"Resolved, That when experience shall point out the necessity of amending this constitution, and when a majority of all the members elected to each house of the general assembly shall, within the first twenty days of their stated biennial session, concur in passing a law for taking the sense of the good people of this state, as to the necessity and expediency of calling a convention, it shall be the duty of the several sheriffs, and other returning officers, at the next general election which shall be held for representatives after the passage of such law, to open a poll in which the qualified electors of this state shall express, by vote, whether they are in favor of calling a convention or not; and said sheriffs and returning officers shall make return to the secretary, for the time being, of the names of all those electors voting at such election; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of the qualified electors of this state, voting at such election, have voted for calling a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next regular session, direct that a similar poll shall be opened and taken at the next election for representatives; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of all the electors of this state, voting at such election, have voted for calling a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there shall be in the house of representatives, and no more, to be chosen in the same manner and proportion, at the same places, and at the same time that representatives are, by the electors qualified to vote for representatives, and to meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of re-adopting, amending, or changing this constitution. But if it shall appear by the vote of either year, as aforesaid, that a majority of all the qualified electors voting at such election, did not vote for a convention, a convention shall not be called. All cases of contested elections of delegates, and where two or more candidates for delegate to any convention, that may be called under this constitution, shall have an equal number of votes, shall be decided in such manner as may be provided by law."

CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. APPERSON submitted the following section, and having briefly stated its object and necessity, it was adopted:

"Sec. — In case of the sickness of any circuit court judge, or for other good cause, which may prevent his attending any of his courts, the general assembly shall be authorized to make provision by the general laws for the appointment of a special judge to attend such courts, and also for the trial of such causes as the circuit judge, when present, cannot try from any cause."

THE LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention again resumed the consideration of the report on the legislative department.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. At this late day of the session, I am exceedingly reluctant to consume the time of the convention, with any remarks of mine, because we are all anxious to bring our labors to a close, and return to our homes, and the bosoms of our families. Besides, sir, there may be some danger of getting into the book of abstractions, we have just heard proposed. Nevertheless, on a question of this kind, I am for at least enough of examination and discussion, to enable us to vote understandingly. I am aware that some complaint has been indulged in, in some quarters, against the convention, because of the length of the session. Well sir, we have been here about seventy five days, and will, I am well convinced, be ready to adjourn, by this time next week, unless something may hereafter occur to prevent it; if so, we will have revised the constitution in a shorter time than the same work has been done by any convention of any one of the other states, which has recently been called—at least as far as my recollection now serves me. Quite a number of the states have lately called conventions, all of which, I believe, have taken more time than this body has done. It may have been that debate on some subjects, was to some extent, unnecessarily lengthened, yet I have at no time called the previous question. In fact, have never called it in my life; for I am for giving all an equal opportunity of being heard. But I take this occasion to remark, that if we should be so unfortunate as to be detained till Christmas, which I hope and trust will not be the case, I shall vote against taking a recess, even on Christmas day. It would make no difference with me personally, for I live, as it were, under the shadow of the capital; but I would do so, for the accommodation of those members who live at a distance.

I shall, Mr. President, vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston,) and in favor of that offered by the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin.) In opposition to that vote, it is urged, that this thing, of changing the basis of representation was never discussed before the people, and has never been demanded by them. I admit that the question presented by the amendment, was not in that precise form made before the people, yet the subject of apportionment was mentioned, and it was known that it would be before this body, and that the basis of representation go together. There was another question connected with this subject which was not discussed before the people, except in some particular localities, which has, nevertheless, been acted upon by the convention. I allude to that clause in the old constitution, providing that no county should have more than one senator. That has now been changed, and each section of the state is now to have full, equal, and fair representation in both branches of the legislature, according to whatever basis may be established. This has been done, though it was never contemplated by the people at large, when they were voting a year or two since, for calling the convention. I make no doubt, it was looked to in the city of Louisville, and in some other portions of the Ohio border, and perhaps had a strong influence in those places in favor of calling the convention. But it was not looked to by the people at large, yet when the question was presented, and the justice of the convention appealed to, the change was made by a large majority. I was among those who voted for it. I did so, because I came to the convention to do equal and even handed justice to all, as far as my votes would go, irrespective of country or town, and I, with a majority of the convention, considered it right to give each section of the state, uniform and equal representation, upon whatever basis might be established. We are now to fix that basis; and are to meet the question, as to making it the qualified voters of the state, as in the old constitution, or the whole white population, excluding aliens. If the voting population of each part of the state bears the same proportion to the women and children, as it does in every other part, there is no necessity for making any change, for then the qualified voters of a county would always be a fair index to the whole population, so that whether the old, or the new basis were adopted, each county would, in either case, have the same relative political weight. On examination it is found that this is not the case, but that in one section of the state, the adult males bear a much larger proportion to the women and children, than they do in another, and different section. Are those parts of the state, thus having the greater number of women and children entitled to a correspondingly greater voice in the legislative councils of the state? It is insisted by gentlemen that they are not, and that the qualified voters of a state, holding and exercising as they do, all political power, ought alone to be represented.

The provision in the old constitution is pointed to, and invoked, as authority on this subject. It will be recollected, however, that there are now two important reasons in favor of a population basis, not then existing. First, at the time of the adoption of the present constitution, the number of adult males was, relatively, about the same to the women and children in one part of the state, as in any other part. Qualified voters were consequently made the basis, as they then presented a fair index to the whole population. If that were the case now, it would be right and proper to continue the provision unchanged, for I admit that it may be slightly more convenient. Secondly, that tide of foreign population which is now pouring into one part of the state, and which has caused a difference in the relative numbers of men, women and children, did not then exist. The circumstances now meeting us on this subject, are hence materially different from those surrounding the framers of the old constitution, and must be met and treated as they now present themselves. I would not favor a change of this sort, if no material and substantial difference resulted from it. Nor would I favor it, if I did not believe it was demanded by right and justice. I would seek no advantage of any part of the state, but would endeavor to do justice to all, according to equal and correct principles, right within themselves.

For the purpose of ascertaining whether there is in fact a necessity for this change, I have taken some pains in comparing the number of women and children with the number of men; first in some of the Ohio border counties, where this foreign population is chiefly found, and then comparing their relative numbers in the interior and southern counties of the state. My investigation of this subject has brought me to conclusions widely different from those of the gentleman from Oldham, (Mr. Whitehall,) who addressed the convention last night. He labored to show that the returns, as to the children and voters of the state, which we have before us, are inaccurate and uncertain, and not to be relied on. I, however, could not well comprehend how his tables and figures had any practical bearing on this question, or that any thing was, in point of fact, proven by them. For the benefit of my own judgment, I too have made out a set of tables which, by the indulgence of the convention, I will notice for a moment. These tables are made with the view of ascertaining the relative number of women and children, when compared with the qualified voters in the different sections of the state. The auditor's report for 1849, shows the number of children between the ages of five and sixteen in every county of the state, as well as the white males over twenty one in each county: and I take it as true, that the children under twenty one, and not included between these different ages, are relatively the same. But there is no means of ascertaining the proportion of adult females, when compared with the adult males of the different counties of the state, except by the census of 1840. I have, therefore, consulted the census of that year for this purpose, assuming, as fairly may be done, that the proportions now are the same as then. By these means we may arrive at results with sufficient certainty for present purposes.

The first block of counties lie on the Ohio and include the counties of Jefferson, and five others immediately below. They are—

	Males over 21, in 1849.	Child'n bet'n 5 and 16 in 1849.
Breckinridge, - -	1,757	2,250
Daviess, - - -	2,112	2,240
Hancock, - - -	554	747
Henderson, - - -	1,589	2,003
Jefferson, - - -	2,283	8,598
Meade, - - -	1,114	1,620
	16,409	17,458

In this district the children equal the males over 21, with 1,048 only over. In other words, the children equal the males of 21 years of age, with a gain of six and four tenths per cent. over only.

Take another district, containing about an equal number of males over 21 years of age, and lying on or near the Tennessee border, and opposite to the above district, consisting of counties, and having males and children, as follows, to wit:

	Males over 21, in 1849.	Child'n bet'n 5 and 16 in 1849.
Allen, - - -	1,346	2,225
Barren, - - -	2,959	3,664
Butler, - - -	948	1,437
Christian, - - -	2,248	2,801
Cumberland, - - -	973	1,502
Logan, - - -	2,179	2,822
Monroe, - - -	1,247	1,737
Simpson, - - -	1,017	1,375
Todd, - - -	1,499	2,048
Warren, - - -	2,215	2,794
	16,631	22,405

In this district the children equal the adult males, with 5,774 over, or a gain upon the voting population, of thirty-four and eight-tenths per cent.

The latter district has 4,715 children more than the former, and consequently gains, in the single item of children between the ages of five and sixteen, more than half the ratio of a representative.

Pursue the inquiry a step further, and compare the adult male with the adult female population of the same districts. To do this, it will be necessary to resort to the census of 1840, that being the only source of information we have on this subject. I have, accordingly, made a table showing separately, the whole number of white males and females over twenty years of age in 1840, in these two districts respectively.

The table is as follows:

	White males over 20.	White females over 20.
Breckinridge, - -	1,503	1,335
Daviess, - - -	1,402	1,209
Hancock, - - -	485	392
Henderson, - - -	1,466	1,144
Jefferson, - - -	7,881	5,871
Meade, - - -	901	749
	13,638	10,700

Excess of males, 2,938.

Allen, - - -	1,248	1,170
Barren, - - -	2,704	2,627
Butler, - - -	691	657
Christian, - - -	1,959	1,836
Cumberland, - - -	902	871
Logan, - - -	1,877	1,800

Monroe, - - -	1,136	1,115
Simpson, - - -	963	978
Todd, - - -	1,330	1,231
Warren, - - -	2,004	1,816

Excess of males 713 only in 1840.

It is here shown, that in the Tennessee border counties, there is but a very slight difference between the adult male and female population, while in the Louisville district, there is a marked and wide difference. This great difference, is owing chiefly to the city of Louisville itself; for the difference in the single county of Jefferson is 2,010. By a reference to the census, any gentleman will see that it is made up in the city of Louisville, and no where else.

In that city, it stood thus in 1840:

Males over twenty,	5,341
Females over twenty,	3,880
Difference	1,461

It is but fair to conclude, that the number of these two classes of population is relatively the same now as in 1840. If so, as the population of the city has more than doubled in the last nine years, so, proportionally, will this difference be increased, and the next census will show it.

It will be further seen by reference to these tables, that in every county in the Louisville district except Jefferson, the number of children is greater than the number of adult males. In that county they are 685 less; and while the number of children in the whole district, as before stated, only equal the number of males, with six and four tenths per cent. over, the children in the Tennessee border counties equal the number of adult males, with thirty-four and eight tenths per cent. over; and that, according to the figures of 1849.

Compare now the white males over twenty one years of age, with the children between the ages of five and sixteen in two other sections of the state, also, according to the reports of 1849. Begin with a block of river counties above Louisville, to-wit:

	Males over 21.	Child'n betw'n 5 and 16.
Mason - - -	3,114	3,340
Pendleton, - - -	1,336	1,219
Campbell, - - -	2,182	2,204
Kenton, - - -	3,406	3,413
Boone, - - -	1,958	2,323
Gallatin, - - -	883	859
Carroll, - - -	993	1,080
Trimble, - - -	1,084	1,406
Oldham, - - -	1,104	1,316
	16,060	17,160

Difference, 1,100. Here the children equal the adult males, with six and eight-tenths per cent. over.

We will now take a block of mountain counties:

	Adult males.	Children.
Morgan, - - -	1,261	2,014
Breathitt, - - -	621	1,019
Floyd, - - -	986	1,754
Pike, - - -	812	1,320
Johnson, - - -	599	992

Perry,	-	-	502	807
Knox,	-	-	1,130	1,760
Harlan,	-	-	648	1,086
Whitley,	-	-	1,058	1,735
Clay,	-	-	866	1,384
Laurel,	-	-	865	1,414
Rockcastle,	-	-	842	1,219
Letcher,	-	-	381	611
Wayne,	-	-	1,443	2,387
Casey,	-	-	1,057	1,592
Russell,	-	-	940	1,479
Adair,	-	-	1,560	2,323
Clinton,	-	-	812	1,371
			16,381	26,267

These counties, either of the mountains or contiguous, come out with children, equal to the adult males and fifty five and six-tenths per cen. over.

These two blocks of counties contain about an equal number of adult males; but in comparing the children, the river counties are distanced, being only 9,107 behind! Which, to the mountains, is considerably over one representative, in the item of children alone between five and sixteen.

The gain of the mountain on the river counties in women, is as great proportionally, or nearly so, as in children. According to the census of 1840, these counties, respectively, had men and women over the age of twenty, as shown in the following table:

	Males over 20,	Females over 20.
Adair, - - -	1,357	1,351
Breathitt, - -	386	347
Clay, - - -	747	695
Casey, - - -	821	852
Clinton, - -	714	713
Floyd, - - -	1,070	1,011
Harlan, - - -	529	513
Johnson, (formed since 1840.)
Laurel, - - -	602	580
Letcher, (formed since 1840.)
Knox, - - -	968	938
Morgan, - - -	877	747
Pike, - - -	636	595
Perry, - - -	480	486
Rockcastle, -	630	570
Russell, - - -	742	735
Whitley, - - -	842	835
Wayne, - - -	1,271	1,214
	12,612	12,182
Excess of males 430.
Boone, - - -	1,887	1,549
Campbell, - -	1,339	907
Carroll, - - -	779	651
Kenton, - - -	1,710	1,358
Gallatin, - -	775	624
Mason, - - -	2,811	2,375
Oldham, - - -	1,210	997
Pendleton, - -	938	732
Trimble, - - -	833	746
	12,282	9,939

Excess of males, 2,343.

In the mountain counties, the women nearly equal the men, while in the river counties just enumerated, they fall 2,343 behind.

There is no means of ascertaining the relative difference between the number of minors in these different sections of the state, not embraced, between the ages of five and sixteen. But it is obvious, that when they too are enumerated and taken into the estimate, that the interior will be still more strengthened, and the cities on the Ohio border correspondingly weakened.

