demurrer to the third plea, therefore, there is no error."

Now I have presented the case here, precisely as it was presented in the supreme court of the United States, by that illustrious man whose decision upon every question has shed a lustre upon the judicial learning of this country that will live in the most distant ages. Then the question is a settled one, that there is a contract between the state and the people of Kentucky; and when I turn to the clause of the constitution which I have read, it is clearly to the effect that the property of our citizens shall not be taken for public use without paying them a compensation therefor. I have shown that if the state grants land to the citizen it cannot take it back; and that if it grants slaves it cannot take them back, for there is no difference between the title to a slave and to land. And I maintain here that under this section of the constitution, the state of Kentucky declares that it shall not be taken for public use without compensation—that it is a contract between the citizen and the state—and that each is bound by it.

But my friend from Nelson maintains another proposition, and I intend to call attention to it now. Yes it is a strange proposition, and that is, that all the right we have to our slave population is derived from the constitution and laws of the state. If the gentleman would but look back to the history of the acquisition of titles to slave property, he would find there a refutation of his whole position. How did we originally acquire any title to slave property in this country? If he will look back as far as 1620, he will find that the very first slaves were brought to Virginia, in that year in a Dutch vessel. If he will look back not quite so far, he will find that charters were granted by Queen Elizabeth to certain companies empowering them to go to Africa and possess themselves of slaves, and bring them to the then colonies of North America. He will find that they were permitted to go, and that many went without permission at all. Well, when they went there, what did they do? They acquired the property. They captured or purchased the negroes. They exercised their manual strength and labor in acquiring the possession of that property—they became owners by occupation or by purchase, a way of acquiring property that gentlemen will readily understand. I say they became owners by occupation, as those gentlemen who have gone to California to dig gold. There being no law to protect it, they become entitled to the gold from the very fact that they exercise manual labor to separate it from that earth in which it has been long imbedded. Law does not provide the right to the gold and it does not provide the right to capture and appropriate the slave. They had the gold without any law, and they have now called a convention of gold diggers and miners, and for what purpose? To give them title to the gold? Not at all, they have that right now—but it is to give protection to those rights which they have acquired by occupancy. That is the object and design. To give them rights? Not at all—but the protection of the rights which now exist. Let us take this matter a little further. I believe that when Kentucky separated from Virginia—or to go further—that before any constitution was formed in the United States, the people of Virginia had then slaves, and that people had a right to them. And when the act of separation was passed on the part of Virginia allowing Kentucky to become a separate state—when she separated herself and threw herself back on first principles and declared her sovereignty in the act of establishing organic law, her citizens then had this right of property in slaves. Those rights of property therefore were not derived from the laws of Virginia, or from the constitution of 1792 and 1795—they existed prior to, and independent of those laws. They existed because they were rights clearly acquired from those who first acquired the slaves and which had come down to their descendants by descent, or which had been transferred by purchase. Thus were these rights existing prior to the adoption of any organic law. But at this particular period of time, when all things are thrown back to their original elements, and all permitted to express their opinions and views on all and every question, a strange proposition is springing up in the midst of our excited countrymen. What is it? One says to another, you have no right to all that land of yours—another, you have no right to your negroes—and another, you have no right to your strong box. It is a strange proposition springing up right here in this community. What will be the result of it?

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Does the gentleman mean to say that I advocated such a doctrine on this floor? If so he is mistaken.

Mr. DIXON. I mean that such is the effect of the gentleman's proposition. I say that it is the true consequence of the doctrine advanced, that all power belongs to this convention, and that no right exists independent of the organic law it may make, or the statute laws which may be passed under it. I say then, let us go back to the state of society I have mentioned to the gentleman. Let the proposition he made and proclaimed to the people of Kentucky, that prior to the adoption of their constitution the right to property does not exist, and what would be the condition of every member of society? The very assumption of the principle would be looked upon as a violation of every principle of right, which lies at the foundation of every free government.

Well our title to our slaves is not derived from Virginia or from the constitution or statute laws of Kentucky, but it is derived in the manner which I have represented. We come then to the formation of our present constitution. What shall we do here? We intend to unite in framing a constitution that will protect, not destroy, to build up and not to pull down—to throw the axis of our protection around the rights of the citizen, and not to put in the hands of the incendiary a torch to consume or a sword to destroy and murder. This convention has no such power. And if such a power can exist, if it is to be proclaimed here that fifty one men in this convention have the right to seize on the property, should they see proper to do it, then away with the rights of the people. If this is not radicalism, the rank old agrarianism starting up here, as from the floors of the old Roman senate, shaking its gory locks at us, it is very like it. I will say to it, "thou canst not say I did it," but I will say also, it is you and you who proclaim such doctrines who did it. And where is this thing to stop? Who can tell what a people may do hereafter, and what a majority may favor hereafter—where is it to stop? I said the other day, when it is once admitted that a mere majority has the right and the power to seize upon the property of the people and to appropriate it to such use as they think proper, there is no longer any safety in society. You have but to proclaim to all the vagabond population of the world, that they have only to become citizens of Kentucky, and a majority, in order to seize upon the property of our citizens and appropriate it as they think proper—you have but to call upon the wild spirits that inhabit the free states and the great cities, the skulking vagabond population who only seek an opportunity for plunder and murder—you have but to call upon those people of other countries who have been expatriated from their own lands, by the laws, and who are driven from necessity to violence and outrage on those who are better off—you have but to call upon these classes to come to Kentucky, and to assert the rights of a citizen and obtain the privilege of voting, and what would be the result? They would pour in upon us as did the Goth and Vandal barbarians upon the Roman territory—they would come as did the Huns under the lead of Attila, sweeping before them, as with a whirlwind of desolation, all the great institutions of the country, and monopolizing all its property. They would rally around some great leader, like that "scourge of nations," and destroyer of civil institutions, who looked back on the desolation he had left, and forward on the beauty that was spread before him, and like that conqueror exclaim, "I look ahead and all is beautiful, and all is cheering to my eyes and hopes. I look behind me, and my track is marked in ashes and in blood. Desolation spreads itself in my rear, and the beauties of civilization wither and fade at my approach."

And your beautiful land of Kentucky—this fair garden of the United States—this spot where the poet delights to dwell, and the statesman and hero delights to linger—this great Kentucky of ours, so glorious in the memory of the past, and so bright in the vista of the future—it is to become like the plains of Italy, it is to be scourged by those who come like the Goths and Vandals and Huns under Attila, scattering ruin and waste through our land.

I never will subscribe to such a doctrine, or agree that fifty-one men shall be armed with the sovereign power of seizing upon my life, liberty, or property, and appropriating it to their own use, in violation of the great principle which lies at the foundation of all free governments. I never will subscribe to that, and what does it amount to? We have embarked all our fortunes in the great vessel of state, and on this great and cheerless deep of political experiment we are now moving onward, having been permitted, each man, to take into this ark of political safety his property; some one description, and some another; and before the vessel is launched, before she spreads her sails to the favoring winds, and before she has entered on the great voyage, they have pledged themselves solemnly to each other that they will not encroach upon each others rights or property. Well they advance on the great deep, floating on prosperously, when a portion of the crew rise up and declare, you sir have property here that you shall no longer carry, or to another, you have property that we are opposed to taking along—and then they appeal to the majority, and proclaim the right of this majority to compel him either to quit the vessel in which he has embarked with his property, the fruits of his labor or to see that property thrown into the deep. Here is the principle carried out of taking my property without compensation, of taking my slaves without my consent, and in violation of the original pledge in the constitution. I never will yield to that principle, I never will submit to it—never. It was a solemn agreement which we entered into when we entered the great vessel of state, that neither one nor the other should interfere with the rights of the other, and if it became necessary for the public good—to carry out the simile a little further—that a portion of the property should be thrown overboard, that compensation should be made therefor. But that the majority shall rise up and say, away with this, we do not recognize it as property and we will throw it overboard, or you must leave the vessel with it, is a proposition which I utterly repudiate and denounce and against which I enter my solemn protest.

Then what does the resolution I have offered assert? Why this principle—that the citizen has a right to be secure in his person any property—a right which is not only guaranteed by all free governments, but lies at the very foundation of free government, and is illustrated by the principle I read here from that celebrated man, Blackstone, in his commentaries. There the principle is illustrated. It is that the aggregate of society have the right to control its individual members; but the individual members have the right to the protection of all their private rights, and this before any convention is entered into or organic law is framed. It is a solemn agreement that you will not take from me my rights, and in doing that, I submit to you the power of regulating it. I wish to put it to the gentleman—I wish to know whether the resolution I have offered asserts more than the fundamental principle in all the constitutions and laws of the country, that you shall not take private property except for the public good, and only then by granting compensation? I wish to ask whether it is not the principle which ought to be maintained here and everywhere.

Now we are making a great organic law for Kentucky, and asserting great fundamental principles, and why not assert that it is not the right of a mere mob, although in a majority, to seize upon the property of individuals? Why not assert that principle? Admit that we have the power, and the power may exist in this convention, but that does not carry with it an admission of the right of its exercise. I used the word power yesterday, but I meant the word right. The power may exist, and I admit that the physical power does exist. I, in contravention of the laws of Kentucky, might commit an act which would stain my hands with the blood of a fellow man. I may have the physical power, but not the right to do it. I may rob, murder, and commit every other crime known to the law, but I have not the right to do all these things, and I deny the right to do the act referred to in the resolutions. We may usurp power, but assumption is not right. We may take it upon us to do as we please—we may proclaim to the world powers, which our constituents never delegated to us, and never intended to do. Still those acts and declarations would not carry with them the right to do those acts, which we would proclaim ourselves as having the capacity to perform. No such right can exist. Our rightful powers then, in my humble opinion, are limited to the protection of the people and their rights, and not to destroying their property—not to pulling down, but to building up that great temple of liberty, to which all fly, and to erect that altar around which all may cluster, and offer up the libations due to freedom and human rights.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not rise to enter into the discussion of the question at present, nor do I think that I shall discuss it at any other time. If I should undertake to do so, I shall desire thoroughly to understand the point that is to be discussed. Certainly the gentleman from Henderson (Mr. Dixon) has not been answering speeches that were made in this house, at least in my hearing; and if no other record of the debate went out save the speech of that honorable gentleman, our honest and confiding constituents would be led into the belief that there was an agrarian spirit prevailing here, and that it had obtained an influence that was threatening to result in robbing them of their property. The remarks of the gentleman would authorize the assumption that such a spirit exists in this house. Does the gentleman intend to ascribe such a feeling to the delegates in this body?

Mr. DIXON. Will the gentleman state the proposition I made.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not say that the gentleman charged any individual member although from his manner I was led to suppose for a moment, that he was charging me—but that, I believe is disclaimed by the gentleman) with entertaining the sentiment that this convention has the power to divest the citizen of the title to his property—to go into the strongholds of the miser, and say to him, surrender your gold—to go to the land holder and say give up your land. I utterly disclaim such sentiments.

Mr. DIXON. I do not impute it to the gentleman if he disclaims it. But if the gentleman asserts it, I take issue with him.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I trust the gentleman will never have the mortification of listening to the assertion of such an abominable principle from the humble individual now on the floor. I uttered the sentiment yesterday in answer to the remarks which accompanied the introduction of this resolution, that we held slave property in this commonwealth under the guarantees of the constitution. I do not deem it necessary to go back to the introduction of African slaves into this country, but I expressed the sentiment that it was the constitution of Kentucky, and the constitution of Kentucky alone that gave the guarantee to the holders of this description of property. I believe that to be the principle of your constitution upon the subject. Abrogate that, and I will ask my worthy friend from Jefferson whether his plea of the Mosaic dispensation, in a court of justice, would authorize him to hold his negroes in bondage. That was the position that I advanced, and I advance this further proposition, that the power was given to the conventions that assembled for the purpose of forming the constitutions of 1792 and 1798, to withhold, if they chose to do so, the constitutional guarantee, under which this property was held. This is what I advanced; not that this convention desired or contemplated to infuse into the constitution a principle or spirit or power in any department of the government, destructive of private property; although the gentleman's speech would seem to indicate that such was the purpose of this house. I disclaim it for myself, sir, entirely.

But the object that I had in rising was merely to ascertain from the gentleman whether he maintains the principle that the constitution of the state, where there is no specific grant to A or B of property or privilege, exclusive in its character of the rights of the great mass of the people, is a contract within the meaning of the federal constitution.

Mr. DIXON. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE (continuing.) A single moment, sir. No one has contended here, in my hearing, that if the legislature chooses, by ordinance, to grant an estate in land to B, or individual and separate and corporate rights to C, or to transfer property by legislative enactment, that such legislative action did not constitute a contract within the meaning of the federal constitution, which inhibits the passing of laws impairing the obligation of contracts. And, hence, the rule applicable to the case which is familiar to every student who has ever crossed the threshold of a lawyer's office, is wholly inapplicable, with due deference to the gentleman, to the question now under consideration. But the question which I propounded to the gentleman is this: Is the constitution—is the organic law of the state—which protects the members of the community in the enjoyment of their political, social, and religious privileges and rights of property, a contract between the members of the convention who made it and the people—the individuals who may have exercised rights and acquired property during its existence? If such be the interpretation of a state constitution, we had better at once draw the little pay to which we are entitled and go home, for every innovation we make in our constitution will be a violation of the contract. Sir, if I am not greatly deceived in my memory—and I regret very much that other matters have almost taught me to forget what law I learned in early life—the question has undergone repeated investigations of the supreme court. The supreme court cannot take cognizance between citizens of the same state under the 25th section of the judicial act, of any conflict between a state law and the constitution of the same state.

It is no contract. It might as well be said that the provision of the constitution which declares that no man shall be put in jeopardy twice for the same offence, is a contract. If we declare in the new constitution that a man may be tried three times for the same offence, we have a right to do so, and in doing so we violate no contract.

I have grown up under this constitution, says a citizen, I have reared a family under the guarantee, among others, that a man shall not be tried twice for the same offence, and you have now taken away that guarantee for my safety. What remedy have I? Suppose I sue the convention in the supreme court of the United States, will you maintain the position, and let it go abroad, that the constitution of a sovereign state is a contract between a state and individuals, where there was no property vested and no personal rights conveyed to the individual?

Mr. DIXON. I am not certain whether I understood the gentleman or not. I think however, I understood him yesterday to affirm, that it was in the power of this convention to declare what shall be property in Kentucky, and what shall not. And I think I understood the gentleman in addition to this, to make no exception whatever in favor of any kind of property. I understood the gentleman to say, and to maintain here, that it was a power belonging to this convention to say, what should be property, and what should not be property. Did I not so understand the gentleman? The gentleman asked me a question—it was this—whether I mean to affirm here, that the constitution of Kentucky is a contract between the citizens of Kentucky and the sovereign power in regard to the exercise of their civil rights. Sir, I mean to say, and I mean to maintain it, that it is a contract, a solemn contract, one sir, which the government cannot violate—one which ought never to be violated—which no mortal man here can violate without arousing the indignation of the whole world. It is a contract which guarantees to me the right to liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and the privilege of worshipping Almighty God in whatever form I choose. It is a great contract between the people of Kentucky collectively, in their sovereign capacity, and the individual members of society. It is a solemn contract which ought never to be disregarded. I do not mean to maintain here or elsewhere, that the same rules will be applicable as are applicable to the rights of property; but I do mean to say that it is undoubtedly a contract between the governing and the governed—between the makers of the law, and those upon whom they operate.

The gentleman says I have no right to make any such assertion. I ask the gentleman if he—

The PRESIDENT. The hour for calling the order of the day has arrived; and I would remark that this mode of interrogating gentlemen directly in the manner and spirit in which it is done, will lead to unpleasant consequences and should be avoided. It is surely not necessary to the free discussion of any question that may arise.

Mr. DIXON. I stand corrected. I did not commence the system of interrogation, but I confess that I was speaking with some little animation.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will permit me to say that the whole tenor of his address was of such a character as to induce the belief that he was making charges against individuals. I forbore to call him to order for some time, for I knew his manner of speaking; but gentlemen must perceive that it will lead to unpleasant consequences unless they correct themselves.

Mr. DIXON. I stand corrected sir.

Mr. TURNER. I hope the gentleman will have leave to finish his speech.

Mr. DIXON. I know that my manner is very earnest; but what I said was intended only in a good natured way. I certainly did not mean to reflect upon any gentleman, but I understood the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) to have asked me this question—if I meant to assert that there was power in this convention to take away the property of the people of the state. I understood him to indicate that I had asserted such a proposition. The gentleman may have been reported wrong in the speech which he delivered upon this resolution yesterday to which I beg leave to call attention. The gentleman is reported to have said,

"Yielding my full assent to the position that 'slaves are property, and entitled to the same protection which is guaranteed to other property under the organic law, the enquiry necessarily arises, how came slaves to be considered property? Was it by constitutional provision and organic law, speaking it into existence by the authority of the people, exercised in their convention, and carried out by legislation? The property in slaves is guaranteed by constitutional law, no matter how originally acquired; and the same power (the people,) which gave the constitutional guaranty, if they elect to do so, may withdraw that guaranty in any re-construction of the government which they may choose to make. I do not say it would be just to do so; but they have the power to do so; and the constitution of the United States does not inhibit the people of a state from the exercise of such a power. Is it contended that the same people have not the power now, or they shall not hereafter exercise it in the same manner; they have the same sovereignty, the same power to declare what shall and what shall not be property within this commonwealth."

If I understood the gentleman correctly, of which I am not entirely certain, I understood him to say that this convention possessed the power of the people. If I am wrong in this, I hope the gentleman will correct me, for I do not wish to misrepresent him. The gentleman then yields his assent.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE rose to address the chair.

The PRESIDENT. I still must insist that this mode of appealing to gentlemen is totally out of order, and it leads directly and at once to difficulties between members of this convention, which it is desirable should be avoided.

Mr. DIXON. If the gentleman means merely to assert the power of the people—that they may in their strength arise and break down all the guaranties of the constitution—that they may declare who shall and who shall not have property—if he means that when they assume the terrible power that was exercised during the French Revolution, when they overrode and destroyed all the guarantees thrown around the property of the country, which was in itself revolution, I will not take issue with him. But if he means to assert here that the power of declaring what shall be property and what shall not be property, who shall have it and who shall not have it, that the right exists here to take the property of every citizen, to seize it and apply it in any way that the governing power may think proper—then I differ with my honorable friend from Nelson, and therefore I join issue with those who claim this right. I do not mean to assert that any gentleman does claim it. I assert in the resolution that the right does not exist. I assert that we have the right to protect and guard, but not to pull down and destroy the rights of individuals—that our powers are derived from the people, and that we came here to build up the great civil institutions by which the people are to be protected and not to destroy them.

This is what I intended to convey, without intending to cast any reflection upon gentlemen, for I have a deep respect for the opinion of every gentleman, however much he may be opposed to me in the views he entertains; but I must speak out boldly upon the point that is contained in my resolution, and I have done so.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on referring the resolution to the committee of the whole, and ordering it to be printed; which was agreed to.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. BARLOW in the chair, and resumed the consideration of Mr. Turner's resolution in relation to slavery.

Mr. CHENAULT. I rise on the present occasion, not with the vain hope, sir, of shedding any new light upon the proposition offered by my honorable colleague, and to which a proposition to amend was offered by the honorable president of this body, by striking out all after the word "resolved." But sir, I rise for the purpose of showing to my constituents and to the section of country from which I come, that I have been faithful to the pledges which I made to them. My honorable colleague and myself took issue upon this question when we were canvassing for a seat upon this floor. I am well aware sir, that every speech made on this floor costs the state of Kentucky, perhaps, $100; but, sir, in obedience to what I owe to my constituents, I desire to make a few remarks before recording my vote upon the resolution.

The people of Kentucky, sir, have convened us here for some purpose, and as far as my knowledge extends, that purpose is to endeavor to amend the organic law of the state, or in other words, the constitution of Kentucky. And, sir, I think if there is any one fact clearly established, or more clearly than all others as respects the amendment of the present constitution of Kentucky, it is this—that many of the most prominent convention men of Kentucky, in 1847, convened in this very place, issued a manifesto to the people that they would not interfere with slave property as it existed in Kentucky; and I wish to show that that manifesto issued from the seat of government, and having the authority of distinguished names was the great cause, and I believe the sole cause of this convention being called by the people. What, sir, let me ask, was the vote of the convention party in 1833? That vote was but about 28,000.—What, sir, let me ask this house, and the honorable chairman of this committee, has produced the powerfully increased vote in the space of ten years, if it was not the declaration that was made to the world that we would not interfere with private rights, with private property, or property in slaves? I consider that a settled question.

If we attempt, sir, to engraft the law of 1833 upon your constitution, what does it intimate? It is, sir, that we are resolved to change the organic law, by engrafting upon it a feature which, if carried out, will strike at the very root of slavery in this confederacy. Yes, sir, and this understanding produces alarm. Even while we are consuming time here in debate, there is not a Kentucky slaveholder—there is not an infant in Kentucky, of ten years of age, who does not feel that his rights and his property are somewhat endangered by the action of this convention. Sir, I wish to see no such principle engrafted on the constitution of Kentucky.

To engraft this principle does more than this. It builds up, as my honorable friend from Henry (Mr. Nuttall,) says, a slaveocracy in Kentucky; or in other words, a slave monopoly, which I do not desire to see created, and defends that monopoly by guarantees greater than those which apply to other property.

I will do my honorable colleague the justice to say, that I do not think he intended, in offering the resolution, to avow himself an advocate for the incorporation of that law in the constitution, for he said he was not sure that he should support it himself. I think it was his great zeal to get into this body, which induced him to commit himself to such a resolution, deeming that it might be serviceable and give him some degree of strength. I think however, my honorable colleague, from his connection with some of the leading men of the state, from his old associations, and from its having been a project offered to the people of Kentucky, and from its having been carried through the legislature by his aid, has been perhaps wedded to the darling project.

I am opposed to this resolution from another consideration. I recollect a remark that was made by a distinguished gentleman of Kentucky, a member of the legislature, in a speech in which he labored strenuously to convince the people of Kentucky that they ought to engraft the principle of the law of 1833 in the constitution. He told them that from 1833 up to 1840, during the continuance of that law, there had been a decrease in the number of slaves; and he took the ground that when three fifths of the members of the Legislature should think proper to emancipate the slaves, they could do it. Upon that point I take issue with him. I think, sir, that the portrait of Washington, which is hanging over your head, should admonish not only Kentucky, but every slaveholding state in the Union to stand up and firmly maintain its rights over this property, as well as over all other property that is secured to them by the constitution of the United States or the constitution of Kentucky.

I am a native born Kentuckian, and it was with mortification and regret that I read the letter of a distinguished citizen of Kentucky, in which he said that the time was approaching when the slaveholder would have an opportunity to get rid of his slaves. But I think that his plan was unjust and demoralizing in its tendency, taking away from one portion of the citizens of the state what they had earned by their industry, and leaving others in the full enjoyment of their different species of property. I think the engrafting of such a proposition into the constitution would be to declare to the emancipationists, throughout the length and breadth of the United States, "open your ears, be vigilant, be attentive, Kentucky sets the example that no more slaves shall be introduced; and she is the battle ground where this great contest between slavery and abolitionism is to be fought." And I will say to my co-delegates here assembled, let us fight this great battle like men—let us contend for our rights—and if an overruling providence, as my colleague would say, has decreed that the slaves shall be free at some future day, I would say, with due deference to my colleague, let providence do its own work and let us not attempt to hasten that work.

We see the abolitionists at the north already in the congress of the United States endeavoring to deprive slavery men of their rights—endeavoring to drive them from the country for which they have shed their blood—and even now in this convention, it is proposed to deprive the men who went shoulder to shoulder, and breast to breast in the defence of the country and the country's rights—of the property to which they are entitled under the guarantee of the constitution and laws. Kentucky then is setting an example which, in my humble judgment, will number the days of this republican government. If there ever was a principle more forcibly expressed than another, it was that which was expressed by the father of his country when about to retire from public life, which was, that these states should bind themselves together by one common interest, and that no small differences of opinion should separate them. Our motto should be, "united we stand, divided we fall;" and, sir, as we are a frontier state—as Kentucky is to be the battle ground in this contest—let Kentuckians show that they intend to maintain their rights at all hazards, be the consequences what they may.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the progress of this debate, as has been remarked by some gentleman who heretofore participated in it, three classes of opinions have been developed, the first restrictive of slavery; the second approving the existing state of things—approving the constitution as it now stands, and as it has been explained by the court of appeals; the third taking higher ground, and professing so to modify the constitution as to make it conform to what is conceived to have been the spirit and true meaning of the framers of the present constitution in making the provision upon this subject. If I were disposed to generalize, I would say that the first class embraces those who regard slavery as an evil, and who indulge the hope that it will pass away, and are animated by the desire to aid in accomplishing its extinction. As to the second class, it embraces those who have expressed and perhaps entertained no decided opinion upon the abstract question. They are content to repose on the existing state of things, leaving the past with posterity and the future to God. The third category embraces those who have adopted the proposition that slavery, as it exists in this country, was not per se an evil in its inception, has been productive of more good than evil in its progress, and does not promise to present a future more inauspicious than the past. I am aware, sir, that surrounding circumstances, habits, associations, temperament, with many other extraneous causes, may have produced such modifications of opinion as to be incompatible with this classification, but I look upon its general accuracy as susceptible of demonstration.

Let me invite the attention of the convention to the language in which the original resolution, which is the foundation of this debate, is couched:

"Resolved, (I do not know whether I can give it accurately from recollection,) that henceforth, no persons shall be slaves within the commonwealth of Kentucky."

This is the general rule, the sweeping declaration—"resolved that henceforth no persons shall be slaves within the commonwealth of Kentucky." The general rule is prohibitory of slavery, the general rule is emancipative in its character, the general rule is to abolish the whole system. It is true sir, there is an exception, and the rights of slaveholders in Kentucky are compressed within the limits of that exception. Slavery, as it now exists, and the descendants of those who are now slaves, and such as are permitted to be brought here under certain restrictions, are embraced within the limits of that exception. But the broad declaration is made, that hereafter no persons shall be slaves within the commonwealth of Kentucky. The language of the resolution seems to me to indicate its spirit. The general rule is laid down from principle, the exception is adopted from necessity. The principle is that slavery shall cease to exist in Kentucky. The necessity is, that it shall exist sub modo. Upon what does this broad declaration rest? If it be predicated of any principle it is, that slavery is an evil. If it point to any end it is, sir, that the evil should be lessened if not extinguished. The effort at restriction necessarily associates the idea, raises the inference that the will, but not the ability to abolish slavery exists. It concedes emancipation as right in the abstract, but the exception contests it in the concrete. It yields up the whole argument, except one isolated point, by narrowing down the controversy to the sole question of practicability.

If then, sir, the principle that slavery is an evil can be eviscerated from this resolution, does it not follow that the only excuse for not correcting the evil, is the impracticability of any plan of emancipation heretofore proposed. This view of the subject, this position seems to me to be strengthened by the statistical argument of the honorable mover of the resolution. I shall not enter upon its details nor is it necessary for me to do so. It is sufficient to say that his argument concludes with the declaration that to free the slaves would be to enslave the white man. It will not be pretended that the prohibition is designed to operate as a protection to the state against superabundant slave labor. This superabundance does not exist, nor is it reasonable to suppose that it ever will exist; and in this position I am fortified by the argument of the gentleman who first addressed the committee on this subject. He declares that slavery has not increased in Kentucky as in former years, and intimates that a period was approaching when it would cease to exist; and that this would be brought about by a higher power than any human institution—by heaven itself. If then, sir, there is no danger of an excess of slave labor why make the prohibition? The proposition is either nugatory, or it is intended to act as a restriction upon the system as it now exists. There is no danger, sir, of slaves being brought to Kentucky beyond the demand for slave labor. Such a position as that, it seems to me, would be preposterous. Men do not carry coals to Newcastle. Slaves, like every other kind of property, seek the best market, where a demand exists, depend on the same principles that regulate trade in every other department, the difference between the demand and supply fixing the price.

But sir, on the other hand, by restricting the introduction of such slaves as may be necessary to meet the exigencies of the country, you make a direct attack upon the institution of slavery itself. If you carry out what I conceive to be the principle which is embodied in the resolution, what will be the consequence? That anomalous thing, a slave state, without the benefits of slavery, and yet unable to avail herself of free labor. By adopting a provision such as this, and bringing about such a state of things, you place an incubus on the bosom of the body politic, that must weigh down the enterprise and destroy the prosperity of the state.

This view of the subject is not controverted by the fact that for fifteen years the law of 1833 continued upon our statute book. It will be recollected, that by a system of partial legislation, and by continued evasions, that law was rendered inefficient, inoperative, and did not accomplish the purpose for which it was enacted.—The door, though it seemed to be closed, was held continually open. What is to be the effect of adopting such a provision, upon the future prosperity of Kentucky? Is the immense area of fertile lands within the limits of Kentucky to remain as it is, a primeval forest? Is the vast mineral wealth, with which her mountains abound, to sleep forever in the dark bosom of the earth? Who among us can foresee the exigencies of coming years? Who can set bounds to the enterprise which the great mineral and agricultural resources of our state are calculated to awaken? Who can measure the wealth with which that enterprise would be crowned, if it should be left to the exercise of its unshackled energies? Are the men of southern Kentucky content to lie under the shades of their unsubdued forests, and dream of smiling fields waving in the yellow maturity of promised abundance? I ask you by what process of alchemy, if you please, the mountaineer can change his coal and iron into gold? This proposition will be to Kentucky a Chinese shoe. Crippled in her progress, marred in her fair proportions, she will stumble forward to premature decay, with the sin of undeveloped greatness stamped upon her withered lineaments. Can it be argued that the deficiency in slave labor could be supplied by free labor? The experience, not only of Kentucky, but of all the states of the union, shows the incompatibility between these two descriptions of labor; they cannot co-exist; the presence of one banishes the other. Where slavery exists, the white operative, as a class, is unknown. Such sir, I venture to affirm, is the elevating influence of slavery, that it lifts the white man above that description of labor; it converts him from a mere machine into a man. And hence it is in consequence of this incompatibility, no reliance can be placed upon free labor, when slave labor is inadequate to the purpose. And what will be the consequence? We shall be neither a free nor a slave state; "neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor yet good red herring." And it is easy to be foreseen, that when such a state of things is brought about, the institution must wear itself out. Does it not then follow, if I am correct in the position which I have taken, and in the illustrations which I have attempted to give, that this resolution is a direct attack upon the institution of slavery in Kentucky?

Let me pass on to the consideration, for a very brief period of time, of the second class in the division I have attempted to make. They are those, as I have said, who are content with the provisions in the existing constitution. They are, I apprehend, pro-slavery men, who are not looking forward to a change in our system, and yet for some reason or other, they are not disposed to protect the institution from the perils of possible innovation. I would not be understood as entertaining distrust in popular discretion, when I propose to close the door against any legislation on this subject, except so far as merchandise in slaves is concerned. My object would be to guard against the dangerous effects of agitation. Not that agitation would directly accomplish any thing. Not that it would immediately lead to the overthrow of our institutions. But it is the collateral effects which I dread, the influence it would have upon the slave and the owner of slaves, rendering the slave worthless, disobedient, and intractable, bringing that description of property into disrepute, throwing uncertainty around it, no man knowing how long the institution of slavery would continue among us, inducing men, and the very best men the country boasts, rather than remain in this state of embarrassment and uncertainty, to disrupt all the dearest associations that cluster about the heart, to sever the ties that bind them to home and country, to forego all these considerations, and deserting the birth-place of their young hopes, and the graves of their fathers, carry themselves into voluntary exile, that they may live under the shade of their own vine and fig tree, with no man to make them afraid. Are not these considerations that should induce pro-slavery men to pause before leaving this subject in a state of uncertainty? Why stop here? Are they not looking forward to a continuance of the institution? If this be not the case, then are they dilatory in their efforts. They stop short. They should attach themselves to the first class of which I spoke. They should make an immediate demonstration, and erect upon it a platform for their future operations.

Why pause, sir? Has not public opinion proclaimed throughout the length and breadth of Kentucky, the sentiments of the good people of this commonwealth? Is it not supposed that emancipation has been buried, as it were, under the avalanche of public opinion? Why permit its inanimate corpse to be dug up? Why suffer it to be reinvigorated and have the breath of a new life breathed into it? Why let a new song be put in its mouth? Why permit emancipation to plant its foot on the platform of the constitution? Why suffer the institution of slavery again to be folded in the stifling embraces of the law of 1833? Why not dispose of this exciting subject at once and bestow upon Kentucky the advantages of an unequivocal position? I am one of those who believe that it was the interest of our fathers, who framed this instrument, to give to it just such an interpretation as the opinions which I have advanced would indicate, to place the subject where I have attempted to place it. I believe that the legislature has no power to prohibit the importation of slaves except for merchandise. I believe this is the true interpretation of the intent of the framers of the existing constitution; and it is to restore to the constitution its original spirit and guard the institution of slavery against the insidious attacks of emancipation, that I take higher ground than do those gentlemen who are for retaining the provisions of the present constitution on this subject.

I will refer for a few minutes to the third class of opinions which seem to be indicated here, and I will remark, that my own opinions are of this class. In order to give my views on this subject, it will be necessary to refer to the relation that exists between master and slave; that I should attempt to show the influence which that relation exerts, not only upon the condition of the parties to that relation, but upon general society. If I am able to prove that slavery is not an evil, as regards the African, as regards the white men, as regards the general structure of society, I shall establish the position which I assumed to belong to this third class. I shall have proved that slavery is not an evil, and when I do that, I shall have proved that it is a blessing. That political equality is a great principle in our government, is as true as that social equality never did, and from the very constitution of man, never can exist. Men are born intellectually, morally, and physically unequal; and these irregularities seem to produce gradations in society. In this country, sir, where political distinction does not exist—where political rank does not obtain, wealth seems to be the chief agent in accomplishing social inequality. Hence, wealth seems to occupy one extreme, and poverty the other, of the social gradation. Upon those who are poor, (I speak of communities where slavery does not exist,) devolves the performance of all the menial offices of life. It is their destiny. Poverty forces it upon them. The degradation to which they are subjected does not spring so much from the performance of menial service, as from the relation which is generated by that service. The poor man looks up with awe and wonder to his master, as a type of the power of wealth; and when he reflects upon his own condition his soul shrinks within him, and he feels and acknowledges his own nothingness. He looks at the impassable barrier—the abyss that lies between him and his master—and feels that although he has the same political rights, he has not the same social position. Is this calculated to elevate the character and make the proud, fearless freemen that we boast of? That this is true, there can be no doubt. That this state of things does exist, and that it must from the nature of things continue to exist, is equally certain. Now look at the state of things in the slave state. There the menial offices—those services that attach to themselves degradation, are all performed by slaves. No matter how humble his condition, the freeman of the south feels with Cooper's scout that he is a white man, without a cross—that liberty is not only a political right but a personal distinction.

There are in the slave states but two great divisions—white and black. The black is the degraded class; the white the honored. And when it is said that slavery is calculated to produce aristocracy, there is more truth in the remark than persons generally allow. But it is general aristocracy—aristocracy of the whole white race. What is the reason of the marked distinction existing between the men of the south and those of the north, their circumstances being equal? Is it climate? That cannot be, because the distinction stands out as prominently upon the borders, where a river forms the geographical division, as in the interior. They have all sprung from one common origin, speak the same language, live under the same political institutions, yet when you institute a comparison between the men of the north and the south, does it not result in favor of those of the south? Has not the south acquired for itself a character for frankness, generosity, high-toned honor, and chivalry which is unknown to the north? Look a little further. Review the history of our government from its first foundation down to the present time. It exhibits a series of brilliant triumphs achieved by the south, illustrating superiority of moral force over mere numerical strength.—The voice of its eloquence has predominated in the council chamber. She has displayed her courage and patriotic devotion on every battlefield, and throughout the broad expanse of our country. Her energy and her wisdom have been mainly instrumental in achieving the successful progress of those institutions which were originally moulded by her genius and her patriotism.

But there is another view in which I wish this subject to be considered. I wish to contemplate slavery in regard to its general effect upon society as a whole. I wish to contrast the results of the combination of capital and labor in the two sections of this union. Capital and labor are the two great elements of every country's property. By capital I mean money or property of any description. By labor I mean merely physical exertion, and the united operation of these two constitutes the prosperity of any country. In order to achieve this prosperity they are reciprocally necessary to each other, and yet they are antagonistical. Capital without labor is valueless, and labor without capital is useless. What is the function of capital? It is to accumulate. The function of labor in those states which are usually called free, is to toil out a life of wretchedness, with no ability to escape from the wretchedness of its condition. The fiercest struggles that governments have ever known, struggles that resulted in the overthrow of their institutions, have arisen from this fierce antagonism of capital and labor. They are the great elements of strife in every country where free labor is employed. Talk about ambition stalking to a throne! Infinitely greater are the evils which spring from the strife between capital and labor. Labor complains that she has expended her energies and worn out her life in obtaining a pittance that is scarcely sufficient to support nature, scarcely sufficient to reinvigorate the system and fit it for commencing the same round of labor on the morrow. Capital looks on with unconcern, impassive in its nature and governed by the laws of its being, like the car of Juggernaut it rolls on to the accomplishment of its ends, crushing beneath its wheels those who have ministered to its greatness. In these fierce strifes capital is always the victor. When labor complains, what does capital do? It can afford to wait till the sharp pinchings of hunger force labor into submission. Then it is that capital dictates terms, and puts its foot upon the neck of labor.

Look at Massachusetts, that great State which boasts of her dense population, and of her enormous wealth. Her laborers are absolutely excluded from the social circle. I have attempted to describe the influence of capital, looking at and accomplishing its own ends by immutable laws—laws springing from its very character. Hence the misery, the poverty, the degradation of the operatives as a class where free labor obtains—hence the difference between the manners of the men of the north and those of the south.

Now let us for a moment, if you please, turn our attention to the south, and see how this principle works. There is there no antagonism between labor and capital. They are both united in the same hands. This antagonism cannot possibly exist in a slave state. The union of these two great conflicting elements gives to the state a conservatism which can nowhere be found where slavery does not exist.

The whole population of course are not the owners of slaves. Among those who are not slave-holders, capital in land, for instance, is united with their own labors, thus producing no antagonism, and the residue of the population who are without capital, for the most part mechanics, are so necessary to the capitalists, that instead of having the wages of labor fixed for them by their employers, they dictate their own terms. Hence the difference between the mechanics of the south and those of the north, and the independence growing out of their position and out of the operation of this institution of slavery. It is this which has elevated them. It is not that there is any intrinsic difference between the men of the south and those of the north. Human nature has been the same in all ages. The difference in their condition must be referred to the circumstances by which they are surrounded.

I have thus attempted to show that this institution, so far as the white population is concerned, works no evil. I have attempted to show that it is elevating and conservative in its influence. I have attempted to show that order and tranquility are the result of the absence of this antagonism, which has produced such fearful convulsions in those countries where the institution of slavery does not exist. The time may come, though God forbid that it ever should, when this union will be severed; when the north and the south will become distinct empires, and if such a calamity is to visit us, the time will in all probability also come when these fierce conflicts to which I have alluded will result in the production of anarchy, and in laying the foundation for a form of government altogether different from that which now exists. If such a calamity does arise, then we shall have a practical example of the conservative influence of this institution of slavery. Then it will be seen that slavery is a social blessing.

Why, sir, is it that we hear so much of the outrages of lawless mobs in the north? Such disgraceful scenes are never witnessed in the southern states. I am aware that the cities of the north are larger, that a greater concourse of persons are brought together within a small compass, and that there is, under such circumstances more probability of their passions being inflamed. But why is it that mobs prevail at the north, where there is no great difference in point of population, while they are unknown in the south? To what cause can we refer this, unless it be to this very conservatism of which I have spoken. I therefore look upon slavery as a blessing in all of its relation to the white man. Now, if it appear that it is no injury to the slave himself, I shall have established the proposition which I proposed to establish when I set out with my remarks.

Look for a moment at the condition of the black man as he exists in our country, and as he exists in Africa. The black man here, though he wears the badge of slavery, is infinitely superior to the black man as he exists in his native land. What does this go to show? That the connection which exists between the African and the white man has resulted in the elevation of the former. Look at Africa now, and look at her condition a thousand years ago. Go back to her earliest history, nay, examine the antiquarian researches of Champollion, who dug up from the ruins of an unknown empire the evidences of the degradation of the negro race graven in the mystic hieroglyphic of a literature that had been lost to the world. While other countries have strided forward in the march of improvement, while the lights of science have beamed upon them, and the arts of civilization taken the place of savage rudeness, Africa is now where she was then: the same fierce savage lurks amid the dark jungles of his pestilent clime. This inability to advance proves him to be of an inferior race. Why, when all the other nations of the earth, have advanced in the arts and sciences and have manifested ability to accomplish the high destiny of man, why, I say, is the negro stationary? It is because he belongs to a race inferior to the Caucasian. Incapable of improvement by his own efforts, it is necessary that he should be under the auspices of the white man, to be dragged from his original degradation. A comparison of the African, in his native condition with the negro reared under white auspices, exhibits the benefit which has accrued to him from this relation. The negro, sustained in the grasp of the white man, when that grasp is relaxed by emancipation, will fall back into his original condition. As proof of this, look at the difference between the free negro and the slave. Comparison shows the superiority of the latter.

Although removed from under the immediate influence of a master, he still enjoys the benefits of civilization, and is still under the control of wholesome laws. How much greater would be his degeneracy if he should be restored to the original condition of his race, and removed entirely beyond the influence which had been the means of his elevation. Would he not if left to his own resources relapse into barbarism?—Would liberty under such circumstances be a boon? Is slavery which thus elevates him a degradation? He would lose the feeble light which had dawned on his original darkness. If, as I before said, liberty be no boon, then is slavery no degradation. If occupying the position he does among us, his condition be degradation as compared with that of the white man, it is nevertheless elevated as compared with that of the native African. If then slavery be not an evil, but a blessing to the race enslaved, I shall have proved the whole proposition, having before established that it is no evil to the white man, and therefore a blessing to both.

If this proposition be admitted to be true, or to approximate to truth, shall we attempt to cripple an institution which in its operation dispenses a double blessing? Why should we throw any obstacle to its successful operation? Why do we not permit it to remain in its full vigor, and allow it to accomplish all that it has done for our fathers, and that it promises to do for posterity.

I am aware that I have already too long trespassed on the patience of the committee, and I would at this point pause, but the peculiarity of my position in reference to another proposition which has been presented for the consideration of the convention, and the duty which I owe, as well to myself as to my constituents, make it necessary that I should very briefly define my position in relation to the proposition above referred to. I avail myself of this moment, because the subject is connected with the one under discussion.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If the gentleman will give way, I will make a suggestion which I think will meet with the approbation of the convention. Owing to my peculiar position, I am desirous that the report of the committee, in reference to the court of appeals, shall be considered. I will therefore ask that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again on Monday next, in order that we may take up the report to which I have referred, to-morrow. When the committee of the whole shall have this subject again under consideration, the gentleman can finish his discourse. I will make the motion which I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again on Monday week.

The convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 17, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LANCASTER.

Mr. MERIWITHER, who has been detained from the convention for several days by severe indisposition, this morning resumed his seat.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. TURNER rose to correct a misapprehension of the remarks he made a few days since, on presenting the report of the committee of which he was chairman, with which the committee were dissatisfied.

What he intended to say on that occasion was, that there were several members of the committee who did not concur in the report so far as it affected the election of several of the minor officers, such as surveyors, coroners, and jailers, but that a majority was in favor of electing those officers—and also, that one member of the committee did not concur in the proposed restriction as to age to be required of the candidates for office, as the people ought to be the sole judges, and had a right to elect a man of any age they thought proper.

Mr. GAITHER was glad the chairman of the committee had made this explanation, but did not think it went far enough to meet the imputation which his reported remarks had cast upon at least one member of the committee. The gentleman had said that one member of the committee was not disposed to have any restriction as to the age, qualification, or any thing else of candidates for office. That was an awkward position to be placed in, and one which he did not wish to be charged with having assumed. It was his lot to differ with the gentleman and others of the committee, in relation to what is called the conservative principle; but he wanted mature age to be required, although he was opposed to some other restrictions.

Mr. TURNER had understood the gentleman's position to be as he (Mr. T.) had before stated, but if he was mistaken he would be happy to be corrected.

Mr. GAITHER. You are mistaken.

Mr. TURNER was very glad then that the gentleman had corrected him.

After some other observations the conversation dropped.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. DESHA, from the committee on militia, made the following report, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed:

SEC. 1. The militia of this commonwealth shall consist of all the free, able-bodied male persons (negroes, mulattoes, and Indians excepted,) resident in the same, between the ages of eighteen and forty five years, except such persons as now are, or hereafter may be, exempted by the laws of the United States, or of this State; but those who belong to religious societies whose tenets forbid them to carry arms shall not be compelled to do so, but shall pay an equivalent for personal services.

SEC. 2. The governor shall appoint the adjutant general, and his other staff officers; the majors general, brigadiers general, and commanders of regiments shall respectively appoint their staff officers; and commanders of companies shall appoint their non-commissioned officers.

SEC. 3. All other militia officers shall be elected by persons subject to military duty, within the bounds of their respective companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions, under such rules and regulations as the legislature may, from time to time, direct and establish.

POPULAR ELECTIONS.

Mr. GHOLSON offered the following resolution, and called for the yeas and nays thereon:

Resolved, That the good people of this commonwealth are fully competent to judge of, and decide upon, the qualifications of all candidates for any office whether the same be legislative, executive, judicial, or ministerial; wherefore, a certificate of election, according to law, is the only certificate of qualifications that shall ever be required to enable any citizen to enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office to which he may be elected.

Mr. TRIPLETT. Are we to vote upon that resolution without discussion or forethought, and adopt as a constitutional provision now, instantly, unhesitatingly, a matter of as much importance as probably any other provision that is likely to be submitted to this House? Do any of our rules authorize the calling of the yeas and nays before we have had any time to ascertain the full length, and breadth, and depth of a proposition like this? For one, I am not prepared to vote for it throughout, or against it throughout. I want time for reflection; and let me say to the honorable mover of the proposition, that I am rather inclined to think he himself wants time to reflect upon the subject. Is he prepared now to say that the judges of the court of appeals shall have no qualifications whatever; and whether they are twenty-one years of age or not, or learned in the laws of the land or not, is immaterial, because the people are competent to judge of all these qualifications? That may be so, or it may not be so.—The gentleman from Ballard must bear in mind it is a physical impossibility, that in the very nature of things, all the voters who are to vote for or against the election of judges of the court of appeals can be acquainted with their qualifications. The present proposition is to elect four judges of the court of appeals, one in each district; but suppose it is not adopted by the convention, but that the four judges shall be elected by all the voters of the state—does the gentleman intend to lay down the proposition that the voters of the county of Daviess are not to be entitled to all the light that can be given to them when they come to vote for a candidate that may reside in the county of Bracken, or Knox, or Harlan, or in any of the most remote counties of the state? And the same may be said upon the subject of electing the clerks of the court of appeals—for I understand that we are to elect four clerks of that court, and have four different sets of records. It is a fair presumption, when the people of Kentucky have sent one hundred gentlemen here, that they are at least a fair sample of the intelligence of the state. Why send them at all, unless at least they are an average, if not above an average, of the general intelligence of the people of Kentucky. But I acknowledge that I am not very well qualified to judge what are the proper qualifications of a clerk of the court of appeals. Heretofore, when the judges of the court had the power to give the office to whom they pleased, there was an examination of the candidate duly made before them, and it was only upon a certificate that he was competent to make a good clerk that he received the appointment! Are not the people entitled to have this information conveyed to them? Of the whole of the one hundred members in this body, except half a dozen, perhaps, and the political lion of the tribe of Judah, when Nelson, and his colleague, and some other old lawyers, there are none who are competent to judge of the qualifications of a clerk. As for myself and others around me, I think we are not qualified; and it is but right that we should have all the information on the subject we can possibly obtain. At all events, I hope the resolution may be laid over for a time and that we shall not be compelled to vote on it just now.

Mr. HARDIN. I concur in all that was said by my friend just up, except in his compliment to myself, and to that I dissent. I do not want to vote on this resolution at this time, nor is it necessary, for we are showing in our reports every day, that we are willing to return the election of officers to the people. And when the committee on circuit courts, of which I have the honor to be a member, and of which my worthy friend from Ballard is a most worthy member, shall report, and I hope it will be in a day or two, we shall show that we too are determined to trust them. We came here with that view, and it is not worth while to make a general declaration of it. The report of the committee on the court of appeals, as well as those that have been made from other committees show, that we are in favor of restoring to the people their rights. As to this sweeping resolution proposed by the gentleman, I suppose if it means anything, it intends to strike at some of the details of the report in reference to circuit and county courts, it may be, the provision that no man shall be run as a candidate for the office of clerk unless he is qualified and that he must be examined and get a certificate of his ability. I think it is a very valuable requisition to say to a man who comes forward as a candidate, you shall have the testimonial of your qualifications, and you shall not be elected because you are a successful demagogue on the stump. I am greatly in favor of throwing back all the power to where it originally belonged, (the people), but let us not run the thing too far. Let us not go too far. We are pressing it too far if we say that men shall be elected clerks, who perhaps were scarcely ever in a clerk's office in their lives. We have prejudices to encounter in establishing this new system; and indeed one of the very objections I have heard urged against the elective system, was in regard to this very subject of the election of clerks. So far as I was concerned, I always gave it the go-by, by saying it was time enough; but I always intended to guard against it, when the opportunity offered. I was striking at the great offices of this commonwealth—and when I go out to hunt such game as the grisly bear of the Rocky Mountains, I do not stop to trouble myself about the little bears that arise around me, but leave them to be attended to at my leisure. And that is the way I got rid of the election of clerks in the election; but I never did intend, so far as I could prevent it, that a man should be elected clerk without the proper qualifications. I hope we may give the subject the go-by at present, and that the resolution may be printed.

I know that my friend from Ballard labors to the same end that I do—to give the great elective franchise to the people, where it naturally and of right belongs. But let us labor to make a good system, without running into too much detail. When I have done that, I shall feel as Barney Edwards' negro did, when he saw his master after a long absence. Said he, "I have seen the face of my master, my God let me die." When I have seen such a system secured, I shall be willing to go.

Mr. IRWIN. I rise, sir, simply to make a motion. I am unprepared to vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Ballard, (Mr. Gholson,) not that I am unwilling to trust the people—not that I do not feel that they are competent to select proper officers—but that I conceive it necessary that the resolution should be considered. I am willing to trust the people when they desire to be trusted, but surely every officer should have some qualifications. I move that the resolution lie on the table for the present and be printed.

Mr. CLARKE. I barely desire to remark that upon general principles, I am inclined to concur with my friend from Ballard, and think that ultimately I shall support his resolution. It involves a great principle, and one that perhaps ought more deliberately and more maturely to engage the consideration of the convention. I am willing to concede that the clerks ought to be qualified to the discharge of the duties of their respective offices, because the clerk of the circuit court, the county court, and the court of appeals have very important and responsible duties to perform. But there is nothing connected with the discharge of the duties of a clerk in which the people, among whom he lives, are not directly and immediately interested. I hold it to be equally important that a legislator should be qualified to make laws, when he is called upon to take a seat in either branch of the legislature, and have gone through a thorough examination. Is there any gentleman on this floor who proposes that when a candidate presents himself for election, there shall be a tribunal created by the constitution through which he shall pass and be favorably adjudged before he is considered competent to take a seat in either branch? But when he is elected by the people, and takes his seat, he has then one-third of the sovereignty of the state in his own hands. He becomes a part of the law-making power of the state. It is not insisted upon that he shall undergo an examination before he takes that position, but it is insisted that a clerk shall be so much more qualified to discharge the duties of his office, than a legislator, that a tribunal must be established to judge of his qualifications. If the principle be true, that all political power is inherent in the people—that the people are competent for self-government—and that they are the safest depositories of political power, why not leave with the people, who are directly interested in the subject, the power to judge of the qualifications of a clerk? You strike at the great principle that the people are competent for self-government; and you strike also at the principle that the people are the safest depositories of all political power, when you attempt to withhold from them the exercise of that power, unless you can show a good and sufficient reason for withholding it. I can myself perceive no reason, either potent or powerful, or more satisfactory to my mind, why the power should be given to the people to judge of the qualifications of a candidate for the senate, or the lower branch of the legislature of Kentucky, or of a judge, if you please, and at the same time, the power should be withheld from the people, to judge of the competency of a candidate for a clerkship. Now, I doubt not there is a majority on this floor who will ultimately maintain that the judges, as well of the circuit and county courts, as of the supreme court of the state, shall be elected directly by the people. I understand that question to have been decided in the recent contest for the election of delegates to this convention, and I apprehend there are from seventy to ninety members here who are prepared to concur in giving back to the people the power surrendered in the old constitution, of electing all those officers.

When it is decided that the people are competent to judge of the qualifications of judges of the court of appeals, or of a district judge, or of three judges of the county courts, of judicial officers, in whose hands are placed the lives, liberties, property and reputation, of the people of this state—upon what principle is it that this same people are not competent to judge of the qualifications of the other and minor officers? Upon what principle is it that the same people who are competent to decide upon the qualifications for office, of those at whose hands and will and fiat, all the dearest rights of the citizen can be either crushed or elevated, are declared incompetent and unable to decide on the qualifications of a clerk? The people are just as competent to judge of the qualifications, the competency, the moral character, and the honesty of a clerk, as of a judge of the court of appeals. I maintain that we ought to make no exception to the rule, unless the exception is predicated on some reason more powerful than any I have yet heard.

But I would suggest that, instead of demanding the yeas and nays on the resolution submitted, it would be more consistent with the present disposition of this body to refer it to the committee of the whole, and select some early day for its discussion; for, if I am not mistaken, it is one of the gravest questions that has been submitted to this convention.

Mr. HARDIN. I am always gratified when I hear from the honorable gentleman from Simpson, for he is certainly a very eloquent man, and it is to guard against that very kind of thing that we require some qualification, now and then, on the part of a candidate for office.—Take up the report of the committee on the court of appeals, and is there not some qualification required for a judge of the court of appeals? He is to be thirty years of age, and that is one of his qualifications, and it is one of those restraints upon the rights of the people so highly commented upon. Is it not furthermore provided that he shall live in the district where he is chosen? Yes. Is it not furthermore provided that he shall have been eight years a practicing lawyer? Yes; because the committee very properly took up the idea that it was not the best speaker who would make the best judge. Is there not a qualification necessary for a governor? To be sure. Is there not a qualification as to his age? Yes. And we must now and then impose those kinds of restraints, to guard against that very volume of eloquence that we have heard to-day, or our government runs into what is called a mobocracy, instead of a free representative republic. It is to guard against that state of things that these qualifications are necessarily required. Do we not know that it is of vast importance that none but a man learned in the law should be a judge? And should not the candidate be learned in his profession before you make him a clerk? Is not one just as requisite as the other? And shall we elect the best stump speaker, if you choose, or the man who can organize and "dicker" the most voters at the polls? Is it possible that we are going to do any thing of this kind? I have run this thing as far as I can, but the gentleman out Herods me. Let us impose some wholesome restraints as to qualifications upon all the officers put before the people. Let our governor be qualified as to age and residence; let the judges of the courts of appeals be qualified as to age, residence, and legal attainments; and let our judges of the circuit courts be qualified in the same respects. Yes sir, and there is another class of men, who are called the Queen's solicitors, and it would be more tasteful to the country if we should require some qualifications before they throw themselves before the majority of the people. I have seen many a young man of two or three and twenty years of age, who could address himself very kindly to the sympathies of the people, and yet possess no qualification beyond that. I hope, therefore, we shall not vote now on this resolution, as the subject will soon come up in its appropriate aspect.

Mr. CLARKE. I am aware that it is owing to the over-flowing kindness of the gentleman from Nelson, rather than to any merit of my own, that I have received the compliment which he has just paid me. I am not opposed to qualifications, nor did I assert such a principle. I did not say that a clerk or a judge should not be qualified, but I maintained this ground, that the people were competent to judge of his qualifications, and it was predicated upon the idea, that in the exercise of their sound judgment and well matured discretion, they would make a proper selection. That is the ground I take. I have never argued that a judge or a clerk should not be qualified to discharge the duties of his office; but I assumed the ground which is assumed in the resolution of the gentleman from Ballard, that the people alone are qualified to judge of his qualifications. If they are qualified to judge of the qualifications of a President of the United States, in whose hands are thrown all the diplomatic relations existing between this country and foreign nations, and who wields more patronage and power than any other officer, or ten officers in the United States, I maintain they are competent to judge of the qualifications of a clerk, whether of the circuit court or of the court of appeals. I have assumed, and that is the reason I made the suggestion to my friend from Ballard, that there may be reasons interposing to exclude the election of a clerk by the people, unless he has undergone some examination. As yet, however, they have not occurred to my mind, and it is to hear such reasons, if there are any, that I suggested to my friend from Ballard, the propriety of referring his resolution to the committee of the whole, with the assignment of some day for its discussion.

Mr. GHOLSON. I certainly most cordially reciprocate the kind sentiments expressed with regard to myself. I certainly have no disposition to introduce anything here that shall produce unnecessary debate, or lead to an unprofitable consumption of time. But maintaining as I do—having maintained it before those who sent me here, and that sentiment being, as I believe almost unanimously entertained by them—that the people are capable of self-government, and seeing, as I think, a disposition here to deny this great fundamental principle that all power is inherent in the people, and that they alone have the legitimate right to exercise that power, I desire to test the question at once. What light does any learned gentleman need on this subject? Is any gentleman prepared to say that the people are not capable of self-government? or that they are not competent to choose a clerk? Is any gentleman here prepared to say to his constituents, I fear you will take up some ignorant man who is unfit for the office? That you are so vicious and so ignorant that you will palm upon the country an unqualified officer? Why, I hold it to be a self-evident truth that in the absence of interested motive to do wrong all mankind would do right. And where is the motive that shall prompt the people of any county in this state to do wrong in a matter of this kind? There can be no motive; hence they will do right, and in doing right they will make the best selection. If they make a bad selection they alone are the sufferers; it will be their fault, and perhaps one bad choice may be necessary to put them on their guard, and to make them more careful in future. You might as well undertake to stand between a man and the wife of his choice, and say to him let me decide on the qualifications of that lady before you marry her.

It is the right of every man, of every free man, to exercise the privilege of selecting the public servants. And it is for this right that I contend. Now, with regard to the proper mode of managing this thing, and as to what will soonest test the question, I am not prepared to say; but I want the ayes and noes upon it. I want every gentleman here to say to the people of Kentucky whether or not in his estimation they are capable of self-government. If it is thought most expedient to set apart a day for the discussion of this subject, I am agreed, provided the time is not too far distant. I want that thing tested, and the sooner the better.

I will not consume the time of the convention at present, as gentlemen say they are unprepared to enter upon a debate, and I wish to give them ample time for preparation; but the whole argument on this subject in my judgment, is in a nutshell and does not require a lengthy discussion. Unprepared as gentlemen may be, I am myself, ready at all times to vote on a question like this. I am willing that the consideration of this subject shall be postponed and made the special order for Monday or Tuesday next, or any other day that the House may think proper to name. If my friend from Logan will withdraw his motion, I will move that the resolution be referred to the committee of the whole, and made the order of the day for Tuesday next.

Mr. IRWIN. I have no objection.

Mr. MITCHELL. With the gentleman from Ballard, I am always ready to vote on a question involving the rights of the people, and I am prepared now to vote on this proposition. It seems to me that there are two questions involved in the resolution, and it has been my purpose to ask for a division of them, when the question shall be taken. One is the abstract proposition—are the people capable of self-government?—on which I shall vote in the affirmative, believing that there is not a question upon the subject. But the other proposition, whether any qualifications for office should exist, is a question which should be considered. Let me suggest, as an additional reason, that in regard to clerks, there is nothing in the requisition of certificates of qualifications from them, that presupposes a disqualification on the part of the people to judge upon the subject. The very requisition seems to indicate the necessity of examination on the part of the people. It requires that some competent tribunal shall be provided for the examination of this officer, authorized not for any incompetency on the part of the people to judge, but from the inability of the whole people to make the examination and with a view of relieving them from that trouble. It was merely to present this view of the subject that I rose.

The resolution was then made a special order for Tuesday next and ordered to be printed.

COURT OF CHANCERY AT LOUISVILLE.

Mr. RUDD offered the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on circuit courts be instructed to enquire into the expediency of permitting the Louisville chancery court to exist under the new constitution, and giving authority to the legislature to establish other chancery courts in the commonwealth.

THE COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. G. W. JOHNSTON in the chair, on the article reported by the committee on the court of appeals.

The verbal amendments proposed by the standing committee in their supplemental report were adopted, with a view of perfecting the report of the committee.

The question then came up on the proposed additional section to the article, as follows:

SEC. 15. "All elections of judges of the court of appeals, and the clerks thereof, shall be by ballot."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. It will be remembered, when the committee made the report now under consideration, that under their sanction I announced to the house that the mode in which the elective franchise should be exercised by the people in the choice of judicial officers had not escaped their attention. They did not, however, feel it incumbent on them to express what was understood to be their opinion, by any specific proposition as to the mode in which it should be exercised in the choice of judicial officers, waiting, out of respect, the action of other committees, who had kindred subjects under advisement. The committee, however, upon a further consultation and reflection upon the subject, and looking forward possibly to a division of sentiment in this body in reference to a radical change in the mode of voting prescribed by our present constitution, and as long practiced by our people in the choice of political representatives and officers, have thought that between the advocates of the principle of visa voce voting, and those who are in favor of the ballot system, and of introducing this new and important principle in our government of electing all our officers, political as well as judicial, we might attain something at least, in the freedom of the exercise of the privilege where it is brought to bear in the choice of a judicial officer; at all events, that it might operate to relieve the elective principle of one objection which I have heard—I will not say in this house, because it has not been as yet avowed here, but outside of this house—the danger of placing a judicial officer under the influence of personal feelings in his course toward individual suitors and litigants who might either have voted for him or against him. I do not regard however that as at all assailing the principle which lies at the foundation of the elective system. The independence of the judge has never been regarded in any age or country as being secured by or dependent upon the mode of his appointment. It is supposed to rest on the principle which was one of the results of the revolution in England, one of the fruits of which was the change in the tenure of this description of office—prior to which revolution the judge held his office at the will of the crown or the pleasure of the prince, not by the tenure of good behavior. That was the principle, and it is the one from which we have derived, as heretofore entertained, all our notions of an independent judiciary. Not that the officer derived his appointment either by election, from the representatives of the people in our state legislature, or that he was appointed by the executive under the confirmation of the senate—but that when he is appointed the constitution of '99 secured, at least on paper, and I hope in reality, the independence of the judiciary, because he was made by the tenure of his office only responsible under the forms and principles prescribed in the constitution. I do not now understand that there exists in this body or out of it, whether among the advocates of a convention for constitutional reform or against it, any one who is an advocate for life tenure in office. All of all parties are in favor of surrendering the principle of tenure during good behavior, or in common parlance, life estates in office. Upon all sides the question has been given up. All yield to the principle that the officer should at some time short of his life, be returned back to the appointing power, wherever that power may be deposited. We propose by the bill to deposit the power in the hands of the people, to whom we believe it belongs.

The independence of the judge does not depend upon the source of appointment. Whether a judge be appointed by the governor, the legislature, or the people, if he be a bad man he will make a bad judge, and if he be a good man he will make you a good judge or good officer, and the people must take the chances of selecting between the good and the bad. And they are just as competent, if not indeed more so, to make the selection themselves, than any intermediate delegated agents according to the present mode.

I do not propose at this time, to enter into the discussion of the importance of this change, and the benefits which will result from it, further than is necessary to explain the object of the committee in the amendment they propose.—They were unanimous and unhesitating in their opinion of its importance, and in their desire that it should be engrafted upon the article now under consideration, and if you will allow me to say it, upon all other articles which have reference to the election of judicial officers. I believe that a majority of the States of this Union—I speak but from a general recollection and not from minute recollection—have adopted and are now in the practice, in all elections of every kind and description, of the ballot system. There is much to say in favor of the ballot system, and especially in communities differently organized and constituted in some respects from our own State. I have not understood that a change in the mode of casting the votes of the people of Kentucky, for officers heretofore elected by them, has been a cause of constitutional reform, or that it was a cause of complaint or grievance. I do not believe that the time now exists, or is likely to exist in this country, so long as we shall cherish our domestic institutions—if I am understood by that phrase—that there will be the same necessity for the mode of exercising the elective franchise that other States and communities have believed, or found to exist among them. But in the choice of a judicial officer by the people—to meet the argument or the objection to the system that I have heard alledged—that is, that the judge who is elected, finding A, who has cast his vote against him, a suitor in his court, may feel disposed to visit upon him, in some of his judicial acts, vengeance for this exercise of privilege. A judge under the influence of bad passions, in the exercise of the high duties which the constitution and the country have confided to him, may visit the perversion of law, tyranny, and injustice, upon some humble but independent man in the country, brought before him by some of the various processes, as witness, litigant, criminal, or suitor. I think if I have a correct knowledge of Kentucky character, that there is more danger from an individual in the exercise of his judicial functions, when elected by the voice of the people, in an action between a his supporter and B his opponent, lest he might be suspected of leaning towards his friend, he would rather lean against him to avoid even the appearance of favoritism. The committee wish to give every man in the State who may choose to vote for a judicial officer, the privilege, if he choose so to do, by a ballot, deposited in a box unknown to any but himself. It will not deprive any man who may feel disposed to let a candidate know how he voted, of the privilege of voting an open ticket if he chooses so to do. But if I am so constituted as to feel that I might place myself in all probability, being a suitor, in an attitude that would excite a lurking and partial and improper feeling in the breast of the judge towards me in the exercise of his judicial powers, if I chose to keep it concealed from him how I voted, give me the privilege of doing so. I leave to you who have no such apprehensions, the privilege of voting your open ticket, in common phrase, or of letting the individual know you voted for or against him as you may prefer. These were the reasons which influenced the committee in asking the amendment to the original report which has just been read, and with this brief explanation I submit the question.

Mr. HARDIN. I hope the gentleman will not press the section at this time, but permit the bill to be gone through with section by section, commencing at the first one; then the amendment would be reached in its order, and we should have time to reflect upon it. For my own part I cannot say yet how I will vote, but I am very much in favor of the viva voce mode of voting, and the committee of which I am a member are also rather disposed that way. I like harmony very much and I believe that the mode of voting for all officers should be the same. I am not afraid to tell these high dignitaries how I vote.

Mr. W. C. MARSHALL hoped the report would be taken up section by section. He said, at first blush I am opposed to this innovation upon our custom of voting, and I want time to reflect upon it. As at present advised I shall feel constrained to go against it.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I certainly do not desire to press the question if any member is not prepared to vote upon it or desires to discuss it. I will agree to the course suggested the more readily, as I believe that the more these two gentlemen reflect on the subject, the nearer they will arrive at the conclusions to which the committee have come. I suppose I was distinctly understood. I am not advocating a change in the viva voce mode of electing political officers. The reason is that if you elect a political officer, a member of congress, of the legislature, or a governor, he cannot visit his official action on me to my injury for voting against him without its falling with an equal hand on the balance of the community. That is the difference between a political and a judicial officer. Of course I acquiesce with pleasure in the course suggested.

The 1st sec. was then read as follows:

SEC. 1. The judicial power of this commonwealth, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in one supreme court, which shall be styled the court of appeals, [the courts established by this constitution] and in such inferior courts as the general assembly may from time to time erect and establish.

After a brief conversation in which Messrs. Wickliffe, Dixon, Guthrie, W. C. Marshall and others took part, the section was amended by the insertion of the words placed between brackets. The section as amended was then adopted.

The 2d section was read and adopted without amendment, as follows:

SEC. 2. The court of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the state, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law.

The third section was then read as follows:

SEC. 3. The judges of the court of appeals shall hold their offices for the term of eight years, and until their successors shall be duly qualified, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly: Provided, however, That the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in such address, and on the journal of each house. They shall, at stated times, receive for their services an adequate compensation to be fixed by law.

Mr. HARDIN proposed to strike out the words; "which shall not be sufficient grounds of impeachment." He said, I desire that the legislature shall have power to address a judge out of office without the formality of impeachment, and I do not want his removal by address to be confined to such subordinate cases as will not be full cause for impeachment. That is one of the practical modes of making a judge responsible. And while I am up I will state that I shall move to strike out "two thirds," and insert "a majority," because when we come to the two thirds principle, the whole responsibility is as perfect a mockery as can be imagined.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The committee thought that by preserving the responsibility which the present constitution has thrown upon the judicial officers of the government, making them removable for good and sufficient cause, upon an address, two-thirds of each house of the general assembly concurring, and by retaining the power of impeachment, judgment upon which extends only and rightfully to removal and disqualification from office; and the responsibility which arises from the return of those officers to the appointing power, the people, by the limitation of the term of office, they have secured to the people a sufficient power over the judges during their term of eight years. They desired that whilst we were securing to the people, or claiming for them, the power of electing their own officers and limiting the duration of the term for which they shall be elected, to infuse into the exercise of their power some conservative feature, to secure at least those officers, when thus constitutionally appointed, against the possible influence of public excitement, the offspring of political divisions in all free governments.

A party or political majority of the popular branch of the government, maddened with power, unrestrained by any power but the power to do wrong, is, by the amendment of my colleague, to be let loose upon the weakest department of the government—a department filled by the people themselves. Does my honorable colleague remember—I know he has not forgotten the conflict between the legislative department and the judiciary of this state, in 1824. He and myself were side by side, in my humble way—for I bore but an humble part in that memorable contest; he played a distinguished part in that struggle between master spirits, which is known in the history of this state as the contest between the old court and new court party. I refer to this portion of the history of my country in no spirit of unkindness towards those with whom I then differed. There were statesmen and patriots in that party, honest I know in the advocacy of those principles. We triumphed by the power of the ballot box. Had his principle of removing the judges upon the address of a majority of the two houses of the general assembly been engrafted in the existing constitution, as he now proposes it shall be in the new one, what would have become of the great principle, the independence of the judiciary, involved in that contest? Your constitutional court and the principle involved would have gone as by a whirlwind. A good cause for the removal of the judges was then, by a legislative majority, found in the fact that they had decided an act of the legislature unconstitutional.

Sir, I yield to no man in this body in devotion to the great democratic principle, which lies at the foundation of free governments, that the majority shall rule. But sir, to secure that principle in its free and beneficial exercise, I claim, at least, that in framing an organic law, we should take care to insert a rule for the guidance of that majority. Popular majorities need a rule of action by which to be governed. Our constitution is made not so much for the benefit of the majority in the community, as it is to protect the rights of minorities. The great principle in free governments, that a majority shall rule and govern, belongs to political questions, and is loved and cherished by all who love political freedom and civil liberty. I tell gentlemen who think with me, that a government of a majority is the best form of government which the wisdom of man has ever devised; that in order to preserve that government, to secure the liberty, life, and property of the citizen, it is necessary to establish checks and balances, and to throw around the weaker departments those safeguards necessary to insure the freedom of opinion and independence of action in the exercise of their functions. But, sir, in the support and in the advocacy of the principle that a majority shall rule, I invoke gentlemen not to be misled. I say it is necessary and proper, in the formation of a free constitution, that a majority should impose wholesome restrictions upon itself. We may be in a majority to-day, and by a turn of the political wheel we may be in a minority to-morrow, in the legislative body.

In party times when passion guides the popular leaders, when reason is silenced, and argument is hushed by the conflict of selfish motives, the prostration of the independence of the judiciary department of your government is no difficult task. The legislature assume to be the people, forget their true position, and rush with accumulated rage upon their work of destruction. This will be accomplished by local, if not political combination. Help me to remove this judge, says one faction, he is a whig, and we don't like him; we have a democratic majority, we can hurl him out. You have a whig judge in your district, we will join in removing him, if you assist us. Under the influence of popular excitement, political feelings, perhaps personal animosity, the judge is hurled from office. Well sir, the turn of the political wheel brings the whigs into a majority, and under the same influences, the political Juggernaut is rolled over some poor democrat who may be found in office.

To avoid all these possible evils the committee desired to retain the power of removing by address, giving the incumbent the security not so much for his sake as for the sake of public justice, which we have had in our constitution for the last fifty years. They desired to give him the security that he shall not be removed unless the crime, the offence, the cause of removal shall be so apparent to the body that both branches of the legislature shall feel it incumbent upon them to make the removal. When that is the case I have no fears that two-thirds will not agree. If you leave the removal of a judge to the will of a majority of the popular branch of the government, what judge will dare to stand between the encroachments of the legislative department and the citizen? You make him the miserable, suppliant tool of legislative power and wrong, if you trust him in the power of a bare majority, whose acts he will never have the boldness and the independence to declare unconstitutional. What security will there be for the life, liberty, or property of the citizen. I therefore implore the convention to pause before they consent to incorporate the amendment in the constitution we are about to form. The judiciary is the political ark of the poor man, to which he must flee in times of danger; the shield by which he is to resist the attempts of power to deprive him of his rights. If you place the judge in the power of a bare majority, you take from the weak the only security against wrong and injustice. Let us not deceive ourselves by names. The majority of the legislature is not a majority of the people. If you adopt the amendment you virtually surrender all power into the hands of a legislative majority. The legislative department will overwhelm all other departments, and we shall, instead of having secured to the people a government with partitions of power, to operate as checks and balances upon each is correct, but I am coming to this point. A gentleman tells us that when a judge is elected by a majority of the people, the same majority which returned him to office shall have power to say whether or not he shall continue in office.

That is the question. That it is anti-republican to say that a judge shall hold his office when a majority of the people are against him. I say that that question is not involved in the question now before us. A judge from one of your circuit courts is brought before the legislature. When he comes before them, if it is not a political question upon which he is brought, your legislators act in the capacity of judges and jurors to determine the facts and the law in the case. And it is no longer an expression of the people's will, but simply a decision of the legislature sitting as judges upon the case. Suppose you bring a judge before the legislature for malfeasance in office from the county of Hickman, your representatives from other counties, knowing nothing of the merits of the case, sit as impartial triers for the purpose of determining whether or not according to the facts of the case he ought to be removed.

But suppose on the other hand that the judge is arraigned for political offences, or upon such pretences as any one may choose to invent, or upon a charge of incompetency if you please. What then is the result? It is not often that a political question, in which the judiciary may take part produces such great excitement, such deep interest in the country as to cause him to be arraigned. But if you bring him here for a political offence, the legislature being of one political complexion, and the judge of an opposite, and the greatest excitement prevails, as at the time of the contest between the old and the new court, though the judge give a fair expose of the constitution, yet if the majority principle had then prevailed, the judge would have been removed, and a stain cast upon his character, unless the people had risen in their might and reinstate him. When it comes to a political question there is danger in allowing the legislature to remove a judge even upon the two thirds principle; yet I go for that principle.

I am in favor of the report of the committee as it now stands. I am in favor of the election of the judiciary by the people. It is unnecessary to add a single remark on that subject. It was the intention of the convention party in the state to bring every office in the state, judicial or otherwise, within the reach of every man who is competent to fill such office, and who has proved himself worthy of office in the estimation and opinion of those by whom he was surrounded; and that no office should depend on executive patronage.

I shall therefore go for an elective judiciary, but sir, I shall go for these judges of the court of appeals holding their offices for the term of six years only. If that is incorporated in the constitution it is probable that the wheels of government might roll on for the next fifty years, and not a single complaint be urged against the judge; for the simple reason that any man who comes before the people of this country for office, no matter who he is, is desirous of securing the approbation of the people; and if he understands any thing of the people of Kentucky he will endeavor to discharge the duties of his office properly in order to secure his election a second time.

But throwing that out of the question entirely, any man who may be elected by the people to the office of judge will probably be competent to discharge the duties of his office correctly. I have no doubt the people will make proper selections? But there is one other view of the subject which has occurred to my mind, to which I will simply call the attention of the committee, and I have done.

There have, perhaps, been fewer attempts made in Kentucky to remove judges from office than there would have been, from the fact that this mode of removing them by a vote of two-thirds of the legislature, was regarded as rather a difficult mode than otherwise, by which to accomplish anything. The people at this time are looking to the re-eligibility of the judges, and of all other officers in the commonwealth, as their mode of redress in consequence of the faithlessness of the officer to the trust which has been reposed in him. Heretofore sir, even though a judge may have abused the discretionary power vested in him, even though he may not have come up to the line in which a majority of the people would like the judge to walk, and which nevertheless, would not be sufficient ground of removal, either by impeachment or address, they have remained quiet, and why? For the simple fact that they had no other remedy than going before the legislature.

There are a thousand things that would not influence the legislature in the case of addressing, or in the case of impeachment, which, nevertheless, would have great influence with the people when they march up to the polls to cast their votes. I think therefore, that the very best responsibility is in limiting the term of office to about six years, making them re-eligible. Why sir, a judge, whether of the circuit or appellate court, when elevated to the bench, looses his practice. He, no doubt, will desire to be re-elected. If he does, it will be the very best guaranty the people can have that the judge will discharge the duties of his office properly.

For the reasons I have given, I shall vote for the report of the committee as it now stands and against the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson. And I thought it due to the constituents whom I represent here to give the reasons which induced me to give this vote. I hold myself ready, however, at all times when a more convenient mode shall be proposed by any member of this committee, of holding your appellate judges responsible, so as at the same time to secure the proper administration of justice, to go with those who are in favor of such a measure, if I do not see radical objections to it. I admit, sir, that the mode which is provided in the present constitution, and in almost every constitution of the different states of this union, is a difficult mode. I admit all this, and if a better mode could be devised I am for it. But from what reflection I have been able to give to the subject, I have been unable to devise any. Your appellate judges are officers of the whole state; officers in whom the whole state are interested; officers, who are not to be removed, however, by the popular will. They are officers who are to be removed from, or retained in office by a set of judges, consisting of the members of the legislature, sitting to determine whether they have been guilty of malfeasance in office. Sir, when I am elected to an office, I have the right to hold that office until I have been convicted of being guilty of some malfeasance, and it has been proved that I am no longer worthy to hold it. There is a point at which your democratic majorities must stop. It comes up under the principles couched in the resolution of the gentleman from Henderson. It comes up in the principle of the trial by jury. It is where no majority has a right to take from a man a vested right, unless the facts and circumstances be clearly proven as in the case of a judge that he has forfeited his office.

With these remarks, having defined my position, I shall no longer detain the committee.

Mr. NESBITT. As it seems to be the order of the day for delegates to give the reasons which will influence their votes upon the subjects which are under the consideration of the convention, I have thought it would be proper for me to ask the attention of the committee whilst I also assign a few of the reasons by which I shall be governed in reference to the question which is now before us.

I have heard it stated by several delegates that they have always been convention men. I too claim the honor of having been a convention man, and something beyond that—a convention boy. I advocated the principle of reform, sir, as best I might long before I had a right to vote.

I listened with pleasure, sir, to the gentleman from Fayette this morning, and I cannot help regretting that, after having taken so many pleasant tours together advocating a convention and constitutional reform, in the upper counties, we shall now at this late day be compelled to part company. I will not say that I led him through the mountains; and he shall not say that he led me in this convention.

I have been somewhat astonished too at some of the declarations that have been made by delegates here. Some take the ground that this convention is the people. Some take the ground that the legislature is the people. The good old doctrine used to be that the legislature was nothing more than the servants of the people. And looking back into history how do we find that nations have risen and fallen? Just as long as legislatures recognized the doctrine and acted upon the principle that they were the servants of the people, all things went on well. But they at last began to preach the doctrine that is preached here, that they were equal with the people, and that they were the people themselves. And soon another step was taken which taught that they were superior to the people, and then the state began to totter to its fall.

What is the question, sir—what are the objects of it? What are the ends proposed to be accomplished? Gentlemen seem to be anxious to proclaim to the world how much they are willing and how anxiously they desire that a majority shall rule. I too, sir, am in favor of a majority ruling, but I want a majority of the people to do so; and it does seem to me that in advocating the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, gentlemen desire to fix upon, an easy mode of curbing the will of the majority, and to hurl from power the officers of the government, whom a majority of the people have placed in power. I know that I am to be held responsible, not to this convention but to the people themselves, for every act I may perform here and every word I may utter; and I desire to be able to furnish some authority for the manner in which I may act. If the committee will indulge me for a few moments I will make a few extracts from the farewell address of the Father of his Country:

"Towards the preservation of your government, and the permanency of your present happy state, it is requisite, not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care, the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretext. One method of assault may be to effect, in the forms of the constitution, alterations which will impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what cannot be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited, remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of government, as of other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard, by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes, upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion, exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember, especially, that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours, a government of as much vigor, as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty, is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name, where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and of property. I have already intimated to you, the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party, generally.

"This spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes, in all governments; more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form, it is seen in its greatest rankness, and is truly their worst enemy.

"The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism: but this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result, gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual; and sooner or later, the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this 'disposition to the purposes of his own elevation, on the ruins of public liberty.'

"It is important likewise, that the habits of thinking, in a free country, should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration, to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism."

Now, sir, it seems to me that the amendment which has been proposed here, tends at once to consolidate all the departments of the government into that one called the legislative department. Gentlemen have gone to England and have raked up authorities there to prove that the judiciary ought to be independent. I grant it ought.

If we change the principle, I want responsibility to the people of this great commonwealth. And I want the judiciary to be independent of the two other departments of the government. I do not want the judiciary to be bound hand and foot, and to be made responsible to the executive or to the legislative department. I do not desire the legislative department to be responsible to either of the other two departments. I want the executive, legislative, and the judiciary departments, to be independent of each other—to be the representatives of the will of the people of Kentucky, and to be responsible alone to them; and to bring about this end, sir, I shall so cast my vote.

There are other reasons sir, why I do not desire to see the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson prevail. The people of the commonwealth of Kentucky are already jealous of this convention. They know their rights and they know well how to maintain them; though I see sir, here manifested a spirit of radicalism that is likely, if carried to its utmost extreme, to bring us back to our original chaos, to leave us without a constitution, and without any form of civil government. We were elected, sir, for the purpose of making radical changes and alterations in the constitution, I will admit. We were elected for the purpose of carrying into effect the public will—for the purpose of doing that which the people desire to have done, and of doing nothing more.

And I would like to know sir, whether there is a gentleman in this convention who was instructed at the polls by his constituents to say that a bare majority of the legislature shall have the power to undo the work which they shall do at the polls? If there be one, I hope he will discharge his duty. For myself, I know what I was told to do, and I know I was not told to carry into effect any such principle as that contained in the amendment. I have learned my lesson well; and a part of it is to let alone every thing in the old constitution that my constituents have not told me to vote to amend.

This question may not again arise—I do not suppose it will on the report of any other committee, and I thought it proper, sir, to give the reasons why I shall vote to sustain the report of the committee.

There is another reason sir, why I shall do so. I took the trouble to disseminate among the people of my county, as far as I could, the report of the committee, and I asked it as a favor of them, that they would send me information whether it suited them or not; and as far as I received information, it is unqualified that it suits them.

Mr. TAYLOR. I perceive that the discussion of this deeply important and interesting question will not be terminated for several days.

I will move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, and leave was granted to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. ROOT, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WHEELER until Monday next.

COURT OF APPEALS.

On the motion of Mr. BARLOW the convention resolved into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, on the report of the committee on the court of appeals.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yesterday, while my friend from Fayette (Mr. R. N. Wickliffe) was addressing the committee, I could not help remarking upon the vicissitudes of human life. I shared with him the innocent amusements of boyhood, and now, after twenty-five years have elapsed, we find ourselves participating in the more sober, serious, and as I hope, to the country at least, more profitable pursuits of manhood. Although I differ entirely from him, I could not but admire the beauty and power of diction, and that impressiveness of manner which twenty-five years ago, as well as now, enabled him to make the worse appear the better reason. There are in this country three descriptions of aristocracy—the aristocracy of wealth, the aristocracy of intellect, and the aristocracy of office—to none of which I belong, and yet to all of which I desire to be most intimately attached and connected. I cannot destroy the aristocracy of wealth, and I do not know that I ought even if I could. I could not if I would, and I would not if I could, destroy the aristocracy of intellect. This aristocracy of intellect, or rather this mental quality called talent, is the first divinity which my budding spirit was taught to worship, and it is the last idol which the startling proximity to the grave, will in my bosom totter to its fall.—But there is another description of aristocracy—that of office—to which I am hostile, and in the destruction of which I am, in common with many around me, about to participate. I was, as I said a few days ago, an early and an ardent friend of constitutional reform. I was not so because I desired this or that particular reform, or this or that particular measure; but I was the ardent and early friend of constitutional reform on principle. That principle was neither more nor less than an anxiety to secure such a constitution as would level men up, instead of leveling them down. I was for a constitution that would throw open to the aspirations of the poor as well as the rich, to the humble as well as the exalted, the offices of the country. I had seen the offices of Kentucky—so had the people—bought and sold for money. I have seen these offices bought and sold, and the price paid for them was partizan and political services. I was anxious to correct this manifest and inexcusable abuse, and hence I was in favor of constitutional reform, so that the only price which should be paid for the offices of Kentucky should be qualification and integrity.

Have you ever read, Mr. Chairman, that most graphic description of a country church and of a country preacher, given by that justly celebrated and distinguished lawyer, William Wirt, in the British Spy? The meeting house composed of logs, filled with the simple-hearted, honest and confiding people, plainly but neatly attired, their quiet, sturdy horses hitched to the swinging limbs of the surrounding trees, permit the eye of your imagination to rest for a moment on such a picture as described so inimitably by Wirt, such doubtless as you have seen along the pathway of your life; then throw yourself into a city, such as the beautiful one in which we are now convened, and enter a church covered all over with tapestry and splendor, with the pews most beautifully cushioned, with the red morocco bound bible with a piece of green ribbon to mark the chapter and place of the text, and just at the end of the pew a gilt sign with the owner's name upon it; in the first described old fashioned country church, with the horses tied thick around, the worshippers are the plain, modest, and unsuspecting people; in the latter the ostentatious office-holders of the country, with the pharisaical air about them of, "stand back, for I am holier than thou."

This is a just description of the difference between the office-holders and the people, under the present constitution. And it is for that reason, and because of that difference, so plain and manifest, to which no man can or ought if he could, shut his eyes, that I was an early advocate for a convention. I wanted to level men up—I wanted the church doors thrown open, so that every man could go in and worship there. I wanted those aspirations for office in which the poor may indulge as well as the rich, and if need be, gratified; and I wanted the price to be paid for that gratification in Kentucky, integrity and qualifications. And it was because of that principle that I am now here, and it is for the formation of a constitution such as I have just indicated, and possessing the spirit to which I have just alluded, that I mean to vote, not only here, but at the polls, in case it should be submitted to the people. The character of a government depends very much upon the character, and genius, and spirit of the people, and the reverse of the proposition is just as true; and I want a constitution that, in the beautiful language of my friend, Captain Cutler,

"Shall create a charm within the very air,
Which shall teach each haughty thing,
The poorest man he meets with here
Is every inch a King."

I want all the officers in the country, as some gentlemen have said, from the highest to the lowest, to be elected. I had, at first, I very frankly acknowledge, some misgivings in regard to an elective judiciary. I had been early taught that for such a purpose the people was a dangerous depository of power, but I am satisfied now, and experience has proved that it is the safest and the best mode of selection. Every coterminous state, save Virginia, have, in some form or other, an elective judiciary. Tennessee, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, all have an elective judiciary in some form or other. And fortunately they have made the experiment for us, for I am not prepared to cut down the lamp post which experience has placed along the pathway of human life, and to plod on in darkness rather than in light. The experiment has been made in other states, and in New York most satisfactorily and successfully. Originally the judges in New York were selected as they now are under the present constitution of Kentucky. From 1818 to 1835, some of the most ardent contests for governor have taken place in New York than have ever occurred in any state of the union; and simply from the fact that next to the president of the United States, the office of governor of New York was considered the most important. And it has been used with some success, as a sort of spring-board, from which political aspirants have leaped into the presidency of the United States. What were the consequences growing out of these ardent contests? The consequences were, that vacancies in the supreme, and other courts, were filled without reference to the fact whether the incumbent was an honest man or a good lawyer. Executives are but men at last, and are subject to the common frailties and imperfections of our nature, and they therefore, in New York, were prone to fill the office of judge, whenever vacant, with one of these ardent and faithful partisans who had carried, perhaps, a particular county and district for them. What was the consequence? The people became indignant and dissatisfied, and justly so, with this mode of appointment. What was the next step? It was to make the office of judge elective by joint ballot of the legislature. I have lived in one of the states in this union where the judges were so elected, and I say with all candor and truth, that I saw just as good judges there as we have had in Kentucky—possessing as large an amount of legal attainments, integrity, and all those qualifications which a judge ought to possess. I have lived also in a state where they were elected directly by the people, and in that state I saw just as good judges as I have seen under the system which we have adopted and used for the last half century. Hence I say my own experience and observation, connected with the experience and observation of those in other states of this union, goes to prove that an elective judiciary is not fraught with such fearful and dreadful consequences as some gentlemen have fancied and imagined. Hence it is that I am in favor of an elective judiciary.