Why is it, that the women and children, on our northern border, are fewer than in the interior? It is because that border receives the foreign population with which our common country is teeming, and a less number of that population have wives and children. It can be accounted for in no other way.

Some of the counties on the Ohio border, and included in the above tables, will lose nothing, but will rather gain, by making population the basis of representation, as the counties of Daviess, Meade, Hancock, Boone and Trimble.

I admit that my section of the state would gain something more of weight, in an apportionment on the population basis; for example, the counties of Anderson, Marion, and Washington, are swarming with women and children.

	Males over 20, in 1840.	Females over 20, in 1840.
Anderson, - - -	924	843
Marion, - - -	1672	1637
Washington, - -	1576	1548
	4142	4128

Nearly as many females as males.

	Adult males in 1840.	Children in 1840.
Anderson, - - -	1,119	1,473
Marion, - - -	1,762	2,221
Washington, - -	1,847	2,456
	4,728	6,150

Difference in favor of children, 1422.

It hence seems clear, that the effect of the population basis, will be to lessen the weight in the legislature, only of those sections of the state holding our foreign population—one or two of the blue grass counties may lose something by it.

The interior, the new, and the southern border counties, will correspondingly gain.

For the purpose of perfecting these tables, I have made an estimate of the present white population of the state in this way.

In 1840, the white males over 21
in the state numbered	109,360
Whole white population	590,253
We have now adult males	152,234

If the male population over 21, now bears the same proportion to the whole population, as in 1840, our present white population would be 812,000, and a fraction over.

But owing to the influx of the foreigner, the male population now bears a greater proportion than in 1840, so that our present white population cannot be over 800,000.

The ratio would then be to a representative 8,000
In this way we may, with sufficient certainty, get the present population of any county, or section of the state.

Take for example, the mountain counties already mentioned, with the county of Lawrence, which I add, because Johnson was partially taken from it. In these counties the white males over 21, in 1840, was

White population in 1840, 12,243
Adult males in 1849, 71,886

This would give a present population of 101,837

Make qualified voters the basis, and these counties would have eleven members, with a residuum of 602. Make population the basis, and the same counties would have 12 members, with a residuum of 5,837. In other words, in the one case they would have a fraction over 11 members, in the other, a fraction under 13.

These tables conclusively show that the number of males over twenty one in that part of the state, now receiving our foreign population, for the reasons already given, is much greater in proportion to the females and children than in the other sections of the state. That the difference is attributable to this cause, is further shown by taking another block of counties, some of which lie on the Ohio, but in which there are but few foreigners. The first congressional district, for example, to-wit:

	Males over 21 in 1847.	Children between 5 and 16—1849.
Ballard, - - -	825	1,270
Calloway, - - -	1,323	2,207
Crittenden, - -	1,059	1,336
Caldwell, - - -	2,016	2,491
Fulton, - - -	705	974
Graves, - - -	1,665	2,816
Hickman, - - -	758	902
Hopkins, - - -	1,886	2,868
Livingston, - -	952	1,090
Marshall, - - -	870	1,507
McCracken, - -	986	1,215
Trigg, - - -	1,417	1,947
Union, - - -	1,448	1,545
	15,910	22,168

Difference, six thousand two hundred and fifty eight; or a gain of thirty nine and one third per cent. The children in this district equal the males over twenty one, with a gain of thirty nine and one third per cent. This district, in the way of children, comes nearer to the mountain counties than any other in the state, and is consequently entitled to the second premium. The mountain counties of course get the first. For want of time, I have not ascertained the number of women, when compared with the men in this district, but they are undoubtedly about as numerous as the men, for it will be seen that in every county where the children are numerous, there the women are numerous. Wherever you find children in abundance, there the women abound. And in this state, wherever you find the women numerous, there you have plenty of children. It is not so every where. In some countries the condition of the female population is such that the number of children raised by them is much less than in this. In our own state, however, such is the happy condition of the masses of the people, as far as average wealth and prosperity are concerned, that all may, with safety, in obedience to one of his first commands of heaven, "multiply and replenish the earth."

The gentleman from Oldham, (Mr. Mitchell,) insists that we have no example for this population basis. Such is not the case. The constitution of New York has the following provision on this subject:

"The members of assembly shall be apportioned as nearly as may be, according to the number of inhabitants, excluding aliens and persons of color not taxed."

Mr. MITCHELL explained.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. The constitution of Pennsylvania has a similar provision. They afford examples at once, and show at least, this much: that there is not that difficulty in taking the enumerations, as contended for by both the gentleman from Oldham and the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston.) Why sir, there are examples in many of the constitutions of the union, perhaps a majority of them make white population the basis of representation. But if no other state in the union had adopted this basis, it would afford no reason why Kentucky should not, if the thing is right within itself. The question is presented to us and must be decided. In that decision, justice should be done. But these gentlemen urge, as an objection, that the assessor, or other officer who makes the enumeration is made a judge, as to who should be enumerated and who not—as to who is the alien, and who the naturalized citizen. Why sir, does not the present constitution make qualified voters the basis of representation; and are not these officers required to distinguish between those who are qualified voters, and those who are not? Such has been the constitution and laws up to this time. If the officer does his duty under the present constitution, he reports the naturalized citizen as a qualified voter, and the aliens not qualified. Nor does that inconvenience result which has been urged. It is now the duty of the assessor to take down every male over twenty one years of age, and every unmarried female of that age, if for nothing else, to take a list of her property. It is also his duty to take lists of the children between five and sixteen. The only additional trouble would be to have another column to take down the whole number of children under twenty one. It might, perhaps, require two additional columns. But in neither case would it require more than one minute of time for each list, because of these additional columns.

Mr. President, the effect of the new basis, when the population of the whole state is considered, will be to transfer a part of the political power enjoyed by those counties now receiving the foreign population to the interior, and, in short, to those parts of the state on which that tide is not pouring. We are told that the blue grass counties will lose by it. It is true, that a few of them would not number quite so high, yet they, in point of fact, would lose nothing. The county of Franklin would always have a representative; for she has a large residuum. The county of Fayette will always have two. Bourbon will lose one with either basis, but will always have one left. Woodford will always have one, because surrounded by residuums. So that these blue grass counties, as they are called, will, in point of fact, lose nothing, let the question be decided either way. My own county, in this respect, is most happily situated, for she also is surrounded by residuums, which will always give her a representative. But I do not deny but that my section of the state would be something the gainer, for as the gentleman from Logan has told us, women and children are there found in abundance. But, sir, I do not want any thing at the expense of justice; but I maintain that every part of the state should be represented according to its whole population. It is contended that qualified voters only should be represented, because they exercise the whole political power of the state. It is true, that they have assumed and exercised that power, and this has been so in every country. But do they exercise that power for their own benefit only, or for the benefit of the women and children who are excluded from its exercise, as well as for themselves? If they exercise that power for the benefit of the women and children, with whom they are surrounded, as well as for themselves, then those women and children should be taken into the basis of representation.

Sir, when I go to the polls and cast my vote, if I am governed by the principles which ought to control a patriot and lover of his country, I will in that vote as much represent the interests of the women and children by whom I am surrounded, and with whom I am connected, as I, upon this floor, am bound to represent the interests of the voters themselves who have honored me with a seat here. These women and children are properly excluded from the exercise of political power, but they have interests and civil rights as dear and as sacred to them as ours, and which ought, therefore, to be protected and represented. If this is just and right, why deny it to them? For illustration, take this case, which in point of fact does not exist: Suppose the eastern part of the state were engaged in such mining operations as required male labor chiefly, and that they had but few women and children among them, but half the voters of the state, while the western part was engaged in such pursuits, as in some parts of Massachusetts, as required chiefly female labor, and though not having a majority of voters had double the population, and double the interests to be protected and represented; would it not be right, in a case of that kind, to give representation according to population, and the interests to be protected? If so, that is the principle here contended for, and nothing else. Sir, a few days since, we saw the Louisville delegation struggling for equal representation in the senate, and, as well they might, manifesting great zeal on behalf of their constituents. The question here presented is greatly more important than that; for the mountain, interior, and southern counties will gain by carrying it, much more than if they had placed in the new constitution the restriction by which no county could have more than one senator, as it is in the old. That restriction was changed, because in apparent conflict with principle. The change operates to the advantage of that part of the state on the Ohio, having the greatest foreign population, and that only.

The proposed basis would, on the other side of the question, give the other parts of the state additional representative strength. They insist on that basis, not to deprive any county of its just rights, but to give all equal representation, according to the entire white population, aliens excepted. It would be only carrying out a principle, just and equitable to all alike. It is no struggle for political power, at the expense of principle. Nor need it be for the purpose of strengthening the institution of slavery, though such, to some extent, would be its effect. That institution is already sustained by public opinion, and will continue as it is. But the proposition presents itself as one of sheer justice. I am not for it because of any unkind feeling to the naturalized citizen. Such is not the case. As I regard the question as of some importance, and as it has not been discussed before the people, I considered it as proper to give here, and to my constituents, the reasons for the vote I shall give.

Mr. HAY moved the previous question, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The question first in order was on the motion of Mr. PRESTON to strike out all after the word "cities."

Mr. CLARKE desired that the roll might be called, and it was called accordingly.

Mr. CLARKE then moved that the absent members be sent for.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays, and they were yeas 10, nays 84.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, George W. Johnston, William D. Mitchell, Elijah F. Nuttall, William Preston, Ira Root, James Rudd, John W. Stevenson—10.

NAYS—Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, Wm. Bradley, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William Chennault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Chastain T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, Geo. W. Mansfield, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thos. Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ignatius A. Spalding, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—84.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAY called for the yeas and nays on

Mr. HARDIN'S amendment, and they were—yeas 47, nays 48.

YEAS—John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Chas-teen T. Dunavan, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Wil- liam Hendrix, Thomas J. Hood, James W. Irwin, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, Jonathan Newcum, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Thomas Rock- hold, John T. Rogers, Ignatius A. Spalding, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John J. Thurman, Philip Triplett, John Wheeler, Silas Woodson—47.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Ap- person, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Jas. S. Chrisman, Garrett Davis, Lu- cius Desha, Archibald Dixon, James Dudley, Benjamin F. Edwards, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Andrew Hood, Mark E. Huston, Alfred M. Jack- son, George W. Johnston, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Martin P. Marshall, Wm. C. Marshall, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, William Pres- ton, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Ira Root, James Rudd, John W. Stevenson, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, Howard Todd, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washing- ton, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Wes- ley J. Wright—48.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the sixth section.

Mr. DESHA moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson was rejected.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE moved to lay the mo- tion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays, and they were—yeas 48, nays 47.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Ap- person, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, Archibald Dixon, Jas. Dudley, Benjamin F. Edwards, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Andrew Hood, Mark E. Huston, Alfred M. Jack- son, George W. Johnston, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Martin P. Marshall, Wm. C. Marshall, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, William Pres- ton, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Ira Root, James Rudd, John W. Stevenson, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, Howard Todd, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washing- ton, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Wes- ley J. Wright—48.

NAYS—John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Chas-teen T. Dunavan, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Wil- liam Hendrix, Thomas J. Hood, James W. Irwin, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Thos. W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, Jonathan Newcum, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Thomas Rock- hold, John T. Rogers, Ignatius A. Spalding, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John J. Thurman, Philip Triplett, John Wheeler, Silas Woodson—47.

So the motion to re-consider was laid upon the table.

The question again recurred on the adoption of the section.

Mr. APPERSON suggested that it was sus- ceptible of division, and to the second branch amendments would be desirable. He also sug- gested that it might be found necessary to debate the principle involved in that branch, and he ex- pressed a hope that, by common consent, the previous question be understood as not apply- ing to it.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE called for a division of the question.

It was divided accordingly, and the first branch, fixing the basis of representation, was adopted.

By unanimous consent the previous question was not applied to that branch of the section.

Mr. APPERSON then offered the following, as a substitute for the residue of the section:

"At the first session of the general assembly af- ter the adoption of this constitution, provision shall be made by law, that in the year 1858, and ev- ery eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative population of the state shall be made. The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation, the state is hereby laid off into ten districts.

"The first district shall be composed of the counties of Fulton, Hickman, Ballard, McCrack- en, Graves, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston, Crittenden, Union, Hopkins, Caldwell, and Trigg.

"The second district shall be composed of the counties of Christian, Muhlenburg, Henderson, Daviess, Hancock, Ohio, Breckinridge, Meade, Grayson, Butler, and Edmonson.

"The third district shall be composed of the counties of Todd, Logan, Simpson, Warren, Al- len, Monroe, Barren, and Hart.

"The fourth district shall be composed of the counties of Cumberland, Adair, Green, Taylor, Clinton, Russell, Wayne, Pulaski, Casey, Boyle, and Lincoln.

"The fifth district shall be composed of the counties of Hardin, Larue, Bullitt, Spencer, Nel- son, Washington, Marion, Mercer, and Anderson.

Rockcastle, Laurel, Clay, Whitley, Knox, Harlan, Perry, Letcher, Pike, Floyd, and Johnson.

"The seventh district shall be composed of the counties of Jefferson, Oldham, Trimble, Carroll, Henry and Shelby, and the city of Louisville.

"The eighth district shall be composed of the counties of Bourbon, Fayette, Scott, Owen, Franklin, Woodford, and Jessamine.

"The ninth district shall be composed of the counties of Clarke, Montgomery, Bath, Fleming, Lewis, Greenup, Carter, Lawrence, Morgan and Breathitt.

"The tenth district shall be composed of the counties of Mason, Bracken, Nicholas, Harrison, Pendleton, Campbell, Grant, Kenton, Boone, and Gallatin.