What is this thing called public opinion?—Sir, it is the school master of public men. It is the originator, frequently, of some wise and salutary public measures. It is, indeed, as Burns has said, "a sort of hangman's whip, to hault the wretch in order." Do you want an example, full, complete, and conclusive, of its power? It is to be found reported in the book of life, and is presented in the person of the boldest and most talented of the apostles. The apostle Peter, who upon the sea of Galilee, amid the awe of darkness and the storm, had seen his divine master say to the winds "peace," and to the waves "be still"—and all was quiet as an August noon—the same Peter who had stood by the grave of Lazarus, and witnessed that mysterious re-union between the dead body and the immortal spirit of him who was sleeping in the grave—that very man, quailing before the effect of a false public opinion, in one and the same hour thrice denied his faith and his master. I am in favor of an elective judiciary, the officers of which shall be, every eight years, submitted to the salutary operation of public opinion. I am asked to go a step further than this, and to make the judge removable by a bare majority of the legislature. I do not mean to go that far, and the man who would ask me to do it, after the surrender of the prejudices which I have already made on the subject of an elective judiciary, would have cried fire during the deluge.

This thing called an independent judiciary is a matter about which a great deal has been said, and a great deal more thought. Most significant allusion was made yesterday, to an independent judiciary in what was formerly called the mother country. The judges in England, as was said by my friend from Fayette, were originally appointed by the crown. They were, to use a common expression which every man in this house whether a lawyer or not, understands, tenants at will of the crown. What was the consequence? History shows that wherever the prerogative of the crown came in conflict with the interests and liberties of the subject, the judges were invariably found on the side of the king. It was just as the old maxim contained in the book of life declares, "The ox knoweth its owner, and the ass its master's crib." It is a long time since I read the history of England—a good deal longer than since my friend from Henry (Mr. Nuttall) read the history of Greece and Rome—and I believe he said he never read it except in Dilworth—but the contest which finally resulted in securing the independence of the judges, commenced, according to my reading, about the year 1688. It is immaterial when it commenced, but it finally resulted in changing the tenure by which the judges held their office from that of a tenancy at will of the crown, to that of good behavior, and that amounts generally to a tenancy for life. What were the consequences of that change of tenure? The judges from being the supple and pliant tools of the king were converted into a city of refuge for the subject. The judiciary of England then, for the first time in the history of the country, was indeed converted, if I may use the thought, into the shadow of a mighty rock in a weary land, to shelter and to protect. Before that period, the security of the crown rather than the safety of the subject was consulted. Such were the proper, natural, and legitimate consequences of judicial independence.

Although we are about to destroy in some respects the old constitution of Kentucky, there are still some good things in it which have my admiration and confidence, and which are connected not only with the glorious past, but with security for the present, and proud and still more glorious hopes of the future. I desire to read from the very first article in that constitution, and to commend its consideration in all its length and breadth to the house, ere the hour of trial, the hour of voting shall arrive.

"ARTICLE I. SECTION I.

"The powers of the government of the state of Kentucky, shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to wit: Those which are legislative, to one; those which are executive, to another; and those which are judicial, to another."

There is safety and security in that, and there is protection in it. And why? For the reason that it is a division of the powers of government, and it is the separation and division of those powers which constitute republicanism, as contradistinguished and opposed to despotism. I will read the second clause of this section of the constitution, to show you how the division and continued separation of those powers were guarded by the framers of the constitution:

"ARTICLE I. SECTION II.

"No person, or collection of persons, being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others; except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted."

What is despotism? I ask every gentleman to propound the question to himself, and to answer for himself. What but the union of all the powers of government in the same hand? And I vastly prefer living under a despotism where the union of all these powers is in one hand, than where it is in a hundred. There can be legislative despotism as well as any other. And when the legislature, by constitutional provision or by usurpation, get into their hands all the powers of government—executive, legislative, and judicial—as my friend from Jefferson well said the other day, it is a despotism. And it is the worst form of despotism, for obvious reasons. It generates public opinion, and after it is generated, it directs and controls it. The history of the French revolution, so eloquently referred to by my friend from Louisville, (Mr. Preston) is full of meaning and instruction upon the subject of the danger to be apprehended from legislative despotism. What were the consequences there? The monstrous visage of public robbery and murder, covered with the mask of public necessity, stalked over the land; the government carried in one hand the torch of a profane philosophy, and in the other the cup of massacre; public purification for its object, and plunder, rapine, and murder its means. The history of the past is pregnant with the dangers of legislative despotism, and the want of some power in which the people can confide, to stay the hand of popular madness and faction. It is that very separation of the powers of government, contained in this first article—and the strong injunction contained in the second clause of it, that no one department shall exercise the powers properly belonging to another, which constitutes the safety of the citizen, and gives perpetuity itself to the government. And without this clause, I would not give a farthing for any constitution which the wisdom of the people as represented in this convention may frame. And unless that principle is incorporated in the new constitution, I shall go home and take the stump against it, or at least clear my own conscience by voting against it.

Gentlemen seem to think that the legislature is the people, and that its opinions and action is always the just reflex of public sentiment. My own experience and that of every man on this floor shows most conclusively that this is not true. Is there a man here who has forgotten the scenes of 1822, '23, and '24. No sir, and what is more, I hope and trust they never may be forgotten; and all I ask of gentlemen is that, before the vote is taken on the proposition of my friend from Nelson, they will just allow their recollections to wander back to the scenes to which I allude. They are part of history now. The statute of limitations has been well called a statute of repose, and I advert to this history of the past only for the purpose of illustration. What was that history? The legislature passed a law which had the approbation doubtless of their hearts rather than their heads, and which resulted from their sympathy with the unfortunate and distracted state of the country. The courts of Kentucky decided that law to be unconstitutional. The legislature could not remove the judges by address, and what was the result? Finding they could not remove them as the constitution provided, the legislature attempted to do it in an unconstitutional manner. There is an example which is to be avoided of the danger of legislative power, and it is one too, which I desire gentlemen before they vote on the amendment of my friend from Nelson, to look at and to reflect upon. Make a judge subordinate to the legislative power and you make him a mere creature of legislative will. Is that the mode by which we expect to guard his integrity and secure his honor in the administration of justice? Not at all. Look at the judiciary now. Under the present system the executive and the legislature are elected by the people, while the judiciary, whose duty it is to protect the rights and interests of the citizen, to give efficacy to the laws, and stability to the government itself, and even to control the other two departments of the government, is created by the executive and one branch of the legislature. Hence it is that among other reasons, one of the strongest which has induced me to sustain an elective judiciary, is that it will withdraw the judges entirely from legislative influence. If a judge is conscious that he may be removed by a mere legislative majority, will he not be "to their faults a little blind, and to their virtues very kind."

We will suppose the case, and I acknowledge it is a violent supposition, of a legislature in the midst of high party feeling and excitement, suspending in a time of profound peace the writ of habeas corpus, or putting some man in jeopardy of life and limb twice for the same offence, or even taking private property for public use without the consent of or compensation to the owner. The judge standing upon the constitution, acting as a co-ordinate branch of the government, says to them like the prophet of old, with his censor in his hand, "thus far shalt thou come and no farther," and declares those acts unconstitutional, and therefore null and void. They having the power so to do by a bare majority, could and would remove him. And they would place in his stead some pliant and subservient tool, some gentleman who would be obedient to the legislative will, some man who would be ready to say to them, whatever you order I do, and whatever are your injunctions I am obedient. That is the description of the judges which we would have upon the bench, should the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson prevail, and it could not be otherwise. The honest judge would be subject to removal for the honest indication of his opinion, and for his just and unpurchased expositions of the law, or else you would have in the judicial tribunals of the country the mere tools of the legislature ready to record their will, and to do their bidding.

I am therefore, utterly opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, because I believe that upon an honest and unpurchasable judiciary, the safety of the rights and interests of the citizen depend. I believe that times may come and have come when the legislature will be induced to overstep the bounds of the constitution, and to punish the judge for resisting them. I believe, also, that the time has once come, and may come again, when they will be disposed to try a fall with justice only for the express purpose of showing its weakness, and I am opposed therefore, utterly opposed, to the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson. And I am anxious that the new constitution should contain a clause requiring two thirds of the legislature as necessary to remove the judge. We have done enough in all conscience when we have made the judiciary elective, and subjected them to the salutary operation of public opinion at the end of each eight years of service.

I have made these remarks because I considered it my duty so to do, and I shall, whenever the question is submitted to the decision of the house, vote against the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, for the reasons which I have just given.

Mr. GHOLSON. I have not risen with any particular expectation that I shall be able to enlighten this body. I cannot expect that my remarks will have much weight. I feel disposed, however, to exercise this privilege in behalf of those who sent me here, knowing as I do that they will be greatly dissatisfied if some of these measures are adopted. Now, sir, what is the question before us? What is it we are called upon to decide? It is to make a decision between something on the one hand and nothing on the other; for all experience will bear me out, when I say that impeachment by a majority, or even by a two thirds vote, is but a mere scarecrow. It has no terrors for the judicial tyrant on his throne. And why? Because in fifty years it has never succeeded in removing one. What does all this argue? Why one of two things—that we have had the most honest, correct, independent judiciary that the sun ever shone upon on the one hand, or on the other, that this system has proved the most inoperative and ineffectual for the purpose for which it was intended. And now, while I repeat that I believe we have had as enlightened, as honest, as worthy a judiciary as has fallen to the lot of any other people, I will also say we have had those on the judicial bench who did deserve punishment; and I affirm that they ought to have been punished on account of disqualification and misdemeanors in office; but they could not be reached. I, myself, have felt the iron heel of judicial omnipotence, and yet because I was poor I had to succumb before the tyrant. I have felt, and I hope I shall always feel that respect which is due to the judiciary of the country. I am conscious of never having offered an insult to a judge upon the bench. I beg pardon, if what I have said in relation to the judiciary is offensive; but I am a stranger to that sycophancy which I see abroad in the land towards those upon the judicial bench. Who is the judge? Is he not one of us? By what right does he occupy his station? Is it not the gift of the people? Is he not their servant? To what is it you bow when you enter the court house? It is not to the biped who sits there, but it is to the law itself. It is to the majesty of the law—it is to that which, if properly administered, should command our respect, and which, like the dews of heaven, should shed its benign influence alike upon all. It is to that which I bow; and this proposition that the judge shall only be reached by a two thirds vote, is to grant him a dispensation to do what he may please, in his omnipotence, to the end of his term. It is to say, you shall not be punished; the like never has been done, and therefore we have a good reason to believe it will never be done, and you may do as you please. It is possible, and only among possibilities, that if the majority principle, as proposed by the honorable gentleman from Nelson is adopted, an innocent and upright judge might be removed. One single, solitary instance in fifty years is given; and I have listened with pleasure to the declaration that there has been but one instance of this kind in which any disposition has been shown by a majority of the legislature to remove a judge for any cause whatever. We have had a great deal of light on the subject of English jurisprudence. Now, I do not pretend to know all about English history. Much has been said on the troubles that have visited other lands. It may be truly said that I have not gone further than crucifix in that kind of history, for poverty was my only inheritance and freedom my birthright, and it is for that freedom here I will contend. I do not pretend to say whether gentlemen are right or wrong, in their account of British or other foreign history, but I do say that their remarks are wholly inapplicable. I maintain that we are the only free people under the wide canopy of heaven—that we are the only people who are capable of self-government, in the proper sense of that word. These things have no application; these hobgoblins, raw heads and bloody bones, have no terrors for me. I have an abiding confidence in the patriotism and intelligence of the people; and I say to my brother delegates here and the whole world that if I believed my fellow-citizens of Kentucky were so corrupt and so degraded as to abuse, disgrace, and pollute this legislative hall, as some seem to think they would do if this majority principle should prevail, I would turn my back on this state forever, I would not live among such people, who, for opinion's sake, or party's sake, would commit such an act. That I have political opinions of my own I confess. I am a democrat, but I never intend to say it in the convention again. I am sorry to hear some gentlemen bringing up these party terms, and foreboding what party may do. I am a republican, and intend to assist in framing a republican government. I am for doing the greatest amount of good to the greatest number. I am for putting it in the power of the poor to obtain equal and exact justice as well as the rich. And I want to put it in the power of the poor man to reach the high in a manner that will make the tyrant on his throne tremble, and compel him to pursue the path of rectitude. This whole matter seems to be wrong. When you say to a man in the lower or upper end of Kentucky, if you have been imposed upon by a judge—if he fines you improperly—if he is guilty of malfeasance, or any other feissance, for there are so many feasances which gentlemen have referred to, I cannot remember them all—you must follow that judge to Frankfort to get redress, does not any man know that it will amount to nothing. The poor man, we all know, in such a case would obtain no redress; and I beseech you to look at the matter as it is, and do not, because a man lives at a distance from the capital, take from him the power of redress. I know that I am considered radical, and I may be, perhaps, a little too radical; if so, I owe it to the oppressions I have endured and to the abominations in the administration of the government that I have experienced. I have come here to lay the axe at the root of the tree. I hold every man here to be a servant of the people, and I want all officers of the government so to consider themselves, instead of considering themselves their masters. I am not to be told and made to believe that the thing is not practicable. I appeal to gentlemen to erect some tribunal which shall be within the reach of every man within the broad commonwealth, where every man shall be held to accountability. Were I to choose between the two propositions, I would vote for the majority principle. That is something, while the two thirds vote is nothing; it is less than nothing; it never has, it never can, and it never will embrace the object. It is anti-republican; it makes the minority rule; it is all wrong in principle.

I have been astonished—and I say it with all imaginable deference to the grey heads and the wise heads that have discussed this subject—at this discussion and the importance which gentlemen attach to the difference between a majority and two thirds. Why, it will never affect any one for ill; it will never remove a man from office in Kentucky. The responsibility may reach a judge who lives at Frankfort, but it will never reach those in distant parts of the State. The only remedy for the evil complained of is to return to the source whence the power is derived by frequent elections. When the proper time comes, I want to propose the term of four years instead of eight. I want to have some tribunal erected where the judge will be tried by a jury of the vicinage, or other competent tribunal, instead of sending the case to be tried away from the witnesses and the injured party. I have heard it said that there is something too dignified and too noble about a judge that he should be tried by an ignorant jury. Now, I hold there is no man living in the broad expanse of Kentucky who has more rights than you or I, or more interests to be disposed of by a jury of twelve men. Gentlemen talk about bringing a judge in chains to the feet of one department, that of our own legislature. I agree, in one particular, that it is wrong that a judge should be brought before the legislature. It is a violation of the first article of the constitution, which declares that the government shall be divided into three separate departments. I want to keep them separate. I want to carry out the articles in their spirit and truth. I do not want the judge brought to the feet of the executive. I want the judge to do his duty, and to rely alone on those who elected him to office. It is certainly subverting one of the principles of the constitution; it is undeniable that you cannot sustain the position, and maintain these two powers distinct. The legislature, if effectual as a tribunal for the trial of judges, destroys their independence. It merges all power in the legislature, in that respect, whether the required number be two thirds or a majority. It is immaterial; it brings the other departments to the footstool of the legislative department; and then its impracticability is demonstrated by experience, the best teacher on the face of the earth. When we have seen what has occurred in Kentucky in relation to the old and new court system, I think gentlemen should be convinced that if the majority should not rule, a judge can never be removed. And I do not think, if the majority had been sustained, in the case to which I have referred, that the country would have suffered any great harm. True, I was then in favor of sustaining the judges, because I believed they acted honestly, and that they intended to sustain the constitution—still the object of the legislature in passing the law, decided to be unconstitutional, was a good one. For these reasons, and these alone it was that I was disposed to sustain the law.

Well, that single, solitary instance, from the foundation of the government to the present time, is the only one that has occurred, if I rightly recollect our history. It is the only instance in which any attempt to remove any officer, except perhaps that of a justice of the peace, for malfeasance, or misdemeanor, had even the appearance of being successful. And are we sent here by the people, with high hopes and expectations, which are wide spread over the land, that something radical, something republican, should be done, to go back and say to them, that the united wisdom of Kentucky is not sufficient to devise a plan that shall give justice to the whole land? Are we disposed to say when we return to our constituents, you must follow a judge, if he impose upon you, to Frankfort, or go without redress. If you have not thousands you must endure your grievance as best you may. Is this republican? Is it for this that we came here? Are delegates prepared to go home and say there is something so high and sanctimonious in the name of a judge, that we cannot permit you plebeians to lay hands on him, unless you follow him to Frankfort. You confess the citizens of this country are not competent; they are too ignorant, too vicious. We cannot trust you. There is not in the whole country materials for a competent tribunal to try a judge for misdemeanors in office. And then will you turn round and tell them, that although this is the case, they shall not have the privilege of going away? You will try the poor man where the offence is committed, unless he gets a change of venue. But, although the act of a judge is as atrocious as it can be, still he is sent off here for trial. And this is republicanism! This is equality! And this is the glorious feast, that gentlemen, in their devotion and their patriotic strains, in which they dilate so eloquently on the fruits of the judiciary, have invited us to! This is the feast of the poor! This is the grand banquet which is to result from our conventional labors here.

Now, I would respectfully ask why it is you will put in the constitution a provision that, you all must agree, has heretofore proved ineffectual, and one which we may, therefore, reasonably expect will be so hereafter. Why, I ask, will you put such a provision in the constitution, when it has never removed a circuit judge in the whole extent of Kentucky? Is it not trifling with the rights of the people? Is it not trampling the rights of the poor man in the dust? I affirm that it is. But I have heard it objected out of this house, although I do not recollect that any gentleman has adverted to it in his remarks, that a judge would be harassed—would be subject to perpetual indictment, if a jury was permitted to act on the case.

I submit it to gentlemen if that is not saying a great deal for their several constituencies, that a judge could not be permitted to go on in an even-handed and straight forward administration of justice, because their constituents are so malicious and so black-hearted that they would continually harass them with wicked and unfounded indictments. For my part, in the name and behalf of my constituents I deny the imputation. I represent no such people here. No, far from it. All we ask for is even-handed justice. All that we want is, to do away with that distinction which, because one man is poor, places him directly within the reach of the law, and because another is an official dignitary takes him away to another and a higher tribunal. The whole system is wrong, and anti-republican, and I protest against it. I never will submit to that principle. I maintain that we all stand here on one broad platform of equality, and I claim that the poorest in my county shall enjoy the same rights and have the same protection as the richest and proudest in this broad commonwealth.

We claim no exclusive privilege—we claim to be freemen, to be honest, and we claim a just share in all the rights of the government. This is what I ask at the hands of the convention; and I call upon delegates to do away with this horizontal distinction. It cannot be denied that this creates one. It is an invidious distinction between the rich and the poor. Am I to be frightened by this talk about taking away the character of a judge, when you take away his office? All experience shows that if you want to make a man a martyr, your surest way to do it is by persecution. I hold, then, that this result never would take place; that the honest man never would be put down and eternally disgraced by such an act. If wrongfully removed he would be sustained by the people. There is too much patriotism and too much intelligence in this commonwealth to allow the innocent man to suffer. They never have done it, and never will do it. We ask for equality in the administration of justice; and this is to be insisted upon to the last. No man can successfully maintain that the character of a judge is more sacred than the life of an individual, yet you will compel the individual to be tried on the spot by a jury, and if found guilty, you will hang him as high as Haman's gallows. Yet a man, because he is a judge, when he has violated the rights of a citizen, must go to Frankfort for trial. I call on gentlemen to blot out this horizontal distinction; our people call for this; and they call with one stentorian voice for a return of all the powers of government to their hands. It is for that I ask—for that equality that should belong to a republican people.

I do not know that it becomes me on the present occasion to say any thing more. There was another point to which I desired to call the attention of the committee, but as that may come up at another time more appropriately, I will say no more at present.

Mr. DIXON. I do not rise to remark upon the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, but merely to refer to some of the positions just taken by my friend from Ballard and McCracken. I will take this occasion to remark that I look upon the independence of the judiciary as the sheet anchor of the ship of state, and without which there would be no security, either of person or property. I am for the independence of the judiciary, and I regard it as the great palladium of the rights, and the liberties of the people of this commonwealth, and I trust in God that the people will never become so insane as to bring the judicial power of the country down at the feet of faction, or subject to the mere excitement of popular feeling. The gentleman from Ballard and McCracken, has implored this convention not to sacrifice the rights of the poor, and he seems to think that those rights are to be protected by the persecution of the judicial intelligence of the country. Did the gentleman ever enquire how it was that men are influenced, or what it is that can influence the judge on the bench, or stain the judicial ermine with corruption? Did he ever learn that it was not the poor who could influence the judge?

Mr. GHOLSON. I utterly disavow any design to persecute the judiciary, or that such were my remarks.

Mr. DIXON. I did not say that the gentleman had used that language, but his argument comes to that point, and I am remarking upon the effects of the gentleman's argument. Does the gentleman desire to humiliate the judiciary at the feet of popular power, which in its wild excesses, knows no right, and is limited by no restraint? What is it that corrupts the judge, prostitutes the judicial character, and sinks it to the low and degraded position of pandering to the appetites of men in power? Is it the poor man who can do this? Does he find that when the rich suitor and the poor suitor appear before the judgment seat, that the former is more likely to influence the judge than the latter? Is the judge likely to be more sensible to the approaches of the poor man, than to the power and wealth of the rich and powerful? What then is it that ever protects the rights of the lowest and the meanest in the commonwealth from violation and outrage, but the independence of the judiciary and the integrity of the judge? When party spirit is exerted, when passions sway, and judgment is subordinate, then you behold an independent judiciary elevated on an eminence far above the storm, looking down and calming the stormy wave, and throwing the axis of judicial protection around the weak, whom public fury would have sacrificed. The gentleman would bring down the judge from that high elevation; but the people, the poor man who finds in an independent judiciary the best protection of his rights, will never consent to it.

The gentleman seems to think that majorities should rule and control in all things. There are some things in which majorities ought not and cannot rule. What is the object of law at all? What is the object of constitutional law? What is the object of those great principles which are declared in our bill of rights? Does the gentleman mean to say that the restraints which are there imposed on the rights of majorities are wrong? Does he mean to strike out of the constitution of the state, a great principle which has prevailed throughout the land—that a bare majority shall not take from me those great rights there secured? It was to sustain them, that is the very object of framing a constitution at all. It was to restrain the majority, to abridge their power, and to say to them, "thus far shalt thou go, and no farther." This is the very object of all law and constitutions.

With all due respect to the gentleman from Nelson, I must enter my protest against one principle contained in his amendment. It proposes, as I conceive, that one department of the government shall have the power of swallowing up another. Its effect will be to make the judicial department but the slave of the legislature. Does not every gentleman here see, that if the judges are to be elected throughout the country, that if it becomes the organic law, that the legislature may remove the judge for any cause they may think proper—that they have but to suggest as a reason why they should remove him, that he has decided the act of assembly to have been unconstitutionally passed? You have made a constitution, the object of which is the protection of the rights of the people—and you have thrown around them the safeguards which are designated in the bill of rights. The legislature, led on by some turbulent spirit or other, violates those safeguards, the judicial department of the government steps in to rescue them, and declares the law to be unconstitutional—and the legislature having the power so to do, by a bare majority, sweep them down from that high elevation upon which the people have placed them. Do you not see that the legislative department will thereby sweep down, by a bare majority, this department which was intended to restrain those fierce popular excite-ments which tend to sweep away all that is dear and valuable to society. I shall go against the amendment because of its tendency to permit one department to swallow up another, and to drag down and bring as a victim to the feet of the legislature, that great safeguard of the rights of the people—the judiciary.

I rose not to make a speech, but merely to say to the gentleman from Ballard and McCracken—let him beware of his proposition.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. I have been exceedingly edified by the course which this question has taken since its introduction into this house. It will be admitted that the discursive character of the debate which has been tolerated, has evolved all the elements, out of which a pure and independent judiciary is to be constructed. It was not my intention, if this question had been kept within its legitimate limits, to have been heard in regard to it. But I stand here sir, more deeply interested in regard to making a pure, independent judiciary, than upon any other subject which may be presented to the consideration of the convention. When all the elements which enter into the structure of this judiciary department seem to be free for discussion here, I feel it to be my duty to those whom I represent, as well as what I consider to be in obedience to the dictates of my own conscience, to say a few words.

We are sent here to reform our constitution only in those parts which public sentiment has indicated should be reformed. We are not to demolish the constitution under which we have lived for fifty years in safety and prosperity; but to reform the government only in such parts as have created dissatisfaction in the minds of the people. The people of this State have found no fault with the constitution except in some of its parts, which we may reform without going deeply into the vital principles which were established in 1799.

Amongst other things that either ideally or really oppress them, is the irresponsibility of their inferior and higher courts. That irresponsibility they wish to be changed by the constitution which we are sent here to make, and some practical principle placed in the constitution which would make the judiciary, whether high or low, more responsible. Experience diffused through the State in regard to the action of the lower branches of the judiciary—the experience of the oppressions of this branch of magistracy—I mean the justice of peace system,—has created a dissatisfaction in regard to that department of the government.

What is the great evil which we are here as a convention called upon to correct? I ask every gentleman in this house, whether or not the leading grievance of which the community, that we here represent, most loudly complain, was not the grievance arising from these lower branches of the judiciary? I ask them whether it in fact was not, in its inception, the great reason why this convention should be called? That was the first real grievance which led the people to agitate the call of a convention.

Now sir, as has been well and truly said, we should have a government adapted to the public sentiment. The public sentiment, which is our lex non scripta, ought to be obeyed, or it is not a government of the people at all. An enactment that is not in accordance with public sentiment, lies as a dead letter on the statute book. Public sentiment should be implicitly obeyed, and its behests should be embodied in the organic law which we are here to frame.

Now, the public sentiment, as indicated, in regard to the inferior branch of our judiciary is, that the constitution should be altered, in so far as relates to the manner in which men should hold office, as well as to the punishment that should be inflicted upon them for malfeasance in office. Public sentiment, I repeat, has shown that clearly. The present constitution has also shown that their magistracy is not sufficiently responsible to the people. And one reason why this is so, is because the people do not put them in power. They are self-created, and perpetuate themselves by their own action, and that among others has been given as a reason why the people voted for a convention. Let us elect this magistracy, and let us elect them in the different precincts in which they reside, giving them a proper jurisdiction, and the people will select officers who will perform the service properly. The election by the people is an indication of public sentiment which is unmistakeable, and should be obeyed. Go higher up, and what have the counties in the State indicated in regard to the circuit court judges? Do you find as much unanimity as you do in respect to the inferior magistracy? In some counties there is some unanimity, and in others they leave it to the discretion of those whom they send here. But, in regard to the lower branches, there is a unanimous opinion that they should be elected.

In regard to the next branch, you find a division on the broad surface of Kentucky; that while some counties are for electing, some are for electing in one way, and some in another. We find there is not unanimity in this respect. Let what I say be understood as believed by me; there is a unanimity in Kentucky to limit this life tenure, and to break up the principle of a tenure during good behavior, which amounts to a life tenure, and insert in lieu thereof, a limited tenure. This is a principle upon which the people have fixed their seal, and they have equally announced the limitation principle. Public sentiment must be embodied in the constitution, and it has fixed its condemnation upon life services.

The time of service shall be limited, but with regard to the number of years, there is not the same agreement in opinion. We all agree that the services of a judge shall be limited by a term of years; and whether appointed by the governor or elected by the legislature, or by the people; that is to be an element in the structure of his office. We all agree on that—there is no difficulty in the committee in regard to this point. We all agree to limit the judicial office to a term of years, but there arise the questions, what further shall be done in the structure of this judicial system? How shall we get the judge into office? How long shall he be retained in office? How shall he be dismissed from that office? These questions involve these propositions. You are called upon to make an office, and the first inquiry which is natural to a reasonable mind is, what is the object of the office? What do the people wish to effect through the medium of this ministerial agent were a called upon to constitute? They wish a judge who will decide between the weak and the powerful impartially. They wish to protect one citizen against the villainies of another. They wish a judge to stand as a barrier against the tyrannous influences that may arise in the private walks of life. What more do the people ask at your hands in the structure of this office? He is not only to protect the weak against the strong, the poor against the wealthy and powerful, but he has still other duties to perform.—Duties higher cannot be under heaven, except the duty to God. His duties, then, are higher than any which rest upon him as a mere member of society. What are they? That he shall protect the balances of our government from those usurping tendencies and influences which we have seen in all times in the legislative department of the government. And without which protection, each department would rush madly and wildly upon the other, and in the collision sweep down and destroy all those great constitutional barriers which the wisdom of ages has thrown around the rights and liberties of mankind. Much has been said of the safety of human liberty when in the power of the legislative department, and some gentlemen have been so inaccurate as to refer to Roman history to sustain their position. It is not my wish to revert to that; and it is not necessary to maintain my position that I should do so. But liberty has, in as many instances suffered through the despotic influence of combined numbers as through any other influence whatever, and the testimony of history is that liberty has always expired under the influence of factions generated in such bodies as this. Such may be the case here; but our judges are called upon to stand between the citizen and the usurped authority on the part of the executive or the legislative departments. They are called upon to be a barrier to protect your constitution against invasion from either the executive or the legislative, and you must, in making this structure of a judge, confine yourself to the view of its object. No mechanic makes a machine unless he takes into view the object for which it is designed. No man lays down a proposition except he has his end in view, and no politician can advocate a measure except he knows what it is calculated to produce. Hence, we are, in framing a constitution to take into consideration all its provisions to make it so that all its provisions can have a fair and proper operation. One gentleman has observed that, in the course of duty, the judiciary is called on to stand against the action of the legislature. Your legislature, perhaps, pass a law against human liberty in a time of excitement, such a time as may arise in this country on the slave question, such a time as might arise on the question of emancipation, or no emancipation, when men, in carrying out the feelings of their hearts, and which they believe to be right, may place themselves in a false position before society. The people may appeal to the constitution which gives them equal rights and privileges, and which declares that the right of trial by jury shall be sacred and inviolate to them. And this appeal is submitted to the judiciary, whilst a great majority of the legislature have enacted laws having a restraining effect on the rights of the citizens. Here is a decision upon an enactment of the legislature, which, for the time being, receives the popular applause, and is considered correct, but which involves some rights, which were not agreed upon when the charter of liberty was framed. Here is a law then, which the legislature has passed, which comes in conflict with the freedom of the person of the individual under the constitution; and here is a judge called upon to protect him from the unconstitutional effect of this law on his rights. The judge then, if he fulfils the functions for which he is appointed is bound to decide according to the dictates of his conscience, and protect this citizen if he is right, against legislative and popular influence. Now, that is a proposition which is far higher than any which relates to contests between individuals.

In making this judge, you are to take into consideration that these exigencies may arise in the process of time, and that you are to confer upon him the power of preventing this evil from legislative usurpation. And after securing his independence the whole structure of the office should conform to the design you had in view when you created it. Well, you have made it in conformity with the design which you had in view when you created the office, and the duties which the judge may be called upon to discharge. Then you must guard him against the attacks of faction in his course, which will destroy his power. You must not ask a man to do that which no man can do, and which is imposed upon no man in view of the frailties of human nature, that which no man can do without being exposed to the insinuations of temptation, or the bold assaults of power.

Then, in making this department in conformity to the duties which you require, is there a man who means to make this structure anything but that which will produce a pure, independent action? Not one. We all agree that the judge shall be pure, intelligent, independent, yet when you aim to accomplish this object, will you surround him with a class of circumstances that conflict with the idea of purity and independence? If you do, you are guilty of that which, I presume, you do not intend. You place him in circumstances which are sure to produce the reverse.

Your judge, then, must be independent in order that he may be pure; he must have salary enough to induce talented men to accept the office, intelligence enough to induce intelligent men to elect him, and integrity enough to resist the usurping tendencies of the other departments of this government. Then what is the proposition that is laid down by the gentleman from Nelson? Let us look at it. It is that a majority of the legislature shall remove this judge from office for any cause which, in their wise discretion, they may think proper, by spreading their reasons on the journals. You desire this judge to be independent, yet you require him to be independent at the risk of his own honor, at the risk of his own bread. He is elected by the people, and removable by what? A great mistake seems to pervade this house, and let me remark upon that mistake. There is a great mistake, as indiated by the language of delegates when they speak of the legislature in such a manner as to confound the idea of that body with the idea that they are, in reality, the people, when in fact they are only a majority of a party of the people. The great object in making the judge independent is to render him pure and above the influence of partizan operations. But, in making him above party it is to place him above the sphere of those influences which mere partisan operations have upon the people. The difference between a party of the people and the people themselves is a most important one. Suppose, for instance, a judge is arraigned before the legislature for the declaration that the course which some violent emancipationist has taken, is not wrong, and that the fundamental principles of the constitution, which secures to him equal privileges, have been violated by the passage of an act of the legislature which was founded upon public sentiment at the time of its enactment. His punishment is called for by public sentiment, but like the weak who fly to a fortress of strength, he goes to the charter which the constitution has erected, and that charter points him to the judge that is to protect him. This tribunal, therefore, is by the terms of the resolution of the gentleman from Nelson, to be disgraced by the legislature if he dares to declare that it has interfered with the rights of this humble citizen; that legislature elected by the people over this broad state, divided and distracted as they may be, yet still having a majority sufficient to carry out all the wishes of the people, stand here ready to represent them in saying that this doctrine of emancipation must be put down, even if it must be at the expense of the destruction of the fundamental principles of this government. Now, if I understand the object of government, it is to protect the weak against the strong; it is not made to protect majorities, but minorities. Hence there are certain fundamental principles and maxims that are never to be disturbed.

When you trace out the origin of the improvements that have taken place in our judicial system, you will find that our ancestors have been struggling for the maintenance of that principle from the time of King John, when they secured to themselves the principles of Magna Charta, the foundation of all those parliamentary provisions, that were enacted from time to time, giving personal liberty, and which they placed upon their statute books. We read in English history, that in the time of the Plantagenets and the Tudors, the liberties of the subject were repeatedly violated, either by the king, or by whatever power had the ascendancy. And although the English people had the name of being free, they never had an inch of freedom, nor ever did enjoy it in fact, for the want of one great desideratum in their system of civil polity. And what was the reason that this system of polity was so corrupt, that with all their paper rights, they still were not free? Their property was not secure, and their lives and their liberties outraged by the laws of the land. Let me refer gentlemen to that state of things, and let me entreat them to pause and reflect on the reason that this people did not enjoy their liberties. At that period, although their system of civil polity was considered complete, yet they did not enjoy that polity in security. It was on account of the administration of the law by a dependent judiciary, and because it was a mere idle farce to proclaim a man free while the king and the parliament might trample his dearest rights under foot, and he have no protection. These freemen, from whose loins we are descended, and who are the pride of human nature—these freemen and law-abiding people, a people governed by a common sense principle in all their actions, both national and individual—a people who look upon human government, as the most difficult on earth, as a science that should be made more and more perfect, as necessity points out—this people, I say, endured these grievances patiently and impatiently, according to the circumstances that surrounded them, till having wandered through a labyrinth of difficulties, and after having listened to the voice of the wise Bacon, (that judge so famous for receiving the influence of private solicitation,) these people who had lived for ages, and laid up the maxims out of which human wisdom is made—these people, at last found out that the great cause why their liberty was only in name, and their property secure only in name, was for the want of some ministerial agency, some power engrafted on their civil polity, to hold up the weak against the strong.

Why is it that from that day to this no power has been found that will secure that solitary principle, the protection of the weak against the strong? Why is it that the great desideratum of government has never yet been discovered, that the weak might be protected in his property and his liberty against the strong? Why was it that beings like us, enlightened as they were in ancient times, failed to make this discovery? Why was it that the democracy of Athens, who conceived themselves so wise in all the principles of government, failed? Why was it that the numerous attempts to establish a republic in Rome was unsuccessful? Why was it that the prætor, when he went into power, was only asked to be consistent with himself? When we refer to the times to which I have alluded, we discover that it was the ignorance of the principle, which would secure the weak against the strong, which caused those failures to establish self-government. That principle never was discovered till our ancestry in England, having passed through the process of adventurous experiments, were forced, by the necessity of the occasion, to adopt the plan of an independent judiciary.

Surround such a man as Bacon, an ornament to the human intellect, a most astounding phenomenon of human intellect, surround him with favorable circumstances, let him not look to power to hold him in office, give him a salary sufficient to place him above temptation, in other respects, and a more pure and noble instance of the mind of man has never been known since the days of the earliest memory of man. The circumstances which surrounded this great man were the cause of his lack of purity and independence. Circumstances formed the man. Where you meet with one man in this high position, who walks like a giant above all circumstances around him, you meet with a million who are the mere creatures of circumstances. That man is the true genius, who can make circumstances bow to the high behests of his own intellect. That man, to whom I have referred, Lord Bacon, was not that elevated genius. He was an instance of a giant intellect, thrown down by circumstances and temptation, into abject contempt. Go on from that period and trace the rise of the judicial structure, and you will find that it lasted till the days of William and Mary, till after public sentiment had been whipped into maturity of wisdom; and this great desideratum, the independence and purity of a judge, was discovered.

When you get to that epoch of time, shortly after the expulsion of James II. for crimes which never can be atoned for, among other principles asserted, is the principle that the judge shall hold office during good behavior; that he shall be subject to no power but the power of God, in inscribing a deep sense of right on his conscience in all his relations to the great King, or the minor King.

That independence which is secured by putting the judge in office during good behavior, is the most important principle that can affect the human character. This independence is absolutely essential to the character of a judge, as essential as in any department of this government. A paper constitution is nothing without efficacy and sanction. A principle is nothing unless it can be carried out practically. An abstract principle may be correct, yet when it is reduced to practice, it may prove its inadequacy for the end; but, the very beauty of the science of government is, that although it is fit on principle, yet in practice it produces effects perfectly answering the purposes of its institution. Your abstract proposition is, that you will have a balanced government and an independent judiciary, and you will reduce these two principles to practice. And how are you to do it? Are you to guess at the manner in which it is to be accomplished? Are you to destroy the government which your ancestry framed, and adopt a mere guess-work form of government, or are you to look to the light of experience, which you have as a guide, and which penetrates beyond the bounds of speculation into the regions of reality?

Your design is to make an independent judge, and in the word independence, we will include ideas which must go with it—purity and intelligence; for, no judge can perform his duty if he is dependent upon those around him. But you can make him pure and intelligent as the necessary consequence of independence.

I have shown why Lord Bacon and other eminent jurists failed to reach the character, which we have seen in modern times. It was because they held their power during the pleasure of those that placed them in office. But we are called on to limit this life service, and the public sentiment must be gratified. We are not bound to demolish that principle in our constitution; we are, however, bound to limit the term of office, for this is absolutely necessary to obey the will of those who sent us here. Now, can we obey that will and still retain in this judicial system this important principle of judicial independence? I say we can, that this object can be achieved, and that we can now make another advance in the science of government beyond that which was made by the wisdom of those who have gone before us. They attained the greatest independence by allowing the judges to retain their office during good behavior; we can attain the desideratum by permitting them to retain their office for a term of years. It is not so important how a judge gets into office, as that he shall have no temptation when he shall have taken his seat. The manner of his appointment is not so important, as that, after he secures that appointment, he shall properly discharge the duties which belong to his station. The elective principle, therefore, may be considered as the manner of putting him in office, and the tenure of office for a term of years, may be adopted and still he will be pure. The independence of a judge in England, did not arise from the circumstance that he was appointed for life, but from the fact that if he behaved well he could not be removed, and that he had no occasion whatever, to look to any source for his continuance in office except his own merits. Now, I wish this idea to be well weighed by gentlemen. The judge was not put in for a term of years by the King, to be again appointed at the end of that term by the same King, because if so, he would have been under the influence of temptation to propitiate the kind feelings of that King that he might secure a second appointment. He was not re-eligible to office because if he was turned out of it he suffered the fines and penalties incident to that disgraceful position. He was placed in an office, the term of which was limited by life if he behaved himself well.

Now, what is it? You put a man into office, and say to him if you behave yourself, you shall remain. In order to remove from him any temptation, (such as existed in the heart of the English judiciary to succumb to the appointing power,) I say the principle ought to be incorporated in the constitution that he shall not be re-eligible—that he shall hold his office during this term of years, provided he behaves himself; and when that term shall have elapsed, he shall go out of power for at least one term. Let us consider this matter and inquire what we shall have gained by inserting this principle in the constitution. Like causes will produce similar effects in the moral as well as in the physical world. The great cause of the independence of the English judiciary was, they were not under the influence of power. The same cause must be produced here.

Look at the man who is chosen for eight years, and then is a candidate for re-election. See what a spectacle will be presented to the people of Kentucky. Your judge is to be elected by the people at large, that is a concession I admit. Your people are, therefore, to elect your judges. A man is a man in whatever guise he may be, and when a candidate comes before you he will mingle with the people. Now, I am no servile adulator of man as man, or of man as many; and although I have heard an adulation in regard to the people that would make me think I was any where else but in this body, though I have a respect for the people which those should have who resort to this adulation, still I know the people. I know the people of Kentucky are influenced by common sense and justice, and they suspect that man, who is always saying the people cannot err; and that man who expects to rise into favor with the people by appealing to them in such terms of adulation as I have sometimes heard—I do not mean to allude to any one in this convention—will fail in his attempt to secure their favor; but a manly independent course before the people of this state, telling them what is true, though it operates against you, is a course that will be sustained by the people, and will more surely attain the public favor than any other course whatever. Now, if the judge comes before the people, he comes before a people of this kind, although you may look at it as paradoxical. The people will be generally divided into two classes, and these parties—whigs and democrats—perhaps are nearly equally divided, but there is another class mingling with the people. What class is that? It is a class found in every republic, which floats between the two great parties, giving first to one party the ascendancy, and then to the other. The effect of this floating vote has been shown in many cases within the knowledge of gentlemen during the last thirty years. What caused the election of General Harrison, except the inclination of this floating interest to his side? And what but this, produced the election of Gen. Taylor? If this proposition has proved true on a large scale, are you to expect it will be otherwise upon a limited one in this commonwealth? When your candidates for re-election present themselves before the people, what is likely to be the practice of the two parties? The two great parties stand out prominently, but here is another party, which ought not to be classed among the people. This judge is to be elected. His mind is anxious and he begins to weigh his chances of success, and he thinks he must propitiate this floating party. Here are a thousand voters on one side, and nine hundred upon the other, and one hundred and fifty floating voters who must be propitiated. What is to be done? I ought not to ask that question; human nature is human nature, and proud as human intellect may be, or elevated as your principles of morality may be, when your mind is inflamed, you are sure to call to your aid this balance of power which may decide your fate. You are sure to propitiate it with all the will that your nature can invent. Is this a true or a false picture of the practical effect which will be produced by the election of the judiciary by the people? Is it a true or a false picture of the practices to which our judges will have to resort to obtain this high elevation of the judgeship. If it is true, there is nothing but a power, which must be abiding in this house, which will make me yield to the election of the judiciary by the people. In deference, however, to that power which I know to be present in this house, I have conceded this question. The judge has assumed his seat for a term of years, limited, some say to four and some to eight years; he has received his salary, his honors, and the only dark spot in his reminiscence is the corrupt scene through which he was forced to pass, to obtain his office. But oh what a sad condition. It has caused me to lose my self-respect. I have had to pass through the ordeal. I have obtained office, but I have lost my self-respect. I have condescended to do that which should make a proud and honest man blush. But nothing but necessity has caused it. It is the plea of necessity that always gives the tyrant his excuse. It was the plea of my necessity which caused me to sacrifice the principle which I ought to cherish more than any other—my own self-respect.

He is in power though, and he holds that power subject to the will of the people for re-election. In England the king or parliament put the judge in power. This person, was he put there by the people—by the whig or the democratic party? Every man will say it was the little floating party that elected him. What have we seen in the great state of Ohio? After great trouble and confusion the legislature of that state was organized. It became the duty of that body, under the constitution and laws of that state, to elect a senator in congress and judges. There it was that a little, insignificant band of fanatics, called free soilers, insignificant in number, more insignificant in intellect, showed itself in the legislature. Neither of the great parties holding the balance of power, the potency of this little party was sorely felt. They held the balance of power and dictated to the democratic party the course to be pursued in the election of these high officers. They told the democratic party if they would come into their terms, they should have success in the fond wish of their hearts. They gave them the United States senator, and then this little party, composed of three men, demanded the judiciary of the state!

Now what happens in a body constituted of one hundred and fifty, may happen in one of an hundred thousand. The same cause may produce the same results when acting in the broad space of unlimited numbers, and just so certainly will this small irresponsible party, dictate in the counties of this state, who shall be the judge. The judge looks then to that party as the source and origin of his power, and with great propriety he looks to them for his re-election. Is that a proposition that is understood here by this house? The very power of his appointment he has to look to for his re-appointment.

In England the judge was put in for life, and of course he was ineligible. Then incorporate this same principle during good behaviour. But how? Say he shall not be re-elected—give him a good salary—incorporate that salary in the constitution—then make that judge ineligible, and although you have demolished that judicial structure which we have borrowed from England, you have constructed one which will secure the same end that was designed to be secured by the old structure. But gentlemen say there is no stimulant for the judge to behave well while in office, unless he is to be placed before his constituents again. Let us look at it. I know that I am detaining the house longer than they want to be detained, but the subject under consideration rises above every other subject.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL here rose and asked the gentleman from Fleming to give way for the purpose of enabling him to make a motion that the committee rise.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL assented.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL then moved that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The motion was agreed to, leave was granted, and then the convention adjourned.

MONDAY, OCTOBER 21, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. Norton.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. ROOT, from the committee on Elections, made the following report:

Your committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Joseph Lecompte, contesting the right of Elijah F. Nuttall, the delegate returned to serve in this convention from the county of Henry, which memorial is as follows:

"To the honorable, the constitutional convention of Kentucky, now assembled in the city of Frankfort.

"Your memorialist, JOSEPH LECOMPTE, a citizen of Henry county, Kentucky, claims that he is entitled to membership in your honorable body, in exclusion of Elijah F. Nuttall, Esq., who now occupies a seat upon the floor of said body, claiming to represent the county of Henry: and your memorialist shows the following causes upon which he predicates his claims.

"1st. Your memorialist avers, that he was a candidate for membership in your body at the last August election in Henry county, and that your memorialist having all the legal qualification for membership, as aforesaid, and being opposed by the said Nuttall, was elected over the said Nuttall, by having a majority of all the legally qualified voters, who voted at said election, to vote for your memorialist, over said Nuttall.

"2d. Your memorialist avers that the poll-books of all the places of voting in Henry county, do, in fact, show upon their face, that your memorialist did receive a majority of the total number of votes cast at said election; and he claims in virtue thereof, that he is entitled to the seat as the delegate for Henry county.

"3d. Yet, nevertheless, your memorialist avers, that the returning officer, who was entitled to certify the election of the delegate who might be elected, certified to the Secretary of State that the said Nuttall was elected; and, in virtue thereof, the said Nuttall hath taken his seat in your honorable body; when, in fact your memorialist avers, that the said poll-books show your memorialist to have been entitled to said certificate by ten votes: but your memorialist avers that he is entitled to said seat for other reasons: he charges,

"4th. That voters voted for said Nuttall who were not citizens of the county of Henry at the time of voting.

"5th. That voters duplicated their votes for said Nuttall.

"6th. That persons, who were under the age of 21 years, voted for said Nuttall.

"7th. That citizens of Shelby county voted for said Nuttall.

"8th. That, in these and other respects, there were two hundred illegal votes for said Nuttall.

"Wherefore, your memorialist prays that the proper steps may be set on foot to ascertain the truth of the case, and that your honorable body will declare your memorialist entitled to a seat in this convention, as a member thereof, provided it shall turn out that your memorialist is, in law, entitled thereto. And your memorialist will ever pray, &c., &c.,

"JOSEPH LECOMPTE."

have had the same under consideration, and report thereon: That it was agreed by the memorialist, on his part, to withdraw all the allegations in his memorial, except the second, and to rely on that alone—

"2d. Your memorialist avers, that the poll-books of all the places of voting in Henry county, do, in fact, show upon their face, that your memorialist did receive a majority of the total number of votes cast at said election; and he claims in virtue thereof, that he is entitled to the seat as the delegate for Henry county."

And on the part of the sitting member, Elijah F. Nuttall, that he would rely alone, upon showing the fact, that after the said election, and after the poll-books were returned to the clerk's office of the said county of Henry, that the poll-books for the precinct of New Castle, in said county, were changed, altered, and forged, and that twenty-six marks (or votes) were placed in Lecompte's columns opposite to the names of divers persons, who voted for neither of the parties in this contest, at the August election. The issue being thus formed, and the onus probandi thrown upon Nuttall, the said Nuttall proceeded to call his witnesses, when Lecompte, by his counsel, moved your committee to exclude all parol testimony, tending to show any alteration or forgery of the poll-books of the said county of Henry; which motion, being fully heard, on the part of Lecompte, was overruled. Whereupon, Lecompte, by his counsel, demanded a specification, in writing, of the votes, that the sitting member alledges to have been forged upon the poll-books of New Castle, and it was furnished him:

Whereupon, the memorialist, (Lecompte,) declined all further contest, and withdrew any further claim to a seat in this convention.

Your committee would further report: That, from an examination of the poll-books, from the said precinct of New Castle, that they are of the opinion, that votes had been added to Lecompte's columns, opposite to divers names of voters, since the "footing up" of said poll-books by the clerk of the election; and this was more apparent to your committee from the fact, that no such errors appeared in the addition of the votes of either of the other candidates. Your committee enumerated the number of votes upon the New Castle poll-book in Lecompte's columns, and found that the number of marks standing for votes, exceeded upon each page, except one, of said poll-book, the clerk's addition, from two to four votes.

Your committee also report the following resolution:

Resolved, That Elijah F. Nuttall, who has been returned by the sheriff of Henry county, to have been duly elected, at the last August election, a delegate to this convention from the county aforesaid, was duly elected by the qualified voters of said county; and is entitled to his seat upon this floor.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BOYD called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NUTTALL said he would like to have them taken. He had been extremely anxious that the committee should have received some of the testimony on the question of forgery, but they thought that the withdrawal of the contest was perhaps an admission of the fact. He was better acquainted with the tactics of his competitor at home than perhaps any gentleman on this floor, and he should like to have the yeas and nays taken. In fact it was at his suggestion that the gentleman from Trigg made the call.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE suggested that the vote should be taken, and if there were any noes then the yeas and nays could be called for.

The PRESIDENT put the question on the adoption of the resolution, and it was agreed to unanimously.

Mr. HARDIN brought before the convention the question of paying the expense of this contest. He said there had been many witnesses brought to this city at an expense of several hundred dollars.

The PRESIDENT intimated that no claim was made by the witnesses.

Mr. HARDIN replied that he understood their attorney had paid the money for them.

Mr. NUTTALL said he had already paid a portion of the witnesses, but he did not conceive that these expenses should fall upon him under the circumstances.

Mr. HARDIN said before this contest was commenced, Mr. Lecompte enquired from him who would be adjudged to pay the costs; and he (Mr. Hardin,) replied that he supposed the state would pay if there was probable ground for the contest, and if not, that Mr. Lecompte would have to pay them. Mr. Lecompte added that he was exceedingly poor, and did not wish to be obliged to pay. It did not now appear that Mr. Lecompte had probable ground whereon to contest the seat of the sitting member, and it would be better if the state should pay. He (Mr. H.) had felt bound to make this statement.

Mr. NUTTALL thought that from $70 to $100 would pay the whole expense of the prosecution, including the witnesses.

The PRESIDENT interposed and said there was no question before the convention.

The conversation then dropped.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the report of the committee on the court of appeals, Mr. Huston in the chair.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. The discussion of the subjects involved in the question, so exceedingly important in their character and bearing, on Saturday last exhausted me physically; and this morning I feel the propriety of putting off the discussion of this point till a more propitious period. The independence of the judiciary is a standard principle in its character, which must be engrafted into the constitution, which we make in this house. And in view of having it thus engrafted I will read a proposition which in its proper place and at the proper time I will offer for the action of the convention.

"The judges of the court of appeals shall receive each a fixed annual salary of not less than — dollars, and be ineligible for the succeeding term after the expiration of the time for which they shall have been elected."

This distinct proposition, carrying with it a principle which it is necessary should be engrafted on a judicial structure, will be submitted at the proper time, and I hope it will then receive the aid of all those who view the matter as I do. I believe the proper time has not now arrived, and therefore I shall not trouble the house with any more remarks.

Mr. HARDIN. I designed making one or two remarks further in this case, but I have conversed with the honorable chairman of the committee, and he says that he is desirous of closing the debate. If any gentleman is desirous of speaking, I will not speak at the present time. If not, I will submit a few remarks.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not design to make a speech on this question, but it has excited considerable interest in the house, and perhaps in the country. I only design to give my reasons why I will not vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson. Members have assigned various reasons, and unless I assign mine, my constituents might place me among those who have given reasons of which I do not approve. Most of the members have set out with the proposition that they were original convention men. I, too, claim to have been an original convention man. I claim to be one of those who go as far in favor of reform as any gentleman in this house. I think, with other members who have addressed the committee, that all power belongs to the people, and that power should be exercised for their good. I claim for them the sovereignty in this land, but it seems they have sent me here to yield up a portion of it and to frame a government that shall be enduring. We have divided our government into three several parts. The executive power we confine to one, the law-making power to another, and the judiciary to a third. Our government, without going back to England, and to the history of the past, is framed on the principle of checks and balances. This principle should be kept up and not destroyed.

The law-making power is one part of this government; it is that department to which the people of this state look with more jealousy than any other. But they have thrown a protection upon, and have made the judiciary supreme. They are the check, and when we make a law by the legislature, it is the duty of the judiciary to declare whether it is or is not constitutional. But if we make the judiciary subservient to the law-making power, then the judiciary will be the tools, the tenants at will of that department, as the judges were in England previous to the revolution. This will be the case here, and it behooves us to fix this thing up permanently, that it may stand. How can the gentleman from Nelson go for making the judiciary subservient to the law-making power, when he does not go for specific amendments? He wants to throw around the constitution the present clause in relation to amendments. He wants the people to come to their sober second thoughts before we destroy the present constitution. He would not go for a bare majority to amend our constitution, much less ought he to go to destroy that power in our government, which holds them in check and awe. There is not a consistency in these two principles. I have before remarked, it seems to me, that the power is in the hands of the people, and I wish to make the judiciary subservient to them. I want the judiciary made elective by the people, and elected for a term of years. If good and faithful servants, they can be returned again, and that will be the strongest stimulant that can be thrown around an honest man. I also wish to have a separate department to try men for malfeasancess. I would be as radical as the gentleman from Ballard and McCracken. I would have a tribunal to try a judge in the vicinage. There is a precedent for this; and then it would be necessary that they should have the consent of the whole jury, and not a majority merely. A verdict of the whole twelve sworn jurors would be required. Some gentlemen are in favor of a verdict by a majority of jurors; but that was not the ground of the original convention men. It seems to me that no man who is a lover of that which is consistent, and a lover of justice can be in favor of such a system. Some gentleman, I believe it was the gentleman from Campbell, said there is not virtue enough in two-thirds to try a judge. This to me appears to be a strange position; if there is not virtue enough in two-thirds, for God's sake don't take a majority. In times of excitement, politicians will transcend their duties. They have done so. The passage of the law of 1833 was uncalled for, and the repeal of it was uncalled for. They have passed many uncalled for laws, and I want to throw around the law-making department many checks. With the expression of these few reasons, I do not think it necessary that I should say anything more.

Mr. CHAMBERS. The faculty or power of condensing is a most valuable one, and its exercise is indispensably necessary in the formation of a constitution. This power might also have been advantageously and happily infused into many of the speeches which gentlemen have addressed to us upon the subject before the committee. Sir, seeing the difficulty of obtaining the floor, and witnessing the distressing embarrassment that young and modest members must experience in attempting to address the convention, I had determined to condense and to compress all that I might have to say into the simple yet comprehensive aye or no; and sir, I shall not very greatly depart from that determination on this occasion.

Sir, the subject matter under consideration is the motion made by the gentleman from Nelson to amend that portion of the report from the committee on the court of appeals which relates to impeachments and address, and he proposes to strike out the words "two thirds" and insert "majority."

Now sir, the effect of this amendment, should it prevail, will be to place not only the judges, but all of the higher officers of this commonwealth at the mercy of a bare majority in the legislature; and why sir, should we do this? Has any gentleman's constituents required such a provision at his hands? Will such a provision conduce to the securing of abler and better men for these offices? Is it requisite to insure a faithful discharge of their duties, that these officers should constantly have the terrors of address or impeachment before their eyes? I think not sir. What sir, is the prominent and distinguishing feature, the characteristic movement on the part of the people in calling this convention? Was it to enlarge the powers of either of the great departments of this government? Was it to make any one of those departments more dependant upon another than it is under the existing constitution? No sir, no. I have not so understood them. But on the contrary the object and design most apparent in the great movement which has resulted in our assembling here, was a determination on the part of the people to reclaim and to have restored to them many of the powers now delegated to the several departments. It was not to increase the strength of one of these departments at the expense of another's weakness that we were called here. No sir. It was to take from each of these departments some of the powers now delegated to it, and to restore the exercise thereof to the people themselves. What sir, are our instructions with regard to the executive branch of this government? Are they not that we shall strip him of all appointing power and patronage? that we leave with him the qualified veto he now has—the command of the militia, and the exercise of the attributes of mercy and clemency—the pardoning power.

What sir, are our instructions with respect to the judiciary? Afe they not, that we take the little patronage it now has, the appointment of clerks, from it? That we make the judges as well as clerks elective? That we shorten the terms of their offices? That we make the incumbents dependent upon, and responsible to, the people?

And, what sir, are our instructions in reference to the legislative department; are they that we shall enlarge its powers, or make either of the others more dependant upon it? I think not sir. If I understand the requirements of the people they are that the legislature shall meet less frequently—that it shall confine its action to subjects of a general character and interest—that it shall be limited in its power to incur debts and to increase the taxes.

These sir, are the great measures for the accomplishment of which this convention was called, and sir, let us not disappoint the people by doing either more or less than they have required.

Here sir, I might stop, for I have said about all that I intended to say, and more, perhaps, than some may consider germane to the subject. But we are in committee of the whole, and great latitude in discussion is allowed; and as I do not know that a time more opportune to say something about impeachments will occur, I will say it now. Sir, whence did we derive this feature in our constitution? Other gentlemen, fresh from the perusal of English history, anticipating the proper time for such discussion, have descanted most eloquently upon the rise of British jurisprudence, the progress of judicial independence, and so forth; but sir, I was surprised that whilst gentlemen went minutely into these details, they entirely overlooked and lost sight of that highest and most august of all judicial tribunals, from which our court of impeachment is derived,—I mean, sir, the British house of lords, sitting as a high court of impeachment, and a court of final and last resort for causes as well civil as criminal. This too, when that identical provision in our proposed amendment is the subject under consideration. But sir, it is easy to account for this oversight. The engrossing subject with us is the mode of appointment, tenure of office, &c., of the judges of our ordinary tribunals of justice. The court of impeachment is an extraordinary one, and one, to my mind, wholly useless and unsuited to the genius and character of our people and that of our institutions. Sir, it may suit a proud old monarchy, such as that of Great Britain, to tolerate such an institution, and surely a sight more imposing, in the civil pursuits of life, is no where to be seen than that exhibited by the British house of lords sitting as a high court of impeachment. There, sir, you may behold the lords spiritual and temporal, with all the high dignitaries of the crown and parliament, arrayed in all their decorations and insignia of office—there you may see the house of commons, with its speaker at its head preferring charges—there you may see an ex-governor of India, arraigned as a criminal, and there you may hear the overpowering and enrapturing eloquence of a Burke, a Sheridan, a Windham, a Fox, and a Pitt. Sir, such an institution may be a proper appendage to a regal government, but it is wholly out of place in a plain democratic republic, where institutions are wanted for practical and useful purposes, and not for expense and show. But gentlemen look at me enquiringly, and seem to demand, how will you reach the high officers of government for official delinquencies? Reach them, sir, just as I would the lower officers!—And how is that, sir? By indictment and trial by jury in our superior courts of law. But there are impeachable offences which are not indictable at common law. But I presume these can be made so by statute. Under an impeachment the charges and specifications must be set out with clearness and certainty, and could not the same be done with equal clearness and certainty in an indictment? Sir, I prefer the indictment, because it offers some practicable way to reach these offenders, and insures a fair, cheap, and speedy trial. Sir, for political offences there is no accountability nor responsibility, save that to public opinion; but for crimes and misdemeanors, every officer in this government stands upon an equal footing with the private citizen, and all are amenable at the bar of the same tribunal, the ordinary courts of law. And sir, we are about to render our inferior officers so amenable for their official delinquencies; why then shall we make an exception, and provide a different tribunal for the trial of official delinquencies in superior officers? Sir, I see no good reason for such a distinction. Sir, what is the penalty attached to a conviction by impeachment? It is, I believe, removal from office and disqualification forever after. Could not this follow conviction by indictment as well? I think it could sir, and in addition, it might, in aggravated cases, be right to inflict upon the person convicted, death, confinement in the penitentiary, or other punishment. Sir, I see nothing in the prosecution by impeachment which is not attainable by indictment. I am, therefore, in favor of our omitting this article of impeachment and substituting indictment and trial by jury. Let conviction vacate the office, and let it be the duty of the acting executive, upon proper information of such a state of case, to issue a writ of election to fill the vacancy thus occasioned.

Still sir, in a certain class of cases, removal by address will be necessary; and I am in favor of it by a two-thirds vote, but not by that of a bare majority. When an incumbent has become unfit for the office by age, infirmity, or other cause not amounting to an indictable offence, removal by address would seem to be proper, and some provision for such contingencies should be made.

Mr. MAYES. I am not unaware of the fact that the patience of the committee is well nigh exhausted in the examination and investigation of the important and interesting question presented by the motion of the gentleman from Nelson. This fact together with another, the feeble state of my health, admonishes me that it is altogether proper even if I was otherwise inclined, that in any remarks I may submit, I should be as brief as the nature of the case and the circumstance, will permit.

I had thought indeed when I left my home that the convention would have but little difficulty in arranging and framing such a constitution as would accord with the notions and opinions of the people as expressed in the late August election. I thought indeed, and still entertain the same opinion, that all the important amendments desired by the people to the organic law had been so deliberately discussed by the people, and so clearly understood by their representatives, that we would have but little to do here other than to meet together and to throw into proper form the amendments desired to be made in the constitution by those over whom it is to have a mighty influence either for weal or for woe. I know of but two great and important questions discussed during the last summer, in reference to such amendments as should be made in the constitution. Those questions I know were discussed at length in the part of the country in which I live, and from my reading and the indications as exhibited by the newspapers of the country, they were the two great and important questions operating on the people at the time they called the convention. What were they? One was that the legislature met too frequently, and that out of that arose unnecessary and extravagant expenditures, which it was the great object of the people to curtail. Another great object as I then understood, and still understand, of the people in calling a convention was that there should be returned to them the power heretofore delegated to the executive—that of appointing the officers of the commonwealth. The people claimed the right to appoint these officers themselves directly at the ballot box. This question of slavery which has been so ably and eloquently discussed here never entered into the minds of the people as an important question until after it was determined to hold the convention. After that happened the question became an important one, and we have all come here, I doubt not, to express the voice of the people in the way of altering the constitution on this subject. Hence I remark I considered the discussion here on the subject of slavery as uncalled for, and under the circumstances as wholly and entirely improper. I will remark here again, that many have professed to come here in opposition to the open clause or specific amendment, and why? Because they say if the constitution is left in a position to be specifically amended, this question of slavery will agitate and distract the country from year to year. Yet we have here from day to day, in speaking upon and agitating that very question, done the very thing which we would arrest by a clause in the constitution. Hence I regard that we have in our action on that subject been somewhat contradictory to ourselves.

Now I think I am right when I say that the people of Kentucky require no such change in the constitution of the state, as the one proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson. I am not prepared to say that a bare majority of the legislature in all time to come shall have the right at its will and pleasure to remove from office the judges placed in office, not by the legislature, but by the vote of the people, given at the polls. Gentlemen have told us to beware, to look to our constituents, and I believe if I was to give a vote of that character it would be directly in opposition to the will of those who sent me here. The people desire no such change so far as I am informed, in the fundamental law, as the one contemplated in the amendment of the able, learned, and experienced gentleman from Nelson. I am not to be driven from any opinion on this subject, deliberately formed, by the repeated declaration that the people are capable of self government. It seems that whenever gentlemen desire to press a question and to carry it through they get up and admonish us that the people, the sovereign people of this country, are capable of self government. Sir, this is the lesson, I suppose to have been taught us all from infancy up to the present time—that the people of this free, this happy, and this glorious confederacy, are and ever have been capable of self government. Why, I have understood this to be one of the great and mighty principles for which our fathers in the days of the revolution, the times which tried the souls of men, and for which Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, and all the patriots of that day, contended. All power of right belongs to the people; and should be vested in and confided to them, yet the people themselves, in their fundamental law, desire such checks and guards as shall protect them against wrong and fraud, come from what source it may. This I understand to be the wish and desire of the people. Yet you tell me that you give to the people the right to elect a judge, and at the same time you say that a bare majority of the legislature, without cause, unless it be some political cause, shall have a right to remove the very judge from office elected by the people. I understand that it is contemplated, and I believe it will be done, that the State of Kentucky shall be laid out into four districts, in each of which the people there residing shall select one judge. I understand, also, that it is more than likely that the convention will determine that the state shall be laid out into twelve, or more or less, circuits, and that the people of each circuit shall have the power restored to them to determine who shall be judge in a particular circuit in which they live. Now, assuming that this change shall be made in the constitution, in the district in which I live, the people knowing the integrity, the fitness, and virtue of the individual living in that district, select him and say he shall take the scales of justice, and administer the justice of the land in that district.

Well, the legislature coming from every county in the state meets, and charges are preferred against that judge, or no charge is preferred; if you please he has been a partizan. The legislature, by a bare majority, tell the people of my district, "you have elected your judge; you know him; you have lived with him; you know he is a man of integrity, virtue, and honesty, and legal learning, yet the constitution leaves a majority of us to say that you shall not have the man you select." This would be the effect of it. "You have the right to elect the judge, and a large majority of the district may desire to continue him in office, but a majority of the representatives in the legislature say, you shall not retain him." Why, is it desired that the power of impeachment and the requirement that two thirds of the legislature shall be necessary to remove a judge from office shall be stricken from the constitution, because it is said the judges, where two thirds are required to remove them, are irresponsible to the people? Can it be seriously contended that a judge, elected and holding his station under the change in the constitution proposed by the committee on the court of appeals, will not be responsible to the people? Is not the responsibility seen at once, and will not this responsibility direct the people to remove any difficulty that might exist so far as the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson would be calculated to remove it? Would it not? But if the motion of the gentleman shall be rejected, and the constitution shall require two thirds of the legislature to remove a judge from office, the gentleman tells us he would not give a cent for the constitution. Nay, if you do what the people desired you to do when you were elected—if you say that the power to elect these officers shall be returned to them, the power to select the judge who is to administer the justice of the land in a district—if you say this, I would not give a cent for the constitution, says the gentleman. If you say that the legislature hereafter shall not convene oftener than once in two, three, or four years, still, says the gentleman, I would not give a cent for the constitution. If, again, you leave the proposition in the constitution in relation to slavery as it is, and say you consider the people desire it, still the gentleman says, I would not give a cent for the constitution. Why, these are the great changes, the important changes that it is desired by the people should be made in the organic law of Kentucky.

But the legislature, in the language of the gentleman, is defeated. The legislature of Kentucky constitutes the people of the state of Kentucky. Now, I do confess that to me—although I do not profess to have much learning—this is a new idea. But I would ask before I remark upon it, whether there be in any civilized government upon earth such a feature as the gentleman desires to incorporate in the constitution of Kentucky? I ask if there be in any one of the constitutions of the thirty states, forming this great confederacy, such a feature as the gentleman wishes to have inserted in the constitution of Kentucky? When, and where did he learn that the legislature constituted the people? If any department of the government has been more completely condemned and repudiated (to use a strong term) by the people than any other, it is this self same legislative department.—Why is it that the people desire that it should not be called together more than once in four years, or, at least, once in two years? Why, from the very fact that the people themselves have but little confidence in the discretion and wisdom of that branch of the government. It arises out of that. Why is it that the people desire that the legislature shall not have the right to run the state in debt, without first consulting the people in relation to the appropriations they may desire to make? Because, from experience, the best of all teachers, they have learned that the legislature, on the subject, is not to be relied upon. That is the reason. Why is it that the people desire that this constitution, for the framing of which we have been called together, shall provide for the protection and security of the common school fund of Kentucky? It is for the reason, and that alone, that they apprehend the legislative department of the government will squander and waste that fund which has been set apart, most sacredly, for the education of the poor as well as the rich. Sir, I know it to be the case, so far as the people I have the honor to represent are concerned. Last year, in my county, a large majority was given in opposition to the tax of two cents for common school purposes. Why was it? Simply because they had no faith in the legislative department of the government, and believed they would divert the tax to another purpose. They approved of the common school system, and saw the necessity of education. They know that the very existence and perpetuity of the free institutions of this country depend upon the virtue and intelligence of the people; but say they, "we have no confidence in the representatives of the people." Not that they have no confidence in the people; they tell you they have all confidence in the people. But they say those men we sometimes elect, are not the people, and do that which the people repudiate and condemn. The experience of every man shows this to be true. We all know it to be true. Now, the gentleman from Kenton was right; experience teaches us that he was, although my friend from Henry repudiated it in reference to the democracy, in relation to the principles of party action. The principle of action spoken of by the gentlemen applies to one party as well as another when in power. We may try to bear it off. We may felicitate ourselves that one party in power will not remove from office those opposed to that party, but every day's experience proves to us that when one party is in power, those in office, holding different politics, must give way. Give the legislature the power to remove the judges, and I care not whether the whig or democratic party is in power, human nature is the same in both. A judge, in a time of high party excitement, must bow and cringe at the feet of the legislative department, if they would keep their places. I believe that no gentleman, legally qualified, and having that virtue and integrity so essential to the bench, and possessing one particle of self-respect, if the motion of the gentleman from Nelson succeeds and becomes part and parcel of the constitution, would ever go upon the bench. No, sir. No man who respected his own standing, who regarded the peace and happiness of the community in which he lived, or the reputation of his family and his friends, would place himself in a position so unenviable. I take office from the hands of the people; the district elects me a judge, and am I to be removed from office by the vote of a bare majority of their representatives? Whether it be for good causes or not, let him be removed, and there is a plague spot, a stain, a disgrace, fixed upon his reputation for all time to come. And no man having self-respect would, as I conceive, receive office so trammelled.

I was very much pleased with the gentleman from Henry, and with a good part of his speech, but I do think he rather contradicted himself. But he is not like an individual who tells you, if he does not succeed in a motion, he will go against the constitution. He is an advocate of constitutional reform for the sake of constitutional reform, and if he can better the constitution in any one particular, he will go for the new constitution heart and hand, although all the little notions he may entertain were not adopted in it. This, I conceive to be the right spirit, which the people intended should operate upon all of us when they sent us here to frame a new constitution. Why do the people in one county believe that they are going to get a constitution made exactly as they would have it? Do they not know it must be built up, and framed upon that principle of mutual concession so essential to framing a basis for any government. I shall be with the gentleman, if any essential change, which is desired by the people in their organic law, be made, whether the one particularly favored by the people I represent or not. I go for the new constitution, on the ground that the condition of the people will be bettered, and that one improvement, at least, on the subject of government, the most important subject that relates to mankind, has been made. I am for having the power returned to the people to elect their officers. I will sign and vote for the constitution, if that power be refused, and the legislative department shall be regulated as the people desire; and I will use what little influence I may have to induce others to go with me. I think with the gentleman from Henry, and his very countenance is an index of his honesty on another subject, and that is, that it was made manifest during the discussion of this subject, that the votes in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, as indicated in this house, will be few and far between. I think they should be few and far between, for if we desire to sap, and blast, and ruin the very foundations of the government under which we live, it does seem to me that we could not more effectually do it than by incorporating in the constitution the feature proposed by the gentleman from Nelson.

One word in reference to a remark of the gentleman from Mason. It seems the gentleman has lived in different states. He tells us he has lived in a state where the legislature by joint vote are permitted to determine who shall administer the law; and I was surprised to hear the gentleman say it was a happy mode. Of all the modes presented to my mind, that by joint vote of the two houses of the legislature is the most objectionable. It is, in my opinion, obnoxious to the most serious and powerful objections. I believe that the people are capable of electing persons who will discharge the duties of judge with ability and fidelity. Where they have an opportunity to know the individual, the appointment will be a good one; they will select such persons as are worthy to be entrusted with the important interests which must necessarily be confided to a judge.

Now I merely desire to state why I object to the principle which is recommended by the gentleman from Mason.

The people of the county where I live, desire by their free suffrages to call in some man to act as judge; but you provide by your constitution that he shall be elected by joint ballot of the legislature. What follows? I desire to have a certain man elected. A member of the legislature from another county, desires to secure the election of a particular individual to a similar office in his county. He says to me you go for my man and I will go for yours. If there is no judge to be appointed in his county there may be some object for which he desires an appropriation of money. The result is the same. We enter into an alliance for mutual support and assistance. No sir, it is one of the most corrupt modes by which appointments can be made; one of the very worst systems in my opinion, that could be adopted in any country. The stream of justice should be kept pure and unadulterated. The people themselves whose interests are so deeply concerned should be the appointing power. They are interested in having the best men that can be selected for judges, and they will take care to select such.

Well, sir, there is another point connected with the subject under consideration, to which I will for a moment advert. I think we were admonished the other day that at the proper time a motion would be made to strike out of this report the feature which requires that some test of qualification shall be required of those who present themselves for election to the office of judge. The propriety of such a provision has been already adverted to by some gentlemen who have taken part in this discussion; and for myself, sir, I give notice now, that I am in favor of it. I design to go for protecting the people against imposition and fraud. No man should receive the appointment of judge who is not learned in the law, and who is not in all respects properly qualified to discharge the duties appertaining to the office. Being learned in the law is, I apprehend, a very essential qualification, and there ought to be some mode of determining this point, beyond the mere prima facie evidence that you have seen him engaged in the practice of the law. It must be evident to gentlemen that it is desirable that the candidate for judgeship should be able to certify the electors of his qualifications. This must strike gentlemen as being necessary and proper for the safety of the community, that the people may know into whose hands their interests are to be intrusted.

Gentlemen agree that there ought to be a certain age fixed at which a man may be elevated to the bench; and another requirement should be a certain number of years' practice at the bar before he is made eligible. But, gentlemen say the people are capable of self-government, and in consequence of the people being capable of self-government, no qualification is necessary to be fixed for those who are to hold office under appointment by the people. Without the insertion of these provisions, I think gentlemen will find that their constituents will not be satisfied. I told the people in the county where I live that if I should be elected to the convention I should be in favor of these tests of qualification, in reference to the judges, and also in reference to the clerks of courts. But when a man presents himself before the people for the station of judge, the mere presentation of a certificate will not be sufficient evidence of his qualification. It is a fact that is well known that there was a time when in Tennessee there was no test, I believe, required on the part of a candidate for a clerkship. Well, sir, a fact came under my own observation in relation to the conduct of a clerk—it may be an extreme case, but still many such cases have no doubt transpired—which shows most conclusively how far we may be from shielding and protecting the rights of those whom the gentleman so fondly calls the people, if we adopt this constitution, and permit A. B. or C. D. whether ten years of age or older, whether instructed in the duties of the office or not, to be elected clerk. Under such a system the man who can best flatter the people is the man who will be most successful. He will be certain to be elected without any test or qualification. This will be but opening the door for the demagogue—the man who loves himself better than he loves the dear people.

I had occasion to call for the record of one of the counties of Tennessee; I sent to the clerk of that county for a copy. What think you the clerk did? Instead of sending a copy of the record, he was so well qualified for the high station he occupied, he was so well informed of his duties, that instead of the record he sent an entirely different document. That clerk was elected under this system, of which I have spoken, without test of qualification, or fitness for office. And I will tell you how it happened that he was elected. I am but a poor historian, but I will give you an outline of the case. There was a war commencing in Florida; this man started for the war, but he did not get there. The circumstance of his having started, however, gave him so much popularity that they made him clerk. Why, the very rights of the people themselves depend upon the qualifications of the public officers. The people are capable of judging of the qualification and fitness of candidates for office, when they have the means within their power; but if you withhold from the people the means of judging, it cannot be expected that they will be able to make suitable selections. How, in the name of common sense, can the people elect a proper officer, unless they have the means of judging of his qualifications? Will they vote for a man because he happens to belong to one party or another? Very likely they might in such a case as that of the clerk of the court in Tennessee, to whom I have referred, who had started for the Florida war, and thus had acquired a degree of popularity.

But it is the duty of this convention to provide the means of judging of the qualification and fitness of candidates for office. The people are not to be deceived by flattery, by being told they are capable of self-government. That is an axiom, of the truth of which they are well satisfied. The feature which the committee desire to have retained in the constitution, is the very guard which the people want. Strike that feature from the constitution, and they will have no guard, no security, for the proper discharge of the duties of the judicial officer. It is that feature which they desire should be retained, so far as I am acquainted with the wishes of the people.

If the legislature are the people, why may we not with equal propriety, say that the judges are the people? The members of the legislature, according to my apprehension, are agents of the people, and they are agents who frequently abuse their trust. The judges, over whom the legislature is to sit as a kind of inquisition, the judges themselves, are the agents of the people also. Let the people elect them. Let the people elect every officer, from the judge of the court of appeals, or from the executive down to a constable. Every officer of the government is an agent of the people. Does it follow that he is the people? But gentlemen tell me that a majority of the legislature ought to have the right to determine for every district in the state, who shall be judge, and who shall not. To this proposition I can never agree.

Mr. TRIPLET. I do not rise to make a speech, but I want the ear, for a moment or two, of the honorable delegate from the county of Nelson, and I also, for a very few moments, desire the attention of the members of this convention, and your own. There are two propositions that were made by the gentleman from Nelson, and provided such explanations are given by him, as I have no doubt he is fully capable of giving, and such promises are made by him, as he is fully capable of complying with;

if these explanations and promises are given to myself and the committee, I shall vote for the first proposition; without them I shall not vote for it, and I believe the committee will not.—For the second proposition I shall not vote, on any account whatever, for the reasons which have been given by gentlemen who have participated in this discussion, which reasons I will not repeat, because it is not worth while to repeat what has been better said by others. But as no gentleman has turned his attention to the first proposition, I desire to advert to it for a moment, for I consider it of the utmost importance. It establishes a principle which I am in favor of, if we can carry through the whole constitution. But I am not willing, and I do not believe that a solitary member of this committee is willing, to adopt that principle in this particular place, unless it can be carried through the whole constitution. We are all aware that it is necessary that we should be extremely careful that all the parts of the constitution shall harmonize—that they shall not only fit well together, but work well together, and that no one part of the machinery shall conflict with another. The proposition to which I now refer, is that for striking out the words, “which shall not be sufficient ground for impeachment.” If it be intended to retain in the new constitution the whole of the fifth article of the old constitution, these words ought to be stricken out. I see around me several gentlemen who were members of the old legislature. The gentleman from Henry is one of them, and the gentleman from Nelson, Mr. Hardin, is another. The first gentleman has declared that he has travelled in his literary researches as far as Dilworth, and the other gentleman has advanced as far as words of three syllables; but these gentlemen, if they have not read their political spelling book, have at least read the book of mankind, and they know what it is that the people expect. They know, or ought to know, that every species of special pleading should be avoided in a document of this kind—that it is necessary that we should make our meaning clear. I want to leave as little as possible for legislative or judicial construction. What we do I want to do so plainly that the different departments of the government may not only read it as they run, but understand it well and easily. Now, leave this clause as it stands, without striking out the words referred to, and this question will occur frequently.—There is a certain class of acts which amount to malfeasance, others to misfeasance, and others to nonfeasance in office. A man has done a particular thing that he ought not to do, or he has omitted to do a thing he ought to do, about which acts there may be cavilling as to whether they fall under the class of cases to which impeachment applies, or whether they come under that of address. I know on one occasion such a question saved a man from being turned out of office. It opens a door by which men of tender consciences evade the responsibility of voting directly upon the question of a man's culpability. It raises a doubt by which men of strong consciences or no consciences at all, can escape the consequences of their misdeeds. To put it in legal phrase, which will be intelligible to every body, they demur to the case set out on the motion for the address, on this ground—that it is not cause for address, but cause for impeachment, and that you must not put it in the form of an address. Why? Because it is a higher, a worse, a blacker crime than that which, by the constitution of the state, is authorized to be made cause of removal by address.

I acknowledge sir, that this is a very strange reason, and it would be a strange reason to an undisciplined mind; but the greater should always include the less, and if the judge had committed treason, larceny, or arson, or any capital offence, and the moral sense of the community was satisfied of his guilt, yet one of your men of tender conscience may say it is not good cause for removal by address. I want to get rid of this objection. Gentlemen can imagine a thousand different cases in which this objection might be raised. If you think proper to give the power of impeachment, put in the necessary words for that purpose and you will have all that I aim at, and that is, when a civil officer of the government has been guilty of such high crimes and misdemeanors as to require impeachment, impeach him if you think proper, but the impeachment of a civil officer has in this country become almost unnecessary, and indeed almost impracticable. If a judge fail to attend court for such a length of time as to make it evident to the legislature that his conduct amounts to nonfeasance in office, it might be cause for impeachment, provided sickness or other legitimate reasons for such absence be not proven; but you may remove him by address, although his absence had been occasioned by sickness or physical disability. Retain then the 5th article of the old constitution, and add to it, and every evil or inconvenience that has been predicated will be avoided. I cannot agree to go so far, as to strike out the two-thirds principle; but without going into that question at present, I will only ask the gentleman from Nelson, when he comes to reply to the arguments that have been advanced against his proposition, to answer this solitary question: was not the two thirds principle originally inserted in the constitution of this State, and in the constitution of the United States, as a matter of compromise between requiring the verdict of the whole jury to decide the facts on one side, and the majority of the court to decide the law on the other, and whether when the legislature meets and has to remove a man by address, they are not occupying the position of both a jury to decide the facts, and the court to decide the law,—whether this principle was not put in as a compromise in consequence of the mixture of the character of the court, having to decide touching the law and the facts—between the two extremes, of requiring only a bare majority of the court on one side and the whole of the jury on the other? Has it not worked well? Tell me a solitary instance where it has failed upon address, although gentlemen can find a hundred instances where it has failed by impeachment. There is the point. I am in favor of striking out the words proposed to be stricken out.

I am averse to detaining the committee longer, for there are many gentlemen who are desirous of giving their views, and who seem to think our sittings are too brief. My own opinion is that we would get along faster, if we were to allow the committees to do more work.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I will state briefly what the views of the committee were. They, in the first place, believed differently from the gentleman from Daviess, that no officer should be removed by address or impeachment upon mere rumor. I understand the gentleman to state that cases might arise, cases of high crimes and misdemeanors, and although the legislature may be satisfied that the crimes were committed, yet in the absence of direct proof of the fact the party cannot be removed.

Mr. TRIPLETT. As this is a matter of some importance, I wish it to be clearly understood. What I wish to know is, whether it is intended by the committee that an officer shall be removed for something which is not a fact to be proved by testimony. If this be the intention, let it be done; but if you intend to remove the judge upon facts that require the testimony of witnesses, in the name of Heaven go through with the address in the same manner as you would with an impeachment. Give the accused notice in writing of all the facts you intend to prove against him. Let him be heard at the bar by himself or counsel and let him produce witnesses for his defence. Give him the benefit of all the means of defence when you propose to remove him by address, the same as you would if the form of proceeding was by impeachment. I desire to ask both the gentlemen from Nelson, one as the mover of the amendment, and the other as chairman of the committee, whether if you retain the fifth article, you intend to grant to the judge under the address all the means of defence that he would be entitled to under impeachment. If you do this, you will have made a most salutary reform.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I think that I did not misunderstand my honorable friend. The object of impeachment is not only to get clear of the officer, but also to disqualify him for the future from holding office in the community. The committee did not design, in giving the right to the legislature to remove by address, requiring the usual number—two thirds—to lessen the rights of the accused or to enlarge the privileges of the accuser—the commonwealth. That no man should be removed unless there be sufficient proof of the facts alleged against him, nor shall he be removed upon a charge which is but partly proved. If I understand my honorable friend, his objection was, that for any offence which was punishable by impeachment, the triers of that impeachment, when called to exercise their functions under the solemnity of an oath recently administered, would, like a jury, require proof before they would convict the individual. But he may be guilty, says the gentleman, and there may not be sufficient proof to satisfy a court, or the constituted tribunal, yet enough to satisfy the minds of the people, and that you will convict him upon mere rumor propagated by his enemies. That is the gentleman's position if I understand it. The gentleman divides the offences for which officers may be removed into two classes—into such as are mala in se, and such as do not amount to crimes. It is upon this latter class that the removing power by address is intended to operate, and in cases of trials or misdemeanors, the mode of proceeding is by impeachment, therefore I was in favor of retaining the impeaching power.

Mr. TRIPLETT. Sir, although I know there is an impropriety in this conversational mode of debate, yet I must be excused for a single moment. No man supposes that it was intended that an officer should be tried without an oath on the part of those who try him, and notice of the accusation that is made against him. I cannot believe that my honorable friend from Nelson is unable to comprehend the distinction that I take. Suppose a judge gives a decision which is so perfectly absurd, that you see he is incompetent to discharge the duties of his station, there you want no testimony to prove the fact. It is matter of record. But when you accuse him of felony, when you accuse him of any crime, then it is necessary not only that you give him notice of the accusation, but that the senate shall be sworn as well as the lower house. All these things might confuse the minds of a jury, but they cannot confuse this house. There is a distinctness of understanding on the part of gentlemen around me, which convinces me that they cannot be confused. Why then go another step and say they shall be newly sworn? Swear them every morning if you wish. That does not touch the point of my argument. This thing of removing men by address is a serious matter, but it is one which becomes necessary sometimes, and shall we not take the trouble to lay down the necessary preliminaries so that it may be done correctly? It is only writing a few lines further, and saying at the bottom of a paragraph, that each house when sitting and adjudicating upon an address shall be sworn, and prescribe the form of oath. I think the proposition made by the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin,) ought to succeed, provided it is particularly guarded, and I leave in his able hands the duty of properly guarding it.

Mr. HARDIN. Were it not that an expectation is entertained in this house that I should make some reply to what has been said in opposition to the proposition which I made, I would not address the house now or at any other time on this question, because I discover, sir, that I am in what may be called a very small minority, and it is somewhat unpleasant to travel in such company. I rise, however, rather for the purpose of disabusing myself from some remarks, though not of a personal character, and not for the purpose of making a set speech. Before I do that, I will make this preliminary remark, that for five years back I have been exceedingly anxious for the call of a convention. I discovered that great abuses had crept into our government—very great abuses—especially in the appointing power, and that in the language of Jefferson, "power is always stealing away from the many to the few," and that it has been emphatically stealing away from the people of Kentucky; and like boys playing "cat or corner ball," when the ball is lost they stop and cry out "lost ball." I was ready, for one to stop legislating and cry out "lost ball." One great object that I had in view, in advocating the call of a convention, I felicitate myself will be fully attained, and that is that the appointing power will be restored to the people where it originally and of right belongs. When I attain that, I will vote for almost any thing that this house may be disposed to insert in the constitution. I did not like from the start the proposition that is now before this committee, and I hope I may be indulged while I recapitulate the new and substantial provisions contained therein, and as I go along I will point out some of the objections that I have to them. The first principle is that the judges shall be elected by the people; I heartily go for that. The next proposition is substantially, that the judges shall not be removed by address in any case that is the subject of impeachment. I am rather opposed to that, but not particularly wedded to my opinion. The next great principle is, that it shall require a vote of two thirds to remove a judge. Well, sir, I am against that, as I intimated to this house a week or two ago; yet that would not be a sine qua non with me, if I could get some other alterations made. I want—whether it be a majority or two thirds of the legislature, that shall have power to remove a judge—that the passage of the resolution shall be ipso facto, the removal of the judge, and that the governor shall have no hand in it afterwards; because if we were to pass a resolution, unless there was some provision of that kind inserted, he would veto it, and there is no provision by which we can pass the resolution, his veto notwithstanding. It will be remembered by delegates in this house that the legislature of Pennsylvania attempted to address a judge out, and the words employed in their constitution were, "the governor may remove." The legislature passed the resolution by a large majority of both houses and laid it before the governor. He refused to remove the individual, and the legislature entered upon the labor of expostulation. They contended that the word "may" was synonymous in the sense in which it was used in that place with "shall." The governor returned this insolent answer: "You say the word 'may' means 'shall'; I say it means 'I will not.'" He then went on and said, "You do those things which you ought not to do, and you leave undone those things which you ought to do, and there is no health in you." That was the language of the governor of Pennsylvania.