"The number of representatives shall, at the several sessions of the general assembly, next after the making of these enumerations, be apportioned among the ten several districts, proportioned according to the respective qualified voters in each: and the representatives shall be apportioned, as near as may be, among the counties, towns and cities in each district; and in making such apportionment the following rules shall govern, to wit: Every county, town or city having the ratio shall have one representative; if double the ratio, two representatives, and so on. Next, the counties, towns or cities having one or more representatives, and the largest number of qualified voters above the ratio, and counties, towns and cities having the largest number of qualified voters under the ratio, regard being always had to the greatest number of qualified voters: Provided, however, That if there should be any county not having a sufficient number of qualified voters to entitle it to one representative, yet it shall have a representative, if all the adjacent counties in the same district have a sufficient number of qualified voters to entitle them respectively to one representative: And, provided further, That when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified voters to entitle it to one representative, then such county may be joined to some adjacent county or counties to send one representative, provided such adjacent county has not a full ratio. When a new county shall be formed of territory belonging to more than one district, it shall form a part of that district having the least number of qualified voters."

Mr. IRWIN. I move to amend the amendment, by striking it out and inserting the minority report, which I presented this morning.

Having had the honor of presenting the substitute which will shortly have to be voted upon by the convention, I feel it an imperative duty to draw a comparison between its merits and the merits of the one presented by the committee on apportionment. I have examined the bearing of that report. I think I understand what will be its results, and I confess that of all the propositions to apportion the representation of the state, it is the most unjust, and of course the most unequal. Now, our great object is to apportion the representation among the several counties of the state as nearly equal as may be, without regard to political results, and acknowledging the difficulty of doing this with anything like exactitude, and in fact knowing that in some particular places it is almost impossible, I have only changed the section of the old constitution, so as to make it imperative on the part of the legislature to start at a particular point or points that shall be most agreeable to the convention. Now, if the legislature shall undertake to apportion the state according to the substitute which I have offered, I think one of the greatest difficulties resulting from the present mode of apportionment will be avoided, and as the public men of the state are accustomed to the present mode I incline to the opinion that it should be adopted.

What objectionable principles are contained in the substitute, that do not exist to a greater degree in the report of the committee? Is there more equality? Is there more justice? I ask gentlemen to show me in what particular has the report the advantage over my substitute? I venture to affirm, that in the application of the principles of the report, it will be clearly seen that an inequality exists which has never existed under the old constitution, and which is so manifestly unjust, that its adoption would do more towards preventing the adoption of the new constitution than any principle which, up to this period, has been incorporated in it.

To show the inequality of the committee's report, I shall give the result of the principles when applied to the counties, and I feel sure that it will conclusively prove to the convention, that the committee's report should not be adopted. Let us take the first district. Caldwell gets one member with 2,016; Crittenden gets a member with 1,059. The difference is 957.

Again, Hopkins gets a member with 1,886 votes, Calloway gets one with 1,323, and the difference is 563.

Let us examine the second district, where there are some cases of inequality of much greater magnitude. Christian gets one member with 2,248 voters, and Hancock gets one with 554 voters; the difference is 1,694. This is a startling inequality. Daviess gets a member with 2,112 voters, Meade one with 1,114 voters; the difference is 998. Breckinridge gets a member with 1,757 voters, Grayson one with 1,108 voters; the difference is 649 voters. Now, let us look at the third district—the one in which I live. Logan—according to the report, with 2,179 voters gets but one member, while Simpson gets a member with 1,017; the difference is 1,162 voters. Warren with 2,215 voters gets but one member, Monroe gets a member with 1,247 voters; the difference is 968 voters. These startling inequalities are, I think, sufficient to justify the convention in rejecting the report, whether they shall adopt my substitute or not. I will barely remark, that similar inequalities run through the entire report.

What are the chief merits of the substitute? In the first place, the mode of its operation is well understood. You commence at a given point in the state, and as soon as the ratio is supplied, you move on with your residuum, until the apportionment is completed. Does not every gentleman see that at what point soever the voters reside, there the representative will sure to be.

It has been objected to this system, that the state will be gerrymandered so as to suit the principles of the dominant party, by throwing the residuums into those counties where the political opinions of the voters shall coincide with the majority making the apportionment. Now, to some extent this may be true, but I ask gentlemen to show me how this matter can be avoided. Suppose you adopt the system of districting the state, will not residuums have to be rolled about in the districts? And will not the same principle be put in practice, although the territory over which the application is to be made will be of smaller extent? I ask again, what is gained by a departure from the old system? Some gentleman here indicate, that I make this struggle because my county is likely to loose a member. Well sir, is there any thing wrong in that? The county of Logan—than which there is not in the whole state, one more to be relied on for the correctness of her political sentiments—is about to be shorn of her political power, by the application of principles in the mode of apportionment, and gentlemen taunt me with the remark, that I am only for Logan. I do not deny, sir, that I feel that she is about to be wronged, and I shall do all I can to prevent the application of a principle which is to militate in the least degree against her political power. Sir, she has honored me long; she has done every thing for me, and I will stand by her as long as I can raise my voice in her defence; and if she must loose her political strength, it shall be against my solemn protest, and my earnest appeal for justice. It is all I ask. I demand it not only for Logan, but for Warren, for Christian, Nelson, Shelby, and all that large class of whig counties whose political strength is to be demolished by this report, and whose strength is to be transferred to Scott, Hancock, and as I believe, ultimately to democratic counties, with less political strength, merely because they are more favorably situated in the districts in the committee's report. Sir, I have not much hope that my proposition will be adopted, but having done my duty to my constituents and to my country, I shall leave the subject with the convention.

Mr. TURNER. I have been here in the legislature when representation has been apportioned, and I understand perfectly all the difficulties that exist in the matter. The old constitution required the residuums to be rolled from one county to another, and thus it depended upon the point of commencement, whether justice was done throughout the state or not. It was under that principle that Warren had two members and Pulaski one, while the latter had three hundred more votes. Unless prevented by the constitution, the dominant party in the legislature will always exercise the power to their own advantage. This can be prevented by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Logan, (Mr. Irwin,) with the addition of a slight amendment, which I shall propose. It is, that the representative shall go with the largest residuum, wherever it may be situated. Thus no county will be entitled to a member, if its population is less than that of some residuum in any portion of the state, and no county will get an additional member, unless its residuum is the largest in the state. The old system of apportionment was well enough, if controlled by a principle of this kind, and would secure the nearest approach to equality of representation that can be attained.

Mr. IRWIN. I will accept of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. GARFIELDE. Mr. President, I have a proposition which I desire may be read for the information of the convention.

The secretary read it as follows:

"The house of representatives shall, at all times, consist of as many members as there may be counties in the state, and each county shall be entitled to a separate representative, who shall be chosen by the qualified voters thereof. The state shall be divided into senatorial districts, in each of which a senator shall be chosen by the qualified voters thereof: Provided, That each representative and each senator shall be entitled to one vote for every one hundred electors in his county or district."

While up, sir, I will avail myself of this opportunity to investigate the report of the select committee, appointed to report a system of apportionment to this house, as also the report of the standing committee upon the same subject.

These reports set out with the broad principle that representation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth. This principle should govern us in our efforts to lay the foundation of apportionment. It should be our compass and polar star to guide us to correct results. But we may assert one thing and practice another. We may, in the same instrument, declare the rights of the people and take them away. The declaration of a principle, then, unless it be carried out in practice, remains a dead letter. Indeed it is worse than a dead letter, for it declares rights which it does not protect.

The plan reported by the committee upon the legislative department, is defective in this respect, as I have shown on a former occasion. It gives the small counties an undue power, as also some of the large ones, leaving the medium counties to be the sufferers. By that plan, one thousand voters in one section of the state, exercise as much power as two thousand do in another section.

One county will have largely over its due power, while another will be stripped of what little it is entitled to. A system thus radically defective cannot meet the approbation of the people of the state, and should not be incorporated into the constitution, loading it down, not only with an unpopular principle, but with an unjust one. I trust, sir, that the sense of justice which exists in this house, will not suffer the members to entertain such an objectionable proposition. I should regret to see the protracted and laborious efforts of this house terminate in such a monstrosity.

But, sir, the subject more particularly before my mind, is the report of the select committee chosen from each congressional district to report a plan of apportionment to this body. I regarded the organization of that committee as likely to produce favorable results, and was, consequently, prepared to regard the offspring of their labors with favor. I expected to see a system proposed which would do credit to the originators. In this I have been sadly disappointed. What is their plan? It is a mongrel, neither fish nor flesh. It is the union of the systems of the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Apperson,) and the gentleman from Harrison, (Mr. Desha.) It proposes to divide the state by counties, into ten districts and give each district its proportion of members according to its aggregate voting population, which shall be distributed among the counties of the district accordingly. Now, sir, let us examine the workings of this plan, and ascertain whether it metes out equal justice to each county and section of the state. In my estimate, I have taken the number of white males over twenty one years of age, as that was the most convenient basis, and would not materially affect the result. I wish to show the inequality which will exist among the counties composing the different districts.

I shall confine myself to a few counties in each district, so as to take as little time as possible. I have examined eight out of the ten districts, which will clearly show the injustice of the report.

I have thus shown the great inequality of the plan proposed by the select committee. It works injustice in every district. I have not shown one fourth of its enormities, but sufficient has been shown to demonstrate its great injustice. I have selected the counties almost at random, yet every comparison writes condemnation upon the face of the proposition.

By reference to the table above, it will be seen that the little county of Hancock, in the second district will have the same power of Christian, and yet Christian has 1694 voters more than Hancock. So Greenup, with a voting population of 1936 has no more power than Lawrence, with 967. Thus the 969 voters in Greenup, comparatively exercise no power. It is not necessary to give any more illustrations. By reference to the table, any one can see the operation of the system at a glance.

I am satisfied the committee did not carry out the plan, and ascertain its mode of operation or they would never have reported it. Their own sense of justice would have prevented them from having advocated a system which has no equality in it and which strikes directly at the declaration in the first part of the report which says that "representation shall be equal and uniform."

The plan proposed by the gentleman from Trigg, presents the same inequality and is obnoxious to the same objection. He increases the number of districts to twelve, and thereby increases the inequality. I am satisfied sir, that the district system, while it obviates one difficulty, produces another of still greater magnitude.

I did not rise to make a speech, but to have my plan read for the information of the house, and to present some of the operations of the system of apportionment reported by the select committee. I may, at a proper time, discuss the subject more at large, but for the present am satished with having barely shown the great and crying injustice which would be produced by the adoption of this report. I hope sir, the convention will vote down a proposition which is fraught with so much injustice to the country generally.

Mr. APPERSON. The gentleman last up (Mr. Garfield,) says, that his proposition is the only one that meets out equal justice. Now, I shall be greatly disappointed if it gets a vote except his own, and if it does, I am quite certain it will be very few. As for the gentleman from Logan, (Mr. Irwin,) I shall convince him out of his own mouth, that the joint proposition of himself and the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Turner,) presents quite as great inequalities as the plan of the committee. Caldwell having 1860 voters, and Crittenden having 947 voters, my friend from Logan, first refers to, as presenting a most striking inequality; and yet they have the same number of representatives, one each, and under the gentleman's own plan, they would stand precisely the same. Where then is the greater equality of his system of apportionment. The examples given by him, prove his argument, therefore, to be worthless. The gentleman from Fleming, (Mr. Garfield,) looked upon the first district as arranged by the committee as perfectly startling in its inequalities. Let us examine it:

The representation in the first district will be as follows:

Fulton & Hickman, 1,287 voters, 1 representative.

Graves, 1,576 voters, 1 representative.

McCracken & Ballard, 1,470 voters, 1 representative.

Crittenden, 947 voters, 1 representative.

Colloway, 1,206 voters, 1 representative.

Marshall & Livingston, 1,632 voters, 1 representative.

Trigg, 1,381 voters, 1 representative.

Caldwell, 1,860 voters, 1 representative.

Hopkins, 1,813 voters, 1 representative.

Union, 1,264 voters, 1 representative.

Thus showing a most striking instance of equality in representation under the report of the committee. The gentleman said that in this district the inequality was so great as to be startling; he certainly did not examine the matter, or else he is an indifferent judge of this matter.

Go a little further, to the fifth district, to which the gentleman from Fleming, also referred, as presenting great inequalities. He says that Anderson & Spencer, with 2,093 voters, get a representative each, whilst Nelson & Mercer, with a voting population of 4,132, get but two representatives, or one to each county. By what rule the gentleman thought himself authorized to take these two large counties to put together to prove his position, I know not, they are not adjacent, the county of Washington lies directly between them. Suppose the gentleman had said that Nelson and Spencer, united, had 3,014 voters, and the report gave them two representatives—that Mercer & Anderson, when united had 3,211 voters, and the report gave them two representatives—had he presented the state of case in this way, it would have been apparent, even to himself, that he was as unfortunate in his complaints of the inequality of the fifth as he was of the first district. I believe that Spencer, was taken from Nelson, or at least in part, and that Anderson, or a great part of it, was taken from Mercer, and the feelings and wishes of the people of these small counties, coincide to a great extent with the larger ones to which I have attached them.

Some gentlemen have been led into mistakes, by taking as a basis the white males over twenty-one, as reported by the auditor, instead of the qualified voters, who are less numerous than the white males, as they will notice when they come to see the figures written down. Under that system, Jefferson, including Louisville, would have 9 or 10,000 voters, when if the basis of qualified voters was taken it would be but 6,774, a considerable difference certainly.

So far as I am concerned, I am not wedded to this report, and the committee who reported it, so far as the number of districts is concerned, were far from being unanimous. But I will further say, that there cannot be any system of apportionment devised but there will be hard cases occurring under it. Allusion has been made to Hancock, as having a separate representation on a voting population of not more than five hundred and sixty. The counties of Daviess, Ohio and Breckinridge, are the only counties adjacent to Hancock, and they have all over the ratio; and would it be just to say to Ohio, Breckinridge, or Daviess, with the residuums they possess, that they should also take Hancock under their wing without an additional representative? Why, the residuums of these three counties will be vastly more than enough to give Hancock a member, when they are added to her voting population. What are you to do with Hancock if she should not get a member? Her electors must be represented in some way; and it is clearly not fair to Ohio to attach Hancock to her. How would it be under the proposition of the gentlemen from Logan? Why the two counties of Ohio and Hancock would be continued together, in all time to come, as they have been since the last apportionment of representation.

It will be found, that in adopting the district system, as you increase the number of districts, so do you increase the number of these hard cases.