I am in favor, whether you require a vote of two thirds or three fifths or a bare majority, of removing the individual without the intervention of the governor at all. The governor has no hand in the election of a judge, except by his vote as a private individual, and I am not for applying to him, as governor, to sanction what the legislature has done.

Well sir, I am willing that the eight years principle shall be retained in the bill, provided you introduce in it the principle of ineligibility after that time. If they are to be re-eligible, let their terms be as in Mississippi, for but four years; and let the re-eligibility only continue for two terms. But I would prefer a term of eight years, with ineligibility for at least four, five, six, or eight years more.

I do not know that the court of appeals would be placed in a position in which they may exercise any undue influence upon the voters. But take the circuit courts—and I imagine that we are to have twelve judicial districts, embracing perhaps eight or ten counties each, in which may be included some fourteen or fifteen thousand voters—and imagine to yourself a judge on the bench, who is looking, if you please, for a re-election. Imagine to yourself that he has the life of some member of a powerful and influential family in his hands, or the liberties of another member of a family of that description—and he may have a thousand cases of that kind before him—and I ask you if that is not a lever of power that cannot be resisted for one moment? What lawyer in the state can come in competition with him? None, none sir! I am in favor of a man, when he comes before the people, coming without the black cloak of a judge upon him. I am opposed to re-eligibility, and I want to say to this house, that if I could see the ineligibility principle carried out in this bill, with some other alterations, I would forego the proposition that I now make. I am making these propositions, because, take this bill as a whole, I do not like its provisions. I do not like the proposition for four judges. I have no recollection that we ever had four judges, except in that celebrated court called the new court; and I recollect very well that when I took the stump against that famous court, of all the weapons that I used that was the most powerful, except that of John Trimble's woman's saddle which he put in the mortgage. I have a deep-rooted prejudice against four judges, and I will state a case. The circuit judge, if you please, decides a certain principle of law. It comes up to the court of appeals. The four judges stand two to two in their opinions, and the decision below is sustained, because they are equally divided. Well, a case comes up in which the circuit judge has taken an opposite opinion; the court is divided and so it stands. That is what we call a beautiful uniformity of decision. Give us then a number that can agree; take three, five, seven, nine, or eleven, if you want to give us a number that can never be equally divided; but three judges have done our business very well for the last twenty or thirty years, I believe. I have but little fault to find with the court of appeals, and it was a fault that we all find, namely, that the governor was the appointing power. I want to give it to the people. Next, I always thought there was something of indecent hurry and haste in the manner in which these judges discharge their business. The higher court of the state should do its business with something like a measured gravity and dignity; yet their whole business has been accomplished in one hundred days of one year. And the moment they accomplish it they hurry off to accomplish other business—some to lecture on law, some to do one thing and some another. I do not know that I shall offer an amendment, or that it is practicable to make any alteration on that point. I am against four judges, because it will add to the expenses of the court some $1500, at least—$2000 if we fix the salary at that sum.

I am against branching the court. Branching the court will make it necessary to have four clerks, four clerk's offices, four clerk's records, four different sets of all the machinery attending the court. That will swell the expenses, perhaps, taking all together, some $5000. But I have an objection still stronger. Where are you to locate these four branches? If you leave it to the legislature, it will be a bone of contention eternally. And when they are located, it will perhaps be in places where there are not to be found five law books. At all events they may be located at places where full and competent libraries for the court of appeals cannot be obtained. Well how many days will these branches have to sit? And how many terms are they to hold? Will they have four terms? If so, how many weeks and days will they sit at each? Say eight weeks, and I will soon show you that that will not do. There will be four clerks, four sets of records, four clerk's offices, at the expense of the state; there will also be four men to wait on the court, four men to make the fires, and God knows how much additional machinery will be required in these courts. But the great objection is this—will they in any term in the year be able to do the business? Some gentlemen tell you that if you divide the business of the court of appeals into four parts the judges can do the business. But do you not know, and I appeal to every lawyer in this house, that if you branch it the business will be doubled and trebled. Did you ever see a neighborhood where there was no court house within twenty miles? How peaceable, and quiet, and civilly disposed towards each other they were. Make a new county and bring a court house to their doors, and every man begins to pull his neighbors hair the wrong way, directly in the shape of a law suit. Bring up a branch to any place, and I can safely say that I can point out some five lawyers that can take more business to the court than it can do in that part of the year allotted to it. In Mississippi—I went there in 1837 and 1838 with a view of practicing there—it was known that that was the case, and they presented me with a set of rules to sign; and it was a regulation of fees, such as a per centage for collecting, and a half per cent. for getting continuances. Now a great deal of the business will be exactly of this kind. You double and treble the business, and throw into the court, where it only sits once a year, so much that the court will soon get behind hand. It will soon be found that the great business of the lawyers will be to get the fees by continuances.

I recollect that when I practised in Green, a very worthy lawyer, Sam Brents, the half of whose business was getting continuances, of which he obtained the fees; and I have known him, for the purpose of getting a continuance, to speak four hours on the point, whether at the court was equal to in the court. I am against this proposition; and I am against the proposition that we shall vote for these judges by ballot. I am in favor of the viva voce vote for every officer in this commonwealth; and I do not subscribe to the reasons suggested by my colleague, that the judges ought not to know who voted for them, lest they may wreak their vengeance upon the men who voted against them. If that be the case, the public feeling in this country is in a most deplorable condition, to say the least. But if a judge wants to play that game, cannot he very easily find out who voted against him? The gentleman and myself can go into a crowd, and without asking a man, but by merely shaking hands with him, we can tell whether he will vote for or against us. A candidate has a hundred ways by which he can find it out. I recollect when I run for congress in 1835, I met a very worthy man on the Sunday evening before the election; he shook hands with me, and said where are you going? I am going to Taylorsville, said I. Are you going to be there tomorrow, while the election is going on? I answered yes. I vote at Bloomfield, he added. Yes, said I; and I hope you will take all your friends with you, and get them to vote for me. A week or two afterwards, I again met him, and he said to me, how did you know that I was going to vote for you? Just from the manner in which you enquired where I was going. I knew you felt interested in my locality the first day of the election, and that was enough for me. But if I cannot ascertain it in that way, it would be very easy for me to ask one man to enquire from another, how he voted, and thus I can soon find out. But I will not indulge the opinion that in this country men will be afraid to vote, and to avow their sentiments, for fear of the wrath and indignation of the judge; and I am unwilling to believe that the judge would exercise it. When I come up to vote, I am not to look at the judge through a smoked glass, as they do at the sun, when it is about to be eclipsed. We are not to have any man here that we are afraid to look upon. My worthy colleague well knows that the people are not afraid to vote. We have been candidates too often not to know that our best friends, who do not agree with us, will come and vote against us, and look us fairly in the face, and be friends with us afterwards. In counties where there are large landholders—men holding perhaps half a county—there may be tenants that it may be necessary to screen from the wrath and indignation of their landlord, when he knows how they vote. In counties too, where there are large manufacturing establishments, and where a man can control the votes of a thousand operatives, it may be necessary to protect them; but in this country, above all others in the world, we ought to be the last people afraid to vote. The first objection which I made, was, as pointed out by my worthy friend from Daviess, (Mr. Triplett.)

If the gentleman will turn to our constitution, he will see that it is only a misdemeanor in office, that is a ground of impeachment under our state constitution. But in the constitution of the United States, the power of impeachment extends beyond that:

"ART. 2, SEC. 4. The President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office, on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

A man in the government of the United States may be impeached for treason, and felony, and other high crimes, and misdemeanors, that remove him from office. When you come to the State of Kentucky, it is only upon misdemeanor in office, as to the court of appeals. And when it comes to a justice of the peace, they can be removed by impeachment for any offence, or they can be addressed out:

"ART. 5, SEC. 3. The governor and all civil officers shall be liable to impeachment for any 'misdemeanor in office; but judgment in such cases shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification from any office of honor, trust, or profit, under this commonwealth; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to indictment, trial, and punishment according to law."

Any thing he can be impeached for he can be removed for; but a justice of the court of appeals cannot be removed unless for misbehaviour in office. A judge of the supreme court can be removed by impeachment, for bribery and other high crimes and misdemeanors which do not relate to the office. A judge of our supreme court can only be removed for misbehaviour in office by impeachment—a justice of the peace for all the catalogue of offences that can be committed by man for which he would be worthy of removal. I see no reason in the world why there should be that difference. If a man is guilty of misbehaviour in office, why not give the opportunity to address him out? Say he is guilty of gross oppression or tyranny in office, are we to get at him in no way except by impeachment? How many ten thousands of oppressions and misbehaviours are there of which a judge may be guilty; and I ask if there is no way to reach him but by impeachment? What is an impeachment? Who starts an impeachment? Why some man in the country; or an address may be prepared and carried on by some member of the legislature. We know, as a matter of experience, that the resort to impeachment is impracticable. The people are cowed and afraid to undertake it. I recollect once that some of the officers of the banks in the District of Columbia pointed out to me how Mr. Dallas, then Secretary of the Treasury, had swindled the government, on a loan, in favor of his son-in-law, Bache, out of $1,250,000. They showed me the book where his son-in-law had subscribed for or bought up $13,000 at eighty seven and a half cents on the hundred for stock—for that was the price during the war. And he had been permitted to pay in the whole ten millions in that way; although at the time he paid it in the war had closed, and the stock had risen to par, enabling him to realize twelve and a half per cent. on the ten million loan. This I say they pointed out to me, and it is in a book which I will never part with in the world. I pointed it out to Mr. Randolph and he attacked Mr. Dallas. Some gentleman from the other side of the house cried impeach him, and Randolph replied, I once tried that against that corrupt Judge Chase and it would not do, and I will try it no more. And then he said this—When I was a boy I read some book where the rats held a great convention to devise the ways and means to get clear of the cat, of whom they stood in fear. At last they agreed to put a bell round the cat's neck, but when they came to the last question—which rat would put the bell on the cat—there was none found willing to do it, and the whole business fell through. No rat could be found to bell the cat. And so it would be with impeachments. Burke, Fox, and Sheridan, tried to bell the cat, Warren Hastings, for a series of oppressions unparalleled in the history of the world, but they failed after a trial of fourteen years. The ministry protected him—the Queen took his wife by the hand to her crowded levees and parties—and the King protected him and the prosecution failed. Since then an impeachment in the House of Lords, has been considered a perfect mockery. I look upon the whole doctrine of impeachments as a perfect mockery and insult upon the people. Where is the man that was ever impeached out? You (pointing to Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) tried it with Judge Peck—you, and others of as great talent, tried it and failed by one vote. You know, as far as you are concerned, that it is a mockery. You labored in such a way as to entitle you to great credit, and so did your colleagues in the house of representatives, but they all failed. Chase was one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States at the time that John Adams was in office, and congress with his aid and assent passed the Alien and Sedition laws, which roused the indignation of the people of the United States in all its length and breadth. Chase was the man who played the same part to John Adams the elder, that the infamous Judge Jeffries did to James II precisely. They were a pair that were worthy of each other, and they were as tyrannical a pair as were ever on the bench in the world. The people of the United States, however, with one united voice nearly, hurled John Adams from the presidential chair and put Jefferson into it. But the whole federal senators remained, and when Chase was impeached for his misbehaviour in office, and for all his tyrannies and course of oppression, in office, the federalists attended to a man. If you were ever in congress at the time you know how they sat. I had the misfortune or good fortune to be there during a little of the time. There they sat on one side of the house, the federalists dressed as the Duke of Wellington or the Marquis of Whitcask, or any other distinguished nobleman, with their heads all powdered. On the other side were the republicans in their plain clothes and no powder. On the trial of Chase the fine dressed federal senators, to the number of fifteen, against nineteen of the finest republicans the world ever saw, saved that old tyrant; and that as Randolph said, was enough for him. While nineteen republicans voted against Chase, fifteen old federalists, in their fine clothes and powdered heads, voted for him because he had been serving their cause during the administration of Adams, and they kept him on the bench. That is what they called obedience to public sentiment I suppose. They knew that four fifths of the whole nation were republicans at the time; but those federalists, who were elected during the reign of Adams, held their seats, with some additions from the New England states; and those fifteen saved him. I consider impeachments of no use at all. There is only a procrastination and expense in it. Nobody will undertake it, and the only remedy is an address to both houses.

Well how is an impeachment tried? There are sixty senators; and of these, thirty one is a quorum. Two thirds of that number is all that is necessary to convict a man—that is twenty one. But how is an impeachment tried in the Senate here? There are thirty eight senators, of whom twenty is a quorum, and two thirds of that number is fourteen and that fourteen may convict. Now fourteen is six less than my amendment presents to this house.

If an address of the majority prevails, it will be, if the number should remain as it now is, twenty senators and fifty one representatives. By impeachment fourteen senators have the power to remove a man. The constitution is based on that theory. I know that in common, and in perhaps ninety nine cases out of a hundred the whole senate will be full; but the government is predicated on the theory that fourteen senators out of thirty eight can break a governor if they choose.

Now what is this dangerous proposition that has excited so much opposition? From every quarter of this house has opposition sprung and all seem to be astonished that I have the temerity—I had almost said the audacity—to bring it forward.

What is the proposition? If we are to have one hundred members in one house, fifty one which is a clear majority of all elected, with all absentees counted against them, will be all that is necessary. If the senate consists of thirty eight as at present, then twenty will be all that is necessary in that body. But there must be twenty, because the proposition is that a majority of each house, which means a majority of all the members to which it is entitled, shall be required. Then where is the difference between us? You say two thirds, that is twenty six senators and sixty seven representatives. We on our part, the small band that went to Thermopylae, and will I hope, again, if we can bring it before the people, say twenty in one house and fifty one in another. You say twenty six in one house and sixty seven in the other. And after that, you meet the argument precisely in the same way, by crying out revolution, revolution, as Cromwell did, when he cried out Sir Harry Vane, save me from Sir Harry Vane. Is there any thing more revolutionary in our proposition than in yours? The only difference in the two propositions is in regard to these numbers, differing to the number of six in one house and sixteen in the other.

Gentlemen ask, shall the judiciary be at the mercy of the legislative department. Well who is to try the case, if it takes two-thirds? The same body? The same body precisely. If the proposition was to have a different department of government to try, then the gentleman's argument would be sound; but when it is the same department, the legislative department, we see that the difference is in the number only, which is necessary to convict. I ask now is it more revolutionary with us than with you? How is it to oppress the judiciary by the legislature in one case more than in the other? Gentlemen say that the Polish manner will be taken, deciding that one vote is a sufficient negative, till one man can cut off a member's head. There is then, nothing in the proposition to alarm any body. It is only a question (not that another department, but the same department shall try) whether it shall be twenty in one house and fifty one in the other, or twenty six in one house and sixty seven in the other. If our doctrine is revolutionary so is yours, gentlemen. If our doctrine is that the legislative department shall be called on to decide on the judiciary, so is yours. It is only in reference to number that we differ. I want the legislature, the senate, and the house of representatives, to take the attitude of a high court of judicature, and hence I do not want the governor to have any connection with it or any veto upon their action. I want to have it possess the dignity and the solemnity so far as practicable, of a high court of judicature, by giving to the accused the right of being heard by himself and counsel, that it shall not be a mere hasty thing, as was caught up against Judge Clarke under the excitement of the moment. But there shall be two branches acting separately, and they shall assume the high character of a court of adjudication, and the governor shall have no hand in it, but the accused may be heard by himself and counsel. I ask gentlemen, are not our judges to be responsible to the people in some way? Do you mean to make them entirely irresponsible? If responsible, how are they to be? Can the people come here, one hundred and fifty five thousand voters, according to the census, in this or any other place to try and remove a judge by impeachment? You must make the judges responsible through some agents that they may designate. Whom will the people designate? Is it to be the governor? God forbid! Who then? To the people through the senate by impeachment; the whole people of Kentucky through their representatives, taking both houses together. Who represents the people more immediately than any other? You say the governor does. Yes he does. Who ought to do it? The senate and house of representatives, who come immediately from the people, from one end of the state to the other, from the mouth of Big Sanday to Mills' Point, and from Louisville to Cumberland Gap. I say there cannot be a tribunal better selected, more proper, and more amenable to the people than the house of representatives and the senate.

We must adopt that system. We are obliged to make them responsible to the people in some shape. They cannot be responsible to the people individually, and therefore they must be responsible to their agents, and who so proper as the senate and house of representatives? Away then with the argument that you put them at the mercy of the legislative department. A few days since a gentleman gave us an instance of the new court, and perhaps he will give us another of Judge Clarke. That occurrence has happened once since the formation of the government in 1792, but I hope and trust in God it will never happen again. A bad course of legislation in 1819, by chartering a set of independent banks, and thus flooding this country with paper, produced an inordinate spirit of speculation, and got the whole state into debt. You had no laws to protect a poor man's land from being sacrificed as you have now by the two thirds principle, and of exempting a poor man's bed or cow, or only working beast from seizure and sale. Constables and sheriffs were going from place to place through the land, and there was no safe-guard that the land should be sold at the court house door. None. Sheriffs and constables were going through the land, and selling as I know, valuable lands for one-fiftieth of their value. I know of ten thousand acres that were sold for one hundred and twenty dollars, and the sale was confirmed in the court of appeals. I know a thousand acres, worth four or five thousand dollars, sold for four dollars, and the sale was good. I know another case of fifteen thousand acres, that belonged to an uncle of mine, and which had descended to his heirs, sold for ten dollars. Sir, there was a parcel of merciless speculators following the sheriffs and constables of the country, like carrion crows, buzzards, and vultures, following a marching and fighting army to prey upon the bodies slain in battle, or those who might die by disease, and the people were goaded on to madness. But I hope never to see such a state of things again. It is better that the people should succeed than that such a principle should be retained in the constitution. I did vote for the old court. I am one who, rather than be sustained by the trickeries of bond and mortgage, would live in a worked-out saltpetre cave. I fought for the old court, and I saw the sufferings of the whole country. The legislature in its wisdom has surrounded the poor man with the protection of a two-thirds principle, and exemption and sale at the court house. We are not to reason from extreme cases, as that of Judge Peek, or the extreme case of Judge Chase, or of Judge Clarke, in the old court, but we are to settle on the general rule, on the safe principle based on the common occurrences of all good governments. That is what we ought to settle down upon now. I ask what is the theory of our government, and what is the theory of all republican governments? There are but two kinds of government. None but two. Some are called the government of the Grand Turk, some the government of the great Emperor of all the Russias, or the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, the miserable little Bonaparte here now in Paris, and Queen Victoria with her royal spouse, whose father owned a little country that had sixteen hundred people in it, and we may go and look back to the aristocracies that existed in Venice, and in all there are but two. One is that of a minority controlling a majority, and the other, that of a majority controlling its own action; call it imperial, monarchical, or what you will, there are but two.

What is the theory of our government? Is it not that of a majority? Are you afraid of the majority? Are you to say the majority cannot be trusted—God save the majority from themselves, their foolish selves? Cannot a majority of the supreme court of nine judges be trusted to decide upon ten millions of property? Yes. Cannot a majority of a court martial decide on the high-toned honors of General Scott, or of General Taylor, if he were still a general? Yes. Cannot a majority in congress make a law?—They could if it was not for the president's veto. Cannot a majority of the legislature of Kentucky make a law, the governor's veto notwithstanding? Yes. Does not a majority in the court of appeals govern? Does not a majority in the county court govern? And if there were other courts would not a majority govern in them? Yes. But when a majority of the legislature come to try and fine for misdemeanors they cannot be trusted! This is the whole case.

I go for having the elections by the people, and then I go for practical responsibility. We all do. But then they say that practical responsibility is two-thirds, and I say that it is responsibility to a majority of the representative department. This is the only difference between us. We agree in the elective principle, and we agree in responsibility, but we differ in saying in whom that responsibility shall consist.

But when you come to the trial of an officer for misbehavior, a majority is not to be trusted. That is the whole case. I go for the election being with the people. All of us go for that. I go then for periodical responsibility. We all go for that. But then they say that periodical responsibility is two-thirds, but I say that it is no responsibility at all. That is the only difference between us. We concur in the elective principle, but when we come to responsibility, they insist upon the two-third principle, which I say is no responsibility at all. I have looked a little into this matter, as regards the practice in other states. The constitution of Massachusetts—and there are other constitutions which have the same provision—is in these words:

"CHAP. 3, ART. 1. The tenure that all commissioned officers, shall, by law have in their offices shall be expressed in their respective commissions; all judicial officers duly appointed, commissioned and sworn, shall hold their offices during good behavior; excepting such concerning whom there is a different provision made in this constitution: Provided, nevertheless, the Governor, with the consent of the council, may remove them upon the address of both houses of the Legislature."

"ART. 3. In order that the people may not suffer from the long continuance in any place of any justice of the peace, who shall fail of discharging the important duties of his office with ability or fidelity, all commissions of justices of the peace shall expire and become void in the term of seven years from their respective dates; and upon the expiration of any commission, the same may, if necessary, be renewed, or another person appointed, as shall most conduce to the well being of the Commonwealth."

There the majority principle with the governor's concurrence, removes a judge. In the constitutions of New Hampshire and Rhode Island there is the same provision. In New York the judges are removed by impeachment, and the majority of the senate and a majority of the supreme court constitute the tribunal, and then it takes two thirds of this majority to authorize the act of removal. Indiana has about the same provision. We know one thing, that in Massachusetts they have a first rate judiciary, equal to any in America, and their constitution has been in existence ever since the year 1780, and we know that in New Hampshire and Rhode Island they have a good judiciary. In Rhode Island they are not only elected by the people, but they are elected every six months, and yet they have a good judiciary. So that the majority principle is not a new one. It is not new in Massachusetts, for it has been in existence there since 1780; it is not new in New Hampshire and Rhode Island, and as my friend from Fayette said, it is not new in Great Britain. Here is the British statute on the subject:

"All judges must derive their authority from the crown, by some commission warranted by law. The judges of Westminster are (all except the chief justice of the King's bench, who is created by writ) appointed by patent, and formerly held their places only during the King's pleasure; but now for the greater security of the liberty of the subject, by the 12 and 13 W., 3 c. 2, their commissions are to be quamdiu se bene gesserint; but upon the address of both houses of Parliament, it may be lawful to remove them."

A majority controls in the house of Lords and in the house of Commons. The judges are to be commissioned by the King and the appointing power is vested in him still; but the removing power, the responsible power to the people, is in the Lords and Commons. Not in two thirds, but in a majority of those bodies, and as the same gentleman observed, to secure further the power of the judiciary, as to its responsibility to the people, when a King dies, the judge's commission does not die with him. Under the statute of George III. he continues in office as long as he lives, unless he is removed for misbehavior. Are not impeachments in the house of Lords decided by a majority? Are not all laws passed by the Parliament of Great Britain passed by a majority? Does not congress pass all laws by a majority? Is there the two thirds principle in any part of the government of the United States? To be sure, it takes two thirds of the senators present to decide upon an impeachment, and therefore, twenty one out of sixty can remove a judge or any other functionary under trial. How that principle got into our constitution God in his mercy only knows. If my friend from Daviess comes to enquire of me, as he says he will, I must tell him to go further ahead. I can give him no information. I have looked at the theory of the British government. The two thirds principle is not there, nor does it prevail in the courts in Great Britain. If twelve judges are on the bench seven may decide. If an impeachment is tried in the house of Lords, a majority decides. The principle of a majority controls throughout in the British government. It controls throughout that of the United States, except in the removal of a judge by address, and I propose, or shall propose, that the judge be heard by himself or counsel, and that the governor shall have no hand in it, and that the legislature shall be considered as a high and dignified court of judicature.

Sir, this is an age of improvement. What was the condition of the world fifty years ago, and what is it now? What was known of the power of steam fifty years ago? It is not twenty years since a man in Kentucky drove his horses to the market in South Carolina, and driving along the turnpike where a railroad passed over it, and looking above, four or five cars passed over his head—his horses scattering in every direction, "my God," he exclaimed, "behold hell in harness." Forty years ago, the moving of a steamboat by night down the Ohio river, would have alarmed the whole western world. Ten years ago, would any man have believed that he could have talked to the people in Washington city and get an answer the same minute? We thought Franklin, the benefactor of the world, when he armed the world with the lightning rod against the thunder bolts of heaven. And now we call down the same thunder bolts, and send them as messengers to every part of the world. I recollect hearing a dispute between two ignorant men when erecting the posts for the telegraph which passes through Bardstown: one man said they could talk, on that line, to the people at Washington city in a minute. "It is not so," said the other, "God Almighty keeps his lightning to punish sinners, and He will never part with it in the world." Look at the history of the world. Behold the wonderful growth of the energy of Greece. See what power was developed in the Roman republic, and see how they were degraded the moment, the tyrant slipped in. What is Greece now? What was she an hundred years after liberty was driven from her border? Nothing. What was she during the palmy days of her republicanism?—the admiration of the world, and the world was hardly a match for her in battle, though she covered not ten thousand square miles at most. What was Rome after she lost her liberty? A great corrupt mass of the human family. And how the mind and the energies of man sunk, and how they became disordered and degraded. Constantine established the christian religion—it threw itself into the hands of the corrupted civil authorities and sunk mankind almost to the level of the brute creation. So much so, that a handful of naked Arabs, like to have overrun and conquered all the christian world. They conquered in Asia, in Africa, and in Europe, until the great battle was fought on the plains of France, and there nothing saved the christian world, if God had not said to the Huns be christians and march against the infidels, and they did march, and after three days hard fighting conquered. There was no energy or power at all, and the whole christian world was in a state of absolute slavery. How was it afterwards? The Saracen power went down, and the Turkish power stood up. They conquered the christian world again in Assia and Africa. They conquered the seat of christianity—Constantinople. They conquered Greece, Thessaly, Macedonia, Thrace, the country on both sides of the Danube, and were on the very point of conquering Vienna and the whole christian world in Europe, when the Poles, by the word of God became christians, and through their king, John Sobieski, saved it again.

How was it again when Martin Luther sprang up. Religious liberty walked abroad and the nations of the world improved in all the arts and sciences of war and civil liberty. And after the American revolution started and proclaimed liberty to mankind, the flame of revolution was caught in France by the boys who fought here in our ranks—Lafayette, Pichegru, Jourdan, Bernadotte and others. Liberty was then proclaimed, and how now does it stand over the world? We have to a great extent civil liberty and religious and political liberty, and what now is the condition of mankind? Can the heathen world ever overrun them again? Never! We have nothing to fear from the arms of the heathen world again! Nor will it ever be necessary to convert a heathen nation to save us again. The christian world through the influence of religions and civil liberty can conquer ten thousand heathen worlds, let them be no stronger than it is now. Gentlemen have spoken of the French convention. Well God bless the French nation, the French convention was a great thing. It was composed of a powerful set of men, and it struggled and was convulsed in its effort for liberty. Their king turned against them, and their queen and their nobility did the same. All Europe declared war against them, and what did the French convention do? They accepted battle with the whole united crowned heads of Europe, and in the language of Danton—"the gauge of battle was the head of a king thrown down." What a noble expression. And would to Almighty God, the Hungarians had thrown down as their gauge of battle the heads of the tyrants of Austria and Russia, and they would have roused mankind from one end of the world to the other. But they have succumbed and I would rather be at this day, the son of Kossuth, or of any of those who were beheaded, or who now are in jail, than the son of that vile traitor Georgy, who now is basking in the sunshine of his master's favor. Sir, mankind is equal to any emergency. When our revolution broke out how was it? Great Britain said—you have not a man in America who can command a company of regulars—you have no talents—but the moment we struck for independence, a thousand, aye ten thousand showed themselves on the theatre of action, both in the cabinet and in the field. Do you think the Almighty creates men for particular purposes? No, but it is the natural genius of men to resist slavery and bondage—and man walked abroad in his own grandeur and majesty. It was the occasion that made Washington and all the generals, and all the statesmen of that day. It was the occasion that made Massena, who fought fourteen years in the royal ranks of Louis XVI, and never knew what energy he had. So it was with Bernadotte who fought in our ranks. It was the occasion that made Massena and Bernadotte, Mirabeau and others. Say to the people that they are capable of self-government, and I will warrant you they are able.

It may be said, Hardin you are a demagogue. I am not, and every body that knows me knows that I am not. I have looked to the people for every thing, in a political way, that I ever received, with scarcely a single exception, and so have you, and you, and you, and you, (pointing to several delegates.) We have all looked to the people. Thank God, I do not know a man in this house, that has been a solicitor of power, except at the hands of the people; and I despise the man, that like a little dog, goes scratching at the door of power at about the hour of nine o'clock at night, and by his scratching gains admission. I never did that, and thank God, I do not believe there is one man in the house who has ever done it. We all look to the people, and we all desire to give to them the best government that is possible. Let us at the same time that we give a government to the people, give them one that will be acceptable to them. There is as much necessity to give them such a government, as to consult the wisest maxims that Plato could devise. I know it is difficult to frame a government for posterity, but let us give them the best one we can. I want the best constitution. I come to yield a great deal to the views of those who may not agree with me. If I get the elective franchise restored to the people, I shall have gained a great point. If I get the appointment of the judges for a limited number of years, and their ineligibility, I shall have gained another great point, and will take almost any thing after that; but I am not willing to take this bill as it now stands, in all its provisions. I introduce this amendment, intending to get something better, and I hope for that still. I have nothing to hope for in the political world, and where a man hopes for nothing, he has nothing to fear. I have spoken my honest convictions, the same that I held two years ago last winter, in this hall—the same that I held in every political speech I made. I do not know that I said the majority principle, but a more practical responsibility than the two thirds principle. I do not say that my colleague agreed to it; in fact, I have no recollection what he said; I had as much to do as I wanted to take care of myself. But I held this doctrine in the counties of Hardin, Spencer, Marion, Bullit, and Nelson, and in this hall, therefore, I play no demagogue.

I am sorry that I should in any way, bring down upon myself the rebuke of the gentleman from Graves. He is a worthy man, and I am told, is the brother of one of the fastest friends I ever had, and one of the finest men I ever knew, and I should be sorry that he should look horns with me; and if he thought that I said I would not give a cent for the constitution, it was rather a slip of the tongue than otherwise, and if he please, I will modify what I said; I will do it at all events to avoid his opposition.

I have not been in good health as every body knows for a month, and if I could have avoided making a speech I should have done it, but I felt bound to do it. I know that I am to be in a minority, but if I knew there was not one man in this house, who would vote for it, I would vote as I shall now; and I beg those gentlemen who think as I do on this subject, to stand up like men, and maintain their views by their vote. Three hundred men fought more than a million at Thermopylae, and let us, like the Spartan charging, sing the hymn of battle, and fight on bravely. I have but a few days to live in this world, and it is more my business to get ready to die, than any thing else. I will only mention that I have the authority of Mr. Jefferson, which is considered high authority, for this principle of a majority. He says:

"It has been said that the people are not competent electors of judges learned in the law. But I do not know that this is true, and if doubtful we should follow the principle in this as in many other elections, they would be guided by reputation, which would not err oftener, perhaps, than the present mode of appointment. In one state of the union, at least, it has been long tried, and with the most satisfactory success. The judges of Connecticut have been chosen by the people every six months, for nearly two centuries, and I believe there has hardly ever been an instance of change; so successful is the curb of incessant responsibility. If prejudice however, derived from a 'monarchical institution, is still to prevail against the vital elective principle of our own, and if the existing example among ourselves of periodical elections, by the people, be still mistrusted, let us not at least adopt the evil and reject the good of the English precedent; let us retain a movability, on the concurrence of the executive and legislative branches, and nomination by the executive alone."

This two thirds principle has insinuated itself into our constitution, but I cannot tell how it got there. We know that in jury trials it requires a unanimous vote. This principle was wrested from the king by the people, so far as it regards the rights of persons. It is entirely sui generis and does not belong to this government. The theory of this government is, that a majority should govern.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. After the able vindication we have just heard, and in consideration of the length of time we have been in session, it would scarcely be courteous to this house, nor would it be doing justice to myself were I to proceed in my remarks at present. I may desire to do so to-morrow, and for that purpose I will move that the committee now rise.

The committee accordingly rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

Mr. HARGIS, who has been detained from the convention for some days by severe indisposition, resumed his seat this morning.

EXEMPTION FROM EXECUTION.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be requested to enquire into the expediency and propriety of providing in the new constitution, a clause specifying the amount of property which shall hereafter be exempt from execution.

COURTS OF CONCILIATION.

Mr. IRWIN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That tribunals of conciliation shall be established in every county by law; such law shall be general, and shall be of uniform operation throughout the state.

Mr. IRWIN said he wished that proposition to be referred to the committee on county courts. He was not satisfied how such a court as was indicated by that resolution would operate; but on an examination of the proceedings of the conventions in the states of New York and New Jersey, he saw that such a proposition was submitted to each of those bodies. The object of the proposition was to prevent litigation, and he had no doubt that every gentleman would have it much at heart to accomplish this. He had read that in Denmark there were 25,000 law suits in one year, which after the adoption of these courts were reduced to 10,000. They have also been established in Prussia and France, and, it was said, with good effect. He was not quite sure that these courts would suit this country, even if they could be carried into effect. It was said, he believed, that the people of the country could establish arbitrators for themselves, but he thought it better to establish such courts in each county for the settlement of small disputes that might arise. He wished to have this proposition referred to the committee on county courts that the convention might get the information which that committee would be able to furnish. He would read to the convention an extract from a report made some few years since to the New Jersey convention on this subject:

"In each town or precinct, two persons are chosen by the people, who sit one day in each week, for the receiving of complaints, issuing summonses for the appearance of parties at the next regular day of meeting, and for hearing the parties already summoned. The courts sit with closed doors, and none but the parties themselves, or their special attorneys, are permitted to be present. The duty of the court is to hear the complaints and reply to the parties, and to endeavor to induce them to adjust their difficulties amicably. As an absolute rule, nothing that passes in the court is divulged by the members of it, and is forbidden as evidence in the courts of law. Should the attempt for reconciliation fail, the court grants to each of the parties a certificate stating that they had appeared, but did not reconcile their differences. Those certificates are required by the courts of law, in order to oblige parties to seek reconciliation.

"The fee of this proceeding is very trifling, and is paid by one or both of the parties, as may be decided by the reconciling judges.

"Your committee suppose, that it is unnecessary for them to say any thing in recommendation of a tribunal so simple in its formation and so evidently useful, but they cannot refrain from calling the attention of the convention to the fact of the numberless cases which are subjects of lengthy, expensive and vexatious law suits, which have their origin in trifling differences between neighbors and friends, and which the amicable agency of a third party could reconcile and put forever at rest."

He then continued to say, that he knew but little of the effect the adoption of such a provision would have; he had merely desired to call to the attention of the convention, for if the object was to prevent litigation, it was certainly an object worthy of attention.

Mr. BRISTOW said, however highly he appreciated the object of the gentleman from Logan, as manifested in the resolution, and however desirous he was to carry out that object, he must protest against the reference proposed. He could suggest another reference which he thought would be more appropriate than the committee of which he was the chairman, which was principally composed of lawyers, and of whom it might be said, although they might profess a great desire to produce peace and harmony throughout the borders of this great commonwealth, that "When self the wavering balance shake,

Its rarely right adjusted."

How much more proper would it be to refer the proposition to a committee composed of farmers, whose labor will not be distrusted in their laudable attempt to prevent litigation.

Mr. IRWIN briefly replied. He was not quite sure that a committee of farmers could so well understand this subject as one on which there were lawyers as distinguished as the gentleman from Todd. He however was not particularly anxious as to the direction which the proposition should take; the only object he had in view being to bring it to the attention of the house, believing as he did that it was worthy of their attention.

The motion to refer to the committee on county courts was negative, and the proposition was referred to a select committee, consisting of Messrs. Irwin, Boyd, Gholson, Dudley, and White.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention then again resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the report of the committee on the court of appeals, Mr. HUSTON in the chair.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. This debate was commenced on the amendment of my colleague, presenting to the consideration of the committee a single question, but one which, in my humble judgment, is of vast importance and magnitude as connected with our deliberations and the duties before us.

The question, sir, is a proposition that the judges of the appellate court, and of consequence all other officers from the governor down to a constable, to use the language of my colleague, shall be subject to be removed from office by an address of a majority of each house of the legislature.

The proposition, sir, is at war with the opinions that I have entertained ever since I had a knowledge of the theory and practice of my government. Coming from the quarter whence it did, I confess it struck me with more than ordinary surprise. It is a proposition, sir, which has for its purpose the inevitable effect of placing the two departments, the executive and judiciary, of this government at the will and mercy of a legislative majority, congregated in this hall for the purposes of legislation under the provisions of the constitution—a proposition which, if adopted, makes the legislature what the British Parliament is to that government—omnipotent—and produces necessarily a concentration of all power directly and indirectly in one department of government—the popular branch. This proposition, announced with such confidence in its propriety, accompanied by such an appeal from the source whence it came, was not in itself calculated to quiet the apprehensions I had.

We were told that he had been anticipating the question which was then before the house; that he had looked for it, and turning with emphatic expression and authoritative tone, he appealed to the delegates of this convention who were the real advocates of constitutional reform, to rally under his banner on this principle, as the one great principle upon which he intended to make battle in this house, declaring—and he is so reported—that if it were not incorporated in the constitution which we are about to make, he would not give a ninepence for the constitution. My friend from Graves, who addressed the house yesterday, misquoted him when he said one cent; that is less than he said he would give for it.

I attempted, sir, upon the introduction of that amendment, to present in brief the views which influenced the committee in so organizing the article as you have it from the report. I have, perhaps, in part to vindicate that committee again to-day; but what I shall say will be rather in vindication of my own opinions. It is at all times unpleasant to me to differ with my honorable colleague upon questions of constitutional law, but more especially, related as we are, being the representatives of one of the counties in this commonwealth. He undertakes to speak for the county of Nelson, and presumes, and I have no doubt believes, that he speaks truly their opinions on this subject. Differing with him, not only in the soundness of the principle, but in fact in reference to the opinions of the people of Nelson, I should be recreant to them and unjust to myself if I did not take issue with him, both in reference to the principle itself and the fact on which he acts.

Sir, the question of the mode and manner in which a judge shall be removed from office, after he shall have been elected by the people, was not a subject of discussion in that canvass. However much I desired the honor of representing that county on this floor, and however much I feel honored by the confidence of the people of that county, a majority of them being politically opposed to me on other questions, had the question been presented in discussion, whether we should incorporate a provision into the new constitution, by which to place the judiciary department within the power of both branches of the legislature; from whatever source such a proposition might have come; I would have staked my political existence on the issue before the people, and would have risked that question with the most entire confidence as to the result.

I regret that under the circumstances, the question was not made, for if I know myself I desire to make a constitution, not for the present generation alone, but for those who come after us. I would not consent to be the representative of a people, and engraft into their organic law a principle of self-destruction of the very liberty and independence of a co-ordinate branch of this government. Other agents should have been employed.

My worthy and respected colleague is adroit in debate, powerful in purpose, and always has one when he acts. I have known him long and tried him often in forensic debate in professional life, and it has sometimes fallen to my good fortune to be on the right side against him. When beaten upon one point he retreated with great skill and assailed me upon another. Conscious that the principle he has advanced cannot be sustained by the enlightened judgment of this house, yielding the question that he stands in a most woful minority, he consoles himself that his proposition was to feel the pulse of the house, and having done so, he has drawn around him a Spartan band, as he calls it, to rally under his banner in the future operations in framing this constitution. I would say to this band, if such a band have enrolled themselves under his banner, take heed, be cautious that you are not led to make war, before you are done, on your own principles, and your own best interests, and the best interests of the state. We came here to make a constitution such as the people of Kentucky can live prosperously and happily under, and such as they will be satisfied with when it passes from our hands; and, sir, I can say to the gentleman, that his warning voice to the advocates of reform in this house, for whatever purpose intended, did not strike on my ear as necessary. We were told that there were enemies of reform at work, and those of us who desired constitutional reform, should take care whom they trusted and with whom they acted, and he gave us the biographical illustration of the life and profession of Burke, the man who made his living by killing his friends with kindness. Did he mean that there were political Burkers in this house, professing to be in favor of reform, but in reality designing to defeat the very purpose for which this convention was called? And I suppose by inference that we are to understand that the article on the organization of the court of appeals emanated from a college of Burkers, and that it was designed by that committee so to operate in its provisions, as to defeat the object which the people had in reference to the judiciary department of the government, to-wit, election by the popular voice, and limitation of the term of office, and return to the elective power, and what I think is a necessary corollary, a constitutional guarantee and safe guard, and wall of defence thrown around them while in the exercise of that office, that will enable them fairly, boldly, and independently to discharge their duties, without the constant apprehension of being dragged to the house of parliament in this state, and their independence sacrificed at the will of a bare majority. These were the purposes, so far as I understand, the people desired in reference to the judiciary department. But it seems that, weary of this principle, made perhaps a little sick of it by the manifestation of the judgment of this house against it, if not by his own recollections of his past history and opinions on this question, he has surrendered the question, suffered a non-suit and made an onslaught on the whole bill on this motion. I must be pardoned while I devote a portion of the time which I had assigned to this discussion to vindicate the bill, upon the points indicated yesterday, from the assaults which have been made and are threatened to be made, before I progress further in the discussion of the immediate question before the committee.

Sir, my colleague has notified us that he objects to four judges for the appellate court, and declares that it is unparalleled, save in a new court, organized in 1824. If his recollection is as much at fault in some of the facts and historical incidents he so eloquently presented to us yesterday, as in that, I am rather inclined to think it would be difficult for any member to beat him, in the language of a countryman of mine, in arguing history. In 1801 the appellate court was constituted of four judges. It so remained till 1813, when, upon the demise of one of the judges, the legislature passed a law declaring that thereafter it should consist of three judges. I need not name the eminent men who filled that court during that time. And during all that period of twelve years, the case which he put yesterday as an objection to four judges, to wit, the two cases decided differently by two circuit judges, and both affirmed by a divided court of appeals, did not occur, and perhaps never will. To answer that objection, for a single moment as I pass—does my honorable colleague know that where a case should be confirmed by a divided court, that it stands as the decision and precedent of the appellate court and governs not only the court below, but all the other courts until it shall be otherwise decided. And should the case come up, that he alludes to, of a different decision to the circuit judge, the appellate court is bound by the precedent of the first decision. It is putting a case that has not happened in the history of twelve years of our appellate jurisprudence. It is putting a case that has not happened in the history of the jurisprudence of any of the other states whose appellate courts are constituted of an even number of judges, and most of the appellate courts of our sister states are composed of the number four. It is putting a case calculated to scare a skeptical mind more than to enlighten a reasoning mind. Why did the committee propose to organize this tribunal of four judges, to stand as long as this constitution shall stand, if we make one? I appeal to the lawyers, who are in the habit of practising in that court, on my left and on my right—I appeal to every man who has attended that tribunal for the last eight or ten years—if the judges have not been so overburdened and overwhelmed with labor as to be almost forced to retire from the bench. The answer is uniform and without a dissenting voice, that there is more than three men can do with dispatch and accuracy; the labors are greater than it is possible for them to perform to the satisfaction of themselves and the community. Looking forward to an increase of population and business in this commonwealth, conjecturing and hoping that our constitution shall be such, at least, that it shall endure for the period that our present constitution has endured—fifty years—what will be the increase of population and business in the commonwealth of Kentucky? And is it too much to ask, in the formation of the court that the tribunal shall be composed of the number of four judges? Indeed, some of the members of the committee—although it is not altogether parliamentary to speak of the individual opinions of the members of a committee—were anxious to engraft in the constitution the provision that the legislature shall have the power of increasing that number if the public exigency should require it. More, however, upon this subject, when the gentleman's proposition comes up to reduce the number of these judges; and then it will be proper for me to call upon some of my able associates in the committee to vindicate theirs as well as my own judgment upon it.

But the gentleman admonishes us he is also against the principle of re-eligibility in office of the judges of the court of appeals as well as all the other judges, and he invites his spartan band to come up to his rescue, and stand by him upon that question. I fancy that he will find the principal portion of that force disinclined to follow him in this movement at least.

I listened with great pleasure, as I always do, to the able and ingenious argument that my friend from Fleming incidentally introduced on this subject, and I could not see, sir, with every desire to be convinced, if I was wrong upon this question, and I know there is no gentleman more able to convince me than he—I listened to him and I did not hear an argument from him upon the subject of a judicial officer, with all due deference and respect, that did not strike at the very principle of electing the judges by the people. His argument was, that there were two great parties in this state, and there necessarily always would be, which were nearly equally balanced. He chose to give them their appropriate names, whig and democrat, or some other name that may hereafter spring up. In either party there were sound portions of the community competent and capable of exercising the elective franchise with freedom and judgment. But that there existed in this community also another power which he represented as floating to one side or the other, as appliances, corruptions, blandishments, or allurements, might be able to turn it. That it had always and would always control our popular elections, and that the judge necessarily would court that portion of the population which he described as not properly entitled, and who, ought not to be allowed, to exercise the elective franchise in the choice of the judicial, or any other officers.

We again hear on the other side, from another quarter, that instead of courting that portion of the people the judge would be influenced by the powerful and wealthy within his district. It was emphatically asked, if a powerful and wealthy family is involved in a contest in his district, either by crime, or in litigation, whether you could find a man to stand up and administer justice in the face of such a power? It is utterly impossible, says the gentleman. Yet the same gentleman tells us when he declares his opposition to the mode of balloting, reported by the committee, that he cannot believe that any judge could be found weak and wicked enough to be influenced in the exercise of his official duties, and controlled and diverted from the line of justice and probity, because one or the other of the litigants may have voted for or against him. The inconsistencies in that line of argument I will not stop to point out.

What is this principle of re-eligibility? You have seen the action of other state governments and their constitutions, in which they have declared that after a given age no incumbent shall be re-eligible, or continued on the bench. In New York, I believe, the age of 60 or 65 drove from her bench a chancellor Kent and a Spencer, men whose mental capacity and great legal learning made them shining lights in the history of American jurisprudence, not only while in commission, but for some twenty years after they were supposed to be incompetent to administer justice and decide the questions of law submitted to them by their fellow-citizens. That state became satisfied that this system of ostracism was wrong; that to provide by legislative enactment, when human intellect should fail, was unwise, and they abandoned it. In all the efforts of the states to return the power of appointing the judges, either directly to the people, or in a less popular form to the legislative branch of the government, there is not a single instance, nor do the records of any of their journals or debates, so far as they have fallen under my examination, show that a single man had indicated a desire to render a judge ineligible after the expiration of his term. Kentucky statesmen are the first to maintain that such a principle is necessary to preserve the purity of the judge. Convince me that it is dangerous to the purity of our jurisprudence that the judge elected by the people should, because of the confidence which he may have created by his good conduct and pre-eminent qualifications, and because the purity of his conduct on the bench has commanded the respect and confidence of all who have been called to his court—convince me that such confidence shall operate to disqualify a man and to deprive the state or district of his services, and I fall back to the old principle of appointment, or some other mode. Sir, it is to charge upon the people, not in so many words, but by implication, a want of capacity to discriminate in the choice of their officers between the good and the bad. It is telling them, you are incapable of determining on the character of your judicial officers, whose official conduct is day in and day out exposed to the scrutiny, the vigilance, aye sir, the keen eye of the advocate in his court. You are not capable of determining or deciding when a man is influenced by improper or corrupt motives, and you shall not be permitted to re-elect him, though he may have commended himself for all the decorum, all the probity, all the integrity, all the justice, and all the firmness that can endear a judge to a state, or to a district. We will incorporate into your organic law a provision taking from you the privilege of calling upon him again as your public servant upon the bench of the appellate or district court. It is telling the people they are without discretion, and without capacity thus to select for themselves, and to determine, when they witness the conduct of a man upon the bench, whether he be corrupt or pure. The great argument with me in surrendering the opinions formed in the law school, or the library, those principles which all students imbibe from the eulogy which Blackstone has pronounced on the judicial department of England, and his opinions as to the tenure of the judicial office, the necessity of the independence of the judges, and the policy of removing their appointment as far as possible from the excitements and turmoil of political conflicts, was my confidence in the capacity and integrity of the people to select their own officers. I desire to give to the people the power of selecting judicial officers, believing they had the capacity, the discretion, and from the deep and abiding interest they had involved, that they would make a selection better than any other intermediate agency which I can devise myself, or which others can devise. I have seen a reason for this, that all will acknowledge, in the exercise of the executive power of appointment of all the officers. I will not stop to quarrel with them or point them out. They are remembered. And, as my worthy colleague was, at one time, part and parcel of the executive, I take his testimony as conclusive evidence on the subject.

I am in favor of the election of the judge because, feeling his responsibility to the people, he has a conscious pride about him—he feels a spirit of independence, and he knows that the justice of this community is such, that if he turns to the right or to the left, if he should kick the beam of justice in favor of the rich or the poor, there is discrimination enough in the community to know it. There is no officer in this commonwealth—I care not what he may be called—who is watched with more vigilance, more scrutiny by the public at large, than the judges in the courts of original jurisdiction. Sir, when a judge enters upon the discharge of the duties confided to him by the people of the state, he knows his responsibility, he knows that, to secure the good opinion the people entertained of him, when they placed him there, he must strike for justice, to use a common phrase; and when the people see that he does so, they will sustain him. But when they see the miserable tool of power, the instrument of fear, they abandon him. There is no necessity therefore, for inserting in the constitution the provision that he shall not be re-eligible. I put it to my colleague whether we shall go further in this business than our sister states have gone? Shall we manifest an apprehension lest some one elected by the people should become corrupt, and acting from improper motives, should discharge the duties confided to him improperly? I trust not. Why, I ask you sir, when the judge has been elected by the people, and he has served his six years, or if you please, his four years, or eight years, whichever may be fixed, and the people are satisfied with him, and are anxious to retain him, when there is no better man in the district, to whom they can confide these high, and honorable, and important trusts—why, I ask you, will you deprive the people of the opportunity of calling to their aid, the man who has given such universal satisfaction? Why disqualify a man in the prime of life? And sir, this is not all. If my honorable colleague should carry out the intimation he has given, that the term of eight years is too long in the appellate court—that six years is too long a term for the circuit court—and four years too long for the county court, and should come down as low as some are disposed to come, (but I will take it at the period at which I understand his committee has fixed upon as the term of service for the circuit judge—six years) I ask you sir, with his principle of ineligibility engrafted upon the constitution—I ask him sir, of what materials will his court be composed? Will he tell me that he will secure the services of capable lawyers? I appeal to every member in this house—I appeal to my honorable colleague himself. Go home and look abroad in your own district—tell me of a lawyer whose practice is worth following—tell me of a lawyer who is willing, for the sake of the elevation to the bench, to abandon his practice, with a constitutional restriction upon him that when he has served six years—when his practice and clients are gone, his habits of life changed, he is to go back to the practice of law. Tell me of a lawyer who is fit to go on the bench—I speak in reference to his capacity—who would accept the promotion? It is true of the profession that the larger portion of them work hard, live well, and die poor. No man sir, who has attained the necessary standing in his profession, and is of the age proposed in this provision, would be willing to surrender his practice and the means of support for his family, for the tenure of six years, with the glorious privilege of being disqualified for the judgeship thereafter, and of being compelled to turn to the practice of law for the support of the family that is dependent on his exertions. No, sir, no. Your judiciary, under such a system, would be composed of old, broken down lawyers, who never did much good for themselves, or young ones who have been following the profession all their lives and have not overtaken it. Besides, I would as soon think, myself, of leasing a farm to a tenant for six years, telling him that he should no longer occupy it; and telling him, also, that he should not be accountable for waste during the time.—What would be the practice of a judge under such a tenure of office? Tell him that he must go back at the end of the term, for a living, to the practice of the profession, and for the last two or three years of his judicial life he would be like the tenant who is not responsible for waste. The one would leave the briars growing in the corners of the fences, and the other would leave the docket overflowing with causes. That would be the effect of your system of disqualification.

Something was said sir, by my honorable colleague yesterday about districting the court of appeals—and I regret exceedingly that he had not reserved himself till we had got clear of this motion. To use his own language, he was mightily opposed to this system of branching the court of appeals. I care not by what name you term it, the proposition is, that the court of appeals shall hold its sessions in four districts, at such times and places as shall be provided by the legislature. Is this a new question in this state? No, sir. Long and often has a large portion of this commonwealth demanded that the court of appeals—to use a common phrase—shall rusticate; shall hold their sessions at different points in this commonwealth, thereby to destroy the tendency to centralization—to bring the administration of justice nearer to the residences of the suitors.

My colleague says it will have a tendency to increase litigation. I am not prepared sir, to say that it will or will not. I am much inclined to believe that it will not have that tendency, because if we are successful in giving to the people of this commonwealth a good, intelligent, independent tribunal of original jurisdiction, it will tend greatly to lessen the necessity for an appellate court. Give us a court that the bar and the country will have confidence in—that is, a court which tries the case originally, and the suitor be content to abide the result. It is, sir, because our tribunals of original jurisdiction are so constituted that neither the bar nor the community, in many parts of the state, have confidence in their decisions, that the business in the appellate court has been increasing for the last fifteen years. But admitting that it has a tendency to increase the business, shall we deny to a suitor of the county of Hickman the privilege of having his cause revised by holding the court at so great a distance that his counsel may not be able to follow the cause? Is public justice served by denying to suitors who reside at a distance the privilege of having their cases revised in the appellate court, when in the opinion of the counsel justice has not been done?

I said, sir, that this business of dividing the labor of this court is not one that is new in this commonwealth. I have not the time, sir, nor is it necessary that I should look up the various bills that have been, from time to time, before the legislature in reference to this subject, and defeated in their passage by being pronounced unconstitutional. I find that in 1816 the subject was before the legislature, and it was proposed, I think, to hold the court at three or four points in the state; and that I may do justice to gentlemen who thought then as I think now, I will read the names of those who voted for the bill. They are "Messrs. Buckner, Breathitt, Beauchamp, Craig, Cotton, Coffee, Cosby, Dollerhide, Emerson, Flournoy, Fergus, Forrest, Goode, Hughes, Hornbeck, Hart, Hubbard, Harrison, Letcher, Mills, Moorman, McMahan, Metcalfe, McClanahan, Patton, Rennick, Robinson, Reeves, Rowan, P. Thompson, Ward, Wirt, Wall, Yantis, and Yates." Among them are names of great weight, men of great political influence, lawyers eminent for their talents. I could go to the journals and show you, year after year, men who were voting for this proposition, and demanding it as an act of justice to the extremes of this commonwealth.

Looking, sir, to the questions that belong to the bill further on, especially the mode of electing these judges by ballot, or by viva voce, individually I care not one farthing what may be the decision of this house in regard to the mode in which the votes shall be cast. I do not doubt the gentleman himself possesses the independence to look boldly at the judge whilst voting against him. He is not prohibited from doing so; but sir, there are others who may not have been blest with that spirit. The object of the committee was to give the voter the privilege of voting with perfect freedom. As I remarked the other day, a majority of the states in this union have adopted the ballot system in all their elections. I said that the reason why they adopted it in many of the states in reference to the election of many of their officers, did not, and I hope never will, exist in our commonwealth.—I allude to the crowded and dependent population, such as they have in many of their towns and cities.

But to return to the question immediately before the committee, I will endeavor to meet the argument which I understand to be the only one that has been presented, that the impeaching power, and the power to drive these officers out of commission by the voice of two thirds of each branch of the legislature, is inoperative, is not efficient, and cannot be used either to keep the officer in order, or to punish him when he has violated his duty as a public officer. And sir, I regret exceedingly that my worthy and honorable colleague in drawing upon his memory for instances to illustrate this position, had not called to his mind the admonition which I think is necessary to be observed in all our intercourse: "de mortuis nil dicitur nisi bonum."

He, sir, introduced as an illustration, the memorable assault made on the secretary of the treasury, Alexander J. Dallas, by the federalists and anti-war party of 1812, growing out of his operations as secretary of the treasury, in regard to a loan authorized by act of congress. Sir, who was Alexander J. Dallas? No man of his age or day was more revered or more highly respected and esteemed by his associates, by those who knew him and had familiar intercourse with him, in his social and political relations. His memory, his name, his virtues, his social qualities, are held in veneration by those who knew him. Sir, those of his descendants and representatives who now live, and the representatives of his gallant son, who sacrificed his life in the cause of his country, are to have the mortification of reading in the debates of this convention, recorded and perpetuated for all time, that their father was guilty of swindling the government, when acting as secretary of the treasury amid the struggles and differences between the federal and the war party in 1812. I stop not to investigate that transaction; but when investigated, it will be found that Mr. Dallas was free from all blame. He could not afterwards have lived and died, beloved and respected as he was throughout the commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the United States, had he been guilty of swindling the government. I had not the pleasure of a personal acquaintance with him, but I have long had an intimate acquaintance with his distinguished son, the late Vice-President of the United States. It is the regard I have for the high reputation of the deceased, that I feel called upon to say, that there is at least one man in the convention, who is not prepared to take the assaults of the federalists against that distinguished gentleman as true, without proof from the record. I have no doubt my colleague believed what the clerk told him, but the allegation that Mr. Dallas swindled the government out of this money cannot be true. It is impossible that it can be true.

As another illustration of the inefficiency of this power, my colleague gave us a graphic description of the personal appearance of those federalists, who sustained Judge Chase on the occasion of his trial, and my colleague was so emphatic that he not only denounced the judge but he denounced his triers also. I had thought that the public judgment upon the exciting questions which arose out of the memorable contest of 1801 had become settled, and that those excitements had passed away when the actors in those scenes had paid the last debt of nature, and the public mind had been brought to bear impartially upon the subject. I had thought that there was at this day but one opinion in reference to the decision in the case of Judge Chase, and I will venture to say that the gentleman, with all his ability, if he take his jury from this house, and produce all the evidence he is capable of producing, would not be able to obtain a reversal of the decision in that case. Sir, if his triers, the senators of the United States, deserve the condemnation which my honorable colleague gave them yesterday, I think the statement at least ought to be accompanied by the names of the men whose votes I find recorded as declaring Judge Chase not guilty of the charges preferred against him. I have heard him loud and eloquent in his encomiums upon the individual, his patriotism, intelligence, public virtue, his fitness for the high station of President of the United States, whose name stands recorded first among those who voted not guilty upon every charge against Judge Chase. That individual was John Quincy Adams. Yet sir, my worthy colleague would have elevated this gentleman to the highest office in this government, considering him worthy of the confidence of this nation. I could give you other distinguished names sir, names of individuals in whom my honorable colleague professed to have unlimited confidence, who nevertheless voted not guilty upon the charges preferred against Judge Chase. I could give you the name of one of the distinguished senators of Kentucky, formerly a resident and revered citizen of this town, who, though acting with the republican party of that day, was compelled to record his vote against a majority of the charges contained in the indictment.

And what was this charge? Without going into particulars, Judge Chase had decided that it was treason against the government to resist, by an armed force, the execution of a statute of the United States. Iredell, his predecessor, Judge Peters, and Judge Patterson, decided the same question. When the gentleman comes to examine with care and attention the whole case, together with the judgment of the court, I think he will arrive at the same conclusion to which my mind has been brought, that the senate of the United States could not have decided otherwise.

He has been pleased to allude to the case of Judge Peck, with which my name is associated as one of the managers. It is true the house of representatives voted an impeachment in that case. The charge was, that he had punished a lawyer for contempt, because the lawyer had criticised his opinion in the newspapers. The house thought that it was an improper exercise of power, the offence not having been committed in court; that it did not properly belong to a judge to punish for contempt where the contempt consisted in something written or said out of court. The senate thought otherwise; that is, they thought there was nothing of corruption in the exercise of the power. The judge was acquitted, but I believe it improved his manners as a judge. This case led to the passage of an act of Congress defining what should constitute a contempt of court.

The gentleman has referred to the case in the county of Carter as evidence that this power of impeachment, or address, has fallen as a dead letter upon the statute book. Are we to be told that because I can point you to a case where a notorious criminal has escaped public justice, by the improper conduct of a judge, or by a misconception on the part of the jury, or a perversion of the facts, that we are therefore to abandon the ancient mode of trial by jury? Because all criminals have not been convicted shall we go back and take up this invention, which I see emanating from a law shop in Louisville, that upon the trial of a criminal, the commonwealth shall have the right to challenge as many jurors as the criminal, and that the jury shall consist of seven? Are we to abandon our time-honored system because Judge Chase, or the Carter magistrate, has escaped? I trust not.

Let us come sir, to our own state and see how this thing has operated. Has this power never been invoked efficiently on our judicial bench? I entered public life as a member of the legislature, (I am almost ashamed to acknowledge it as long ago as 1812,) and one of the first acts that attracted my attention was a charge brought against an associate judge of the county of Nicholas. The charge was that he was an alien, and the proof was that he had been some twenty years in the United States, but had not taken the oath of allegiance; and further, that he had declared himself delighted with the result of a conflict that had taken place, in which the British were victorious in 1812. The result was, the legislature broke him by the unanimous vote, I believe, of both houses. I could give you numerous instances where officers of the government have been removed by the legislature. It is true, attempts have been made to remove judges by address, and have failed, but I call upon my colleague, and upon the gentleman from Fayette, his lieutenant, I suppose, in his Spartan band, to point out to me a case where a judge has been brought before the legislature for a moral delinquency or misdemeanor in office where there was a failure to remove the judge when he ought to be removed. I will pause if my colleague will name a case; my own memory does not furnish me with one. I remember very well the case of judge Clarke. He was attempted to be removed under the two-thirds rule, and the attempt failed. Yet sir, there was a majority in both houses in favor of his removal, and, but for this principle of requiring two-thirds, that worthy man, that able jurist and statesman, would have shared the fate, which many a judge will meet, if my friend should succeed in his proposition, to engraft the majority principle in the constitution. I must be allowed by the committee to disinter the facts connected with this case from the buried rubbish of your library, and place them once more in bold relief before the people of Kentucky, that they may understand what would be the effect of my colleague's proposition if he should be able to engraft it in the constitution.

In 1822 we had in Kentucky a set of politicians, most of whom have passed from the stage of life, whose residences were around the Athens of Kentucky. They were called and familiarly known throughout the commonwealth in those days as the Lexington junto. They assumed to control the will of the legislature. Judge Clarke, in the Bourbon circuit court, was called upon to quash a replevin bond. He quashed the bond on the ground that the law was unconstitutional and void. I think the opinion was given on Tuesday or Wednesday evening, and on Friday night there came an avalanche from Lexington, with a copy of the judge's opinion taken from the newspapers. The next morning, being Saturday, as soon as we met, a gentleman, who is now no more, who was not behind my honorable colleague in his power of appealing to the passions and prejudices and excitements of the people, thought it necessary to call forth public indignation against an unoffending officer, came into the house and moved the appointment of a committee not to inquire into the guilt of the individual, not to inquire into the merits of the case, but to report an address to the governor requiring his dismissal from office, for no other offence than that of deciding a law to be unconstitutional. I happened to be a member of the committee. Such was the indecent haste, not having time to sit on Saturday night, for the session of the house lasted until nearly the hour of midnight, I was summoned on the Sabbath day, sir, to meet in a member's room to take the subject into consideration. I well remember the room and its furniture, and its inmates. There was a bed two chairs and a jug of whisky. I tried then to procure a summons to be sent to Judge Clarke, or a letter inviting him to appear before the committee. A few others with myself attempted with all our persuasive powers, or rather with imploring solicitude, to preserve at least the appearance of justice in our proceedings, and to have the judge before the committee. It was denied. The report was made to the house requiring the governor to remove him. We again, for some six hours, continued to solicit the tribunal for a summons, requiring the attendance of Judge Clarke before the bar of the house to answer to the charge, and as a mere act of grace and mercy, at the close of the day, an order was made for process against him. The officer found him engaged in the trial of two persons indicted for murder. The jury had just found the men guilty, and the judge was dragged from his court, leaving the verdict unconfirmed, and before the ensuing term the convicts broke jail and escaped justice. Now here are the proceedings in the case of Judge Clarke, and here is an exemplification of the glorious provision of my friend. Here is a large majority, sir, lacking but two votes of being two thirds, prepared to dismiss a judicial officer, for no other offence than deciding an act of the legislature unconstitutional. And sir, I beg you to bring your mind down and follow the history of the man to his grave, and tell me what was the judgment of the country upon that man so long as he lived. He afterwards filled a seat in congress as long as he chose. He was once a judge of your appellate bench; he was elected by the people of this commonwealth its chief magistrate; I believe, in purity and virtue, he may have had equals, but no superior in Kentucky. And it is to avoid scenes of this kind that I wish to guard the judiciary department. My colleague, in his impassioned and glowing eloquence, gave us the causes which led the legislature into the adoption of the relief system, and the violation of the constitution, and the temporary prostration of the appellate court. He is of opinion the like causes will never exist; that the execution laws of the state now protect the debtors' property against sacrifice. Sir, these laws are mutable; may be swept from your statute book, and I do not wish to leave the judiciary to the discretion of a bare majority of the legislature. I want the judiciary to act as a check and balance upon the other two departments of the government. I wish not to let the judge depend for his continuance in office, upon the mere will and pleasure of a majority of either branch of the legislature, or of both together.

Sir, I will not take the trouble, nor detain the committee, by reading the proceedings and votes of the house in the case of judge Clarke. But I shall request the reporter to append them to the remarks I make, not for any purpose of my own, but as a part of the history of the case. I want my constituents to see and know what will be the effect of placing the judiciary at the will and pleasure of the popular branch of the government. I want them to draw a lesson from the experience of the past.

Sir, my colleague referred to the reforms in the judicial department in our mother country. I admit that the revolution brought about a great reformation in favor of English liberty when they changed the tenure of judicial office. When they did that sir, however, claiming to be omnipotent, the parliament retained in their hands the power of removing the judges by address. Is that all sir? No. The concurrence of his majesty, the king, is necessary, besides the concurrence of a majority of parliament. Our ancestors, however, benefitted by experience, improved upon the English system. In order to better it and to secure American liberty, and the independence of the American government, they carried it yet further, and provided, as I think, in almost every American constitution, certain safe guards which were thrown around the judicial department of the government, which we claim shall be thrown around our judicial department in Kentucky. They did not leave to the will of a bare majority of the legislative department, the power of destroying the independence of the judiciary department. They accordingly incorporated into the American system, these further improvements upon the British system. They provided that the judiciary should not be controlled by the will of a majority; but for misdemeanors in office, they require higher evidence than the dictum of a popular majority before they shall be removed.

My worthy colleague brought himself to the conclusion yesterday, that there is very little difference between us, and by figures he attempted to prove that there is very little difference between a majority of the house and a vote of two thirds. I will not stop to work out that problem. I think there is, however, some difference. What has been the effect of this attempt to get clear of the judges by a popular vote of the house of representatives and the senate? I might call your attention to the attempt to get rid of judge Robbins, and I believe the main charge against him was, that he refused to appoint the son of a man, who had resigned his office, to a clerkship. But let us examine a little into our own history in reference to this attempt to put down the judiciary. I will not go abroad for precedents or opinions. I will refer to many instances in our own history and our own times, to support the position that I maintain on this floor. I stated the other day, that in all popular governments, based upon the will of a majority, that majority needed checks and balances and restraints upon itself; that it was necessary in the formation of an organic law in a popular government, if they wished to preserve public liberty and secure private rights, to throw restraints and safe guards around themselves. For uttering this sentiment, my colleague chose to say that it was the sentiment of a monarchist and a courtier. If it be so sir, it is one that I have imbibed by long reflection and from high authority.

Allow me to read an extract from the opinion of one well schooled in the science of government, (Mr. Rutledge, of South Carolina):

"Yes, sir, in popular governments constitutional checks are necessary for their preservation; the people want to be protected against themselves; no man is so absurd as to suppose the people collectively will consent to the prostration of their liberties; but if they be not shielded by some constitutional checks they will suffer them to be destroyed; to be destroyed by demagogues, who filch the confidence of the people by pretending to be their friends; demagogues who, at the time they are soothing and cajoling the people, with bland and captivating speeches, are forging chains for them; demagogues who carry daggers in their hearts, and seductive smiles in their hypocritical faces; who are dooming the people to despotism, when they profess to be exclusively the friends of the people. Against such designs and such artifices were our constitutional checks made to preserve the people of this country."

I will not stop to give you historical illustrations from other nations or times than our own. Sir, I will not content myself with quoting the opinions of this distinguished American statesman and jurist. I have authority nearer home, and authority that is entitled to more weight perhaps upon this question than the one I have just read. I will proceed to read from this last authority:

"The government of the people is divided into three distinct co-ordinate departments; one to make the laws, another to expound the laws, and a third to execute them. The departments emanate from the same great fountain of power, the people; they are equal and independent of each other, with a few exceptions, which shall be noticed hereafter. And it is necessary, in the nature of things, that it should be so; for the people intended, in making their government, that they should be checks and balances to each other.

"This great principle of three departments of governments, co-equal, co-ordinate and independent of each other, to a great extent, has been considered one of the pillars upon which this republic, that of the United States, and our sister states, are erected. It is an indispensable ingredient to the very existence of all republics."

Have you three co-ordinate equal departments of the government if you bring the judiciary to the footstool of the legislature? But to proceed, for these authorities are rich and abundant. Why, sir, Bonaparte, and Greece, and Rome, are good authority. So acknowledged, I believe, on all sides. But I read again:

"Gentlemen ought to be cautious whenever they depart from the fair, obvious, and manifest import of the constitution, as the same was wrote by the convention, in pursuit of what they suppose or call the public good; they are travelling on dangerous ground; it is nothing 'more or less than the plea of all tyrants and despots; for in their most wanton acts of oppression and cruelty, they plead the public good and the public necessity. Bonaparte pleaded necessity, public good, and the glory of France, for his conscriptions and wars. England relies on the same plea for her system of oppressive taxation, and her prostration of everything like civil liberty. John Adams had the same defence to make, for his alien and sedition laws, and all his acts of official misconduct and mal-administration. The truth is, no republic can exist long without a constitution, the charter of their liberties; and that charter amounts to nothing unless it is revered by all and obeyed by all, and never broken or evaded, either in letter or spirit, by any department of government, under any pretence whatever, even if it should assume the imposing name of public good or necessity. It is by imposing names and appearances we are always deceived. The tyrans beguiled by their music. Christ was betrayed by a kiss.

"We are told, in the next place, that the judges ought to be removed by way of asserting the supremacy of the legislature. That doctrine goes to an entire annihilation of the constitution and is subversive of all government. The constitution contains a delegation of power to the three departments of government; and also, it contains prohibitions and restrictions upon the three departments of government. Certain great fundamental rights are reserved to the people. The three departments are to check each other, if either exceed its constitutional power and encroach upon the other departments, or the great rights reserved to the people."

By this authority we are taught that if we leave the legislative power uncontrolled, it will be invoked to crush the independence of the judiciary department.

Again, sir, to continue the quotation:

"The people intended that the judicial department should be a check to the legislative, should that department attempt any unconstitutional act, any encroachment upon the great inalienable rights of the people. I would ask, how can that department be a check, if the other, by an ordinary act of legislation, can destroy it at will and pleasure?"

To do this is what the committee intended by the article under consideration, that it should constitute a constitutional check upon the other departments; that they should be responsible to the people who gave them their appointments, and that the legislature should act as a court to try them for crimes and misdemeanors.

"Will you not allow the judges to decide upon a constitutional question? Is it not their duty, when the question is brought before them? And will you turn them out of office for doing their duty, because you may suppose the opinion is wrong? Are our judges to be removed whenever the legislature may differ with them in opinion? If that be the tenure by which they hold their offices, then, I say, it is a brittle tenure, and our judiciary, instead of being a safeguard, a shield and buckler, to defend the property, liberty, and life of the citizen, is a mere mockery."

How can my colleague hope to see an independent judiciary under this constitution, if by the exercise of a mere act of legislation they can be removed from office?

Sir, the concluding remarks of a very able speech of my colleague, from which I have been reading, are emphatic.

"All republics have gone the same way; men of daring courage and unbounded ambition have played the demagogue, by abusing the honest officers of government, sounding alarms and crying out to the people, we are oppressed by those who administer the government, pretending a glowing love and an ardent devotion to the people. This course of conduct breaks the harmony of the government, produces discord, confusion, riots and tumults; still advancing, step by step, the climax is capped, by pushing the people into blind anarchy and wild uproar. In this state of things, the government is a prize to the first bold and daring adventurer. The history of all republics proves this assertion. Athens had her Pisistratus; Rome her Caesar; England her Cromwell, and France her Bonaparte."

This, sir, is the warning voice of my honorable colleague, an able and sound statesman of his day, delivered at a time, and upon an occasion, when the whole commonwealth of Kentucky was agitated from one extreme to the other; when mighty spirits on both sides were agitated, when, as it was thought, a destructive movement was made against the judiciary. He and others were standing on the ramparts of the constitution calling on the people to rally in support and defence of the time honored instrument which we are now called on to revise.

I rallied under his standard, as I remarked the other day, side by side, and shoulder to shoulder, in my humble way, aiding and assisting my colleague in implanting in the public mind those sentiments of justice and sound policy, which resulted, after a struggle unparalleled in excitement, in a settlement of this vexed question. I was conversing this morning with an old friend, who played a distinguished part in that conflict, being at that time a member of one branch of the legislature, and an important actor in the whole scene. Time has passed over him; the frost of many winters have caused him to reflect. He said, in his emphatic manner, if we had had then the lever of my colleague, we could have prized from office every judge in the state and triumphed in the struggle.

I invoke my colleague not to put this provision in the constitution; for when the crisis comes, if come it may, and God forbid it should ever come in my day, we may not have his voice to sustain the independence of the three co-ordinate branches of the government; and I ask him now to review his opinion upon this question before he votes upon it. I ask him to compare his opinion now, with the opinion that he formerly held, and tell me which he is willing to stand or fall by.

I have detained the committee longer than I should have done, had I been left to the exercise of my own judgment. I know I have been unable to do justice to the subject, but I have endeavored to present my views without recapitulating the positions that have been more ably taken by others on this question. My object has been to present specific authorities to show that the existence of this power, as we propose to continue it, has not proved detrimental to the interests of the commonwealth, or of her citizens; and that it is our duty, coming as we do, not to innovate upon great principles, which are intended to secure the liberties of the people, and the independence of the different departments of the government, but to improve them—it is our duty, I say, to adhere to those great principles. Having said thus much, I yield the question to the decision of the committee.

The question was then taken upon the motion to strike out the words "which are not the subjects of impeachment," and it was decided in the negative.

The question then being upon the motion to strike out "two-thirds," and insert "a majority," it also was decided in the negative.

Mr. HARDIN. My object in rising, is to enquire of my worthy colleague, what he means by the words in his report "the governor shall remove any one of them, upon an address of two thirds of both houses of the legislature." Does he mean that the governor is to sign these verdicts, as a part of the law-making power, or what does he mean? If he is to sign it as a resolution passed by both houses, as a component part of the law-making power, then he can veto it, notwithstanding it was passed by a vote of two thirds. I have conversed with some gentlemen here, and there appears to be a diversity of sentiment in regard to the meaning of this clause. It was necessary, perhaps, that the meaning should be distinctly understood. I am aware that it is not proper to refer to his action in committee, but one may guess—and I guess therefore, that the committee on the circuit courts—whether they decide that a majority or two thirds, shall be requisite to the passage of the resolution—intend that its passage shall of itself ipso facto, remove the judge, and that the governor shall have no negative power on the subject. If the governor is not to have a negative power, why not say so? If he is to have such a negative power, when and in what way is it to be exercised? Is the legislature to be brought to a stand still, like the legislature of Pennsylvania, in the days of old John McKay? I expect not. I do not design to make a speech but when we come into the house, when I shall have the opportunity of calling for the ayes and nays, I will there bring the question to a test. I move to strike out the words to which I have referred.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I had forgotten in my somewhat discursive remarks to refer to the objection indicated by my colleague against the governor having any agency in this matter of impeachment. The committee have adopted the same language as in the present constitution. I do not understand, nor does my colleague I suppose, that the governor or any one else, when the legislature is deciding upon questions of this kind, has any power over the subject. The language of the constitution as preserved in the report of the committee, is imperative that the governor shall remove. It leaves no discretion with the executive as is left with the British crown, or as left to the executive in the Massachusetts constitution—where it says that a majority may remove when the governor and his council shall concur. It is altogether imperative; and after the passage of such a resolution, the question naturally arises, who is the most appropriate power to execute this judgment of the legislature? If the legislature merely passes the resolution of removal, and then adjourns and goes home, perhaps the judge might, if he choose, hold on to his commission and attempt to exercise the power. As the governor is the chief executive officer of this commonwealth, though my colleague desires, and I think I shall go with him, to strip him of all power save that of appointing a secretary perhaps, or of giving entertaining parties to the legislature when they meet here, I thought at least we might entrust to him the execution of the judgment of this high court of impeachment, or high inquisition of the State. And looking a little further, the governor is to issue writs of election in cases when vacancies occur. And who is there more appropriate than the executive, at the order of the judgment of the legislature, to notify the people by a writ of election that a vacancy has occurred. However, if I can conciliate my colleague, and get him to go with me for a single provision of the bill, I will consent that he may strike the governor's name out of it.

Mr. HARDIN. I would cheerfully yield any thing in the world, and be cap in hand to my worthy cousin and colleague; and his turning around to me and saying that we would perhaps leave the governor the power of appointing a secretary, could not but remind me of what Enneas said to Dido when she required him to relate the taking of Troy—

"Great Queen what you command me to relate,
But renews the sad remembrance of my fate."

Now I enquired more out of curiosity than any thing else, of the worthy President of this body, who I consider one of the most learned men in law and in constitutional law in Kentucky, what was meant by the clause to which I have referred? He said he thought it gave to the governor a veto power. It was in the most innocent manner that I called his attention to it, and his opinion ascertained, my suspicions were aroused.

The gentleman says the king of Great Britain has a veto upon the address of parliament to remove a judge. I know that is so, but I have examined with a great deal of care and attention the exercise of the veto power by the kings of Great Britain, and if there is a single instance of such exercise since the abdication of James II, it has escaped my attention. There never was a nation in the world, that except in name, and a great many forms perhaps, was more republican than Great Britain. The crown does not interfere with the acts of parliament at all. It is not responsible for any thing that is done at all—for the king, in the language of their government, can do no wrong. The reason is that he does nothing at all. His ministry is responsible for all that is done wrong, and they get the credit for all that is done right. And whenever the nation does not approve of what the ministry has done or is doing at the time, they turn them out—and the signal is, bringing them to a small majority in the house of commons. The curiosity of this house has perhaps often been excited, why it was that the ministry of Great Britain always resigns when they are brought to a lean majority, say of twenty, thirty, or forty votes in the house of commons. I never could get exactly at the reason until I read a book prepared by a gentleman whose name I regret to have forgotten, who had been a member of parliament for about thirty years. The members of parliament get no pay—not even the pitiful sum of three dollars per diem. Nor are they obliged to submit to the humiliations of having an attorney general or first auditor enquiring whether the sum could not be reduced to two dollars, if they sat too long. Sixty days is the time these two great functionaries seem to have fixed upon as the period during which we are to sit in this house. The members of the British Parliament I say get no pay. The profits of the collections of the internal revenue in Great Britain are worth about three millions a year. Whenever a member of Parliament votes with the Ministry they give to him the appointing power of all the collecting officers of the internal revenue in his county. If there are two members who both vote with the Ministry, then the power is divided among them, or if there is one member from a county for, and another against them, the former gets all the power of appointment. And these appointments, it was notorious they sold, and sometimes they derived therefrom from 50,000 to 100,000 pounds sterling. Now, it will be seen why it is that the Ministry resigns the moment they find themselves in but a small majority in the House of Commons; they know the treasury rats are leaving them, and they do not wish to be left alone, because these rats have an instinctive premonition of a falling house. They are like the rats who come home in a ship from a voyage around the world, and who have an instinctive knowledge as to whether she is seaworthy or not, and if she is not they immediately leave her and go to another vessel; that is the reason.

Now, the king's veto, as I have before said, has never been exercised within my knowledge since the abdication of James II. It is as formal as John Doe, in the trial of an action of ejectment. It is merely necessary to the form of the British government. And whenever the British parliament, by the action of both houses, should remove a judge, the king would never dare exercise his veto power. And why? Because it would produce a ferment in the parliament, and throughout the land, that would end, God only knows where. What was the reason that Louis XVI was dethroned and imprisoned? It was but for the exercise of merely the slightest veto power. And they called him Monsieur Veto, and his wife the Austrian, and Madame Veto. They dethroned Louis and brought his head to the block in France, for thwarting and crossing the popular will.

Now, the governor has no hand in the election of these judges. They are to be elected by, and to be responsible to, the people. Therefore, he has no right to interfere in their removal. I have the utmost confidence in the present governor, and I shall have the utmost confidence, I suppose, in whoever shall be his successor.—And, in relation to the present governor, we should remember, in the language of Queen Elizabeth, in reference to the Archbishop of Canterbury, "we frocked him and will unfrock him."

There are a great many motions I mean to make in regard to this bill, and my colleague cannot buy me off. Not at all. I am not to be bought off with a crust of bread or a sop in the pan. I strike at and shall vote against the four judges. I strike at and shall vote against the branching of the court of appeals. I have been looking over the two first volumes of Judge Craneh. The first, I think, has about twenty-three cases, fifteen of which came from the District of Columbia. The second has about twenty cases, and all but five of them came from the District of Columbia. And why? Just because justice was at their very door, and whenever you bring the court of appeals into four districts, they will exhibit, not a District of Columbia in miniature, but in bold relief. I believe that it would so overburden the courts with business, that they would not be able to get through with it. And although, perhaps, it would be a personal benefit to me, by bringing the court nearer to my door, I shall oppose the proposition to branch it.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I hope these words will not be stricken out. The belligerents, from my old native county of Nelson, cannot compromise this constitution. I hope and trust the convention will act discreetly on this subject. The gentleman from Nelson, who has last spoken, asked me what was meant by the clause to which reference has been made. I supposed he was acquainted with the constitution of Kentucky, and I said to him that the governor, as I understood it, would have a right to exercise the veto power in this case—that is, on the supposition that we retained the present provision of the constitution, and which is as follows:

"Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the governor, and before it shall take effect, be approved by him; or, being disapproved, shall be re-passed, by a majority of all the members elected to both houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill."

Then, if we remove by address of both houses, it is an order—a resolution; it goes to the executive, and if he approves, he signs and executes it. If he disapproves he sends it back. His disapproval amounts to a call for a re-consideration before the tribunal. And upon that re-consideration, if a majority of both houses insist, the order is executed.

I have made up my mind in relation to my vote on this subject of appointments to office. And that is, we shall take these appointments from the governor and give them to the people of the state at large, or of the districts, counties, &c. To that extent we will strip the executive of all power; but I am not prepared to destroy the office. I do not mean to attempt to make the stool stand on less than three legs. I wish to retain such powers in the executive as is due to an officer elected by the whole people of Kentucky to see her laws faithfully executed. I believe it is just and proper in addition to this two thirds requisition to give the executive the power of throwing back for re-consideration any hasty act the legislature may have performed in the exercise of their power. The judiciary is the weakest branch in this government. They will always be the weakest, constituting now in the court of appeals, and in the circuit court, and in the chancery court, I believe some twenty three individuals—a number which I have no doubt, instead of increasing, we shall diminish. We have confided to them the power of deciding upon the rights of individuals, of bringing the public justice of the commonwealth to bear upon those who offend against her laws, of deciding the rights of individuals as they arise under the laws and contracts permitted in society, peaceably, quietly, without making any of those appeals to the great interests of the community, or the passions of men that attract to them popularity, and with that popularity, power. And in the discharge of those duties, the losing party attributing too often his defeat to the judge, and thus exciting murmurs among the people, the dissatisfaction of learned and distinguished counsel, all having its influence on the public mind against them, and they not mingling with or taking any interest in the great scenes that lead to popularity and power in this country—they are the weakest power. They will be the weakest power. This constant attrition on the public mind, that is lowering them in the estimation of the people, is constantly going on, and I do not wish to throw down any one of the barriers that is to sustain and shield them from wrong and oppression. If they deserve to be removed, let it be by two thirds of the tribunal we have organized. And let the governor, chosen by the whole people, and the representative in addition of that minority who have voted against the removal, have the power to recall this great tribunal for a re-consideration of their action. Let us show that, in restoring these appointments to the people, we do not intend to strip the executive of all power and consideration—that we expect the individual who attains the proud elevation of governor of the commonwealth of Kentucky to be a man of character, intellect, and integrity, such a one as will never throw back upon the legislature their action for re-consideration, unless in his conscience he believes there is ample cause. In such a case a re-consideration is necessary and proper. The question comes up legitimately and properly when we come to the powers of the executive, and not just in this place; but I am prepared to meet it with my vote now as then.

Mr. TURNER said, with a view to expedite business and to confine the discussion to the topics under consideration, he desired to propose a plan which had met the sanction of those of the leading members of the convention with whom he had consulted. It was a series of amendments, to the report as a whole, on which when discussion was terminated, the question could at once be taken separately. The amendment, which had just been discussed was not included, for he concurred with the president in his views in regard to the veto power. And if that power was retained, another amendment to the report would be needed so as to require two thirds to concur, in reiterating the decision of the legislature upon which the veto had been brought to bear. The constitution as it now stands only requires a majority to reverse a veto, and this was one reason why he supposed the veto power did not apply in cases of these removals from office. He was very willing that the new constitution should be made so to apply, because he did believe that judges elected for a limited term would have any too much independence of the popular feeling and prejudices. He then expressed a desire to be heard to-morrow on this question, and read a series of amendments to the report, which he intended that he should offer.

Mr. NUTTALL. I thought I discovered a very few days after we assembled here that some three or four gentlemen of this body intended to take upon themselves the privilege of making this constitution, and that the balance of us might exclaim, "we had no part or lot in the house of David," and "to your tents oh Israel." If that be the case, I am willing now to have issued a writ of de idiota inquirendo over the balance of the members, and to set these gentlemen apart to revise the organic law of Kentucky.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I rise to a point of order—I may as well make it here as at any other point. Mr. M. then called attention to the rule requiring amendments to be made to the section at the time under consideration, as being the point which he desired to raise.

Mr. NUTTALL. I am very sorry that the gentleman thought proper to bring this motion down on me just as I was about to do something. If the independence of the judiciary is to be lost, it will, if this committee will adopt an amendment to the eighth section that I now propose, at least save its character.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I hope we will proceed to take the question on the amendments as they are proposed, and when we come to the 8th section, the amendment indicated by the gentleman will be in order. I barely wish to excuse myself from any imputation of desiring to restrain the gentleman from Henry or any other from participating in this work of framing the constitution. I am very willing that he shall do it, and I know he will whether I am willing or not. I know him very well, and I will venture to say that he will have his full share in making this constitution in some way.

Mr. NUTTALL. Just as certain as the Lord lives I will. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDIN. I want to meet again this afternoon, so as to give my friend from Henry a chance. I would rather he would take the after part of the day, for he will be in better order then, than at any other time. [Laughter.]

Before Mr. NUTTALL'S amendment was read, or any question taken on Mr. Turner's proposition, the committee rose and reported progress. Leave was granted to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1849.

APPROPRIATIONS BY THE LEGISLATURE.

On the motion of Mr. JAMES, the following resolution was agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to enquire into the expediency and propriety of so amending the constitution as to prohibit the legislature from passing any bill, or resolution, for the appropriation of money, or creating any debt against the state, or for the payment of money in any way whatever, unless such bill, or resolution, shall be voted for by a majority of all the members then elected to each branch of the legislature, and said vote to be spread upon the journals of each house.

THE ELECTION FOR CASEY COUNTY.

Mr. BALLINGER presented a memorial accompanied by a statement of facts signed by some one hundred and twenty five persons, in relation to the election of the sitting delegate for the county of Casey, which he moved to refer to the select committee, having that subject in charge.

Mr. HARDIN made a brief statement of the reasons why the report of the committee on the subject had been delayed so long. On examining the case he found that it involved many difficult questions. He was satisfied that the gentlemen who did not fill up their votes on Monday had no right to do so on Wednesday, but it was alleged that the judges of elections informed them that they would have the right to do so. Important questions consequently arose that would require a report of some length. He would however endeavor to present it in a few days.

The motion to refer was then agreed to.

PROPOSITIONS TO AMEND.

Mr. TURNER offered the following amendments to which he yesterday called the attention of the committee of the whole, that they might be printed, and referred to the committee of the whole having in charge the report of the committee on the court of appeals.

1. Strike out of the third section these words—"they shall, at stated times, receive for their services an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law," and insert these words—"each judge shall receive for his services not less than $— per annum."

2. Strike out the fifth section.

3. Amend the seventh section by striking out these words—"to the district in which such judge was elected," in the second and third lines; and strike out of the fourth line the words "by that district."

4. Amend the eighth section and second and third lines by striking out these words—"and who is a resident of the appellate district for which he may be chosen."

5. Strike out the ninth section and insert in its stead this—"the court of appeals shall hold its sessions at the capital of the state."

6. Amend the tenth section by striking out of the third line these words—"in each district in which a vacancy may occur."

7. Amend the eleventh section by striking out in the first line these words—"in each appellate district;" and in the second line strike out the word "thereof," and insert these words in its place—"of the state," and strike out of the same line the words "for such district."

8. Amend the twelfth section by striking out of the second line these words—"the district in which he may be elected," and inserting in their place the word "state."

9. Amend the thirteenth section by striking out of the second line these words—"in any district;" and out of the third line these words—"to that district" and the word "thereof;" and out of the fourth line these words—"for that district."

10. Strike out the fifteenth section, which is in the amended report, and all the amendments proposed to the fifth section.

Mr. WILLIAMS called for a division, so that the question could first be taken on the motion to refer. He saw no necessity for the printing.

Mr. GRAY asked if it was in order to present these amendments at this time.

The PRESIDENT replied that he thought it was entirely in order; indeed he had no question about it.

Mr. GRAY said it was yesterday decided to be out of order for a member to present diverse and sundry amendments which embrace the entire bill. It seemed to him that each of the amendments should be offered separately to each distinct section to which they apply, and that they could not be presented in mass in this way.

Mr. DIXON did not understand the gentleman from Madison to offer his amendments in mass; he simply offered them in the house that they might be printed, and referred to the committee of the whole, with the view of offering them separately at the proper time. He thought it was perfectly in order.

Mr. TURNER desired to explain: one of the amendments which he had proposed was to do away with the district system in the election of the judges of the court of appeals. The necessity for the other amendments was that the same idea ran through many sections, and when they were printed, it would be perfectly obvious to gentlemen, whether they were in favor of electing by the state at large or by districts. If the convention would order them to be printed, their bearing on the report of the committee on the court of appeals would be readily seen. It was for the convenience of gentlemen that he made this motion, and not with the view of submitting them for the action of the convention in mass. They would be offered separately in committee of the whole to the sections to which they apply.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE enquired whether the adoption of this motion would have the effect of giving precedence to these amendments in committee of the whole.

The PRESIDENT replied that the committee having reported their plan for a court of appeals and having themselves reported distinct amendments, he conceived it was in order for any gentleman to make distinct amendments or propositions to that report. It was in the province of the convention to order such propositions to be printed and referred to some committee; but when in committee of the whole, the rules that govern it would be applied and these propositions would not have any precedence. They might be offered and there was a propriety, when a change was contemplated in the whole aspect of the report, that the member should indicate it, and that it should be printed, so that its bearing might be seen. Hence the chair deemed this motion to print and refer to be in order.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. NUTTALL said he also had an amendment of which he wished to make the same disposition. It was designed to be inserted at the foot of the eighth section.

The Secretary read it as follows:

Provided, however, That if any candidate for the office of judge of the court of appeals, or any of the circuit courts to be established in this commonwealth, shall engage in public speaking or treating, during his candidacy for such offices, or either of them, upon information, in writing, supported by the oaths of two or more respectable witnesses, to the attorney general of the state, he shall, in the event of the election of such candidate, thereupon cause to be issued from the clerk's office of the circuit court, at the seat of government, a caveat against such judge, which shall be returnable to the succeeding general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky, who shall try him according to the rules and regulations by this constitution provided for the trial of judges for other offences, and upon conviction thereof, he shall be adjudged disqualified from holding said office, and the governor shall not, before the trial nor after the conviction in such case, commission such judge.

Mr. NUTTALL said it was very evident that the judges were to be elected, and, although his amendment was not couched in the language he could wish, if it were printed the convention would be enabled to see the idea which he wished to embody, and some gentleman might be induced to take some steps to secure a provision which shall prevent the judges from entering into the election contests which would take place under the new constitution.

The motion to print and refer was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the convention is now engaged in the most important business upon which it will be called to act during the session. I think the judiciary department is a matter of infinitely more interest than that of any other department or all other departments of the government besides. Now I conceive that an innovation on that department is about to be made by this convention which will be in my judgment fraught with consequences of the greatest mischief to the country. No government—no constitution, that does not secure an able, learned, and impartial judiciary, is worth possessing. And when any principle is about to be introduced into the constitution which would be subversive of those great ends of government and of the judicial department itself, it seems to me it is the duty of every person thus convinced to offer every opposition to the introduction of such a monstrous principle.

I had hoped that the minds of men whose ability and experience in connection with the courts of the country, and with the framing of constitutions, and the introduction of great constitutional principles into such an instrument, would have taken a part in resisting that great and mischievous innovation, which in the absence of a better champion I feel somewhat disposed to offer myself.

I understand that it is the order of proceeding in convention that propositions in relation to the judiciary shall be submitted to the house and have a reference to the committee of the whole, and be printed, that they may have a proper consideration. I did suppose myself that a different mode would have been adopted, but I shall not object to any mode, provided it will enable each member to present his views and have a just consideration of any proposition which he may deem it important to present to the convention.

This affords a more deliberate consideration to the convention, and gives the advantage of having it in print, so that the members of the convention may examine it more carefully and deliberately. In conformity to that course, and to what has been adopted by several members this morning, especially by my friend from Henry (Mr. Nuttall) I will submit a proposition which I intend to offer as a substitute for the report of the committee, in relation to the appellate court; and in doing so I do not propose to make any remarks at large; but I will say to the gentleman from Henry, that he is striking but at some, at a small portion of the inherent evils which will attend the new system of submitting the election of the judges to the popular vote.

I think myself, sir, as we value an able, a learned, and an impartial judiciary—as we estimate the value of the rights of persons, of property, of liberty, and of reputation—and as we expect to secure to the citizens their enjoyment of these rights through the intervention of laws, just laws, properly administered by wise and independent tribunals, that that innovation upon the present system ought to be resisted. I may stand alone in this body, or in this state, in vindication of that position; but whether alone or whether I have allies enough to enable me to maintain it, of which I have no hope, still I intend to maintain it, because I believe that every duty which I owe to my state and to the government of my state, requires that I should attempt, as far as in me lies, to prevent the establishment of any such principle in the constitution of the state of Kentucky.

I will submit and ask that it be printed, a substitute in support of which at a proper time I may say something in committee of the whole. I regret exceedingly that I am called upon to say anything in its support. I regret exceedingly that the mind that conceived such a proposition as has been offered to this convention, and which pointed out so justly and so forcibly its weakness, and the attacks to which it was perpetually accessible—that that mind did not conceive it to be its duty to have entered upon the vindication of the present principle in the constitution which stands sanctioned by time and experience. And I had hoped that if that mind had not felt bound to perform such a work that some other and more experienced mind would have come up to the work. I regret beyond any language I can use to have to perform a task so arduous and so difficult. But still unequal as I feel to the task, I feel bound to undertake the work myself in the absence of a better champion.

The secretary read the amendment as follows:

ARTICLE —.

Concerning the Judicial Department.

Sec. 1. The judicial power of this commonwealth, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in one supreme court, which shall be styled the court of appeals, and in such inferior courts as the general assembly may, from time to time, erect and establish.

Sec. 2. The court of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the state, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law.

Sec. 3. The judges of the court of appeals shall hold their offices for the term of eight years, and until their successors shall be duly qualified, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly: Provided, however, That the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in such address, and on the journal of each house. They shall, at stated times, receive for their services an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law.

Sec. 4. The court of appeals shall consist of four judges, any three of whom may constitute a court for the transaction of business. The judges shall, by virtue of their office, be conservators of the peace throughout the state. The style of all process shall be, "The Commonwealth of Kentucky." All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and conclude, "against the peace and dignity of the same."

Sec. 5. That the governor of the commonwealth shall, from among the judges of the inferior courts, and such persons as shall have been judges thereof, nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint the judges of the court of appeals.

Sec. 6. That the court of appeals shall appoint its clerk, who shall be a citizen of the state of Kentucky, and who shall hold his appointment for and during the term of years, subject to be removed by said court, upon specific charges, filed by the attorney general. And whenever there may be charges pending against the clerk, the said court shall appoint a clerk to perform the duties of the office for the time.

Sec. 7. That all fees accruing for services rendered by the clerk of the court of appeals, shall be collected from the proper parties under the direction of the auditor of public accounts, and be paid into the treasury of the State, and said clerk shall receive for his compensation an annual salary of $. The number, appointment, and compensation, of his deputies, and the other necessary expenditures of his office, shall be regulated by law.

The motion to refer and print was agreed to.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said, in consequence of some remarks thrown out a few days ago respecting the increase of counties, he felt bound to ask for the appointment of a select committee, for which purpose he would offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prescribe the mode and manner in which new counties shall be established, so as to prevent the unnecessary increase of counties.

The resolution was agreed to, and the chair appointed as the committee, Messrs. C. A. Wickliffe, Mayes, G. W. Johnston, Boyd, and Apperson.

HOUR OF MEETING AND ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. RUDD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That this convention will meet from and after this day at 9 o'clock, and continue in session until two o'clock.

He said in support of this resolution that there had been three amendments offered this morning to the report which had been for some days under consideration in committee of the whole, in relation to the court of appeals, and as much more time would be required to discuss these amendments he thought the sittings of the convention should be extended so as to afford more time to gentlemen to discuss them than they had had heretofore. Another reason was that he saw manifested in this house a disposition to hold evening sessions. If, however, this resolution were adopted the convention would be five hours a day in session, which would afford the convention sufficient time to do its business. For these reasons he submitted this resolution, and if there were to be any difficulty about it he would call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT suggested that it would be necessary that the resolution should lie over for one day under the rules.

Mr. DIXON said the resolution was entirely out of order. The gentleman could not propose to deprive this house of its right to adjourn at any time.

Mr. RUDD was perfectly aware of that. He knew the house had the right to adjourn at any time, and even for three days at a time, but if this resolution were passed it would hold the house to a responsibility which they would not disregard by adjourning at one o'clock or even sooner.

The PRESIDENT explained that by the rules of the house 10 o'clock, A. M., was fixed as the hour of meeting, which could not be changed without a two third vote. That portion of the resolution in relation to the adjournment he held to be out of order.

Mr. RUDD had no desire to be out of order, and therefore he would amend his resolution, so as to embrace that part that was in order, on which he desired the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOYD suggested that as a similar resolution had been heretofore offered, the consideration of which was postponed to Monday next, it would be desirable to postpone this resolution to the same time. He would therefore make that motion.

The motion was agreed to; yeas 42, nays 34.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. MERIWETHER, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Wright, for an indefinite period, that gentleman having been called home in consequence of sickness in his family.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the court of appeals.

Mr. TURNER. I understand that although we are restricted in our action to one proposition at a time, yet we are permitted to embrace in the discussion the entire merits of the subject. I have listened to this debate, the ablest I have heard in any deliberative body, with a great deal of interest, but still I think there are views of the subject which as yet have not been fully presented, and it is under this belief that I now trespass on the patience of the committee to express my views on the various propositions touching the judiciary. And I hope the fact, that as the profession in the pursuit of which I have expended the best part of my days, is intimately connected with this subject, will be my excuse for so doing.

I came here determined to remove the power of appointing the judges from the governor, and to go for their election by the people—although it was with great hesitancy that my mind was brought to that point. But I believe the country has settled down in favor of the elective principle, and that the majority of the people of my own county, although there is considerable division of opinion there, are decidedly in favor of it; and there is such a prejudice now existing against executive appointments, as would, in a great measure, do away with their usefulness. There is an opinion prevailing throughout the country, whether right or wrong, that almost every executive that has been elected in this commonwealth of either party, has collected around him from one circumstance or another a great many individuals who keep the great body of the people from having any influence with the executive department of the government. I do not believe this myself, but there is an impression abroad that the executives have been influenced by favoritism and by cliques, and not by considerations of qualification and capacity in their appointments to office. And there have been many appointments made within the last twenty years which would at least give a color to such an impression. I have therefore determined to go for an elective judiciary, but in doing that, I must have those guarantees and safe-guards thrown around it that I think are necessary and essential to secure its independence. It is the judiciary of every country which gives character to its government—and it is in their honesty and purity, their intelligence and independence, that the safety of the life, liberty, and property of the citizen depends. The executive or legislative department to-day may hold one language, and the change in the current of public opinion may cause them to speak another to-morrow. In the congress of the United States, there will be at one election one party, and at the very next election another party in power. It is the same in the governments of the various states of this union. But the judiciary should speak the same language in all times and countries, and to do that it must be independent not only of the other departments of the government, but in some measure of the appointing power itself after the appointment has been bestowed. Is any man's life and liberty secure, where he has a judge to try him, who is the mere index of popular excitement and prejudice, and whose decisions vary as it varies? Would our rights and property be safe under judges of that description—the mere index of the way the popular breezes are blowing—and what would be the consequence to all investments of property and capital, under a judiciary system which every six or twelve months should hold a different doctrine in regard to the rules and contracts in relation thereto? What but utter ruin and destruction? There can be no security or confidence in any thing that relates to such a judiciary.

I have had great doubts about the propriety of appointing a judiciary for a term of years, but the public opinion of the country is so entirely unanimous in favor of it, that, as a matter of course, my own feeble voice hardly ought to be heard as expressing doubts in relation to the subject at all. Yet, I have greater doubts about it than I have as to the propriety of their election by the people—much greater. I believe that an elective judiciary, with proper guards, such as to hold their offices during good behavior, to be rendered independent by the constitution by fixing their salaries, and to be removed by two thirds, and not a bare majority, may be better than any system we have ever had. But, unless we can have all these points secured, the government cannot get along. Look at the government we are about to pull down. I supposed—to use a farmer's simile—that when we came here to perform that work, we were going to leave to the old government, at least, three rails, but I think now the chances are that we shall scarcely leave it one rail. And really a constitution is a fence, a wall thrown around to guard the liberties and rights of property of the people. If the people desired all power in their hands, they could have it without a constitution and without a legislature. The very object of making a constitution, and for which they sent us here, is to guard the people against the results of an unchecked exercise of their own power, and to protect the rights of every citizen in the commonwealth. And, the constitution, instead of being solely for the benefit of the aristocracy and wealthy, is for the great security of the poor man, of the weak against the powerful and the mighty.

The poor and the weak have no security in any government, where the constitution does not restrain within their proper spheres and proper limits, the great and powerful men of the country. It is the poorer portion of the country who are the most interested in having a stable and independent judiciary who is to carry the government into effect? Who, when the legislature or the executive are disposed to trample down the rights of the great body of the community is to protect them? They appeal to the judiciary to come to their aid and to say to these other departments—thus far your power goes and no further. Gentlemen talk to me about the people, and of their possessing all power in themselves. I am aware of that, and the people have sent us here to take away a portion of that power, to confide it to their agents, and to put restraints on those agents. And one of the great principles which they desire shall not be invaded, is that each department is to be confined in its action, to its own particular duties.

Well, I have indicated that I am going for an elective judiciary. In going for it, I regret separating from my friend from Bourbon, because I believe him to be one of the ablest and purest men in this body. I have had my doubts whether in separating from him I was right, but yet I have determined at this point to do so. I will do it on certain conditions. What have we come here for? And why have any of us desired a seat in this convention? Was it to secure a momentary popularity among the people, to be swept away by the first adverse breeze that comes along? Or was it not to do that which will endure us to posterity for the benefits we have conferred upon them, and give to our names fame and veneration among those who come after us, and at the same time furnish an example in the modeling of a government which other states would be proud to follow.

If the first set of officers that are appointed under this new constitution we are about to create, are not men of the highest standard of intellect, integrity, and purity, then will that new constitution become obnoxious to the people. It will be said by every body, you have made a government that cannot be administered, and which is neither practical nor right. You have done away with the old constitution made by our fathers, and you have given us one in its stead, that does not work well, and that does not realize that amount of benefit to us that we expected when we sent you here to make it. We may get thereby an ephemeral popularity of a few months or year's duration, but its beneficial and practical operation for years to come is what we are sent to secure. And how shall we secure that? We must do it by making the judiciary the great pillar of the government—that branch of the government which is the guardian of liberty and of every right that is dear to man. Its action should always be uniform, and based on principles the same in all ages and at all times. We must make the judiciary stable and independent, and then only shall we make it a benefit to the community. Now, twenty five years ago, when men were struggling with the old and new court question, was it not then manifest that the judiciary was the weakest department of the government? As then organized it was weaker than the legislature or the executive? And in fact the legislature was then more powerful than both of the other departments together. And in what we are now doing we must, in some way, supply those props that support the weakness of the judiciary, which we are now about to take away. We are stripping away all power from the executive, and giving it to the people, so that that department of the government when we get through will not amount to anything. The man who would then take the office would merely have a right to be called governor, and have every old lady and tippler in the country petitioning him to remit fines, and, perhaps in addition, the power to pardon. But he would have no patronage in his hands, and if all that was proposed here was to be carried out the office would be a mere shadow.

Well, instead of adding strength to the judiciary, we are going to provide for its election, and to change the tenure of their offices from good behaviour to a term of years, and then as a matter of course bring them nearer to the political power, and more under the influence of the legislature. The legislature is composed of individuals mixing with the people, constantly going back to them, and having perpetual connection with them. The judiciary, from the necessities of their avocations, are aloof from the people, and do not associate with them. Indeed it would be considered unbecoming and undignified for them to go into those circles which the political portions of the government go into. Moreover, every decision of a judge makes him one enemy for every friend; and it must also be recollected that the recollection of an enemy is an hundred per cent. more retentive than that of a friend. Then you have all the power of the bar in opposition to the judge. I wish to speak of my profession with respect, but it is in accordance with human nature. But the whole corps of lawyers will be candidates in opposition to the judge, and being therefore interested in rendering him unpopular, will be continually striking at him—those of them at least who desire his situation. The result may be that the country may be influenced to believe him an incompetent judge, and as wanting in all the requisites that enter into the composition of an intelligent judicial officer. You weaken him therefore in his position, and in the very points where he is now most strongly sustained. The judge now holds his office during good behaviour, and what is the effect? Every lawyer is desirous of being friendly with him—for a great many people think, that the best way to gain a cause, though not the best way to act, is to have your judge like you—and the bar are generally disposed to sustain the judge. Again, it must be remembered that there will be an ever-changing current of popular opinion and parties in the country. Elect, at the first election, a judge of one particular party, and by the time he is ready to go out, the popular current will have changed, and another party will be in power. Then political prejudices will begin to be excited in the choice of a judge, and the influences of party will be brought to sustain and oppose him. With all those influences to which I have referred against him, it seems to me that we should sustain him in every way that we can. When we look at the great power that will be brought to bear against a judge, the influence that the bar will be inclined to use against him, and the fact that his duties claim his whole and undivided attention, prevent him from shaking hands with and making friends, giving parties, etc., we are undoubtedly called upon to give him some power to sustain himself against all these influences. If we do not, the government will go down the first year of its operation, or to use a more homely phrase, it will stick in the mud.

I voted yesterday for the two thirds requisition to remove the judge, and I am now in favor of still further sustaining him, by allowing the governor to have a discretionary power after two thirds of the legislature shall say that he shall give up his office, of returning, for good cause, the question back again to the legislature for reconsideration. And when we come to that clause of the constitution read by the President yesterday, I want instead of a majority to reverse the veto, to have a two thirds vote required also for that purpose. This was one reason that induced me to suppose this veto power, under the present constitution, did not apply to cases of impeachment. It would be a most extraordinary feature in a government to say that in the first instance it should take two thirds to remove a judge, and the governor from good and sufficient reasons gives his veto thereupon, that then a bare majority should be sufficient to affirm the decision notwithstanding that veto. I wish at the proper time, to move to amend this, so as to require a two thirds vote after the veto—and this as a further protection to the judiciary.

And now as to the question of salary. I think it ought to be fixed in the constitution at a sufficient minimum—to do what? To induce the great and distinguished lawyers of the country, who are qualified, and have reputation and talents, and character for honesty and firmness, and all other requisites for a competent judge to offer their services, and go into the judiciary. For I have no wish to fill our benches with a set of little ninepenny judges, under an elective system, with all those powers to which I have referred arrayed against them. They would never be able to get along—the government would go down—and the people would call another convention to reverse what we have done. It is essential to the firmness and independence of the judiciary, that it should possess powerful talents to sustain itself. I want no third rate judges in the court of appeals and in the circuit courts to battle against the mighty power that will surround them at all times. It will never do, and we must offer and pay a salary that will induce the first legal minds of the state to quit the practice of their profession and take the office. As a member of the legislature, I have never been a high salary man, but to secure the first class men we must pay what their services require before you can organize a judiciary here that will not cost more than the present. I believe that with a dozen or fifteen circuit judges, for instance, comprising the ablest, most talented, and hardest working men, that they will do the business better, and in a shorter time than the nineteen we now have. I mean no disrespect, but so far as I am acquainted, there are very few able men among them. I believe we can, by getting better men, have the judicial business performed at as cheap a rate as it now costs the government. We would have fewer men to do it, and better work done than by the many. I would therefore fix in the constitution such a salary as would secure the ablest men in the judiciary; and I believe if we do not, we shall not get along with an elective judiciary. I am satisfied it will not do to give the legislature the power of fixing the salary. If it was left to the next legislature—I have looked over the list and they are very clever men—I do not believe on a call of the ayes and noes they would fix the salary of a judge of the court of appeals at more than $500. I hope, as the gentleman from Bourbon says, that none of us intend to seek for office, and that we all mean to do right. I believe he has some proposition that no member of this convention shall be a candidate for office within ten years. If that is adopted, gentlemen of my years may as well give up all hope. But I am ready to vote for it, if it would not cut off a great many worthy young men, I see around me, from serving the people.

There has been something said about districting and branching the court of appeals. Well you have discovered pretty early in the session that I dare to speak my mind on any subject, and I am going to do it on this. Although I have moved to strike out the provision, I am not very anxious on this subject of districting the court. If I believed that we were to have a judiciary to be composed of the members of one party alone I would not go for it. I believe the court ought to be composed of members of both parties, and it has been my experience in attending court, that it would be better, and I have seen courts organized in that way, at all times, and that there would be less prejudice against it. And if I believed there would be a disposition to make this a political court, and that the two parties would meet and nominate judges of their own party exclusively, though I belong to a party now in a political majority in this state, I would not make this motion. I make it because it seems to be connected with this branching of the court of appeals, because as it is left to the legislature to make the districts they might throw into the court men not so well qualified as we would get having the whole state to elect from. There may be districts in the state, that have no individual sufficiently qualified for the office. In my experience it has been a great while since I thought the court of appeals was an able body. I will not dispute that there are clever men in it, but if there has been any man of transcendent talents there, for a long time, then I have been mistaken. I think there ought to be one man of towering abilities there—one who could take the great questions of boundary between the state and federal power when it comes up there, and grapple with them like a giant. I believe that we ought to frame such a constitution, and offer such a salary as would command such a man at the head of the judiciary of a great and independent state.

As to branching the court I am against it in every way and shape in which it could be named, because then I believe you never will get a set of men to accept the offices, for any salary this government will give. Such a set of men I mean, as ought to fill them. A judge of the court of appeals is not like the circuit judge. For the latter, all that is necessary is that he should be a sensible man, and a good lawyer, and be able to come to correct conclusions. He is not required to write them out for publication. But when you come to the court of appeals, you must have men of learning, education—men of transcendent abilities if you can get them, because the state that pays only for ordinary talents, in these times, throws away its money. You had better give a large, a high salary, and let your judiciary be stable and uniform in its decisions, instead of vacillating and varying with every flare up that public excitement may array against them. Let them have character, talents, and learning, so as to be able to carry public opinion with them. Let them move on like a torrent, and public opinion will move with them. They have to write out their opinions, to give their reasons, and to print them, and they should have the talents and the learning requisite for this. To secure all these qualifications, we should pay them not only a good salary, but give them the power of sustaining their reputation. A distinguished man at the bar is not going on to the bench, if he did not believe it would increase his reputation. As for salary, you never will give one which of itself, would make it worthy in a pecuniary point of view, to induce the master spirits of the state to take the position. There must be some other thing, and what is that? The honor of the station, the prospect of handing their names down as the great expounders of the law and constitution, and who will be remembered for ages to come for their intelligence and ability. You must give them an opportunity to do all this. And do you suppose that four men—for I do not believe you can get along with three—of the first order of talents, who are making from $6,000 to $10,000 a year by their profession, will take a seat on the bench of the court of appeals, and be made a set of mere tinkers to ride around the state from point to point, and place to place. When you and I were boys, there was, Mr. Chairman, before Kentucky became rich, and we got out China ware and plate, and all that—there was a set of men called tinkers, who went around picking up all the old pewter spoons, and running them over again—thus making old spoons new. Now sir, this proposition to branch the court of appeals puts me in mind of these tinkers—and you will have tinkers for your judges, if you adopt this proposition.

How many causes are there now pending in the court of appeals? We have seen it stated in the newspapers, and I know it is so from examination, that out of seven hundred causes in that court, there are about three hundred of them at least, every year, where written opinions are considered necessary to settle and define the rights of property and all other rights, for the courts of this commonwealth. Well, before they come to the facts, there are the principles of law involved in the case to be determined, and the judges have to go to the law library and read, and examine, and decide which of these principles are applicable to the case. And after all this is done, then they have the labor of writing out the opinion. In delivering such opinions, involving as they often do, the rights of property to an enormous amount, not only to the suitors concerned, but to the people generally, how essential it is that every word should be weighed, and every principle thoroughly examined. It should not be put forth as the result of hasty labor, but of the most matured deliberation. They are put in the book, and become in fact a part of the law of Kentucky. If there is a mistake in the opinion thus laid down, it may be the cause of divesting the citizen of his property, or of inducing men to invest their property and engage in contracts, only to be ruined and destroyed. And these opinions thus published too are the guides to the judges of the inferior courts in their administration of the law, and to the people in their understanding of it. And suppose now that each judge has about one hundred of these opinions a year to write out, if he is put on the bench of the branch court, how is he going to do it? Will it not occupy him one whole year if he stays at home, without riding about from point to point?

I should have no objection to the branching of the court, if only the great lawyers of the state would come before it and argue, in order that the court might thus be sure of all the aid which such distinguished and learned minds could bring to their assistance, in deciding upon great and important cases, involving, as I said before, immense interests. I have no doubt there are able men and lawyers in every part of the state, but you will have a crop of lawyers come in and fill your court house, if it is not pretty large, under the branching system, that will not be so able. And they have as much right to be heard as others; nor do I object to it. And there will be other things taking place. I have argued in the present court of appeals, and I know an instance of a lawyer from the southern part of the state, arguing a case in that court involving a question of property, when he and his client really wanted to lose it. Of course, in deciding against him the court would be doing just what the lawyer and his client desired. But for aught I know, this is a case which might happen under any organization of the court we might adopt. Can you have at each location the court may decide upon the law library that we have here? Those who do not know much about the legal profession may think a library a very unimportant matter, and that the judges ought to know all about the law. I am asked myself, often, 'what are you reading yet? why, I thought you knew all the law?' That is a great mistake. No man ever lived to learn all the law, and even if he did, he might become a little cloudy on the subject, especially when he is called upon to argue or decide a cause, he may find it very necessary to read and refresh his memory. Chief Justice Marshall himself never decided a difficult case, I dare say, without refreshing his memory by a reference to the decisions of the American and English courts. And it is proper that every judge should do the same, if he wishes his decisions to square with the established principles of law. What, then, will be the cost of three law libraries? As stated in the newspapers, $3000 will not furnish such a library as the court of appeals should have. I believe the library of the law school at Lexington did not cost less than $10,000, and the court of appeals ought to have one in nowise its inferior. You must have some man and a waggon to carry the books around, or else you must purchase a library for each district. You must build a court house for each district, or else be a tenant of the county, and pay rent for the use of their court house. Then you must have for each court a sergeant, a tipstaff, a man to make fires, etc., and all the other attendants to a court. The increased expense is therefore a great objection to the system. It would be much more expensive than the present system, of which the people complain, and that is one evil among others in regard to it, which they desire to have obviated.

have said that the legislature shall not infringe on that definition of treason, nor change the law of evidence upon which the charge shall be established. They have laid down great and broad principles of natural right in our bill of rights; they have assured to us the freedom of speech, the right to meet together to deliberate upon, and condemn the action of our popular authorities; the freedom of the press, the right to worship God according to reason and conscience, and the security of property and person; exception from ex post facto laws, and laws violating the obligation of contracts, and other rights fundamental and proper. They have laid down the mode, and a difficult and tardy mode it is, in which they themselves, the only source of power that exists upon God's globe, will amend the fundamental law, the constitution of the land. And what does the concluding article in the bill of rights say, in regard to these and other rights quite as important?

"To guard against transgressions of the high powers which we have delegated, we declare, that every thing in this article is excepted out of the general powers of the government, and shall forever remain inviolate; and that all laws contrary thereto, or contrary to this constitution, shall be void."

Now I ask my friend, and I ask the house, if the people were not afraid to trust themselves, if they were not afraid to trust that majority, which might get possession of the government, and control its action? The people have said that these rights are inalienable, and that they shall forever remain inviolate; that all laws contrary thereto shall be void.

Now, I will illustrate this important position, this great and fundamental truth, by one or two examples. Private property shall not be taken for public use without the consent of the representatives of the owner, nor without just compensation being made to him for it. That, in the last twelve months in one of its modes and forms, has been a most exciting question in this commonwealth. Suppose that every adult male in Kentucky should meet and resolve that emancipation should take place without compensation, and this in opposition to the constitution of the state. I ask my friend, and I ask this convention, what would be the legal and practical effect of such a resolution, adopted unanimously by the freemen of the whole state? It would be unconstitutional, and it would be void; and a judiciary, able, understanding the principles of the constitution, impartial, independent, would rise above the raging storm, and would not allow this great principle in the constitution to be violated, that the people of the state of Kentucky cannot wrest from any man his property, without just compensation being made to him.

I ask again then, if in this most important juncture, the people have not shown a distrust of themselves, and have not refused to confide the exercise of sovereign power, even to a sovereign majority itself? I will put another instance, and but one more. What was it but the principle of freedom of conscience, and the right to worship God according to the dictates of reason, that inalienable and invaluable right which produced the settlement of this North American continent? Suppose now, that the hordes of immigration from Catholic Europe shall come on in such increasing waves as to constitute the balance of power in this Union. They are now coming at the rate of half a million yearly, and in a short time these tides may rise and swell, till they reach a million annually. How many such annual influxes will it take to enable a catholic league in times of excitement, to seize upon the balance of political power, not only in the United States, but of most of the states? Suppose that state of things should come upon us, and then in obedience to, and in conformity with the principles of a united faith, and despotic religion, they should resolve to put down protestantism, and that the infallible catholic religion should be the only faith, and that all should bow to it in sending up orisons to their Omniscient Creator? I ask if a majority thus derived and constituted, should meet in defiance of the constitution, and that great principle which secures freedom of conscience to the citizen, and should resolve that this should be the all-pervading religion of the land, what legal effect and validity would it have? None sir, none whatever.

Now sir, the wise men who framed this constitution, and the people who have lived under it so long, knew that we were all frail and infirm beings, liable to error and passion, to oppression and wrong; they knew that when such was the character of the individual action of mankind, that its aggregate action by states and nations must be of the same character. Why, there is not a man in this hall, however enlightened in mind, however pure in intention, however sublimated in morals, that does not err from day to day, and grievously err; how, when we all individually so err, can our collective action be invariably free from error, free from the infirmities that beset, and always will beset our frail and fallen nature. The people knew that they were liable to be misled and to commit error, to be led by faction to perpetrate wrong, and in times of high excitement to use their power oppressively on the minority. And it was because of this deep and philosophical knowledge of our infirmity and liability to err in all things in government, in the formation of a constitution, and especially in the enactment of laws, that they established this constitution, that they laid broad and deep the fundamental rights in the article of the constitution from which I have just read; and they proclaimed that all laws which violate these great and inappreciable rights should be held void and of no effect. Then I am not to be deterred from this position, by being asked if I am afraid to trust the people. I am afraid to trust the people, I am afraid to trust myself. But when you enlighten the people, when you give them facts, and time to deliberate, to act advisedly and with mature reflection, I bow to their will with as much submission as any man in this hall. But I am not for bringing about a state of things which shall deprive the people of those lights and that deliberation.

I think my position argues more confidence in the people than that of any gentleman who has spoken his sentiments in the course of this debate. The people know that they are the only legitimate source of power. Why when they adopted the principle in the constitution, by which they bound themselves that two successive votes should be taken at a general election, upon the question of calling a convention, and a majority should be had each time before they could call a convention, did they incorporate that principle? They knew they had the right upon the instant and at all times to change, amend or wholly subvert our constitution and our form of government. But they reasoned, they reflected like moral and accountable beings, they considered that such would not be the best mode of changing that constitution, and that time and reflection would be necessary to inform them, even upon this great question. From such considerations they chose to prescribe for themselves the time which the existing constitution requires for its amendment. Why sir, the people want a government, not merely for the purpose of exercising their power, not merely to display to the world that they are the authors of the government, that it exists by their will, and that they have a right to change it as they please; they do not want a government with officers and with all consequent expenditures, simply for the ostentatious display of this power. They want it for their convenience, their security, and their protection. I have this confidence in the intelligence and virtue of the people in relation to this question and all other questions of government, if you can satisfy them that there is a mode of filling the judicial offices, different from that of popular election, by which a greater amount of ability, honesty, and independence can be secured, they will have the reason and good sense to cast the exercise of power from themselves, and to delegate it where it may more certainly secure those great ends.

We all agree as I before said, in one general principle, and that is, that we must have an able, honest, impartial, and independent judiciary. The question on which we differ is, as to the best manner of securing such tribunals. I propose to compare opinions with gentlemen in relation to two modes. I deny that it has been any where established by time and experience, that the principle of popular election of judges is the best or will secure the great purposes for which a judiciary is to be constituted. We have no such experience in our country, or elsewhere, to establish that political truth. I have met with men, democrats too, who have lived in Mississippi and have practiced law under an elective judiciary system, and of all men whom I have met they were the most thorough and uncompromising in their opposition to the system. Such a system in that state has resulted in the courts being deterred from holding their terms by the clamor of debtors, and in bringing upon it the foul and indelible dishonor of state repudiation. It has been adopted but recently in the state of New York. Certainly it has not been there long enough in operation to afford any thing like a practical test that is to be relied upon in carrying out our deliberations in the business of forming a constitution. Why sir, a system like that would require an age to prove it; we should have to run through two or three judicial cycles before we could say we had the lights of experience in relation to that problem. How had it worked, and how is it working in that state for the short period of its existence? In any other way than I could desire it to work in my state, if the principle is to be introduced here.

You propose to elect the judge by the people. What will be not only the manifest, but the inevitable consequence of the adoption in practice of such a principle? You will make your courts and your judges partizan and political, as certain as that the sun shines, or as the night succeeds the day, and you will draw these offices into the absorbing maelstrom of political partizan politics. Gentlemen hug to themselves a contrary delusion. But we all know the people are wholly divided, into two great political parties. The candidates for these offices will not have the virtue and self-denying capacity to hold themselves aloof from the scramble of party politics. In my judgment, men never deluded themselves with a greater fallacy. Your system, in a short time after the judges are to be elected by the popular vote, will inevitably force the selection of every candidate for a judgeship from political partizans; indeed there will be none others from whom to select these candidates, and the very same means which fill other political partizan offices will be resorted to, and will fill the office of judge. We recollect that about two years ago the first election was held for supreme judges in the state of New York. When the two parties made their nominations for supreme court judges, Mr. Gardiner received the nomination of the democratic party, and he being an anti-renter in principle, that party took him up and voted for him, and he was elected, running ahead of his ticket some twenty thousand votes. What power and influence gave him such a great majority over his associates on the ticket? It was believed beforehand that if elected to the supreme bench, in that high judgment seat he would be anti-renter, and would decide against the rights of the landlords. We recollect a few years ago, that we sent a commission to the state of Ohio, consisting of two of the most talented and prominent men in Kentucky, to endeavor to have re-modeled the laws of Ohio for the reclamation of fugitive slaves. This mission produced the passage by the Ohio legislature of what was called the "black law." The subject excited the people of that state, and divided them into parties. An abolitionist became a candidate for the office of judge before the legislature of the state, and he declared beforehand that he regarded those laws unconstitutional, and if elected would declare them null and void—and it was upon this previous declaration of principle, that he was supported and elected to the office. But what is going on in the state of New York at this time? New York—the empire state as she is called—great in her population, in her resources, in elements of wealth, and national power, and great but most mischievous in the example she sets to her sister states, and in no example more mischievous than in the constitution that she has lately adopted—what is going on in that great state? I read from the New York Evening Post an account of what is doing in the second judicial district:

"The judicial convention in this district met at Newburgh on the 11th inst., and nominated

John W. Brown, Esq., vice S. B. Strong, whose term expires."

I have served in congress with one of these gentlemen, and I suppose my venerable friend (Mr. Hardin) has served with the other, and we both know that Strong is a man of greatly more ability and legal attainment than Brown. And on what considerations is Mr. Strong now superceded, and another democrat brought out to fill his place? The Post says:

"A more acceptable nomination could not have been made, either to his district or to the state. Mr. Brown is one of the first lawyers at the New York bar, and enjoys the entire confidence of his professional brethren. He is, besides, a man of unwearied industry; has been the architect of his own fortunes; was honored with a seat in congress for two successive terms, and was one of the most efficient members of the constitutional convention of 1846.

"His antagonist, Mr. Hasbrouck, also of Newburgh, is better known as a politician than a lawyer, and will not probably receive the entire support of his party against a candidate so desirable, in every point of view, as a judge to the people of his district."

I make this declaration without regard to politics—be he whig or be he democrat—keep your political partizans out of your courts, as you would keep a pestilence from this hall. But the cause for the overslaugh of judge Strong will appear in the continuation of the extract:

"The following very appropriate tribute was paid by the convention to the Hon. S. B. Strong, whose term of office expires this winter.

"Resolved unanimously, That Hon. Selah B. Strong, whose term as justice of the supreme court will expire on the first of January next, has discharged the duties of his station with pre-eminent ability, and to the entire satisfaction of the members of the bar, and the people of the district. That nothing but the peculiar situation of the district, and the location of three judges in a single part of it, has induced us to nominate another person to fill his place."

What was the controlling consideration then? Not talents, not legal attainments, not impartiality, not integrity, not every talent and virtue that can adorn the judicial bench, but a favorable local position gave the inferior man more strength, and therefore he was selected by the convention, to displace a vastly superior man. Availability! But this is only one of the districts. I read from the same paper:

"JUDICIAL NOMINATIONS.—The democratic candidates for the supreme court in the eighth judicial district of the state are as follows."

The democratic candidates for the supreme court! A court that supervises the legislation and the action of the executive of the Empire State—that declares what is law, and what is not law—that secures to the citizen his life, his liberty, his reputation, and his property—this august and all powerful tribunal, that ought to be a type of divinity itself, as much as frail and erring man can be—how is it to be selected? By the meeting of democratic and whig cabals and jontos, and the bringing forward of men, not for their virtue, intelligence or legal attainments, but because of their political popularity and availability. And what do these cabals do? They nominate upon strict party and partizan grounds, eight candidates under the name of the democratic candidates for the offices of supreme judge in the Empire State of New York. What a spectacle!

"The democratic candidates for the supreme court in the eight judicial districts of the state are as follows:—District No. 1, Samuel Jones, of New York; district No. 2, John W. Brown, of Orange."

Mr. Jones is an able man. I am informed that Mr. Brown has received the nomination of the two segments of the democratic party, the Barnburners and the Old Hunkers. They have settled their family quarrels, and the two parties after living separate a while, have done away with their partial divorce, and have got together again, and are living in tolerable harmony, I suppose. But before that was effected, Mr. Brown received the nomination of one section, and now he receives it from the other. That is not all—the Anti-renters—powerful and determined in purpose, casting their votes and exerting themselves in all the elections as a unit, probably hold the balance of power in some of these judicial districts, and it becomes a matter of great party interest, with both parties, to enlist the Anti-renters in the support of their cause and candidates. The Anti-renters made efforts, and I believe they succeeded in getting such pledges and assurances from Mr. Brown, as Mr. Young, the whig candidate for governor, and as Mr. Gardiner, the democratic candidate for lieutenant governor, gave them at a former election. The consequence is, that the three parties unite in the nomination and the election of Mr. Brown is placed almost beyond the power of fate itself. The third district has nominated Henry Hogeboom, of Columbia; the fourth, John Fine, of St. Laurence—whom I have the pleasure to know, and who is a very worthy and intelligent gentleman—the fifth, Joshua A. Moore and Robert Lansing, of Jefferson; the sixth, William H. Shankland, of Cortland; the seventh, Theron R. Strong, of Wayne; and the Eighth, Nathan Dayton, of Niagara. The nomination in the fifth district was made before the re-union of the Barnburners and the Old Hunkers—and of these two sections of locofocoism I do not know which bears the best name. The editor says:

"The nominations in the fifth district were made before the union of the democracy in the State was completed.

"We presume the necessary steps will be taken to present but one candidate there. The district is strongly democratic, having given a majority of over ten thousand against Taylor; and it ought not to be lost by divisions."

Now I ask any man here if he is so credulous as to believe that these offices of judge, under our proposed system, will not become politically partizan? And if they are to become so, what are to be the inevitable consequences but inefficiency, degradation and corruption? What office is there in all America—in any state or territory within the United States, that is filled by the popular vote or by an electoral college of any number, but what has been thus degraded and become politically partizan in its character? How is it with your President—with your members of congress—with your governors of the states and state legislators? How is it with your county courts—your coroners and petty constables? All have become political partizan, all have been degraded into this sink of corruption and iniquity, and all are soiled more or less by its filth.

How can you expect to preserve the ermine of a judge pure and uncontaminated when it is dragged into such an association? Never, never! You might as soon expect to find chastity in a brothel. How is it that your political and partizan offices are filled—and how is it that these judicial offices will be filled when they are degraded to that character? Go to some of the districts now in my mind, and you will see partizan leaders, months before the election organizing, so as to make perjury, and subornation of perjury, inevitable. You will see sums of money scattered broad cast for purposes of bribery and corruption, and of buying the elective franchise itself—the highest prerogative of political sovereignty that can appertain to man. Go to the stables and the barns—contiguous to the places of voting a few days before the election—and you will see debased men herding together like cattle, drinking and carousing, fiddling and dancing, and in their revolting orgies, violating the Sabbath itself. You will see $50 and $100 as publically paid for votes as for a horse in open market, and all for political partizan victory. You will see your partizan leaders—your high priests of democracy and whiggism—passing their slogan and their war cry, their henchmen and followers, calling out their forces and preparing for the conflict, and making every appliance that can be devised, for the purpose of accomplishing their ends. Think you not that the sacred ermine of the judge will thus be brought down to degradation and infamy? It is so in New York, and it will be so in Kentucky, whenever you make these officers elective by the people. One thing is certain, the people are about as often mistaken and abused, cheated and defrauded out of proper men in electing to political offices, as otherwise. I imagine that the actual statistics upon this subject will present at least one half unfit from ignorance or want of capacity and principle, or some other cause.

The same causes that bring such a proportion of unfit, inefficient and improper men into your purely political offices, will also operate upon your judiciary. Their fixed salary and their longer tenure of office will aggravate this state of things, as to them. But we are answered again by the cry of the demagogues, "are you afraid to trust the people with the people's business?" I say if the people's business can be better done by agents selected by them and directly responsible to them, the people themselves will not only sanction, but will require you to trust their business—not to themselves, but to those agencies. And here I will say to my respected friend from Henderson, that upon this point I have not the remotest intention to apply my remarks to him, but to one not present—a native red-republican, a natural born, constitutional, inherent red-republican, of which party I am not. That there are some functions of government which can be better performed by agents appointed by the people, than by the people themselves, and which ought to be entrusted to such agents. You cannot get the people together to make laws, acting in general assembly. It is physically impossible. But if there were small communities, such as Athens, or the republic of ancient Greece, or the republics of Italy of the middle ages, and if it were possible to assemble the body of the people for that purpose, a few able, experienced, and discreet men, properly selected by the people, would be better fitted and more competent to devise laws than the people themselves. If it were possible to get the people together to sit in judgment, and to apply legal and constitutional principles to the multitude of cases that come before the judges, it could be better done through the medium of judges, enlightened and virtuous men, than it could by the body of the people themselves. But it is said the people elect their president and governor, and why should they not elect their judges? The people do not elect a foreign ambassador, a secretary of state, or a commander of their armies, and if they had had the power to elect the commander of the army to take charge of the late Mexican war, the results of which shed so much glory and lustre upon the American arms—not upon the American government—but upon the American soldiery—who would have been probably called upon to lead our armies in the conduct of that war? Where would have been the hero of Buena Vista? The man whose valor, and whose military genius created his own fortune, a most brilliant one, in one campaign. Where would have been the hero of Chippewa and Lundy's Lane, whose military genius conceived and executed in this Mexican war, one of the most brilliant campaigns on record? Even the immortal Scott would have been saved the work, and his country would have lost one of the brightest pages of her history, the record of the greatest of modern campaigns, from the castle of St. Juan de Ulloa to the city of Mexico by the selection of another and less able military leader. It is in the nature of things, that there should be an inherent irremediable unfitness and impropriety in the people electing such officers as these. That unfitness is much more palpable, and applies with much more force to the office of judge. Gentlemen say we live in a progressive age. I am not a very old man—not so old probably as I seem to be—I am not a sexagenarian at any rate, but still these modern wisacres would persuade me that I am behind the times; that I do not keep up with the intellectual improvements of the day, and particularly in the science of government; that although I studied in the schools of Washington, of Hamilton, and of Jefferson, and of the sages who formed our institutions, that still I am a vast distance behind the advancing political sciences of the day.

Now there are some things that cannot be improved, among them are the process of procreation, the Lord's prayer, and some of the fundamental and immutable principles of our constitution, and I say that the man is a novice himself who attempts to prove and establish that I am a dotard and behind the wisdom of the present generation, because I will not repudiate great principles like these. When you put your system in operation, how will you elect your judges and who will elect them. I have seen it stated as a political axiom that the independence of the judiciary is the assurance which the sover-sign of the state gives to its justice against its power. This is a great principle in our system, and I will examine the proposition a single moment. The constitution and wise and just laws under it, are the essence of free institutions and of true popular liberty. What is it that constitutes liberty? It is not the power of doing what we please; but it is the security which good institutions and just laws give. The rights of life, of liberty, of reputation, and property, are assured to us, by our constitution and our laws, and this is American liberty. This constitution and these laws are not self-acting and self-executing machinery. The shield of the law is said to protect the citizen, but how is its protection secured to him? How is it then with the humble man, and how does it become a panoply and security to him? It is by the intervention of judges who are learned, who are independent, and who are honest. If you have not a judiciary so constituted, you might as well have no laws, for the security and protection of our essential rights is only to be had through the medium of courts, and without judges who have the ability and the virtue to apply those laws, the laws might as well not exist—indeed they do not practically exist. We all concede this truth; how shall we make it practically good to the country? How will you give assurance to the people that they have such laws, and such tribunals thus to administer them, because it is not enough that we provide and pass laws, it is requisite and necessary that the people should have full confidence, full belief and faith that they have such laws and such tribunals to administer them, but you never will attain this in my judgment by means of your courts elected by popular vote. We all concede that our judges must be honest and independent. How are you to make them independent? They must be able and learned in the law; if they are not, they cannot be independent, because they will have to lean upon the intellect of some trusted lawyer, who will be called upon to guide them in their dark and bewildered path. Ability and learning in a judge is just as necessary as virtue, integrity and impartiality. The history of political officers, and you propose to make the judiciary a political office, proves, that in a majority of cases at least, this requisite, ability and learning, will not be secured for the bench as it is not for other descriptions of offices.

In the great state of New York have we not seen that these requisites are not the touchstone; that they do not guide those who make the nominations, and who mediate, at least, confer the appointment itself; that they are not the motives which control the action of those cabals and conventions that nominate the candidate for judge? They look to availability, to a man's popularity, to the number and activity and power of his connections, to his wealth; to his golden coffers, and to his disposition to spend and scatter their contents for the purposes of corruption. They will pass around the party watch-words, and in bringing their candidates into the field, they will invariably have whig and democratic candidates for judge. Who will fill these offices? The men that can get the nomination of the convention, of the intriguing and corrupt cabal that bring out the candidates and present them to the voters of the district. They will succeed, and they alone. Is it not so in offices purely political? And if it is so, is not the conclusion inevitable that it will be so in relation to the judges, when you make them partizan political officers? Now my democratic friends may answer me on this branch of the subject, by saying that the whole of your judges now are partizan judges; they are whig judges. I am sorry that all of them are. It is this total interdiction and exclusion of the democratic party from these offices, that has given this question of electing the judges by the popular vote its strength.

If the democratic party always had had an equal or just share of these offices, and if election to them by popular vote had not been recommended to us by the example of New York, this question never would have existed here in its present imposing strength. You have seen the powerful argument that this exclusion of their men of talents addresses to their party. Here is our party, constituting nearly a majority of the people of Kentucky, possessing an equal amount of intelligence, virtue, and fitness for these offices, and are we not inexorably excluded from them under the present system. That system is unjust and oppressive to us, and therefore let us overthrow it. And the rank and file have marched with their leaders and are ready to overthrow such a system and substitute any other that promises them a fair proportion of the honors and emoluments in this department of the government. I deny that the people of Kentucky ever demanded an elective judiciary. I deny that they now do it. I say if this question is fairly made and ably discussed in every county and district in the state of Kentucky, the people themselves will sustain a contrary principle, if you will hold out to the democratic party a system that will give them a just and equal share of these offices. How then did the question acquire this strength? Because the country was divided into two parties, each party zealous and anxious for the patronage and power of the government rather than for the success of its principles and the great practical benefits which they believe are to flow from those principles, and consequently determined to take no position to jeopardize their party strength. The democrats go for change, because change is favorable to them. The whigs, because they think that their malecontents, with the democrats, will become a majority, and they are determined not to be left on this question in a party minority, and for that reason they fall in and swell the multitude that is ringing this cry for change in the judiciary over the state.

Now, what do I propose? I propose to avoid the evils, the great, inevitable, unappreciable evils, that cannot be too much deprecated, which must result from this system of electing by the popular vote. And what is my plan? I have to speak of it in its application to the circuit courts also, as in that connection it attaches itself necessarily to the court of appeals. I suppose our friends, the democrats, as a general rule, will only expect to get the judges in districts in which they have the majority; and it is fit and just that they should there have them. I imagine they do not expect, and probably all of them do not desire more; but whether they do or not, I presume they will hardly get more as a general rule. Well, how do I propose to organize the courts and to appoint the judges? You may call them circuit or district courts, or whatever you please, but you divide the state into districts. I propose to constitute the members of the house of representatives of the legislature, from each district, into an electoral college, and as soon as the legislature convenes, the seven, eight or ten men constituting the representatives from a district, shall get together and form an electoral college, whenever there is a vacancy in the office of judge in the district, and shall name two men to the senate. The senate shall nominate one of them to the governor, and he shall commission him as judge of the circuit or inferior court of that district. In this way, ten, fifteen, or twenty judges, as may be decided upon, will be selected. When the court of appeals is to be filled, the governor shall select from among the circuit judges, or such persons as have filled that office, a sufficient number, and shall nominate them to the senate, and by and with their advice and consent, he shall appoint them to that high station. But he shall be limited and restricted to only such persons as are or have been judges of the circuit or inferior courts. These inferior courts shall be filled, in the mode and on the principle which I have described. How is that going to work? The executive branch of our government is rather in low repute now. It has been cried down, till it has lost the popular affection, and not only that, but the system of the government itself—the constitution—has been cried down. And gentlemen who thus assail the executive, say there have been great abuses in the exercise of its discretion and power.

I will concede that there has been at least some abuses, but not so much as there has been on the part of the legislative branch of government, though more I admit than there has been on the part of the judicial department. You cut off all agency and possible abuse of the executive power in filling the inferior courts, and upon whom will it be devolved? Upon the members of the house, men chosen by the people for whom the judge is to act, and who are most interested in having proper men to be their judges—representatives who for their intelligence and knowledge of public men, and business, will be chosen by their constituency for this in connection with other high duties. Would not they select proper judges? They would know to a reasonable extent all the men in their several districts fit for the office of judge, while eight tenths of the people of the district do not and cannot have such knowledge of men. The quiet of the profession and the seclusion of the law library leads the very men who are best qualified to fill the office away from the vortex of politics. The best men especially for judicial offices, are not mixing in political affairs, they are away from them, calmly pursuing their legal studies, improving their minds and cultivating a system of moral principles and moderation of character, that eminently qualifies them for the discharge of the duties of the bench. The people, out of their particular counties, are generally strangers to such men. The men whom they send to the legislature as their representatives would probably know all such men in their districts. Those representatives will in most cases name two men of the party in a majority in their districts to the senate, and the senate will nominate one of them to the governor, who will commission him as a judge. In this way the popular voice of the district would be represented, and a man of the same political sentiment with the majority would be their judge, and he would in all probability be the ablest man of their party in the district. By this mode what an incentive would you offer to the electors, for choosing their best men—a prospect of ultimate promotion to the bench of the appellate court. They would look forward to the time when a limited term of office in that court would bring about a probable promotion, and they would select men of the first legal attainments, fitness and capabilities, with a view to promotion to that high station. When the judges came to fill their stations in the circuit courts, they would know that within the course of seven, eight, ten or twelve years there would be a periodical series of nominations to the appellate bench, and these nominations would be restricted entirely to themselves, and the few who had filled their offices. The most industrious judges, the men of the most ability and fitness for the office, would in all probability be called to fill the higher places. What powerful incentive do you offer to these judges to withdraw entirely from the turmoil of politics, to appropriate their talents, their time, and their energies to the exclusive study of the law as a science, and the improvement of all the necessary qualities that enter into the character of a great judge. I ask you if this system would not inevitably work to the improvement of our judiciary, and to the encouragement of application and industry among the circuit court judges, by holding out to their ambition a reasonable prospect of reward and promotion? Look at the principle where it is operative in the general government. I propose a line of regular promotion in the courts. We have that principle acting from the foundation of our government in its military and naval services. But for the existence of that principle, and the emulation to which it gave rise among our naval and military officers, Scott himself never would have been fitted to have planned and executed the brilliant campaign which throws a halo of glory around his name. You bring the principle into our courts, and you secure thereby in the legal profession, the same results which vindicate it in the military and naval professions.

But I have a few other cursory remarks as to the defects of this system of electing judges. As I said; the people would not select their judges, but a few active and intriguing politicians, who manage the conventions and political caucuses, and get control of the political parties of the district, would direct the whole affair. Yes, in a judicial district, a half dozen men would control the nominations, and thus decide who should be judge and who should not. I know it is intended to limit the tenure of the judicial officer. I am in favor of that principle, and every evil of the existing judiciary system, which requires correction, in my judgment would be corrected by its introduction. And so far as we innovate beyond that, it is wholly for mischief. You bring down the terms—say of the appellate judges to eight years, and the circuit judges to four or six years. Now the men who are nominated to office will be elected and placed there by those who make the nomination, because the candidates so nominated will certainly and inevitably receive the support and entire vote of their party. Whoever does this work of nomination therefore will essentially and practically make the judge. And who will do it? Not the people, not the mass of the voters, but the political wire-workers, the jugglers, the active electioneers, the enterprising, the bold and the unscrupulous political managers. They will usurp this power of nominating the judge, and in that way they will dictate to the people whom they shall elect. Think you not the man thus nominated and elected will not know who put him in office—that he will not “remember his creator in the days of his youth?” And if you give him a short term, think you not that he will look to the power, to the men, ah to the man who placed him in office for the purpose of securing a renewal of his term? Why just as certain as destiny.

Under the existing system a judge is appointed by the governor and senate. He feels the sanctity of his office, the purity of the ermine which he figuratively wears, and he with draws from politics, stands aloof from active partisanship, and becomes a non-combatant in this war for political power. His independence is assured to him by a life tenure. But when candidates are brought out as the whig and democratic candidates are, nominated by whig and democratic conventions and cabals, and a nomination is equivalent to an election, and that nomination is made and decided by a few, and the judges then go into the canvass, and in defiance of the resolution and purpose of my friend from Henry, (Mr. Nuttall,) make speeches from the stump, mingle with the people, visit from house to house, draw themselves into controversies, declare themselves opposed to black laws or similar questions, when they go into pot houses and grogeries, and come reeking from the brandy bar to the bar of justice—what sort of administration of justice will you have? Will not its pure streams become contaminated and corrupt, defiled and polluted? Who is there that wants such streams of justice to flow through the land to desolate the sacred rights of life and liberty, reputation and property? Do you want your courts to be thus constituted, and made the supervisors of the government of the country, to set limits to the exercise of executive and legislative power—yes, to stand as a barrier against the sovereign people themselves, whenever they seek to invade great and fundamental principles, as those contained in our bill of rights? What do the sovereign people say in relation to the judges? We elect them as a defence and a bulwark of our justice, against our power. What sort of security would they be when a half dozen intriguing and corrupt political managers in a district give his office to the judge, when he has a short term, and when he is looking for a renewal of that term, to the men and power that placed him there? He would become a suppliant tool, and submit his own mind and his own intellect—if mind and intelligence he had—and his own will, impartiality and virtue to the interests, the caprices, or the passions of the men who placed him in power. The system is corrupt in its essence and nature, and in its inevitable results, and you might put pure men in it, but you would necessarily in most cases debase and corrupt them.

I will give you another instance if you please. I have heard of a gentleman who has instituted in this state, a thousand actions of ejectment for land, and I know other gentlemen who claim thousands of acres, worth hundreds of thousands. The election of a judge is coming on. We all know, who are acquainted with courts of law, the weakness of the courts for the purposes of self-defence. We know also the capacity even of circuit or inferior judges, for mischief, aggression and wrong on private rights, and whenever there is a partial or corrupt judge, he may, in many cases, suppress and pervert justice. There is a vast deal confided to his discretion, especially in making up bills of exception, through the medium of which his decisions are submitted to the superior court. We all know that when circuit judges become so corrupt, and debased as to pervert and prostitute their power, they may in this way subvert justice. An election is about to take place in a judicial district—these one thousand ejectments are filed, or suits are commenced, each involving some two or three hundred thousand dollars—and there is a democratic and a whig candidate—something like an equal division of parties in the district—and there is to be a severe and doubtful contest. I tell you there are many of the districts, where ten thousand dollars of gold would carry the election, and enable the man who had a large interest at stake to place his creature in the office of judge. Give the candidate a short term, and submit, not to the people, but to the cabals and managers, the question of his re-election, and you expose him to this influence. From the mode of his constitution, the tenure of his office, the uncertainty and insufficiency of his salary, he is weak, and is known to be weak. He that is suspected is liable to assault, or she either; and he or she either, who pauses when assaulted, is lost, and I tell you that these men who have such immense interests depending on the decision of these courts, will make the approach, and many judges will pause and sell themselves too. And they will know beforehand, from which of the candidates they can expect most. There are men in this state, having suits in the courts, and interests large enough involved in them to authorize that expenditure, and who would make it judiciously and effectually too, to carry the election of a judge, and place his man and creature in the seat, to exercise not only the justice of the sovereign people, but the mockery of that justice which should be an emanation of the divinity itself. And are you going to drag down the judiciary system to that depth of degradation? I give you another example. My friend who sits before me, (Mr. Hardin,) who now has the frosts of sixty-five winters on his brow, has an intellect as vigorous, comprehensive, active, and daring as any of which I have ever had knowledge. Through his life, he has always exercised, and always would exercise a vast influence, the influence of mind, of great and towering intellect over inferior minds, the influence of an iron will and purpose that never sleeps, over a will and purpose more feeble and enervated. In a canvass for judge, the support of my friend would control the election, as certain as that he would give his favorite candidate that active, energetic, and all-powerful support he gives to every cause he advocates. When he places his friend in office, and practices in every court in his district, I ask you, if my friend would not have a more favorable ear in court than the man who opposed the judge? By the present mode of appointment, a governor who has made a judge, having a suit in court, would before him, in a majority of cases, have decidedly the vantage ground against any adversary whatever. And the general safety of suitors in court, is in the fact that the governor is not the opposing party; but under the elective system, those who make the judges, would at all times, and in all courts, be parties litigant or their advocates and lawyers. And it would not be in human nature for the judge to escape from their thralldom.

When political parties nominate party candidates, and on party views and party considerations sustain and vote for them, and when there has to be borne the heat and burthen of many a long and fatiguing day in the canvass of one of them by his political friends, would not his party, when he came upon the bench, exact a return from him, and require him to submit himself to their interests and purposes and passions so far as he could, without the prospect of punishment—and he might so administer the laws within that pale to a most fearful extent. It is so with all other officers, and it would be equally so with the office of judge. Suppose an election in a judicial district, if you please. We have just passed through an excited and violent gubernatorial, presidential, or general canvass, such as has often characterized the state of Kentucky, in which men array themselves as it were, in hostile strife; and every angry passion in our nature is aroused, and every power of the intellectual and physical man is brought into requisition. The parties meet, discuss, and bring up voters to the polls, and every appliance of bribery, corruption, or intimidation is used. In the course of such a contest as this, a private brawl arises, and a whig and a democrat meet in mortal combat, and one of them falls. Does not his case in the criminal court immediately become the cause of his party? and think you not they will require their judge to become the instrument in shielding and saving the man who crimsoned his hands in blood to advance the interests and secure the success of the party? But I have named as yet, a small portion of the disorders and deplorable consequences which this monstrous power of electing judges by the people would necessarily bring with it. To have an able judge, you must necessarily have an able man for a candidate. If you adopt the system, in my humble judgment, they ought not to be re-eligible. The judge, if not able, ought at least to have the sustaining principle of official independence and the purpose to discharge his duties solely with regard to his oath, and the constitution and laws, and not with reference to the chances of re-election. If you render him ineligible, you ought to give him a longer term—ten or twelve years at least—because you will not get a man of second rate talents and legal learning to accept the office for a term of four, six or eight years. We all know, those of us who are lawyers, that when a man abandons his practice to take a seat on the bench, he loses it, and when he returns to the practice again it takes him years and years of painful toil and labor to regain it. Men in full and lucrative practice, and such a practice have they who are competent in ability and learning to be judges, will never consent to give up that practice for a short term on the bench. They would know full well the degrading means to which they would have to submit to secure election and re-election, and often as ruinously expensive as degrading. And men in any degree qualified could not be induced to take the places for short terms. Such as would act otherwise, would want the talents and attainments to get business as lawyers, and they would not possess one of the high qualities of a great and virtuous judge. To secure the services of men even remotely approximating to the requisite amount of mind, of law learning, of independence and rectitude, you would have to give them, both in superior and inferior courts, long terms—ten years at least. But whatever be the length of the term, men of the best ability, and of the highest qualifications and qualities for the bench, will never submit themselves to arduous, doubtful, and debasing partizan political canvasses, with all their debasing and revolting concomitants, to become judges; and yet this will be the one impossible condition upon which the place is to be won.

And when your courts are filled, as they will be, with party hacks, without talents or legal attainments, poor and needy, looking to their salaries for bread and to party or a few party leaders or powerful and influential men for a continuance of this bread—low and grovelling in mind, depraved in moral sense, broken down in spirit and independence, and destitute of self-respect, what then becomes of the protection which the constitution and laws promise the citizen? What security has life, liberty, reputation and property against the violence of the strong and lawless? What defences have the weak and the lowly against the wealthy and the powerful? Such I believe will be the fruits, and but a portion of the bitter fruits, which this mischievous innovation will bring us, and there will be no escape from them. It is in sorrow and despondency that I make this dark prediction, and I know it will be treated with the same incredulity and contempt as the predictions of Cassandra of old. I would hope, if I could, that my prognostics of this great evil deserved to be so treated. This change in the mode of filling the office of judge, being I apprehend inevitable, my earnest and sincere wish is that it may produce the best results, better indeed than its most sanguine friends promise for it. Yet I have no faith—none. But whatever be the constitution and forms of our public offices, and the modes of filling them, I have the sincerest desire, that they shall result in the greatest good to the greatest number. But if it were possible to place fit men on the bench in the first instance—the system is so inherent in its vitiating effects, so essentially corrupting in its nature, that it will necessarily drag down these pure and better men to its own level. What is it that secures the independence of a judge? My friend from Henderson (Mr. Dixon) has debated this point; and though his entire speech, which evinced great powers of mind, was nominally on the other side of this question, yet I felt myself that the chief force and power of his argument was on our side, and it was so of necessity, because no man can make a just, a logical and appropriate argument in favor of the independence of the judges without striking at this principle of popular election. The thing is utterly impossible. You cannot have an independent judiciary elected by popular vote. What said my friend in reference to and in illustration of this part of the subject. He spoke of the judges of England, and the change made in their tenure of office, and of the separate powers which would appoint the judges here, and that which would adjudge them—being in the one case the legislature and in the other the people; and he argued the independence of the judges from the separate and independent existence of those two powers.

What was the great judicial reform in England that gave to the courts of that country an elevation and independence to which before they were entirely strangers? It was making the judge independent of the appointing power. The crown appointed the judge, who held the place during the pleasure of the crown. Whenever the king spoke his fiat, the judge, whose independent spirit had made him obnoxious, went out of office, and some more flexible royal minion took the vacant seat. The necessary consequence was, that but few judges opposed the royal will, or refused to become the tools of its oppressive tyranny. Hence the history of the previous crown trials are marked by the most revolting judicial prostitution, and the shedding of the blood of martyrs in the cause of their country's liberties. But at length the tenure of the judge's office in England was declared by law to be during good behavior, subject to removal by the king upon the address of two thirds of the two houses of parliament. Then it was that the spirit of independence enthroned itself on the benches of the English courts, and in the serene strength and power of law and justice looked down upon royalty itself. Then it was that her courts for the first time threw the shield of liberty and law over the prostrate subject, and sheltered him from the heavy blows of a tyrant king. But how will it be here under the proposed change? The judge every four years is to go crawling back in the slime of his own and his party's filth, not to the people, not to the hard handed, strong-sensed, honest hearted, well employed masses, but to the brawling demagogue, the politicians by trade, the party hacks, the ever active and intriguing wire-workers, and the men who have thousands to give to the work of bribery and corruption, for a renewal of his term. He is subject all the time to be removed by legislative impeachment and legislative address. And who but the people, or rather parties and politicians, make the legislature? Whose mind, whose will and purpose but those who make the judges does the legislature reflect and execute? What power regulates the quantity of bread this judge shall eat, by declaring what shall be his salary but this same legislature, this general committee of arrangement, not of the country, not of the body of a great party, but of a jumble of political partisans? I ask my friend if the cases are parallel? If the assurance of judicial independence in England is not more satisfactory than it would be under his system in Kentucky. No where on the globe is there at present more just, enlightened, independent and inflexible administration of the civil and criminal law than by the courts of England. There are ten instances at least of the escape of felons and of the failure of a redress of private wrongs in our courts to one in those of England. It is the security which this state of things gives to her subjects, the certainty of judicial justice which gives to her government its tranquility and its chief stability. More than is secured by her large standing army and unequalled navy.

How, I ask, in the name of common sense and reason, could a judge, thus constituted and thus holding the office, selected necessarily from a class of inferior men, because from the tenure of the office and the mode of election, you will get none but inferior men to accept it—his salary depending on the legislature, and having given up what little practice he had, if he had any, and looking for support, for food and raiment for himself and his children, solely to his salary—how could he, by the laws of human nature, be independent? Why, he would be the merest and vilest dependent minion that ever disgraced the ermine or the name of a judge. The suitors in court make the judge—or rather in part make him, a part being opposed to his election. The lawyers who practice in his court in part elect the judge, and in part oppose his election. And would not those suitors and lawyers who had made the judge have a power and claim over his good will and favor, that those who opposed him would not have? It is the immutable law of our frail and fallen nature, and no shifts we can devise will enable us to escape from it. None.

How then I ask my friends again are you to secure a pure and independent judiciary under such a system? The thing is impossible, and if it is impossible, we ought to fly from it, and at once to repudiate it. You have a good system now, as clear as the noonday sun, and it has existed in the wise and just administration of free and equal laws in this country for half a century. If you have a doubt in regard to the other project then, let your doubt cause you to reject it. This is not a subject for experiment, or a matter upon which we are to doubt or put forth beautiful theories that we know from the experience of every day, and of ages will work wrong. Let us throw ourselves back on experience, and be guided and controlled by its safe lessons.

I have said that I do not believe the people demand this change—and I am candid in that opinion. I have never seen a man in my social intercourse and conversation on the subject, that is for the change unless he was a democrat. And I never have conversed freely in confidence and friendship with a democrat, that he did not avow his reason for being against the present system—and I admit it is a sufficient one—was that it deprived his party of all judicial office, both in the inferior and superior courts. I feel the force and justice of that argument. Now the only abuses which I have ever heard urged by the people against the judiciary department, as it exists, were of a very limited and trivial nature. They brought up instances of judges appointing their relatives to clerkships, and of the clerks making sales of offices, and of these judges ratifying those sales by appointing the purchasers to the office. And that is the extent, all told, of the complaint of abuses against the judiciary as it exists, and is constituted under the present constitution, so far as I know. Now just look at the clamors and indignation of the people against the legislative department of the government for its frequent and numerous abuses of power—look at the like condemnation by the people of the executive department—and compare the volume, the matter of these complaints, their truth and justice, with the few and trivial complaints made against the judiciary, and tell me which of the departments of government has most sinned against propriety, against justice, and against the people? And yet the fury of this convention is to be directed mainly against that department of government which has offended least, in the proper constitution and security of which the people are most interested, and the organization and proper adjustment of which is the most difficult task that the convention is called upon to perform.

I do not believe the popular feeling required the call of this convention. I do not believe it, strange as it may appear to some of my friends here. There were a few things complained of, which ought to be corrected, and I would like to see them reformed. But I do not want to see any revolution or subversion of the existing system—any overthrow of the great, time-honored, and well tested principles of our constitution. Let it, and its great outlines remain, a monument of the wisdom and patriotism of our ancestors, to guide and enlighten posterity to the latest generation. If there are a few defects in it, let them be obviated and improved. In relation to the judiciary, the only essential defect ever brought under my knowledge has been this: there have been incompetent judges, who could not be got out either by address or impeachment. And whose fault was it? Not that of the judiciary, or its organization, but of their triers—of the tribunal which is required to supervise that department, to keep it pure and incorrupt, able and competent—the legislative department. Why do they not impeach the judge, if he is corrupt? Why have they not removed by address, the incompetent? It is not true that it is the sin of the judiciary, but a dereliction of duty on the part of the legislature. I have seen the salary of the judges increased, for the purpose of constraining certain incompetent judges to resign. I have seen the better portion of the judges, men of mind, virtue, intellect and unsullied character, respond to such an insulting call upon them, and at once surrender their places to the executive. I have seen the incompetent, and those who ought to be out, clinging tenaciously to the office, and I have seen the legislature march forward, and bring up the salaries of these inefficient and incompetent judges, to the high mark to which the legislature had raised those salaries. Whose sin was that? If there was a tittle of the cause of complaint, and of just complaint, against the judicial department, that are brought against the legislature and the executive, I would share in that spirit of indignant hostility which urges on some in this convention, in the crusade, the remorseless crusade they are making against it. But it has had no such short comings, it has not perpetrated a tittle of the wrong against the country which the legislature has. But still there are things in the constitution of the judiciary, I would like to see changed. I admit that from the unchangeable principles of our nature, our sympathy with infirmity, which prevents us from removing incompetent judges, and induces us to raise their salaries to the same point as those who are competent—will forever prevent us from removing by impeachment or address. I do not want an incompetent judge fastened on the people for life; and the only remedy that I believe would possibly work any good, would be limitation in office. This is secured in the system I have proposed. You are to get the best materials for a judge, and when you have filled the office in that way, you might permit the incumbent to be re-eligible—as when the department is properly organized he ought to be. But if you follow out the mode by which it is proposed to fill it, I tell you that like the strong man, you will get deeper and deeper into the mire, and finally be engulfed in its depths, as certain as time and man exists.

I propose to withdraw from this corrupting political scramble a portion of the talents, the virtue and the ambition of the country, and turn it to the pursuit of legal science and judicial promotion. Everything is now swept along by that all engrossing political current. Every man of mind and ambition, who hopes for an elevated or an honorable position among his countrymen, through the superiority of his talents, and by the exercise of his virtues and patriotism is called by the only course of preferment and honor to enter the political arena. You will give to the members of the house of representative, representing a judicial district, the right to name the two men from whom the judge shall be chosen for that district—they of course would select men of their party politics, unless more powerful considerations should control, and if they existed they ought to control. Let the senate take one of them and nominate him to the governor, and the governor commission him as judge; and then from this class of judges, let the governor select the appellate court. Tell the young men of mind and promise in these judicial districts—withdraw yourselves from politics, there is no man that contributes anything to his own personal virtue and happiness, or to his moral sense, his general intelligence, or to his dignity as a man, by going into the arena of politics. None. No man can venture into that vortex without being more or less injured. Tell the man of pure well regulated mind which desires distinction, that it is not to be driven to the necessity of leaping into that tumultuous arena, for the purpose of realizing their cherished hopes. Tell them to aim higher in qualifying themselves by study in the noiseless recesses of the library, and in the cultivation of that moral sense and elevation of character which prepares them to become the repositories of the high powers which the constitution reposes in the judiciary of the country. Tell them that by taking this course, they are to minister to a purer and a nobler ambition, than if they were to rush into this turmoil of politics. Tell the men who are to make the selection for office, choose your best and most promising men—choose them with a view to their powers of mind, their moral worth, their habits of diligence and application, and their capability for improvement in legal science.

Select your men with a view to these high qualities, for those inferior judgeships, and in a few short years, in the course of judicial promotion, they will be translated to a higher and nobler and more responsible station—one in which they are to figure before and act for the whole, and become members of your highest judicial tribunal. What a powerful stimulus do you offer to the man of genius and of virtue and noble ambition to withdraw from the corruption of politics, and dedicate himself to more elevated duties and objects, and by which he may render higher and more difficult service to his country.

I had proposed to urge some other points and arguments, but I find my strength a good deal exhausted. Indeed I have now spoken longer than I thought I should possibly be able to do when I commenced. For the patience of this committee in bearing with me so long, I return it my sincere thanks. I came here to act for my state without regard to party politics. I would have been extremely gratified if a stouter and an abler champion had appeared here to support the cause which I have attempted to uphold, but in the absence of allies, of a single coadjutor, and indeed of even one having with me in this matter a heartfelt sympathy, still I felt that unaided, with my single arm, it was due from me to strike one blow at least against this great and monstrous innovation. I came here to reform the constitution. I would be willing to elect the inferior executive and ministerial officers, as clerks, sheriffs, constables, coroners, etc. I would be willing also to do away with the county courts. I want to prohibit local and private legislation, such as divorces, etc., and to secure some other slight reforms, but I want to do nothing else. As long as there is a ray of reason in my head, or a pulsation in this feeble heart, I shall feel it the most sacred duty I owe my country to oppose this principle of electing judges by the popular vote. I will oppose this attempt to desecrate and drag down this greatest and most important and yet most defenceless department of the government. In addition to that, I am for maintaining inviolate the rights of property. I am also against an open clause in the constitution. I am against the perpetual agitation and constitutional tinkering which such a principle would introduce. And I am in favor of requiring the foreign voter to reside as long within the state, as our own native born children before they exercise the right of suffrage. Upon this latter question, I shall ask the indulgence of the convention at a future time, and I promise to trouble it no further in set speeches. But to ensure success to either of the cardinal positions which I have here declared, there is no amount of popular applause, no place or honor in the prospective, no vision of my ambition, that I would not bring into this hall, and lay down cheerfully as a sacrifice—not only to carry either of these principles, but to give them any strength. And not only to gain them a modicum of strength, but to do my duty, by declaring my deep, abiding and undiminished devotion to each and all of them.

The convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 27, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. GEO. W. BRUSH.

DEATH OF THE HON. BRYAN Y. OWSLEY.

Mr. M'CLURE offered the following preamble and resolution:

WHEREAS, It is represented to this convention, that the Hon. BRYAN Y. OWSLEY departed this life about 12 o'clock on the night of the 26th inst., in the town of Frankfort, and that his friends will proceed with his remains to Boyle county, the place of interment, at 10 o'clock, a. m., to-day: therefore, as a token of respect to the memory of the dead,

Resolved, That this convention will accompany the procession which takes charge of his remains, across the bridge over the Kentucky river, on the route to his interment; and that the convention, for the purpose aforesaid, will take a recess of half an hour.

The resolution was adopted, and the convention proceeded to join the funeral cortege.

At half past 10 o'clock, the convention re-assembled.

PARENTS AND PROPERTY.

The PRESIDENT presented to the convention the following statement from the second auditor, in answer to a resolution offered yesterday by Mr. Taylor:

A statement showing the total number of parents and guardians, with the amount of their property, and the number of children between 5 and 16 years of age, taken from the commissioners' books returned to the Second Auditor for the year 1849:

	Parents.	Child'n.
1st. Those that have no property entered for taxation and number of children	8,028	19,467

REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES.

The PRESIDENT also presented the following letter, in relation to a resolution passed yesterday on the motion of Mr. Hargis:

HON. JAMES GUTHRIE, President State Convention:

Sir: I enclose a statement of receipts and expenditures from 1829 to 1849. Upon receiving the resolution of the convention on yesterday, requiring me to furnish "the receipts and expenditures from 1823 to 1849 from each source," I found it would be impossible to furnish that statement in time for the use of the convention. I then saw Mr. Hargis, the mover of said resolution, and he is willing to accept the statement now enclosed.

I am sir, very respectfully,

THOS. S. PAGE,
Second Auditor.

Auditor's Office, Frankfort, Oct. 27, 1849.

Mr. HARGIS said it was important that the convention should have the information which his resolution had called for, and he hoped the document now presented would be printed and referred.

The motion to print was withdrawn, after a few words from Mr. Triplett, and the communication was referred to the select committee on the State debt.

NEW COUNTIES.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, from the select committee on that subject, made the following report, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed:

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. No new county shall be formed with an area of less than three hundred and fifty square miles; nor shall such new county be formed, if by doing so it reduces any county out of which it shall be formed, in whole or in part, below an area of four hundred square miles; and in running the lines or boundary of such new county, no such line shall run nearer than ten miles of the county seat of any county.

INSTRUCTION TO CLOSE DEBATE.

Mr. MERIWETHER offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee of the whole be instructed to close the debate upon the report of the committee on the court of appeals on Monday the 29th inst., at 12 o'clock, m., and that said committee of the whole proceed to vote at that time upon the pending amendments, and such as may be proposed.

Mr. MERIWETHER said he apprehended the resolution wanted no explanation, for it explained itself. He thought sufficient latitude would have been allowed for debate by 12 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE suggested to the gentleman from Jefferson, that his resolution should be somewhat modified. Amendments might be sprung upon them after the time had arrived at which the resolution would stop debate, and he enquired whether it would be proper that they should be called upon to vote on such amendments without due reflection or explanation. He would suggest, though he would not make any motion for that purpose, that ten minutes should be allowed for debate on any amendment that may be offered.

Mr. MERIWETHER was aware of the objection to which the gentleman from Nelson alluded, but if it was intended to give ten minutes to each gentleman for an explanation, he apprehended they had better not pass the resolution.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE did not suppose that many members would desire to speak or to explain. It might be proper at least to allow a gentleman to give his views on the amendment that might be offered, and also to allow some member of the committee from which the report came, to give reasons why it ought not to be adopted. Now suppose twenty members should consume ten minutes, not in discussion, but in explanation; would that be too much time to give to it? In the house of representatives of the congress of the United States he believed time was allowed to explain amendments, and he thought such a privilege should be retained here.

Mr. MERIWETHER said, in reference to the rule in Congress, it was confined he believed to the mover of the amendment. He had no objection to give the mover of an amendment ten minutes for explanation, and the chairman or a member of the committee that reported the article, ten minutes for reply.

The following words were therefore added to his resolution: "allowing the mover of any amendment ten minutes to explain the same, and to a member of the committee making the report, ten minutes to reply."

Mr. HARDIN enquired from the gentleman from Jefferson, if he meant to preclude any remarks when the report should come from the committee of the whole to the house?

Mr. MERIWETHER. Certainly not.

Mr. HARDIN continued. He made the enquiry because he designed to say something himself, but he should take up as little time as possible.

The PRESIDENT put the question, and a division was called for.

Mr. MERIWETHER said as there seemed to be some doubt about it, he would ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRAY thought this resolution was rather making a discrimination between the members of the convention. It appeared to him that every member of the house ought to have the same privilege; and he saw no reason why it should be confined to a member of the committee from which the report came. He moved to amend the resolution, so as to give ten minutes for explanation to every member who desired to explain. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. IRWIN said, he did not like the resolution as it was amended. A good many had addressed the convention and it might be that others desired to do so too. He desired to do so himself. He had been trying for several days to have sufficient confidence in himself to do it. It seemed to him that after fifteen or twenty gentlemen had occupied the whole time of the convention from its commencement to the present time, other gentlemen should have an opportunity to speak. He did not think the time had been spent unprofitably that had been spent in discussion. He thought important views had been presented to the house and he thought this discussion would do a great deal of good to the country. They learned from each other the views that gentlemen entertained, and he could not see why it was necessary that they should say that at this particular day the debate should be closed. He thought they had been getting along very well, and that in two or three weeks they should be ready to vote, as by that time many of the most prominent subjects would have been discussed. He thought it better to lay the resolution on the table at present. He made that motion.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MERIWETHER withdrew his call for the yeas and nays, and the resolution was adopted.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention then again resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the court of appeals.

Mr. WOODSON. Mr. Chairman, when I indicated my intention last evening to address the committee this morning, it was more from the impulse of the moment than any pre-conceived or settled determination on my part to give my views upon the interesting topics presented in the course of this discussion. At the time, sir, I was laboring under the influence of that general excitement which pervaded the whole committee at the conclusion of the thrillingly eloquent and interesting speech of the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Garrett Davis.) I felt, sir, whilst that distinguished delegate was speaking, with a zeal so characteristic and with a power so peculiar to himself, that it was a singular misfortune to the country and to the party to which he belongs, that he did not utter sentiments which were more in accordance with the wishes and feelings of that party—as well as with the age in which we live—as well as the circumstances by which we are surrounded. I felt the force of the remark that the gentleman said had been applied to him viz: that he was behind the times—that he was living and acting with the past rather than the present—that he was expressing the sentiments of the eighteenth rather than the nineteenth century. I regret that the gentleman has not resumed his seat this morning as I shall take occasion to notice some of the positions he assumed, and make such replies to them as they merit, in my judgment. Allow me to say though, sir, that nothing is further from my intention than to say any thing which, in the slightest degree, is calculated to reflect upon the motives or intentions which superinduced any remark that fell from him—far from it. On the contrary, I entertain the very highest possible regard for his personal as well as political integrity.

We were all forcibly struck, and I am sure, sir, that the whole country will be when the gentleman's speech, delivered on yesterday, is published, with the graphic description which he gave of the great abuses and corruptions of the elective franchise in Kentucky—men lying in our stables and barns—drinking, violating the sabbath, selling their votes—a picture that I will repeat no further, but refer you, this committee, and the country, to the gentleman's speech for Scenes, sir, which, if they have ever been witnessed in Kentucky, I thank God have never come within my observation—they may have been witnessed in Bourbon. But I am charitable enough to hope that the gentleman's unapproachable purity has revolted at small matters, and has so wrought upon his gifted imagination as to cause him to manufacture mole hills into mountains, in the excitement of debate. He says that money and other corrupting influences will control the elections of our judges; that no one, however pure, ever passed through the ordeal of an exciting political contest, and came out of it, as pure as when he entered it. Sir, I need no more powerful refutation of this assertion than to point to the gentleman; he, sir, has passed through many such ordeals, and he still is but another name for purity.

But allow me, Mr. Chairman, to ask what was the whole of the gentleman's speech an effort to prove? Nothing more nor less, sir, than man's corruption and incompetency for self-government. Strip that speech of the bright, glowing and burning words with which it is clothed—let it stand in its naked simplicity before the country, and nine-tenths of all who read it will see but that one idea in it. I am happy to say that it is the first speech I ever heard on that side of the question. I have read many. I could but think of the days of 1776 when such speeches were common. At that time the enquiry, can man govern himself? was an interesting one indeed—the purest patriots—the most sagacious statesmen doubted—the experiment had never been successfully made—the fallen splendors of the republics of antiquity were poor arguments in its favor—the pomp, power and circumstance of monarchical Europe—the literature of the age, and, I may with propriety say, except in the colonies, the patriotism of the age all stood in hostile array against it. Still our ancestors acted—they determined to try the great experiment in defiance of the experience of the past—they proclaimed the long obsolete idea, man has purity, intelligence and prudence sufficient to govern himself—of the glorious, the happy results of that determination I need not speak—they are subjects with which the world is familiar. And I had thought that even the crowned heads of Europe had at last acknowledged the truth of the maxim “man can govern himself.” But, sir, what do I find here in Kentucky—yes, sir, in Kentucky, where I had supposed every heart would bleed and every head would fall in the maintenance of this great truth? I am told by one of Kentucky's most distinguished and gifted sons that he is afraid to trust the people—that he is afraid to trust himself. And we are now called upon to demonstrate the fact that the people are capable of electing their own servants. We are now triumphantly asked if we wish to destroy the symmetry of our government—to set at defiance the experience of the past—to overturn a government which has so happily and so signally blessed us—and under which so few abuses have occurred in the executive or judicial departments of the government?

I answer for myself, sir, that if to take from the governor of Kentucky—the judiciary of the country, and the legislature, the power to appoint to, and fill the offices of the country, is to be regarded as a destruction of the government, I am prepared to see it fall—and instead of shedding tears over its untimely grave, I shall only regret that it has not fallen long ago. So far, however, from wishing to destroy, I only wish to build up and perfect the government.

Allow me though, Mr. Chairman, to ask if there have been no abuses under the present constitution of the powers exercised by the different departments of the government? And can I answer that question more conclusively in the affirmative, in any other manner than by calling to your recollection the admission of the gentleman from Bourbon (Mr. Davis) that the present convention would never have been called had the democratic party been treated justly in the bestowment of the offices of the country within the gift of the governor? I think not. He says that partizan considerations have been too generally regarded in the bestowment of office. I would ask if any other than a blind adhesion to party, in the great majority of cases, has ever been regarded at all? To be sure there are some honorable exceptions, but they are few. Do not understand me, however, sir, as wishing to censure the whig party particularly upon this score; they, if possible, are less guilty, in the state and nation than there great rivals the democrats. But we all know, sir, that a whig governor or a whig president will fill the offices of the government with whigs, and that a democratic governor or president will fill them with democrats. Exceptions I know may be found, but isolated exceptions to a rule only prove its general truth. If this is so, and no man can doubt it—and the preservation of the judiciary of the country from party politics is essential, and I am told and believe it is—I ask you how we are to be worsted by changing the mode of appointment? It, per possibility, may be so under an elective system. We know that it is contaminated in its very creation under the present system.

The question, sir, the practical question I mean, has the governor of Kentucky more discernment, more purity, more intelligence than one half of the voting population of Kentucky? For myself I will venture to say he has not. The appointing power to office ought to be pure, intelligent, above improper influences, able to set at defiance the combinations and conspiracies of the designing, to resist the unjust encroachments of the bold and designing, to appreciate as well as to ascertain the merits and qualifications of the retiring and independent, in contrast with the unbridled pretensions of the arrogant and sycophantic—who generally beset governors and presidents for office—not the retiring student or the man of business generally, but on the contrary, the lazy, idle, noisy partizans, who infest the country. The people on the other hand, and I say it to their credit, will reward merit when they find it; and they can but find it, if it is in the country. The people combine to a greater extent, in my humble judgment, all of the requirements of an efficient and desirable appointing power than can be found any where else in this or any other government; and, hence, I desire to see the people retain in their own hands the appointment of every officer in the state.