Mr. TURNER. With the gentleman's permission, I will present the proposition of the gentleman from Logan, as I have modified it with his consent.

The Secretary then read it as follows:

"Provided, That after the apportionment is ascertained, as above, it shall be modified and changed as follows: Those counties having a smaller voting population which shall be entitled to one representative, under the above mode, than other counties not having one, shall yield up the same to the latter, and the former shall be attached to adjacent counties. Those counties having a smaller voting population which shall be entitled to two representatives, under the above mode, than other counties not having two, shall yield up one of the same to the latter, so that no county with a smaller voting population shall ever have a representative where a county of larger voting population has not, and so that no county, with a smaller voting population, shall ever have two representatives when a county of a larger voting population shall have but one representative."

Mr. APPERSON. What becomes of Hancock under that proposition?

Mr. TURNER. Can she not be joined to any smaller county?

Mr. APPERSON. No.

Mr. TURNER. Then she will have to be attached to some larger county. If then the residuum of the county to which she was attached was larger than her number of voters, or if the two united came nearer to the ratio than any other county or union of counties, they would get an additional member under my proposition.

Mr. APPERSON. I am glad the gentleman has made this explanation, as now there is presented some justice in his proposition. But to swallow up a small county in that way would be unjust to it, and the large county to which it may be attached, would always have the control if it desired to do so.

I was going on to say that as you increase the number of districts, so you increase the number of hard points or inequalities. For instance, Gallatin will have a representative because she is adjacent to no county in the tenth congressional district but what has a residuum. She has but 813 voters, and yet she must have a representative, because she has a greater number of voters than would be included in the residuum of any of the counties in that district.

Again: the little county of Breathitt, with a little more than five hundred and sixty voters, (just five hundred and ninety,) will be entitled in a short time to a member, and why? Because, being in the 9th congressional district, she lies adjacent to Morgau only of all the counties in that district which is increasing rapidly, and before a second apportionment shall be made, will, in all probability, possess the full ratio for a member. Then we shall have to give a member to Breathitt, because she lays adjacent to no other county to which she can be attached. And by laying the state off into four districts, I know of but one solitary case of great inequality, that of Hancock, which could occur. The rule in the legislature in the apportionment of representation has been to lay off the state into three districts, the northern, middle, and southern, and to divide the representation among them. But even then it has always been a matter of great difficulty to get through with. One other hard case, if you lay off the state into small districts, that will occur is this: the county of Scott, with one thousand eight hundred and thirty nine voters, will be entitled to two representatives, because the residuums over the ratio which she has is greater than any other in that district, whilst Pulaski with two thousand three hundred and five voters will have but one representative, because her residuum is not equal to the vote of several small counties in that district. This will occur when districts are small. This is an extreme case perhaps, and I instance it only to show that whatever mode gentlemen may adopt, the hard and the soft spots will occur. Why, according to the resolution and mode of apportionment of the gentleman from Harrison, that county would have two representatives with only two thousand and sixty voters, because it would have a residuum greater than any other of the adjacent counties or any other county in the district. But by adding Gallatin to that district, she having a greater number of votes than that residuum, she would have the representative, and Harrison would have but one.

I believe it best to have the state laid off into districts, and that the fewer the districts are the nearer equality can be attained. I prefer the system of districts, because if you take the state at large there will ever be complaints as to the manner in which the apportionment is made. Accompanying the proposition which is submitted by the committee, a principle is laid down that representation should be equalized according to the number of voters. The proposition is, that in the first instance all the counties having the full ratio should have a representative; next, that those counties having a full ratio and the largest residuum compared with the number of voters any county has under the ratio, should have an additional representation, but if a smaller county has more voters than such residuum, then she shall have the member. This principle was proposed in reference to four districts, but it governs with equal justice whatever may be the number. By adopting four districts, as I first proposed, each would have between thirty five and thirty six thousand voters, and there would not in any one of them be three hundred voters more than in another, and I still think it would be preferable. However, I prefer the report of the committee to any proposition yet presented as an amendment to it, and shall adhere to it as against them.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I rise to point out an incongruity in the gentleman's own report, and to show that it is impossible to carry it out. If he will turn his attention to the thirteenth line, he will find that it reads thus:

"Provided, however, That if there should be any county not having a sufficient number of representative population." What is to be done with it? "Yet it shall have a representative."

But to come to the second proviso. It is as follows:

"And provided further, That when a county may not have a sufficient number of representative population to entitle it to one representative, then such county may be joined to some adjacent county or counties to send one representative, provided such adjacent county has not a full ratio."

Now it turns out that in the second district there are counties which are under the ratio. Therefore they would not be provided for by the first proviso, because there are three different counties under the ratio. Two would be provided for by the second proviso. That covers the counties of Butler and Edmondson. Hancock does not join either of them, but is still in the same district.

Mr. APPERSON. Hancock is adjacent to three counties, and all three have a full ratio. Hancock gets one representative, because the adjacent counties are entitled to one. Butler cannot get one. Why? Because she lies adjacent to a county not entitled to one. Butler and Edmondson neither being entitled to one.

Mr. TRIPLETT. The explanation is right, but the bill is wrong, and if the explanation is put down in the bill, it will be right. But there is another difficulty. Suppose Butler shall come up to the full ratio, what will become of Edmonson? There will be two in the same district not provided for. The first is provided for by the first section, and yet there is another in the same district not provided for.

Mr. GRAY. Notwithstanding the argument of the gentleman from Montgomery, and the estimation in which he holds his proposition, I must say I think that proposition one of the most abominable and objectionable that ever was presented for the consideration of any deliberative body. My friend from Daviess is right in his statement of the character and operation of the proposition. It gives a certain number of representatives to a district. Suppose there are ten districts, and each has eleven counties, then suppose Butler or Edmonson come up to the ratio, where will you get a representative to give to either? Hancock is surrounded by three counties which have the ratio, therefore Hancock must have one. Then if Butler or Edmonson comes up to the ratio, can you give a representative to the other if it should come up to the ratio? Such a difficulty may occur sooner or later in every district in the state. Shall we put in the constitution, which we hope to have last forages, a proposition so absurd. Of all the propositions which have been presented, this is the most abominable and the most unequal, because a county, if it has only representative population of five hundred, will have a representative. Does that correspond with the principle of an equal representation for all. It would be a perfect contradiction of the principle in that very district, and would be in many others. There is no equality in it at all. That district runs from the Tennessee line to the mouth of Salt river, nearly one hundred and fifty miles. How is the voting population of that district distributed. In the northern end, the gentleman gives the counties of Meade, Hancock, and Grayson, three counties which do not join. To these counties with a population of males over twenty one years of age of two thousand seven hundred and seventy six, he gives three representatives. He gives to the county of Christian with two thousand two hundred and twenty eight voters one representative. Is not that beautiful equality? Is not that representation according to population with a vengeance? I trust in God this convention will never disgrace itself with anything so unjust as that. Take Hancock and Grayson, and how many males over twenty one have they? They have one thousand six hundred and sixty two, and by this gentleman's beautiful plan they have two representatives in one end of the district, and in the other end, two thousand two hundred and twenty eight voters have but one. That would be beautiful justice, beautiful equality of representation. Apply this proposition all over the state, and the same results will be seen. Cumberland, Casey, and Boyle, with three thousand one hundred and ninety two voters have three representatives, but Pulaski with two thousand three hundred and ninety two has but one. I trust this convention never will adopt such a proposition as that. I cannot vote for the constitution with such a proposition in it. We propose to have qualified voters the basis, and if so, let us carry it out. I hope we shall adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Logan, or that of the gentleman from Trigg, or that of the gentleman from Floyd, or the report of the committee as it first came forward. I can take any other proposition that has been offered sooner than this.

The amendment of the gentleman from Logan, at the suggestion of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, was so modified as to have the districting commence with the county of Greenup, and the apportionment to take place once in eight years.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I think the gentleman's proposition now will be more likely to do justice than any proposition we have, if the gentleman will just say that the legislature, in making the apportionment, shall divide the state into three districts, as near equal as may be, commencing and resting on the Ohio river. In this way, I think you will control this wild, and I will say unjust, method of laying off the state, which has been practiced.

Mr. TURNER. If you go by districts, you may still leave some one county with a representative, which has not as many voters as some other county in the district. According to my proposition this cannot happen in any part of the state.

Mr. GHOLSON. If the latter clause of the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Madison is added to the proposition of the gentleman from Logan, there can be no gerrymandering. I see no necessity for the first part. I think it is settled that the largest county shall always have the representative, and not that one having nine hundred and ninety-nine voters shall have one, while one having one thousand does not.

Mr. TURNER. I will show the necessity of the former part. According to the proposition of the gentleman from Logan, residuums will be produced. My proposition is, to apply those residuums so that no small county shall get a representative, while a large one has not any.

Mr. MORRIS. I feel no disposition to occupy the time of the house, when I do not feel that duty requires me to speak. But as this question is one of the most important of any we have had before us, and is particularly important to my constituents, I feel it incumbent on me to say a few words respecting the proposition of the select committee, and that submitted by the gentleman from Logan.

At the suggestion of Mr. IRWIN, Mr. Morris gave way for a motion to take a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. CLARKE. Having voted for that portion of the sixth section of the report, I now give notice that I will move a reconsideration of that vote. I do it for this reason: that it establishes the basis of representation, and makes the qualified voters that basis. This morning, the vote was taken upon the amendment offered by the senior gentleman from Nelson, which amendment embraced the principle in regard to the basis of representation which I had had the honor to submit, and which had once been adopted by this convention. The vote stood—ayes 47, noes 48. Immediately upon the announcement of the vote, a motion was made to reconsider it, and then a motion was made to lay that motion upon the table. There were but four members absent at the time the vote was taken, who have been here during the session. I will not pretend to say that those who have attempted to preclude any further action upon any branch of this section hereafter, were aware that three of those absent members were in favor of the amendment; but I do undertake to say, with a personal knowledge of the fact, that three of the four were in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Hardin.

A minority of this convention, then, have committed a direct and flagrant violation of the rights of the majority, and fastened, as far as the vote of to-day can fasten, upon this constitution a principle which the majority of this body is opposed to. I assert if every gentleman who voted for the amendment shall adhere to his vote, that there are yet three gentlemen, who are in town, but absent from sickness, who will vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, and thus make the vote in favor of it fifty, clearly showing a majority in favor of the basis of white population, and against the basis adopted. I am aware that the motion I have made must lie on the table till to-morrow. I would not have made it if there had been a clear, palpable, and satisfactory indication of disapprobation of the proposition. But when I was convinced there was a majority of the convention against the basis established by the vote to-day, and saw the attempt made to stifle their will, I could not, in justice to myself and that majority, forbear moving to reconsider the vote by which the section was adopted.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. On this question of basis of representation, I admit that the convention is nearly equally divided. Without having any particular feeling with regard to its operation on that part of the state which I represent, I still rejoice that the vote resulted as it did, because I thought the basis of representation which had been fixed by our fathers in 1792, and again in 1799, and which had been approved by the people of Kentucky for sixty years without murmur or complaint, was just and right. I challenge any member of this convention, even the delegate from Simpson, to say whether he ever heard in the halls of legislation of Kentucky, or out of them, from the citizens of this commonwealth, any complaint of the principle upon which our political power was apportioned. Was it a cause of calling this convention; was it a grievance; and does it operate as a grievance? Then why change? The object of the change, as avowed by the mover and its advocates, is for the purpose of operating upon one particular section of the state injudiciously.

Mr. CLARKE. I beg to inquire whether it is in order to debate this question now.

The PRESIDENT declared it to be in order. Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not intend to go into any extended argument as to the propriety of the change. The alteration proposed is calculated, in my humble judgment, in the progress of time, to do great injustice to portions of the country, not designed now to be injured. The great tax paying portion of the commonwealth will feel its effects. We may as well call things by their right names. Gentlemen speak of strengthening the rural districts by this operation. Our fathers made a basis of the free voting population, with which I am content. Our habits and agricultural pursuits, and the situation of our agricultural region are such, that the tendency of our population is to the extremes. Natural causes—our agricultural pursuits—are forcing the political power from the centre of the state. While I disclaim the idea of uniting property, either land or any other kind of estate, as an element of the basis of representation, as unjust in a free and equal government, I disclaim the idea of uniting any matter, though animated, which is inactive in the expression of sentiments, necessary to the choice of a representative in the legislative department of this government. Why should I, because I may be worth five thousand dollars more than my neighbor, in casting my vote at the polls, exercise a greater political weight in this government? I do not exercise it, and will not give a vote that shall authorize it. But shall I exercise less weight? No. Why should one man exercise more political power than I do, because his lot has been cast in a part of the country which God has blessed with children, not his own, and over whom they would not, if permitted to vote, select him as a guardian or public agent? Why should my accidental residence among women and children, to whom I am bound by no ties of blood, kindred, or relationship, give me more political power in this Union than a man who may not be blessed or surrounded by that description of population?

Mr. CLARKE. I will withdraw my motion to reconsider now, and I give notice that I shall make a motion to reconsider to-morrow.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Very good, sir, I will be present whenever it is made.

Mr. MORRIS. It is with great reluctance that I ask the attention of the house to a few remarks which I deem it my duty to make upon this system of apportionment reported by the committee. It is one of the most important and delicate subjects which has occupied the attention of the convention; one which has attracted the attention and occupied the time of some of the ablest men in our body; and I can venture with safety to say, that no man has yet been able to fix up a plan of apportionment which even to himself would seem to be entirely just and impartial. I was a member of the legislative committee to which this subject was referred. The committee worked at it faithfully and for a long time; and the plan submitted in the report was adopted as the best we could make, though not entirely satisfactory to any of us.

I should not say one word upon this question, and should have submitted it to the vote of the convention without a remark, but for the fact that this report of the select committee presses more heavily, and, as I believe unjustly, upon the immediate interests and rights of my constituents than any thing which has been presented to us. It would seem, sir, that the committee had traveled out of the regular course of their report and attached a proviso, with no earthly object but to strike a blow at the rights of the people in my county. Indeed, sir, the whole system, independent of this peculiar act of injustice, seems to me, by far, the most unequal and oppressive of all the various plans which have been submitted. The report sets out with the broad declaration that "representation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated by the number of representative population;" and yet when we look into its details, it would seem that the last of all objects which was sought to be accomplished, was that of representation in proportion to the number of qualified electors.