Various reasons, Mr. Chairman, have brought me to this conclusion, and thoroughly satisfied my mind that I am correct. I will give a few of them. First contrast the talents, virtues, in a word, the qualifications of men in high office, placed there by the people, with those in correspondingly high and responsible positions by executive favor, and I feel confident that the discernment and the judgment of the people will stand fully justified before the world. Congress has been filled by the people, our judges appointed by the governor. I do not know how it is in other states, but this I do verily believe, that in point of talents, morals and fitness for office, the members of congress from Kentucky have invariably surpassed our circuit judges.

Yes, but gentlemen say there is a difference in political and judicial offices; the people are very well qualified, say they, to elect their president, members of congress, &c., but then to think of allowing the people to elect a judge, the idea is ridiculous. What do the people know of the qualifications of a judge? I will tell you what they know; they know who is honest; they know to whom they would entrust their business in a court of justice; in a word they know that honesty, intelligence and business habits, to the exclusion of their opposites, are essential to the proper discharge of important private or public trusts. I tell you though, sir, that the judgment and discrimination of the people, as well as their incorruptibility, are greatly underrated. Go to any common farmer and ask him who is the best lawyer, the most successful, the most honest, that practices at the bar in his county, and I will venture that in nine cases out of every ten, where the enquiry is made, not only a satisfactory, but the correct answer is given. How could this be otherwise, as society is organized and business carried on in Kentucky. The great body of the people attend the courts of the county occasionally, especially when important and exciting causes are to be tried. They see the lawyers arrayed on either side, witness their mental conflicts, listen to their discussion of propositions of law before the court, their addresses to the jury, hear judges and lawyers talking of each others standing and attainments in the profession; these things being so, sir, how can the people be at a loss to know who of the lawyers at the bar is qualified to discharge the duties of judge? Has common sense left the world and taken up its abode with office holders alone? Are the people so steeped in ignorance, barbarism and mental night, that they are wholly unable to discriminate between the pretensions of the pettifogger, on the one hand, and the real merits, sound legal learning and abilities of the lawyer on the other? So far from it I venture that the people, a majority of them, in any one of the districts proposed by the report on your table would be able to designate, with invariable certainty, the very best man in it for the bench. At least they would know more about the lawyers of the district than any governor could possibly know. Let me ask you, sir, what the governor of Kentucky knows about the qualifications of men for office in the remote parts of the state? Nothing, literally nothing. Why, sir, when an office is to be filled, we see those who desire it, riding over the country procuring letters and recommendations of them to the executive, and, generally, without them, he would not know any thing more about the claims or fitness of the aspirants for office than I know of the relative sprightliness of any two of the numerous offspring of the queen of England. At last, sir, under the present constitution, his excellency has to be, from the very necessity of the case, governed in his appointments to office by the information of the neighbors of the aspirant, leading whigs or democrats as the case may demand.

Well, but there is another serious, irremediable objection, to an elective judiciary urged by gentlemen. What is it? Why sir, it is, that they can be corrupted; that money—the charmed tongue of the artful demagogue will mislead them—involvement in error. And here sir, is the Thermopylae of the gentleman from Bourbon—here it was that his eloquent voice swelled to its full height and his indignant eye flashed its keenest fires,—yes sir, in the effort to demonstrate the ease with which the people could be seduced and led away. If there was any one point in his great effort where he exhibited more fully than any where else, the full grown dimensions of Kentucky's orator, it was there. But sir, I will ask, did he convince any one that he was right in the views which he presented—in the assertion he made, that he was afraid to trust the people? If so, I can only say to you, whoever you are, then sir you are convinced that the very foundations upon which our government rests are but sands to be swept away by the breath of the first demagogue who breathes upon them. Our government rests upon the intelligence—the purity of the people; and I need not say that if they can be rendered vicious and corrupt in the election of the judiciary, that they can in the election of the legislature, state and national. And if so, what is our government worth? Not the paper sir upon which the charter of our liberties is written. And if I were fully satisfied that the people were corrupt—the majority I mean,—that those who have all power, according to the theory of our government, could be bought and sold—and the government of the country thus made the emblem of corruption and iniquity—I would invoke the shades of our departed ancestry to return to earth, form a procession, with Jefferson and Madison at their head, take the declaration of independence which declares the equality of man, the constitution of the United States which provides for a popular government, and together with all the State constitutions which secure the same great and heretofore thought inappreciable boon to man, march to the foot of the British throne, confess the divine right of kings, make a bon fire of those unmeaning, false, delusive charters of our boasted liberty, and pray her majesty to give us a sprig of royalty to reign over us and our children for ever. But, Mr. Chairman, I thank my God that I yet have confidence in the purity and the incorruptibility of the people, and consequently in man's ability to govern himself. And deprive me of that confidence, and sir when you have done so, allow me to say that you have deprived the world, as well as myself, of the brightest hope that gilds the patriot's dreams.

At last, however, I am told sir, that even admitting the people would elect good judges, that they cannot be corrupted, and all that, yet that unless the judges are independent that the country is destined to decay and ruin,—and we have had long, eloquent and able speeches in vindication of an independent judiciary. The mother country, old England, (I wonder if we will never get done going to her for precedents to prove how a Republic ought to be governed?) has been referred to—her independent judiciary has been pointed at—the high wrought praises of a Blackstone, of an independent judge, have been cited. There I admit its necessity—the liberty, the property, the reputation of the subject, are all dependent upon the independence of the judge; that is, provided dependence makes a man a slave, and I know that it does to a greater or less extent.

There sir, the king appoints the judge—there the reigning monarch is considered the source of power and honor; here the people—here in short, the government was made for the people—offices erected for the benefit of the people, and the duties thereof are to be discharged for the benefit of the people; there the government was made for the king—offices created by him and for his favorites to fill, and the laws of the realm administered to suit his royal pleasure, and often to the oppression and ruin of the British subject. Hence it was that the people demanded, and at length succeeded in effecting, the independence of the judge, who was to decide upon their most sacred rights. Prior to this time, the commission of the judge in England was during the pleasure of the crown; this being the case, we all can but see at once that there was no independence in the judiciary, and we can all see the necessity for it. There the effort was to make the judge independent of the king; here, strange absurdity, the effort is to make him independent of the people; there the king fought against the independence of the judiciary—the people for it.

Mr. Chairman, here allow me to advert to first principles for a moment or too. All human governments have had an origin, different theories characterize them. And it is our good fortune in America to differ from all of the governments of the world which are older than ours. In what does this great distinguishing difference consist? Most conspicuously in two respects—first in other governments the executive originates the theory and appoints the officers who are to administer it. Here the people originated the government and prescribed the duty of those who are to administer it. Secondly, here we have a written theory—dividing the government into different departments and assigning to each department particular functions—such was not the case in any other government upon earth when the constitution of the United States was formed. Why I may be asked, do I advert to these first principles? I do it to show the want of analogy between our government and all others—and to assert that this convention has all power in its hands, which has been lying dormant in the present constitution of Kentucky, or which has been exercised under it by the different departments of the government. That it is legitimate and right in us, either to increase or diminish the powers of the legislative, executive or judiciary branches of the government as we may think right or the people demand, whose majesty we represent. The question then presents itself, what ought we to do? Ought we to allow each department to retain its present powers or ought we to increase the powers of one and lessen that of another? One fact is obvious to all who have reflected upon this subject as we increase the powers of government we lessen our own, as we take from the different departments we increase our own—I mean the people. If for instance we make no provision for a legislature to meet under the amended constitution, none can ever meet—if we take from the executive all of his powers and from the judiciary all of its powers, what then is the government? Why the people most assuredly. Why then to the extent that we diminish the powers of the different departments of the government, without vesting the powers we take away in some other department, we increase the powers of the people. This being so, my impression is, that we ought not to increase the powers of government in any of its departments—but that we ought to decrease it in all and restore the strength we take from these different powers to the people. For instance, let us deprive the legislature of the power to meet as often as heretofore. Let us deprive the governor of the power to appoint any officer of the government—and let us take from the judiciary the right to continue in office save for a limited period. It will be seen that I have stripped each department of the government of great powers—but if I have it has only been to give them to the people to be exercised by them. Now there is only one sort of independence that I recognise under our theory of government, as properly belonging to the judiciary or either of the other departments of the government—and that is let each be perfectly independent of the other—that is never allow the legislature to infringe upon the executive, or the executive upon the judiciary—keep them all separate—exercising their delegated functions each in its own sphere perfectly independent of all the rest—and all dependent upon the people within constitutional limits. Thus far, sir, and no farther am I willing to subscribe to the doctrine of an independent judiciary.

There is another idea which I wish to present. I understand that this is a free people, that we live in a republican government, and that the people have a right to govern themselves. We have a senate and house of representatives in Kentucky as well as in the United States government. Why is it that the members of the lower house are elected for a short period, and the senate for a longer one? It is to prevent the effect of hasty legislation under the influence of popular excitement. Look now at the report of the committee on the court of appeals, and we see there is a provision that the judges shall be elected for eight years, the first being elected for two years, another for four, another for six, and the fourth for eight years, so that after the first election only one judge is elected in two years. We have the same conservative principle here then, which is found in the manner in which our senators are chosen. Suppose now any undue excitement should originate in the country. Only one member of the court will be chosen at any one election. Four years will have to pass away before any improper influence from popular excitement can be brought to bear on the decisions of that court. Well, if a people shall persist for four long years in one course of policy, my impression is it will be right. I do not believe that any people will continue for four years in any undue excitement. We have a safe guard then in the bill itself, which will secure us against any excitement to which the people are liable. My impression is that this is a mere contest between the friends of a popular government, and the friends of the old order of things.

But, said my friend, (Mr. G. Davis) the people are unwilling to trust themselves; and he is unwilling to trust himself, and he is unwilling to trust the people. How did he attempt to show that? Why he read from the constitution of 1799 where it is said that private property shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. He read the section relating to the inalienability of the rights which are reserved in this constitution, and then declared that the people were afraid to trust themselves. Whom did they trust? Did they confide any of these powers of which the gentleman read, to the legislature, or to the executive? They trusted nobody but themselves with these powers. To show this point, I will read from the 28th section of the 10th article.

Now these sacred rights were excepted out of the general powers of government, and where were they reserved? In the hands of the people; and this convention is nothing more nor less than the body of the people of Kentucky, called here for the purpose of amending the organic law, and to make such improvements as time has pointed out to be necessary. How are we created? By the people. Can the power that creates create any thing, having greater purity than the creating power? Suppose this convention appoints all the judges in the state, would any gentleman be afraid to trust this convention? And yet I do not think that this convention would appoint better judges than the great body of the people would appoint. This convention is the reflex of the intelligence of the people, and if they were capable of electing us they are capable of electing their officers, and they will exercise it. The gentleman regrets that New York has set us so baneful an example, but I can tell you the time has come when the people of Kentucky too intend to take the power into their own hands. I am glad that New York has set the example, and I am only sorry that the honor of this great movement, this first step in modern times in a great state, does not belong to Kentucky. New York has set the example, Pennsylvania is about to follow. Tennessee intends to do it, Kentucky intends to do it, and I tell you that the time is not far distant when in all the thirty states of this Union the people will elect every officer. And we will go higher, we will not stop there; we will take it upon ourselves to elect every officer in the state and nation. We can do it with as much propriety, and as much benefit to the people as it has been done, or is likely to be done, under the old order of things. I have much respect for past history, but am not so wedded to it as not to be willing to open my eyes to the light which is everywhere beaming around me.

I was sorry sir, to hear the gentleman say that he would go home and oppose this principle before the people, the principle that the people have the right to govern themselves. I trust he will take that back. I trust he will take the example of those who framed the constitution of the United States. There was a Hamilton in that body, who fought the great battle for the aristocrats and monarchists; he opposed the constitution through every step of its progress; and when he had struggled and struggled in vain, that magnanimous, that great and illustrious man surrendered his own opinion and he went to his state and with all the powers of that mind which had not been surpassed in that or any other age, he labored for the adoption of that constitution and it was adopted. I trust Mr. Davis will go home and retract what he has said here, and come into the support of this principle. But if he should not, I will still hope that he will not be able to defeat what the people have done here. I know his powers, his genius, and ability, but I trust that hereafter he will be disposed to act with the friends of constitutional reform in carrying out what they have determined to carry out.

My friend from Mason, the other day said, there were three sorts of aristocracies; the aristocracy of intellect, of wealth, and of office. Let me suggest to him that there is another sort of aristocracy, and one that will swallow up all other aristocracies that are not compatible with it, and that is the aristocracy of numbers. The people, sir, form the aristocracy of numbers, and they are coming to take the place of these other aristocracies, that have enjoyed all the benefits of the government, to their own exclusive advantage, and to the entire expulsion of the great body of the people.

I know that I have spoken discursively, but be pleased to remember, this is my first effort in this body, and I felt a little like a gentleman who has never courted, but who is desperately in love. He has good and pure intentions, but when the time comes, he is greatly embarrassed to communicate them. I am only sorry, to use the language of the gentleman from Bourbon, that the people whose advocate I am, should not have had an abler champion; whilst I have been speaking, but I can use a different expression from that which the gentleman used. He said he had no aid, he takes it on himself, that he is the only champion of the rights of the few, to the exclusion of the rights of the many. But sir, I have many compeers, and I thank God, much abler ones than myself, who are willing to do all they can to bring back the government to the hands of the people. I rejoice that it should be so, for I know that every step we take in that direction will meet with favor from the people. I know that the people are capable of the high destiny that awaits them. We have taken our position, nothing shall deter us from it, and in the language of one of Scott's heroes,

"Come one, come all,
"This house shall fly
"From its firm base,
"As soon as I."

I do not profess to be a leader of the people, but one of them, and with them we have our eye fixed on victory; and we intend to march forward. We intend to seize that prize, popular liberty, and enjoy it sir, when we have it.

Allow me to return my thanks for the very kind attention with which I have been listened to.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I desire to avail myself of the rule which prevails in committee of the whole, to express my opinions upon some of the amendments proposed, and which I shall be precluded from doing when the report comes before the convention.

It might be profitable to mark the position which we now occupy. The popular and free governments has existed from the time of the first settlement on these shores by those noble spirits who were driven hither to seek refuge from tyranny and oppression, now more than three hundred years. The government of all the colonies was more or less popular and free in their construction up to the date of our glorious revolution, and since our independence. The form of the government of all colonies as separate states, have become more popular and free with constitutions securing personal liberty and private right, and the choice of the agents of the government with greater or less restrictions in the hands of the people.

When Kentucky separated from Virginia and formed her first constitution in 1792, the right of suffrage was extended to all the free white male citizens over the age of twenty one years. A decided step as to the right of suffrage in advance of the other states of the union, but influenced by the same distrust of the people which was expressed by the gentleman (Mr. Davis) from Bourbon, on yesterday, she provided electors to choose a governor and select a senate, and to the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, confided the appointment of the judges of the superior and inferior courts, and most of the other important officers, and to other agencies the appointment of most of the county and district officers, and only gave to the people entitled to the right of suffrage the choice of representatives to the lower branch of the general assembly, and the electors of governor and senators, and the sheriffs and coroners.

After the lapse of eight years another convention was called, and another step in advance was made, and the right of the people to choose their own governor and senators, as well as their representatives, was secured, but the appointment of judges, &c. was given to the governor, with the advice and consent of the senate, and to the courts the appointment of their own clerks and to the county courts the nomination of justices of the peace with the rotation among the members of that court of the sheriffalty, and the appointment of all the county officers.

How did the system work? Was the country satisfied with its operations? Did the governor in making nominations seek the senators, converse with them, and obtain their advice as to the best man to be appointed? No sir, his nominations were determined on in secret cabinet, and the senate only asked to register and confirm them. How has it been with regard to such nominations? Have the favorites of the governor been such as were the favorites of the people? Have they been selected for their intelligence, integrity and capacity for the station, or have they been selected from family and party considerations, without regard to their qualifications for the office? We know that family and party considerations have but too often prevailed without regard to qualifications, and that great dissatisfaction has long prevailed in the country, and that the people are no longer satisfied to have the appointment of their officers in the hands of the executive.

How has it operated with the courts? The judges nominated by the governor. Have such men been selected as were best qualified for clerks for the discharge of the great trusts and important duties confided to that class of officers, or have they been the mere favorites of the judges and their influential friends—perhaps a relation—and but too often without qualification for the office?

I leave it to the knowledge of those acquainted with how the appointments have been made, and the manner the business has been transacted, to answer the question.

How have the county courts fulfilled the trust of selecting the officers confided to their appointment? The offices have not been bestowed on those best qualified to discharge the duties. The offices have been conferred upon family connexions, the favorites of cliques and mere partizans. The interest of the public has not been consulted, and the people have suffered from neglect and want of capacity on the part of those officers. It is to provide a remedy for these evils, to make a reform in this selection of all their officers, more than for any other purpose, that this convention has been called; and let me tell the gentleman from Bourbon, it is because these trusts have been violated by the agents to whom the people confided them in order to have the offices bestowed on those best qualified to discharge the duties more than any other cause, that this convention is now assembled. It is not, so far as the democracy is concerned, because they have been excluded from offices of trust and profit in the commonwealth by whig executives. It is because the evils have been long continued and festering in the public mind, until the people have resolved that a remedy shall be found and a remedy applied.

The first time I had the honor of a seat in the house of representatives, the question of a convention was before the legislature, and the question of limiting the tenure of the judicial offices of the state was raised by me as a reason for calling a convention, and in consequence of my advocating the limitation I was denounced as a radical and looked upon with dread by those who deemed our constitution perfect. I have lived to see the day when a limitation to the judicial term has the sanction of all.

Having called the attention of the convention to the position in which we now stand, I will submit some remarks upon the subject of the tribunal which we propose to select the judicial officers. It is well to be acquainted with history, but it is far better to understand the lessons which history teaches. The necessity for an independent judiciary is a lesson which we derive from English history. The judiciary of England was not deemed independent, while the appointment of the judges and their continuance in office rested with the monarch, whilst their offices and salaries depended on his pleasure. They were not and could not be independent. It is deemed essential to the liberties and rights of the people to take from the crown the control of the judiciary. His prerogatives and his interests sustained and enlarged by a judiciary subject to his will, acted oppressively upon the people and constituted a judicial despotism, and English freeman learnt that power was stealing from the many to the few by means of the judicial tribunals. All kings that ever have or will exist, have or will seek to have, their powers enlarged and strengthened by open or secret means, and one of the greatest sources of power is judicial construction, and he who has a suppliant judiciary at his control, is master of the liberties and rights of the people. The king as to the tenure of their offices, and subject to English made the judges independent of the removal by parliament. This was done that the judges should stand indifferent between the king and the people. From that time we find the prerogatives of the king restrained by the judicial tribunals, and the people better secured from the oppressions of the crown, and justice and right more sure to prevail. In this country the powers of government, according to our republican theory, reside with the people. From the people proceeds all the powers that are exercised in the various departments of government. There is no antagonist interest between the government and the people. We want no judiciary independent of the people. We want the constitution upheld, and the liberty and rights of the people secured, and what is the interest of one is the interest of all. Whatever change we may make in our constitution—however we may direct the judiciary shall be appointed and how removed, I hope that the principles that secure the rights of personal liberty, of private property, and the pursuit of happiness, will find a place in our constitutional law, and that the judges shall never be independent, but always responsible to the people. A judiciary responsible to people in this country is essentially different from a judiciary in England, and other monarchical governments, where the interest of the king and the people is separate and distinct. I want to have no judiciary in this country that shall be independent of the people.

The arguments in favor of the ability or capacity of the people to select their own executive and representatives in both branches of the legislature, apply as well to the selection of judges. It is conceded the people have capacity to select their governor and representatives—why are they not equally capable of selecting their judges? The president of the United States, notwithstanding the machinery of the electoral colleges, is elected substantially by the people, and the candidates for electors, in practice, are only the advocates of particular candidates, and the organ of the people to cast their votes as indicated at the polls. In our state our chief executive magistrate is chosen by the people themselves. Those who enact our laws—our senators and our representatives, are also chosen by the people. They are the direct agents of the people; the first execute the laws and all enact those laws. We confide to them powers as important and as essential as those we confide to the judges. Why have the people capacity to choose one set of their agents and not the other? The interests, powers, and duties confided to the president of the United States is far more important than that confided to any of our judicial officers, and the many able and distinguished statesmen who have held that office by the votes of the people, afford satisfactory evidence that there can be no want of capacity on the part of the people to select that high officer. The same may be said in relation to the many distinguished men who have filled the office of governor of Kentucky, and the other states, by the votes of the people. And with pride we may refer to the many distinguished men we have had in our national and state legislatures; and the prosperity that we have enjoyed as a people, in our national and state governments, and the wisdom and justice of our laws. Those that make our laws and those that execute them are chosen by the people, and why should not those who administer the laws also be chosen by the people? They are the people's, and not the governor's nor the legislature's judges. If it is contended that the people are not competent to choose their judges, neither are they competent to choose the executive and legislative agents of the state and nation.

Gentlemen contend that the present mode, namely, nomination by the governor and confirmation by the senate, is best calculated to secure the appointment of competent and able men. The governor of the state never has, and never will be, more than a man, possessing passions and frailties, liable to be influenced by proper and improper impulses. He may be deceived, or have unjust prejudices and partialities; and how much more liable is an individual to be mistaken, or led astray by improper influences, than the whole body of the people? How much more likely is he to be influenced by private interest, partiality, and prejudice, than that the whole people should be so? Honesty of purpose and integrity of action are always greater with the masses than individuals, and particularly with individuals armed with power. There will always be greater security in having good judges when the selection is made by the whole body of the community, than when it is made by an individual. Do gentlemen mistrust the people? Do they believe their feelings may be wrought upon and their judgments misled, and that they will be influenced to do what they ought not, and place improper and incompetent persons in office? Who are the parties to suffer, should such be the case? Will it not be the people themselves? Who are most interested in having good judges? The life, the liberty, the property, and the pursuit of happiness, of each and of all, is at stake. No individual can have a separate interest from the whole mass. The liberty and rights of one cannot be trampled upon without hazarding the liberty and the rights of all.

It is true that the education of the masses is not so far advanced as we might desire. Still, the public mind is sufficiently enlightened to be able to understand and comprehend all the great interests of society and government. There is no people on earth more thoroughly enlightened on the principles and sciences of free government, nor on the personal and private rights of the citizens. All, or nearly all, read the bible and the newspapers. They hear, in the several courts, constitutional, criminal, and civil law, discussed by able and ingenious counsel, and they hear the impartial decisions of the courts. The actions of men and their rights are openly discussed in our courts and before our jurors, and all brought to that legal and correct standard of right and wrong which constitutes one of the distinguished blessings of a free people. Our tribunals of justice and trials by jury are high schools for the dissemination of legal information, and the true principles of right and wrong among the people. The law and the justice of every case of great importance is fully discussed and known in the several counties when they arise, and thousands upon thousands of cases are ruled amongst an enlightened and just people, form the lessons learned in our courts and thus disseminated amongst the people.

Our annual elections and our habit of publicly discussing all great and important questions of government and public policy, and the conduct and principles of our public men, are also high schools for the dissemination of political information amongst the people, and for a critical and searching examination of the principles of government, the action of the government, the conduct and actions of public men. Our sessions of the legislature are also high schools for the discussion of the great principles and policy of free government, and are calculated to perfect that knowledge that is acquired from history, and render permanent and lasting the principles of equal laws and rights. The pursuits of agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and mechanical arts, are high schools for acquiring information, and the habit of judging men and things. The freedom of our religion, the instruction of the ministers of the gospel, the Sunday school, the cheering consolation brought to the domestic circle by these messengers of peace, the sublime lesson of morals that flows almost daily from the pulpit, these, with the influence of woman's gentler nature in the domestic circle, and her breathings of love, and right, and justice to her offspring, constitute high schools for the morals of the people.

It is to a people thus enlightened and thus instructed, that we propose to entrust the selection of judges to enforce the laws. There is no people on earth better informed as to the rights, the principles of their government, its policy and its action, the conduct and principles of its public men. They are both thinkers and actors in the great drama of life, and look to their energies and exertions for comfort, for wealth, and station in life, with a full knowledge that all offices are open to their attainment, their ambition, and their virtues. Gentlemen mistrust this tribunal of the people—they mistrust themselves—they have no confidence. Now, confidence may be a plant of slow growth in old men and old politicians, and with the party to which the gentleman belongs. The results of free government—a government of and by the people, in the choice of their agents to conduct it, has given to me confidence that they are to be trusted, implicitly; and I am unwilling longer to pay brokerage to the executive and the other trustees of the present constitution, for bestowing offices in the shape of appointments and places for relations, of the agents and their influential and family friends. The offices are created for the benefit of the people, and if any favors are to be bestowed in the grant of these offices, it is the people's right to bestow them, and to whom they please. The shades of suspicion that gentlemen cast upon the action of the people, in the selection of officers, by the high-drawn pictures of our elections, are but fancy sketches. The great mass are intelligent, honest, upright, thinking and acting men, in the various pursuits of life; and they constitute an overwhelming majority in the electoral college. And we may proudly point to the selections made by the people, through a long series of years, in disproof of the conclusions that gentlemen draw from the spots they see on the sun. The people of Kentucky have decreed this change and I have confidence in the decree, and I wish to carry it out fully and fairly, to the best of my judgment.

I desire to strengthen the judiciary by taking from them the suspicion that they owe their stations to executive favor, or to the influence of great men, or to party considerations. I desire to give them the authority of the people to preside in the halls of justice, and administer the laws of a free people. With the warrant of the people, and sustained by their suffrages, they will have a strength and popularity that they have not hitherto possessed, and can with more confidence and animated with brighter hopes preside in the halls of justice.

Gentlemen fear the influence of great lawyers and subtle litigants will secure the election of judges who will be swayed by the influence that promoted them. The bar of Kentucky is crowded with bold and fearless lawyers, and no judge who is dependent on the public will, can dare to be unjust or partial in his conduct on the bench, or in his decisions. His conduct and his decisions are public property, and scrutinized with boldness. Injustice or partiality will be sure to bring his condemnation before the tribunal of public opinion, and if unjustly or il-liberally treated by the bar or the litigants, that same tribunal of public opinion will be sure to be his guard and his shield.

There is a charm in the life and conduct of an intelligent, learned, and upright judge, that wins the confidence and esteem of the people, and is a sure guaranty to public favor. Such a judge will live down the excitements of the moment, and give sanctity to the laws, and confidence in the public justice of the country.

It is proposed to amend the report so as to make these judges ineligible. All I have urged in favor of the election of the judges by the people, is applicable to their re-election with increased force. The judge has been tried; he has been found capable; he knows the laws; he is impartial; his integrity is without impeachment; he is kind and urbane in his deportment to the bar, to the litigants, jurors, witnesses, and people; he administers the laws with firmness, yet with mercy. The people see and know all this. They desire to retain so good a judge. Why will you deprive them of the right? You fear they have not capacity to know a good judge; that improper influences will be brought to bear on the minds and judgments of the people. You cannot conceive that the people can appreciate the high qualities which constitute a good judge, and that their favor is only to be won by bad men and sinister practices. With all that so judge the people, I have no power to reason, I can offer nothing to persuade—nothing to convince. I believe the people will also know a bad judge, and will mark all the qualities to constitute one, and they will have the intelligence and virtue to reject such, should they come before them for re-election. Bad men are not the recipients of the favors of the people. The sample of our public men prove it. The rejection of all such by the people prove it; and bad judges will have less favor with the people than any other class of public officers. Should the people in the first instance select a bad judge, or in the second trial should he prove such, we shall provide for removal by impeachment or address, so that any mistake in this matter shall be promptly redressed.

The report of the committee provides for four judges of the court of appeals, and that they shall be elected in four separate districts, and shall hold their offices for eight years, and one is to be elected every two years. It is proposed to reduce the number to three, and that the election shall be by general ticket. I shall vote to retain the four judges. I have practiced for many years in the court appeals, and believe the labors are too great for three judges. There has been for the last ten years an average of more than six hundred causes in the court of appeals every year, and some of them immensely complicated, involving intricate questions of law, and involved in doubtful facts. To understand and decide these causes as they should be, requires great time, great labor, and an extensive examination of authorities. There should be ample time and ability to decide the causes which go to that court, and I am satisfied the labor of a fourth judge is required, and that it is due to the litigants of the state that we should provide a supreme court all sufficient to decide well and understandingly all causes that shall be brought to that tribunal.

I shall also vote for the election of the judges of the court of appeals by districts in preference to electing them by the state at large. In electing these judges by districts we shall always have three judges on the bench who have not been voted for by the litigants whose cases are before the tribunal, and to whom the objection which is made to the election of judges, that they will be swayed in their decisions by those who voted against or for them, will not apply. In electing them by districts we shall have the best lawyer of the district selected for the judge, and one who, by his character and legal attainments will be known to the whole district, and which would not, except in rare instances, be the case were the elections by general ticket. We should also have each section of the state represented on the bench of that court, which has not been the case heretofore, and get clear of that charge of partiality in the selection of the court that has prevailed.

Gentlemen say we will have a party court, and that the two great parties will array themselves and choose their candidates from their respective ranks. Grant it; but it will be the same if we elect by general ticket. If we elect by districts each party will present their ablest and best man, and whichever party prevails we shall have an able judge. If we elect by general ticket it is not probable the whole four of either ticket will be equal to the whole four selected for the district tickets, and in all probability we shall not have as many able men on the bench, nor have them so well distributed, and many of the citizens will have to vote for men who they do not personally know.

We have a party court now, and the court will not be more a party court if we elect by districts than it is selected by the governor and senate, or that it would be if selected by general ticket. It might be less so. The governor always puts in his party in office. He cannot and does not rise above party influences; but the people are more liberal and rise above party prejudices, and select men for public office in gratitude for past public services, and on account of high character and capacity for the station. In the office of judge the people do not want a partizan. They want a man of character and high legal attainments, and a just, true and impartial man. Such a man they will elect and break down all party rules. Such men they have elected to political stations in defiance of party trammels, and they are far more likely to elect such to the office of judge.

To the people we desire to restore the appointment of the judges, and to the people in districts who will personally know the men they are called on to vote for. We have looked too much to party and too little to qualification. The people, I verily believe, will look more to qualifications, and less to party in the selection of judges.

We propose to make the sessions of our legislature biennial, and have our representatives elected once in every two years, and to elect our judges in those years that we do not elect our representatives, and to have the election in one day, and in convenient election precincts. The minds of the people will be called to the qualifications of the judge, to the requisites proper for that office and to nothing else; and if the candidate mingles with and addresses the people, he must sustain the character suitable to the dignity of the judge. He must manifest intelligence and capacity suitable for the station. His reputation and character must be pure and without stain. As to a party court we cannot be worsted, and we may be bettered.

I do not consider the plan of the gentleman from Bourbon calculated to give us as able men on the bench. I dislike his electors to come between the people in the choice of the judge. The presidential electors are only advocates of the candidate of the party, and bound in honor to give force to the party nomination. His electors for judges will in some measure lose their character of representatives, and become the advocates of particular men for office, or they would come in upon mixed considerations.

I do not think the judges of the circuit court best calculated to make appellate judges. They are prompt men in general with their legal knowledge; but they are in the habit of deciding on the spur of the occasion, without the examination of authorities, and without proper reflection upon the bearings of the facts, and of the opinions they give. This off-hand and hasty mode of decision they carry on the appellate bench, and habits of this nature it is difficult to get rid of.

I understand it is proposed to amend the report so as to fix a minimum for the salaries of judges; to that course I strongly incline. I believe the people are more liberal in fixing salaries than their representatives, and I believe if we give good salaries the people will take this constitution because they are to fill the offices, and that they will fill the offices with men according to the salaries. If you give salaries adequate to command the best talents and legal attainments, that the people will not put inferior men in the office; but if the salaries are not sufficient to command the services of her best men, that the best men will not be selected; and I believe the success of our constitution depends upon the character and ability of the men selected to carry out its principles.

It is also proposed to amend the report so that the judges shall be elected by ballot, and I am decidedly in favor of the ballot in the selection of judges. In our first constitution we adopted the ballot, and in our second we adopted the viva voce system. Most of the states vote by ballot, and if examples in our sister states is entitled to consideration we have it in favor of the ballot.

The objection made to the election of judges is, that the knowledge of the judge of those who voted for or against him, would influence his action on the bench. I have no fear of that. The character, learning, and intelligence of the men qualified for a judge with the eyes of the people upon him, would place him above such influences; but the suspicion might rest on the minds of the litigants, and that I would provide against by the ballot. Gentlemen declare that voting openly and in the face of the world, makes our people more manly and more independent. I do not think so. It may give the habit of violating the opinions and sentiments for favors expected or for fear of consequences from those in whose employ or power they may chance to be. I have heard men say that they felt they had a right to control the votes of those that were indebted to them and of those in their employ, and again of those with whom they dealt, and have known men sued forthwith for not giving such votes, and dismissed from employment for the same cause, and politics made the open cause for ceasing to be a customer.

We have a lesson to learn in our march to perfect freedom, and in the exercise of the rights of freemen. We must learn to tolerate each other in our political sentiments, and what we claim for ourselves, in judging of men and principles, we must learn to grant, without interference, to all others, or we are not good whigs or good democrats. We still have a remnant of the tyrant in our nature, which it is our duty, as the free men of a free government, to eradicate and destroy. I would give the ballot as one great step towards this toleration. I desire every man to understand the principles of his government, and to take an interest in its action and in its public men, and when election day comes to feel every inch a sovereign, and be able to cast his vote without fear of consequences. I call for the election of judges, and I call for the ballot.

I thank the committee for their patient and attentive hearing.

EVENING SESSION.

The Convention re-assembled at 3 o'clock, P. M., and again resolved itself into committee of the whole. Mr. HUSTON in the chair, on the article in relation to the court of appeals.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should be very willing if I could to add to the correctness of the conclusions of the convention or hasten the progress of the business thereby, to be merely content with recording my vote. But as I shall not interfere with either of these objects by making a few remarks, to add my mite to the correctness of the conclusions to which the standing committee have arrived, and to express my indebtedness and gratitude to them that they did report such a bill as they have. Not agreeing perhaps in all its details, yet the great principles asserted in that report, I do freely endorse. So far as the business of this convention is concerned, I have adopted for myself the rule that I will struggle for unity on all matters of principle, essentially important, to ask for liberality on all subjects not important and not essential; and I am sure of the ready response of every delegate when I ask for charity in all things. Politicians have a habit when they commence their career, or are about to act in reference to a great principle, of defining their position; and in a very few words, sir, I wish to define mine before this committee.

I do not mean to say much in regard to abuses in our government. That there have been abuses seen by all, there can be no question. There have been many abuses which serve as a finger board to point out their origin, and the danger which exists that may grow into graver and more serious ones; and it is a matter of surprise to me that in the history of our government, under our present organization, they have not been greater. Had our official functionaries acted up to the limits of their power under that organization, and without regard to the spirit of the age or of the people, then our evils would have been great indeed, and long since by revolution or otherwise would have been obviated. But we are indebted to the officers of the commonwealth, from the foundation of our government to the present time, for having done as well as they have; and there is not a solitary officer in the state, against whom I have had, so far as I have engaged in the political reforms of the day, a private pique or malignant feeling—having met at the hands of all the best treatment in the social and official relations, and in the discharge of my duty before them. I have received from their hands no particular favor, neither have I sought for any, therefore I am not disappointed. Hence, no such influences operate on my mind. But some abuses have sprung up—and those abuses directed my mind to the source from which they sprung—the tenure by which they held their offices, and I then thought we had better provide against them, lest in an unfavorable hour these abuses might grow up to the extent to which we have conferred authority on our officers to increase them. It sometimes happens that the people in a small district will desire some functionary, who has charge of some especial duties, to discharge them in a particular way. Most generally they do it, but sometimes they fail, and this directs me to the authority and source of such an abuse. In a district near where I live, there was a vacancy in the office of justice of the peace, and the people in that district got together and elected one. They did it with as much form and ceremony and as well, as if they had been authorized to do so under the laws. But the tribunal to which an appeal was made (the county court,) felt it to be an insult to their dignity that the people should have dared to do it, and would not appoint the man of the people's choice. This induced me to look at the authority under which the court acted, and whence they derived it. The people in the authority, and the organic law as it now exists, authorized them to act as they thus saw proper to act. Another view led me to conclude that some reform ought to be made in the organic law. The greater number of offices seemed, to a great extent at least, from accident of course, to fall into the hands of particular individuals, who did not, as my friend from Mason most eloquently described, depend on their personal merit for the positions to which they were elevated. They were not offices attainable by those in the humbler and less wealthy walks of life. The leveling up principle, referred to by my friend, therefore struck my mind with great force. That great moral principle in reform for which I contend, struck more forcibly than any of the small or great charges made against the officers themselves. I may subject myself to the charge of being a demagogue, but I express my own sentiments. The great moral principle which makes the people feel that this is their government, that they bear it on their shoulders, elevates them in the scale of being, and makes them each feel that they may each attain the highest destiny.

This great moral principle was one of the grounds upon which I come to the conclusion that reform in our organic law was necessary. It was to secure equal rights and equal privileges, to hold out an inducement to the children of the poor and humble as well as the rich and powerful, that if they qualify themselves they may stand a chance to fill the best offices in the country. We have the power to do this now, and I am greatly gratified that since I formed this opinion, I have had no occasion to doubt its correctness, except for a short time last summer when an excitement sprung up on one question. I was a little alarmed, and I was afraid this convention would not come here prepared to work out all those reforms which I honestly thought they should. All that fear has been wiped away. I find the people competent to the task, even when excited from one border of the state to the other, and I bear testimony to the fact, they have sent individuals here well qualified to the discharge of these duties. Then the great consideration is, what are these duties? They have sent us here with authority to yield some of their sovereign power. It is a very high responsibility which rests upon us, and for myself, I will yield up no power into the hands of any department of the government, except so far as is consistent with the necessary restraint and protection of the people and their rights. The great question then comes up, what shall we yield? Some say that we must yield the election of officers, and some regard the people as not qualified to discharge that duty. It is true that all power is inherent in the people—there is no controversy about that. But the question is, how much of that power shall we yield and give up to the different departments of government? It is regarded that the science of government has not progressed further than the organization of three distinct departments. But how much power will you yield up? Just that which is inconvenient to the people to exercise themselves—just that and no more will I consent to yield up; nor are we authorized to yield up any more. Just so far as the people can conveniently attend to the great duties of the government, let them so attend, and thereby feel the elevating influence of thus discharging that duty. But it is said that the election of judges is a thing the people have not talked over or thought of. Elect a judge—the man whom we are in the habit of looking upon as superior, and as hardly forming a part of human nature. Elect a judge? Yes sir. But there are various collateral questions growing out of this main question. It seems to strike the minds of some of the delegates, and some others with great alarm that this power will be exercised by the mob. And some gentlemen say we want a court independent of the people, and some that they are not willing to trust the people. Nay says the gentleman from Bourbon, "I am not willing to trust myself!" If he has that distrust of himself, which should pertain to men who are called upon to discharge high duties, in view of the responsibilities which press upon them, it is right and proper; but if he means, in the abstract, that the court would not be independent because it was elected by the people, or that the court must in the abstract be independent of the people, and the people ought not to be trusted with the discharge of that duty—then I must differ with the gentleman. The question of the independence of the judiciary and its origin has been fully argued and settled in this committee. It was independence of the king. What is the meaning of dependence upon the king? If it means anything it is that the judges in the discharge of the high duties of their office regarded the will and wishes of the king more than the protection and safety of the liberties and lives of the people whose rights they adjudicated upon; that they were looking to, and were guided by the wishes of the king.

How does the principle apply in the election of judges by the people? Is it really a subject of alarm, that the judges should regard the people to such an extent, as in the discharge of their duties to be willing to protect their liberties, and to guard against innovations upon their rights, except in accordance with law? That is the question I ask. Then if there is any dependence at all, I want it to be on the people. I see a difference between dependence on the people and dependence upon a party, or those in power. I am not for that. Who is the judge to depend upon? He is to look somewhere for his bread, and that is to come from the people. He is to look somewhere for approbation, and that is to come from the people.

There are always two sides to a picture—a bright and a dark side. The constitution of some minds leads them always to look to the dark side of things, whilst others regard the bright side. Now I believe that the yeomanry of Kentucky, the great body of them, are practical and sensible men, and that when they go into an election it is with a sense of the great responsibility that rests upon them, and that they would vote with an eye single to the prosperity and the happiness of the country.

I know that there is a dark side of the picture, and that there are those of the people who are ignorant and liable to be misled. Let them feel the responsibility which rests upon them, and that the government is not safe unless they turn their attention to it. It has been said that improper influences will be brought to bear upon the people in the election of a judge, and the gentleman from Bourbon, in his glowing description of the evils to result therefrom, among others suggested that some powerful and influential lawyer would induce the people to elect a judge who ought not to be elected. I am aware that these high wrought figures of my friend from Bourbon have been well studied, but still I desire to explain in my own way the influence of a lawyer. I know the lawyers have not a higher reputation for honesty than they ought to have, and yet I believe they are an honest and honorable profession generally. But even put it upon the principle that in the elections the lawyers will be governed in their action by sordid, self-interested motives, what then will be the result? If I understand the workings of the human heart, it will be the desire of every lawyer to get out of practice the ablest members of the bar, as it would leave more business for the balance. Then, even if they are influenced solely by selfish motives, it will be their object to get upon the bench the ablest of their number. So there is no danger of any improper influence upon the people from that source.

Again: it is said that the judge would be influenced to give improper and illegal decisions in favor of the lawyer who aided him in his election. Is that the character of Kentuckians? Would such individuals be made judges? If an individual has aided us in an election to office, and then seeks to induce us to prostitute that office to his advantage, and to the violation of our oaths, it annuls at once all obligation to him, under which we might be placed. And so far from exerting any influence over the functionary, the man would not be further trusted himself. We are sent here as delegates to this convention, and we strike for high principles, and we say that we would sink into oblivion rather than abandon a principle, and that if unaided, and in a minority of one, we shall still battle for that principle. Is it not then assuming too much to say that the people will not elect equally as honest and independent men to other high stations, equally as important as the office we fill? The living examples given by all the members of this convention is a proof to my mind that the people will not fill these offices under such influences as have been indicated by gentlemen on the other side.

We have heard a great deal said about renters and anti-renters, in New York, and about party nominations; and to my judgment, gentlemen are using arguments derived from that source which operates against any and every mode of appointment ever suggested to my mind. We are all aware that these things will have their effect, but the question is how shall we remove the officer farthest from such influences? By keeping the appointing power where it is? All will answer in the negative—that will not do. Then it is the people who will best discharge that duty, and yet I am aware that generally speaking, the people are more or less governed by considerations of that sort. Be it so. We have not arrived at that point when we can expect always to have done that which belongs to a brighter and purer clime above us. The spirit may occasionally make itself visible in our dark and benighted land, but only so rarely as to induce us to hope for its more frequent return. It is never sufficiently evident to arrive at perfection in any of these tribunals. Then the question is not which is the perfect mode, but comparatively speaking, which is the best mode? I contend that from my observation, the best mode is the election by the people. The change would not be so radical as some think; although it is in language and words, yet in practice it is not so radical, and just so far as the change goes in practice, just so far is it useful and beneficial and better than the other mode. Say, for instance, that a certain officer is desired in a particular portion of the state, and by a particular district; and that every man in that district entitled to vote, petitions to the appointing power, that he shall be appointed. Generally speaking he would be; but suppose the appointing power in this instance, should refuse to listen to the wishes of the people. What would be the result? A conviction is produced at once among the people that the appointing power has done wrong, and that would be the conclusion throughout the commonwealth of Kentucky. We are in an imperfect state, and there is no question but the people themselves would do wrong sometimes, but a wrong is supportable, when we bring it upon ourselves; and when we may live to retrieve ourselves from the consequences of our own action, then it is to some extent bearable. Not so when it is brought upon us by others, contrary to our own wishes and will.

And upon the election of the judges there is a difference from what frequently happens in political agitations. It is sometimes the case that politicians bring about a particular result, by urging and pressing certain matters, before the people have advanced to their consideration; but in the present instance the people chose to think in the first place, and the politicians have been obliged to follow, and as some have said with no little alarm and trepidation—especially among those filling the offices—has been created. But the people have said that they desire this power to elect their own officers, in their own hands. I desire just here, to read some little authority on the subject, and in regard to the origin of the difference between the two great parties in the United States. I read from the writings of an individual who was at least forty or fifty years ahead of the times in which he lived, and a more direct answer to many of the appeals made by gentlemen on this floor could not probably be framed. In speaking of the two parties Mr. Jefferson says:

"One fears most the ignorance of the people, the other the selfishness of rulers, independent of them—one side has been fairly tried, the other not."

"I drafted a constitution annexed to the notes on Virginia, the infancy of the subject at that moment, and our inexperience of self-government, occasioned gross departures from genuine republican canons. In truth the abuses of monarchy had so filled all the space of political contemplation, that we imagined everything republican which was not monarchy; we had not yet penetrated to the mother principle, that governments are republican only in proportion as they embody the will of their people, and execute it."

"In England, where judges were named and removable at the will of an hereditary executive, from which branch most misrule was feared and has flowed, it was a great point gained, by fixing them for life, to make them independent of that executive. But in a government founded on the public will, this principle operates in an opposite direction, and against that will, we have made them independent of the nation itself."

"The justices of the inferior courts, are self-chosen, are for life, and perpetuate their own body in succession forever. They tax us at will, fill the office of sheriff, the most important of all the executive offices of the county."

"Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence, and deem them, like the ark of the covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did, to be beyond amendment. I know that age well. I belonged to it, and labored with it. It deserved well of its country. It was very like the present, but without the experience of the present; and forty years experience in government is worth a century of book reading, and this they would say themselves, were they to rise from the dead. Laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind."

"Let the future appointment of judges be for four or six years. This will bring their conduct, at regular periods, under revision and probatation. We have erred on this point, by copying England, where certainly it is a good thing to have judges independent of the king. That there should be public functionaries independent of the nation, is a solecism in a republic, of the first order of absurdity."

That is the theory of Jefferson. I am aware that it is not very good authority with some, but I believe him to have been one of the purest and ablest politicians that ever lived. On this same subject I am favored with a beautiful extract furnished by the research of a lady:

"There is only one cure for the evils which newly acquired freedom produces—and that cure is freedom! When a prisoner leaves his cell, he cannot bear the light of day; he is unable to discriminate colors, or recognize faces. But the remedy is not to remand him into his dungeon, but to accustom him to the rays of the sun. The blaze of truth and liberty may at first dazzle and bewilder nations which have become half blind in the house of bondage. But let them gaze on, and they will soon be able to bear it. In a few years men learn to reason. The extreme violence of opinion subsides. Hostile theories correct each other. The scattered elements of truth cease to conflict and begin to coalesce. And at length a system of justice and order is educed out of the chaos.

"Many politicians of our time are in the habit of laying it down as a self-evident proposition, that the people ought not to be free till they are fit to use their freedom. The maxim is worthy of the fool in the old story, who resolved not to go into the water till he had learnt to swim! If men are to wait for liberty till they become wise and good in slavery, they may indeed wait forever."

Gentlemen have said that we are without experience on this subject; that the people should be enlightened, and that they are not now qualified to elect their judges. And how are they to be? Do gentlemen expect that upon the mere talking of a convention the people will put themselves at great pains to qualify themselves to do that in which they have had no interest. They are however a plain sensible people, and as politicians they are equal to any emergency. Then throw the responsibility upon them, and let them feel that that responsibility is resting upon them, and what will be the result? If politicians are correct they will discharge these high duties, and well discharge them. Thus much upon the general subject of electing the judges.

I have said that I am in the habit of looking at the bright side of things. It may be a good or it may be a bad quality, but I always prefer to look at that side of the picture, and I believe that the spirit and genius of the age will carry me through safely. I believe that if this power be given to the people it will be safely exercised, and that the result in regard to the judiciary, will be all that can be desired. But the mode and manner in which this report is framed, meets many of the objections against the elective principle itself, as contained in it. Gentlemen say that it will not do to have the judges of the court of appeals elected by the people, because of the influence that may be exercised over him by some powerful individual, who may have favored his election, when he comes in contact with a poor man—and that thereby the poor man will be deprived of justice. I will just here remark before I refer to the report itself, which obviates the difficulty, that the argument excites no alarm in my mind. I have understood the course of politicians for a long time, though it is true that I have not been engaged in much political life myself, but I have heard of them, and that is not their way of acting. Politicians generally think remarkably well of poor people, and I suppose it is because a great majority of the people are poor. And when we are told of the power and influence of money in the hands of men who will bring it to bear upon the people, I always remember that in our country, so far as my experience has gone, there is always two sides to a question. Therefore while one undertakes to make his money tell, another is always telling on him, and thus these things will out, and correct themselves. And while therefore the assumption that the rich will impose upon the poor through the influence of the judge upon the bench, excites no alarm in my mind, it is also guarded against by the mode and manner in which the report is framed. Indeed there are three safeguards on the subject. There are to be four judges, and if one of them from the first district should be subjected to any such influence, there would still be the other three uninfluenced. If there were to be three judges, still there would be the two who held over; and who could not be influenced by the causes which entered into the election of the third. So I conceive that difficulty is obviated by this provision of the report.

The district system of election, I believe, will produce a wholesome emulation between the several districts, as to which shall select the best men. It is the feeling of our nature, and with that pride of locality that always exists in the breasts of men, to a greater or less extent, each district will endeavor to send their best men, and superior men, if they can find them, to those that any other district may send. I am doubly in favor of the district system therefore, for the reasons, to which I have just referred. Here, it is as I before remarked, that as to other matters of expediency, I am not disposed to quarrel with members, as to whether they shall be carried out or not. It meets my hearty approbation, that one of the judges shall be elected in each of the four districts. In assuming there are to be four, I acknowledge that I am governed by the arguments of those who ought to know more in regard to the subject than myself. I have conversed with some of the judges themselves, and with others conversant with the business done in that court, and it seems to be conceded, that the business is more than three judges can do with deliberation, and with an eye that justice should always be administered. I am also satisfied that the business will be increased, and I want to provide for that contingency. Let there then be four judges elected, one in each of the four districts. But if it will increase business, is it not also another objection? Not to my mind. It is very true that I may be considered in the category of those who are governed by selfishness, and if nothing is to be considered but the interests of the lawyers of the country, then let those benefits be equally distributed by means of branch courts. But there is a principle involved beyond that consideration. It is of course, a judicial tribunal for the benefit of the whole state, and if the people any where are dissatisfied with the decision of a circuit judge, let them have the advantage of this tribunal composed of the ablest men in the state. If it is of no use abolish the court, but if it is beneficial to the people, then let those benefits be equally distributed, and not confined to any particular locality. But gentlemen say, if those at a distance cannot conveniently come to court, there are those on the ground who will attend to their business for them. But they cannot be so well accommodated. A man feels of course a deeper interest in his own matters than any body else, and my experience teaches me, that if you want your counsel to feel like yourself, you must try and infuse into him the same spirit and feeling with which you are animated. If a man has been oppressed and trampled upon, let him try and infuse such a spirit into the lawyer, that he will feel that it is he himself who is the injured party. Can that be done by men who live three or four hundred miles off and have never seen the lawyer? Whenever an important case was brought to me, I have always advised my client that it was best for him, not only to have a lawyer who resided here, and understood the practice in the court of appeals, but that he himself should go in person and see his lawyer, and mesmerize him, if you can, by infusing into him the spirit which actuates yourself in the pursuit of justice. At a casual view, it may be supposed that it will do well enough to write to the lawyer, and furnish him with the facts; but it is not so well as to infuse into him, by personal application, the feelings to which I have referred. Besides, it is more to the satisfaction of the client to know that his case is in the hands of a man with whom he is acquainted—who is no imaginary person, but one with whom he has conversed, shaken hands with, and of whose character and position he has fully enquired, and is thoroughly satisfied.

The fact that appeals are not taken from different parts of the state in proportion to the amount of business transacted on account of the increased expense thereby imposed on those residing in distant portions of the state, was happily shown by my friend from Montgomery, (Mr. Apperson.) It clearly demonstrates that if there are any advantages to be derived from the court of appeals, the opportunities of having them are not equally distributed. If it is a good tribunal, let us place it within the reach of all, if it is not a good tribunal let us abolish it at once. Considering as I do, that it is a settled question that the judges will be elected by the people, I believe therefore that it is best for each of the four districts to elect one judge. They will be better acquainted with the candidates, than if they were to select from the whole state. But gentlemen say that we must throw some guards around this mode of election if it is adopted at all. And one of the great guards they propose is that the individual should not be re-eligible to a second election. They give as a precedent for this, the fact that the governor is not re-eligible to a second term; but they are very far from convincing me that he ought not to be if the people desire it. I am well aware of the mighty power and influence exerted by the distribution of offices in the hands of the governor, but that objection does not apply to the judge at all, as he has no such power to wield. But I am yet to be convinced that it is not right for the appointing power to say in every case that it may desire, "we approve your official conduct." I cannot see the force of the reasoning that when an individual has well discharged his duties, he shall not be rewarded. It is said that the officer would be influenced by improper motives. Why say that the people are qualified to make the appointment, and in the same breath say the people cannot distinguish between those who deserve a second election and those who do not. It seems to me a contradiction, the principle is absurd and I am not satisfied that it shall be declared in the organic law of the land, that any officer shall not be re-eligible, if he fills the office and discharges the high duties imposed upon him, to the satisfaction and advantage of the people. The dark side of the picture is, that he will prostitute his office to abuses for the purpose of securing a re-election. I believe no such thing. I fully believe that there is virtue and intelligence enough in the people of Kentucky fairly to estimate the manner in which the officers have discharged their duties; and when they have ably and faithfully discharged them, I want the people to have the right to say if they choose to, each and all, "well done good and faithful servant," we trust you and desire you to go on. So in regard to the governor, if I had the power myself, and it was an original question, I should say that he should be re-eligible, and this with the full conviction in my mind that the present officer would be re-elected, although I should do every thing to defeat his re-election. But the judges have no such patronage as the governor, no such offices, and an objection that would be applicable to the governor would not apply to the judge.

And shall we establish a principle in our organic law that we will have no more distinguished men in the tribunals of the country? Will you establish the principle that six or eight years shall be the full limit of the time that any individual who shall fill a judicial station in Kentucky, shall be allowed to distinguish himself and benefit his countrymen? Shall we say to them that no matter how much you may struggle to qualify yourselves, it is all lost? It seems to me the very thing itself operates directly to contradict itself. They want an independent, a virtuous and a talented judiciary and how do they propose to get it? By saying to the judge, when you have had some experience and qualified yourself in the duties you are to perform; when you have got far enough to be distinguished, we prohibit you from serving longer. This principle of human nature would spring up and operate on the individual. He would at once say, I will not undertake to be a shining light in the tribunals of the country; I have but a few years to serve, and then I must seek for other business, and after I have lost all the practice I had, and to a great extent unfitted myself for other pursuits, then I must quit this to which you have called me and find some other way to earn a subsistence. Is it not in fact saying that the appointing power were not qualified for the exercise of that high duty with the influence of the officer operating upon them. Or rather it would be saying to them, you have all the knowledge and ability requisite to decide as to the integrity and virtue of a candidate in the first instance, but in the second you have not, because of the influence the officer would exert over you by the prostitution of his office?—Would it not make the judges more industrious and studious, if they are such individuals as I hope we shall obtain, if we give them an opportunity of showing to the people their ability and qualifications to discharge the duties assigned them under the stimulus afforded by the prospect of a re-election? As was very pertinently remarked, all the reasons that operate on the popular mind favorable to first election, would operate favorable to the re-election. And they would operate even to a greater degree. When we first vote for a man we have had no opportunity of seeing how he will discharge the duties we are about to impose on him; but in the case of a candidate who comes up for re-election, the people have seen and understood his abilities and his qualifications. If they are satisfied then they may continue the worthy officer in the discharge of his duties, and afford him the opportunity still further to inform himself in legal knowledge. There is no such thing as getting to the end of this information—it is progressive. Then let him progress in its acquisition, and if he becomes an honor to the station, let the people have the opportunity of continuing him in their employment. If the officer has been incompetent or failed in the faithful discharge of his duties, the people will at once condemn him.

We are not to expect perfection in any system, and I am aware that the elective system will not be an entirely perfect one. But it has been tested in other states and with success, and while I regret that to Kentucky does not belong the honor of having first adopted the principle, still I am willing to follow in the footsteps, and thus not be obliged to travel over unexplored ground. But the gentleman from Bourbon says that the system has not been tested long enough to satisfy the considerate mind of its success, and then he gives an instance of what particular individuals say on the subject. What they say should have very little influence as an argument, but we have also information as to the working of the system in other states. We have information from Mississippi, and it demonstrates that an elective judiciary in that state, has been entirely successful, in securing the most able, talented, and virtuous judiciary officers. There and elsewhere the system has been fully tested, and we see none who have tried it returning to that system which they abandoned.

I have said what I intended to say on this subject. I have tried to make myself plain, and practical, and easy to be understood. I have not dealt in abstractions. Let logicians do that. I know that the people of this country desire no such reasoning; at least in my section of the state they do not, and to them I desire to discharge my duty. In closing my remarks permit me to express the hope that the labors of this convention will be continued and closed in peace and harmony. Let the good of our constituents and our state be our polar star, and may we each hear, when we retire from our labors, the grateful gratulation, "well done good and faithful servant."

Mr. IRWIN. Differing as I do from the gentleman from Todd in the position which I occupy, I feel it due to myself and due to those I represent, that I should express the opinions I entertain, but I regret that I cannot speak with that clearness and deliberation that he has done. I do not expect that I shall succeed in changing the vote of any gentleman on this important subject. I am one of the few gentlemen elected to this house who were opposed to what is now termed constitutional reform, and in my county it was one of the objections urged against me, that I would be opposed to all reforms that might be proposed in this convention. This however was an error. I am not opposed to all the propositions which have been presented, for some of them contain principles for which I shall vote. In the first place I am opposed to the election of the judges of the court of appeals, as proposed by the committee, but would be willing to vote for a judiciary elected by the people for a single term. I want them to be ineligible. I want them to be independent.

In the organization of a government I have been taught that the different departments should operate as checks upon each other, and I very greatly fear, that the mode proposed will so operate as to centralize all the departments, and produce a despotism on the part of the majority that may in time subvert the rights of the minority—one of the great objects for which governments are created.

What check will the court of appeals be upon the legislative department, when both are placed in power by the same electors. Can you suppose that a majority of the electors who might place representatives in power favorable to the enactment of an unconstitutional law, will place judges on the bench who will reverse the enactment, or declare it null and void. No sir. Elect your appellate judges. Elect your representatives. Let both emanate from the same source, and they act in concert; they will be a unit, and if checks and balances are necessary in a government, you will destroy them. Does any gentleman believe that at the time the appellate judges of Kentucky declared the relief laws unconstitutional, and were hurled from office by the representatives of the people, that judges would not have been elected who would have sustained the legislature?

An incorruptible and enlightened administration of justice is indispensable to a free government, and the question comes up, will the judges of your appellate court, elected by the people, (and that by districts, a very objectionable feature,) be as independent, as free from bias, personal as well as political, as they would be if they were placed in power by some other process? Judges are but men. If they get into a heated controversy, and questions of great magnitude are presented and discussed, their personal, partisan, and political friends mingling in the canvass, and by their powerful exertions securing their election—do you suppose they will forget their obligations; that they will fail to reward their friends and partisans? It will be too much to require of human nature—that they should forget their friends or their enemies.

Gentlemen seem to think that any other process than by a direct vote of the people, is in opposition to the principle that from the people must emanate all authority. Now, we all know that a pure democracy cannot exist, that the powers of the government must be delegated to agents, and the first and great question is, will the interest of society be better promoted by the election of the judges directly by the people, or indirectly by the people, through an agent selected by them and responsible to them.

I incline to the opinion that you will best subserve the interest of the people of Kentucky, by giving to the governor the appointing power of the appellate court, and the senate the power of rejecting or confirming the appointment, limiting the tenure of office to eight years.

By this process you will secure constant responsibility, and destroy the life tenure as it is called, in the judicial offices of the country. I feel satisfied that the objection to the present organization of the judicial department of the government, consists more in the tenure than in the mode of appointment. All men seem to think, that of all the safeguards to human liberty, to the safety of our rights, personal as well as political, the judicial department is more to be relied on than either of the others. If this is so, we should so organize it as to secure efficient, independent and enlightened administrators of the law, and the question comes up, will an election, directly by the people, best subserve our purposes? Sir, from what you have seen and felt, can you, or you, sir, conscientiously say from your own knowledge that elections, as carried on in Kentucky, and indeed elsewhere, are not so conducted as to place the recipients of place and power in a position dangerous to his independence. Is it not in the nature of man to reward his friends and punish his enemies—and does not all history prove that men yield to the power that places them in office? As long as the chancellors of England held office at the will and pleasure of the crown, were they the administrators of justice or the blood-thirsty agents of tyranny? Let any gentleman look into the history of England, through the entire reign of James II, and he will see that the judges were the most profligate and unscrupulous scoundrels that ever disgraced humanity.

Elect the judges now of the court of appeals in four different sections of your state, one district will have one set of political views—another the reverse, and this division may be produced by a decision of the judges themselves—their election is coming on—they are in the canvass, and ardently seeking a re-election—it is over, and they meet on the bench divided in feelings, in interest—and future rewards and future elections are to be secured by the tenacity with which they subserve the party purposes of those who elected them. Do you, can you believe, that these judges thus elected can calmly and dispassionately decide upon the constitutionality of your laws? Why, sir, an elective judiciary system, is yet, I think I may say, an experiment that the best men in the land look upon with fear. Yes, sir, the people themselves, many, very many of them, distrust and fear the exercise of power which may prove fatal to their interests, fatal to their hopes of peace and quiet, fatal to liberty itself.

In these United States, how many have tried the experiment? Four or five I believe—New York, Mississippi and some others—and the experiment is of such recent date that I think gentlemen will not rely upon it as conclusive evidence that the system is much improved. Another feature in this report is most objectionable, that is the election by districts. Sir, if you must elect them, surely you will let the people share in that election. I can have no objection to requiring one judge to live in each district of the state, but surely all sir, as all the people of this state are to participate in the benefits of this court, you will let them have some share in its organization. I think I see in this division of the state into districts, some squinting at party supremacy. I hope sincerely that party will have nothing to do in this judge making business; it will be fatal to our peace and fatal to our happiness. I, like the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis,) think that party should not influence the organization of the supreme court, and that the minority in the state should not be deprived of all share in the judicial or other offices of the country. But sir, how will you prevent it? Put your state into districts, and my word for it, you will elect the judges of the supreme court from the predilections which they may indicate—upon the subject of national politics.

Elect your judges of the court of appeals, as proposed by the committee on the appellate court, and it is admitted by the honorable President, it will be a partizan court, it will be more sir, it will be so organized that litigation will increase four fold, and it will simply be a court for the benefit of the lawyers of the country, at the expense of immense litigation and cost. He says the strongest men of each party will be candidates, and this argument shows that it is obliged to be a political partizan court, and of all the organizations for the distribution of justice, a partizan court is the last one in the world that the people will have confidence in, and it is the last one that I think we ought to organize.

I am told that judges for the supreme court will not canvass. That the dignity of the office, the amount of the salary, and the magnitude of the interests involved will preclude the idea. Why, my dear sir, this district system will, in my opinion secure the election of judges who have a mere local, or neighborhood popularity—and that men will be elected who, if the whole state had the right to vote, would never, no never be thought of—and this local popularity would depend upon his political predilections.

I am also opposed to that principle which makes the judges re-eligible. It has been said that an elective judiciary would protect the rights of all equally. This may be doubted. I know that the rich and powerful can always be secure; if a man has wealth he always has power. Bring two litigants into court in antagonism to each other; one a poor but honest man; he has his home, his fire-side, in fact his all are at stake; he has but one vote to give, he is unknown to fame, and his whole reliance is upon God and his country. But sir, who is his opponent? He is rich, he is powerful, his cause is argued by the most learned counsel. He can by means of his wealth and connexions have the ability to carry his county in favor of the judge who is to decide upon this important case. I ask you Mr. Chairman, if you were placed in the position of this poor man, if you would not fear for your rights.

But sir, suppose he does decide rightfully—and he decides in favor of his rich friend—do you not believe that this poor man would distrust the correctness of the decision? So you see two evils may arise from the operation of this principle of re-eligibility: one, that there is great danger that the judge, to secure his reelection, will lean to some extent, in favor of the rich litigant; and another, that if he decides rightfully in his favor, the poor man will distrust his judgment. Both evils are to be apprehended; either will be fatal to the character of the judiciary, which like Cæsar's wife, should not only be pure, but unsuspected. Surely if we have an elective judiciary, it does not follow that the officers shall be re-eligible.

Sir, I have made up my mind to vote against the election of the judges of the appellate court. I fear its centralizing effects, and I fear for the independence of its officers. I fear that they will fraternize with the legislative department. I fear that a dominant party in the legislature, backed by the judiciary department, may forget that the people created them, or that they are responsible to them. Sir, I have been told that this course was not in accordance with the progress of the age in which we live, and that the people would hold me to fearful responsibility. Sir, I intend to meet that responsibility, and if I am to be sacrificed, I shall have the proud consciousness of knowing that my actions have been prompted by my best judgment of what are the interests of the people.

On the motion of Mr. PROCTOR, the committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. PROCTOR, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Newcum indefinitely. The Convention then adjourned.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. MOORE submitted the following resolution, which was agreed to.

Resolved, That the select committee on the public debt be instructed to inquire into the expediency of depriving the legislature of the power to borrow, or to authorize the borrowing of any sum or sums of money exceeding in all fifty thousand dollars, without the consent of a majority of the voters in this commonwealth previously obtained, except for the public defence in cases of insurrection or foreign war.

This committee consisted of Messrs. Hardin, Meriwether, Barlow, M. P. Marshall, McHenry, Gholson, Coffey, Lisle, and A. Hood.

Mr. MOORE offered the following resolutions, which were agreed to.

Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for the real and bona fide representation in the general assembly of the people of each and every county in the state, and to inquire whether this end is attainable without giving to each county in the state at least one member in the house of representatives, increasing the number in the larger counties by a fixed ratio.

Resolved, That all the people in the state ought to enjoy as nearly as may be an equal representation in the senate of this state, and in the congress of the United States by means of districts of convenient form and equal population, and that the power of the legislature ought to be restricted in districting the state so as to accomplish that end.

Mr. BOYD offered the following resolution, and it was referred to the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery.

Resolved, That the legislature should have the power (a majority of all elected to both branches concurring) to submit amendments to the constitution, to the people; and if a majority of all the qualified voters of the state should vote in favor of such amendments at two successive general elections, it should be a part of the constitution, Provided, that but one amendment should be proposed at the same session of the legislature. And, provided further, that no amendment should ever be so proposed, or submitted, which will give power to the legislature to emancipate slaves, without the consent of the owners.

Mr. BOYD submitted the following, and it was referred to the committee on the legislative department.

1. Resolved, That the legislature should have no power to incorporate companies, with general banking or trading powers, without providing that the private property of each individual stockholder should be made liable for all the debts and obligations of such incorporation, without submitting it to the people for their approval.

2. Resolved, That the legislature should have no power to borrow money (except for the purpose of repelling invasion or suppressing insurrection), without submitting the question, together with the amount to be borrowed and the purposes for which it may be wanted, to the people for their approval or rejection.

Mr. MACHEN offered the following which was referred to the committee of the whole.

Resolved, That the legislature at its first session, after the adoption of the new constitution, be required to provide for the compilation of a book of forms for the government and direction of the clerks of the different courts of record within this commonwealth, in the manner of keeping their records.

HOOR OF MEETING CHANGED.

The resolution some time since laid upon the table until this day, proposing to change the hour of meeting to 9 o'clock A. M., and to hold an evening session, commencing at 3 o'clock P. M., came up in its order.

Mr. PROCTOR, who moved the original resolution, now urged its adoption. In reference to the objection urged when he first submitted the resolution, that it was necessary to give the committees time to discharge the duties devolving upon them in their committee rooms, he said he believed that objection no longer existed; but if it was not entirely removed, he suggested to the committees the propriety of a more industrious devotion to their duties.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said he should now cheerfully vote for the gentleman's resolution; but he rose principally to say, in reference to the closing remark of the gentleman, that the committee of which he was the chairman—the committee on the court of appeals—had not been otherwise than industrious in the discharge of their duties, frequently holding two sessions a day of four hours duration, besides attending the session of the convention.

Mr. WOODSON was of opinion that the business of the convention was not sufficiently advanced to justify them in holding evening sessions; he therefore moved to strike out that branch of the resolution which provided for an evening session, which would leave it to the convention to meet in the evening whenever it might be found to be necessary.

Mr. CLARKE defended the standing committees against any imputation on their industry. He said they had been more industrious than the committees of any legislative body of which he had ever been a member. For some ten days longer he thought they should not commence evening sessions, for they had still many consultations to hold, the constitutions of many of the States to read in reference to particular sections, and much labor to be undertaken in making the articles of the new constitution as perspicuous as possible. He suggested that this resolution should be still further postponed.

Mr. BRISTOW also defended the committee of which he was the chairman, against any imputation on their industry.

Mr. McHENRY, in the absence of the chairman of the committee of which he was a member, also justified that committee by a recapitulation of their labors.

Mr. GHOLSON briefly spoke in favor of evening sessions.

Mr. PROCTOR disclaimed any intention of casting imputations on the members of the committees. But he reminded the convention that they had been a month in session, and in that time the committees should have managed to get through their business, and the convention itself should show to their constituents that they were in earnest in the business which had been confided to them.

Mr. HARDIN briefly explained the progress and present condition of the business before the committee of which he was chairman, and expressed the opinion that now they should be enabled to proceed rapidly with the business of the convention, and meet the expectation of the people. He confessed that he was of opinion, that they had hitherto done very well. They had interchanged opinions and become acquainted with each other's views, and in the course of another week, they should be enabled to vote upon some of the most important questions upon which they should be called to act.

The motion to strike out that branch of the resolution in relation to evening sessions was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted. The convention will therefore meet for the future at 9 o'clock, A. M.

THE CONTESTED ELECTION CASE.

Mr. ROOT stated that, as chairman of the committee on elections, he had received a communication from Mr. Leecompte, the contestant for the seat occupied by Mr. Nuttall, but as that case was not now before the committee he had been advised to present it to the convention.

Mr. GARRARD objected to the reception of the communication. He thought it should not be placed upon the journal. The gentleman from whom that communication came, was the claimant of the seat of the gentleman from Henry, and he had had a fair opportunity to sustain his case by any proof in his possession; but in the progress of the case, Major Leecompte withdrew his claim to the seat, and the sitting member was declared by the committee, to be rightfully here. That gentleman however, now sent here a document of some eight pages, which he (Mr. Garrard) did not suppose Major Leecompte had written, which should not under the circumstances of the case, be received by the convention, and spread out on their journal.

The PRESIDENT enquired if he rightly understood the chairman of the committee on elections to say that it was not a communication addressed to the convention.

Mr. ROOT replied that it was addressed to the committee on elections.

The PRESIDENT then decided that it was not properly before the convention.

Mr. ROOT withdrew the communication.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention again resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the court of appeals.

Mr. PROCTOR. As I am perhaps the youngest member upon the floor of the convention—and as I am conscious of the age, ability, experience, and talents of those with whom I am associated in the great task of making for the people of Kentucky a constitution, it is with no ordinary degree of diffidence that I have summoned to my aid, the courage that will enable me to address the committee. But I do not intend to enter into an elaborate discussion of the various propositions before the committee, nor would I have been found intruding myself upon the time and patience of the convention, had it not been for the tenor of certain remarks which have fallen from gentlemen during the progress of this discussion, which I hold to be at war with the genius and spirit of the age in which we live.

And you will permit me, Mr. Chairman, here to remark, that while I have ever been conservative in my views in relation to constitutional reform, and while I have ever been opposed to that radical doctrine which would unsettle and destroy the great conservative influences of the different departments of the government, I am at the same time not one of those who are so wedded to the old order of things as not to see the errors and defects with which that system is surrounded. While I venerate that which is venerable, and while I admire that which comes down to us sanctioned by our fathers and rendered sacred by time-honored custom—and while I appreciate as I should the labor of those venerable men who have gone before us, and to whose devoted patriotism and love of country we are indebted for so many of the privileges which we enjoy, I am not one of those who believe that no improvement can be made in the science of government.

Mr. Chairman, seventy three years ago our fathers proclaimed to the world the important truth that man was capable of self-government; the people of this union have been demonstrating that great principle ever since; and the free voters of Kentucky have elected us to this convention for the purpose of giving to this union and to the world a practical illustration of this great principle. In making a government for the people of Kentucky it should be remembered that we are not now just emerging from the savage state, but that we are surrounded by all the lights and experience of other ages and other countries and have the advantage of all the benefit which is to be acquired in the great school of experience. It is our duty in forming a government for the free and intelligent people of Kentucky to make that government harmonize as near as may be with the spirit and genius of the people. And what, Mr. Chairman, let me ask is now the condition of mankind; and what is the aspect of human affairs? It is that of alternate struggles and triumphs. And yet I venture the assertion that never in the history of man, with all his chronicled glory and ancient renown, has there been witnessed a period so interesting in the history of man as the present. I know, sir, that we may perhaps discover in the history of certain nations specific acts and achievements more glorious than any of which we boast; but, sir, in coming to a correct conclusion as to the intelligence and capacity of a people for self-government, we must withdraw ourselves from narrow compasses and individual instances, and we must look abroad upon the whole human family; and where I ask was there ever a period so interesting in the history of man as the present? But a few short years ago the lordly prerogative of the few over the many was the settled and recognized doctrine of all Christendom. A few bold and gallant spirits, however, there were who repudiated this doctrine and asserted the great principle that to the people belongs all power and all sovereignty.

It was this great principle that enabled the British subject to wrest from the hands of the British crown the magna charta of English liberty. And, sir, it was but the working of this great spirit that enabled our fathers to shake off the yoke of a tyrant, and to seek an asylum here in this mighty empire of a new world, where, bearing with them the spirit of this great principle, proclaimed to the world the important and hitherto disputed truth that all free government was founded on the authority of the people. Acting upon that great principle ever since, we have given to the world a practical illustration of its truth. The great advancement which the American people have been making in all the various sciences and departments of government is but a proof and confirmation to my mind that man is indeed and in truth capable of governing himself. Under the spirit and genius of our institutions and the age in which we live our people have marched onwards, and have been demonstrating the beauty, grandeur and power of a government founded on the virtue and intelligence of a free and independent people.

Then sir, in forming the constitution which we have assembled to make, we should make that instrument correspond, as nearly as possible, to the genius of the people, and the age in which we live. For myself, sir, I shall vote for every proposition which will tend to produce such a result.

In forming a constitution for the government of a free people, it is well for that government to harmonize with the feelings of the people, because sir, all governments and all free institutions must be sustained and supported by the great majority of the people. The question naturally arises then, what are the sentiments and feelings of the people of Kentucky, in relation to the election of the judiciary, by the people. If sir, I am any judge of the indication of public sentiment upon this subject, there is a vast and overwhelming majority of the people of Kentucky in favor of electing their judicial officers. And sir, while I am frank to admit, that for a long time I doubted the propriety and expediency of electing the judges by the popular voice, yet sir, I am also as frank to confess that upon mature reflection and consideration of this great question, my mind has undergone a radical and perfect change. I confess sir, that having been early taught to look upon the independence of the judiciary as the only safe-guard to the rights of the citizen, I had imbibed the notion that this independence was inconsistent with popular elections by the people. Not sir, that, like my friend from Bourbon, I feared to trust the people; but I did fear that the influence which might be brought to bear upon popular elections might warp the judgment of him who was to decide upon the various rights of the citizen. But when I came to look upon this question in all its various bearings, my better judgment has convinced me, that there is no power to which the selection of the judicial officers can be so well trusted as to that of the sovereign people themselves. The gentleman from Logan on Saturday, remarked that he was opposed to the election of the judges by the people, from the fact, that if the judges were elected by the same electors by which the legislature and the executive were elected, they would form a unit in the several departments of the government that would be dangerous to the rights and interests of the citizen. May I not ask, Mr. Chairman, if there would not be a unit formed in the different departments of the government, if you still permit the executive to appoint the judicial officers of the government—a unit far more dangerous to the rights of the people than if you retain in the hands of the people, the power to make these appointments themselves. I think so, sir. I believe as was remarked by my aged and venerable friend from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) upon another occasion, that "all men love power from the Autocrat of Russia down to the petty constable who struts your streets with his saddlebags upon his arm." And if you confide too much power to the hands of one man, that power will be abused; whereas, if you retain it in the hands of the people, the many, to whom, and from whom all power emanates and belongs, there cannot be that danger that would result from concentrating all power in the hands of one man.

I know that it is a difficult task to form a government that will be perfect in all its parts. Man is a frail and erring being; he is subject to all the passions and prejudices of frail, erring nature; but sir, when we come to make a government, we should endeavor, as near as may be, to make that government harmonize with the condition of man as man, and to harmonize with the great principles of civil liberty.

How then, sir, is this to be done, if you want to elevate man in the scale of human existence? Can you do it by telling him that you are distrustful of his capacity to select his own agents, and the officers of government? Would it not rather be done by holding out to him the idea that he was an intelligent being, created for high and noble purposes, and endowed with great and mighty privileges? What sir, was it that nerved the arm of Kentucky soldiers when bearing aloft the flag of their country upon the heights of Cerro Gordo, and upon the plains of Buena Vista, but the recollection of the noble ancestry from which they sprang. We, sir, then are to make a government for a brave, a patriotic, and an intelligent people, and in making that government, we should not indicate to that great people, that we distrusted their capacity for any emergency. Again sir, if you elect all the officers of your government, you say to the humble and obscure (and sir, having commenced my career in life without friends or fortune, I confess I have a very great respect for this class of the community,) that the door is open, be virtuous, be honest, be industrious, and a virtuous and intelligent people will reward your exertions.

Mr. Chairman, I will say no more upon this branch of the subject. But I will just here remark, that I shall support the proposition as reported by the committee, with but few exceptions. I shall support the proposition to elect the judges by districts, because sir, I believe that by that plan, we shall be more likely to get a court free from prejudice than by any other plan that has been proposed. By that plan, three of the judges will be removed from the consequences which have been so much deprecated upon this floor by gentlemen, who fear that the excitement of an election by the people might be brought to bear upon the decisions of the judge. I shall vote for branching the court, because I believe that if this court is demanded by the interest of the people, and is necessary to carry out the great ends of government, it should be so arranged as to give to all the people, as near as possible, an opportunity to avail themselves of the advantage of that court. And again sir, as was well remarked by my friend from Todd, if you want a suit well managed and well attended to, you must have an attorney that partakes of the spirit of the client—one who will become interested in the issue and result of the cause; and no attorney is so apt to become so as one who lives in the client's own county, and who has been engaged in the cause from its commencement. It will also have the effect of making better lawyers, as it will open to the lawyers of each county a wider field for the display of their talents. I shall also vote for the re-eligibility of the judges. Without giving my reasons at length upon this branch of the subject, I will only remark that in my humble judgment, if an individual who has been elevated to a high judicial station should so far forget his position and calling, as gentlemen have indicated they fear he would, I believe there is virtue and intelligence enough among the people of this commonwealth to detect and condemn such a course, and to elect some more honorable man in his place. Upon the subject of electing the judges by ballot, I am somewhat like my friend from Henry, my mind is in doubting castle. But sir, as this is a question that was not discussed before the people, and as I doubt very much whether the people of Kentucky would favor such a plan, and as I am satisfied that the people of Kentucky have independence enough to vote fearlessly for any officer they may choose, and as I am satisfied that equally as many, if not more frauds could and would be practiced under the ballot system, than under the visa voce system, I shall vote against that proposition.

Mr. Chairman, one other remark and I have done. Notwithstanding sir we have been a little tardy in the discussion of the various propositions before the convention, I have been pleased to see the two great political divisions in this house harmonize so well. And when I see around me men of both political parties—men of age, and experience, and virtue—men who have passed the meridian of life, and who are laden with the fruits of experience, I cannot but hope for the most auspicious results from our labors. But sir, whilst I am thus gratified, I have regretted, deeply regretted, that gentlemen belonging to the great political church that I do, should have thought proper in the discussions now before the committee, to allude to the calling of a convention, as a matter which had originated from party feelings. And sir, when the gentleman from Logan, a few days ago, made the startling announcement to this convention, that the democrats and emancipationists had united together for the purpose of calling this convention, I admit sir, that I felt a good deal surprised; but sir, when on Saturday, he announced to the house, that he had been elected because of his opposition to any constitutional reform whatever, then sir, the secret of my astonishment was made manifest. Sir, I have just this to say to the gentleman from Logan. He may speak the sentiments of the people of Logan, but sir, if his be whig doctrine—if his be the sentiments which agitate and control the great whig heart—then sir, I am ready, like my friend from Knox, to tap at the door of the democratic church for admission. So far however, Mr. Chairman, from the calling of this convention having been a party measure, it was called for by the people—whigs and democrats have hitherto battled, shoulder to shoulder, upon this great question. I stand here as a living witness, that so far as the democrats of my county are concerned, the imputation of the gentleman is not chargeable to them; and I do hope that we shall be actuated by a common sentiment, and a common spirit, and as we are to make a constitution for a free and intelligent people, that we shall bury our party feelings, and party prejudices, and that we shall make a constitution that will remedy the evils of which the people have complained.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. I desire to submit a few suggestions to the committee before the vote is taken, upon so much of the report as is yet undisposed of, and the amendments proposed thereto; and in this I promise to be brief. The report and amendments yet undisposed of, propose that the court of appeals shall consist of four judges, and that this court shall hold its sessions in different districts in the state. It proposes further, re-eligibility and minimum salaries. The last proposition, I believe, was made by the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Turner.) Before going into details upon any provision to be incorporated into the constitution, it seems to me that this committee and the convention, should well consider the results and consequences which may flow from such details; and especially should they well consider such results, if the question has not been discussed before the people, and decided by them in their elections at the polls. There were some four or five important and radical changes which the people seemed desirous to have made when they called this convention. One was that the legislature should meet only once in two years; another great and fundamental change insisted upon was, that all the officers in the commonwealth should be elected directly by the people themselves; another was, that when the legislature was assembled, some restriction should be placed upon the power of that body, especially as to local and private legislation relative to matters and things which could be more cheaply and conveniently done in other departments; and further, that some limit should be fixed as to the power of the same body in contracting debts. These were some of the reasons and objects for which this convention was called, and permit me to remark that at no time, during the two years canvass before the people on the question of calling a convention, did I hear any one say that it was to be called for the purpose of increasing the expenses of the government and multiplying offices. On the contrary, it was expected that if any change were made in this respect it would be to curtail expenditures and diminish the number of offices.

Now, in this, the very first report which is brought to the attention of the convention, it is proposed to increase the number of the appellate judges by one, and that the court shall hold its sessions in different districts in the state. You, by the constitution as it were, issue your mandate to the legislature to district the state into four judicial districts, and declare that these courts shall hold their sessions where the legislature may prescribe.

The gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Apperson,) made an able speech to convince the committee that this court should be branched, and he demanded of those opposed to branching to show wherein any expense would accrue against the state in case this were done. Now, I ask for nothing better than the arguments of the gentleman himself, to show that the expense of this court will be increased, and that if his positions be true, the annual expense will even be doubled. That gentleman told us, that no additional court houses nor additional libraries would be needed in the different districts, in which the court of appeals would be required to sit. He also told us that a great number of causes were carried to the court of appeals, and that nearly half of them were reversed, and insisted that to obtain these reversals the court ought to be brought within convenient distance to every part of the state; and that the border counties now carried a much less proportional number of causes to the appellate court than those within the vicinity of the capital. Now to obtain correct decisions resulting in these reversals, it is necessary to have learning, ability and talents on the appellate bench of the highest order—yet it is proposed to send the appellate judges out into the state to correct errors, without a court house and without a library. But is it a fact that the state of Kentucky will establish in any district a court of appeals without a court house? Is it a fact that she will appoint three or four judges, and require them to perform their duties in different districts without a library? But the gentleman says they can have the libraries of the lawyers. This may be, but when the thing is finally tested it will be seen that the state will have the libraries and court houses to furnish and such other conveniences as the wants of the court may require; and if the branches ought, in point of fact, to do so that every facility may be given to secure correct decisions. It would be better to have no court of appeals than to have a weak one. One great object in a court of last resort is to attain uniformity of decision, and to settle general legal principles, since the decisions of such a court are not only to affect the rights of the parties in a given instance, but the rights of hundreds and thousands in similar circumstances. It will be impossible to put this system into operation without an expense to the state of thirty thousand dollars, made up of the cost of three or four court houses and as many libraries besides the salary of the additional judge. But why is it another judge is wanted? It is to meet the facts of the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Apperson,) that you will double the amount of business by branching. But when you get four judges and branch the court into four or five districts, you will need eight instead of four, because of the accumulation of business caused thereby; for according to the argument of that gentleman, I consider it as proved conclusively, that whenever you branch the court and hold it in different districts, you will have, instead of six hundred cases, about double that number to decide. And from the intimations already given in this convention, there seems to be a strong party in favor of framing a constitution, in which the doctrine of specific amendments is not to be allowed, and that the door is to be shut, bolted and barred against that principle. Suppose the number of the appellate judges be fixed and limited to four, and in the course of coming years, it becomes desirable to increase or to diminish that number, but on consulting the constitution, you find that the door to any amendment is shut, and bolted and barred. In view of these considerations, I ask if gentlemen are willing to go into details of this sort? I, for one, am opposed to going into this branching of the court of appeals, when the people have not instructed us to do so. It was not one of the questions decided by the people at the polls.

Why is it that the court of appeals was not branched before? It is said that the legislature had constitutional scruples. Sir it was easy to have constitutional scruples in order to shrink behind them to avoid the difficulties which presented themselves. But that was not the reason that hindered the legislature from branching this court, for in fact there was no constitutional barrier, what then is the conclusion to which we must come? It is this, that it was not the will of the people to have this court branched. We must certainly come to this and no other conclusion, otherwise the legislature at some period in the last fifty years, would have done it. The legislature had the power during all this time, and the only reason that can be given why they did not exercise it was, that they were not willing to shoulder the responsibility when the people had not required it.

I am willing that this question of branching should go before the people. If they decide in favor of it by their representatives in the legislature, I have no sort of objection. If any barrier exists in the present constitution I am willing to remove it; but protest against putting it in the new constitution. We do not know how it will work. According to the argument of the gentleman from Montgomery it will increase the business of the court perhaps, beyond the power of that tribunal properly to decide and dispose of the causes which may come before it. I am willing this question of branching should have a fair trial before the country, but I shall not consent here to this unnecessary increase of offices and expenses. The fact that the committee propose an additional judge, is evidence that they considered that the business of the court would be increased by branching, above what might be expected if the court were held at one point.

Some gentleman has proposed that a minimum salary should be fixed in the constitution, I believe it was the gentleman from Madison, and who contended that it should be so, because the salary should be beyond the power of those who elected the judge. I was struck with the remark of some gentleman the other day, that the people of Kentucky were generally more liberal in making compensation to those who served them—to their agents in an official capacity, than the legislature itself. I am willing to leave that whole matter to the people, and let them say by the legislature, who are their representatives what the salary shall be. It is impossible for us to say what may be requisite in the long future. I would ask are you making a constitution to last but a few years, or one to last half a century? As the present one has done. No man can tell what will be a fit salary to be paid fifty years hence, or whether three or four judges will be required, or whether three, four or more districts will best accommodate the people. Yet you propose to go into all these details, and then bolt and bar the door, and say that these judges and districts shall never be diminished nor increased in number, until the people come up and lay down their sovereign power at the feet of a convention. We have already seen some of the effects of placing the whole sovereign power of the state in the hands of a single body of men, yet I believe this convention will make such a constitution as the people of Kentucky will accept. They may go counter to the public will in some respects, but in the main, I believe, the constitution will be such as will meet the expectations of the country. I say then to gentlemen, let us not, in making this instrument, go into detail if we are to shut it up against specific amendments. I shall go against a fixed salary for the reasons I have given.