A plan of apportionment has been submitted by the gentleman from Logan, and amended by the gentleman from Madison. This plan, as I understand it, is pretty much the same with that of the old constitution, except that an attempt is made to prevent the rolling residuums from being made to fall so heavily upon those who may happen to be in a minority, and to establish some permanent rule by which the legislature shall hereafter be governed. It fixes a point at which the legislature shall hereafter be compelled to start, in apportioning the state; and the amendment of the gentleman from Madison provides, that after traversing the whole state, and giving to each county, with the full ratio of qualified electors, the representative to which it is entitled—it shall then take a survey and fix the remaining representatives upon those counties, either single or double, having the largest unrepresented residuum of qualified electors. The plan submitted by the select committee, lays the state off into ten districts, and not only sanctions but absolutely enforces a system of gerrymandering in those districts upon the legislature. The question now before us is, which one of these two plans shall be adopted? For my own part, although I am not particularly pleased with either of them, I think the plan of the gentleman from Logan by far the most just and desirable. Indeed, sir, I should much prefer the plan of the old constitution, odious, oppressive, and unjust, as it has been acknowledged to be, to this plan of the committee. The convention which framed the old constitution, conferred the power upon the legislature to gerrymander the state, and thereby inflict an act of gross injustice upon whatever party might perchance be in the minority. They placed it in the power of that legislature, by acting honestly and fairly, to render an act of justice to every part of the commonwealth. The convention now assembled, proposes by the bill reported by the select committee, to do the act themselves, and place it in all time, beyond the power of the legislature, to remedy the wrong which thereby they will have inflicted, to stamp it upon the constitution itself. The plan of the old constitution, by suffering the residuums to be rolled in any and every direction through the state, placed it in the hands of the legislature to confer the power, at discretion, upon any particular portion of the country which they knew to be most inclined to carry out the particular objects they might have in view. It was made to operate like the old woman's elder stalk, which, according to her idea, was the greatest medicine in the world—a great panacea for every disease. If scraped up, it operated as an emetic; if scraped down, it acted as a purge; and truly, in the hands of a skilful legislature, its medicinal qualities have been so potently applied as to keep the poor patient, the minority party, in a most woful state of depletion. That system which was thus injuriously applied, was the act of our ancestors, who, in the honesty of their hearts, believed the legislature to be as honest as themselves. They had no intention of doing an act of injustice; they knew that, under their plan, justice could be done, and they believed it would be done. They were mistaken. We have assembled here, and one thing imperiously demanded of us by the people is, that we establish a certain, permanent basis of apportionment, which will render it unlawful, in all after time, for the legislature to act unfairly, and yet it would seem that we are prepared to fix an apportionment immutably upon our constitution, as unjust and unfair, as any which could be devised by the legislature. It seems to me that I would rather entrust the power to an unholy agent to do the unholy deed, whilst he had, at the same time, the opportunity to do right, than to myself commit the wrong. To prove that I am not mistaken—that I do not complain without ample cause of the report of the select committee, I will refer you to some calculations I have taken the trouble to make, which will, I think, most conclusively prove that this plan must operate with great inequality and injustice.

We find that the county of Caldwell, in the first district, with a population of 2,016 voters, is entitled to one representative. The county of Crittenden, in the same district, with 1,059 voters, is likewise entitled to one representative—difference in population 951. Hopkins has one member, with 1,886 voters. Calloway, with 1,323, has one—difference 563. Caldwell and Hopkins, with 3,902 voters, have two representatives. Crittenden and Calloway, with 2,382, have two—difference 1,520—quite enough, under the ratio, for one additional representative. Would this seem to be just and equitable? Does this indicate that representation is based upon numbers? I should say not. Yet this is the system which is sought to be forced upon us.

Again, sir; if we go into the second district, we find that Christian, with 2,248 voters, has but one representative. Hancock, with 554, has one—difference 1,694—more than 100 over the ratio. Daviess, with 2,110, has one representative. Meade, with 1,114, has one—difference 998. Christian and Daviess, with 4,360 voters, are entitled to two representatives. Hancock and Grayson, with 1,662, to two representatives—difference 2,698. These are some of the astounding developments made by a very slight examination of this most just and fair system of apportionment, recommended to this convention by the select committee.

If we go to the third district, we will see that Logan, with 2179 voters, has but one representative—Simpson, with 1017, to the same—difference, 1162. Warren, with 2215, has one—Monroe, with 1247, the same. Logan and Warren, with 4394 voters, have two representatives—Simpson and Monroe, with 2264, have the same number—difference 2130. In the fourth district, Pulaski, with 2392, has one member—Taylor, with 1097, the same—difference, 1295. Russell and Casey, with 1991, to one—Boyle, with 1168, to one—823 difference. Pulaski, Russell, and Casey, with 4383, have two—Taylor and Boyle, with 2265, have two—2118 difference. I could go on, and by reference to the tables I have made out, show you that the same, and perhaps even more startling instances of injustice and inequality will be found to exist in the other districts. But I will not weary the patience of the house, by going further with these details, when enough has been shown to convince any reasonable man, that the inequalities are too enormous to permit him to establish them in this constitution—that the attempt is made to fix the representation upon territory, bounded by imaginary lines, and not upon the number of voting population.

Some few weeks ago an effort was made to throw the representative strength of the state from those counties and sections which have heretofore, and should still possess it, on account of the larger amount of representative population which they contain, and the immense amount of revenue which they pay, into the smaller and poorer counties of the state. It was presented in the garb of this "baby basis" as it is called, making women and children, and not the free white male citizens over twenty-one, the basis of representation. It would seem that the report of the committee, is but a continuation of the same plan—an effort to carry the power of the state from the wealthier and more populous counties to the poorer ones, which have been ascertained to have a larger proportion of women and children. I find under this plan, that Christian, with 2248 voters, will lose a representative—that the counties of Logan, Russell, Nelson, and Bourbon, will each be deprived of a member in the legislature—and that these members will be transferred to the smaller counties with a less proportionate population. My friend from Henry proposed the other day, that territory and not population should be the basis of representation; that each county should be entitled to a separate representative. His plan was at once rejected with singular unanimity. An effort was made to restrict the cities, and after a long and fiery debate, this convention decided that they could deprive no portion of our voting citizens of the right to be represented. A vote was taken on yesterday upon the "baby basis," and the convention decided that men, and not women and children, should be represented. An attempt is again indirectly made by the apportionment, to secure, to a great extent, these principles which have been rejected—to transfer the power from the voting population into territorial limits, and into the hands of women and children, and I sincerely hope this indirect effort will meet with the same fate at the hands of this convention, with those more direct in their objects.

It has been found to be absolutely impossible, by any plan, to render entire justice to every part of the state—to present a system which shall give to every section the exact number of representatives to which it is rightfully entitled. This plan of districting was suggested as a remedy to the evil. It was supposed that by laying off the state into districts, each nearly approximating the others in population, that though in those districts the counties might not have their proper representation, yet the same sectional interests would be fully represented. Certainly, if we will look at these districts, we will find that the different parts of them are as widely separated in interests, as the remotest sections of the state can be. Take away the representative from the county of Christian, and transfer him to Hancock, and he will no more represent the views and interests of the people of Christian, than he would if transferred to Greenup or Fulton. By this plan of the committee, a great gain will accrue to the northern districts at the expense of the southern. No provision is made for future alleviation. The districts are made permanent, and I have no doubt that the evils now great, will increase as the country grows.

I much prefer the plan proposed by the gentleman from Logan. I think that, as amended, no great injustice can be done; and that it is much better calculated to secure the rights of the people, than this ten district plan, which I sincerely hope will be rejected by the convention.

Mr. DAVIS. I want as a basis of apportionment, that principle adopted, which will secure the nearest approach to equal justice to all the counties in the state, and leave the least discretionary power to the legislature. A great abuse heretofore, in relation to the subject of apportionment, has been, that the whole state has been a field upon which to gerrymander. I think a remedy may be applied by taking a part of the project of the honorable gentleman from Montgomery. If you make ten districts, and make no apportionment, but leave it for the legislature, it seems to me that such a system would work pretty well, because the gerrymandering must be on a small scale if done at all, being limited to each district. Then let the first apportionment be made agreeably to the proposition of the gentleman from Montgomery. This will prevent the inequality pointed out by the gentleman from Christian.

Mr. APPERSON. I want to say a word to the younger gentleman from Christian. He seems much alarmed with the committee's report on the apportionment. The one introduced by the gentleman from Logan he approves. Let us see how it works.

Mr. MORRIS. I did not state that the proposition of the gentleman from Logan met my approbation, but that I preferred it to the report of the committee.

Mr. APPERSON. I want to go on and see if I could do worse than that proposition would do. The first county the gentleman takes in his fault-finding of the committee's report is Caldwell. He says Caldwell has but one, and Crittenden would have one; and yet she has only half as many voters as Caldwell. How would it be under the amendment which he advocates? Just as the report of the committee would make it. Caldwell one, Crittenden one. This ground of his complaint is therefore unfounded. The old ratio fixed it the same way. But this is the gentleman's first illustration. I can tell you where the shoe pinches. It is the principle of taking away from the large counties. The gentleman has been but little in legislative bodies, or else he would not have talked about sweeping away the representation from the counties where the wealth is. Woodford pays annually into the treasury, upwards of $2,000 more than Christian. If wealth is to receive representation, and not voters, why not go to Woodford instead of Christian? Christian with 2,138 voters will get, he says, but one member, according to the report, and yet the small county of Hancock will get one. The county of Hancock is a solitary instance, when you take the whole state, there is no other county similarly situated. If he insist that Christian shall have two, Daviess and Hancock will get but one, yet their united vote—and they are adjacent—is nearly 2,500. Suppose you allow Christian to have one, it is all she ever will get unless Daviess and Hancock should have two. If the proposition of the gentleman from Logan should be adopted, with the provisos of the gentleman from Madison added, you will find that Christian is cut down to one representative. Is it not more equitable that Daviess and Hancock with 2,500 voters should have two, rather than Christian. Grayson with 1,127 voters has a member. Is there any disposition on the part of the gentleman to take away that one from Grayson and give it to Christian?

Let us see what the other gentleman from Christian says. He selects some counties which he supposes will have too great a representation, and contrasts them with some which he says will have too small a representation. Let me call the attention of gentlemen to the apportionment as it now stands under the present constitution, and which the elder gentleman from Christian advocates above all others. Five counties to-wit: Bourbon, Harrison, Logan, Christian, and Nelson, with nine thousand nine hundred and ninety two voters have ten representatives, and five other counties to-wit: Mercer, Pulaski, Warren, Daviess, and Caldwell, with ten thousand three hundred and forty-four voters have only five representatives. This is the apportionment which suits my friend, but can any thing be more unequal than this? The five latter counties have three hundred and fifty voters more than the five former, and yet have only one half the number of representatives.

The gentleman from Bourbon suggests that we lay off the state into ten districts without adopting any other principle, and leave the legislature to make the apportionment. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to this proposition. The committee believed it best to lay off districts and then to lay down certain principles for the action of the legislature, so that they would have no discretionary power in making an equitable and fair apportionment. When I asked what would be done with Hancock, according to the proviso of the gentleman from Madison, I was told it would be joined to some other county, and the two counties together would have two representatives; but upon an examination of the proviso there is no such provision whatever—indeed there is no provision for the union of two counties to send two representatives. I want to call attention to the effect of putting counties entitled to one representative into one class, and those entitled to two into another class. Take Christian with two thousand one hundred and thirty eight voters, and Taylor with one thousand and forty seven. There is to be no comparison between Taylor and Christian, according to the proviso of the gentleman from Madison, because Christian is a competitor for two representatives, and Taylor for but one; and there is to be no competition except between the large counties belonging to one class among themselves. The small counties of the other class may compete among themselves. The effect may be that two thousand two hundred voters can get two representatives, when a small county with one thousand cannot get one. Under the system proposed by the committee, the county having one thousand voters will have a representative before the other can get two. The county with nine hundred will get one sooner than the county with two thousand two hundred will get two, because nine hundred is greater than the residuum of the large county over the ratio—the ratio being one thousand four hundred and sixteen. The county of Montgomery which I represent, will not be affected by any proposition, for she has just the ratio. But it seems to me the smaller counties are deserving of something at our hands which I would be glad to give them. I will only add, with respect to the report of the committee, that we laid down certain principles from which the legislature could not depart. If the state should be divided into four districts, which I believe to be the best, I acknowledge there will be less opportunity for the evils which have been complained of.

Mr. NUTTALL. I think the proposition of the gentleman from Madison is the most just which has been presented, and I intend to go for it. Many counties have two representatives with less voters than others have which have but one. I think this will prevent anything of that sort.

Mr. DESHA. It is not my purpose to inflict upon the house a speech at this late period; and if I were inclined to do it, the fact that I witness inattention to the speeches which have been made for some days past, would prevent me from making the attempt. But having submitted the plan of ten districts, and having been a member of the select committee which reported this back to the convention, I feel that I should say something of the motives which influenced me in submitting this plan.

Much has been said by both of the gentlemen from Christian, as to the injustice of this report. I have endeavored to divest myself of prejudice, and they have failed to convince me that the system we propose will operate unjustly; but on the contrary, it is my opinion that it will operate more justly than any other which has been presented. What does it propose? It lays off the state into ten districts. The gentleman from Logan seemed to insinuate that political motives may have governed the committee and those who favor this report.

I wish to say that when I came here, I divested myself of political prejudices. I came not to represent one party, but both; and I regretted to hear the terms democrat and whig uttered in this hall, as often as they have been. I should consider myself unworthy of a seat here, if I could be influenced by such motives. I have seen the system of gerrymandering carried on in this state, and in other states, so much, that my attention was called to the question, whether we could not prevent it. I do not say that the party in power for many years past, have done it, more than their adversaries would have done, if they had been in power. It is far from me to say so. The object is not to inquire what party may have a majority in the legislature, but to secure the best method of apportionment to each county.