Much has been said respecting an independent judiciary. I am in favor of an independent judiciary, and at the same time in favor of responsibility to the people, but in a given way; and that is, that when the judge has been elected, he shall continue in office till the time for which he was chosen has expired. That my vote will show, and I am in favor of this other independence of the judiciary, that when a judge has been elected, the tenure of office shall not depend on the popular will; or rather on popular preference during the time for which he may have been elected—but on causes presented on fair trial. For such of these causes as would not be sufficient ground of impeachment you have already determined on a mode of removal; but without legal cause, even though every man who may have voted for a judge should change his opinion and prefer another, such judge cannot be removed, but will hold the office for the time he was chosen. At the end of that period I wish the people to have the right to elect or reject him at their pleasure. That is independence enough for me, and the kind of responsibility I am for.

There is one other matter to which I wish to call the attention of the committee though it has been discussed much more ably than I can hope to discuss it. I will therefore, in a word or two only, present the views which I hold on the subject. There have been some able speeches made in this house against an elective judiciary, speeches utterly opposed to my opinions, but which I have no disposition to reply to, because they have been well answered by others. I will only say, that the people have decided that question, and unlike another gentleman who has spoken, I cannot come to the conclusion that they decided lightly and hastily.—They have had two whole years before them to consider the matter, and they have determined that they have not only the right to elect their officers, but that it is expedient to elect them, and all of them. The question now is, whether it is expedient for them to do it themselves or to delegate the power to others. They have tried the latter mode for fifty years, they have tried it fully and thoroughly and they have now deliberately determined that they can exercise that high privilege as well as any agent can do it for them. They have come to the conclusion that they will have as learned, as pure, and as intelligent a judiciary if they appoint the judges as they will if they give that power to the executive; and further, that they will not only have as intelligent, as pure, and as learned a judiciary thus appointed, but one much more in harmony with public feeling and the popular voice. They have determined to withdraw this delegated power, which is recognized under the present constitution, and that they will exercise that power themselves, and they are now determining that when the judge is elected, whether for eight or ten years, that the election shall be in the nature of a contract between him and the people, and that if he discharge the duties of the office properly, he shall not be subject to be removed simply by the popular voice, but only for misdemeanors in office for which he may be impeached, or for any other reasonable cause, for which a majority of two thirds of the legislature may remove.

But gentlemen seem to think that if the judges are re-eligible they will be responsible to the people, and therefore not independent, under the old mode, they were as independent of the appointing power as they will be under the new, and not more so. But according to the mode now proposed they will hold their offices only for a limited term. If the people are capable of determining who ought to be their judge in the first, they are equally capable in the second instance. All agree that the judge should hold his office only for a limited term. Now, if you do not place the appointing power in the hands of the people, will you place in the hands of the executive, and if so, how does it stand, will not the judge court the executive, and bow to him or to whatever source may hold the re-appointing power, for the purpose of securing a re-appointment, as certainly as if the power is in the hands of the people? But the idea is at war with the fundamental principles of our government, that if the people have a sufficient amount of public virtue and intelligence to govern themselves, and select their own officers, they will not always know by what motives, in a general point of view, the judge is influenced in deciding causes which are brought before him, and whether he has an eye to his re-election in the decisions he may make. If the people are not capable of resisting the wily attacks by a judge when he presents himself before them, either in the first or the second instance, then your form of popular government is an abortion, and you may as well at once abandon it.

As I have seen no good reason for changing my opinion in the arguments of the gentlemen, I shall vote for re-eligibility. The arguments presented by the gentleman from Todd (Mr. Bristow,) were such as perfectly satisfied my mind, that one of the most powerful inducements to strict justice and purity in a judge, before an enlightened people, is re-eligibility. Before such a people, his hope of re-election hangs not on playing the demagogue or corrupt judge, but on the independent and upright discharge of his duties in an official capacity—knowing at the time that his official conduct and motives will be duly appreciated by the people—and that if he is found leaning to the rich and influential, or to the strong lawyer of talent and weight of character, as has been intimated, or to any other power whatever, that his fellow citizens would rise up and vote him down. Gentlemen insist that this principle of re-eligibility will bring the judge under the sway of the rich and influential.

Yet the poor man's vote counts as many as that of the rich. Besides, there is a sense of justice among the people of Kentucky, before which the reputation of any judge would be blasted, whenever he should be found deciding a cause, or in any official capacity acting in such manner as to convince the people that he thus acted for electioneering purposes. It would secure his defeat in any coming contest.

I hope the committee will be content, without putting the provision for branching the court of appeals in the constitution. If there be any constitutional barrier which prevents it, let that be stricken out, and let the whole question go to the people to be decided by them. I am willing that the border counties should have justice done them—it is right that they should; but I imagine that this committee are not ready to say that the people have decided this question. If they have not decided it, and the action of the legislature shows that the popular will is against it, let the whole matter remain for the people to pass upon, and let them say whether the court of appeals shall be branched or not. As I have said, I shall vote against a fourth judge, and against branching the court of appeals, but for leaving it in the power of the legislature to make this provision by statute hereafter, if they choose to do so. And I protest against going into these details, while it is uncertain whether the public will will sanction them. The gentleman from Louisville said, this branching of the court would be of great convenience to the members of the legal profession, and probably of some convenience to the people at large. If this is gotten up for the sake of the legal profession, and without reference to the people at large, I would say, let the gentlemen of that profession appeal to the people at large for this convenience, and if a majority are in favor of it, I am willing that majority should rule.

But I do hope that the responsibility of this expense of branching the court of appeals will not be incurred by the convention, and that the fact that it may be made a make-weight against the final adoption of the constitution by the people, will also be considered. Have we an overflowing treasury that the matter of cost may be passed lightly? It was said last winter that the public debt was growing less. But if we examine the tables we shall find that this debt is constantly increasing. It is true that the public debt, aside from the school fund, has been something reduced—say one hundred thousand dollars. On the other hand, the people have determined that that fund should remain inviolate. The interest on which was funded on the first January, 1848, and the bond of the state taken therefor, amounting to upwards of three hundred thousand dollars, not only increasing the debt of the state by that amount, but since the date of this bond the accruing interest on the entire school fund, including the bond, has continued to run up and accumulate against the state, till the additional outstanding interest on this fund to-day is not less than one hundred thousand dollars—so that if the faith of the state to the school fund is preserved, unless we diminish and retrench the expenditures of the state, instead of increasing them, an increase in taxation is inevitable. This gradual increase of the public debt is not understood by the great body of the people, but the reverse is generally believed by them. I have no doubt the convention will preserve the school fund inviolate. True, our attempt at common schools has been but a faint, a feeble imitation of a school system, and has in truth amounted to nothing as yet; and in point of fact was a perfect failure till the people came to the rescue and taxed themselves in a sum amounting annually to near sixty thousand dollars, which is in addition to that fund which they had before said should be set apart and secured to the schools of the state.

I make no doubt the convention will, in obedience to the will of the people thus manifested, consecrate the whole school fund under the new constitution to the purposes of education, and hope that in future we will have an efficient system and not a mere imitation or attempt at a system as heretofore. The people have decided that they will go forward on the subject of common schools. I hope they will. But I have called the attention of the committee to the state of the treasury only to show that we cannot now meet accruing liabilities. And that if we would avoid further taxation, every possible item of expense must be kept down. But, sir, without adding more, I would only again say, leave details as far as possible out of the constitution, especially if it is the intention of the convention to vote down specific amendments. If it is, let the constitution consist of general principles and a general organization of the government only, as it was in this respect before, and leave to the legislature the power to fill out minute details. Such as fixing salaries, as well as the number of judges, and the points at which the courts shall be held. I have no objection to settling things of this kind now if you intend allowing the new constitution to be amended specifically. If you do not so intend, but still go on filling up the new constitution with such provisions, the time may soon come for us to regret their existence without a mode to get clear of them, short of calling another convention.

Mr. HARGIS. It is the first time in two weeks that I have been able to speak, or scarcely to think, on account of the state of my health; and I do not know that I shall be able to do so now. As much as I prize and value the right of the people to govern themselves, and to elect their own officers to preside or rule over them, and who receive pay for the services, in the present form of the report of the committee on the court of appeals, I shall be compelled to vote against it, because I believe that it will be injurious to the interest of the state, and the best interests of the people. The subject of branching the court of appeals is not new to us. From the best examination that I can make, this subject has been before the legislature, during the last fifty years, no less than twenty-four times. In one instance only eight votes were wanting to its passage in that body. I have heard no argument advanced by any gentleman, which has satisfied me that the legal power does not exist in the legislature to branch the court of appeals, if they wished to do it. I have examined the constitution, and from the best lights I could obtain, I concede it as a fact that the legislature has had no real constitutional objection to branching the court of appeals. The objection has really been on the part of the people; they have never required it. I know gentlemen in the district adjoining mine come out boldly, and say that this branching of the court of appeals would not increase the expenses of the state; that it would permit judges to bring justice nearer the doors of those engaged in litigation. I have examined the different constitutions—among others that of Texas, and what was the consequence? No state in the union has branched the court of appeals, where they have paid less than two thousand dollars as a salary to the judges. In Louisiana they pay six thousand dollars to the judge, and to the associate judge five thousand five hundred dollars. In Tennessee the judge is paid three thousand five hundred dollars, and the associate judge two thousand five hundred dollars. Now, gentlemen tell me that branching this court will not increase the expense, but will any sensible man believe that if these judges are appointed and compelled to ride throughout the state and hold courts, it will not cost more than fifteen hundred dollars? Would any man, who is capable of sitting upon the bench of the appellate court, run the risk of travelling over the state and attending to the duties of his station for such a compensation? And would Kentucky, patriotic Kentucky, say that her judges should be behind the new and little state of Texas? Would she send her men of the best talents throughout the state, to four different points, and then be behind the little state of Texas, and say that they must perform these important services for the pitiful sum of fifteen hundred dollars? No sir, she would not do it. Now, whatever gentlemen may try to palm on this convention, I tell you that when this court is branched, and our judges have to ride over the whole state, you will find that we must pay them as much as is paid any where else. I should hate to live in Kentucky and have it said we did not pay our judges what is fair and liberal. And where is the man that would risk his cause under such a system, where the judge rides over the whole state, and when he gets to the place of holding the court, may not find a library worth five hundred dollars. And these books the lawyers will own, and it will be very natural that they should want them for their own use.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of twelve has arrived, at which time this debate must close.

Mr. HARGIS. Well then, I shall have to vote against the whole of the proposition.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. As the hour has arrived which is assigned for the purpose of taking the vote, I ask the consent of my colleagues, before we vote on the principal amendment, to submit a few verbal amendments, which do not change the principal bill.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE then offered a series of verbal amendments to the article as follows:

Section 3, line 2, after the word "years" add the words "from and after their election."

Section 4, line 3, add to the word "office" the letter "s."

Section 5, line 2, strike out the words "appellate court."

Line 3, strike out the words "districts" and "therein."

Section 6, line 2, strike out the 1st, 2d, and 3d lines to the word "years" inclusive, and insert "the judges first elected shall serve as follows, viz: one shall serve two, one four, one six, and one eight years."

Section 7, line 1, strike out after the word "court" the words "by death, resignation, removal, or otherwise."

Section 7, line 2, and 3, strike out the words, "to the district in which such judge was elected," and insert "to fill such vacancy for the residue of the term."

Section 8, line 2, strike out the word "appellate."

Section 9, line 1, strike out the word "appellate."

Line 2, strike out the words "times and places," and insert "place and times."

Section 11, line 1, strike out the word "appellate."

Line 3, after the word "years," insert "from and after his election."

Section 12, line 1, strike out the words "as clerk," and insert "to the office of clerk of the court of appeals."

Line 2, strike out the word "elected," and insert "a candidate."

Line 3, strike out "have at the time of such election," and insert "has."

Section 13, line 1, strike out the word "the," and insert "a."

Line 2, strike out the words "for any cause."

Line 4, strike out the words "for that district."

Section 14, line 1, strike out the word "provide," and insert "direct."

Line 1, strike out the word "for."

Line 4, strike out the word "those," and insert "these."

The amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIR announced the question to be on the motion of the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) to strike out from the fourth line of the third section after the word "impeachment" the words "the governor shall remove," and in the fifth line after "them" insert "shall be removed."

Mr. HARDIN remarked that he had never offered those amendments. He had merely made an enquiry to ascertain whether it was the intention to vest in the governor the veto power in this case. If so, then there would be exhibited in the constitution the incongruity of first requiring two thirds of the legislature to remove a judge, and then allowing a majority to overrule the governor's veto on that action. He had supposed it to be an oversight on the part of the committee, and had risen to enquire if it was not so.

The fourth section was then read.

Mr. HARDIN moved to strike out the word "four" and insert "three." So that there should be three instead of four judges of the court of appeals. It was the very improper haste and hurry to get through, on the part of the judges, that kept them at work so late at night, to which reference had been made and not the press of business. If there were to be four judges this evil would not be obviated. He had obtained a statement which exhibited the following facts: In 1843, the number of juridical days the court of appeals was in session, was 106; in 1844, it was 96; in 1845, it was 107; in 1846, it was 110; in 1847, it was 112; in 1848, it was 107; and in 1849, it was 50 days. Now if they would set about as long as they ought, say 150 days, they could do all their business very conveniently. And to increase the number would not tend to secure any reform.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said the committee had taken counsel from other states, in a large majority of which, the appellate court consisted of four judges and upwards. They had also looked forward to an increase in the population and business of the country. And he thought that public opinion was satisfied that four judges were not too many to transact the business even at the present time.

Mr. HARDIN conceded that there had been some little increase of business, but not to a considerable extent. The number of cases in 1843 was 661, of which 468 cases were decided; in 1844, 627, of which 426 were decided; in 1845, 753, of which 550 were decided; in 1846, 758, of which 510 were decided; in 1847, 818, of which 628 were decided; in 1848, 763, of which 598 were decided; in 1849, 369, of which 288 were decided; but there has been only one term held during the present year. In 1802 or '3 or '4, we had four judges, but it was found to be more than was necessary, and in 1813 the legislature reduced the number to three, and since that time there had not been more than that number.

Mr. TURNER desired to obviate the impression which might be created by the gentleman's (Mr. Hardin) remarks that the court were not engaged in the duties of their office during the time that they were not sitting in the court room. When the court was not in session the judges were engaged at home in the examination of authorities, and in the preparation of opinions on cases which had been submitted to them. The easier cases, it was true, were decided at once, but those embodying difficult questions, the judges were in the habit of taking home for examination. He believed, however, that if the court was branched, there would be a great accession to the business before them. And as the court could not hold their sessions at four places, and sit more than once a year in each place, therefore, instead of causes being decided directly, in difficult cases, two or three years would elapse before the decision was rendered. He was for increasing the number of judges, and believed that the reduction of expenses proposed in the circuit court system would more than balance the increased expense that would be incurred by the addition of one judge. From 1804 to 1812, there were four judges, but the legislature in 1813, when one of the judges resigned, that they might be justified before the country in raising salaries, dropped one judge and gave his salary to the other three.

Mr. HARDIN said that his understanding was that the judges went home to attend to their own business, and not to examine authorities or to write out opinions. Some of the most important cases have been argued before them, with great ability, and in less than four days a new judge had an opinion ready on the case. And as to the large library of which the gentleman had spoken, and the want of which he had urged as a reason against branching the court, where did the judges find that at home? The gentleman must not give up that argument, for we shall want it to use against branching the court. And as for the little saving in regard to the circuit courts, we want that to apply to the state debt.

Mr. TURNER said that as far as he knew, every judge had an excellent library at home, nor did he think any man should be appointed to that station who did not have such a library. And he would not branch the court for the reason that it might be called to sit at places where there were not lawyers who had such libraries. The judge now, if he had not a sufficient library at home, would postpone the case for further examination when he came where there was a competent library. There were some important cases decided, and he knew of one in which the gentleman from Nelson was concerned, where great and complex constitutional questions were involved—where it was a matter of great difficulty to come to a decision, and where numerous authorities had to be examined. In settling a case of that importance it was necessary that the judge should have every authority which could shed any light upon it, even if he had to send abroad for books.

Mr. HARGIS said he was opposed to the increase of the number of judges and to the branching of the court. Three judges were just as competent to discharge the duties as four, or five, or six. The court, as constituted, had been almost the only tribunal in the land that had given satisfaction, and there was less complaint against it on the part of the people. To branch the court, he believed, would be to lower the high character it had always borne; as it would overwhelm them with business to such an extent as to prevent their giving it that attention which was requisite, in deciding upon questions of the importance as those which generally came before them. He should go for the district system and the election by the people, and believed that to be all that was necessary in the way of amendment, so far as the appellate court is concerned. The propriety of branching the court was a question for the legislature to decide, and not the subject of organic law. Their duty, in framing a constitution, was to lay a foundation of broad and far reaching principle as a guidance to future legislation.

Mr. DAVIS preferred the number of three judges to four. Every judge ought to understand not only every question but every record, connected with it. To multiply the number of judges would of course increase the difficulty. He was opposed to branching the court, and for the same reasons. He was opposed also to creating another officer, unless it was unavoidable. He wanted a few offices, and as few men looking for office, as possible. To continue the number of the court at three, to increase their salaries to about two thousand five hundred dollars, to require the terms of the court, one commencing the first of January, and the other the first of June, and to continue their sessions until the general business was got through with, he thought to be a better system than that proposed by the committee.

Mr. MAYES was in favor of retaining the four judges. According to the reasoning of the gentleman who had just spoken one judge would do the business better than three. The opinion of four judges would carry more weight with them than that of a less number; and on the principle that in a multitude of counsellors there was wisdom, four judges would be of more aid to each other, in consultation and forming opinions, than three. To substitute three for four judges, would, in a great measure, defeat the purpose the committee had in view in restricting the court of appeals. He was for the branching of the court, and he cared not if it did increase the expense of the tribunal, so long as it had a tendency more generally to diffuse its benefits. The reason that so few appeals were brought from remote parts of the state was the expense attendant thereon, which would, in a great measure, be obviated by bringing the court nearer to them, and this, therefore, was one of the advantages to be derived from branching the court. As to the library, how was it in the days of Judge Bibb? There was no public library then, and he got along without one, and judges generally in that day resorted to their private libraries. No gentleman, it was fair to suppose, would be elected a judge of the court of appeals who was not a man of great legal attainments, nor did he suppose that the court would be required to sit in any place where there was not a library. He could see no force in that objection, so far as libraries were concerned.

Mr. CLARKE agreed that if the people were furnished with convenient courts in each of the four districts that there would be an increase of litigation, but he apprehended it would not be maintained that the people would go to law without good and sufficient reason. If it was proper to have but one court, and to locate it in a remote part of the state so as to prevent litigation, and to prevent an impartial administration of justice, that end could be better accomplished by at once allowing the court to sit in but one place, and fixing it at some remote point of the state. The whole argument resolves itself into this—you must have courts so arranged as to prevent the people having access thereto, and in that way prevent an increase of litigation. If it was desired to withhold from the people the right to come into the sanctuary of justice and there demand its impartial administration, the most efficient means to accomplish it would be to locate the court as he had instanced. How often did it happen that causes in the remote parts of the state where the lawyer believed the decision to be wrong were not brought to the court of appeals, on account of the increased expense? He had in 1843 voted against the law restricting the magistrates of the state to the holding of but four courts a year, and he always acted on the principle that justice ought to be carried as near every man's door as is possible, and consistent with the public interests. And the people of Kentucky will not withhold a small expense to secure that end. As it was now, it was almost an impossibility for a poor man in the remote part of the state to bring his cause to the court of appeals on account of the heavy expense. If the citizens want to go to law let them have the means of redressing the injuries they have received, and let those means be placed within their reach. As to the library, it had been well remarked that no judge would be elected in a district who had not a good one, and who was not a lawyer of experience and learning. But if a library should be needed at any point and the legislature should hesitate about making an appropriation for one, the judge elected by the district would furnish one himself, for not one of them would hazard an opinion and publish it to the world without due investigation of the facts and authorities.

The PRESIDENT said, with a view to correct any misapprehension as to the course pursued by the judges of the court of appeals with the records, after the cases were argued or submitted on briefs, the practice is to refer a record to a single judge to ascertain and report the facts and law questions arising on the record, and where there were disputed facts and great contestation about them, the record was read before all the judges, and the facts and law settled, and the record referred to one of the judges to draft the opinion; and when the opinion was drafted, it is read and approved by all the judges. There are many records in which there are no disputed facts, therefore there would be no more difficulty with four than with three judges.

Mr. WILLIAMS said that gentlemen argued this question of branching the court, as if there had been a bar to justice in, and a difficulty of getting access to, the court of appeals in any part of the state, which was to be remedied by branching the court. The gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Apperson), had also presented some statistics calculated to confirm this impression, yet those statistics were most fallacious. He (Mr. W.) held in his hand some statistics prepared from the auditor's report which he thought presented the facts in a more favorable light. The whole number of causes arising in the inferior courts as exhibited by that report for the year, was 13,249, of which there came up to the court of appeals 447, or one out of every thirty. He had made an estimate of the number of causes which each county would have been entitled to bring up to the court of appeals, and then compared it with the number each county had actually brought up to that court, and the result was that there appeared to be no difficulty of access on the part of the remote counties. Indeed many of them had brought up more than their proportion. For instance, Allen county, according to the estimate should have brought up two suits and came up with one, just half as many as it ought. Henderson was entitled to three, and brought up six; Bullitt three, and brought up ten; Caldwell thirteen, and brought up eleven; Carter one, and brought up two; Cumberland two and brought up three; Hardin three and brought up eight; Fulton three and brought up six; Calloway three and brought up two; Clay one and brought up five; Hickman, one of the most remote counties in the state, two and brought up ten; Johnson one and brought up two; Knox two and brought up four; Laurel one and brought up three; Lawrence one and brought up six; Livingston five and brought up six; McCracken two and brought up twelve; Morgan three and brought up three; Nelson eight and brought up twelve; Whitley one and brought up ten; Todd six and brought up eight; Shelby fourteen and brought up seven; Pike two and brought up four; Pulaski two and brought up four.

The whole table goes to show conclusively, that the argument on the other side, based on statistics, is utterly without force, and that there is really no difficulty of access to the court of appeals from any section of the state. He was opposed to the branching of the court of appeals and for these reasons: After laying out the state into four districts, and requiring a judge to be elected in each district, it might so happen that in a particular district, there was no man possessing the high qualifications necessary for a judge of the court of appeals. The people therefore, in the selection of those judges, should be unrestricted except by the limits of the state. Again, it would be impossible for the court to hold its sessions in the district more than once in each year, and thus they could not, as now, holding two terms in a year, call over the docket twice in a year, and the result would be, that the docket would not be cleared at all, and there would be great delay. And causes would be delayed through that cause expressly by those who so desired. But what was the object of the court of appeals? To obtain uniformity of decision. This being the great object, what necessity was there then to have the court sitting all over the state, and deciding differently, in different places? A circuit court, if its decisions were final, would be quite as good a court of final resort as that. What was then to be gained in the branching of the court in the correction of flagrant errors and conduct in the subordinate tribunals, another part of its duties? Nothing. There was clearly, as he had shown from the statistics, no difficulty in getting access to the court, and all the great purposes for which a court of last resort was established could be better obtained by requiring the court to hold its sessions at one point. Besides, he believed, even conceding that it was desirable to branch the court, it would be far preferable to leave the matter to the future regulation of the people, through the legislature, than to tie it up beyond control in the constitution. Nor did he believe that in calling this convention, the people had expressed any desire to have this measure adopted.

Mr. LINDSEY said that having been absent during nearly all of the discussion which had taken place on the formation of the appellate tribunal of the state, he had not had an opportunity to express his views on the several subjects that had been discussed. And having but ten minutes time allowed him now, he could only express one or two reasons that would induce him not to vote for striking out four and inserting three judges of the court of appeals. In this section of the state, however it may have been elsewhere, the attention of the people was directed to this subject, and it was generally thought that another judge added to that court would lighten the immense labor now performed by the three judges. That an additional judge added would require a concurrence of three in deciding a cause where there was not unanimity, and in such cases, would give more confidence in the principles settled by the adjudications.

This popular indication had great weight with him, even if his own convictions did not fully concur; as he did earnestly seek amendments in the present constitution, and being thus anxious he was not willing to insert any matter that had not the sanction of the people, by their having had it fully discussed and made a question before them in the canvass.

Nor was he unwilling to leave any thing in the present constitution which the people had desired changed. He was in favor of the four judges therefore, and that they be elected by the people in four districts, into which the legislature shall divide the state. The reason that influenced him to favor the district mode of electing the judges of the court of appeals, in preference to electing them by the state at large, in addition to many other reasons he had heard stated this morning, was this: the convention have decided that the people shall elect them, and to keep them aloof from the general politics that operate in selecting all officers for the state at large, the district plan to his mind was best. The districts will be of size sufficiently small to enable all the citizens therein to know, or learn pretty well for whom they are to vote, and not be compelled, as they would be, if the election was by the state at large, to trust to the guidance of others, and in that way bring to operate in their election all the party machinery and tactics used in the election of other officers, and so odious in its influences.

These were some of the reasons that operated on him as an inducement to favor four instead of three judges, and the plan of electing them by districts.

In relation to branching the court, he was opposed to it, and might perhaps, if the opportunity occurred, give his reasons at length for that opposition. In this section of the state, the proposition to branch was not agitated, and this with him, was a reason, as he had said, for not disturbing the present constitution in relation to the place of holding the court. It had been urged by the delegate from Simpson, that persons at a distant part of the state, were often deterred by the necessary expense to be incurred, from bringing up their cases. His experience had been, that men who want to go to law, or continue when at it, are not deterred by expense. Suppose, however, a court established two or three counties off from the gentleman, in what way could a record of a case get to the appellate tribunal cheaper than it comes now. At all distances over 30 miles the postage is the same, consequently by mail, there would be no more expense than there is now. This is the cheapest mode of conveying a record, even cheaper than sending a messenger with it to an adjoining county, when he would have to be paid for his services. It would be seen that not one sixteenth of the cases now in the court of appeals were attended to by lawyers residing at the capital. Where counsel did not choose to attend in person, they practice by brief or written argument. The largest portion of causes are managed in this way. The idea of some gentlemen, that motions may have to be made requiring personal attention, had but little weight, for no counsel of any practice, familiar as counsel in the circuit courts are with their causes, who cannot readily foresee all motions that can arise on records in the appellate court and provide as well by brief therefor, as by personal attendance.

Mr. APPERSON said that this table just presented by the gentleman, answered his purpose nearly as well as the one he had presented himself the other day. Three hundred of these cases were those which had remained over on the docket, from previous years, and this of itself was an argument to show the necessity of adding another judge to the court to secure the dispatch of business. As to the gentleman's list, he had stated only extreme cases, and had not, as he (Mr. A.) did the other day, selected a region of country, without reference to particular counties. Let us see how the matter stands according to the gentleman's own list. Anderson county was entitled to send up three causes, and brought up six; Bullitt three, and brought up ten; Bourbon thirteen, and brought up fourteen; Bath seven, and brought up twelve; Clarke five, and brought up twelve; Estill three, and brought up ten; Franklin eleven, and brought up twenty one; Fayette fourteen, and brought up seventeen; Fleming six, and brought up twenty-two; Garrard eight, and brought up twenty-seven; Harrison six, and brought up sixteen; Jefferson twenty-four, and brought up twenty-eight; the Louisville chancery court thirteen, and only brought up fifty; Lincoln four, and brought up ten; Marion three, and brought up nine; Washington six, and brought up six. Now just look a little further. Trigg was entitled to eight, and brought up one; Simpson three, and brought up one; Monroe one, and brought up none; Logan six, and brought up one; Warren five, and brought up four. But he might go clear through the table, and it would establish every fact for which he had contended in introducing his own table the other day. Nor had the authenticity and correctness of that table been at all questioned.

Mr. TRIPLETT said the whole question was one of convenience—shall the judges go to our constituents, or shall our constituents come to the court? Shall Mahomet go to the mountain, or shall the mountain come to Mahomet? For fifty years our constituents have been in the habit of coming to the capital. The mountain has come to Mahomet for fifty years, and he thought it was time now that Mahomet should go to the mountain. Suppose the branching of the court would cost the state a few hundred dollars more, how much would it save to the people—by bringing the court of appeals nearer to them, instead of compelling them to go to the capital—in the matter of travelling expenses, lawyers' fees, &c. It was a mere question of convenience, and as it had been tried for fifty years one way, let it now be tried for a time the other way. But the convenience of the people of the state may hereafter require that the number of districts shall be increased, and he had come to the conclusion that it was better to leave the subject with the legislature, rather than to place it beyond control, by incorporating it in the constitution. He would require the legislature, and not merely authorize them to provide.

The question being then taken, the motion of Mr. Hardin to strike out "four" and insert "three" was rejected.

Mr. TRIPLETT suggested that the last clause in the fourth section, as follows—"all prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Kentucky," and conclude, "against the peace and dignity of the same"—did not properly belong to this article. It related to criminal prosecutions, with which, of all the departments of government, the court of appeals had the least to do. The gentleman from Nelson would recollect that that particular clause in the present constitution lay dormant for forty-one years, and until about eight or nine years ago, when the court of appeals decided that a scire facias issued on a bail bond must have those words in it. It was placed in such a part of the constitution, that for forty-one years neither lawyers, clerks, or sheriffs had found it.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE suggested that it should be passed over for the present, to which Mr. TRIPLETT assented.

Mr. KAVANAUGH enquired if the question had been taken as yet on the adoption of the third section?

The CHAIR said that it had not.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE moved to amend the third section, by striking out the words "two-thirds of each house," and insert the words, "by the joint vote of both houses, two-thirds concurring." There are one hundred members of the lower house, every member of which might vote for the removal of a judge, and the question goes to the senate. That body is now constituted of thirty-eight members, and twenty-five may vote to remove him and the other thirteen to retain him. There would be one hundred and twenty-five votes to remove him, and thirteen to retain him, and he would be retained. So far from that being a two-third principle it was rather a nine-tenth principle. His proposition was, that out of the one hundred and thirty-eight members, ninety-three should be sufficient to remove the judge, and forty-six should retain him. If the two-third principle was to be adopted, let it be fairly carried out.

Mr. PRESTON said this was but a phase of the majority proposition already decided by the house. The two third principle might be adopted in regard to several other matters which would come before the convention, and the gentleman from Fayette, like a skilful general when defeated at one falls back on another battery. The proposition was without a precedent in practice within the thirty States of the Union or in England. The principle that a majority should govern was proper in legislative bodies, but should never apply to trials. It was a principle that did not prevail in juries, and should not in impeachments or address, which are in the nature of trials. When it was proposed that the legislature should not except by a vote of two thirds of each house, grant the credit of the state to corporations or undertake the building of rail roads or any thing of that kind, was there any reason for prescribing a rule that would bring the senate and the house into one common mob in order to act on a subject so important as the propriety of trying and degrading a judge. It struck at the principle of that deliberation, which the division of the general assembly into two houses proposed to secure, and in fact was but a phase of the proposition which was once nearly unanimously voted down in committee.

Mr. MERIWETHER said that there would always first have to be an investigation into the facts of the case before it was decided to remove the judge. Did the gentleman mean that one house should be waiters on the other, or that the whole matter should be decided in joint session. If so, it was without a precedent in any state constitution.

The amendment of Mr. R. N. Wickliffe was rejected.

Mr. TURNER moved to amend the third section—so as to provide that the salaries of the judges should be fixed by the legislature at a sum not less than—in amount.

Mr. HARGIS was opposed to fixing their salaries in the Constitution. It was better to leave it to the legislature, who would be governed by the circumstances in the discharge of that duty.

Mr. BULLITT moved as an amendment to the amendment that the blank should be filled with $2,500. He withdrew his motion, however, at the request of Mr. TURNER, who suggested that it would be better first to adopt the principle before the sum was decided upon.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE was opposed to fixing salaries in the constitution, and would state his reasons therefor. He was perfectly satisfied that there was out of this convention an organized party of office holders, who, in connection with those opposed at the start to any change in the constitution, will seek every opportunity to prejudice the result of the labors of the convention before the people; and in substitution of any argument of his own on this subject, he would just refer to a conversation he had with a gentleman the other day on this very topic of salaries. The gentleman was opposed to the call of a convention and not a member of this body, but he seemed anxious that adequate and liberal salaries should be fixed for the officers, but was unwilling to vote for the new constitution even if that was done, and finally when asked if he would use it as an argument against the adoption of the instrument before the people, he replied that he thought it would be a fair argument to use to defeat what he considered to be a bad measure. Therefore he (Mr. W.) would rather trust the matter to the next legislature, believing that they would be imbued with the spirit of the new constitution, and be prepared to fix the salaries at fair and proper amounts. It was a strong argument to use before a free people, to tell them that the salaries of the officers had been fixed beyond their control. And certainly those gentlemen who have manifested so much confidence in the purity of the legislature in regard to placing the power of removal in the hands of a majority of them, should be willing to trust them in this matter of salaries.

Mr. HARDIN was willing that the gentleman's remarks should apply to the court of appeals, but not to the circuit court. The committee on that subject had adopted the minimum principle. They proposed to restrict the legislature from fixing on a less sum than $1600 per annum, and less than that would fail to secure judges to discharge the amount of business it is proposed to impose on them. He would go for $1500 to the court of appeals judges, but not more. They had shown such a disposition not to hear arguments and to hurry to their homes, that he would not, even if he was in the legislature, go for giving them a cent more.

Mr. TURNER was in favor of amending the constitution, and of making such a one as would be acceptable to the people. And the people have sense enough, he believed, to know that unless the judges are paid proper salaries, no system that we can adopt will succeed. He desired to secure the slave property beyond the reach of the legislature, and even to restrict the agitation of the slavery question itself. This he believed would secure the vote for the new constitution of a great many who opposed the call for a convention. The extension of popular power would also secure the votes of those who had desired a reform in that particular. These measures would combine all the great interests of the State in the support of the new constitution, and thus secure its adoption. As for the office holders, he did not expect to please them. He had nothing to say against them, but the people have willed that they must all go out—and that not one shall be left to tell the tale of their woes.

Mr. CLARKE said that of the different State constitutions, there were about eighteen or twenty-three in which the proposition of the gentleman from Madison had been omitted, and indeed so far as he had been able to discover, there were but four or five in which any amount of salary had been fixed. He could perceive no very good reason why this convention was called upon to deviate from that rule. There are various circumstances which govern the amount that a judge should receive. In 1842 and '43 such was the scarcity of money, and the general reduction of the value of property and labor throughout the State, that the people demanded that the salaries of their officials should be reduced. This state of things may occur again, and if a minimum be fixed in the constitution, this remedy could not again be applied. Another reason against the proposition was, that he did not desire further to encumber the original convention men. They would have enough to do, without being obliged to sustain these high salaries, in explaining the reduction of the number of circuit judges, and the increase of the court of appeals, and other changes that may be made in the constitution. He preferred to leave the question of salaries to the legislature, and leave them to fix the amount, as the circumstances of the case and the condition of the country may require.

The committee then rose and reported progress and had leave to sit again.

And then the convention adjourned to nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

TUESDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1849.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. McHENRY, from the committee on miscellaneous provisions, made the following report, which, on his motion, was ordered to be printed and referred to the committee of the whole:

ARTICLE —.

Concerning Impeachments.

SEC. 1. The house of representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

SEC. 2. All impeachments shall be tried by the senate; when sitting for that purpose, the senators shall be upon oath or affirmation. No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

SEC. 3. The governor, and all civil officers, shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office; but judgment in such cases, shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit, under this commonwealth; but the party convicted shall nevertheless be subject and liable to indictment, trial, and punishment by law.

POWERS TO A COMMITTEE.

On the motion of Mr. HARDIN, it was ordered that the select committee on the public debt have power to send for persons, papers, and records.

RESOLUTIONS, COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. JACKSON offered the following preamble and resolutions, which were referred to the committee on education:

WHEREAS, any plan or system of common school instruction, which can be adopted in this constitution, will necessarily demand frequent alterations, conformable to the progress of society, to the improvements in systems of education, and to the means which the state may be able, from time to time, to bestow—Therefore,

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to establish in this constitution a system of common school instruction, but that the legislature be required, by a provision in this constitution, to maintain inviolably the present common school fund; also the money arising from the special tax now levied for that purpose, and such other means as may be placed at the disposal of the legislature for the promotion of that object; and that the same shall be appropriated to the promotion of common school instruction, in such manner, and under such restrictions, as the people, through the legislature, may determine.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the court of appeals.

The amendment pending when the committee rose yesterday, on the motion of Mr. Turner, in these words, in relation to the salary of the judges, "which shall not be less than dollars per annum," was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the third section by adding the words, "which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

He said he was unwilling to add a more effectual mode of removing from office than either impeachment or address—the withholding of "aid and comfort" from a judge by diminishing his salary.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said so far as he was individually concerned he had no objection to the amendment; but the reason it was not put in by the committee was, they thought it would come in better in a general provision in reference to the salaries of all officers. It certainly could not do any harm to insert it, and he agreed that it was not proper the legislature should have power to take away the salary of an officer during the time for which he was appointed, with a salary fixed by the people.

The amendment was agreed to, and the third section as amended was adopted.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the fourth section.

Mr. GHOLSON moved to amend the section so as to provide that the concurrence of three of the four judges should be necessary to overrule the decisions of an inferior tribunal.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said such a provision was unnecessary. Three judges were necessary to constitute a quorum, and he presumed the gentleman hardly required that they should be unanimous.

Mr. GHOLSON thought the circuit judge was the most competent to decide questions that came before him, for he was acquainted with all the facts and circumstances of the case, and he therefore desired to have a provision that such a decision should not be overturned, unless with the concurrence of three judges of the higher tribunal. If the opinion of the gentleman from Nelson was correct, that two should overrule a judge of an inferior court, he saw no necessity for increasing the number of judges of the appellate court. He desired, by the amendment which he had proposed, to give to the opinion of the judge of the lower court the weight to which it was entitled.

The amendment was rejected, and the fourth section was then adopted.

The fifth, sixth, and seventh sections were also adopted.

The eighth section was next read. In the original report it stands as follows:

"Sec. 8. Any citizen of the United States, who has attained the age of thirty years, and who is a resident of the appellate district for which he may be chosen, and who has been a practicing lawyer in the courts of this state for at least eight years, or whose practice at the bar, and service upon the bench of any court in this state shall, together, be equal to eight years, shall be eligible to the office of judge of the court of appeals."

Mr. HARDIN enquired what was meant by the words, "service upon the bench of any court in this state?" He desired to know if it was intended to include county as well as circuit courts? He was aware that sometimes men were appointed to the bench of the county courts who had not read a word of law, and he desired the chairman of the committee on the court of appeals to say whether he intended to include such men.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE replied that the object of the committee was, that the candidate for the office of a judge of the appellate court should furnish some evidence to the people, by his practicing as a lawyer, or on the bench, of his qualification for the office; and he did not suppose that the people would elect such a man as his colleague had described. Some gentlemen, he was aware, objected to the words "practicing lawyer," and wished to substitute the phrase "licensed lawyer." The committee had used the term practicing lawyer as it had been used in other constitutions. He knew there were great facilities afforded to obtain licenses. He had heard of one who offered himself as an applicant for a license, to whom the only question proposed was, how many modes, according to law, there were to acquire an estate? Three, was the reply. When asked to particularize, he said one was when a man's daddy died, another was when he bought and paid for it, and the third was hooking. That answer was considered sufficient, and the man got his license, and it would therefore be seen that the committee had reason for not adopting the term licensed. The wish of all the committee was to confine it to lawyers who had practiced in the courts for some years, and who could furnish evidence of their capacity, by the services which they had rendered.

Mr. HARDIN said the committee on the circuit courts had directed him to insert in the report from that committee the term of eight years, as a practicing lawyer, leaving out any service on the bench. He had himself known in his region of country, several men, such as had been described, who obtained licenses as lawyers, and they were the greatest pests to society. It appeared to him too, that it was a growing evil. He had heard of one of these men being examined, to by the question, what is manslaughter, replied, that it was killing a man in a hurry.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to strike out the words "and who has been a practicing lawyer in the courts of this state for at least eight years, or whose practice at the bar and service upon the bench of any court in this state shall together be equal to eight years."

According to the gentlemen who had addressed the committee it appeared that one man might obtain a license without any qualifications, and he would become a practicing lawyer if he obtained a case with a fifteen shilling fee.

Mr. NUTTALL approved of the amendment to strike out. He had no doubt there were such men as had been described, but he wished to throw the whole responsibility on the people, and he doubted not they would elect suitable men.

Mr. THOMPSON said the people would know who were competent, and therefore he was opposed to all restrictions upon the people.—Such restrictions could not be found in the constitutions of other states where the judges are elected by the people. There were no such restrictions placed upon the governor in making such appointments, who might select a man who had not been either a judge or a practicing lawyer, and why then should these restrictions be placed upon the people when the appointing power will be in their hands. They would doubtless elect competent men, and generally men who had practiced more than eight years, either for the bench of the circuit or the appellate court.

Mr. MERIWETHER said if the gentleman from Bullitt had understood his motion he would have seen that it was to strike out all restrictions.

Mr. ROOT said he had an amendment which he thought would obviate the difficulties which with some gentlemen existed. It was to insert the words "and who has been a practicing lawyer in the courts of record of original jurisdiction." This would cut off the small, petty, practicing lawyers.

The PRESIDENT subscribed fully to the doctrine that the people are capable of selecting their judges, but they had met here in convention to lay down general rules to govern and direct the people. He presumed that this convention would provide against the election of an infant, and that was restriction. They would also require of the person who is to be elected a judge of the supreme court of the state of Kentucky, that he shall be at least twenty-one years of age. He saw that this provision required that he shall be thirty. As a general rule, if all the people were together consulting on the subject, they would say that the man who was to preside in a court of judicature of the last resort, should be a man of matured intellect and information, and that they would fix a period so far as would promote that maturity of intellect, judgment, and information, requisite to that office. He was content with thirty years. If they were all here consulting in relation to the qualifications of this judge, they would all agree that he should be an individual well acquainted with the laws of the land, either from practicing in the courts, or presiding in the courts of record of the commonwealth a sufficient time to afford evidence of his qualifications. Now, sir, I think eight years at the bar, or three years at the bar, and five as a judge in a court of record would be a good rule to observe in relation to this matter. We would all agree that each of these restrictions should be observed in order that we shall have the advantage and benefit of the acquisitions of the profession, and have men properly qualified for this station. We do know, that occasionally, there are peculiar freaks take possession of the public mind, in relation to individuals, and some even have a remarkable way of charming the people by their eloquence, and consequently they might have men imposed upon them who were without mature judgment and that knowledge of the law which would qualify them for the bench. Now, in prescribing this rule for the people themselves in relation to all the judges, that we will all have a greater chance of obtaining able, competent, experienced, and properly qualified men. And, in deciding, in the first instance, and making a system for all time to come, we had better provide the men that we want in that tribunal. But suppose we do occasionally cut off an individual under that age, who is well qualified, do we not also cut off the pretensions of those who have not had experience, and who are not of mature intellect, and of legal qualifications to discharge the duties of the office. By the adoption of this rule it is not misjudging the competency of the people to select capable men for office? It is no suspicion in relation to it; it is only a safe rule for the people to subscribe to with a view to regulate themselves in reference to the choice of an officer. I shall vote against striking out.

Mr. CLARKE concurred in part in the views of the honorable President of this convention. He believed, that if the people of this state were now congregated, they would concur by an overwhelming majority in the opinion that the judge should be qualified by experience, learning, and practice. He believed that if all the citizens of one district, embracing one fourth of the state were met, they would agree by an overwhelming majority that no man should be a judge of the court of appeals in this state, except he were qualified, a man of legal learning, experience, and talent. For that very reason, believing that such would be the fact in every section of the state, he was perfectly willing to leave the question to the voters of the several districts. If they would give such a decision when congregated here, they would do the same thing when exercising their sound discretion and judgment at the polls. He saw no reason why the people should be limited in the exercise of their judgment and sound discretion in making a selection of a judge when the governor has never been limited in the exercise of his discretion and judgment since the first constitution was framed. There never was a provision which required that the governor should be a lawyer. There had been those, it was true, who had claimed that office on different grounds, and some on the ground that they were not lawyers, but from among the people, as they were pleased to term it. If then, the governor appointed the judges without reference to specific qualifications, would it be proper to limit the people by saying that the judge should have been a practicing lawyer for eight years, or have rendered service on some judicial bench of the state? If it were true that the people are competent to elect their judges, and there were a correct principle in the breast of the people of this state—if it were true that the people want to promote their own welfare, then would they make no such selection of a judge as the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) had indicated. This fact being conceded, he saw no reason for placing any restrictions upon the elections by the people. His opposition was based in the present instance upon the same ground as when the other day he opposed the provision relating to the qualifications of the clerks of the circuit court.

Mr. ROOT re-stated his amendment thus—to strike out after the words practicing lawyer the words "in the courts," and add "in the circuit court and court of appeals." It was evident that the judge of the court of appeals must be a lawyer, a lawyer in practice, for no man would be suitable to occupy the bench of the court of appeals who had had no practice. It would bring more ruin to the country than any thing else, for ignorance in high places often produced difficulties which required the skill and talent of many wise men to remove. It was therefore a settled principle in the minds of the people, that lawyers, and those of the best talent and conversant with the practice in the higher courts, must be appointed to these offices.

Mr. HARDIN felt desirous that the bill relating to the circuit courts and the court of appeals should harmonize. The committee on the circuit courts had introduced a provision requiring the candidate to be a practicing lawyer for eight years, and a residence of five years in the district. He desired, as he said a few days ago to the gentleman from Simpson, (Mr. Clarke,) to guard against the effect of the eloquence of young men who had no other qualifications for the office. He had known a young man, who by his eloquence could carry the state with him, who was less powerful as he advanced in life. And so it was with many young men. Aikenside wrote his best work at twenty one; and Sheridan, at twenty three, wrote his "School for Scandal," and he never did so well after. He wanted the candidate to be a resident in the district—to have been a lawyer for eight years—and if he had his choice, he would say that he should be thirty five years of age, and should not continue in office after the age of sixty five. He would put such a restriction as to age, because he would guard against the winning eloquence of any young Absalom who might start up. He thought the qualification as to the residence not long enough.

Mr. DIXON. If he understood the object of the motion to strike out, it was to destroy all qualifications for this office, and if it prevailed, it would read in this way: "any citizen of the United States who has attained the age of thirty years, and is a resident of the appellate district for which he may be chosen, shall be eligible to the office of a judge of the court of appeals."

Could it be possible that gentlemen were really in earnest when they assert such a proposition as this? Did gentlemen really believe that every citizen of the district was eligible to this office? Surely gentlemen would not and could not maintain that such would be the fact. What then would be the effect of the motion to strike out? It would be that every citizen might at once be eligible to this station, whether ignorant or learned, honest or corrupt, qualified or disqualified. He could not believe that any gentleman was in earnest in advocating this measure. It was asked why any qualification should be put in the new constitution when it was not found in the old one? Did they not meet here for the purpose of amending the old constitution, and to make it more perfect? If nothing was to be added or altered, why the necessity of meeting? No restriction was laid upon the governor by the old constitution, but it was to remedy the abuses of the old system that they were now deliberating. In all probability the storm which had arisen against the executive and the appointing power would not have existed had it not been for the abuses which existed under the old system. It mattered not that this was not in the old constitution, the question was whether it was right and proper to incorporate it in the new. Was it right that men not qualified should hold this office, who might be wafted into this high position by the circumstances around them? If so, why not let the people determine what the age shall be. Why not let the people determine on all the qualifications? What was the object of laying restraint on the people in one particular and not in another? He believed there should be a restraint upon the people which would keep in check any tendency to corruption and licentiousness; not that he was afraid to trust the people to elect their officers, but he was opposed to their driving off into licentiousness, and elevating men to high stations who were utterly disqualified to discharge the appropriate duties. If there were to be any sort of discrimination in regard to these officers, he desired that it might be put into the constitution in that form.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE did not suppose that they were violating any great principle, or usage, or right, when they endeavored to insert some qualifications for the office of judge. The proposition of the gentleman would strike out all qualifications. An individual who had not been a resident of the United States long enough to have become a citizen might be voted for and elected. It was required by the report of the committee that he should have been a citizen eight years, and should have practiced law, or adjudicated in the courts of justice during that time. It was now proposed to strike out that, and thus render every one not only eligible to fill offices, but competent to vote for others. He found in running over the constitution of the state of Louisiana, that a person must be a citizen over the age of thirty years, a resident of the district eight years, and have practiced law five years, in order to be qualified for this office. The same principle would be found in other constitutions. He believed that no principle or right had been invaded by requiring that, before a person should come before the people asking to discharge the duties of this office, he should have some prima facie evidence of his fitness.

Mr. TALBOTT said he had made up his mind to say not a word on this subject. He did not expect to say any thing that would influence the vote of any gentleman, or be very interesting to the house. He only wished to say a word to his friends, who had come here pledged to constitutional reform. For himself, he had come determined to vote for any and every measure which he conceived necessary to carry out the great object which the people have in view, the election of all the officers by the people. But while he was in favor of that measure, he would, at the same time, oppose any and every measure, having for its object to thwart that great purpose. A proposition had been submitted here to try the judges elected by the people, by a bare majority of the legislature, and to that he was opposed. A proposition was now also submitted, to let any and every individual, without regard to his qualifications, and whether a citizen or an alien, be eligible to a seat in the highest courts in this state. He was likewise opposed to that, and if there was no other reason than that which he was about to assign, it would be sufficient. They had been told by some gentlemen that such confusion as the world had never seen before, would ensue if they left the election of the judges to the people. And he believed this would be the case if this proposition to strike out should be carried? If there were no qualifications required, every man would have his candidate in the field. Every man had his influence; every man had his party; and the result would be, that the district would be filled with as many candidates, and the man that could bring the most influence to bear, by corruption, or other means, would be the successful candidate. He felt constrained to vote for retaining the qualification in the report of the committee.

Mr. NESBITT thought the people desired to guard themselves against having a set of hungry office-seekers without any qualifications except as to age and residence, more gaunt than famished wolves, turned loose upon them. It might happen in a canvass, that one of the candidates might possess all suitable qualifications, while the other was entirely destitute of them. The better man might secure a large majority of the votes, and the other might receive not more than twenty five votes in the district; yet before the election closed the candidate having the highest number might be stricken down and die. He presumed, in this case, that the certificate of election would be given to the man whom the people never intended to elect.

Mr. ROOT again referred to the effect of his proposed amendment. He thought that every delegate would see its propriety. It would be but a poor compensation to their constituents, for their long effort in getting this convention, if they were to come up here for the purpose of bringing about constitutional reform, if at last, the door to the office of the judge of the court of appeals was opened so wide, that every ninny hammer, through the influence of wealth or king alcohol, might ascend the judgment seat, and arbitrate upon the great questions which had been handed down from all antiquity, although he might be perfectly ignorant of the laws, and the decisions that have been sanctioned for the last thousand years. It was more important to have a person of judgment and experience in the station of a judge of the court of appeals, than in that of the presidency of the United States, or the chief executive office of this commonwealth. The governor of a state might succeed very well if he had a shrewd and learned secretary, although his own learning did not extend beyond Dilworth; and the president of the United States might retire from his station with honor, although he possessed little or no qualifications, provided he is surrounded by a wise and judicious cabinet. But when they come to the judgment seat of the court of appeals, where great and important interests were involved, learning, ability, talents, and integrity were indispensable. All the other departments of the government depended upon this, and they would have spent their time in vain, if they failed to secure this. They would adopt a system which, instead of being beneficial, would result in the most pernicious consequences to all the people.

Mr. MERIWETHER observed that the gentleman from Henderson had inquired whether it was to be supposed that every gentleman in the district would be qualified. It might be asked, on the other hand, if every lawyer were qualified. The gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) had told them with what facility a license might be obtained. And any person so licensed became a practicing lawyer if he obtained a fifteen shillings fee. But the gentleman from Campbell said that the bill would permit an alien to be eligible. The bill however, said he must be a citizen of the United States. The gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) said that even a residence was not required. He would ask if the bill required a residence? A person that practiced law in Indiana, or Ohio, might be eligible; all that he would have to do, would be to make himself a resident and if he had practiced law for the term of eight years, he would be eligible to sit on the bench of the supreme court. There were a dozen individuals residing in Indiana, and yet practicing lawyers in the courts of Kentucky. As to the section read by the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) from the constitution of the state of Louisiana, he believed that this was the only one out of some half dozen that he had examined, which contained a provision like the one which was read. If this amendment prevailed, he intended to follow it up with another which should require the candidate to be a citizen of the district. He had no fear that the people would elect a man without qualifications. The gentleman from Louisville (Mr. Guthrie) had made the supposition that an infant might be elected. It was not so. The amendment did not extend to age, but he proposed to offer an amendment which would be such that the people would be sufficiently prepared to judge of the attainments of the candidate without saying whether he should have been a lawyer or not. Would gentlemen say that all who had been lawyers, were qualified? If any standard of attainment could be fixed upon, which would secure talent and integrity, he would go for it.

Mr. TALBOTT explained that what he meant by using the term alien, was, a gentleman not living in the district in which the election was going on, but who had come there from some other district, merely with a view to his election. He did not mean by alien, a native of Europe. He had no idea that the people would elect a man who was disqualified. For himself, he would say that he had entire confidence in the people, and believed it was to their interest to elect men fully qualified for the office, inasmuch as their lives, their liberties, and their property were at stake. He believed the people equal to any emergency. But here was the difficulty he wanted to avoid. If men were to be made eligible to the high office of a judge of the appellate court, who were not lawyers, who had no sort of legal qualifications, who were not conversant with the practice and doings of the courts, men who had every thing to gain and nothing to lose, he would say again, that the adoption of such a principle might produce a state of confusion which every man in the country would regret to see. We all knew that a man to be a judge, should be a lawyer, and a lawyer of high attainments. At any rate, he believed it for one. As he had already said, he believed his constituents were in favor of electing all the officers by the people, but they did not want to leave them without restraint, or elect them without qualifications of any and every sort. And it was on this account, not because he distrusted the integrity or intelligence of the people, or believed they would elect corrupt or incompetent men, but he wished to prevent confusion, and elect the wisest and best men of the country as judges. And this he believed the people would do, if the qualifications mentioned in the report of the committee should be retained. He would therefore vote against the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson.

Mr. MERIWETHER said, the gentleman remarked that a number of individuals, not qualified, might be candidates, and one qualified person might be a candidate. That circumstance would result in the advantage of the best man, according to the view he had taken, for he did not distrust the intelligence of the people. He would ask whether there might not be one qualified lawyer and half a dozen not qualified?

Mr. DIXON understood the gentleman to inquire whether a portion of the lawyers of this state might not be wholly disqualified to fill the bench of the court of appeals. The gentleman himself had not denied that some lawyers might be qualified to fill that office. On the other hand he would inquire if, from the whole community not embraced in the class of lawyers, one individual could be found qualified for that office?

Mr. MERIWETHER replied that he believed there was, and always had been.

Mr. DIXON said he confessed that this was beyond his comprehension. He had spoken of lawyers, not practicing lawyers alone, but those who understood the laws of the country, and had devoted their lives to their study. Would the gentleman insert in the constitution a declaration that every man in his district was qualified for this office, if the people chose to appoint him? If so, the constitution would be a laughingstock for all sensible men. It was his wish to make a good constitution, one that the people of Kentucky would be proud of, one that would protect the people from every improper influence, from whatever source it might come. He was not for taking away these qualifications. He believed that the restrictions as to age, citizenship, and residence in Kentucky, should be retained, and such other restrictions as would guard against improper influences, or against the possibility of placing men in power who are unqualified, and if they would protect the judiciary or the people, they should all unite for the same end.

Mr. DAVIS thought consistency a jewel, and was glad to see his friend from Jefferson (Mr. Meriwether) approximating to it in some degree. It seemed that the people who made constitutions and laws, and were competent to fill all the offices of the government, were unerring and infallible. Throwing any restriction around them, was acting with some degree of inconsistency. He thought his friend from Jefferson had not gone far enough to reach the point of consistency. It was true, he wanted to throw away some of the shackles that were around the people. He would ask, why not take away every thing that hindered a perfectly free choice. If the power that controls and elects were unerring, infallible, and would always select proper agents to fill office, why should any attempt be made to shackle these agents in their most enlarged discretion. Why have any restrictions as to citizenship, residence, or age. He would suggest to his friend, to draw up an amendment something like this: that every person, without regard to age, residence, sex, or color, should be qualified under the constitution. His honorable friend had said, that a man who has never practiced law, was yet competent to fill the office of the judge in the court of appeals. But this court reviewed the Federal and State constitutions, and all laws made under them, and all common law, and all civil law which had been adopted in our constitution, and yet a man who had never practiced law was supposed to possess sufficient knowledge to discharge all the duties devolving on the highest legal tribunal in the State. He thought that if ever there was a position extremely absurd, his honorable friend from Jefferson, who was a very able and sagacious man, had now laid one down. Still he was consistent, and the gentleman who had not given his concurrence was inconsistent. Whenever all powers were delegated to fill all offices, and it is declared that the agents were infallible, and would do exactly right, then this broad ground should be assumed without any shackling of those agents. But gentlemen involved themselves in a dilemma, when they threw any qualifications around the filling of offices. That was the test of the truth of the general principle upon which nine-tenths of the delegates in this convention seemed to act in relation to forming a constitution. He would say with the gentleman from Jefferson, that if it were necessary to prescribe any restriction upon a perfectly free action in filling the office of the appellate judge, it would be equally incumbent, wise, and politic, to prescribe restrictions in other respects. But, although he was opposed to the motion of the gentleman from Jefferson, and the principle upon which it was made, yet if that gentleman would act in beautiful and harmonious consistency with truth, it would not only lead to the position which his honorable friend occupied, but to one far in advance of it.

Mr. GHOLSON was surprised that this sarcastic mode of treating the right of the people to elect their judges had been so long delayed. He had been throughout the session expecting remarks similar to those he had just heard from the gentleman from Bourbon. He thought the people were entitled to the best talents for any office, and that they were the best judges of those talents. He did not think the best talent always came within the limits prescribed. Some men were more mature at twenty-five than others were at thirty-five. They had been told that the judicial offices must be confined to lawyers, that the clerks of the offices must be those who had been trained for two years in a clerk's office. He did not consider this training necessary. There was such a thing as hunkerism, and that hunkerism had occasioned all the sentiment against equal rights and equal freedom that they had heard. Gentlemen had been so long accustomed to the loaves and fishes—they had so long had a monopoly of every lucrative office in Kentucky, that they would now fight to the last. This was the last dying kick of aristocracy which they were about to see in this hall. He came here to aid in taking care of the interest of the farmer, on which the whole world depended. He wanted no restriction laid upon that class who supported the balance of the community. He was disposed to leave the whole matter of elections to the people without any restrictions of this sort.

Mr. PRESTON said he occupied rather a middle ground between the gentleman from Ballard, (Mr. Gholson,) and the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis.) The perfect infallibility of the people to which the gentleman from Bourbon alluded, he did not believe was contended for except by very few upon this floor. It was not contended that the people were infallible, but that it was better to trust the power of appointment to them than to the fallible governors Kentucky has had, and that they intended to substitute that mode of appointment for the one which had heretofore existed, without seeking to impose any restrictions which were not absolutely necessary upon the election of a judge. The convention, however, did intend to say that a free negro should not be elected, nor an alien. This would be one qualification. They did not intend that a minor should be elected, and this would be another qualification. They intended to impose some wise qualifications in order to secure to the people the appropriate and temperate exercise of their own power. He was in favor of the exercise of that power by the people, but he did not believe that any true friend of popular rights would carry it so far as to make it a mere farce in the eyes of all the world. When he looked to the extreme left, the "extrême gauche," as that portion of the French Chamber was called where sat the democratic members, he had no idea, from the moderate sentiments expressed by many of them, that they intended to strike down those restrictions upon the exercise of popular power, which experience dictated, and the destruction of which had been ridiculed in the burlesque proposition made by the gentleman from Bourbon. He knew of but one instance in history of a judge who was not a lawyer, and yet who gave universal satisfaction. He well remembered that the illustrious Sancho Panza, when he governed the Island of Barrataria, did so without any legal preparation, having received from his master, Don Quixotte, full authority over that fair and romantic domain; yet no judge who had ever exercised his powers in any land, ever received such applause in the administration of justice as did Don Sancho in his district. History did not relate whether the district was appellate or not, over which the celebrated Squire held sway; but at least he had full power and unlimited authority therein. He maintained that his friends from Jefferson and Ballard must fall upon the plan of that eminent judge, if they wished to relieve their proposed judiciary, who were not to be lawyers, from embarrassment in their decisions. Sancho had one fixed and inflexible rule with which he started out, and which aided him greatly in the decision of all points of law; he determined when he ascended the bench that he would never listen but to one side of the question, that then, as he honestly asserted, he had never any difficulty in making up his mind. Let us pursue this plan; and justice will come back to that true standard, and to that classical uncertainty in which the Greeks painted her as a blind-fold Goddess, holding the balances evenly suspended, so that luck was every thing, and every man had a perfectly fair chance. Now, he believed there was such a respect for the doctrine of chance in the public mind, and such wisdom in worthy Sancho's rule of practice, that if the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson were engrafted in the constitution, the courts of Kentucky may soon, perchance, rival in learning, in dignity, and in wisdom, the decisions of the immortal Governor of the Island of Barrataria.

The PRESIDENT remarked that it had been said by the sages of the law, that it required a study of more than twenty years to make a competent judge; and he could himself truly say, that after its practice for nearly thirty years he found that he had a great deal to learn in relation to the law, and that there were continually new questions and principles arising which required studious application and examination to understand. Now it certainly would be the desire of the people of Kentucky, that the greatest legal attainments the country afforded should be placed on the appellate bench. And shall we in their name, in providing a constitution for their government, require that some preparation, some evidence of devotion to a subject, which requires so long a study to understand, should be evinced on the part of the candidate, before he should be allowed to trouble the people with his pretensions to this high office? That is the question here, and the gentleman from Ballard misunderstands the position of those who favor the election of judges by the people. It is not that the people are deemed infallible, but that they are deemed a wiser and a better authority of appointment, than those to whom the power has heretofore been confided. It was true that the present constitution in giving the appointing power to the governor prescribed no qualification for office, but they also required the nomination to come before the senate, and it was not to be believed that thirty-eight men of the age of thirty-five, elected in the various districts of the country, would ever have permitted a man to ascend the bench of the chief justice of the appellate court of Kentucky, who had no actual experience in, or had devoted no time to, the study or practice of the law. That was the guard which was thrown around the executive appointments. And in giving this power to the people it is proposed that they shall throw a guard around themselves, in order that they may not be troubled with candidates who have not devoted their time and attention to the attainment of the proper qualifications. It was not intended to prescribe any individual, whether farmer, mechanic, loafer, or any thing else, but he must give the people an evidence by the devotion to the profession of law of a sufficient length of time, to show that he has some pretensions to the office, before he became a candidate. Would it not be prudent to allow the people to impose this restriction on themselves? He had as much confidence in the people as any one, but he intended to vote for the insertion in this constitution of a clause prohibiting the legislature from taking private property without due compensation therefor. Yet would not his confidence in the people induce him not to put it in the constitution, but to leave it to the representatives of the people interested. And he believed the people to have that restriction imposed upon them. All his reflection had satisfied him that the people had a right to prescribe to those who come before them as candidates for office, that they shall present certain evidences of qualification for the duties, and he desired that those who aspired to this high tribunal, should be brought within that rule.

Mr. GRAY said that the requirements of age and residence were qualifications of office. The experience of every man also went to show that no man would be qualified for a seat on the appellate bench until he had practiced law at least eight years, and was it any more improper to require that he should possess these qualifications than those to which he had first referred. They were all prerequisites and had the same object in view—that the people shall know something of the qualifications of the candidate presented to them, and it was a knowledge which they could not very well obtain in any other way. It was to prevent the men who had no qualifications for this office from troubling the people with their claims—and the people were annoyed enough in that particular, as the number of rejected candidates to the convention testified. These restrictions, with the addition suggested by the gentleman from Jefferson, of a residence of five years in the district or state, were, it seemed to him, most proper.

Mr. TRIPLETT said that a judge of the court of appeals was to be a judge of the law, and the practice, and how was he to learn law without study, or know what the practice was, unless he had practiced in the courts. Every man knew that the practice becomes a necessary part of the law, and if eight years was too long a time to require for that, then diminish it. He would say to the gentleman from Ballard, that although perhaps, his (a rich alluvial) county might produce men different from the balance of the state, yet he ought to have some degree of compassion on those in other parts. Our lawyers did not take up law by absorption but only by hard study, and they must have eight, ten, or twelve years before they could become possessed of such qualifications as would fit them for a seat on the appellate bench, and enable them to decide favorably on all the rights of the citizen, arising under the constitution and the laws, and he could not believe gentlemen to be in earnest when they desired to leave the possession of the proper qualifications on the part of those who were to sit on its bench to mere accident.

Mr. CLARKE had once before in some remarks assumed the same position as that contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Jefferson. It does not propose to destroy all qualifications, and there were very good reasons why a candidate should be a citizen of the United States. An elector must be. But even if it was required, he did not believe that any man who did not possess that qualification would ever be elected by the people. He had no objection to the candidate being required to be a resident of the district in which he ran, for a certain time, but he did object to the requisition of the eight years practice of law, the thirty years of age, and the having been a judge of some court for eight years. No one believed, he apprehended, that any person would be elected to the court of appeals who was not a lawyer, and familiar with both the law and the practice. Would any one undertake to say that the people would not know this fact and whether the candidate possessed these qualifications as well as any one here?

Mr. TRIPLETT. Give them the means and they will.

Mr. CLARKE asked, by what means it was that any one in that committee learned what it was that constituted a good judge? Whatever they were, those the people would possess. The president of the United States was elected without any requisition of qualification whatever, and yet he had the appointment of all the officers in the nation—the judicial ones included. Might he not sometimes be mistaken in his appointments, and if so would not the consequences be as disastrous to the country as if the people should chance to be mistaken in their selection of a judge? He had no fears that the people would ever select any other than a competent lawyer of distinction and standing in his profession. And if it was necessary to say that a man should not serve as judge before he had reached the age of thirty years, was there not an equal necessity existing to prohibit his eligibility after a certain age. There was just as much danger to be apprehended from imbecility in the office of a judge, as from incapability. He thought there was just as much reason in the one case as in the other.

Mr. McHENRY said there was a principle involved in this matter which gentlemen seemed to have overlooked. The great objection urged against the election of judges, by those opposed to that reform, was that it would lead to the selection of incapable men, and under improper influences. To this it was replied that the people were capable of judging in these particulars, and that the class from which these high functionaries were selected, would be those who were qualified by their study of, and experience in, the practice of the law. Any constitution made here must therefore clearly be the result of compromise. He called on gentlemen on the one side therefore to yield the question, as to the election of judges, and on those on the other, to yield to those restrictions which seemed to be desired to be thrown around the people in the exercise of that power. They could do it more especially as the opposite side required but those qualifications, on the part of the candidates, which all of them agreed the people would themselves require, whether it was in the constitution or not. He hoped gentlemen would bear in mind, that there must be some compromise of opinion on both sides.

Mr. HARGIS said the question here was best presented in the proposition, were the people competent to the election of the judiciary, or were they not. Any restriction upon the people in the exercise of that power was tantamount to a declaration that they were not competent to the task. He was opposed to restricting the selection of candidates to lawyers, as he did not believe it would secure any better judges. There would be perhaps some two to five hundred lawyers in any district which might be made, and yet out of them, not more than one tenth would be capable of drawing a declaration, and force the case to an issue. Many men too had been in the courts who were not qualified to pass judgment on a case involving twenty dollars. These restrictions therefore would not secure the people any better judges. As to the fear that the people would be troubled with candidates, he did not regard that as any reason at all for the imposition of these restrictions. If the people were qualified to elect their judges at all, they were competent also to decide upon the qualifications of the candidates before them, and he was therefore opposed to the imposition in the constitution, upon their free exercise of the appointing power. If they were not competent for the task, say so openly and directly, and let the present system be sustained; but do not seek covertly to convey the impression that they were not, by these various restrictions upon them. They are competent, or they are not—there is no middle ground on the question.

Mr. MAYES would not have been surprised if this amendment had emanated from some gentleman who was opposed to the election of judges by the people, as it then would have been plainly seen that the object was to render the constitution as ridiculous to the people as possible. Such certainly would be the result, if it was declared, as the adoption of that amendment would declare, that every man in the state, without the evidence of any qualifications save that he resided in the district and attained the age of thirty years, should be considered qualified for the office of judge of the highest court in the state. They might as well declare that a jury on the trial of a man for murder, would be fully as able to decide upon his innocence or guilt, by the mere hearing of the reading of the indictment, as if they had heard all the evidence on both sides in regard to the transaction. The restrictions were reported by the committee, not because the ability of the people was at all doubted, but because it was deemed proper and necessary that the people should be guaranteed that the candidates presented to them should possess the necessary qualifications for the office. The people in the districts could not personally be acquainted with the qualifications of all the candidates who might come before them, and the candidates therefore, should be restricted from presenting themselves, unless they did possess those qualifications necessary to discharge the high duties of a judge of the appellate court. And certainly no gentleman would desire that any other than such a man should be elected. He came here not to represent lawyers, mechanics, farmers, or any one class, but the whole people; to do that which in his weak judgment was best calculated to promote the interest and happiness of all; and these were the motives which governed him in his action on this subject.

Mr. TAYLOR said that the position occupied by gentlemen here could not better be illustrated than by an anecdote, which the committee would pardon him for relating: "A gentleman went into a lawyer's office, and saw around it but two chairs, a pack of cards, and a bottle of whiskey. Said he, how do you get along without any law books, I don't see any here? Said the lawyer, looking at him full in the face, and with a great deal of emphasis—I always go on the broad principle of human ingenuity." (Laughter.) And (said Mr. T.) if you want an appellate court that will go on the broad principle of human ingenuity, just go for striking out all qualifications reported by the committee, and you will be gratified. Some gentlemen seem to think, with Dogberry when he said that reading and writing came by nature, that the great and necessary qualifications for the court of appeals were of spontaneous growth. It has been said that whom the gods would destroy they first make mad, and it appeared to him—he said it in no offensive spirit—that some gentlemen were approaching that spirit. The committee had thrown restrictions around the legislature in regard to the great natural and inalienable rights there proclaimed, and what purpose, other than to prevent their being infringed upon? What objection, then, could there be to carrying out this principle further, and require that those who were to decide upon and to guard those rights, those who were to sit upon the appellate bench, should possess the requisite qualifications for a discharge of their duties? And besides, was not every one aware that attachment to and confidence in the new constitution, by the people, was to depend on the manner in which the reforms introduced were to be carried out? If it was desired then to bring the instrument down so low as to be almost beneath contempt itself, just allow a man without qualifications to get on the appellate bench, merely from the circumstance that this body failed to require the requisite qualifications for a candidate for that station. Those who believe that the people have the intelligence and capacity to select proper judges of the court of appeals, and that they would select none except such as were experienced lawyers and fully qualified for the duties, should not object to these restrictions. If the people were thus qualified they could do no harm, and it may do good. It was an apt remark, that the first duty of the legislature was to see that the people were free, and their next duty to see that they so remained. Acting upon that principle, he should vote for the insertion in the constitution of the restrictions reported by the committee.

Mr. MERIWETHER here withdrew his amendment, for which Mr. Root had moved a substitute, and then moved to strike out the first word in the 8th section, any, and insert no, so as to make the section read no person. He wished barely to remark, that the section as it now stands, is an extension of the right to become a candidate, instead of a limitation. Without some alteration such as he had indicated, a lawyer who was a citizen of Indiana or Ohio, (and there were several within his knowledge,) who practiced in the courts of Kentucky, together with every justice of the peace who had been on the bench of the county court for eight years, would be eligible to a seat on the bench of the court of appeals in Kentucky. He would barely call the attention of the human ingenuity lawyer of this house, and the one who appeared to be so familiar with the practice in the courts of that renowned judge, Sancho Panza, to the absurdity of making lawyers who were citizens of other states, and even justices of the peace, eligible to our supreme bench, to the exclusion of our own citizens.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE thought the gentleman had made his retreat upon a very small battery.

Mr. MERIWETHER. The attack came from a very small one.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said that the direct expression of one thing, in law, excludes the expression of another. The expression of qualifications, therefore, clearly excluded every body who did not possess those qualifications. The amendment, therefore, was wholly unnecessary.

Mr. HARDIN said the requisition of the qualifications necessary was not expressed so clearly as it ought to be, or as it would be if the negative form had been adopted. It was the natural qualification of every man to be fit for the office unless certain restrictions in regard thereto, were imposed upon him. The negative principle was the one adopted by the committee on the circuit courts, and the two articles ought to harmonize in expression as far as possible.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE preferred the present form, and thought it to be clear that it could not be misapprehended by any who understood the force and meaning of language.

Mr. BROWN offered the following substitute for the eighth section:

"No person shall be elected a judge of the court of appeals, who is not a citizen of the United States; and who has not attained the age of thirty years at the time of his election; and been a practicing lawyer eight years; and resided — in the district, immediately preceding his election."

He thought it necessary that the candidate should have resided in the district for a certain time, so that the people might have an opportunity of judging of his qualifications and fitness for the office.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE had intended, as soon as an opportunity was afforded, to have offered an amendment in regard to this qualification of residence, but he had been in doubt as to the number of years that should be required. The object would be attained, however, without the adoption of an entire substitute for the section.

Mr. HARDIN was in favor of some amendment requiring a residence of some length of time in the district. Otherwise, lawyers from Ohio and Indiana who practiced in the courts of Kentucky, might remove into the state just previous to the election, for the very purpose of being candidates for office. He again urged that in these matters the terms of expression in this article and in that reported by the committee on circuit courts should be harmonious, and instanced the action in that committee as having been governed by such a consideration as applicable.

Mr. BROWN then filled the blank in his substitute, with the words "two years," so as to require a residence of that period of time in the district, to qualify a candidate for the office of judge.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. MERIWETHER to strike out the word "any" and it was negatived.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE then moved to amend so that it should read "any citizen of the United States, who has attained the age of thirty years, and who has been a resident of the district for which he may be chosen, for at least two years next preceding the election," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NESBITT moved to add the word "five" after the word thirty, so as to require the candidate to have attained the age of thirty-five years, before he should be eligible to an election.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE desired to explain the opinion of the committee on this subject. It would perhaps rarely happen that a candidate would be presented or chosen younger than the age proposed by the amendment, as there were very few lawyers who had attained sufficient standing and celebrity in their profession before that age, yet the committee, in looking back to the distinguished men who had filled the appellate bench not only in Kentucky but the supreme court bench of the United States, found that some of its brightest ornaments had been called there at an age not greater than the period the committee had thought proper to adopt. He was satisfied from what he knew of the life of judge Story, that he was not thirty when he was appointed judge, and was assured also that the late governor Clarke was not thirty years of age when he was appointed judge, and he could give other instances. Thirty years was the meridian of a man's life, and the committee thought that instances might occur where individuals of that age might present themselves possessing such maturity of mind and power of intellect as would command the confidence of the people among whom they lived, and they concluded to fix the requisition of age therefore at that period. For himself, he had no choice on the subject, though he should regret very much to deprive a district of the services of a competent man, merely because he did not happen to be born six or eight months earlier than he happened to be.

Mr. HARDIN was not wedded to thirty five or thirty years as a requisition of age. As to judge Story, his impression was that he was at least thirty three years of age when he was appointed on the bench of the United States supreme court. He was the youngest judge he believed ever placed on that bench. So far as his knowledge of the history of England was concerned, he knew of no man who had ever been made a judge in any of the courts there under the age of thirty five, and very rarely until they had reached the age of forty or fifty years. The committee on the circuit courts, by a vote of eight or nine to one, had fixed upon the age of thirty five. As for himself, it would not apply to him, or even to his colleague, and he was not particular whether the age of thirty or thirty five should be agreed upon.

Mr. APPERSON wished to state, as due to the chairman of the committee, that the gentleman had proposed to limit the period of age beyond which a judge should be ineligible, but was voted down unanimously by the committee. In regard to judge Story, he was just informed by the gentleman from Bourbon that judge Story was appointed to the bench in 1812, when he was about twenty seven or twenty eight years of age. Such an instance however, would rarely occur, but if such an opportunity should again occur, the committee did not wish that the constitution should be a bar to the people availing themselves of it.

Mr. NESBITT remarked that the present constitution required that a senator should be thirty five years of age, and as he supposed for the purpose of securing men of matured minds, to operate as a check upon the lower branch, where, he believed, the only qualification was that the members should be twenty four years of age. The court of appeals was a check upon the circuit courts, and revised the errors that the circuit judge might be lead into by his youth and inexperience. As a member of the committee on circuit courts, he had been in favor of requiring those judges to be thirty years of age; but he believed that the judge of the court of appeals should be a man of more mature age. And if there should an instance occur, as that of judge Story, the people would not be entirely deprived of his services, they would merely have to wait five years before they could avail themselves of them. He was not tenacious however, of his amendment.

The amendment proposed by Mr. NESBITT, was then rejected.

Mr. ROOT called for the question on his amendment, to insert in the third line after the words "practicing lawyer," the words "in the circuit courts or court of appeals," in lieu of the words, "in the courts." The question was then taken, and it was rejected.

Mr. PRESTON moved to strike out in the first line of the eighth section, the words "citizen of the United States," and to insert in lieu thereof, the words "qualified elector of this commonwealth." The words in the section would seem to give the power to congress under its naturalization law, to make the basis of the qualification of the judge of the appellate court of Kentucky. The words "citizen of the United States," were not used in the present constitution in regard to the right of suffrage. There the phrase is used "every free male citizen." There were some important questions which had sprung up as to whether a naturalized citizen of the United States, was necessarily invested with all the rights of a citizen of Kentucky by coming here. He believed such not to be the case. In Illinois, a residence of six months was all that was required to become a citizen of the state, even from an alien to the United States. He preferred that the basis of the suffrage in Kentucky should be taken.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE suggested that the object of the gentleman could be accomplished by moving to strike out of the section the words "of the United States," so that it would read, "any citizen who shall," &c. This would leave this vexed question of double allegiance undisturbed.

Mr. PRESTON accepted that modification of his amendment.

Mr. BROWN moved to amend the amendment so that it should read "any citizen of the commonwealth of Kentucky."

Mr. PRESTON preferred his amendment as he had modified it.

The amendment of Mr. BROWN was rejected, and that proposed by Mr. PRESTON was adopted.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE here stated that a friend who had been at the trouble to make an examination in regard to the matter, had just informed him that judge Story was thirty-two years and two months old when first appointed.

Mr. TAYLOR moved to strike out the words, commencing in the fourth line and ending in the sixth line, as follows; "or whose practice at the bar and services upon the bench of any court in this state, shall together be equal to eight years."

The section as it stood would allow a man who had been on the bench of a county court seven years and six months, and had practiced law for six months to be eligible to the bench of the court of appeals. He apprehended this was not desired by any and that it was perhaps an oversight by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The question was then taken on the eighth section as amended, and it was adopted.

The ninth section was then read.

Mr. DIXON offered as a substitute for the section the following: "the court of appeals shall hold its sessions in each appellate district, unless the people on the petition of a majority of the qualified voters of such districts shall otherwise direct, and then at such time and places as may be otherwise directed by law." His object was to give the people of a district who might desire not to have a branch of the court of appeals among them an opportunity to get rid of it. He did not doubt however, that all would desire to have the branch in their district.

Mr. MACHEN had objections to the manner in which it was here proposed to get at the sense of the district. He proposed therefore that the following should be added to the end of the section. "Provided that any one or all of said districts may by a majority of the qualified voters therein decline having a branch of said court, and in such event the appellate business for such district or districts shall be transacted at the seat of government."

Mr. DIXON withdrew his proposition and accepted that of Mr. Machen in lieu thereof.

Mr. TURNER said that he should at a proper time move a substitute for the whole section leaving it to the people of the entire state to say whether they would have the court branched or not, and to the legislature to provide for carrying out their will in case they should decide in the affirmative. He had as yet heard no expression from the people on the subject—nor had it, so far as he had ever discovered, at all entered into the canvass for the convention.

Mr. HARGIS had an amendment which he believed would obviate all the difficulty. It was as follows: Strike out all the first line after the word sessions, and insert in lieu thereof the words, "at the capital in Frankfort, at such times as may be provided by law, provided that the legislature may at any time provide for said court to be held at such other place or places not exceeding three as they may think proper." This subject was a proper one for legislation, and had no business in the organic law.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE had no idea that the people of any district would ever refuse to have a branch of the court of appeals come among them, and he preferred therefore, the section as it stood, without amendment.

Mr. MACHEN was himself fully satisfied as to the propriety of branching the court, and had full confidence that the district of country from which he came would sustain the constitution of the convention on that subject. His proposition was intended merely to obviate the difficulty, which seemed to exist in the minds of some gentlemen, as to the probability that some of the districts preferring not to have a branch of the court among them. The amendment could do no possible injury while it might tend to satisfy gentlemen who entertained the apprehensions to which he had referred. However, he felt no particular interest in the matter.

Mr. MAYES opposed the amendment as being calculated to destroy the proposition to branch the court, and because it would have a tendency to keep each district in a state of continual excitement.

Mr. HARDIN was opposed to the amendment. When the districts were arranged and the proposition came up before the people as to what point in the district the court should be located, it would lead to continual excitements among the people. In some of the districts the location might be such as to induce a majority of the people to reject the court, rather than to have it continued there. It was emphatically the proposition with too much machinery—if it was intended to branch the court it was better to do it at once. He should have preferred that the whole matter should have been left to the legislature, for them to branch the court or not as the people might desire. To insert the provision in the constitution would, he was confident, insure forever fifteen to twenty thousand votes against the constitution. Who believed that the vote in this, and the adjoining counties, would not be very heavy against any constitution containing such a provision. He was against branching because it would increase the expenses of the state. It was among the great reasons which induced him to advocate a convention, that some provision should be made in the constitution to guard against that wasteful extravagance in the administration of the government, which had so largely increased the ratio of taxation since the year 1834. To branch the court, to add an additional judge with other necessary expenses incident to such a change would add to the expenditures of the state at least $4000 yearly. Gentlemen might say what was $4000? Nothing. But those who were farmers knew that when a thousand bushels of corn was put in a crib an armful or a ear taken from it was nothing, but these little things would leave the crib bare by spring. What was one of the little springs that fed the Mississippi? Nothing. But when they were all united they formed the broadest and most majestic river the world ever saw.

The CHAIR announced that the gentleman's time had expired.

And then the committee rose and reported progress. Leave was granted it to sit again, and then

The convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 31, 1849.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the court of appeals.

The question before the committee was the amendment offered yesterday by Mr. Machen, to the 9th section.

Mr. MACHEN suggested that his object in presenting that amendment was to prevent some difficulties which he thought had arisen in the house. He was a thorough friend of constitutional reform, and he had no intention to make any proposition which would embarrass the action of the convention. He still believed the amendment to be proper and right, but the consultation which he had had with those for whose opinions he had a great regard, had induced him to ask for its withdrawal.

The amendment was accordingly withdrawn.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said, he understood that those who opposed the sitting of the court in different districts, yet were in favor of electing the judges by districts and not by general ticket. It would be necessary therefore to preserve the equality of the voting population as nearly as possible in each. It had been suggested by the gentleman from Daviess, (Mr. Triplett,) that these districts should be so formed as to preserve the balance of power, that the place at which the court would be located, might be inconvenient to some of the counties in the district. He would, therefore, with a view to obviate that difficulty, offer an amendment as addition to the ninth section, as follows:

"The legislature may authorize a writ of error or appeal to be tried in another county than that to which such district may be attached."

If it would be more convenient to take the business of one county or district to another county, this would give permission to do it, leaving the county in the district, so as to preserve the equality of the voting population.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HARDIN said he had an amendment which he should offer in the convention, in lieu of the ninth section, which he thought would meet the objection of the gentleman from Henderson. He would only read it now:

"Sec. . The court of appeals shall hold its sessions at the seat of government, unless otherwise ordered by law, and the power is hereby given to the legislature, from time to time, to fix on and regulate the times and places for holding the sessions of the court of appeals."

He did not desire any present action upon the amendment. He wished not to encumber the constitution with the subject; he wished the power in this case to be left to the legislature. They would make more friends by leaving it to the legislature than by putting it in the constitution.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE was fully aware that that was the last point to which the opponents of the district system were to retreat and fight its battle. He was not to be alarmed from doing what he thought right by the idea which he considered a fallacious one, that they should make enemies to the constitution by the insertion of such a provision. Gentlemen were in the practice of getting up and saying, that unless their favorite measures were carried, there would be such a weight of opposition to the constitution that the people would not receive it. Other gentlemen said the people cared nothing about districting, and that it was a lawyer's project. He had heard and read similar language from persons out of the house, coming from the mountains around the seat of government. Between the proposition of his colleague, who would leave the subject of branching the court to the legislature, and the one of his friend from Madison, that the court shall be held at the seat of government, he had no hesitation in preferring the latter. He had no wish to have such a spring board, as the amendment of his colleague, from which aspirants to office could bound into congress or the executive chair. He had often witnessed the influence which had been brought to bear upon the action of the legislature from around and within the capital, and he did not believe, if the matter were left open, that the court would be located any where else than at the seat of government. The influence of the members of the bar around that place would be brought to bear upon the legislature, and would constitute a nucleus to rally around for some aspirant for congress, or the governorship, and it would be very convenient to say, we will postpone this bill till the next year, till the third of March. If it was right and proper that the court of appeals should hold its sessions in different places, and at different times, and if the public interest would be subserved thereby, he would inquire what good reason there was for postponing it. As to the argument that it would be a make weight against the adoption of the constitution by the people, it was one that could be used on both sides. This measure had been before the legislature heretofore and he might perhaps point out the cause why it had been defeated. There had been in times past, some sudden changes, and new lights had burst in upon the legislative body between the going down and the rising of the sun; even at the hour of midnight those lights had burst in, and had furnished an apology for the declaration, that men had scruples about the constitutionality of the thing. The gentleman had proposed to give this constitutional power to the legislature. They would have it at any rate unless the proposition of the gentleman from Madison prevailed.

Mr. HARDIN repeated, that he had only indicated his design to bring forward the amendment he had read, at a proper time, when he should probably give his reasons fully and thoroughly, that his constituents might see why and wherefore he differed from his honorable colleague. He was not an enemy to the bill, he had ever been in favor of electing the judges of the court of appeals, and of electing them by districts, and that they should hold their offices but for one term.

Mr. O. A. WICKLIFFE did not intend to say that he was an enemy to the principle of the bill.

Mr. HARDIN said he had staked himself on the great question of constitutional reform. He was one of the first men that voted for it in the state senate. He was exceedingly anxious to frame a constitution which the people would adopt, upon the first vote that they should take upon it; and it was equally important that the constitution should be popular, as well as good. He had no idea of practicing law much longer, and would just as lieve have the branch of the court at Pulaski as here. He did not take many causes to that court, and there were a great many eminent lawyers who never took a cause to the court of appeals. They might as well stop at the court below, because they could have the opinion of but one man when they got here, and the case would not be as well argued as at home. He admitted, however, that it was well to have a court of appeals, for the purpose of preserving uniformity in decisions. But the idea that justice was to be carried to every man's door, was like that which he had somewhere read fifty years ago, in which an individual declared that he hated the very idea of a court house and a grave yard. If he was not obliged to support his negroes he would never go near a court house, for he regarded the court house and the grave yard with much the same feelings.

He agreed with his colleague, that the legislature always had the power to branch the court, and he did not know how a contrary opinion got abroad; he had been told, however, that it was started by a gentleman who lives here, Mr. Charles S. Morehead; but whoever it was, he ought to have a patent for it. He had been in the legislature twice when the subject of branching the court had come up, and when gentlemen suggested places where the court should be held, Springfield was one of the places named. This was a place where they had to haul water five miles, and he always put in a proviso, that if the court was sent there, they should sit in watermelon time. The idea, therefore, that the legislature had not the power to branch the court, was a new one—one that, during his practice of the law for forty-three years, he had never heard in his country.

The CHAIRMAN stated that as the gentleman from Nelson had not offered the amendment which he read, there was no question before the committee.

Mr. MORRIS said he had been a silent but an exceedingly interested listener to the discussion on this question. He was one of the few gentlemen in this house who was extremely tenacious in the matter of the independence of the judiciary. He believed most emphatically and entirely with the late venerable Chief Justice Marshall, who declared in the convention of Virginia, that the greatest curse which could befall any country, was a dependent and corrupt judiciary. He came here prepared to vote for the insertion of a clause in the constitution giving to the people the election of the judges. He believed that the independence of the judiciary depended not so much on the mode in which the judges received their offices, as the tenure by which they were held. He believed that the same corrupt influences, so beautifully described the other day by the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis) would equally operate on the legislature, or on any other of the departments of the government, as on the people themselves. Nay, he believed it would, to even a greater extent. He considered that the independence of the judiciary was to be effected more by making the term of office long, and the salaries of the officers high, and also by making the judges ineligible after serving out their respective terms. He believed that in this way they might secure an independent judiciary, and these were the propositions he would vote for as a member of the convention. As regarded the question now before the committee, he looked upon it as one of policy and expediency, and could he imagine it struck at the independence of the judiciary in the remotest degree, he would stand against it as firmly as the gentleman from Nelson had done; but he looked upon it as not affecting the independence of the judiciary.

The convention had been told, and it had been proved by the gentlemen from Montgomery, and also by another table produced here by the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Williams,) that if they branched the court of appeals, the legal business of that court would, in all probability, be largely increased. Now, he saw no objection to the adoption of that proposition on that score. Give the people of Kentucky an opportunity of having their law business promptly attended to, and that could be done by having branches distributed in different parts of the state. If the court of appeals was a benefit and a service to the people, by affording them an opportunity of going to a higher and abler court than the circuit court, for an adjudication of their cases, then let the tribunal be placed in such a position as to suit the convenience of the people. Was it right that the people from remote parts of the commonwealth, should be compelled to travel all the way to Frankfort, in order to attend the appellate court, whilst the judges should have the privilege of travelling along good roads, and without any inconvenience whatever, to sit and hear appeals at the seat of government? The court of appeals then, under existing circumstances, must, he thought, be either a benefit or a curse to the people. He should judge from the argument of the venerable gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) that he considered this court a curse. If it was a benefit, it should be spread over the state at large, so that people might enjoy it; but if, on the contrary, it was a curse, why let the people bear it?

It had been said that the introduction of this clause would affect the reception of the new constitution by the people of Kentucky. He, however, did not believe it would produce any effect of that kind; but if any, it would affect the constitution for good, and render it more palatable to the people. The insertion of the provision in question was regarded by many gentlemen here as an entering wedge toward the removing of the seat of government. He did not look upon it in that light. He would do nothing to remove the seat of government from Frankfort, for it was a pleasant place, and the people were very warm hearted and hospitable. He would warn gentlemen, who felt interested in the town of Frankfort, that there are large and remote sections of the state where the people were extremely anxious for the branching of the court of appeals, and that if they pertinaciously adhered to the keeping of every thing within this little town, it might operate most seriously against it.

The 9th section as amended was then adopted.

The secretary then read the tenth section, as follows:

"The first election of the judges of the court of appeals shall take place on the _____ day of _____, and every two years thereafter, in the district in which a vacancy may occur, by expiration of the term of office; and the judges of the said court shall be commissioned by the governor."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE proposed to fill the blanks in that section. He thought, that if the constitution was not to be formally proclaimed as the constitution of the state, till the people had had an opportunity to consider it, and the convention were to meet afterwards to proclaim it, they could not meet earlier than April or May next. The members of the legislature would be elected on the first Monday in August, as he understood by the contemplated report of the committee on that subject, and consequently, there could not be an election of judicial officers earlier than the ensuing spring after that legislature had closed its session. He would, therefore, propose that the first election of these officers, throughout the state, should take place on the first Monday in May, 1851, and that they should be elected thereafter on that day. That would avoid an election of these judges at a period when the political officers were chosen, and he thought it a more convenient season than the month of August.

Mr. MACHEN suggested that members of congress would be elected in 1851, and the election of judges and members of congress would thus occur in the same year.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE replied that it was for this reason that the month of May was selected, which would avoid all other elections.

Mr. DESHA said the second or third Monday in May would be more agreeable to the people, in reference to their business for the season.

Mr. APPERSON would prefer the middle of a week, and an earlier period. The first Thursday in April would throw the election still farther from the time of other elections.

Mr. HARGIS preferred the third Thursday in April, as the circuit courts would be in session in his county on the first.

The PRESIDENT thought the election of these officers should come on those years when the members of the legislature were not to be chosen. He would prefer the first Monday in August, on those years when the members of the legislature were not chosen. He was not willing, however, that any time should be fixed upon now, as the time when all officers were to be elected was to be fixed upon hereafter.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE stated that the reason why he wished to have the blank filled now, was, that he understood that the committee on the legislative department had fixed upon the first Monday in August, 1850, as the time when the first election for representatives should take place under the new constitution. They would then be obliged to take a different month, or delay the election till August, 1851, which would bring the election to the time of the election of members of congress. He thought it would be better to fix on a different period of the year for the election of the judges, both of the appellate and circuit courts, from that on which either state or national officers were to be chosen. He was, on the whole, indifferent whether the time were fixed now, or whether they waited till the legislative committee had reported the time for the choice of representatives. He would, therefore, withdraw the proposition to fill the blank at present.

The tenth section was then adopted.

The eleventh section was then read, as follows:

"There shall be elected, in each district, by the qualified voters thereof, a clerk of the court of appeals for such district, who shall hold his office for the term of eight years, from and after his election, and who may be removed by the court of appeals, for good cause, upon information by the attorney general."

Mr. TURNER said he had some difficulty in understanding the operation of this section. He would like to know how many attorneys general were to be had? He thought this section ought to provide for having four attorneys general, one to attend each sitting court, otherwise he must pass around to each district. In this case the business at the seat of government would be neglected, for the officers there would have no one to advise them in his absence.

Mr. IRWIN was not in favor of the proposed arrangement of the court, but he would enquire if it were not somewhat strange, that a clerk who was elected by thirty thousand persons could be put out of office by four persons?

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE was sorry that he could not please the gentleman from Logan. It was difficult to please a gentleman who did not wish to be pleased. The gentleman from Madison (Mr. Turner) had suggested that the presence of an attorney at the capital was necessary. He would enquire where that distinguished gentleman now resided? Did he live at the seat of government? There had been many who did not, and the present able and competent officer did not reside here. He did not know how the government got along in his absence. He thought there would be no difficulty from the cause indicated. The gentleman from Logan (Mr. Irwin) had objected that the committee proposed that four judges should displace a clerk who had been elected by thirty thousand persons. He would answer that the judges were to be elected by a still larger number, but they were to be removable by a small number. The power must be placed somewhere.

Mr. McHENRY rose to a point of order. He thought the remarks were not applicable to the subject before the committee. The section was not debatable under the resolution which gave permission to discuss amendments only.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE begged pardon for having unintentionally wandered from the point in debate.

Mr. TRIPLETT wished to call the attention of the honorable chairman of the committee on the court of appeals to the words in the eleventh section, "and who may be removed by the court of appeals, for good cause, upon information by the attorney general."

There was a possibility, and even a strong probability, that a clerk might misbehave in one district not immediately under the cognizance of the attorney general, and he would not have information of the fact. He would therefore suggest the propriety of inserting the words, "upon the indictment of a grand jury"—after the words above quoted. There ought to be some measure by which the citizen in a remote part of the state, who had been injured by the mal-conduct of a clerk of the court of appeals, might be able to reach him through the attorney general. No private person could compel him to file an information, but when a grand jury had found a true bill on an indictment, it was prima facie evidence that the attorney general ought to file an information against him. He would prefer that the trial should take place in his own district, because the subjects for which he should be tried would relate to the records of that particular court, and it would be necessary to have the records of that court to prove the facts. He would prefer that the honorable chairman should move an amendment of that kind, because it was not easy to carry an amendment to which that gentleman was opposed.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said the committee thought it best to throw around these officers some safe-guard from unnecessary annoyances by persons who might institute proceedings against them which were groundless. As a member of that committee he was not attached to any particular court as the court to try such a case. He would suggest to his friend whether it would not be better to leave it to the legislature to fix the mode of procedure.

Mr. TRIPLETT assented to this proposition.

Mr. HARDIN suggested that it would be better to adopt the language of the old constitution, which is in the following words:

"They shall be removable for breach of good behavior by the court of appeals only, who shall be judges of the fact as well as of the law."

Now, under that clause, the court of appeals has said it is only to be filed by leave of the court. If this language were adopted, all would understand what the decisions were. He would not, however, make any motion on the subject.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE observed to the gentleman from Daviess (Mr. Triplett) that if he would consent to postpone any action upon his amendment for the present, he would consult the committee of which he was a member, and get a provision which he thought would meet the views of that gentleman.

Mr. TRIPLETT assented.

The eleventh section was then adopted.

The twelfth section was then read.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said that in consequence of the amendments previously adopted, it would be necessary to strike out the words "of the United States," and insert the words "a citizen and resident of the district at least two years next preceding the election." And he would move to have it so amended.

The amendment was adopted, and the section therefore was in these words:

"Sec. 12. No person shall be eligible to the office of clerk of the court of appeals unless he is a citizen and resident of the district at least two years next preceding the election, in which he may be a candidate, of the age of twenty one years, and has a certificate of his qualifications from the judges of the court of appeals."

Mr. NUTTALL moved further to amend by striking out the words "and has a certificate of his qualifications from the judges of the court of appeals."

If this report were adopted, and if the election of the judges and the clerks were to take place next May, out of the twenty five or thirty thousand voters composing a district, not more than half a dozen, except the old clerks, would stand any earthly chance of being elected clerks of the court of appeals, for their several districts. Be that as it might, he understood that if this section were adopted, it would have the direct effect of installing all the old officers who were formerly clerks in the different courts of Kentucky. There was no earthly doubt of it; and, he would here say, that if there was one thing more than another that had a most powerful influence in revolutionizing public sentiment on the subject of calling this convention, it was the manner in which the clerks had heretofore been appointed, and the course pursued in continuing men, from father to son, in office. He was in favor of giving every man a fair opportunity of filling one of the public offices, if he chose to run for it. Now in regard to the duties of the clerks of the court of appeals he did not pretend to say that he understood them, but it seemed to him that few qualifications only were required to make a man a good clerk. He had been in the court of appeals once or twice in his life, and had never heard a clerk read more than a short paper that the court had affirmed or reversed the decision of the court below. A line or two was sufficient to enter the order of the court, as it appeared to him. He might be mistaken; that might have been a minute merely, and the order might afterwards have been written at length, but he did not hear it read. But, it seemed to him, that any practical man of good sense might discharge the duties of clerk of the court of appeals, or of the circuit court. He was willing to carry out the doctrine, which he first contended for here, and that was, that if the people were qualified to judge of the capacity and ability of men to fill other offices, they would certainly be qualified to elect a man clerk of the court of appeals. He was in favor of striking out the words he had indicated, because he thought it would be forcing the clerks already in office on the commonwealth.

Mr. HARDIN observed that this was the same question that had occupied the attention of the committee for the last three weeks. All it amounted to was, whether they should fix the qualifications for any office. They had fixed the age at twenty one years, and that was a qualification. That was as much an abridgment of a man's liberty as to make him subject to military duty. He had no idea that the people would elect a man that was not qualified, but it was important to have the people understand what was thought about the principle in order that they might know that a knowledge of the law was essential to the administration of justice in our courts. The people ought to understand that before a clerk was permitted to act he should have some paper which would show his qualifications. He thought that no man should be elected a clerk unless he was qualified. It had been said that it was in consequence of the abuses of the appointing power this convention had been brought about. It was true, there was ground for these complaints. When the clerk of Owen county died, the judge sent down to Green, without regard to the wishes of the people of the district, and brought his brother out of an apothecary shop. It was difficult for him to get a certificate, but some man taught him to repeat the answers which he would be required to make, and he thus obtained one. When the clerk in Garrard died, the judge thought no man was so well qualified to fill the place as his son William; and William having sold it out, no man was so well qualified as William's vendee. And when Boyle county was made no man was so well qualified for that office as William, in the eyes of his father. He hoped gentlemen would not be inclined to carry their views so far as to run this principle into the ground. We have fixed upon the qualifications as to age and residence. It would do no harm. The gentleman from Henry was entirely mistaken in the supposition that the old clerks would be elected. Some would, and some would not. Many young men would qualify themselves to fill the office of clerk, and he ventured to say that there would be no scarcity of competent men to discharge the duties.

Mr. CLARKE said that gentlemen had attempted to assign reasons why a candidate for the office of the clerk of the court of appeals should be in possession of a certificate in respect to his competency and ability to discharge the duties of the office. This was based upon the fact that the individual would not be as likely to be as generally known by the people, as the one who obtained the office of clerkship in the circuit court. Hence therefore, it was contended, the necessity of a certificate. But, he would ask, was it true that the possession of a certificate was satisfactory evidence of his qualification? That was the point. It was argued that no one should be a clerk unless he was qualified, and the best evidence of the fact was the possession of a certificate. Now, in respect to what had fallen from the gentleman from Madison, and the venerable gentleman from Nelson, on the subject of a certificate, he would ask if these certificates, obtained with the facility which had been stated here, furnished satisfactory proof of the qualification of a clerk to discharge the duties of his station? If he (Mr. Clarke) desired to be a candidate for the office of clerk, he would set about learning to answer some dozen or twenty questions, which it was understood by the old clerk were always put by the judges of the court of appeals to an aspirant for the office. And, after he should have gone before them, and answered those questions, he would get a certificate. They allowed a man, because he had a certificate to impose upon the people—to practice a fraud upon their credulity. That was the effect of it. If they let him go before the people upon his reputation, his standing, his character, and business habits, the people would be competent to judge of his fitness and capacity to discharge the duties of a clerk. But, if they let him go into office, because of his possession of a certificate, which he had obtained by fraud, they excited the suspicion of the people and invited them to enter into a scrutiny of his qualification, which they doubtless would institute. He had no objection, nor had any one, to the candidate being a resident of the district in which he should be elected, two years, and that he should be twenty one years of age; but he did object emphatically to his being, by fraud and trickery, palmed off upon the community as a competent clerk, when able and distinguished lawyers said he was not qualified.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE explained the object of the committee in framing this section, in this manner. They designed to show to the community and to the world, as well as to the candidates for this office, that he should be furnished with prima facie evidence, at least, of fitness for the office. That individuals had obtained certificates who were not very well qualified for the duties of a clerk, might be true. An instance had been given by a gentleman. He could give an instance where the reverse was true. He had known the case of a young man, who had enjoyed every advantage to make himself a competent clerk, for he was schooled in the clerk's office, and made himself familiar with the duties of that office by study and experience, and he (Mr. Wickliffe,) knew that he was well qualified, yet in his alarm and trepidation, before the tribunal, he could not answer a single question. He then came to him, (Mr. Wickliffe) and told him what had occurred. Upon a consultation with the judges, a re-examination was had under such circumstances as to remove the cause of his trepidation; a certificate was granted and he made a most excellent clerk. When gentlemen came to reflect upon it, he thought they would see the necessity of having some security against any man obtaining this office without the proper qualifications. Some popular declaimer, wholly unqualified, might obtain the suffrages of the people, and secure the election and commission of a clerk, and having done so, he might then farm it out to some one man who was qualified, just as the old sheriffs had done. He wished to preserve a provision by which the people should have some evidence of fitness, and that there should be some inducement to young men to qualify themselves. If his colleague were to imagine that he might be a suitable clerk in his judicial district, it would be difficult to prevent his election, yet no judge of the court of appeals would grant him a certificate that he was qualified. Would it be proper to appoint such a man as he, and then have some friend of his to perform the duties of the office.

Mr. CLARKE wished to remark that there was a man now occupying the station of clerk who could not write.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE supposed as Dogberry said, it came by nature. He was aware there had been a practice throughout the state of appointing young gentlemen to that station who had never spent a day in a clerk's office, and who knew nothing about the business. Clerks had been appointed to office pro tem., who went to work and qualified themselves, and became excellent clerks. But it was not now proposed to elect clerks pro tem.; and prima facie evidence was requisite, at least, that they could read and write, and understood something of the judiciary of the country. The office of a clerk was a very important one, not only for the despatch of business, but its correctness. He had known evils to arise, owing to a want of qualification in a clerk under the present system, or by incompetency of his deputies, while the clerk himself was employed in other business. It was on account of abuses of that kind, that the subject of calling a convention was fully discussed throughout the region where he lived. The people did not demand any evidence of the honesty or integrity of a clerk, but they said they would require some evidence that he had learned his trade, that is, that he knew how to do the work.

Mr. BALLINGER would not have arisen to speak on this subject, but for the allusion to a clerk in one of the counties of this state, by the gentleman from Simpson. It was true that for the last year, that clerk had been disabled by the palsy. There was, however, no clerk in the state better qualified to discharge the duties of the office. He had been a clerk a long time, and received his appointment at first on account of his superior qualifications, and he was a living evidence of the indispensable necessity of proper qualifications. He had given universal satisfaction for nearly thirty years. The business of the office was now carried on by individuals who were not themselves qualified, but who performed their labors under his direction. That was an evidence of the necessity of having a clerk who was qualified both in theory and practice. He thought, notwithstanding the statements which had been made to the contrary, that the possession of a certificate was a requisite evidence of qualification. Any man who would give his time and attention to the subject could qualify himself for this office; but the people were not capable of judging whether an individual was fully competent. None but those who were themselves qualified to perform those duties were competent to judge of the fitness of another individual.

Mr. CLARKE explained that he did not make the allusion to which the gentleman had replied, with a view of showing that the incumbent was not qualified to discharge the duties of the office, but simply to reply to the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe), and to show it was not indispensably necessary for a clerk to write a very elegant hand.

Mr. GHOLSON said he had not risen with any expectation that his peculiar views could be enforced, or that he should make any impression on the house in what he might have to say on this question; but he felt it his bounden duty to oppose the course which some gentlemen were taking in making these invidious distinctions at every stage of this discussion. Now the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin), had conceded the whole ground in controversy at the outset. He had taken down his words verbatim as they fell from his lips, and they were that he had no idea that any man would be elected who was not well qualified. He had as much confidence in the intelligence of the people as the gentleman, and concurred with him in the opinion which he had expressed. It had been fully shown that a certificate was not prima facie evidence of a man's fitness for office. In this opinion he also concurred. They all knew that for many years past, the public offices had been confined almost exclusively to a certain class of the community, divided among certain families belonging to the Patrician order, as he considered them. The father first enjoyed the office for a number of years, and then it was transferred to the son. This was the only class of persons, if this provision were adopted, that could come forward and obtain a certificate of qualification. He agreed with the gentleman from Nelson, that the people would make a proper choice. Where a man was well known the people must be the best judges, and yet gentlemen proposed to prescribe to the people whom they should or should not elect. He maintained that the character of a man before the people was the very best evidence of his qualification. He protested against prescribing to the people, for it was in so many words saying to them, "you know nothing about selecting a competent clerk, and we must give you our advice lest you elect an incompetent man, having no confidence in your judgment, integrity, and discretion." He knew this measure would be adopted, but before it was he would now repeat his protest against the infliction of such injustice on those who sent him here.

Mr. DIXON believed that he well understood now, what the gentleman from Ballard meant. The last remarks of that gentleman were easily understood. He had asked the gentleman from Nelson, if his object was to prevent the ignoramus from being elected clerks, to prescribe rules to keep them out of the office.

Mr. GHOLSON declared he had not uttered that sentiment, but did say that other gentlemen held the doctrine that the people would elect a set of ignoramuses, and therefore they prescribed those metes and bounds.

Mr. DIXON. That was it then, just the thing, they prescribed rules by which ignoramus might be prevented from being clerks.

Mr. GHOLSON. If the gentleman thought to make capital by a wilful perversion of his remarks he was welcome to do so.

Mr. DIXON did not think much capital would be made from any remarks of that gentleman: for after giving him full credit for all the capital he possessed, it would be of little value. He understood the gentleman to say, if the people would make bad clerks, they had a right to do so; if they would make mean and dishonest men clerks, they still had a right to do it; and if they put ignoramuses in office, they had the right to do it; and he insists that the people of Ballard and McCracken should not be prevented from exercising this right. It was unfortunate that the gentleman did not live in the time of the great contest of the white and red roses, as it was termed, or between the houses of York and Lancaster, which was waged with such partizan fury, that England was drenched in blood. There was during that memorable contest, a celebrated man who entertained the same opinions with the gentleman from Ballard and McCracken. He and those who agreed with him, thought it was wrong for a man to write, highly criminal to read, and especially so, if he spoke French. It was the celebrated Jack Cade. He was the great leader of all the ignorance of England; he fought several battles, and was victorious; he took many captains, and made it a point, like the gentleman from Ballard and McCracken, to spare no one who was so unfortunate as to have learned to read and write. At one time he constituted himself a court with criminal jurisdiction, when a clerk—the clerk of Chatham—was brought before him, on the grave and horrible charge that he could read and write, and some one else on a charge that he spoke French. Before the examination of the unfortunate violators of the criminal code of Cade commenced, one of his followers said—the first thing we do, let us kill all the lawyers; to which Cade immediately replied, nay—that I mean to do. Is not this a lamentable thing, said he, that of the skin of an innocent lamb should be made parchment, and that parchment being scribbled over should undo a man. I did, said he, but seal once a paper, and I was never mine own man since. It was after arriving at this most wise and sapient conclusion that the most unfortunate clerk of Chatham was introduced into court and put upon his trial, when the most remarkable specimen, perhaps now on record, of all the beauties of ignorance was displayed in the dialogue which ensued between the renowned judge and one of his followers. I do not pretend to quote from the great dramatist, Shakespeare, accurately; but it was, as well as my memory serves, after this sort:

"Who have you there, said Cade.

The clerk of Chatham, said his follower.

What's his offence, said Cade.

He can write and read, and cast accounts, said his follower.

O! monstrous, said Cade.

We took him setting of boys copies, said his follower.

O! the villain, said Cade.

He has a book in his pocket with red letters in it, said his follower.

Nay, then, he is a conjuror, said Cade.

He can make obligations and write court hand, said his follower.

I am sorry for it, said Cade. The man is a proper man on mine honor. Unless I find him guilty he shall not die. Come hither sirrah, I must examine thee. Dost thou use to write thy name, or hast thou a mark to thyself, like an honest plain dealing man.

I thank God, said the clerk, I have been so well brought up that I can write my name.

He hath confessed! He hath confessed, said the follower of Cade. He is a villain and a traitor.

Away with him then said Cade, let him die with his pen and inkhorn about his neck. Off with his head.

And now, said he, we'll have the head of Lord Say, for selling the dukedom of Maine, and good reason too; for thereby is England maimed, and fain to go with a staff, but that my puissance holds it up. Why, said he, is not this Say a villain, and worse than all, he can speak French, and therefore he is a traitor. Answer, if you can. The Frenchmen are our enemies, go to then. I ask but this, can he that speaks with the tongue of an enemy be a good counsellor. I answer, he cannot. Then I say let him die the death of a traitor. Off with his head."

Had my friend lived at that period, he might have been a distinguished leader like Cade. No qualifications were then needed. If he wrote, that was a disqualification; if he read, it was the same; and if he spoke French he had no chance but to have his head taken off. They were not now living at such a period, and he thought his friend from Ballard must be satisfied of that. Jack Cade thought the qualifications of writing, reading, and speaking French, were sufficient to demand decapitation. His friend from Ballard seemed to think that all qualifications for the office of clerk, should be disregarded. He, (Mr. Dixon) however, looked on the qualifications of a clerk, as among the most important in the state, important to every citizen in the the whole country. In the clerk's office were deposited all evidences of titles, a thousand evidences of facts, upon which all the rights and interests of the people of this commonwealth depended. It was highly important that the clerk should know how to take care of these papers. Surely it was important, and he believed it required years of study and close application to qualify any man for the business. He was most decidedly opposed to breaking down, or throwing wide open the gate to permit every man to go in and take charge of these evidences of title, whether qualified or not. They had better look to this matter before they acted upon it. Titles to land, and titles of every description were placed in the keeping of the clerk. In the proper records of the decrees and judgments of the courts, every thing was involved, because a corrupt or ignorant clerk may pervert the record, and destroy all the evidences which it was intended to perpetuate, and then the rights of the people of course are sacrificed. Nothing could be so important as that the clerks should be competent men. He hoped they would not, by striking out this provision, say to the people of the whole state of Kentucky, it was right and proper, if they chose to do it, to put an ignorant man in the office of clerk. It would be a wrong, and an outrage on their rights, to put an incompetent man in that office, and thus throw down all the barriers which should be erected by this convention, against that wild spirit of revolution, which under a leader of the spirit of Jack Cade, might result in the destruction of every thing that was worth preserving.

Mr. GHOLSON said it would be recollected by the committee that he had commenced his remarks with the emphatic declaration that he wanted qualified men, and that the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) said he had no idea that the people would elect a man who was not qualified. And, in order to get them, he (Mr. G.) proposed to give the election to those who lived around them, and who would therefore, be the best qualified to judge. He wished to be understood on that particular point. When gentlemen were driven to the wall, when they showed a disposition to hold up the aristocracy, let them refer to old English tales of Jack Cade, and Spanish tales of Sancho Panza. He needed no such aid. His affections were with the people.

The PRESIDENT supposed there was no man in the convention who did not desire that the candidates for the office of clerk should be well qualified. Now what was the best mode of securing that description of officers? In the present constitution it is declared "that each court shall appoint its own clerk, who shall hold his office during good behavior; but no person shall be appointed clerk, only pro tempore, who shall not produce to the court appointing him, a certificate from a majority of the judges of the court of appeals, that he had been examined by their clerk in their presence, and under their direction, and that they judge him to be well qualified to execute the office of clerk, to any court of the same dignity, with that for which he offers himself." These are the qualifications required by the the present constitution. Granted that even under these qualifications frauds have crept into the records, should they now throw open the doors to an unlimited extent for the entering of such frauds, for that reason alone? Because certificates were sometimes given unworthily, was that a reason why no qualifications at all should be required before a candidate had the right to present himself and trouble a district with his pretensions to office? Licenses were required from lawyers and yet sometimes there were men who received them, who were not lawyers, but this fact was soon found out, and before they could do much harm. In regard to clerks, the evils arising were not so readily to be obviated. And should not the people require at least the same qualifications of those who present themselves for that office? Shall not the people place over themselves the same guards that in the present constitution they placed over the courts to prevent improper individuals from presenting themselves for these offices? However aristocratic these clerks might become from their official position, they certainly were not so in their origin. They were generally the sons of poor men, and frequently the orphans of widowed mothers who were educated in their duties by the several county clerks. And he desired also to fix such qualifications as should open the office to all, and at the same time preserve that high character for capability which the clerks of the courts of Kentucky had ever borne at home and elsewhere. It would at least increase the chances of securing better officers, and it was the part of wisdom, therefore, to put it in the constitution. Their possession of this certificate by the candidates, would be prima facie evidence, at least, to the people, that they were qualified for the station.

Mr. TURNER said that most of the clerkships were filled by the sons of poor and humble men. And if it should be required, as he proposed, that each clerk should serve an apprenticeship of two years before he was a candidate, it would to a still greater degree, keep the office within the reach of the sons of poor men, inasmuch as the sons of the wealthy and the aristocratic would hardly consent to learn the business as apprentices. The best clerks in the commonwealth were the sons of poor men who had been obliged to serve an apprenticeship of this kind. He instanced the clerks in this city, and in Madison, Fayette, and Lincoln, as being most excellent officers, and men who were of the class to which he had referred. The objection to the present mode of judges appointing their own clerks was, that they were very apt to appoint their own sons and relations; and this was not surprising, as they received so little compensation, that they must be compelled to resort to that means to sustain their families. But the people were now to make these appointments, and he hoped the convention would put it out of the power of any man to receive one of these offices unless he had qualified himself by learning its duties by a regular apprenticeship. In regard to the reference that had been made to his aiding a young man in procuring the office of clerk—he had only to say that he did it in one instance, receiving no compensation therefor, and merely as an act of good will to the person. And even this he desired to guard against in the future.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE said he should vote to retain the requirement of a certificate. The requisition in the present constitution on its face would seem to be the best that could be devised. It requires the judge to appoint the clerk, and even then, that he should not do it except upon a certificate of qualification. All would suppose that the judge was the best person to judge of the qualification of a clerk, and the framers of that constitution were wise in that provision, if the courts of the country had carried it out in the spirit they designed. But if there was any thing at all which had brought about this convention, it was the open bargain and sale of the offices of the commonwealth, and the shameful prostitution of the appointing power. There was hardly an office in the state that was not held through bargain and sale. It was the fact in regard to his county, as had been brought out by legislative investigation. He said it in no terms of derogation to the incumbents, for they were his personal friends, nor did he make it a matter of reproach to them, because it had come to be a sort of common law in the state, that all offices were to be bought and sold as merchantable commodities. He was for requiring some evidence of qualification from the candidates.

Mr. CLARKE wished to have the officials in his district excluded from this charge. The clerks there held their offices by no bargain or sale. It was due to them, estimable gentlemen as they were, though political opponents of his, that this should be said.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE made his remark in a general sense. The case to which he had alluded in his own county had been a matter of legislative investigation, and here it was proper to say both gentlemen swore that the judge had no knowledge of the sale of the office.

The question was then taken on Mr. NUTTALL'S amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. TURNER moved to amend the 12th section, by striking out the words "a certificate of his qualifications from the judges of the court of appeals," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "a certificate of his having served two years in some clerk's office, and of his qualification from the judges of the court of appeals."

Mr. WOODSON thought the adoption of this amendment would place it in the power of the present incumbents of the offices to say who should be clerks in all coming time. As a general rule, the clerks he believed were opposed to the calling of a convention, because under the present constitution they had a life tenure of their offices. To require that no man should be eligible to the office unless he had served an apprenticeship of two years, would lead to these results. The men who had been taken into the clerks offices would, from delicacy, be prevented from becoming candidates against their old friends; and the clerks also would be likely to get no one into their offices who would be probable, hereafter, to become their opponents for the station. Further as to the amendment: No man who had not written in a clerk's office for two years could possibly be a candidate until after the first election. What he desired, was to see every man who could get a certificate of his qualifications eligible to the office, and if in the granting of those certificates the judge should perpetrate any fraud on the freemen of the commonwealth, let them be deprived of their offices.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL said there was one honorable exception to the charge that the clerks had opposed the call of a convention. There was one who had not only been an earnest advocate of reform throughout, but who to his honor, be it spoken, was opposed to the qualifications recommended by the committee. He, (Mr. M.,) should vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Madison, and also against the proposition of the committee, leaving it, as he hoped the convention would determine it, to the people to decide what qualifications and restrictions should be required, and who possessed those qualifications. He had been commanded by the people of his county to commit into their hands not only the election of their officers, but to trust to their intelligence and their integrity in making that selection. He would give his vote therefore for no qualifications that were dependent upon the action or judgment of any other than the people themselves. They believed themselves to be, and he believed them to be, qualified to determine who was fitted for the office of judge of the court of appeals, and for judge of the circuit courts. He did not agree with the gentleman from Henderson that the people were totally indifferent to the qualifications for the offices they were to fill. He could not believe that there was no anxiety existing outside of this convention to fill these offices with persons who were amply qualified to fill them. Relying as he did most implicitly upon the virtue and intelligence of the people of this state, and believing himself to be commanded by the people of his county, as well as by the people of the state at large, to commit into their hands this power, he desired to do it without the imposition of any restrictions, believing they would themselves require all the qualifications that were necessary. He should therefore vote against every proposition to required qualification.

The amendment of Mr. TURNER was then rejected.

Mr. NUTTALL moved to strike out the words "and has a certificate of his qualifications from the judges of the court of appeals."

He did not want the clerks to have all the advantages, but only just an equal chance with every other candidate who might be able to get a certificate of qualifications from the appellate judges. He wanted all of them to come before this new court of appeals, and much more necessary was this since gentlemen had here confessed that men had received certificates and appointments who were not qualified.

Mr. HARGIS thought if the amendment was adopted it would prevent the court of appeals from organizing for the want of a clerk. The judges were first to be elected, and who should sit as clerk if it was provided that no one should be elected until he had received a certificate from them? As to the qualifications of these clerks, he was desirous of requiring that they should be possessed by the clerks of the appellate court; but of the clerks of the circuit courts who were to be elected in the different counties, he would require no certificate of qualifications. He was acquainted with counties where there was no man who had a certificate or who could get one, and if such a qualification was required the court would either have to do without a clerk, or appoint a pro tem to act until some competent man should move into the county. This would not be the case in such large tracts of country as would constitute an appellate district.

Mr. BOYD moved to amend by adding at the end of the section the words, "or any two circuit judges of the state." The certificate of any two circuit judges should be sufficient, as it might not be convenient for poor young men who were qualified, to go to the expense of attending the court of appeals for the purpose of procuring their certificates.

The amendment was adopted.

The thirteenth section was then read as follows:

"SEC. 13. In case of a vacancy in the office of clerk of the court of appeals in any district, the governor shall issue a writ of election to that district, and the qualified voters thereof shall elect a clerk to serve until the end of the term for which the clerk was elected whose vacancy is to be filled. Provided that when a vacancy may occur from any cause, or the clerk shall be under charges, upon information, the judges of the court of appeals shall have power to appoint a clerk pro tem, to perform the duties of clerk until such vacancies shall be filled, or the clerk acquitted."

Mr. KAVANAUGH said it appeared to him that in case a vacancy occurred a short time previous to the general election, there ought to be some mode of appointment, by which the office could be filled pro tem for the remainder of the term. He understood, however, that the provision required that a writ of election should issue, even when a vacancy occurred, within a few months of the expiration of the term.

Mr. JAMES said he had prepared an amendment which he thought would obviate the difficulty.

The amendment was read by the clerk as follows:

Amend section 13 line 2, strike out all after the word "district" and insert "within less than one year next before the time for which he shall have been elected or appointed, the judges of the court shall fill the same, but in all other cases the vacancy shall be filled by an election in such manner as the general assembly shall provide by law."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE observed that it appeared to him, that there was really no necessity for the amendment. In case a clerk should die within a month of the expiration, if the gentleman would examine the section, he would find that no difficulty could arise. There would necessarily be an appointment pro tem, of a clerk to do the business until an election took place, under the writ issued by the governor, or until the general election, as the case might be.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was rejected.

The fourteenth section was then read, and the question being taken, it was adopted, as follows:

"SEC. 14. The legislature shall direct by law the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns to the secretary of state, of all elections of the judges and clerks of the court of appeals, and of determining contested elections of any of these officers."

The 15th section was then read, as follows:

SEC. 15. All elections of judges of the court of appeals, and the clerks thereof, shall be by ballot.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE reminded the committee that the proposition regarding the voting by ballot, was the next subject to be voted upon. He would leave it entirely to the judgment of the committee as far as he was concerned, without detaining them with any argument as to the propriety of its adoption.

Mr. ROGERS remarked, that in his opinion, the proposition involved a great and important principle. It was a matter of importance to the people of the state, to consider whether or not the present mode of election should be abandoned, and the ballot system adopted. He desired gentlemen to look back for a moment, and consider from whence this thing came. If they would revert to the August election, it would be seen that since the secret, and masked battery of the open clause, had been put down by the people of the State, the emancipation party had been holding up to the people the ballot system, as one which ought to be adopted, and the object was apparent. Under that system frauds could not be detected, whereas when votes were given openly, if an error was committed, it might be corrected. There was no necessity for ballot voting in Kentucky. Was it to be supposed that the citizens of Kentucky were in dread of any influence that might be exerted over them as by land-lords over tenants. Not at all. What were the arguments adduced in favor of adopting this system? It was held out by the emancipationists, that they could not come up and vote freely and openly without exposing themselves to the enmity of those whom they opposed. There was an ulterior object he apprehended. He believed they were looking forward to the time when they would be able to bring up the question of emancipation in another form, and they wanted to secure the provision of ballot voting as a preliminary step. When a man desired to commit petty larceny, or highway robbery, he would be very glad to provide himself beforehand with a means of concealment of his act, and when men contemplate committing a wholesale legal robbery of your property, they want the cover of ballot voting to do it under. To use their own language, they meant to be "as wise as serpents and as harmless as doves," and in carrying out their views, they were no doubt, prepared to come forward at all times, under cover of patriotism and humanity, but other disguises were necessary. It was written in the book of inspiration, that there should be false prophets in all times to come, as there had been in times past, and that they should deceive even the saints themselves. It would not be very surprising then, that they should deceive even these good convention men. They had yielded to the anti-convention men, the question of eligibility of officers; they have yielded to them, the question of qualification; they have yielded various points—this point, he hoped they would not yield. He hoped they would retain the viva voce system, for he wanted to know where every man stood who came up to vote. It would be important as a matter of reference. It was desirable frequently, to revert to the former acts in a man's political life. How would it be in regard to the action of the convention if after a period of years, it could not be ascertained what course delegates had taken. He desired that there should be a public and permanent record of all votes, and he trusted that the amendment would not be adopted.

Mr. BROWN proposed to amend the amendment by striking out the word "ballot" and inserting the words "viva voce."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said he rose merely to disabuse the committee on the court of appeals, from the imputation of entertaining the sentiment that this proposition of theirs was in furtherance of the views of the emancipationists. He was very certain however, that the gentleman could not himself have supposed that such was the purpose, which the members of the committee had in view, in proposing the amendment that was now under consideration. At all events, he could say for one, that no such purpose entered his mind, and he did not think that he had subjected himself to such a charge, either in the house or out of it, wherever he was known. While up, however, he would say to his honorable friend, who had moved the amendment to the proposition of the committee, that the best way to accomplish his object, would be to vote against the proposition, and leave it to the legislative department, hereafter to prescribe the mode in which electors should cast their votes, and thus avoid encumbering the constitution with any provision on the subject.

Mr. ROGERS desired to say one word in explanation. He did not intend to advance the opinion, that any member of the committee, or of this house, favored the amendment that had been recommended by the committee, for the purpose of promoting the views of the emancipationists, but that, he believed, would be the effect of the amendment if adopted. It would be yielding to them a principle, and to this he could never consent. He hoped the amendment would not prevail.

Mr. BULLITT felt it to be his duty to protest against the adoption of the ballot system, in any form in which it could be presented. The direct tendency and effect of it would be to aid emancipation, as well as agrarianism, in all its forms. He had as much confidence in the honor, integrity, and virtue, of the people of Kentucky, as of any other people in the world; he would not yield the Kentucky character to any other, but it was a fact well known, that there were bad men in all communities. If all men were perfect and invulnerable, why would they be sent here, to make a constitution? A perfect man requires no law to restrain him, but they found it necessary in all governments, to impose restraints upon the wicked. What would be the effect of the ballot system? It would be this.

There were bad men, it was admitted—men who would deprive their neighbors of their property, if they could have an opportunity of doing it by sneaking up to the ballot-box, like a sheep-stealing dog, without being responsible to the influences around them. Where was the necessity for adopting the system of ballot voting?

He had come to the convention prepared to go for the election of judges, by the people, although it was not his original opinion that they ought to be so elected. Upon this point, he had yielded to the wishes of the people whom he represented. He believed further, that if the convention or the people hereafter, through the legislature, should determine to give good salaries and long terms of service to the judges, their appointment by the people would be, he thought, the best mode that could be adopted. But he would not begin by teaching the people a system of fraud. Any man who was not independent enough to go up to the polls and vote openly, ought not to be allowed to vote at all. What was it that they were proclaiming to the people by such a mode of action as this? It was tantamount to telling them, we are establishing a system that we say is the most perfect that can be devised, and yet so imperfect is it, we say in the next breath, that we cannot suffer our constituents to vote openly like men, but that they must sneak up to the polls and vote stealthily. Suppose, after having voted in this manner, I should be enquired of, by a candidate, how did you vote? In addition to the concealment of my vote in the first instance, I should have to lie a little about it, I suppose, in order to hide from him the fact that I had voted against him; so that I might avoid having my neck stretched, as I might be liable to do, when the judge came to carry out that vindictive resentment which gentlemen attribute to them.

He protested against the ballot system, on the ground that among honest men it was wholly unnecessary, calculated to teach people to dissimble, and to hide their votes. In a government of the people, like this, every man should come forward, boldly and independently, and give his vote. He should be taught and instructed to do this. One of the advantages that a slave state possessed over a free state was, that in the slave states property was more equally divided than in the free states. In the slave states, overgrown estates were not heard of. An Abbott Lawrence and a John Jacob Astor were not to be found as in the free states. There was no man to be found there having five hundred voters under his control, men who were more degraded than the slaves. If the slaves were allowed to vote he would be inclined to adopt the ballot mode of voting, but the case was very different.

There was no gentleman in this house who had a higher respect for the chairman and all the members of the committee on the court of appeals, but the course pursued by the committee, he must be permitted to say, did not entirely accord with his ideas of what constituted that sort of action which the honorable chairman professed to have in view. The ballot mode of voting was not applicable in this country, and they were let into a bit of a secret, by being informed, from a very high emancipation source, that the emancipationists in their future conduct were resolved to be as wily as serpents and as harmless as doves. And how had the question now been brought up? Oh! it was pretended that a man could not vote, free from control, without going up to the ballot box, poking in his ballot privately. There was no earthly reason why the present elective system should be changed.

Mr. HARDIN said when the present constitution went into operation, he, although a lad, only about sixteen years of age, was in the habit of attending the elections, feeling a deep interest in observing how they were conducted, and he knew that there were great complaints of the frauds that were practiced upon the illiterate. The friends of the candidates were in the habit of shifting their tickets. Another cause of complaint was, that some of the voters were made to vote two tickets, and such was the alarm of that class of people, lest they should be imposed on, that they were in the habit of going to their neighbors, in whom they had confidence, and getting them to write the names of the candidates for them. Under the original constitution of the state, free negroes were permitted to vote; and one of the causes of calling the convention in 1799, was to change the ballot system of voting.

He understood from the chairman of the committee that he did not intend to carry out the principle through all the elections. He was for uniformity of voting. The principle should be the same in the election of all the officers of government. As the gentleman from Jefferson had well said, in countries where one man might have a thousand operatives under him, it might be necessary to protect those men in the exercise of the elective franchise against the dictation of their employers. Where a man owned nearly a whole county, it might there be necessary, but there was certainly no necessity for any such thing in Kentucky.

Mr. BROWN observed, that it was suggested to him by the chairman of the committee, that he could attain his object as well by voting against the amendment proposed by the committee. That might be true, but he could also attain it as well, by the amendment he had offered. He was utterly opposed to the adoption of the ballot system, in Kentucky. He was in favor of the old mode of voting. He had never had a vote to give, nor did he ever expect to have one, which he desired to conceal. He believed that it was more republican, more democratic, more independent, for a man to go up to the polls and vote his sentiments, without any concealment; and he believed that the system of voting, now proposed, was a little like the open clause, appropriately termed, by the gentleman from Mason, a masked battery. He disclaimed any such imputation against the committee, or any member of the committee, as that they were desirous of favoring the views of the emancipationists; but it was very well known that it was a mode of voting that had been favored by the emancipationists. The old mode he regarded as valuable, from its convenience for reference, whenever it became desirable to ascertain how a man had previously voted. Unless the poll-book could be referred to, to show how a man voted, he could be held to no responsibility. There was within this state a class of men who were willing to destroy, and who would destroy, if they had the opportunity, the tenure by which a certain species of property within the state was held. They would take it away from the owner, without any compensation. They were engaged in a species of robbery, and this ballot system would serve them as a protection from the odium which would attach to those who desired to obtain a man's property without compensation. He was in favor of retaining the old mode of voting, because it was more republican, and because it would hold men to a just sort of accountability.

Mr. GARRARD said he had been endeavoring, for the last fifteen or twenty minutes, to get his own consent to pass over the remark of the gentleman from Morgan. The gentleman said there was not, in some regions of country, although he excepted that part which he himself represents, a man to be found who was qualified to discharge the duties of clerk of the court of appeals, nor one who could obtain a certificate of qualification. He would ask if the gentleman alluded to that portion of the people of this commonwealth that he had the honor to represent?

Mr. HARGIS remarked, that he had not specified the particular county where this state of things existed, and he did not know that the gentleman had a right to require him to state, specifically, what county he alluded to.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE remarked that he was perfectly indifferent as to the decision of the committee upon the proposition now before them. He believed it would be remembered that it was stated when the proposition was submitted to the convention, that it was not designed to change the mode of electing political officers, but merely to change the mode of voting in the election of judicial officers. It would be remembered by the gentleman from Jefferson that the idea of such a discrimination had certainly not come from the emancipationists. Whenever he believed that any proposed change was calculated to forward the views of the emancipationists, he would be found battling as hard against such change as any man in the convention. He was opposed to changing the system of voting in Kentucky that he had been so long accustomed to in relation to other than judicial officers. Yet while he would vote to retain the system, there were objections against it, but he doubted whether those objections could be removed without encountering greater difficulties than the ballot system presented. His friend from Jefferson, he thought, was mistaken when he said that the mode of voting by ballot had only been adopted in free states. The gentleman would find that it had been adopted in some of the slave states.

Mr. BULLITT said he did not intend that his remarks should extend to all the slave states.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Therefore this must be regarded, he supposed, as an attempt to introduce a change of the mode of voting for the purpose of letting in those men who wish to disturb the tenure of property in the state, and enabling them to accomplish their designs. He had witnessed the progress of elections in states where the ballot system was the constitutional mode, and he had seen its benefits. He had lived under the system of viva voce voting, and had seen its benefits, and he had witnessed evils under it. It gave to the capitalist, to the man of wealth an influence and a power, which he should wish to destroy, if by human ingenuity it could be accomplished. No man ought to have control over his neighbor, such as the gentleman from Jefferson so warmly repudiates. He had himself sometimes seen the influence that has been exerted over voters at elections. He had known, in one instance, a wealthy and influential man to wait upon a mechanic who had declared his intention to vote for him (Mr. Wickliffe) and say to him, if you cast that vote, I will take your work away from you. He had known another instance, where a friend and supporter of his was indebted more than the value of his whole property. This man was appealed to by letters, and when they failed to divert him from his purpose of voting according to his free will, for the man of his choice, he was visited personally by those who were interested and who were his creditors, who told him, if you cast that vote you must pay up your debts, you must surrender up your property. These were some of the evils attending the present system of voting. He had seen instances, also, under the ballot system, where an honest voter had been cheated out of his vote, and, therefore he had only risen for the purpose of stating to the gentleman and to his colleague that he had not been an advocate for changing the system of viva voce voting, to the ballot system generally, because he did not believe it was requisite in political elections, but merely to explain the motives which operated with the committee in inducing them to recommend its adoption in reference to the election of judicial officers. He had no doubt that the great mass of the community would feel no reluctance, no unwillingness, but on the contrary, would feel both pride and pleasure in declaring their sentiments viva voce at the polls; yet as he deemed it possible that there might be men who would wish to avoid incurring displeasure with the judge by concealing his vote, he desired to afford him an opportunity. The proposed amendment did not prevent any man who desired to do so, from avowing for whom he voted. Having said thus much, he would leave the question with the committee.

Mr. HARDIN said there was one difficulty resting upon his mind, in regard to the practical working of this system, which made it impossible for him to yield his assent to its adoption. As soon as the ballots were counted, they were destroyed. As soon as this was done, he desired to know how they were to ascertain how each man voted, and how it would be possible to carry out a contested election, and ascertain the party entitled to the seat. There had been instances, he had no doubt, where men desired to conceal their votes, but among the people generally, ninety nine out of a hundred were not afraid to look any man in the face, and vote their sentiments. They claimed that it was their right to do so, and no one should deprive them of the right.

For himself, as his worthy friend from Jefferson had said, he believed he would rather abandon the whole constitution than to see this feature introduced into it. It was the great excellence of the people of Kentucky, that they were not afraid to come up and vote for the men of their choice. He thought no difference ought to be made between the mode pursued for the election of governor, and of a judicial officer. The very fact of making a distinction, implies that the judge was considered to be corrupt, or that the people were afraid that they would act corruptly. He would never consent to any such invidious discrimination.

Mr. PRESTON said as he might, in some degree, assume the paternity of the resolution, which came before the committee, on the court of appeals report, although he had not intended to say a word, at present, on the subject, yet he felt it to be due to the committee, as well as to himself, that he should make a few remarks. Every day convinced him that legislative bodies were like individuals, and were to be influenced in the same manner, by the whim of a moment, or by the eloquence of the advocate of a particular proposition, and that they would run full tilt, one way or the other, as these influences moved them. He might be in error upon this subject, but it was one of great magnitude, and should not be met with a sneer, nor subjected to declamation, such as they had witnessed from the gentleman from Jefferson, who had indulged in an assault upon it. And he had noticed that that gentleman had met the approving smile of the gentleman from Nelson. If the system would give rise to all the evils which the gentleman predicted, then let it not be adopted. But such has not been its operation throughout the country. Most of the states of the confederacy vote by ballot, and if such evils flowed from the system, where were the evidences of the fact? Does observation confirm the assertion?

They ought not to reject the proposition without giving it mature consideration. Some gentlemen seemed to be of the opinion that the character of the people of Kentucky was derived from their system of voting, and that it was only to be maintained by preserving that system. He could see no reason why this should be so. Some seemed to take the evidences of our civilization and progress as the cause rather than the result of that civilization. They see no evil, rendered venerable by time, without esteeming it a benefit, no blemish that is not a beauty. They reminded him of an Irishman who having been thrown upon a desolate island, and beholding nothing but sterile shores, was miserable indeed, until at length he discovered where a gallows had been erected, and transported at the sight, exclaimed, "thank God, I now know I am in a civilized country."

The character of the people of Kentucky did not depend on the ballot system or upon any other mode of election; it rested upon no such frail tenure; it was based rather upon the character, the virtues, the worth, the intelligence of our hardy ancestors, those pioneers who first established here civilization and free institutions, than upon the mere existence of this or that system of voting.

But it was asked why not make the system of voting uniform; why make a discrimination? One thing was certain, that the chances of fraud under the viva voce system were multiplied according to the number of precincts into which the district was divided. In the city of Louisville there were this year, some seventeen candidates and the city was divided into eight wards, otherwise it would have been almost impossible to take the vote in a single day. The ballot would, if introduced, obviate this difficulty. The number of offices to be filled in a county at one election might be under this constitution as high as fifteen and a large number of candidates would offer for each, and unless the expenses should be greatly augmented or unless the precincts were multiplied and additional opportunity thereby afforded for the practice of fraud by double voting, the ballot system would be more convenient, and it was this very convenience, which was the main argument in its favor. The gentleman from Bourbon had drawn a graphic picture of election scenes where men were huddled together in barns and where tenants were compelled to vote according to the dictation of their landlords. Would gentlemen deny to the poor and the defenceless the opportunity of going to the polls and voting their sentiments quietly, without opening their ticket if they desire to do so?

Election by ballot seemed to have been stigmatized as an abolition measure. But he would ask whence did it emanate? The first time that he saw it proposed for adoption in Kentucky was in the pro-slavery convention that assembled at Frankfort in February last, which declared it to be one of their chief measures.

He did not believe that this question was one that would alter the character of the people of Kentucky. He thanked God their character was based upon a foundation too solid to be shaken by the mode of voting pursued by the citizens of this commonwealth. He believed they would now have an opportunity of trying the system; that it would be more convenient than that by viva voce in the local elections, and that it should not be heedlessly cast out of the house as if it were one that possessed such monstrous qualities that it would demolish the free institutions under which we live. The apprehension could only arise from an excited fancy that evils such as these could be produced by one or the other system of voting. He hoped that gentlemen would at least give to the subject a little calm reflection, and although he had no hope of carrying the measure, and attached less importance to the adoption of either mode, than many did, he would ask the convention to consider it more carefully, before they acted finally and conclusively in regard to the matter.

Mr. W. C. MARSHALL said, it always afforded him great pleasure to listen to the remarks of the gentleman from Louisville; but he apprehended that on this occasion the gentleman's views were influenced to some extent by the peculiar position which he occupied; and if the gentleman would take the trouble hereafter to read the speech that he had just delivered he believed he would find in it argument enough to satisfy himself that he was in a false position. What was it? He alluded to the description given by the gentleman from Bourbon, of barns filled with voters, brought in from the neighborhood, for the purpose of controlling the elections; and gave that as one of the strong arguments against viva voce voting. He would ask the gentleman if drilled forces were not brought into service under the ballot system? He would ask whether the vote given by ballot was not known from the very color of the ticket, and whether a man at the head of his column of parasites was not able to exert as much influence upon the election under the ballot as under the viva voce system?

The gentleman had spoken of the working of the ballot system in Louisville, and of the influence which a landlord might exert over his tenantry. He would tell the gentleman that the influence of the landlord was a healthy and moral influence, and in his judgment it was far better that that influence should be carried out at the polls.

There was another consideration. He, (Mr. Marshall,) lived in a part of the country where religion seemed to be the order of the day, and he prayed God to defend him from a system by which a man was taught to go smiling in the face of a candidate while about to strike him under the fifth rib. He liked to see a man come up boldly and declare his vote, and not practice a fraud upon his neighbor. He would say to the gentleman further, if this system should be carried out, what would become of the character of Kentucky? The gentleman declared that it was not based upon the system of voting. Why then did the gentleman want to cover it up? If the character of Kentucky was placed upon such a firm footing why cover it up?

Mr. PRESTON interposed to explain. He had said the character of Kentuckians was not based upon the mode of voting, and that the main question was one of convenience in taking the votes.

Mr. W. C. MARSHALL was very glad to hear the gentleman's explanation, for his understanding of the gentleman's remarks had been somewhat different. Still he would say, if it were a matter of convenience only, that could be accomplished by having the elections take place on the same day, he would ask the gentleman whether the same objections that he urged against the viva voce system were not equally applicable to the vote by ballot? It was innovation which the people did not require. It was, in his judgment, a reflection upon the candidate or upon the people themselves, and in either case the people must suffer. It proved that the gentleman was himself unwilling to go into the election of the judges, because he believed it wrong. He had himself made three speeches against the elective principle, but failed to convince a single individual. His constituents said, Billy go for the elective principle, and he folded his arms quietly in obedience to their will.

When the gentleman from Bourbon made his speech, every sentiment that he uttered found a response in his heart, but he said to himself the people desire a different system, and we are bound to yield to their wishes. The very sentiment that had been uttered by the gentleman, in maintenance of his views, struck at the tenure of office; and he could but remark how strange it was to see gentlemen who were sent here to do one thing doing another. If gentlemen would only look at their own speeches they would see it there indicated that the people desired the contrary of what they were doing. The gentleman spoke of leaders urging forward their dependent voters with whip in hand. Great God. He would ask him in all candor and frankness whether if a man designed to use such influence he could not do it under the one system as well as the other? He hoped the gentleman from Louisville would reconsider the course he was taking. And if he would but do that he would find that he was going counter to the popular will.

Mr. PRESTON said that after the lecture he had received from his friend, the laughing philosopher from Bracken, he almost doubted his own judgment, or at least his own recollection, of what he had said on the subject. For himself, he had not been driven by those popular storms into a port such as the gentleman described himself as having been compelled to put into under the pressure of public opinion, and he believed that such was the obstinacy of his disposition, that he should have tried more than three or four speeches on the subject of an elective judiciary, if he had once opposed it, and would have triumphed or fallen on the question. The gentleman however could turn his sails with a dexterity which he could never hope to equal.

He liberates every sail to the wind.

and upon such a subject as an elective judiciary—upon which the lives, liberties, fortunes and happiness of his constituency depended—he wears ship and steers away full tilt, with the largest majority that any member has received, until he is safely harboured in this convention. He did not know whether such facility of temper was, after all, so desirable; at least he would not attempt to imitate it. The gentleman from Bracken cheered on the gentleman from Bourbon who had thrown himself, sword in hand, before the venerable institutions of the past, determined to sustain or perish with them, defending the pass like Horatius at the bridge, but while he applauded him did not imitate his example, but sought shelter behind him. How did the gentleman manifest his consistency? He came forward and declared, in the first place, that he was opposed to an elective judiciary, that he was one of those who were in favor, originally, of the time-honored institutions under which our people have lived. Yet he was now prepared to go to the utmost extent to secure the adoption of the elective principle. That was the basis of the gentleman's consistency. And how did the gentleman further manifest his consistency? He declared that a system of tenantry was one of the best things on earth; and he considered the power exercised by the landlord over his tenantry to compel their votes admirable in its effects. He [Mr. P.] could not, for his own part, see the beauty of the system where a tenant was ordered to vote as his landlord directed. More than half the people of the United States now voted by ballot.—And yet, according to the argument of the gentleman, more than half the people of the United States were cowardly, trembling—and to use the language of the gentleman from Jefferson, “sheep stealing dogs”—and unworthy to be trusted. He appealed to the history of their common country, and asked the gentleman in all fairness, if he could conscientiously calumniate so large a portion of its citizens without cause? What was this system of landlord and tenant that the gentleman spoke of so approvingly? He recollected having a conversation with Mr. Bingham, of Philadelphia, on that subject. Mr. Bingham had been in England at the time when the subject of the reform bill was agitated in the house of commons and house of lords. Mr. Bingham said he met in society a nobleman who owned large estates that were occupied by a numerous tenantry. The nobleman enquired of him how the system of ballot voting was conducted in America; Mr. Bingham described to him the mode of proceeding. The Englishman seemed lost in astonishment. Said he, that is not possible. Not possible? Why impossible? Why, sir, a man's own tenantry may vote against him. Certainly, said Mr. Bingham, that is the very object of the thing. Well, remarked the nobleman, I could never go for a system that strikes at the relation which exists between landlord and tenant, and destroys every sentiment of loyalty and fidelity.

The gentleman from Bracken says he can see no benefit that can arise from the ballot system. Had the gentleman never observed in our state, the eagerness with which couriers hasten from one precinct to another when an election is going on, conveying news of the state of the polls up to a certain time. There sits the clerk, his book open, the votes counted, the state of the contest is known at a glance. The candidate who finds himself behind, says, it is necessary to rush up a few more voters: he spends five hundred dollars more in the corruption of voters; and that is the practical working of the system in excited contests in our state. Now, under the ballot system this would not occur.

If we were to go into this ballot system of voting, it would only be adopting that which a majority of the nation had already tried, and he could assure the gentleman of one thing, that those who had once adopted the system, had never gone back—had never abandoned it.—He would detain the committee no further than to invoke their attention to two or three things: first, the multitude of officers for whose election this convention was providing; secondly, that there would be but one day's election; thirdly, that it would be well to separate the judicial elections from the elections for other officers; and in addition to that, he considered it a matter that was entitled to some consideration, whether it would not be advisable to allow those who desired to avail themselves of the ballot system of voting, to do so at the local elections for judicial officers. He trusted that by the time the question came up in the house, the gentlemen composing the convention, would give to the subject a calm and impartial consideration.

The PRESIDENT disclaimed any idea that the rights of the master to the slave were dependent upon the preservation of the viva voce system of voting, or that they would be jeopardized by the adoption of the ballot system. That relation was secured by that regard for the great principle that no man's property should be taken without full compensation, which prevailed so broad-cast throughout this land, and did not depend upon the caveat system of voting. If it did so depend upon that, he would tell gentlemen that the emancipationists would soon know their strength, and would act upon it.—The fact that he had been five times elected to office by the votes of those who were his political opponents, was certainly sufficient to induce him to believe that the people were independent. No man had a greater cause to respect and believe in the independence of the people; but he had seen the men who had thus cast their votes, persecuted by their party and discountenanced for years. And there was a want of toleration in the land, in regard to the exercise of the right of suffrage. He was one of those who voted his sentiments at the polls, and in deliberative bodies, and he desired to say that he stood here in favor of the ballot.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE here, with the assent of the members of the committee on the court of appeals, withdrew the amendment, remarking that the ten minute rule was, perhaps, a restriction on the debate of the question, and it could again come up in the house, where no such rule prevailed.

Mr. DAVIS said he supposed it would take but a few moments for the fate of his forlorn hope to be decided, and he asked, therefore, that the question should now be taken on the substitute for the whole article which he had offered:

ARTICLE —.

Concerning the Judicial Department.

"Sec. 1. The judicial power of this commonwealth, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in one supreme court, which shall be styled the court of appeals, and in such inferior courts as the general assembly may, from time to time, erect and establish.

"Sec. 2. The court of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the state, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law.

"Sec. 3. The judges of the court of appeals shall hold their offices for the term of eight years, and until their successors shall be duly qualified, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly: Provided, however, That the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in such address, and on the journal of each house. They shall, at stated times, receive for their services an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law.

"Sec. 4. The court of appeals shall consist of four judges, any three of whom may constitute a court for the transaction of business. The judges shall, by virtue of their office, be conservators of the peace throughout the state.—The style of all process shall be, "the commonwealth of Kentucky." All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and conclude, "against the peace and dignity of the same."

"Sec. 5. That the governor of the commonwealth shall, from among the judges of the inferior courts, and such persons as shall have been judges thereof, nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint the judges of the court of appeals.

"Sec. 6. That the court of appeals shall appoint its clerk, who shall be a citizen of the state of Kentucky, and who shall hold his appointment for and during the term of years, subject to be removed by said court, upon specific charges, filed by the attorney general. And whenever there may be charges pending against the clerk, the said court shall appoint a clerk to perform the duties of the office for the time.

"Sec. 7. That all fees accruing for services rendered by the clerk of the court of appeals, shall be collected from the proper parties under the direction of the auditor of public accounts, and be paid into the treasury of the state, and said clerk shall receive for his compensation an annual salary $. The number, appointment, and compensation of his deputies, and the other necessary expenditures of his office, shall be regulated by law."

The question was then taken and the substitute rejected.

Mr. NUTTALL said, some time ago he had offered an amendment to the article, which had been apparently forgotten. He had no intention that it should be buried, and called for the question upon it now.

It was read as follows:

"Provided, however, That if any candidate for the office of judge of the court of appeals, or any of the circuit courts to be established in this commonwealth, shall engage in public speaking or treating, during his candidacy for such offices, or either of them, upon information, in writing, supported by the oaths of two or more respectable witnesses, to the attorney general of the state, he shall, in the event of the election of such candidate, thereupon cause to be issued from the clerk's office of the circuit court, at the seat of government, a caveat against such judge, which shall be returnable to the succeeding general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky, who shall try him according to the rules and regulations by this constitution provided for the trial of judges for other offences, and upon conviction thereof, he shall be adjudged disqualified from holding said office, and the governor shall not, before the trial nor after the conviction in such case, commission such judge."

The PRESIDENT enquired if the gentleman meant when half a dozen lawyers in a district were slandering and abusing a judge, he should not have the right to defend himself before the people?

Mr. MAYES suggested that this was in direct contradiction to the gentleman's position of not requiring any test or qualifications for office. The amendment was in effect declaring that the people had no right to elect the judge if he makes a speech to them.

Mr. NUTTALL said that with due deference to all other professions, he had always thought, that if any one more than another was entitled to the appellation of a high and dignified one, it was the legal profession. And so far from a judge being called upon to defend himself from the accusations of the lawyers, he believed the functionary would find in them his strongest protectors.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE then moved that the committee rise and report the article as amended to the house.

Mr. HARDIN moved to take up the article in relation to the circuit courts.

The motion was decided to be out of order, and after some conversation on the point of order involved, Mr. WICKLIFFE'S motion prevailed, and the committee rose and reported the article as amended to the house.

Pending the question on agreeing with the report of the committee,

The convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 1, 1849.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CLARKE, from the committee on the Legislative Department made the following report, which was referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered to be printed:

OF THE LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

ARTICLE —.

Sec. 1. The legislative power shall be vested in a house of representatives and senate, which together shall be styled the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky.

Sec. 2. The members of the house of representatives shall continue in service for the term of two years from the day of the general election, and no longer.

Sec. 3. Representatives shall be chosen on the first Monday in August, in every second year; and the mode of holding the elections shall be regulated by law.

Sec. 4. No person shall be a representative, who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States, and hath not attained to the age of twenty four years, and resided in this state two years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof in the county, town, or city, for which he may be chosen.

Sec. 5. The general assembly shall divide the several counties of this commonwealth into equal and convenient precincts, or may delegate such power to such county authorities as they may by law provide; and elections for representatives for the several counties entitled to representation, shall be held at the places of holding their respective courts, and in the several election precincts into which the counties may be divided: Provided, That when it shall appear to the legislature that any city or town hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such city or town, shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation, in both houses of the general assembly, which shall be retained so long as such city or town shall contain a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio, which may, from time to time, be fixed by law; and thereafter, elections for the county, in which such city or town is situated, shall not be held therein; but such city or town shall not be entitled to a separate representation, unless such county, after the separation, shall also be entitled to one or more representatives.

Sec. 6. Representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified voters therein. At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, and every eight years thereafter, provision shall be made by law, that in the year and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified voters of the state shall be made. The number of representatives shall, in the several years of making these enumerations, be so fixed, as not to be less than seventy five, nor more than one hundred; and they shall be apportioned for the eight years next following thus: Counties, cities, and towns, having more than two thirds, and less than the full ratio, shall have one representative; those having the full ratio, and a fraction less than two thirds over, shall have but one representative; those having the full ratio, and a fraction of more than two thirds over, shall have two representatives, and increase their number in the same proportion; counties having less than two thirds of the ratio, shall be joined to similar adjacent counties for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That if there be no such adjacent county, then such county having less than two thirds of the ratio, shall be united to that contiguous county having the smallest number of qualified voters; and the remaining representatives, if any, shall be allotted to those counties, cities, or towns, having the largest unrepresented fractions.

Sec. 7. The house of representatives shall choose its speaker, and other officers.

Sec. 8. Every free, white male citizen of the age of twenty one years, who has resided in the state two years, or in the county, town, or city, in which he offers to vote, one year next preceding the election, shall be a voter, but such voter shall have been, for sixty days next preceding the election, a resident of the precinct in which he offers to vote, and he shall cast his vote in said precinct, and not elsewhere. Voters, in all cases except treason, felony, breach or surety of the peace, shall be privileged from arrest during their attendance at, going to, and returning from, elections.

Sec. 9. Senators shall be chosen for the term of four years, and the senate shall have power to choose its officers biennially.

Sec. 10. At the first session of the general assembly, after this constitution takes effect, the senators shall be divided by lot, as equally as may be, into two classes. The seats of the first class shall be vacated at the end of two years, from the day of the election, and those of the second class at the end of four years, so that one half shall be chosen every two years; and when an additional member shall be added to the senate, he shall be annexed by lot, to one of these classes.

SEC. 11. The senate shall consist of not less than thirty, nor more than thirty eight members.

SEC. 12. The same number of senatorial districts shall, from time to time, be established by the general assembly as there may be senators allotted to the state, which shall be so formed, as to contain, as near as may be, an equal number of qualified voters, and so that no county shall be divided in the formation of a senatorial district, except such county shall be entitled, under the enumeration, to two or more senators.

SEC. 13. One senator for each district shall be elected, by the qualified voters therein, who shall vote in the precincts where they reside, at the places where elections are by law directed to be held.

SEC. 14. No person shall be a senator, who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States, who has not attained the age of thirty years, and who has not resided in this state six years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof, in the district for which he may be chosen.

SEC. 15. The first election for senators shall be general throughout the state, and at the same time that the election for representatives is held, and thereafter, there shall be a biennial election for senators to fill the places of those whose term of service may have expired.

SEC. 16. The general assembly shall convene on the first Monday in November, after the adoption of this constitution, and on the same day of every second year, unless a different day be appointed by law, and their session shall be held at the seat of government; but if the public welfare require, the governor may call a special session.

SEC. 17. Not less than a majority of the members of each house of the general assembly shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and shall be authorised by law, to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as may be prescribed thereby.

SEC. 18. Each house of the general assembly shall judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members; but a contested election shall be determined in such manner as shall be directed by law.

SEC. 19. Each house of the general assembly may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish a member for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member, but not a second time for the same cause.

SEC. 20. Each house of the general assembly shall keep and publish, weekly, a journal of its proceedings, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question, shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on their journal.

SEC. 21. Neither house, during the session of the general assembly, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which they may be sitting.

SEC. 22. The members of the general assembly shall severally receive from the public treasury a compensation for their services, which shall be three dollars a day during their attendance on, going to, and returning from the sessions of their respective houses: Provided, That the same may be increased or diminished by law; but no alteration shall take effect during the session at which such alteration shall be made, nor shall a session of the general assembly continue beyond sixty days, except by a vote of two thirds of each house; but this shall not apply to the first session held under this constitution.

SEC. 23. The members of the general assembly shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, breach or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest, during their attendance at the sessions of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same, and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

SEC. 24. No senator or representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, nor for one year thereafter, be appointed or elected to any civil office of profit under this commonwealth, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during the time such senator or representative was in office; except to such offices or appointments as may be filled by the election of the people.

SEC. 25. No person while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society, or sect, nor while he holds or exercises any office of profit under this commonwealth, or under the government of the United States, shall be eligible to the general assembly, except attorneys at law, justices of the peace, and militia officers: Provided, That attorneys for the commonwealth, who receive a fixed annual salary, shall be ineligible.

SEC. 26. No person who at any time may have been a collector of taxes, or public moneys for the state, or the assistant or deputy of such collector, shall be eligible to the general assembly, unless he shall have obtained a quietus, six months before the election, for the amount of such collection, and for all public moneys for which he may have been responsible.

SEC. 27. No bill shall have the force of a law, until, on three several days, it be read over, in each house of the general assembly, and free discussion allowed thereon, unless in cases of urgency, four fifths of the house, where the bill shall be depending, may deem it expedient to dispense with this rule.

SEC. 28. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives, but the senate may propose amendments as in other bills, provided that they shall not introduce any new matter under the color of an amendment which does not relate to raising revenue.

SEC. 29. The general assembly shall regulate, by law, by whom, and in what manner writs of election shall be issued, to fill the vacancies which may happen in either branch thereof.

SEC. 30. Divorces shall not be granted, save by courts of justice, in conformity to law.

SEC. 31. The credit of this commonwealth shall never be given or loaned in aid of any person, association, municipality, or corporation, without the concurrence of two thirds of each house of the general assembly.

SEC. 32. The general assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits, or failures in the revenue, or for expenses not provided for, but such debts, direct or contingent, singly or in the aggregate, shall not at any time exceed five hundred thousand dollars, and the moneys arising from loans, creating such debts, shall be applied to the purposes for which they are obtained or to repay such debts: Provided, That the state may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities are threatened, provide for the public defence.

SEC. 33. No act of the general assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted, on behalf of the commonwealth, except for the purposes mentioned in the 32d section of this article, unless provision be made therein to lay and collect an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest stipulated, and to discharge the debt within years; nor shall such act take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election, and shall have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it.

SEC. 34. No law enacted by the general assembly shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be expressed in the title.

SEC. 35. No law shall be revised or amended, by reference to its title, but in such case, the act revised or section amended shall be re-enacted and published at length.

SEC. 36. The general assembly shall have no power to pass special laws for individual benefit, unless a majority of two thirds of both houses concur therein.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. GARRARD offered the following resolution which lies over one day, under the rules:

Resolved, That the 29th rule of this convention be amended by inserting the words "and such amendments as may be offered" immediately after the word "amendments" in the last line of said rule.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The President announced the next business in order to be on the report of the committee of the whole on the article in relation to the court of appeals.

After a brief conversation it was agreed to take the question first on all the amendments which were verbal merely, or not involving any important principle, and they were concurred in.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE expressed the hope that the convention would not agree to strike out the words "of the United States" from the 8th section, which provides that "any citizen of the United States &c." shall be eligible to the office of judge. The word "citizen" he supposed meant the same thing; but Kentucky had not prescribed a mode to make citizens, other than that by the government of the United States; indeed, he doubted if they had the power to do so. He hoped therefore the convention would retain the expression in the article which but followed the precedents of other constitutions.

The question was taken and the convention refused to concur in the amendment by which those words had been stricken out in committee of the whole.

In the 12th section, a like amendment occurred to which the convention disagreed.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL intimated that he had prepared a substitute for the entire article which he wished to offer when the proper time came. He sent it to the secretaries desk, to be taken up when in order.

The secretary read it as follows:

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. The judicial power of this commonwealth, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in one supreme court, which shall be styled the court of appeals, and in such inferior courts as may be established by this constitution, or such as the general assembly may, from time to time, erect and establish.

SEC. 2. The court of appeals, except in cases otherwise directed by this constitution, shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the state, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this constitution, as may from time to time be prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. The judges of the court of appeals shall hold their offices for the term of six years, and until their successors are duly qualified; but for any reasonable cause, which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment, the governor shall remove any of them on the address of two-thirds of each house of the general assembly: Provided however, that the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in such address, and on the journals of each house. They shall, at stated times, receive for their services, an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law.

SEC. 4. The judges shall, by virtue of their office, be conservators of the peace throughout the state. The style of all process shall be—the commonwealth of Kentucky. All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name, and by the authority of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and conclude "against the peace and dignity of the same."

SEC. 5. There shall be elected, by the qualified voters of the state; one judge to be styled the chief justice of the state of Kentucky, and such associate judges as the legislature may direct; Provided, that it may be lawful for the legislature to lay the state off into districts, in each of which a judge or judges of the court of appeals may be elected.

SEC. 6. The judges of the court of appeals shall hold at least two sessions of the court in each year, and each session shall be held at the seat of government, until otherwise directed by law.

SEC. 7. No person shall be eligible to the office of judge of the court of appeals, who is under thirty, or over sixty five years of age, and who has not been, at the time of election, at least five years a citizen of the state of Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT said the course to be pursued would be to take up the article by sections, and when the measure was perfected by its friends it would be in order to act upon the substitute of the gentleman from Jessamine.

The 1st and 2d sections were accordingly read and passed without amendment.

The third section was then read.

Mr. HARDIN moved to strike out the words "which shall not be sufficient ground of impeachment."

Mr. HARDIN. I invite gentlemen to examine the constitution of the United States. There is no way to address a man out of office for any offence for which he may be impeached. In our constitution there are several incongruities. I will read the section on this subject:

"A competent number of justices of the peace shall be appointed in each county; they shall be commissioned during good behaviour, but may be removed on conviction of misbehaviour in office, or of any infamous crime, or on the address of two thirds of each house of the general assembly."

The convention will perceive that the power of removal extends beyond misbehaviour in office, and that you can remove by address for any thing for which you could by impeachment. You can remove a justice of the peace for felony, treason, or any crime of that description. I see no reason why when you come to address a man out of office, you exclude in the address what is the subject of impeachment. Any one may see the great difficulty which might grow out of it. The consequence will be, when you remove by address, it will be said, that is a subject of impeachment. I wish the legislature to have power to remove by address if the judge behave outrageously bad. Shall there be no way to remove him by address, no way to get at him but by impeachment? We know the delays, formalities, and ceremonies attending an impeachment. I wish the legislature to have the right to address out a man for any thing for which he could be impeached out. I can see why the power of addressing out of office should be more extensive than the power to impeach. It is no crime to be superannuated, yet the legislature should have power to remove by address. It is no crime to be so deaf as not to be able to hear a word, like Judge Duvall, who held his office as judge of the supreme court for ten years after, and was superannuated besides. It was no offence in Judge Heath of Baltimore to become insane, and yet congress could not remove him. It is important that the power to remove by address, should be more extensive than by impeachment, but that the power to remove by address should be excluded from the very offence for which you may impeach, I cannot understand. There are a thousand ways in which their conduct may be very wrong, and yet you cannot impeach them.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The committee transcribed this article from the present constitution, and if there is any thing wrong in it, our ancestors were guilty of it. If it needs correction, I am willing it should be done. I am inclined to enlarge the subject of impeachment, and to prescribe the offences for which an officer shall be impeached. I am extremely anxious to retain the power of impeachment, because it disqualifies a man from any office. I think this will meet the difficulty, "but for reasonable cause, the governor shall remove any of them on an address of two thirds of the general assembly." If no other gentleman does it, I shall, hereafter, move to specify the grounds for which a judge may be impeached.

The motion to strike out was agreed to.

Mr. HARDIN. I will now renew the same amendment that I made in committee of the whole, to strike out "two-thirds," and insert "a majority;" and on that question I shall call for the yeas and nays. I desire now to call the attention of the house to the third, fourth, and eighth articles of Judge Chase's impeachment. The third charge is thus:

"ARTICLE III.

"That, with intent to oppress and procure the conviction of the prisoner, the evidence of John Taylor, a material witness on behalf of the aforesaid Callender, was not permitted by the said Samuel Chase to be given in, on pretence that the said witness could not prove the truth of the whole of one of the charges contained in the indictment, although the said charge embraced more than one fact."

On this charge eighteen were against Judge Chase and sixteen for him.

The fourth charge is as follows:

"ARTICLE IV.

"That the conduct of the said Samuel Chase was marked, during the whole course of the said trial, by manifest injustice, partiality, and intemperance, viz:

"1. In compelling the prisoner's counsel to reduce to writing, and submit to the inspection of the court, for their admission or rejection, all questions which the said counsel meant to propound to the above named John Taylor, the witness.

"2. In refusing to postpone the trial, although an affidavit was regularly filed, stating the absence of material witnesses on behalf of the accused; and although it was manifest, that, with the utmost diligence, the attendance of such witnesses could not have been procured, at that term.

"3. In the use of unusual, rude, and contemptuous expressions towards the prisoner's counsel; and in falsely insinuating that they wished to excite the public fears and indignation and to produce that insubordination to law, to which the conduct of the judge did, at the same time, manifestly tend:

"4. In repeated and vexatious interruptions of the said counsel, on the part of the said judge, which, at length, induced them to abandon their cause and their client, who was thereupon convicted and condemned to fine and imprisonment:

"5. In an indecent solicitude, manifested by the said Samuel Chase, for the conviction of the accused, unbecoming even a public prosecutor, but highly disgraceful to the character of a judge, as it was subversive of justice."

On that charge, also, there were eighteen against and sixteen for him.

"ARTICLE VIII.

"And whereas a mutual respect and confidence between the government of the United States and those of the individual states, and between the people and those governments, respectively, are highly conducive to that public harmony, without which there can be no public happiness, yet the said Samuel Chase, disregarding the duties and dignity of judicial character, did at a circuit court, for the district of Maryland, held at Baltimore in the month of May, one thousand eight hundred and three, pervert his official right and duty to address the grand jury, then and there assembled, on the matters coming within the province of the said jury, for the purpose of delivering to the said grand jury an intemperate and inflammatory political harangue, with intent to excite the fears and resentment of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland against their state, government, and constitution, a conduct highly censurable in any, but peculiarly indecent and unbecoming in a judge of the supreme court of the United States, and moreover that the said Samuel Chase, then and there, under pretence of exercising his judicial right to address the said grand jury, as aforesaid, did, in a manner highly unwarrantable, endeavor to excite the odium of the said grand jury, and of the good people of Maryland against the government of the United States, by delivering opinions, which, even if the judicial authority were competent to their expression, on a suitable occasion in a proper manner, were at that time and as delivered by him, highly indecent, extra-judicial and tending to prostitute the high judicial character with which he was invested, to the low purpose of an electioneering partizan.

And the house of representatives, by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter, any further articles or other accusation, or impeachment against the said Samuel Chase, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the said articles, or any of them, and of offering proof to all and every of the aforesaid articles, and to all and every other articles, impeachment or accusation, which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said Samuel Chase may be put to answer the said crimes and misdemeanors, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials and judgments may be thereupon had and given, as are agreeable to law and justice."

The vote stood, on the eighth charge, nineteen against him, and fifteen for him.

I invite gentlemen to read that charge as a literary curiosity, and also the address to the grand jury of Baltimore, for such a philippic was never given in the world. They are as follows:

"Copy of the conclusion of a charge delivered and read from the original manuscript at a circuit court of the United States, holden in the city of Baltimore, on Monday the 2d day of May, 1803, by Samuel Chase, one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States.

"Before you retire, gentlemen, to your chamber to consider such matters as may be brought before you, I will take the liberty to make a few observations; which I hope you will receive as flowing only from my regard to the welfare and prosperity of our common country.

"It is essentially necessary at all times, but more particularly at the present, that the public mind should be truly informed; and that our citizens should entertain correct principles of government, and fixed ideas of their social rights. It is a very easy task to deceive or mislead the great body of the people, by propagating plausible, but false doctrines; for the bulk of mankind are governed by their passions, and not by reason.

"Falsehood can be more readily disseminated than truth, and the latter is heard with reluctance if repugnant to popular prejudice. From the year 1776, I have been a decided and avowed advocate for a representative, or republican form of government, as since established by our state and national constitutions. It is my sincere wish that freemen should be governed by their representatives, fairly and freely elected by that class of citizens, described in our bill of rights, "who have property in, a common interest with, and an attachment to, the community."

"The purposes of civil society are best answered by those governments, where the public safety, happiness, and prosperity are best secured, whatever may be the constitution or form of government; but the history of mankind (in ancient and modern times) informs us "that a monarchy may be free, and that a republic may be a tyranny." The true test of liberty, is in the practical enjoyment of protection to the person and the property of the citizen, from all enquiry. Where the same laws govern the whole society without any distinction, and there is no power to dispense with the execution of the laws; where justice is impartially and speedily administered, and the poorest man in the community may obtain redress against the most wealthy and powerful, and riches afford no protection to violence; and where the person and property of every man are secure from insult and injury; in that country the people are free. This is our present situation. Where law is uncertain, partial, or arbitrary; where justice is not impartially administered to all; where property is insecure, and the person is liable to insult and violence, without redress by law, the people are not free, whatever may be their form of government. To this situation, I greatly fear we are fast approaching!

"You know, gentlemen, that our state and national institutions were framed to secure to every member of the society, equal liberty and equal rights; but the late alteration of the federal judiciary by the abolition of the offices of the sixteen circuit judges, and the recent change in our state constitution, by the establishing of universal suffrage, and the further alteration that is contemplated in our state judiciary (if adopted) will, in my judgment, take away all security for property and personal liberty.—The independence of the national judiciary, is already shaken to its foundation, and the virtue of the people can alone restore it. The independence of the judges of this state will be entirely destroyed, if the bill for the abolition of the two supreme courts should be ratified by the next general assembly. The change of the state constitution, by allowing universal suffrage, will, in my opinion, certainly and rapidly destroy all protection to property, and all security to personal liberty; and our republican constitution will sink into a mobocracy, the worst of all possible governments.

"I can only lament, that the main pillar of our state constitution, has already been thrown down by the establishment of universal suffrage. By this shock alone, the whole building totters to its base, and will crumble into ruins, before many years elapse, unless it be restored to its original state. If the independency of your state judges, which your bill of rights wisely declares "to be essential to the impartial administration of justice, and the great security to the rights and liberties of the people," shall be taken away by the ratification of the bill passed for that purpose, it will precipitate the destruction of your whole state constitution; and there will be nothing left in it, worthy the care or support of freemen.

"I cannot but remember the great and patriotic characters, by whom your state constitution was framed. I cannot but recollect that attempts were then made in favor of universal suffrage; and to render the judges dependant upon the legislature. You may believe, that the gentlemen who framed your constitution, possessed the full confidence of the people of Maryland, and that they were esteemed for their talents and patriotism, and for their public and private virtues. You must have heard that many of them held the highest civil and military stations, and that they, at every risk and danger, assisted to obtain and establish your independence. Their names are enrolled on the journals of the first Congress, and may be seen in the proceedings of the convention that framed our form of government. With great concern I observe, that the sons of some of these characters have united to pull down the beautiful fabric of wisdom and republicanism, that their fathers erected!

"The declarations, respecting the natural rights of man, which originated from the claim of the British parliament to make laws to bind America in all cases whatsoever; the publications, since that period, of visionary and theoretical writers, asserting that men, in a state of society, are entitled to exercise rights which they possessed in a state of nature; and the modern doctrines of our late reformers, that all men, in a state of society, are entitled to enjoy equal liberty and equal rights, have brought this mighty mischief upon us; and I fear that it will rapidly progress, until peace and order, freedom and property, shall be destroyed. Our people are taught as a political creed, that men, living under an established government, are nevertheless entitled to exercise certain rights which they possessed in a state of nature; and also, that every member of this government is entitled to enjoy an equality of liberty and rights.

"I have long since subscribed to the opinion, that there could be no rights of man in a state of nature, previous to the institution of society; and that liberty, properly speaking, could not exist in a state of nature. I do not believe that any number of men ever existed together in a state of nature without some head, leader or chief, whose advice they followed, or whose precepts they obeyed. I really consider a state of nature as a creature of the imagination only, although great names give a sanction to a contrary opinion. The great object for which men establish any form of government, is to obtain security to their persons and property, from violence; destroy the security to either, and you tear up society by the roots. It appears to me that the institution of government is really no sacrifice made, as some writers contend, to natural liberty, for I think that previous to the formation of some species of government, a state of liberty could not exist. It seems to me that personal liberty and rights, can only be acquired by becoming a member of a community, which gives the protection of the whole to every individual. Without this protection it would, in my opinion, be impracticable to enjoy personal liberty or rights. From hence I conclude that liberty, and rights, (and also property) must spring out of civil society, and must be forever subjected to the modification of particular governments. I hold the position clear and safe, that all the rights of man can be derived only from the conventions of society, and may with propriety be called social rights. I cheerfully subscribe to the doctrine of equal liberty and equal rights, if properly explained. I understand by equality of liberty and rights, only this, that every citizen, without respect to property or station, should enjoy an equal share of civil liberty; an equal protection from the laws, and an equal security for his person and property. Any other interpretation of these terms, is in my judgment, destructive of all government and all laws. If I am substantially correct in these sentiments, it is unnecessary to make any application of them, and I will only ask two questions. Will justice be impartially administered by judges dependant on the legislature for their continuance in office, and also for their support? Will liberty or property be protected or secured, by laws made by representatives chosen by electors, who have no property in, a common interest with, or attachment to, the community?"

He was found guilty on two of the charges preferred against him, by a vote of eighteen to sixteen, and on the eighth there were nineteen for conviction and fifteen for acquittal. Any gentleman who will read these charges, will see that no more flagrant conduct has been manifested on the bench since the days of Judge Jeffries. The effort of Judge Chase was to punish any, the slightest expression, of disrespect to the President, or his family, or his cabinet. The administration of Mr. Adams was particularly marked. It was intended to perpetuate his power. He succeeded General Washington, and he commenced a system to perpetuate his power, and finally perhaps, to end in the subversion of the government. He had a pretence for a war against France and a large standing army, when there was no prospect of war at all. Then, as part and parcel of the same measure, he had an alien law, to enable him to send out of the country any man who was troublesome to him. In addition to that, he had a law to indict and punish a man at pleasure, for any word spoken disrespectfully of the President of the United States, his family, or his cabinet. For that, many men were made to suffer, and among others was a gentleman from Vermont, (Matthew Lyon,) who afterwards represented the state of Kentucky in the congress of the United States. Part and parcel of the same was a system of direct taxation, and also of indirect taxation in the shape of excise. His standing army, his alien and sedition law, and his system of internal taxation, together with such men as judge

Chase, constituted a machinery by which he calculated to perpetuate his power and subvert the government of the United States.

There was a great deal of virtue in public sentiment, and there my worthy friend from Bourbon will find the public voice expressed, was most noble and honorable to the American character. From one end of this continent to the other there was a voice raised against him and his measures, and the public sentiment, notwithstanding the lever of his power, his large army, his alien and sedition law, and his whole system of excise and taxation, hurled him from power. The republican party, as it was then called, did intend to make an example of judge Chase, because he deserved it; and they meant to make this example just as the whig party in England had made one of that tyrant Jeffries. Articles of impeachment were preferred against him by an overwhelming majority fresh from the republican ranks, and each article of impeachment was voted on by the house of representatives, and carried by a majority of two to one, and this was thought enough to authorize his conviction. The senate held their terms for six years, and the New England States had then as they have now a great disproportion of power in the senate, for even the smallest of them are sovereignties, and have an equal power in the senate with the larger states. There was, as I said the other day, a small federal party in the senate, and if I said any thing on that occasion offensive in relation to the powdered heads of these gentlemen and their affected nobility, I will take it back; but it was literally true. They lacked the ribbons and the star, and that was all; they could not even board in the city, but must go to Georgetown and ride in their splendid carriages, so brilliant that when the sun struck upon them they gleamed as when the sun on the surrounding hills of Utica fell on the burnished arms of Caesar's soldiers.