So far as this report respects my county, it is a proof that I had no selfish object in view. Harrison has a large residuum, and if this report is adopted, she will be shorn of one member. When I first proposed the plan of ten districts, with a view that Harrison should retain her member, I presented the district system in a different form. I proposed that Carroll should be thrown to the seventh district, for Carroll and Gallatin have always been united, and sent one member. The vote of the two counties is only a little above the ratio. Carroll was struck off a short time since, and the two together, had one representative. I put them together, because they would be nearer on an equality. I am not particularly anxious about this plan, if a better plan, one which will secure to all parts of the state, a fair and just system of apportionment can be presented, I will vote for it. But it will have yet to be presented.

The gentlemen from Christian, deal in the terms abominable, unjust, and other opprobrious epithets as applied to this report. If it secured to the county of Christian, two members, I presume it would not have been so abominable and unjust. The position of Hancock is a peculiar one. It is bounded on one side by the Ohio river, and is adjacent to three counties, all of which have a ratio, and more than the ratio. We provided especially for Hancock, and I would suggest that there be a provision so that where a county is situated as Hancock is, having less than the ratio, and surrounded by counties having the ratio, it could be joined to one having more than the ratio.

I think the amendment of the gentleman from Logan, as amended by the gentleman from Madison, is worse than the old constitution, because they did occasionally place residuums near the place whence they were drawn. I do not think that plan practicable, but if it is, I consider it worse than the old constitution. I have taken five counties different from those selected by the gentleman from Montgomery, and having a voting population of 9,208, and having six members, making a ratio of 1,524 to a representative. Five others with a voting population of 11,608 have nine members, with an average ratio of 1,289. Is this just? Will it be just? I call attention to the question, whether, when different sections, having different and antagonistical interests upon a particular issue, are affected, you will not, by the proposition of the gentleman from Logan, take residuums and give them to sections, which are not entitled to them according to their numbers.

The plan proposed by the committee sets out with the proposition that each portion shall have the representatives to which it is entitled, and I prefer the report of the select committee, to the suggestion of the gentleman from Bourbon, notwithstanding it may shear Harrison of a member, still as I believe I represent a just people, if I cannot get a better system, I shall vote for the report of the committee as it is.

Mr. TURNER. I would not speak again on this subject, but for the remarks of the gentleman from Bourbon. Madison county is not interested, and I say this proposition will bring about more justice than any other, which has been presented. The gentleman from Logan proposed to take the old constitution. I proposed to add to it the principle of taking residuums and giving first to the smaller counties and going through with them. His proposition would give two representatives to a county, while some other counties had but one. I only say that the larger of two small counties should have the representative instead of the smaller of the two, and I say the same as to the large counties which are entitled to two representatives. Where is the injustice of this. I have seen in rolling residuums every injustice done, and the proposition I brought forward was presented to prevent the power of doing injustice to a minority.

As respects dividing the state into ten districts, you will, if that is done, have to carry residuums, and there will be the same difficulty there was under the old constitution, and the smaller counties may get a representative, when the larger does not, and the larger will get two sometimes when the smaller does not get any. This is not justice. Any principle which will give a small county a representative when a large one has not any is a violation of justice, and any principle that will give two representatives, when another county having a hundred more, only gets one, is injustice. But the principle reported by the committee brings about this result. It is admitted that it does it, and there is no opportunity to correct it, for you fix it in the constitution. According to my proposition, if there is injustice you may go over it again and correct it. If any gentleman can prove that to be unjust, he can out cypher me.

Mr. GARRARD. I dislike to trespass upon the time of the convention, but the remarks of the gentleman from Madison makes it my duty to say a few words. The gentleman says, he is fond of small counties, and in making that assertion I have not the least hesitation in saying he has spoken the truth. His amendment, so far as it is intended to operate, proves conclusively that he is. But, as a friend of small counties, and as one representing three on this floor, I trust my friend from Madison will let me say a word in defence of small counties. The operation of his proviso is decidedly worse than the old constitution, on small counties. In the congressional district in which I reside, there are twelve counties, represented on this floor by five members, they having at one time enough for six. Take the old constitution as it is, and you can hope for nothing better; but take it with the proviso of the gentleman from Madison, and I unhesitatingly say it would be much worse. Work out the first proposition of the gentleman's proviso, and you take from Livingston one member and give it to Morgan. Livingston then would go to Crittenden with perfect propriety. But what becomes of Breathitt? You may add it to Estill and Owsley, or you may add it to Clay, Letcher and Perry. That is the first proposition. And you take Livingston because it is the smallest county under the present apportionment, and I take it if you roll the residuums, it will be hereafter as it was before.

Mr. TURNER. My proposition does not interfere with the counties that are too small for a representative.

Mr. GARRARD. The explanation is the same as the gentleman gave in relation to Hancock. The county of Harlan, under the working of his amendment, must go to the counties of Clay, Perry, and Letcher, or Tennessee, or Virginia. The gentleman can fix it as he pleases.

Mr. MAYES. It seems to me, from the remarks of many gentlemen who have discussed this proposition, that they have mistaken, or not comprehended it correctly. We are endeavoring to settle the principle by which the apportionment shall hereafter be made. Gentlemen have spoken of their own counties, and shown the position in which they would be placed, the object of all of us being to arrive at, and do justice to, the whole state.

I thought the proposition of the gentleman from Trigg, to lay off the state into districts, would be better calculated to do justice to both the large and small counties than any other proposition that has been offered. I have listened with a great deal of attention to the debates on this question, and I have been trying to make up my mind in regard to the plan we ought to adopt. If the state be laid off into ten or twelve districts, I am not convinced that injustice will grow out of that system. On the contrary, it appears to me, we can arrive more nearly at justice, taking the whole state into view, than by any other principle of apportionment. The residuum of one county in a district ought to be taken to the next county within the district. No injury can grow out of it. I intend to vote for the district principle, and I do not think a better plan can be devised. It does seem to me that the question has been sufficiently debated, and that gentlemen have made up their minds upon it. I should be glad if it were settled.

Mr. IRWIN. I am in favor of the district system. If it is adopted in lieu of the report of the select committee, I will try to get up the proposition of the gentleman from Trigg.

Mr. DAVIS. The modification of the report of the committee, I propose, is as follows:

"The number of representatives to which each district may be entitled, shall be apportioned among the counties in such district according to the voting population, as near as may be: Provided, That when any county may be entitled to a representative, and shall have a residuum of two-fifths, and may adjoin a county not having three-fourths of the ratio, such large county and the small one shall, together, be entitled to elect a representative."

Every gentleman will see the effect and operation of such a provision. For instance, if Hancock adjoins a county in a district whose voting population entitles the county to one representative, and if there is a residuum of two-fifths over in the large county, Hancock and the large county shall elect a second representative. If Hancock shall not have this, concession should be made to the small county, which shall entitle it to a representative. Here are the counties of Bourbon, Scott, and Owen, each of which will have a considerable residuum, and their aggregate residuum would entitle them to a fourth representative. There would be nothing in this bill which would prevent the legislature from directing that these three counties might constitute a district to elect a fourth representative. I think in this way justice will be better obtained, and there will be less chance for juggling and gerrymandering, for I believe the terms are synonymous.

Mr. TRIPPLETT. Hancock, which lies adjoining Daviess, seems to have caused more difficulty than any other county in the state. But there is little difficulty when you come to reflect upon it. Suppose you were a citizen of Hancock, you would ask yourself, would I prefer to be added to Ohio, and let the two counties have one representative, or be added to Daviess, and let the two counties have two representatives? If you add Hancock and Daviess together, they will have two representatives, but if Hancock is added to Ohio, they will together be entitled to only one.

Mr. DAVIS. You cannot devise any system but what there must be some discretion left to the legislature. And when you ascertain the principle which operates as near as may be according to equal numbers, that principle would join Hancock to Daviess.

Mr. TRIPPLETT. There is no question about that, and there is no great difficulty about it if you will establish a principle and let it alone. The difficulty is, that when you have established one principle and attempt to establish a second, you destroy the first. Now establish the principle that numbers are to be represented, and never depart from it, and where do you arrive? Whereas Daviess and Hancock together will be entitled to two representatives; if Hancock is added to Ohio, you will have a large residuum. Why? Because Ohio has a residuum without Hancock. When Hancock is added to Ohio, what has Ohio gained, and what has Hancock gained? Nothing? Because Ohio was strong enough without Hancock, and do not give another representative. But if added to Daviess it makes these two counties rich enough to claim two representatives, therefore the principle contended for by my friend from Bourbon is carried out in letter and in principle. There you do not leave it to the legislative discretion, because you fix it in the constitution that Hancock must be added to Daviess, and that those added together must be entitled to two representatives. It is a principle just in itself, and the question is, would Hancock object to it? Surely she ought to be heard. Do you believe that if you lived there you would object to it? Then it is right it should be so. Then applying the same principle of reasoning which is applied to Daviess and Hancock ought to make other parts of the state agree to it, and the principle being right in itself, ought to make us adopt it in the constitution. I think if we establish the principle offered by the gentleman from Bourbon, it will be one that nobody ought to object to, and that nobody will object to.

Mr. GAITHER. I rise to give notice that I shall move a reconsideration of the vote by which the fifth section of the report on the legislative department was adopted.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment of Mr. IRWIN, as modified by the proviso of Mr. TURNER.

The yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. IRWIN, there were, yeas 29, nays 59.

YEAS—John L. Ballinger, William K. Bowling, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, Wm. Chenault, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Milford Elliott, Ninian E. Gray, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, George W. Johnston, Thos. N. Lindsey, Thos. W. Lisle, Martin P. Marshall, Wm. C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, John D. Morris, Elijah F. Nuttall, Johnson Price, John T. Rogers, Jas. Rudd, Albert G. Talbott, Howard Todd, Squire Turner, Andrew S. White, Chas. A. Wickliffe, Geo. W. Williams—29.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I will offer as an amendment to the report of the select committee, of which the gentleman from Montgomery is chairman, the following, to be added after the naming of the districts in the original report:

"The number of representatives to which each district may be entitled, shall be apportioned among the counties in such district according to the voting population as near as may be: Provided, that when any county may be entitled to a representative and shall have a residuum of two-fifths and may adjoin a county not having three-fourths of the ratio, such large county and the small one, shall, together, be entitled to elect a representative."

Mr. W. JOHNSON. I do not think the gentleman from Bourbon understands the effect of his amendment. According to this proposition, Daviess will have the sole right to elect one representative, and a portion of the right in electing a second. Will any one contend that this is right?

Mr. DAVIS. That is exactly what I want; that a county entitled to one representative shall have her separate representative; that the small county having three-fourths of the ratio, shall herself have a representative; but when there is a larger county having a ratio and two-fifths and joins a county not having three-fourths, that the two shall be thrown together, and the second representative shall be elected by a common vote. Suppose Hancock has a whig majority almost unanimous; and suppose the vote of Daviess is such, that by adding Hancock, she would control the election of both representatives, would it be just that Hancock, with her small vote but large majority in a party point of view, should have the right to control the entire vote of both counties? Can there be any objection that every full ratio shall elect a separate representative? And can there be any objection if she has over a ratio, to uniting that ratio with Hancock, and allowing Hancock and that residuum to be thrown together and elect a representative?

Mr. W. JOHNSON. I have waited for an explanation, and what is it? That the people of Daviess shall elect by themselves a representative without the assistance of Hancock, and that then the people of Daviess shall vote with Hancock for another representative. In that case, the people of Daviess vote twice, and the people of Hancock but once, and that in company with a county which has a much larger number of voters. Would it not be as well to put Hancock over into Indiana? Surely that principle will not be adopted here. Every part of the community should have equal rights and privileges. This would be a palpable violation of that principle.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. LACKEY. I will offer the following as a substitute for the sixth section of the report of the select committee:

"That the representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of representative inhabitants therein. At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, and every four years thereafter, provision shall be made by law that in the year ———, and every four years thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative inhabitants of the state shall be made. The number of representatives shall be one hundred, and apportioned among the several counties in the following manner: Counties having the ratio shall have one representative; those having three fourths of the ratio shall have one representative; those having the ratio, and a fraction less than one half the ratio over, shall have but one representative; those having the ratio, and a fraction of one half over, shall have two representatives; those having twice the ratio, shall have two representatives; those having twice the ratio, and a fraction of less than one half the ratio over, shall have but two representatives; those having twice the ratio, and a fraction of one half the ratio over, shall have three representatives; and so on. Counties having less than three fourths of the ratio, shall be joined to a similar adjacent county, for the purpose of forming a representative district: Provided, that if there be no such adjacent county, then the county having less than three fourths of the ratio shall be united with that adjacent county having the smallest number of representative inhabitants, provided that their united numbers do not exceed the ratio, and a fraction of one half the ratio over; but if they do, the county having less than three fourths of the ratio shall have a separate representative. The remaining representatives, (if any,) shall be allotted to those counties having the largest unrepresented fractions; but in no case shall more than two counties be united for the purpose of forming a representative district; but if there shall ever be an excess of districts, they shall be reduced to the proper number, by taking from those counties having a separate representative, with the smallest number of representative inhabitants, their separate representation."

The question being taken on the adoption of the substitute, it was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. I move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Logan was rejected.

The question on reconsidering was taken, and the convention refused to reconsider.

Mr. BOYD. I will offer the following as a substitute for that part of the sixth section of the report of the select committee, which is now pending:

"The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation as aforesaid, the state shall be districted into twelve districts.

First District—Fulton, Hickman, Graves, Ballard, McCracken, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston.

Second District—Trigg, Christian, Caldwell, Crittenden, Union, Henderson, Hopkins.

Third District—Davies, Ohio, Hancock, Grayson, Breckinridge, Hart, Larue, Hardin, Meade.

Fourth District—Todd, Muhlenburg, Logan, Simpson, Allen, Warren, Butler, Edmonson.

Fifth District—Monroe, Barren, Cumberland, Clinton, Adair, Green, Taylor, Casey, Russell.

Sixth District—Jefferson, Bullitt, Nelson, Shelby, Spencer, Washington, Marion.