As I said, on the third charge, eighteen of these senators were against Judge Chase, and sixteen for him, and on the fourth charge, the same number eighteen to sixteen, on the last there was a falling off of one of those that were for him, and the vote stood nineteen against, and fifteen for him. He lived and died on the bench, an example to the world of judicial tyranny, and a proof of the impracticability of impeaching a judge. Now my colleague thinks the acquittal of judge Chase was right. On that subject as well as some others Nelson county is divided. I will not say who is right, but I will declare that I differ from him in opinion. The honorable gentleman said there was a man by the name of John Quincy Adams who voted for judge Chase to the end. Do you know the history of John Quincy Adams? He was the supporter of his father to the end, and of judge Chase, at the time of his trial. But a year or two afterward he got the benefit of a spring plank and turned a summerset to the republicans, but this was not before judge Chase was tried. The gentleman said I supported John Q. Adams. I did it with tears in my eyes, and I had afterward occasion to tell him, in a speech which I made in congress in 1835, I had supported him, but if the Lord would forgive me for it, I would never do it again. That speech was published and copies were sent to my friends over this state.

Mr. DAVIS, I trust the gentleman will not make any more references to summersets on this floor.

Mr. HARDIN, very well, I will not, but I am sure it would not hit my honorable friend from Bourbon if I should. I do not know to what the gentleman alludes. But to resume, I supported John Quincy Adams' election, because his defeat was based on proving bargain, sale, and corruption against six or seven of the best men in Kentucky, and I was determined to stand up for Kentucky. Another reason for standing up for Kentucky, was, at the time I entered upon political life, thirty nine years ago, we had no such parties as whig and democrat, and every one knows that I could not join the federal ranks on account of the cloves and powder. On the death of governor Madison I was against the new election, and also in favor of judge Clark, because I thought he was right. When the question came up in relation to breaking the old judges by address, I was against the address and also against the new court.

Afterwards I fought in the whig ranks, and if any man in my party has fought faithfully, I have, and I have been making battle for it ever since. I believe their great doctrines are substantially right; I believe the labor of America must be protected against the pauper labor of Europe. I believe in rotation in office, for this gives every man a chance, and it is the finest curb ever put into the mouth of those in office. I never have wavered, and if the gentleman from Bourbon thinks I alluded to him, I did not; he is as firm as the rock of Gibraltar which cannot be battered down by a popgun or a pocket pistol.

It will be no labor to trace my position. That has been so traced that any man can see, and read it. But sir, I do not attempt to trace the position of my honorable colleague. He has the advantage of me in that particular. If I were asked in what part of the Heavens the Aurora Borealis dwelleth, how could I tell?

As the poet says:

"Like the Borealis race
That flits 'ere ye can point its place."

I repeat again that I went for Adams because they endeavored to prove bargain, sale, and corruption, on six or seven men of my state. If my country is about to go to war, I will prevent it if I can, but if she gets into war, I will help her. This is the manner in which I acted during the late war with Mexico. If a man, living in another state, should say that six or seven men in Kentucky had sold themselves, I should hardly stop to inquire; I should go for Kentucky in a moment.

I extremely regret to have any difficulty with any gentleman. I regretted the speech of my honorable colleague a few days since. I attack no gentleman, and I do not intend to do so, but I will defend myself. I have been a consistent whig and intend to die so; but I appeal to the democrats, if I have not fought them honorably, if I have ever treated them with disrespect. One reason, among others, why I struck for a convention, was the practice of the governors of Kentucky, in filling all the offices with none but whigs. I believe the offices should be distributed without reference to politics. I believe the result would be that when the elections of the country were thrown into the hands of the people, those elections would be without party feeling. I saw that the power and patronage were getting into the hands of the whigs, and I struck for a convention. I saw that three or four governors more would root out all the democrats as clean as the diggers of ginseng dug it up, and carried it off to China. I cannot see the principle that requires two thirds. We are a government of the people. In all our operations the government is based upon the hypothesis that the people are competent to govern; and if competent to govern, how are they competent to govern? Why, by majorities, and every government of a minority is a tyranny, call it by what name you will. I know that the honorable delegate from Bourbon said that he could not trust the people. I know they sometimes run off with a great deal of feeling; but whom shall we trust? Are we to trust the appointing power in the hands of the governor? Surely not. We have tried that, and it has failed. Are we to trust it in the hands of the members of the legislature? God forbid. I do not know that I very well understand the course which my friend from Bourbon pointed out; but I think we once had a practice in this state similar to that which he recommended, and if so, I have a deep-rooted objection to it. We know that the state of Kentucky has been scandalized by the sale of the sheriff's and clerk's offices. In two thirds of the cases, the clerks of the circuit courts have bought their offices. General Allen was made clerk of Green county in 1793, and the report was that he sold the office to a man named Jack Barret. The judge appointed Jack Barret, his vendee, and the office has been held by one or the other for the period of fifty seven years. How was it in Hardin county? Ben. Helm was elected clerk in 1797, and Mr. Hayercraft, the present incumbent, when a boy, was brought into his office and raised there, and a very pretty boy he was. Mr. Helm had a niece as pretty as he. They wooed and courted, and at last he married Sally Helm. Ben. Helm, the uncle of Sally, resigned, and seemed to give Hayercraft up the office. John Helm, the father of Sally, at the age of eighty, died. In his will he distributed his property among his children, but he said, "I charge Sally with $3,000, and my brother Ben can tell what became of the money." The fair and literal meaning of which is that he bought the office for his daughter, from his brother Ben. We have in Nelson as fair a clerk as any in the world—Mr. Slaughter—and the report is that thirty two years ago, his father gave two thousand dollars for the office. Now, that embraces the three clerkships in the counties where I practice law. In the county of Bullitt, it is reported that Noah Summers bought George Pope out; and in the county of Spencer, it is also said the county court clerk's office was likewise sold. I do not know whether the clerk of Marion—

Mr. KELLY. I will not permit any such charges to be made in my presence against a dead brother.

Mr. HARDIN. Now, the gentlemen says he will not permit any charge to be made against his dead brother. I would be very loath to make any charges upon his father, or his brother. I was speaking in reference to clerkships being sold like horses in the street.

The sheriff of Marion county advertised his office, and it was bid for like horses in the streets. One man bid eight hundred dollars for it, and although willing to give bond for himself, was not for the high sheriff, and it was put up again for a second time, and sold for one hundred and ten dollars less. The high sheriff sued the first bidder, and the defendant engaged myself and colleague for the purpose of defending him, but I at any rate wanted to use it for a political speech, and would have given a bonus of ten dollars, rather than not to have made the speech, but the suit was withdrawn.

Where then are you to vest the appointing power? In the courts? Do we not know that it is a general practice for them to select the members of their own family for these offices? I ask with all possible respect towards the judges, do you know of a single instance in which a new county has been made, and a clerk appointed, that the judge did not appoint some member of his own family to the office? If there has been such an instance, it has escaped my observation. Where then is the appointing power to be vested? Is it to remain where it is? Surely not. Is it to remain with the judges as to the clerks? Surely not. Is it to remain with the governor, when we have seen how it has been exercised, during the last ten or fifteen years. Certainly not; because it will be the source of every species of intrigue and favoritism. Shall the members of the house of representatives appoint state officers? Surely not; for it will be a source of outrageous corruption. Shall it be given to the members from each county? Surely not; for they would soon be selling these appointments, as the members of the parliament of Great Britain do.

Now as to this branching business of the court of appeals, I wish here to submit a few remarks. I am against it altogether, and I will declare now, as I have frequently done, that I have been before the people in one way or another for some thirty nine years, and I have never heard it once demanded by the public sentiment. The court of appeals is the court of the state, and there is a fitness in its being held at the capital of the state. The governor and all the state officers reside here, and the people are in the habit of resorting here to transact their business with the government. It was necessary, therefore, to the symmetry of the operations of our government that the court being for the state at large should hold its sessions wherever was the seat of government. But we were told by gentlemen from the southern and southwestern portions of the state, that the people desire it to be branched. I have never heard the people say a word on the subject, but I will say that the lawyers want it. And in that I do not think I am mistaken, nor do I intend any disrespect whatever to the lawyers when I say it. It is an honorable profession, and one that controls, in a great degree, public sentiment, and one also that, from time to time, has done a great deal towards saving this state from anarchy and confusion. But how are the people to be benefitted? Why, says one gentleman, it is a matter of great importance that the lawyer who argues a case in the court below, must come up and argue it in the court above. Could not the lawyer write out his argument and send it here? Is it not the every day practice for lawyers who live as far away even as Hickman county to write out their arguments and send them up to the court here? I tell you a well written argument is of more weight than the best viva voce one ever made in court. There is the only place where the ballot box is preferable. It is no inconvenience for these lawyers to send their arguments and records here—people are continually coming here from every county, and there is scarce a week in the year when an opportunity will not thereby be offered of sending them. But supposing that there were the four branches of the court established, I ask if it will administer to the convenience of more people, than would be the case if all the sessions of the court were held here? Suppose one of the branches to be located at Mountsterling, and there my friend over the way declares it must be, and there, I think from its central location, it ought to be.

Mr. APPERSON. The gentleman is mistaken, I never said so.

Mr. HARDIN. But you think so, and we all know that it is a central point, and that in all probability, if the court is branched, it will go there. Now is it not more convenient for a majority of the people of the northern district, down to the mouth of the Kentucky, and up the Ohio to come here, than to ride along on horseback, through the mud, to Mountsterling—and the court will be either there or at Owingsville, if there is to be four districts—and if there is three, it will be at Paris. Is it not more convenient for that people to come here, especially when most of them will have other business to transact here? Well, suppose the branch in the next district to be held either at Harrodsburgh or Danville, I ask if it would not be more convenient for the people of Shelby, Hardin, Trimble, Oldham, Jefferson, Bullitt, Spencer and Nelson to come to this place than to go to either of the others? I should like to see you (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) riding through the mud just to pay you for your advocacy of this proposition of branching. Suppose that the branch in the next district should be held at Greensburgh, Munfordsville, or Glasgow, would it be more convenient for the people of Breckinridge, Daviess, Ohio, and Meade to go to either of those places than to come here? Then, I ask my friend from Daviess, will Mahomet go to the mountain, or the mountain go to Mahomet?

Mr. TRIPLETT. We will divide it.

Mr. HARDIN. Is it not easier to come here? Packets are running every day from where the gentleman lives to Louisville, and when the railroad is completed, from thence to Frankfort, in two or three hours. Or if not by railroad, there is a good turnpike and slack-water navigation, rendering it altogether more convenient to come here than to go to either of those other places. In the next district the branch would probably go to the town of Princeton, which would be its centre. I ask the gentleman from Henderson,

(Mr. Dixon) if he would not as soon come here, as he could very conveniently by water, as to go to Princeton? And will it not be extremely inconvenient to the judges, men of advanced years, generally between forty and sixty—for even now the most eligible men for the office are over fifty years of age—to hold a term of ten weeks at Mountsterling, next at Danville, and next at Greensburgh, supposing these to be the points of location. Would it not be extremely oppressive upon them, to be obliged to ride on horseback, through the mud, if it was muddy, or through the inclemency of the weather, if it was inclement, from Mountsterling to Princeton, a distance of near three hundred miles.

How long would it take to finish the business at the branches? The court finished its business here in about 110 days, but I venture to say that they will have to sit eight, nine, or ten weeks at each of these branches—say eight weeks; that would take eight months in the year to hold the sessions alone, of the court. There could be no mistake about it, and for the reason that the business before them would be doubled, and as I think, trebled. Gentlemen have said it would bring justice to the door of every man, or in one gentleman's language, it would bring Mahomet to the mountain. I do not know about its bringing justice to every man's door, but I do know it will bring more cases into the court. I have looked over the docket of the court, and I find that there are a set of gentlemen who practice here—some come here of course, in self-defence—whose every effort is to get some error inserted into the record so that they may bring their causes up to the court of appeals, instead of fighting fair, face to face. It reminds me of the fashion of the governor's appointments, of making two or three appointments out of one. It is a fashion now, of appointing a judge of the court of appeals from the circuit courts, and then appointing another circuit judge in his place, thus making two appointments out of one. These lawyers have the same fashion of getting an error or blunder into the record, that they may have a pretence for appealing, and thus making two causes out of one. In examining the docket, to see who these lawyers are, who thus took two mouthfuls out of a case, I find that two of them who are most excellent lawyers, sharp, keen, shrewd men, who can see a round ninepence across the Mississippi at Plumb point, without the benefit of a telescope—out of fifty lawyers, bring up more than half of the causes here. And why do they do it? Just to make two fees out of one. They also delay the circuit courts. I have argued a case before a court and jury, and one of these court of appeals gentlemen has worried the court the whole day, taking down evidence, and yet so distorting and garbling it, that the case will not appear in the court of appeals as it did in the court below, and by that means the judgment is reversed. I hazard nothing in saying that the branching system will double, if not treble the business of the appellate court, and I do not believe that they will be able to sit in each district, more than once in each year. And the very moment the docket is large, cases will be brought up on the merest pretences in the world, just for the sole purpose of delay. Delays will then be secured for one or two years, while under the present system, the delays are not more than six months. Business will then get so clogged up that it will be impossible to get through with it, and the result will be that the legislature will have to raise the amount for which writs of error or appeals shall be taken. Now any case over which the circuit court has jurisdiction, may be brought up to the appellate court, by an appeal, or writ of error; but such will be the increase of business, under the branching system, that the court will not be able to get through with it, and it will have to be restricted by increasing the amount in controversy, on the suit on which an appeal may be taken. Gentlemen have said, if justice is to be had, why not let it reach alike, the door of each and every man. I answer, that branching the court, will not increase the means for attaining justice, but it will furnish facilities for the most manifest and flagrant injustice. It will retard justice, by increasing the opportunities of ingenious lawyers to make two causes out of one. One gentleman has gone so far as to say, abolish the court of appeals, if you will not increase the facilities of getting justice. I say the court of appeals is only important in one point of view, and that is, to produce uniformity of decisions. All litigation must stop at some point, and whether it stops in the appellate court or the circuit court, in respect to the great quantum of justice, or injustice done, it makes no difference. The only object of a higher court was, by its review, to secure uniformity of decision. When our lives or our liberties are at stake, we stop in the court below, and why do we come to the court of appeals, only when our property, but vile trash at best, is at stake? Just that we may secure uniformity of decision in the courts below, throughout the whole length and breadth of the land. The idea that every man must bring his case to the court of appeals, is entirely fallacious. There is no necessity for it, and it will double and treble the expenses of justice.

But there is another reason why I oppose this proposition to branch the court, and that is the increased expense. It now costs about $5107 per annum to pay the judges and all the expenses of the court. It is, sometimes a little above or a little below that amount, but that is the fair average. Now when you get four judges on the bench—and you will never get a man of fifty or sixty years of age to ride from Mt. Sterling to Princeton, and hold four courts a year in all seasons of the year, for less than $2000 or $2500 per annum—say $2000 a year each—that will cost $8000. Then you must have a room fitted up, a clerk's office to build in each district, costing in all $1000 perhaps, for each branch. Then you must have book presses and records for each, and incidental expenses amounting very near to what it now is. I hazard nothing therefore, in saying that this article in our constitution will double, nay treble the expenses of this one branch of our jurisprudence. I have no individual interest, none in the world in this matter. When I came here, I came in the old fashioned way on horse back, and wherever the branches may be held if I travel to them it will be in the same way. In forming these districts the effect would often be to divide the business of the counties—and to throw one part of it into one district and the other into another district—and thus the same lawyers be forced to attend the court in both districts.

I am in favor of the principle of ineligibility and always have been. Why was it, I appeal to the whigs of the legislature, that we should go for one term for the presidency? Why was it we would not permit the president by the influence of the patronage and appointing power his official station gave him, to look to a re-election for office? Because we were aware that it must influence him in the administration of the government, and in the next place because it would give him so much the vantage ground over any who chose to compete with him. Does not the same argument apply to the judge of the court? You put him in office for eight years—either as a judge of the circuit or of the appellate courts—the same principle applies to both. Suppose a judge having jurisdiction over ten counties, looks forward to a re-election—what then? Perhaps the lives of ten men may be in the palm of his hand at the very time, and they may belong to powerful and wealthy families, because they are the very ones, your hotspurs, who commit these crimes. Perhaps too he may have the liberties of some twenty or thirty others in his hands, one half of them vagabonds stealing about the country, and there may be besides a thousand civil causes before him. Suppose him to be as upright as Aristides himself and as honest, would not this power in his hands have an effect on the voters, whether the ballot or the viva voce system was adopted. It is a lever of power that cannot be trusted in the hands of any man, where he has an inducement to exercise it. The position of the incumbent member of Congress is worth fifteen per cent in votes in the canvass, and the position of a judge who is running for a second term will be worth full fifty per cent. Go to Mississippi, and witness its operations there. Judge Colter, a whig, has been re-elected repeatedly to the circuit court, in a district strongly democratic, and they have never been able to defeat him. Judge Sharky has been elected from the middle district and he is the chief justice. He is a whig and his district is democratic by 4000, and yet no man has ever been able to come nearer than 2200 or 3000 votes of him. Why, although he is an able and upright judge, and one whom Mississippi should be proud of, because his station is a lever that gives him tremendous power. The honorable gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston), who claims the paternity of the ballot proposition, says that the position of the president and a circuit judge is not analogous. I say that he has more power in his theatre, the court, than the president of the United States in his theatre. The sheriffs, jailors, and constables are all cap in hand to him, because their accounts are to be allowed by him. And there is also a class of lawyers who are cap in hand to him. I know, and I appeal to every gentleman here, if it is not the fact, that the lawyer who is seen hand in hand with the judge, is the very man who invites all the business. And why? Because the litigants believe him to be in favor with the judge, and the judge with him, and though both may be honest, yet it invites business to the lawyer, although his legal talents may not deserve it. And I appeal to the gentleman from Green, (Mr. Lisle), who although he has not as yet made a speech here, I know to be one of the most intellectual gentlemen in the house, as gentlemen will find out when he does speak—if he did not live in a town where the judge of the court had three sons, lawyers, and one brother-in-law—the clerk had a son and a son-in-law, lawyers, and if they did not finally exclude all others from practice in that court? Litigants went to them under dread of the judge and clerk, and that drove other lawyers from that bar. And they drove also from that bar, a gentleman who, considering his opportunities, is one of the greatest men of the age. It cannot be otherwise. The judge will have this influence, and that too without being corrupt. I remember what judge Bibb told me when I received my license. Said he, it is not enough for you to get a license from the judge, you must get one also from the people. I said I would try to do so. Said he, you must bear in mind never to quarrel with the judge, and always if possible, appear to be on familiar terms with him. Why? Said I. Because, he replied, it invites business to you, and a contrary course will drive it away from you, if you are ever so competent.

I want the judge to have no power beyond what the constitution and the laws give him, and I want to give him no temptation to swerve from his duty. Why says the gentleman, he should be voted for by ballot, lest he might exert his power upon some voter who had exercised independently his right of suffrage. This is an additional reason, and a confession that the judge should not be re-eligible. But I have another reason. When two men become candidates for office, let them be on the same footing. Do not clothe one of them in his black robes, to look wise and sapient, in all his power. You know how wise and dignified they look. Take a lawyer from the bar and put him on the bench, and he becomes a most dignified character, and generally puts on two or three pair of spectacles to look deeper into the books than any other man. And put him in a position to electioneer before the people, and they will wonder almost how such a man come to get into the world. Let him come before the people as he has got to come on the day of judgment, without his robes of office, and like the man who competes with him for the office.

Nothing in the world so purifies and clarifies the political atmosphere as rotation in office; give no man a life estate in office. What is the principle that fostered the growth of the Roman republic until from a small city they grew to a power that overran the world. It was rotation in office—that no man who filled an office for the first year should be re-eligible the second. That principle was first broken in upon by Caius Marius, and from that day may be dated the downfall of the Roman republic. You purge your political atmosphere by rotation in office. You tell your aspiring young men, pursue your studies and come on, for the public stations are open to you, and you are not to be placed under the disadvantage of competing with the man who has a thousand litigants depending upon him. It is said that we should not make him ineligible unless we increase his term of office. Is not eight years long enough? We know that it is often necessary to take the old trees out of the forest, to give the younger ones air and room to grow. But I have no particular desire about the term; I do not want a man to be an umpire on the bench, and at the same time a candidate for office. If he is to be an umpire on the bench, do not let him at the same time be a sycophant in the political arena seeking for votes. Make him independent.

I do not know that I shall trouble the convention with any more remarks, and I have thrown out these heads of topics that I may be able, if I choose, hereafter, to write out my speech, to enlarge upon them as I please.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not intend at this time, Mr. President, to notice many of the remarks of my colleague, which would, under other circumstances, demand and receive an immediate response from me. This is not the theatre for the exhibition of any private griefs which he may feel or imagine; neither is it fit at this time that I should repel, with appropriate rebuke, the personal allusions to myself, foreign from the question under consideration. When the gentleman made his debut in this house on his majority principle, in reply to the few remarks I made in opposition to his motion, he charged me with uttering the language of a monarchist and courtier.

My colleague has known me well. He could not expect to have escaped the remarks which his reckless charge invited. He looked for a vindication of the principles and opinions uttered by me. He perhaps little thought that I should have drawn for that vindication upon the productions of his own mind, given to the public at a time when sound principles pervaded it; when its vigor had not been made to totter under the influences of circumstances which have surrounded him.

We have spent so much time on this article concerning the appellate court, that I cannot now throw myself upon the indulgence of this body long enough to notice the allusions which I understand to be personal; but a proper time will be presented, perhaps, when the gentleman's report shall come up. I shall then ask the indulgence of the convention to do myself justice, and also to bestow some attention upon my colleague.

The question, before the convention, if I understand it, though I could not learn it from the speech of the gentleman, is to insert into the constitution the principle that a majority of the legislature shall have the power of removing the judges of the court of appeals whom the people have elected. This question has been discussed in committee of the whole, the vote has been taken there, and I am anxious that it should be taken in the house. The gentleman has called for the ayes and noes, and I am prepared to record my vote in opposition to him; and I shall be prepared to defend that vote before our common constituency if he shall select that theatre for the purpose. So far as respects my political opinions in reference to other matters which have divided this country in times past and now divide it, I have at present this much to say: Whatever may have been my errors in the exercise of the functions with which a confiding country have from time to time invested me, I have yet the first man to charge me with dishonesty of purpose or intentional error. I have been able to stand before an opposing constituency, and if I have been unsuccessful in vindicating the correctness of the opinions I entertained, I have at least commanded their respect and personal confidence. I have stood my ground in my own county, neither have I elsewhere been found to flee before my fellow citizens.

I will say no more. I am anxious that this convention shall proceed with its business, and I am now prepared to vote on all the propositions that have been so fully, ably, and elaborately discussed in committee of the whole, and when the convention has more patience and leisure, I may notice some of the remarks, personal to myself, my colleague has made.

MR. RUDD. I voted against the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) in committee of the whole, to strike out "two-thirds" and insert "a majority." My object was to insert three fifths, instead of either two thirds or a majority.

I consider it almost impossible in any state of things, unless for the grossest conduct on the part of the judge, to remove a judge from office by the two thirds principle. A man must be base indeed, if he could not, in a body of one hundred and thirty-eight, obtain forty-six votes. I ask the house in all sincerity, if a man ought to be permitted to sit in judgment upon the rights of his fellow citizens, if he is unable to obtain forty-six votes in his favor? I am in favor of the independence of the judiciary, still I do not want the judge to be wholly irresponsible. I want to make him responsible to the people from whom his power emanates. If it were in order to do so, I would ask for a division of the question.

MR. BRADLEY. I shall vote for the motion to strike out, with the view that when the question comes to be put upon filling the blank, it may be filled by the insertion of three-fifths, so as to give the impeaching power to three-fifths of the legislature, as I prefer that to two-thirds. I am opposed to giving the power to a bare majority, and prefer three-fifths to two-thirds.

MR. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I would suggest to the gentleman from Louisville, that if he will let the question be taken upon the proposition of my colleague, he will not be precluded from offering his own proposition subsequently.

MR. HARDIN. I will withdraw my motion, so far as relates to filling up, and move only to strike out.

The yeas and nays being taken, resulted as follows:

YEAS—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfield, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, William Hendrix, Thomas James, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Ira Root, James Rudd, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, John Wheeler, Robert N. Wickliffe—22.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, William K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D.

Brown, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, William Cowper, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, Archibald Dixon, Jas. Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, James H. Garrard, Ninian E. Gray, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Alfred M. Jackson, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, William C. Marshall, Wm. N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, James M. Nesbitt, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson—71.

MR. BOYD then moved to strike out in the second line the word "eight" and insert the word "six," so as to reduce the term for which the judges should serve. He said he thought it would at least be more satisfactory to his constituents that the term should not be longer than six years.

MR. BRADLEY. I shall vote for the motion to strike out "eight" and insert "six," believing that that term will best suit those whom I have the honor to represent; and if the amendment shall prevail, of which I have not much hope, I shall, at the proper time and place, move to strike out four judges and insert three. I will state here, that I am for the branching system, I am for having three districts, and three judges, with a term of office of six years, and this will enable them to have an election every two years. This is the view that will control the vote that I am about to give.

MR. MACHEN. I shall vote against the amendment, and I will very briefly state the reasons why I shall do so. I came here with predilections in favor of a six years term of office for the judges, and that no officer should be in office for a longer period than six years. I came however with the expectation that perhaps the number of judges would be continued as at present. For reasons which are satisfactory to my mind, I am now in favor of the appointment of four judges. There is a principle connected with the election of the judiciary, which I conceive very important to be maintained; it is that one of these judges shall pass out of office every two years, and that the people of the district in which he resides, or in which he was elected, shall have the privilege of choosing another to fill his place. But if we strike out "eight" and insert "six," we shall necessarily destroy that principle which, it seems to me, so important to preserve.

MR. BRADLEY. There is but little difference between the views of the gentleman from Caldwell and myself. The propriety of having an election every two years, I fully appreciate, and this can be attained by the tenure of six years, having three judges and three districts. I have come to the conclusion that this is perfectly practicable, and I am entirely in favor of it.

Mr. BARLOW called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were then taken upon the motion to strike out "eight" and insert "six," with the following result:

YEAS.—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Milford Elliott, Nathan Gaither, James P. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, Geo. W. Williams—56.

The fourth section was then read by the secretary.

Mr. HARDIN moved to strike out "four" and insert "three," in the first line, which is in these words, "the court of appeals shall consist of four judges," &c. On this he called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken upon this question, and resulted as follows:

YEAS.—John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Mr. TRIPLETT. As the vote which has just been taken, appears to have been given upon deliberation and reflection, and as there is little probability that the decision just arrived at will be changed, it appears to me it will be better to re-commit the bill to the committee from which it emanated, in order that they may remodel it, so as to make it suit this expression of the views of the house. I think it will be a saving of time, and that it will prevent those errors which will probably creep in, if we attempt to re-construct the bill in the house.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. There can be no necessity for its re-commitment, as the only alterations to be made are mere verbal alterations, that will be evident to every gentleman.

Mr. TURNER. I do not believe—sir I am not at all convinced that the deliberate opinion of the house has been expressed in the vote just taken. Nor do I think it necessary to change the phraseology of the bill throughout until it shall be ascertained whether this reduction in the number of Judges, is the true expression of the convention. The two extremes have met, for the purpose of breaking down the branching system—I know that I was asked to vote for that purpose. I am against the branching, and in favor of having four judges, and I hope we shall get back to four judges. I do not wish to change the phraseology of the bill until we shall ascertain whether this will be so.

Mr. DIXON. A difficulty presents itself to my mind as the bill now stands. It provides for four districts, and only three judges to be elected. There will consequently be one district that will have no part in electing a judge. I believe we shall have to come back to the number of four, or give up the bill.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not know whether I distinctly understood the gentleman from Madison (Mr. Turner.) I think the gentleman is certainly mistaken, in supposing the vote just taken was not an expression of the judgment of the house, or that there is a desire to break down the branching of the courts, or the sitting of the court in districts. I do not know what may have induced the decision. I am willing to acquiesce in the decision of the majority, and I presume the vote has been given upon sober and sound reflection. I understand it has been decided that the court shall consist of three judges, instead of four, and that they are to be elected for eight years, and to serve eight years, if they continue in office so long, by a very decided vote of this house. I presume that the election is designed to be by districts, and with the delegate from Madison, I desire that the house shall proceed with its deliberations, upon this article, until we shall decide in some mode whether it is the will of a majority of this house that the court of appeals shall hold its sessions in three districts, which will necessarily have to be prescribed in the following section of this bill. The committee can very easily modify the bill, presupposing that three is to be the number of judges to constitute the court, and carry out the system, as seems to be indicated. I arose therefore to ask the house to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for proceeding with the special order of the day.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. This is I believe the order of the day.

The PRESIDENT. The order of the day is to go into committee of the whole at twelve o'clock.

Mr. WICKLIFFE. Then I propose to dispense with the rule.

Mr. TURNER. I would prefer dropping this matter just here, because I think that we shall all get together again in regard to the number of judges, as it originally stood. In the mean time, I would prefer going into committee of the whole upon some other subject.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I withdraw my objection, and will let the house take its course.

The question then being put, shall the convention resolve itself into committee of the whole generally, it was, upon a division, decided in the affirmative—ayes 42, noes 40.

COUNTY COURTS.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. BOYD in the chair.

The CHAIR stated that the first subject in order, was the report of the committee on the revision of the constitution, and slavery.

Mr. GHOLSON. If in order, I will move to take up the resolution I had the honor to submit some days since, in relation to the qualification of officers.

The question being put, the motion was negatived.

Mr. APPERSON moved to take up the report of the committee upon the circuit courts.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE. I think, myself, that while we are on one subject, we ought to get through with that subject, or else take up one of a kindred nature. If we take up the subject now, of the revision of the constitution, and slavery, it will throw us a week or ten days ahead. I therefore think, that the motion to take up the report of the committee on the circuit courts, is the proper one.

Mr. HARDIN. I was anxious to do so sir, but one or two of the members of the committee requested me to postpone asking that that report should be taken up until to-morrow, with a view of having another meeting of the committee to-night, to see if they could not come to some agreement, so as to make it more conformable to the already expressed opinion of the house.

Mr. APPERSON. I thought the report was in possession of the house.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the understanding of the Chair, that the report is in the possession of the house.

Mr. BRISTOW proposed to take up the report of the committee on county courts.

Mr. DIXON. I do not believe that the committee are disposed to take up any report, and therefore, it will perhaps be as well that the committee rise, and that the convention should adjourn.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion until the committee have taken hold of something, because it would be an awkward report for our chairman to make, that the committee had done nothing.

Mr. HARDIN. I want to know what necessity there is for taking up this report at present. The committee have requested to have another meeting this evening, so as to make the report meet the views of the house. If the object of the gentleman is to take it up for the purpose of perfecting it, I have no objection; but if he has any particular designs against me, or the committee, I hope he will give me until to-morrow, when perhaps I may be able to bring forward something that will be acceptable.

Mr. APPERSON. My only object was to get to work, and I thought that the subject of the circuit courts, was one that had the nearest relation to the subject that we had just been engaged with. My motion did not arise from any thing that I had against the gentleman.

Mr. HARDIN. I am just as ready now as at any time, to take up that subject. I care very little what becomes of the bill, I am not wedded either to the circuit court, or to the court of appeals. My proposition was merely to accommodate the committee.

Mr. APPERSON. If it be the desire of the committee to take up the report of the county courts, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. BRISTOW then renewed his motion to take up that report.

The motion was agreed to. The secretary read it as follows:

ARTICLE —

SEC. 1. There shall be established in each county now, or which may hereafter be erected within this commonwealth, a county court, to consist of a presiding judge and two associate judges.

SEC. 2. The judges of the county court shall be elected by the qualified voters in each county, for the term of four years, and until their successors shall be duly qualified, and shall receive such compensation for their services as may be fixed by law, to be paid out of the county revenue.

SEC. 3. At the first election after the adoption of this constitution, the three judges shall be elected at the same time, but the associate judges, first elected, shall hold their offices for only two years, so that, thereafter, the election of the presiding judge, and that of the associate judges, will not occur at the same time.

SEC. 4. No person shall be eligible to the office of presiding or associate judge of the county court, unless he be a citizen of the United States, over twenty one years of age, and a resident of the county in which he shall be chosen one year next preceding the election.

SEC. 5. The jurisdiction of the county court shall be regulated by law, and, until changed, shall be the same now vested in the county courts of this commonwealth.

SEC. 6. The several counties in this state shall be laid off into districts of convenient size, as the general assembly may, from time to time, direct. Two Justices of the peace and one constable shall be elected in each district by the qualified voters therein. The jurisdiction of said officers shall be co-extensive with the county. Justices of the peace shall be elected for the term of four years, and constables for the term of two years; they shall be citizens of the United States, twenty one years of age, and shall have resided six months in the district in which they may be elected, next preceding the election.

SEC. 7. Judges of the county court, and justices of the peace, shall be conservators of the peace. They shall be commissioned by the governor. County and district officers shall vacate their offices by removal from the district or county in which they shall be appointed. The legislature shall provide, by law, for the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns of all elections of judges of the county court, justices of the peace, and constables, and for determining contested elections; and also provide the mode of filling vacancies in these offices.

SEC. 8. Judges of the county courts, justices of the peace, and constables, shall be subject to indictment for malfeasance or misfeasance in office, in such mode as may be prescribed by law, subject to appeal to the court of appeals; and, upon conviction, their offices shall become vacant.

The first section was again read.

Mr. BRISTOW moved to amend by adding to that section the words, "any two of whom shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business."

Mr. TURNER. With the view of testing the sense of the committee, I move you to strike out the two associate judges.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. TURNER. As a matter of course, the motion that I make will take precedence of the motion of the gentleman.

Mr. BRISTOW. The amendment which I propose will be adopted as a matter of course. There can be no objection to it.

Mr. TURNER. But that motion may be superceded. My opinion is, that we shall have a better court, and one that will better accomplish the public business, if we have but one judge, with a sufficient salary, to secure a man competent to do the business, than to have three judges with small salaries; for in that case, we should be very apt to have men who are incompetent. I made this motion with the view of making another, in case it prevails. It is, that one judge shall hold court at all times, except when the county levy is to be laid and claims against the county, to be assessed. At these times I wish the magistrates, who are to be distinct officers at all other times, to come in and assist. By doing this, you will make it a county bench; otherwise your court will be regarded as a mere town court, as having very little sympathy with the people, and will not have that strength to sustain it, it ought to have in every part of the county.

There is another reason. In assessing the claims against the county, where you have the court as I propose, residing in different parts of the county, they will be qualified to judge of the claims, that may be presented; they will possess correct information; whereas, if you have a court composed of men who live in the town, there will be large classes of claims brought before the court, speciously presented, regarding the justness of which, they would be unable to determine. Numerous cases of that kind are brought forward, and at first view they appear to be just and correct; whereas, if you have information on the other side of the question, they might prove to be unjust. Any man who has had much to do with courts, knows that this occurs very frequently.

And I think in fact if we are to have a court thus organised, it is much better to have one ignorant man than to have three to preside in it. But I think we will be more likely to get a good judge if we have but one, than if we were to have three, and the business will be done infinitely better.

Mr. BRISTOW. I hope the question will be taken upon the motion I made.

Mr. TURNER. I would make this suggestion to the gentleman, that if there is a majority of the committee in favor of my proposition, of course they will vote his proposition down, because if his should be adopted, it goes in a great measure to defeat mine, and if mine should be adopted, his will be entirely superceded.

Mr. BRISTOW. The simple question is whether two of these judges shall hold court.

The question being put upon the amendment of the gentleman from Todd, it was adopted.

Mr. TURNER. I now make the motion to strike out the words "and two associate judges," and in another part of the bill, I will move an amendment to provide that the county magistrates to come in and take their seats in the court of claims.

Mr. BRISTOW. This is an important court sir, a court before which the rights of property, to a very considerable amount, are to be investigated. There will be important questions to be determined by that court when they undertake to settle claims against the county, and to raise revenues. You are aware of the very great prejudice that has existed throughout the commonwealth against the county courts. We could not adopt the principle contended for by the gentleman, without incurring all that unpopularity. If you gather up the magistrates from all parts of the county to hold court at all times of the year, you throw upon them many embarrassments. The gentleman says that these three judges will be selected from town residents. I suppose not sir. We have not prescribed the limits in which they shall live, we have left it entirely to the county, and we have supposed that they would be well content with three judges, whom they might select within the county. We thought that three judges selected by the people to preside in this court, would be better able to discharge the duties, than if you were to gather up all the magistrates throughout the county. The gentleman speaks of frauds and impositions that may be practiced upon the judges, but I think it is a great mistake to suppose that three judges, accustomed to hold court, will not detect frauds as readily as any magistrate can do. Much might be said on the subject, but I am not for consuming the time of this convention. If it be the deliberate opinion of the convention, that one judge should do the business, and when upon county business collect all the magistrates together, let them so decide. But I am convinced that after mature deliberation, they must come to the conclusion that the best way would be to have one presiding judge and two assistants.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. This report relative to the county courts is, in my view, one of the most important that can come before the convention, and as it is suggested by delegates around me, that the convention did not expect to take up this report to-day, and as there is not much disposition manifested to go on with it at present, I will move that the committee rise.

The committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 2, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. STUART ROBINSON.

THE ELECTION IN CASEY COUNTY.

Mr. HARDIN presented a petition signed by some two hundred and fifty six persons resident in Casey county, in relation to the election of the delegate to this convention for that county. It was referred to the committee which has charge of the returns of that election.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. GARRARD called up his resolution offered yesterday to amend the 29th rule.

After some conversation he modified his amendment and it was adopted as follows:

Resolved, That the 29th rule of this convention be amended by inserting the words, "and such amendments as may have been offered in committee of the whole, if desired by the mover," immediately after the word "amendments," in the last line of said rule.

COUNTY OFFICERS.

Mr. TURNER called the attention of the convention to the fact that there were reports from two committees, which were of such a character as to require that they should be considered together in the committee of the whole—the committee on the executive and ministerial offices for counties and districts, and the committee on county courts. He moved that the committee of the whole be instructed to consider those two reports together.

Mr. BRISTOW thought the adoption of such a motion would be productive of confusion. He preferred that each report should be considered separately, and after they had been disposed of in committee of the whole, a special committee could revise and avoid any conflict between them.

The motion was not agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. HAMILTON, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Hendrix till Tuesday next.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of the whole on the article in relation to the court of appeals.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL said he yesterday gave notice of his intention to offer a substitute for the whole report of the committee, and it was then suggested by the President that such a proposition would be in order, when the measure had been perfected by its friends. He now rose to modify his proposition to this extent—he would offer it as an amendment instead of a substitute. If in order, he would now move to strike out the sections from one to ten inclusive, and insert the sections which he presented yesterday.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. I expected when honored with a seat in this convention to have remained entirely silent, except to give my vote. I had no ambition to offer resolutions or make speeches on this floor. It would have been exceedingly agreeable to me to have been permitted to pursue that course, and I should have done so if I believed the course which the convention was about to take was one which would meet the wishes of the people of the state of Kentucky. I had not a doubt when I came here that a constitution would be made in accordance with the wishes of the people without the slightest difficulty or delay. It did seem to me that the desire and the wish for a change of such parts of the constitution as were objected to by the people, was so clearly understood, that the convention could not err in making the changes required by the people. So far as I have been able to learn from my association with the convention party, and so far as I have received instructions from my constituents, there is very little to be done in this body. The people expect some slight change in the legislative department, to have the sessions every two years, instead of annually, and to limit, in some degree, the power of the legislature with regard to special legislation, and involving the state in debt; they expect us to limit the tenure of the judicial officers and to give into the hands of the people the selection of all the officers of the state. Now, I ask every gentleman in this house if we do this, and do nothing more than this, if we shall not meet the expectations and wishes of those who sent us here? I have not understood that the people of Kentucky have believed in relation to the present constitution, that "the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint," and that "from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, it is covered with wounds and bruises and putrifying sores." I do not believe they expect us to change every line and letter of the old constitution; but on the contrary, they desired us to leave as much of it as possible in the instrument which we submit to them. The proposition which has been made by the committee on the court of appeals, I have been compelled very reluctantly to vote against, because, if we embody in it details not expected by the people, if it does not defeat, it will most certainly bring a strong opposition to the constitution. There will be in many counties an opposition to these details; they did not expect us to place them in the constitution; and I have offered this amendment that we might commit into the hands of the legislature—as it was committed to them by men who were practically as wise as those who live in this day—the power of carrying out the principles which we establish in the constitution, leaving the details to the legislature, and not assuming to ourselves the authority to do that which, in every other constitution, has, I believe, been left to the legislature.

We need not be in the least alarmed that what we leave out of the constitution will be dangerous to it. There is no danger of sins of omission being visited on our heads by our constituents. There will be no vote cast against the constitution in consequence of what is not in it, but every new principle that we introduce, all extraordinary and new matter of detail may, if it does not certainly, array many votes against it; and I desire to retain every line and letter of the present constitution, which I am not compelled to change, with a view of engrafting in the new instrument those principles which are clearly and unequivocally required—and very few are required. I venture to say there is not a gentleman in this house, who cannot take up the old constitution and amend it so as to meet the wishes of the people, provided he has no particular wish of his own to gratify, if he will just exercise the knowledge which he has of the wishes of the people of Kentucky. There is not a man on this floor, there is not a boy ten years old, who knows the views of the people, who cannot make a constitution which they would accept without the slightest hesitation. If we have no views of our own, no personal ambition to gratify, no professional ends to attain, and no sectional objects to secure, there is not the slightest doubt that any man can make a constitution which will meet the wishes of the people by an overwhelming majority, and he would have nothing to do but that which his constituents have bidden him to do—change those features which have been objected to, and then leave every thing else just as he finds it. I hope the proposition I have made will receive the attention of the house. I know it is not perfect; and if the motion prevails to strike out and insert, I shall then move a reference to some committee with a view of having it put in a more perfect form.

Mr. HARGIS. I have been waiting for an appropriate opportunity to give my views in relation to branching the court of appeals, and the election of four judges. The branching of the court of appeals is not a new subject. It has been before the legislature during the last fifty years, and I believe this fact is now conceded. The object in calling this convention, in part, was to reform the vast expenses of the state. We were in debt to the amount of nearly five millions of dollars. We have had too much legislation, and thus our expenses have been increased. I have received from the Auditor an account of what will be the additional expense in holding a session of the court of appeals. The judges now receive one thousand five hundred dollars, and the additional expense is nine hundred and one dollars. This expense is necessary to pay the salary of the sergeant, the tipstaff, the attorney general, and other incidental expenses. We should incur in electing the judges of the court of appeals, seven hundred dollars in the first election; and this is an item of expense of which I have heard no gentleman speak. If the state is to be laid off into three or four districts, there must be some place for the sheriffs to meet to compare the polls and ascertain who is elected. The sheriffs would have to be paid about the same amount as for comparing the polls in the election of members of congress, which is two dollars a day, and two dollars for every twenty five miles travel in going and returning, which will make an expense in each county of from six to ten dollars, and will make the whole amount for the state at least seven hundred dollars. Then, in addition to that, there will be an expense for record books which will amount to five hundred dollars in each of the branches. Besides this, if there is an attorney general, he must be paid something in addition to his salary of three hundred dollars a year, for we cannot suppose that he would travel through the state for this sum. His pay must be increased then, or we must increase the number of attorneys general. The judges must be paid two or three thousand dollars for riding over the state and holding these courts. This will amount to six or eight thousand dollars, and the whole sum, without saying a word about libraries, will make an addition to our present expenses of six or eight thousand dollars annually. It will be impossible to avoid this; and I tell gentlemen that whenever they branch the court of appeals, they rivet upon the state an additional expense of six or eight thousand dollars a year.

The legislature for the last fifty years could have branched this court, and could have repealed the act at any time if it was found not agreeable to the wishes of the people. They have never ventured to do it. Why have they not? Because the people of Kentucky have never required it. If they had done so, sending in their members to the legislature every year, it would have been passed, and the experiment would have been tried, and if it did not work well, they could have repealed it. We have come here with a view to lessen the expenses of the government, and carry out the wishes of the people in this respect; and the first thing we do, we fasten an expense of six or eight thousand dollars, annually, upon the state, when the legislature would not venture to do it even for a single year. Besides, the subject of branching the court of appeals was not, so far as I know, discussed last summer by the people. If the people have not branched the court when they had the power to do it, shall we rivet the expense upon the state wholly unlooked for by the people? If this is done, I have no doubt the people will reject the constitution by a large majority. I have seen some dozen men from my section of the country, and all of them are opposed to it. Now, in order to satisfy the people, and to have their will expressed, let this be a matter of legislation entirely; to that extent I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Jessamine. That will give the legislature power to branch the court, if they please; the people will be satisfied; and the objections to an increase of expense, by doing that which the legislature would not do for the last fifty years, will be avoided.

Much has been said to show that the branching of the court will not increase the expense of the state. Surely this expense will be increased unless the judges are willing to ride over the state for the salary of fifteen hundred dollars, which they now receive, while other states are paying their judges from two to six thousand dollars. However gentlemen may claim that the people want justice brought to their doors, they can now reach the court of appeals if they desire it; many do go to that court who ought not. All that is said about setting up this monopoly in Frankfort, and the influence this has on the election of senators, amounts to but little in my opinion. The legislature will sit here, and how will it influence the action of the legislature for the court of appeals to sit here? It seems to me that the influence of the court of appeals and of the legislature would be entirely distinct; I cannot see how they will affect each other. Then how is it that it will tend to set up an aristocracy which has been spoken of around Frankfort?

I should have been glad if the system of ballot voting had not been stricken out. I was for that system, and I still believe it right. Gentlemen have said that was a favorite measure of the emancipationists. I do not see how emancipation is connected with ballot voting. All that has been said about the rich man's marching up and making his tenants vote according to his wish, is an argument in favor of voting by ballot. I want my tenant to go and drop in his ballot without my knowledge of the man for whom it is given. If they vote by ballot what landlord will know any thing about the vote of his tenant. Much has been said about the influence that a wealthy man may have in procuring votes. This is a reason why I am in favor of the ballot system, because a wealthy man would not risk his money if he did not know what ticket would be put in the box. Would I risk paying out money to A, B, and C, when they could drop a ticket in the box against me. That is one reason why the ballot system is all important, more important in the judiciary than any where else. One gentleman says there is no possible chance to contest an election under the ballot system. That is something that I do not understand. If I understand the method of voting by ballot, the name of the candidate is written on one ticket, and the name of the voter is written upon the back of the same ticket. When this ticket is deposited, his name is recorded by the clerk upon the poll book. When the election is over, the ballots are all counted, and the clerk arranges in lists the name of each candidate and the name of each man who has voted for him. The tickets are carefully preserved until it is ascertained whether there will be a contest of the election. And if no contest arises within ten days, the tickets are destroyed. Another gentleman says that fraudulent voting cannot be punished under the ballot system. If his name is upon the ticket and is likewise recorded upon the poll book, will it not be easy to compare the tickets with the record upon the poll book, and ascertain whether there has been illegal voting either by those who are under age, or who are non-residents? If there is a contested election, then these fraudulent votes may be struck out. The grand jury can indict any one who votes under age, and every proceeding can be carried on as if the ballot system did not exist. Now, in order to carry it out properly, the tickets will be destroyed, and neither the judge nor any other man will have a right to know for whom any person may have voted. That is a system that will protect the voter, and if any thing is fair, and will at the same time tend to destroy the corrupt influences under the present system, this will do it.

To those gentlemen who say this is connected with emancipation, I answer that it is not at all connected with either abolition or emancipation. It is a movement of the people, which they, in their honest judgment, consider that we need. Some two or three weeks since, the gentleman from Logan (Mr. Irwin) stated that this convention was brought about by a union of the emancipationists and democrats. I name it to deny it, and I will try to prove it. But I do not blame the gentleman for thinking there was something like a combination of the emancipationists and democrats. He appeared to be a sort of way-faring man during the canvass, having been a candidate in Todd, I believe, and having not succeeded very well there, perhaps, he travelled over into Logan, where he started under headway. All was vacant and open. He soon found that there was an emancipationist there as a candidate, who was after him with a sharp stick, close by. There was another gentleman, who is now a delegate in this convention, a whig, who was away ahead. But this emancipationist was right after the gentleman from Logan, and when I heard of it I thought of the race that John Gilpin ran with the post boy. Gilpin put on his red cloak and his belt, to which he had suspended two bottles filled with wine, and started in the race. And, as he went he thought he would go clear, and the first thing he knew the post boy was scampering at his heels with whip and spur, and he lost his wine. Now, I thought the gentleman from Logan was in the same predicament. He had no expectation of opposition, but here was this emancipationist, running him close, and he came within fifty votes of defeating him. He got more votes than any other emancipationist in Kentucky, except the candidate from Louisville. The gentleman may have had reasons for his belief, but I do not believe that any one, even of his own party, believed his statement to be true. There were in this state twenty whig emancipationists, who together, got about nine thousand four hundred votes, while the nine democratic emancipationists received about four thousand votes. If the gentleman alluded to the union of the emancipationists and the democrats with the intention of creating a dissension here, it was clearly wrong. In Lewis county, there were two emancipationists running, but a whig was elected, who is now in this house. In Lawrence and Carter counties there was a majority of four hundred democrats, and there a whig was elected by a strong democratic vote, but if the emancipationists had joined the democrats this could not have been the result. I name this to condemn the imputation that the democrats were united with the emancipationists, or any other party. I believe that the convention was brought about by the will of the people of Kentucky, and no party should have the honor of it. I believe we came here with the intention of making such a constitution as the people require, without lugging in any thing new, or which would increase the expenses and result in the rejection of this constitution by the people.

If all this be true, that the branching of the court of appeals would increase the expenses of government, and if the people have not required this at our hands, as certainly as we live it will make twenty or thirty thousand votes against the constitution. I honestly believe this, and I call on gentlemen who are in favor of the branching system, to wait only a year or two, and to let us have the right to add another judge, and branch the court, and then, when the subject is discussed, the people will pass it if they want it. But if we put it in the constitution now, under the circumstances, I can assure the friends of constitutional reform that our labor will be rejected.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. I would ask to have the word "six" struck out of the third section, that the number of years for holding the office of judge may be left blank.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman has the right to modify his own amendment.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I presume if the house think proper to insert that amendment, it will be proper hereafter to fill the blank; but the house could not take any thing from it after its adoption, without a re-consideration. We may add to it, but we cannot strike any thing out of it. With that understanding I shall vote. The proposition of the committee is to fix the term of the judges at eight years, and to establish the principle that these judges, whether three or four, shall be elected by districts. The amendment proposes, if I understand it, that there shall be one chief justice and two associate judges.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. It proposes no particular number of judges.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The legislature may then give the chief justice the support of one, or as many more as they please. There is to be one president, of course, and the legislature may so constitute the appellate court that he shall sit alone. If I understand it correctly, I prefer the original report, with all the inroads made on it by the vote of the house yesterday.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. I would ask if the whole matter might not be referred to a committee. I have said that I did not consider myself competent to produce any thing perfect. I have merely thrown out the will of my people. I desire to have it referred to a committee, even if it is adopted by the house. I have no personal interest in this constitution in any way. I have but one wish, and that is, to form a constitution which the people of the state of Kentucky want, and which they will accept. I have but one fear in reference to the proposition emanating from the committee on the court of appeals, and it is a fear based upon what I believe to be a thorough knowledge of the feelings of the people of Kentucky—for I am no stranger to their feelings in regard to the present constitution—and that fear is, that it will be fatal, entirely fatal, to the constitution itself. The proposition of the committee will be presented to the people with a suspicion attached to it, unjust in all human probability, but which the honorable chairman of the committee knows to exist, and to which he has himself referred. It will be looked upon, to use plain language, as a lawyer project. It has been called so in this house, and out of it, and whether the suspicion is groundless or not, is not for us to determine. But let the people of Kentucky believe that the lawyers have concocted this for their benefit, or that the main moving object of it is to benefit the lawyers, and they will scout it as certainly as the Lord lives.—They like lawyers well enough, but not enough to take any thing which they suspect is for their special benefit. There are enemies enough in this house, and out of it, to use this, whether it is so or not—enough to justify the declaration which has been made here. I do not say that I entertain these feelings, but I confess that I shall have some difficulty to combat this objection. I shall have much to do to satisfy my constituents that this bill, in all its parts, is for the whole community, and that this class of professional gentlemen are not more especially benefited. I want the matter left with the legislature. Let them do as they please. I hope the house will understand me that I do not wish to press this thing. It has forced itself upon me, and I felt it was my duty to offer it. But I desire that it shall be referred to wiser heads than mine to render it more in accordance with the wishes of the community. I hope the house will accept the proposition.

Mr. CLARKE. I have known since I have been here, scarcely a proposition made in this house, that has not been met with the stereotype argument, that if it should be incorporated in the constitution, it would cause the constitution to be rejected before the people. I believe I understand something of the feelings of the people of that region of the country from which I came; but I am at a loss to know how it happens, that gentlemen know so well what are the wishes of the people throughout the whole state as they profess to do. The gentleman from Jesamine assumes, as did the gentleman who preceded him, that if you branch the court of appeals, you will lose twenty thousand votes which would otherwise be given for the new constitution.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL rose to explain.

The PRESIDENT. No gentleman has a right to interpose when another delegate is addressing the chair, unless leave be granted him to explain. I hope that gentlemen will obey the rule strictly.

Mr. CLARKE. I beg leave to remark to the president, that if I have misquoted the gentleman, I desire that he shall have liberty to correct me.

UK LAW LIBRARY

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. Never having belonged to a deliberative body before, I must be pardoned for violating a rule which the president seems to think so essential, and the only apology I can offer is, that I was but following the example that has been set me, by older delegates on this floor, with the permission of the president. I will now take the liberty, as permission has been granted me, to explain that my observation was, that I believed that the incorporation of this proposition in regard to branching the court of appeals, would array a large number of votes against the constitution. I did not pretend to designate how many.

Mr. CLARKE. It is an argument, as I before remarked.

The PRESIDENT (interposing.) The gentleman has chosen to impeach the chair for interference. It is true, I have interfered. I have done so heretofore, and shall continue to interfere, and call gentlemen to order whenever they violate the rules of this body.

Mr. CLARKE. I may, sir, have put words in the mouth of my friend who spoke last; I have said that he argued that twenty thousand votes would be arrayed against the constitution, if the proposition for branching the court of appeals should be inserted in that instrument. In this I may be mistaken, but I am not mistaken when I say that an argument that is in the mouth of almost every gentleman on this floor who has spoken upon any subject, is, that if you incorporate a certain principle you will array a party in this state against the constitution, and that, therefore, you ought not to incorporate such a principle. That is a stereotyped argument in regard to almost every proposition, against which a gentleman may entertain an objection.

More than one half the state, in point of population, live south of this place. It has been argued here, and among others, by the elder gentleman from Nelson, that if you branch the court of appeals the result will be, that you will array—I believe his remark was—every citizen—every voter at least in the county of Franklin save seven, against the constitution. Well, sir, I confess for myself that I have not been at the trouble of enquiring how all the people of Franklin county will vote, in the event that the court should be branched, but if you give four judges, and establish four districts, and locate a branch of the court of appeals in each district, I ask, sir, if the same rule, will not obtain, in establishing the fact that you get at four points, or three at least, leaving a branch here, the votes of a great number of persons in favor of a new constitution, because they will have obtained their wish, though you may lose a number of votes in Franklin county because the court has been branched.

I can tell gentlemen, for I profess to know something about the feeling of the people in that part of the country which I have the honor to represent—that they have regarded the location of the court of appeals at one point only, in the state, as a hardship upon that region of country, from the time I grew up, down to the present day, and if we cannot get a branch of the court down there, we are determined, in a body, as far as I am advised, to get the court of appeals a little closer to us.

I understood the gentleman from Nelson to say, yesterday, that it would be a great hardship for the citizens of Henry county to be required to go to Harrodsburg to attend the court, that they would have to travel a longer distance than from Frankfort to Harrodsburg. I suppose the gentleman considers it no hardship at all, that the people of Warren, Simpson and McCracken, and all the southern part of the state should have to come here to attend the court, but it would be a great hardship to make four judges ride down there through the mud. When the people have to come up, the roads are all dry, but when the judges have to go down, the mud will be very deep, according to the argument of the gentleman.

Now Mr. President there is not a voter southwest of Louisville, who would not be willing to be taxed a half cent or one cent, for the purpose of furnishing facilities for obtaining justice. Gentlemen need not be alarmed by the idea of additional expenses when we say that we want four judges instead of three. It has been argued on this floor, and I believe that the conviction obtains in the mind of every gentleman, with perhaps few exceptions, that the business of the court of appeals cannot be transacted by three judges, because the business is calculated to increase, and it must increase, according to the commercial habits of the people of the state. It has already increased in a ratio so great, that the judges of the court of appeals numbering three at this time, cannot bestow that attention in the investigation of the cases that come before them, that the well being of the country and the interests of the community demand at their hands. It must be the case that we must have more than three judges. We must require them to have that uniformity of decision of which gentlemen have spoken; we must require them to enable litigants to reach justice without delay, and sir, the interests of the country demand four judges. I ask if Kentucky will stand back, merely because there will be an increase of expense of twenty five hundred, or even four thousand dollars.

Mr. President, I for one disclaim that this is a lawyer project. I am aware sir, that there are those in the country—and I have felt the influence of these objections myself, who go about and attempt to excite prejudice against the profession of law. I am aware that there are those who go forth among the people, and whenever the remotest opportunity occurs for exciting prejudice against a lawyer who presents himself for office, the opportunity is not allowed to escape. But I apprehend the profession, as far as branching of the court of appeals is concerned, will be able to satisfy an enlightened constituency, that what they have done in this matter, has been done alone for the purpose of enabling them to reach justice, without traveling four or five hundred miles to do it. This may be a lawyers' project on one side or the other, and I doubt very much if there are not a number of lawyers perhaps not very far distant from the present place of sitting of the court of appeals, who are opposed to the branching of that court. Withhold from us a branch and what injury sir, do you inflict upon my constituents, upon those of that part of the country from which I came. Then if I am employed to bring an action of ejectment, or any other, I make no arrangement with my client that if justice is not done in the court below, I will appear in the court of appeals. He gives me a fee. After trial if I apprehend that justice has not been done, I advise him to take an appeal. He does so. And what then? After the case has been prepared there—argued there—understood by his counsel there—all the facts and circumstances perfectly familiar to him, he is there required to leave that counsel with whom he has advised during the progress of the case, he is obliged to employ additional counsel to conduct his case through the court of appeals; whereas if you allow him the opportunity to reach the court by traveling ten, fifteen or twenty miles, the probability is that the lawyer he had employed there, would be able to attend the case, in the court of appeals, and save him the payment of a double fee. That would be the effect of it. It would grow up into a practice that when counsel are employed to attend a case in the court below, there would be an agreement at the same time, that if the case should be taken to the court of appeals, the same counsel would appear and conduct the case through that court, and it must result in a great saving to the people. There is no force in the argument that this is a lawyers' project. I disclaim it as a lawyers' project.

If the wants and interests of the country require that justice should be brought nearer to the doors of the citizens of the state, why withhold it? We are in this state as a band of brothers, and I call upon the gentlemen who live in the counties surrounding the capital, I call upon gentlemen who live in the neighborhood of the place where the court of appeals is at present held, and ask them if it is right and proper to withhold from us a branch of that court. I have no special authority to do it, but I ask in the name of the mountain region of this state, if it be right that those who are congregated around the place of the present sitting of the court of appeals should withhold from those in that region, the right and the convenience of having their rights preserved, when all that the state has had to bestow, has been bestowed upon this place. When all the moneys collected throughout the state, in the way of taxes, have been thrown into the lap of this town for the last half century, is it too much for us to ask, to be allowed to have our business done for us nearer home, when we are taxed as much as they.

I am satisfied that there is a power in the south-western part of the state that will have justice brought nearer to them, and if we cannot get a branch of the court of appeals down there, we will have—and we will struggle for it until we reach the power to have—the court of appeals itself nearer to us. I believe there are some gentlemen on this floor who have perhaps mistaken the proposition that was discussed yesterday, or have not even matured it. I believe that a proposition will be made to reconsider the vote, by which four was stricken out in reference to the number of judges, and when that vote shall be reconsidered and the question be put to this house, we shall then discover whether they are willing to withhold from us, some of whom live two hundred, or two hundred and fifty miles from the seat of government, because of the additional expense of some twenty-five hundred dollars, the means of reaching the sanctuary of justice. I have said more than I intended, for I have been disappointed, and regret to see a disposition manifested, to make those who live in the remote portions of the state, the mere suppliants at the feet of power here.

Mr. HARDIN. I have said over and over again, that I never heard this question made before the people where I live. I mean the question of branching the court of appeals. I have taken part in the elections, though not always as a candidate, I think I may safely say for the last forty two or forty three years, and I never heard the question made, either in my own or in the surrounding counties. I am willing to give the power to the legislature to branch the court, whenever the people of the state desire it shall be done, and I have indicated to the house, that before I had done with this subject, I would offer a proposition for this purpose, and the same thing is embodied in the proposition of the gentleman from Henderson. I want the legislature which comes immediately from the people—if it be desired by the people to branch the court—to have the power to do it; and if they want more than three judges, let the people say so through their representatives. That is all I want.

And I say again, and I say it in a spirit of conciliation, that I do not want to see this constitution encumbered with additional machinery. But as to the gentleman's idea of making me use the expression that it was five hundred miles from the county of Henry to Harrodsburg, and in coming back it was but thirty. I recollect a lawyer called Worden Pope who, when he heard any one using extravagant language, used to say, "pooh! I never believe myself when I am joking." I think I said about fifty miles. But for a man who has been all over the state, in its length and breadth, and made speeches in almost every county, and yet to be convicted of such a gross absurdity, as saying it was five hundred miles from the county of Henry to Harrodsburg, and only thirty back again, is more than I am willing to suffer. I will say it is about two hundred and eighty five miles from one extreme point to the other, where these branches would be located. And I would repeat, that to require an old man from forty to sixty five years old, at all seasons of the year, to pass from point to point, would be, to say the least, extremely inconvenient. The gentleman says, will you not give the mountain counties justice? This does not apply to my friend (Mr. Clarke.) He lives in the richest part of the country—there are no mountains there—not one. I consider the counties of Christian, Warren, Logan, Todd, and Simpson, the garden spot of Kentucky. The gentleman says—if you do not bring the court of appeals to us, we will take away the seat of government from you. Well, that will go for about as much as it is worth. I suppose the whole power of this state is not in Simpson county. Suppose the emperors of Russia, and of Austria, the king of Great Britain, and Louis XVIII, when they had assembled in their great congress, and were proposing some great measure, for the regulation of the affairs of the whole of Europe, up should jump a little delegate from Hesse-Cassel, and say, if you don't do so and so, all Hesse-Cassel will be in arms, and we will pluck the diadems from your brows. Such a threat would not be more ridiculous than the menace of the gentleman about the removal of the seat of government. I have been trying to court my honorable friend all the session. I think he is a very promising young gentleman, but that he should have fallen into the mistake of attributing to me such a palpable absurdity is very extraordinary.

I have no intention of making a speech. I only rose to say, that I approve of the proposition of the gentleman from Henderson, to leave it to the people, through their legislature, to say whether Hesse-Cassel shall be accommodated or not. I have no particular interest in the thing, but I know very well that it is important to the character of the state, that the character of the court of appeals should not be brought down. Duty to the public requires, that that department should be kept up; and to have three or four old men trudging down to some distant county, to hold a court, perhaps it may be in the warm season, perhaps in the winter time, will tend very much to degrade the court, and bring it into contempt. I have no interest at all, none in the world, in having a court to sit in this place. I would just as soon have it sit any where else as here. I don't practice much here. I have perhaps three or four cases a year. It is not a practice that my colleague or myself care much about, or look much to. I believe we come here more for self-defence than any thing else. I know there are some gentlemen, who make it a regular business to come here and get fees. I have a list of the names of several gentlemen who do so. I do not say this invidiously, because it shows that they must be men who have rich gifts by nature, and great legal acquirements. I believe I will reserve the list however, until I do make a speech on this subject, at some future day.

Mr. CLARKE, I suppose that my venerable friend from Nelson assumes, that the elder delegate from Nelson, and some two or three other gentlemen here represent Russia, Prussia, and Austria, and that the balance of us are from Hesse Cassel. I am willing sir, that the gentleman should have all the credit of representing a great power in this convention. I have no objection in the world. But sir, when I know that those who have honored me with a seat on this floor, demand an effort on my part to enable them to enjoy the rights that are enjoyed by those who occupy a more favorable position in the state, I trust I shall be pardoned by the Russian autocrat—I do not apply that to my friend—but I hope to be pardoned by the gentleman from Russia, for insisting that those whom I represent shall be permitted to enjoy an equal participation in the rights and privileges which are to be conferred upon the people of this state by the constitution. That is all I ask. I should be recreant to the high trust confided to me, if I did not insist upon having a branch of the court of appeals, closer to those whom I have the honor to represent. I trust I shall be pardoned by the gentleman, if I try to discharge the duties that have been entrusted to me, by the people whom I represent. I do not intend to be understood however, as desiring to place my friend from Nelson, in an unenviable attitude. I did remark that he had stated in his speech of yesterday, that great inconvenience would be felt by the judges, if they were compelled to go to Harrodsburg. I said, I suppose the gentleman considered it five hundred miles from the county of Henry to Harrodsburg, and only thirty from Harrodsburg here. I did not say that he made this statement, but I deduced it as a consequence from his argument. There is no inconvenience it appears, in requiring the people of Carter, Ballard, and McCracken counties, to come to Frankfort, but there is great inconvenience and hardship in requiring four men to go down to those counties. Now sir, what is the fact? For the last fifteen years there have been three judges from two counties that border on mine, sitting in the court of appeals—I allude to chief justice Ewing, honorable J. R. Underwood, and honorable Asher W. Graham, who has been recently appointed. These gentlemen are obliged to travel to this place, twice a year, to hold court. And is it too much to ask, that they should go down there sometimes, instead of compelling the whole people of that region to come up here. Is it not just as convenient, I ask my venerable friend—for four judges to ride down there once in twelve months, as to require every litigant to come to this place to attend the court. Why sir, up to 1843, upon a motion to admit a will to record in the county court, if the motion did not prevail, the unsuccessful party was compelled to appeal to the court of appeals; and in the absence of branches, in many cases, to trudge from one to two hundred and fifty miles, with from ten to one hundred witnesses, to Frankfort, to obtain the decision of the court as to whether a will should be admitted to record or not. In more than one instance I have known large numbers of witnesses, who were in humble circumstances, to be brought in carts, the distance of an hundred and sixty miles, to reach the capital. I again ask, would it not be proper that the judges should at least visit the people, and hold court among them once a year, rather than to require the people to undergo such hardship and expense as they have been subjected to, under the present system.

Mr. LINDSEY. If the proposition to branch the court of appeals cannot be carried by legitimate argument—if the opinions of the delegate from Franklin and of those gentlemen from neighboring counties, opposed to the proposition, cannot be changed by considerations of propriety and fitness—the gentleman from Simpson will hardly succeed by denouncing the citizens of Frankfort and Franklin county. His people might as well have kept him at home, so far as the proposition under discussion, as well as all other matters, is concerned, if they supposed his attacks upon my constituents would frighten them or their humble delegate from propriety. What has the town of Frankfort done? What has she received at the hands of the commonwealth, so much more than other places, that she should be singled out by the gentleman, and charged with defeating projects which the honorable gentleman favors? He may say sir, she has the capital of the state, and the rickety concern called the governor's palace. Well, look back at the records, and see at whose expense these buildings were erected. They were not built at the expense of the gentleman and his constituents. They had their share it is true; but the citizens of this town, by individual subscriptions and donations of lots, which were sold and the proceeds applied, contributed largely to the expenditures, and that too, under contract with the commissioners authorized to locate a permanent seat of government for the state. Look, sir, at the few improvements that surround your public square. By whom were they made? Were they made by the liberality of such gentlemen as undertake to influence the minds of delegates near the capital, by threats of its removal? They were made, sir, by the authorities of the town. The gentleman's threats are ill advised and made, doubtless, without reflection or premeditation.

If the people of this proud commonwealth require a removal of their seat of government, let them remove it to Louisville, or any other place, and when they do so, I will say to the gentleman, take the court of appeals with it. There is propriety—there is fitness that the three high departments of the government should be at the same place.

I have voted sir, throughout for four districts and four judges. The votes were given from a conviction that four districts would bring candidates for the judgeship within the knowledge of those who are to elect them, and from the fact that a fourth judge would add strength to the high character of the court, and give weight to their decisions, with three to concur in opinion.

These votes were given also, to gratify gentlemen who seemed to desire the district mode of election, and also to obviate the objections raised by those opposed to the election by the people—that they could not know for whom they were voting, and the practice would soon run into the mode of selecting other officers by central influences, and party arrangements.

I did it sir, to lessen in some degree the heavy labors that the court now undergo.

In doing this, I did not pledge myself to go for establishing branches of the court, as I clearly indicated in a few remarks heretofore made. But I am told by the gentleman from Simpson, that I must advance to this, under the penalty of forfeiting all the interests of my constituents. I say to gentlemen, they may reason me into the measure, but I cannot be driven. I know my people too well to believe for a moment, that any considerations growing out of the location of the capital, or any threats of its removal, would be regarded by them, and most certainly they will not be by their humble delegate.

I am not disposed to impute any thing improper to delegates, or to charge them as being actuated by considerations of a selfish character, yet I could but remark on yesterday, when the fourth judge was rejected, that some of those who have manifested so much concern about the branching, should show plainly that they regarded that as fatal to their projects.

Why did the honorable delegate from Montgomery show such feeling at that vote? It was not a defeat of branching, unless he regarded the number of branches as necessary to be regulated by the number of judges, and it spoiled his hopes and calculations for a branch at his town. The fluttering, sir, shown, did awaken a suspicion in my mind, that I had been lending a hand to build the foundation of a project, which I would regard, if carried out, as calculated to weaken not only the independence of the highest judicial tribunal, but the confidence that should be reposed in its decisions.

If the convenience of the people has been the ruling consideration of those who advocate branching, why should they have treated the loss of the fourth judge as fatal to their project? Three districts, if their arguments be true, would be better than one place of holding the court, and why did they not rally on that? My apprehensions are, as intimated by the elder delegate from Nelson, it broke the combination—spoiled the plan, overthrew the figures, and would not work to suit.

Gentlemen who consider the convenience of the people the paramount consideration, seem exceedingly reluctant to accept the proposition made, to leave the subject to the people, to be decided through their representatives. If it is the will of a majority of the people, as contended for by those who favor the measure, why not trust it to their decision. Will any one in favor of branching, vote against the constitution, with the power conferred on the legislature. My opinion is, they will not. Nor do I suppose any one opposed to branching, will vote against it on that account. Yet, if it is made imperative to branch, although it is against the wishes of a majority, it will have to be done, and however inconvenient it may be when put to practice, it will have to stand until the constitution is altered, and will necessarily bring against the constitution we adopt a heavy vote.

Our work sir, would be endangered, and greatly endangered by introducing as fixed rules, matters that have not been desired by the people.

What papers in the state proposed or discussed the plan desired by the committee of the court of appeals? What delegates made it a question in their canvass? The gentlemen from Simpson and Montgomery, both say they spoke of it to their constituents. This may be all true, but does it prove that a majority of the people, or of even their own constituents favor the project in the absence of any contest upon it, or direct expressions of the people's will. Let me ask the honorable gentleman from Simpson how many litigants from his county had occasion to come to the appellate tribunal of the state the past year.

Mr. CLARKE. If the gentleman will permit me, I believe the tables show only one case. There would perhaps have been more, if the inconvenience of travel, and the increased expense of attendance upon the court of appeals, had not been so great. Hence, justice was withheld from them.

Mr. LINDSEY. He answers one, only one. But he says many more would have asked reversals of erroneous decisions given against them, but from the fact that the distance was so great to Frankfort. It proves one of two propositions to be true; that the cases decided must be small indeed, or that there is more need of lawyers in his county, than of a branch of the court of appeals.

It cannot be that a gentleman of his abilities as a lawyer, would see an erroneous opinion of the circuit judge given, and his client's rights disregarded—his property wrongfully taken—when the erroneous judgment could have been revised at an expense of fifty cents or a dollar paid for postage, in transmitting by mail to the town of Frankfort, the record of the case, with a short written brief, pointing out the errors of the circuit court.

Sir, the time was when the court of appeals of Kentucky was what every tribunal of the last resort should be, a court having the confidence of the people—an ornament to the State—and its decisions commanded respect and confidence wherever read. Those were the days when the court had around them lawyers of the highest eminence in their profession. Causes were then argued and re-argued, and opinions were revised and re-revised until they contained an expression of the law plain and easy to be understood.

Those were the days when causes were required to be argued, and then the bar enlightened the court and the court the bar. It was this discussion and labor that made such a bar and such a court. Even in those times, sir, when there was no admission to practice in that court except by regular license of the court—when personal appearance was demanded—when litigants or counsel had to attend the court and await their turns upon the docket, the efforts to branch the court, repeatedly made, were unsuccessful. The arguments then were as now, the great distance to come—the exceeding hardship that a litigant should have to travel all the way to Frankfort with his record.

These objections, sir, were obviated by rules of practice made by the court of appeals and by legislative enactments; until now a man may practice in that court who cannot practice in the county courts of the state. He has, sir, but to write a brief in his client's name, and to send it to the court, and the thing is done. The court is left to find out and apply the law themselves without the aid of authorities. In half the cases they decide, and those who practice in the way suggested, do not aid the court; yet in every case when they do not get a cause decided as they want, become critics on the decisions of the court, and thereby aid in destroying the confidence the people should have in such a tribunal.

It is but a short time since, perhaps one or two winters past, the legislature passed an act requiring the clerk of the court of appeals to docket the causes of each judicial district together. The docket is published under this arrangement before court, so that every lawyer who desires to attend the court in person can come on the very morning of the day if he pleases when his case is to be heard. Thus, sir, every arrangement that can be made to cheapen and make convenient the practice in that court has been adopted, and still some of the profession at a distance seem dissatisfied, and make charges that Frankfort lawyers are monopolizing the business of that court. Look to the records of the court what lawyers of Frankfort are doing—not one sixteenth of the causes are attended to by them. For my humble self, were I actuated by selfish considerations, and looking to what I might make as a lawyer, I would say unhesitatingly branch. But no such considerations are influencing me—none such influenced the people of Franklin in twice casting a handsome majority in favor of this convention. Have they regarded such matters as have gravely on this floor been charged upon them? Nay, had they dreaded the fierce denunciations that some are inclined to hurl at them, it would have been their true policy to have voted against the convention throughout.

What would be said to a plan like that of Ohio, of increasing the judges and having a court of appeals in every county. This would be bringing decisions of causes nearer still to every man's door, although it might not bring him justice or correct law. That is the plan in one sister state—one exceedingly disliked by the people of Ohio, if I am correctly informed, in relation thereto. They have been compelled to require their supreme judges to meet in bank at the capital of their state once a year to preserve uniformity of decision amongst them on their circuits, and to have the opinion of a full court on questions new or difficult. No one wants such a machinery here, I am sure, yet it is but carrying out the principle contended for, that the highest courts should be brought to every man's door.

The next thing looked for, is that the governor of the commonwealth shall branch out. He can't be branched. Why shall he not travel through each county of the state dispensing the duties of the office fairly to each county, and doing the business of the people at their own doors. A fair division of his time in that way would not only be pleasant, but would perhaps keep him in fine health by traveling. Is there not, sir, in the executive departments, twice the amount of business to be transacted by the people which requires them to come in person or by proxy, to what there is in the court of appeals? The same in relation to the legislature. Why require that this department shall sit at one place? Could they not as well move about holding sessions one year at one place, and another year at another? These rambling departments may suit some, but I imagine if left to the people they will not approve them, even on the consideration of having law and justice at their doors.

But some gentlemen say the expenses to be incurred are nothing. Sir, I do not let dollars and cents influence me much in gratifying the wishes of my friends in building up this constitution, yet I know sir, the taxes of this state have increased fearfully in the last fifteen years, and are in a fair way, from the failure of our public works to meet expenditures, to be increased greatly more. It is time sir—it is necessary that we cheapen the administration of justice, and the expenses of government to the people, instead of increasing them. Every one concedes that the branching must necessarily increase the expenses, and the gentleman from Simpson would have had all his people taxed to have brought four judges to his neighborhood to decide the one case from his county rather than let the litigant pay the expense of getting his cause to Frankfort.

In addition to the items of expense already enumerated by the elder delegate from Nelson, there are a few more sir to be added, if branching prevails.

The attorney general must necessarily attend to the business of the commonwealth in each district court. Who sir, qualified to be the legal adviser of the executive of the state, and all the higher officers, would fill that office and perform its duties then for four or even five times the salary now paid—abandoning all other business and every other pursuit, to ride about with the judges to the several courts as he would have to do. He cannot practice by brief in causes of the commonwealth, that he did not attend to in the court below, nor would it be meet and proper that he should do so.

Then sir, you must have a traveling reporter for the court, or four reporters, with sufficient salaries to command competent persons to perform the service of reporting the opinions of the court.

And you must also increase the publication of your statutes and reports four fold, at least, over the number now required, for exchanges with other states and the United States, which will be found no small item of increase. Thirty copies of reports and statutes now for the states, and one or more of each for the United States, must be quadrupled, saying nothing of all other books requisite for a library.

The interest of the state—the convenience of the people—I do not believe require the branching of the court of appeals. Certainly it was not a matter complained of sufficiently to justify us in making it a fixed rule in our constitution to be made. I am, for one, unwilling to hazard higher things, we know the people require, by introducing doubtful ones, to say the least, that have not been required. I will vote to leave it to the people. If they desire it, the legislature will be commanded so to arrange the court.

Mr. President, I did not intend to have said a word on this subject to day, nor would I have spoken, but for the attack made upon my town and county by the honorable delegate from Simpson, who seems to think that Frankfort influence is at work against his favorite measure. Such complaints are often made by persons who seem to me to find out a great deal more of the actions of the people here than I do. I aver sir, I have seen no interference by any citizen of Frankfort, in any way upon any subject before us. They are a free people, and will remain so, unless frightened by the threats of my friend from Simpson.

Once for all sir, I have to say, the people of Frankfort have asked nothing from the convention. They have not, in any way, interposed their feelings, interest, or wishes against any of the matters as yet discussed before the convention; and I do protest sir, against their being held up unjustly as I think they have been to-day, when they have not, in any way, interfered, and their delegate has but exercised the right belonging to every member of voting as he deems right for the interest of the state.

Mr. APPERSON. We have heard the gentleman from Franklin enquire here to-day, what has Frankfort got? I am delighted with Frankfort, and always have been ever since my first visit to the place; but the enquiry has been made what has Frankfort got? In regard to the public buildings, although erected by the people of Frankfort, how often have the people of Frankfort applied to the legislature that money shall be applied from the common public treasury to repay them?

Mr. LINDSEY. I have resided here for thirteen years, and during that time, I have heard of but one application of the kind made. It was to obtain the return of seven or eight hundred dollars by a widow, whose husband at the time the subscription was made, was in affluent circumstances, and surrounded by all the comforts of life. Misfortune brought her to the very depths of poverty, and she was in those circumstances, left with two feeble daughters to provide for. That is the only application ever made to the legislature, so far as my information extends, to pay back any portion of the sum which was contributed by the citizens of Frankfort to the erection of the public buildings. I referred to the fact which will be found recorded in a neighboring county, that at the time when it was proposed to locate the capital here, there was pledged by the owners of the property, a block of lots, now solidly covered by some of the best houses of the town, the whole proceeds of which went into the state treasury to pay for the erection of the public buildings. And be it said to the discredit of the representatives of the people, with a full knowledge of all the suffering that surrounded that lady, and with an overflowing treasury at the time, they wasted and expended it on foolish projects of internal improvement throughout the commonwealth, resulting in nothing but loss to the state, and did not return the money or any part of it.

Mr. APPERSON. I think if the gentleman had looked a little further back, before he came here, he might have found other cases. I have heard of them at any rate, although I do not know whether the money was ever returned or not. But I was going on to notice the enquiry, what has Frankfort had? The present governor is a resident of Frankfort. I was delighted with his nomination and aided in securing it. The clerk of the court of appeals resides in Frankfort, and it is the best office in the state. The register and the second auditor also belong to Frankfort, and they are good appointments, and I do not complain of them. What else has Frankfort had? She has, in the person of one of her citizens, a minister to Mexico—that portion of the foreign ministers that falls to the share of Kentucky. She has also the consul to Liverpool, one of the most lucrative offices in the gift of the president, and she has also a commissioner of Indian Affairs. Now what has Frankfort got, or rather what has she not got? I do not complain. She has distinguished and intelligent citizens, and I believe these are all first rate appointments, but I wish to ask how all this happens? Is there more intelligence and virtue in Frankfort than there is in Louisville, Lexington, Bowlinggreen, Bardstown, and Harrodsburg all put together? It is because there has been a gradual and continual concentration of the representatives of the people, at Frankfort, and there all the greatness seems to have concentrated. The other day, we were told that there were thirteen lawyers residing in the town of Frankfort who practiced in the court of appeals. Were there that many in Louisville? Let us look at the counties not in the habit of sending up causes to the court of appeals. Suppose we look for a moment at Daviess—it is about as wealthy a county as Franklin, and has about as many voters, and I presume she ought to have as many lawyers, and as able ones to make exceptions, and bring up their cases here, if they did not live so far off. Is it possible that Daviess has no good lawyers? She has one, I know, on this floor, a most excellent lawyer, and a very worthy and intelligent gentleman. I would infer from the remarks of the gentleman from Franklin, that the lawyers in other portions of the state, were from some reason negligent of their clients, and never prepared their causes to bring before the court of appeals. Now I presume that the lawyers all over Kentucky are doing their duty to their clients. So far as my experience is concerned, I have found that the lawyers in the most remote portions of the state have paid quite as much attention to the interests of their clients, as have those in the neighborhood of Frankfort. But in all parts of the state there are not the same facilities and opportunities of obtaining justice, and they feel the want of it.

Gentlemen say that this matter has not been discussed among the people, and that they have not been consulted in regard to it. I insist that in portions of the state at least this is not the fact. The people of the county I represent have been consulted, and there was no difference of opinion on the subject among the candidates. It is true that the county of Montgomery has not suffered as much inconvenience as some other counties, for she has had her fair proportion of causes in the court of appeals. I would be pleased to have the court come to Mt. Sterling, but personally I am satisfied it would be better for me if it was never branched. I practice in many of the adjacent counties, and many of the litigants there have employed me in the court of appeals, when I was not engaged in the court below. But I do not expect to do as much of this business if the court is brought to my town. Why it would be an invitation to other lawyers to settle at Mt. Sterling, and there would soon be as many there as at Frankfort.

But that is not the question. It is, does any grievance exist, and how has it happened? Is Frankfort so much more of a commercial place, and has there been so much more litigation arising there than at Owensboro', where manufactures are growing up? Perhaps it is not so large a town, but it is an equally rich county, rich people, and has as many voters as Franklin. And go to the next county, Henderson, and soon down, and you will see that there is a very great disproportion. I was, I must confess, greatly astonished to hear the gentleman from Breathitt talking about the attorney general as he did. The gentleman ought to have known that the attorney general does not live here, and does not compose part of the court of appeals, and if he will examine the docket, he will find that there are but very few cases in which that functionary appears. What has he to do with the court of appeals? There are no criminal causes, except little petty misdemeanor cases perhaps brought up here, and does the gentleman think the attorney general would travel all over the state to attend to such causes? But the gentleman might have known that this was a rule which would work both ways. If it was so convenient for two thirds of the lawyers in this commonwealth to appear by brief in the court, would it be any the less convenient for the attorney general to do the same with the few cases he had charge of? Now, so far as the attorney general is concerned, if we shall sit here until the first Monday in December, we shall sit until the court of appeals is in session, and if the gentleman will go into the court room, I venture to say, that he will not see the attorney general more than once in that court. And yet he is a gentleman well qualified for the station, and always attends to the business.

Another objection urged, was the expense of additional officers, tipstiffs, constables, etc., attendant on branching the court of appeals. Now, if an examination was made, it would be found that these officers were paid by the day, and would be required whether the court sat here, as now, or whether it was branched. The expense, therefore, would be the same in both cases. I was a little amused at the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) in his designation of the districts. One of them, the eastern district, he commenced at the head of the Big Sandy, and run across to the mouth of the Kentucky river. He would hardly do that, I apprehend, if he was in the legislature. The district would with more propriety be framed, by including several of the counties on the south side of the Kentucky river, and would not embrace Payette county. I admit that Franklin would not be so well accommodated thereby, and perhaps Woodford, Jessamine, Anderson, Henry, and other counties nearer, might not, but then look at the greater number of counties whose facilities would be greatly increased if the court was branched. It may be that Harrodsburg would be the centre of another district, though I hardly suppose it would, and at any rate it would be a duty for the legislature, and not this convention, to perform.

So far as the substitute of the gentleman from Jessamine (Mr. A. K. Marshall) was concerned, there was one feature in it which I shall support. I am glad that so able a gentleman has come forward to aid me, for I stated in my remarks on a previous occasion, that at a proper time I should move that the judges should be elected by the state at large, and I understand that his amendment makes just such a provision. Thus far the gentleman from Jessamine and myself are together.

But is there not a grievance in this matter? I take it for granted that the lawyers in other parts of the state are just as attentive to the rights of their clients as are those residing in the centre, and that they would be just as apt to undertake to save the rights of their clients, or would be, if they had the same facility to have their rights adjudicated upon. But, says the gentleman from Franklin, why not make the appellate court travel all over the state, into every county, as it does in Ohio? I answer, because it is inexpedient to do so, and because the same end can be attained by branching. But this, it was urged, would make the court less dignified. Did the branches system make the courts of Virginia, South Carolina, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, and New York, less dignified? Was it such a reproach on the judges to require them to travel? Take the number at five hundred cases, and divide them into four parts, and there would be one hundred and twenty five each. Was it so very hard to require four men to travel, say two hundred miles, and not at all hard to require one hundred and twenty five men to travel the same distance to come here? But there would be more than one hundred and twenty five; there would be the parties to each suit, thus making two hundred and fifty. And what is there undignified in these judges thus traveling to four parts of the state and holding their courts there? Will it tend to degrade the courts whose authority is the highest of any we have, those of New York, Massachusetts, Virginia, Pennsylvania, and others? If so, how does it happen that the decisions of those courts stand so high with our own?

The PRESIDENT, the hour of twelve having arrived, announced the special orders of the day.

Mr. DAVIS moved to dispense with the special order, which was agreed to.

Mr. APPERSON. The gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) has said that the court would be required to sit nine or ten weeks in each place. If there was any evidence that it would sit so long, it is conclusive evidence that the court should be branched. He tells you that they sit now but fifty days at each term, that is about eight weeks. Now when you come to make the calculation, I think that if you branch the court, and require them to sit in four different places, they will not be engaged more than thirty two weeks out of the fifty two. The gentleman has told us that we ought not to be too specific in what we do, and yet what do we find in his bill? He has been so specific as to set down even what shall be the amount of the judges' salary. That is specific enough in all conscience. And his circuit bill reminds me that if the principle is correct, that the court of appeals shall sit all the time in one place, why not apply the same principle to the circuit judge, and say he shall sit in but one place? If it is so undignified for the judges of one court to travel over the whole state, why is it not as equally undignified for the others to travel over, as some of them have to do, ten counties? It is because of the disposition to bring justice as near to every man's door as may be. But I have supposed that four weeks would be sufficient to do the business of the court of appeals at any one of the branches. Perhaps the one in which Frankfort would be situated, if Louisville was thrown in with it, would require five or six weeks. We find that, during the four weeks of the last term the court decided one hundred and thirty cases, and that was quite as many as any district would ever have before it, unless it was the one in which Frankfort and Louisville were situated. Clearly, then, they would not be required to sit longer at all the points than sixteen weeks at one; that would be thirty two weeks a year, and if two more weeks were added for districts where there might be more business, still that would not require more than thirty six weeks. And if we are going to pay these officers so well, certainly they can afford to labor these thirty six weeks.

The gentleman from Nelson has said that there were a few lawyers, who brought up all of the cases to the court of appeals. I have heard it said also that some gentlemen had such influence over courts and juries that they could gain any cause they pleased. The gentleman has told us that he was advised that the best way to succeed in the practice of law, was to be on good terms with the judge, and I suppose the gentleman has acted on that advice. I do not mean to say that any judge has been partial to that gentleman, but we all know what his talents are, and his great ability to make the worse appear the better cause, and in this way he is able to have the decision in his own way. Hence I suppose those on the opposite side find themselves obliged to come up here to seek redress at the hands of the court of appeals.