Seventh District—Oldham, Trimble, Henry, Franklin, Owen, Carroll, Gallatin, Grant, Boone.

Eighth District—Scott, Harrison, Pendleton, Kenton, Campbell, Nicholas, Mason, Bracken.

Tenth District—Fayette, Woodford, Bourbon, Clarke, Jessamine, Anderson, Mercer, Boyle.

Eleventh District—Madison, Garrard, Lincoln, Rockcastle, Laurel, Padaski, Whitley, Wayne.

Twelfth District—Estill, Owsley, Clay, Perry, Letcher, Floyd, Breathitt, Johnson, Pike, Knox, Harlan.

When a new county shall be formed of territory belonging to more than one district, that county shall be added to, and form a part of the district out of which the largest amount of territory was taken to form such new county.

In the year _____, and every _____ year thereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified electors of the state shall be made, in such manner as shall be directed by law.

In the several years of making such enumeration, each district shall be entitled to representatives equal to the number of times the ratio is contained in the whole number of qualified electors in said districts: Provided, That the remaining representatives, after making such apportionment, shall be given to those districts having the largest unrepresented fractions.

Representatives to which each district may be entitled shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, and towns of the district, as near as may be, in proportion to the number of qualified electors; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified electors to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjacent county or counties, within the district, may not have a residuum or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representation, it shall then be in the power of the legislature to join two or more together, for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining, and in the same district, which have residuums over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio, in that case, one representative shall be added to the county having the largest residuum."

I have but little to say in respect to that proposition. It varies but little from the one which I had the honor to present to the convention some weeks ago. It will be seen and recollected by gentlemen, that I leave the apportionment among the several counties within the district, in accordance with the principles in the old constitution, confining to each district its own residuums, so that the legislature shall not have power to roll residuums from one district to another. It will be impossible under this plan for any great injustice to be done.

The question being taken on the adoption of the substitute, Mr. BOYD demanded the yeas and nays, which were yeas 46, nays 40.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, Wm. Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Beverly L. Clarke, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Willis B. Machen, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, John D. Morris, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, John J. Thurman, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe, Wesley J. Wright—46.

NAYS—Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, William K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, William Cowper, Garrett Davis, Chastain T. Dunavan, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, Jonathan Newcum, Johnson Price, John T. Robinson, Thos. Rockhold, James Rudd, Jas. W.

Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, Howard Todd, Henry Washington, Andrew S. White, Robert N. Wickliffe, Geo. W. Williams, Silas Woodson—40.

So the substitute was adopted.

The question recurred on the adoption of the substitute as a part of the sixth section.

Mr. TURNER. I move the previous question.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. WALLER demanded the yeas and nays, and there were yeas 47, nays 41.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, William C. Bullitt, William Chenault, Beverly L. Clarke, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, Peter Lashbrooke, Willis B. Machen, Martin P. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, John D. Morris, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe—47.

NAYS—Richard Apperson, William K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, Thomas D. Brown, Chas. Chambers, William Cowper, Garrett Davis, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Selucius Garfield, Jas. H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, George W. Johnston, James M. Lackey, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, William C. Marshall, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, Jonathan Newcum, William Preston, Johnson Price, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, James Rudd, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, Andrew S. White, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—41.

So the section was adopted.

The convention then adjourned.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. STUART ROBINSON.

ELECTIONS AND RETURNS OF OFFICERS & C.

Mr. TURNER submitted the following sections and on his motion they were laid on the table and ordered to be printed:

"SEC.—The general assembly shall direct, by law, the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns to the secretary of state, of the election of attorneys for the commonwealth, judges of the county courts, and sheriffs, and all other ministerial and executive officers except those hereinafter specified; and shall, in like manner, direct the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns to the respective county courts, of the election of justices of the peace, constables, coroners, surveyors, county attorneys, jailers, assessors, and other officers, whose duties shall be confined to counties, or parts of counties, or to towns.

SEC.—Clerks of all other courts shall be proceeded against and removed from office for good cause, in the same manner that is provided for the removal of the clerk of the court of appeals: Provided, That when a vacancy shall occur, from any cause, or the clerk shall be under charges, upon information, the judge or judges of the respective courts shall have power to appoint a clerk pro tem., to perform the duties of clerk, until such vacancy shall be filled, or the clerk shall be acquitted: And provided, That the legislature shall provide for the appointment, pro tempore, of a county assessor, in case of a vacancy.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GAITHER, pursuant to notice heretofore given, moved a reconsideration of the vote, adopting the fifth section of the report on the legislative department, with the view of moving to amend that portion of it in relation to cities.

Mr. BROWN moved to lay the motion on the table. At this late period of the session he was unwilling to open every question anew, which had been fully discussed and deliberately settled.

The yeas and nays were called for thereon and were yeas 51, nays 38.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Henry R. D. Coleman, William Cowper, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Benjamin F. Edwards, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, George W. Mansfield, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, David Meriwether, Wm. D. Mitchell, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Wm. Preston, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Ira Root, Jas. Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, Howard Todd, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson—51.

NAYS—John L. Ballinger, Luther Brawner, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, William Johnson, Charles C. Kelly, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, Alexander K. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, John J. Thurman, Philip Triplett—38.

So the convention laid the motion on the table.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. BALLINGER gave notice of his intention to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Trigg, (Mr. Boyd,) was substituted for a part of the sixth section of the report of the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. GARRARD moved to dispense with the rule which requires a motion to reconsider to lie over.

The motion was agreed to, and the vote was reconsidered.

A conversation ensued on the subject under consideration, which resulted in its postponement to to-morrow, and in the mean time, that the following propositions which gentlemen desired to submit, should be printed:

Mr. WOODSON'S substitute for the latter clause of sixth section of the legislative report.

"At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, provision shall be made by law, that in the year 1858, and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative population of the state shall be made. The House of Representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation, the state is hereby laid off into ten districts.

The first district shall be composed of the counties of Fulton, Hickman, Ballard, McCracken, Graves, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston, Crittenden, Union, Hopkins, Caldwell and Trigg.

The second district shall be composed of the counties of Christian, Muhlenburg, Henderson, Daviess, Hancock, Ohio, Breckinridge, Meade, Grayson, Butler, and Edmonson.

The third district shall be composed of the counties of Todd, Logan, Simpson, Warren, Allen, Monroe, Barren, and Hart.

The fourth district shall be composed of the counties of Cumberland, Adair, Green, Taylor, Clinton, Russell, Wayne, Pulaski, Casey, Boyle, and Lincoln.

The fifth district shall be composed of the counties of Hardin, Larue, Bullitt, Spencer, Nelson, Washington, Marion, Mercer, and Anderson.

The sixth district shall be composed of the counties of Garrard, Madison, Estill, Owsley, Rockcastle, Laurel, Clay, Whitley, Knox, Harlan, Perry, Letcher, Pike, Floyd and Johnson.

The seventh district shall be composed of the counties of Jefferson, Oldham, Trimble, Carroll, Henry, and Shelby, and the city of Louisville.

The eighth district shall be composed of the counties of Bourbon, Fayette, Scott, Owen, Franklin, Woodford, and Jessamine.

The ninth district shall be composed of the counties of Clarke, Montgomery, Bath, Fleming, Lewis, Greenup, Carter, Lawrence, Morgan, and Breathitt.

The tenth district shall be composed of the counties of Mason, Bracken, Nicholas, Harrison, Pendleton, Campbell, Grant, Kenton, Boone, and Gallatin.

The number of representatives shall, at the several sessions of the general assembly, next after the making of these enumerations, be apportioned among the ten several districts, proportioned according to the respective representative population of each; and the representatives shall be apportioned, as near as may be, among the counties, towns and cities in each district; and in making such apportionment the following rules shall govern to-wit: Every county, town or city having the ratio, shall have one representative; if double the ratio, two representatives, and so on. Next, the counties, towns or cities having one or more representatives, and the largest representative population above the ratio, and counties, towns, and cities having the largest representative population under the ratio, regard being always had to the greatest representative population: Provided, That when a county may not have a sufficient number of representative population to entitle it to one representative, then such county may be joined to some adjacent county or counties to send one representative. When a new county shall be formed of territory belonging to more than one district, it shall form a part of that district having the least number of representative population."

Mr. PRESTON'S substitute for the latter clause of the sixth section of the legislative report.

"In the year 1851, and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration shall be made of all the qualified electors of this commonwealth. After each enumeration, representatives and senators shall be apportioned as fairly as practicable, among the several counties, cities, and towns, of this commonwealth, according to the number of qualified electors therein.

In making the apportionment, all counties having less than two thirds of the ratio, shall be joined to such adjacent counties as will make the sum of their electors approximate most nearly the ratio. After this is done, all fractions or residuums shall be apportioned upon the principle of absorbing the smallest in the largest fraction, and so on, successively, until the apportionment is completed; but no fraction shall be attached to give representation to any county outside of the appellate district in which it originates."

Mr. ROGERS' substitute for the latter clause of the sixth section of the legislative report.

"which shall be first ascertained in the year 1850. At the first session of the general assembly, after the adoption of this constitution, provision shall be made, by law, that in the year 1858, and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified voters of the state shall be made. The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members; and to secure uniformity and equality of representation, the representatives shall be apportioned among the districts of the court of appeals, in proportion to the number of qualified voters in each. In making such apportionment, the following rules shall govern, to-wit: Every county, town, or city, having the ratio, shall have one representative, and if double the ratio, two representatives; and so on, until the ratio is exhausted. Next, the counties, towns, or cities, having one or more representatives, and the largest number of voters above the ratio, and the counties, towns, and cities, having the largest number of voters under the ratio, regard being always had to the greatest number of qualified voters: Provided, That if there should be any county not having a sufficient number of qualified voters to entitle it to a representative, it shall be added to the adjoining county having the largest residuums, provided that said residuum, with the vote of the added county will amount to two thirds of the ratio, in which event the two counties shall have two or more representatives, as the case may be. And if the addition of such county to the county having the largest residuum, will not entitle said two counties to an additional representative, then said county not having a sufficient number of qualified voters, shall be added to the adjoining county or counties having the smallest residuum, to form a representative district."

Mr. TURNER'S substitute for the latter clause of the sixth section of the legislative report:

"Sec. — Representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated by the number of qualified electors therein. In the year and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the free male inhabitants of the state above twenty-one years of age shall be made, in such manner as shall be directed by law. The number of representatives shall, in the several years of making these enumerations, be so fixed as not to be less than seventy-five, nor more than one hundred; and they shall be apportioned for the four years next following, as near as may be, among the several counties and towns in proportion to the number of qualified electors; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified electors to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjacent county or counties may not have a residuum or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representation, it shall be in the power of the general assembly to join two or more together, for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining, which have residuums over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio, in that case one representative shall be added to that county having the largest residuum; and the general assembly, in making said apportionment, shall commence at the county of Greenup: Provided, That no county having a less voting population shall have a separate representative, when another county having a greater number of voting population has no representative: And provided, That no county having a less population shall have two representatives, when another county having a greater number of voting population has but one representative."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE'S substitute for the latter clause of the sixth section of the legislative report.

"Sec. — At each apportionment of representation, it shall be the duty of the General assembly to divide the state, by counties which are coterminous, commencing at the state line on the Ohio river, into three districts, binding on said river, (extending southward to the state line,) as nearly equal in representative population as may be, and allot to each of said districts the number of representatives to which its representative population shall entitle it, according to the ratio fixed. The number of representatives in each district shall be apportioned among the several counties in such mode as will best preserve the principle of equal and fair representation. In doing which, the following rules shall be observed:

First. Each county shall be entitled to a representation equal to its representative population.

Second. The fraction of any county shall be transferred to an adjoining county, when such adjoining county has a representative population under the ratio, but greater than such fraction, and when such fraction or fractions, added to the representative population of the adjacent county, shall be equal to the ratio, such county shall be entitled to a separate representation.

Third. When the representative population of such adjacent county is less than the fraction of the adjoining county, the two shall be united, and form one representative district.

Fourth. Two or more coterminous counties, each having a representative population under the ratio, shall be united, and shall constitute a representative district.

Fifth. When there shall be a fraction or fractions not absorbed by an adjoining county or counties, the same shall be transferred to that county in the district having the largest representative population under the ratio, which shall constitute a representative district."

Mr. THOMPSON'S substitute for the latter clause of the sixth section of the legislative report:

"An enumeration of the qualified voters, and an apportionment of the representatives in the general assembly shall be made in the year 1852, and within every subsequent term of eight years. The number of representatives shall, at the first session of the general assembly after the enumeration aforesaid, be apportioned among the several counties, cities, and towns, according to the number of qualified voters in each, and shall not exceed one hundred, or be less than seventy five: Provided, That any county having two thirds of the ratio shall be entitled to one member."

Mr. CHAMBERS' substitute for the latter clause of the sixth section of the legislative report:

"In apportioning representation among the several counties in this commonwealth, every county which is not entitled to a separate representative shall be attached to that adjoining county which contains the least voting population; and counties thus attached shall vote in conjunction for representative or representatives. The full ratios shall be first filled, and the remaining representative, (if any,) shall be given to the counties or attached counties, having the largest residuums: Provided, That not more than two counties shall in any case be attached for electing a representative; and where the residuums of any two counties thus attached shall obtain an additional representative each county shall have one, and vote separately."

Mr. APPERSON gave notice that he should move the plan of the select committee.

The eleventh section of the report of the committee on the legislative department was next read as follows:

"SEC. 11. The senate shall consist of not less than thirty, nor more than thirty eight members."

Mr. BRISTOW moved to strike out the entire section, and insert the following:

"In the apportionment of representation, the number of representatives in the house of representatives shall be seventy five; and the number of senators twenty five."

Mr. CLARKE opposed the amendment in a few remarks.

Mr. GHOLSON moved to amend the amendment by striking out "seventy-five," and inserting "one hundred," also, by striking out "twenty-five," and inserting "thirty-eight."

A division was called for, and the first branch was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW called for the yeas and nays on the second branch, and they were—yeas 62, nays 28.

So the amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment was then adopted for the original section.

The twelfth section was read and adopted as follows:

"SEC. 12. The same number of senatorial districts shall, from time to time, be established by the general assembly, as there may be senators allotted to the state, which shall be so formed as to contain as near as may be, an equal number of qualified voters, and so that no county shall be divided in the formation of a senatorial district, except such county shall be entitled, under the enumeration, to two or more senators."

Mr. GARRARD offered the following as an additional section, and it was adopted:

"Senators and representatives shall be elected under the first apportionment, after the adoption of this constitution, in the year 1851, and every two years thereafter, unless changed by law."

Mr. JAMES called the attention of the convention to a resolution which he offered at an early period of the session, and said that as he believed such a provision was necessary and important, he would test the sense of the convention upon it, by offering it again. He now moved, therefore, that it be printed, and he would call it up on a future day.

It was read as follows, and ordered to be printed:

"The general assembly shall have no power to pass any act or resolution for the appropriation of money, or creating any debt against the state, or for the payment of money in any way whatever: Provided, The debt created, or money appropriated, may exceed _____ dollars, unless the act or resolution creating the debt or appropriating the money, shall be voted for by a majority of all the members then elected to each branch of the general assembly; said vote to be taken by the yeas and nays, which shall be entered upon the journals of each house."

Mr. KAVANAUGH offered the following as an additional section.

"The proceeds of the slackwater navigation of the state are to form part of the sinking fund, nor is the said sinking fund in any manner to be chargeable with the payment of the interest or principal of the school fund, nor due by the state to the board of education."

After a few words from Mr. IRWIN, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. KAVANAUGH, the motion to print was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the section.

Mr. HARDIN. The avails of slackwater were set apart for the sinking fund, and last year we voted that two cents should be levied upon every hundred dollars of property and applied to the school fund; but the legislature exceeded this, for they transferred the avails of the sinking fund to the school fund. Now I understand the gentleman from Anderson, in offering the proposition, to mean nothing more nor less than this—that the avails of the slackwater shall be and remain where it was originally designed—as a part of the sinking fund.

The gentleman from Franklin brought here a book yesterday in relation to the auditor's report. Upon looking into that report, I find it is a very different year; the year he read was 1848, beginning with October, 1847, and ending with 1848. The document made out by the auditors, begins with the first of October, 1848, and ends with 1849. It is a different document altogether.

Mr. LINDSEY. Mr. President: It will be seen that the language used on the 832d page of the debates, by the delegate from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) conveys the idea that the proceeds paid into the treasury last year, from slackwater improvements, netted only $10,000. This will be understood by every one to mean the business year, from January to January, as the accounts are kept by the board of internal improvement; when in fact the net sum was over three times that amount, as stated by me yesterday. The auditor's statement, (as the fiscal year of the commonwealth is from October to October,) embraces three months of last year, and leaves out three months of this year, and includes the period when business was almost entirely suspended by reason of the cholera, and afterwards by low water.

I have learned that the business year, to 31st December, will realize on the Kentucky river, from $40,000 to $41,000, as the gross receipts of this year.

There have been some extraordinary expenditures in securing dams one and two, on the Kentucky river, amounting to perhaps $6,000 or $7,000; but the ordinary expenditures will not be increased, still the net amount to be paid into the treasury for the year 1849, will go much over $10,000. My whole object has been to place facts and figures aright.

Mr. HARDIN. The expense of the Kentucky river navigation last year was $26,600. I have here a document, setting forth the avails and expenditures for a series of years, and other information in relation to the public debt, which may possess some interest.

The table I present shows the receipts and expenditures for the year ending in 1849. The table the gentleman, (Mr. Lindsey,) referred to the other day, is for the year 1848. The remarkable increase of expenditures for the year 1849, to my mind, demand an investigation. It is as follows:

AUDITOR'S OFFICE, FRANKFORT, Oct. 1849.

Sir: In compliance with your verbal request, I submit the following statements, which are supposed to embrace the information desired by your committee, to-wit:

1. Statement showing the condition of the public debt of the State of Kentucky, from the 18th of October, 1848, to the 10th of October, 1849.

Whole amount of public debt outstanding, October 10, 1848, $4,552,313 81

Amount paid into the treasury by trustee of Craddock fund, June 15, 1849, 500 00

4,552,813 81

Amount redeemed, from the 10th October to December 31, 1848, $19,400 00

Amount redeemed, from 1st January to 10th October, 1849, 36,231 00

Error in original statement of amount of internal improvement and rail-road scrip, outstanding, 30 00

Whole debt (which is exclusive of school bonds,) outstanding, October 10, 1849, $4,497,152 81

Of this sum, $3,661,152 81 bear 6 per cent. interest; $836,000 bear 5 per cent. interest, and $1,690 of the 6 per cent. debt are due.

2. Statement of receipts and disbursement of the Treasury on account of the Sinking Fund, from October 10, 1848, to October 10, 1849.

1849	7,932 06	12,532 06	Loss, 4,600 00

It should be observed that in giving the proceeds of Kentucky river, to the 10th of October, 1849, a warrant drawn for expenses of current quarter, amounting to $7,000, is deducted, which is the fifth quarterly requisition for that year.

Respectfully,

J. B. TEMPLE,

Auditor Public Accounts.

HON. BEN. HARDIN,

Chairman of Committee on the public debt.

Mr. LISLE. I am the friend of common schools and education. I believe that the continuance of our free institutions depends on the virtue and intelligence of the people, and I had intended submitting some remarks to the convention on these subjects, but there had been so much time consumed in discussion, that I forbore doing so, while they were under consideration. Our action here is to affect this state vitally for weal or for woe. I drew up the first section of the article on education, which has been adopted by the convention, and I am under obligations to the younger gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) for presenting it in lieu of the substitute which he had offered for the report of the committee on education. I could not support the report of that committee, because it made it imperative on the legislature within five years to establish, and forever thereafter keep in existence an efficient system of common schools in the state. To accomplish this, night, and would probably, have led to oppressive taxation against the wishes of the people. If the system is sustained in the state, it must be by an enlightened public sentiment. I entreat the friends of education to do nothing which may tend to set public sentiment against it. I am unwilling to force on the people of the state a system of common schools which must be sustained by taxation levied on them against their consent. Such a course, instead of promoting the cause of education, would, as I believe, be an injury to it. The section which has been adopted, secures the present school fund of the state inviolate for the purposes of common schools, and it also provides that the interest on said fund shall be paid and appropriated in aid of common schools, and for no other purpose.

Sir, the income on the sinking fund will be amply sufficient to pay the ordinary expenses of the state, the interest on our public debt, the interest on the school fund, and leave a considerable sum to be applied annually to the extinguishment of the principal of the public debt, without any increase of taxation.

Public sentiment in the state, on the subject of education, is moving in the proper direction, as was shown at the election before the last, when the people voted an additional tax of two cents for the purpose of sustaining common schools. Sir, it is reasonable to suppose that the delegates on this floor reflected truly the wishes of their constituents, when they adopted, with great unanimity, the section securing the school fund, and requiring the interest on it to be paid.

The section which was offered by the gentleman from Anderson, (Mr. Kavanaugh,) was designed to prohibit the application of any portion of the income of the sinking fund to the payment of the interest on the school fund. I do not assert that such is the intention of the gentleman who moved this section, but most assuredly, if adopted, it would be a fatal stab to the system of common schools.

Sir, is there any gentleman on this floor, who will venture openly to advocate the repudiation of the debt due to the board of education? This school fund was not raised from the people of the state by taxation; it was a munificent gift, if I may use the expression, by the general government to the state, and has been solemnly set apart and dedicated by the state, to purposes of education. It is a fund which justly belongs to the children of the country, many of whom are poor and destitute. Sir, the repudiation of this debt would be most manifestly unjust; it would be a stain on the fair fame of the state; no gentleman will assert that he desires to see an increase of taxation in the state; yet, sir, adopt this section, and you must either repudiate the debt or pay the interest on it by an increase of taxation. Are gentlemen prepared for either? Sir, we are attempting to do too much. We are going too much into detail. A constitution should fix and settle great and leading principles, and leave to the legislature to carry out the details. Adopt the section now under consideration, and we are not only going too much into detail, but we shall do that which will not meet the approbation of our constituents. By the adoption of the section, we virtually repeal an act passed by the last legislature. By that act the income arising from slack water improvements on the Kentucky, Green, and Barren rivers, was, after the year 1850, to be applied to the payment of the interest on the school fund.

Sir, a large portion of the school fund has been unjustly and improperly applied to the improvement of our roads and rivers, and it is right and proper that the legislature should have the power of applying the income arising from these roads and rivers to the payment of the interest on that fund. The section now under consideration, is not only uncalled for, but improper, and I hope the convention will reject it.

Mr. MAYES moved the previous question, and the main question was now ordered to be put.

Mr. TAYLOR called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the section, and they were—yeas 11, nays 77.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Green Forrest, Ben. Hardin, Thomas James, George W. Kavanaugh, Wm. D. Mitchell, Ignatius A. Spalding, Squire Turner, Chas. A. Wickliffe—11.

NAYS—Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, Wm. K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thos. D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, William Chenault, Jas. S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, Jas. Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfinkle, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Thos. J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Andrew Hood, Thos. J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, Jas. W. Irwin, Alfred M. Jackson, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Wm. Preston, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thos. Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Jas. Rudd, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, John D. Taylor, Wm. R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson—77.

So the section was rejected.

ORGANIZATION OF NEW COUNTIES.

The convention proceeded to the consideration of the article in relation to the organization of new counties, as follows:

"SEC. 1. No new county shall be formed with an area of less than three hundred and fifty square miles; nor shall such new county be formed, if by doing so it reduces any county out of which it shall be formed, in whole or in part, below an area of four hundred square miles; and in running the lines or boundary of such new county, no such line shall run nearer than ten miles of the county seat of any county."

Mr. MAYES. Being a member of the select committee whose report is now under consideration, I respectfully ask the attention of gentlemen to the reasons by which I was influenced, as a member of that committee, to give my assent to the report, and by which I am now induced to advocate the adoption of it by the convention, as a part of the constitution which we are attempting to frame for the future government of Kentucky. Did I not believe that some such principle as that indicated by the report, was demanded by the people, and absolutely necessary, I certainly would not be found insisting upon its adoption. But being thoroughly satisfied from experience and observation, as well as the history of the state upon this subject, that some such principle is essentially necessary to the well-being of the state and her interests, as well as to the people whose misfortune it is to reside in counties where questions of disorganization and division of the counties exist. I am impelled not only to advocate the adoption of the restrictive principle, contained in the report; but feel most anxious that some such feature be incorporated as a part of the constitution, assured as I am, that by it much evil will be prevented, and if we can prevent evil, to that extent we do good.

The report proposes first that no new county shall hereafter be formed in Kentucky if by its creation the county or counties, or either of them, from which it may be taken in whole or in part, shall be left with an area of less than four hundred square miles of territory, and secondly that no new county shall be formed having less than three hundred and fifty square miles; and in the third place it is proposed that the county line of any county which may hereafter be created, shall not be run nearer than within ten miles of any county seat. An amendment has been proposed by the honorable chairman of the committee, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe,) which proposes to provide that no new county shall hereafter be created, when by so doing the county or counties or either of them from which it may be taken, will thereby be reduced in voting population to a less number than the then existing ratio of representation. When this proposition was under consideration some weeks ago, I could not be surprised by the interest manifested by some gentlemen in opposition to it, and I was especially astonished that my friend from Caldwell, (Mr. Machen,) should have been excited as he evidently then was. That gentleman seemed to think that the adoption of the principle indicated by the report of the committee would be fraught with the most dangerous consequences to the constitution which we are attempting to frame. He warned us that if we should dare to restrain the legislature in its future action upon this subject, wild and impolitic as we all do know that action heretofore to have been, such restraint, whatever may be the necessity for it, would inevitably weigh down the instrument and cause its defeat, when it shall be submitted to the people for approval or rejection. That gentleman, by way of making clear to the minds of delegates the truth of this prediction, asserted without qualification that should the principle contained in the report which we are now considering be adopted and become part of the constitution, more than one half of his constituents would for that cause alone refuse to give to it their sanction, and would in fact vote against its adoption—although it may contain all those vastly important changes, so loudly and almost universally demanded by our constituents from one end of the commonwealth to the other. That portion of the gentleman's constituents who voted against and opposed the call of this convention, will no doubt vote against any constitution we may make, be the provisions of it what they may—because they are satisfied with the existing instrument and desire no change; but sir, can it be possible that more than a moiety of the voters of Caldwell county who voted for and advocated the call of this convention, will condemn and vote against the instrument we may frame and offer to them as the future constitution of Kentucky; if in it they are secured the right to select for themselves by vote all the officers of the government, great and small—if by it also that excessive legislation which has been and which the people well know to have been one of the greatest, if indeed not the very greatest evil under which they have labored and groaned for nearly fifty years past, shall be checked, and if by its provisions the legislature shall hereafter be convened not oftener than once in two, three, or four years, and if the common school fund be secured so that it cannot be misapplied, that fund which I do trust in God will at last bless and secure to the penniless, unprotected, fatherless children of our highly favored commonwealth, at least a common education; and thereby place the offices and honors of the state within their reach; I repeat, can it be possible that more than one half of the gentleman's constituents will vote against the new constitution, containing, as I am well assured it will do, those together with other provisions, deemed generally to be of paramount importance, and fall back on the present constitution with all its acknowledged defects and imperfections, and that too for the reason, and that only, that this convention may think proper to say that in time to come some restriction shall exist as matter of constitutional law upon the subject of creating new counties, surely not. It cannot be possible that such would be the case. The gentleman will pardon me when I say that in this he surely must be mistaken. A portion of the people of Caldwell may be and doubtless are and long have been most anxious to bring about the division of that county as the journals of the legislature made at different sessions, abundantly attest.

Still, Mr. Chairman, I cannot believe that any gentleman, be his residence where it may, who was sincerely in favour of the call of this convention, that the constitution might be amended in the important particulars to which I have alluded, as well as in other respects, will ever vote against the new one for a cause so very trivial. Indeed, one might well doubt the sincerity of any, who might say, that they had been in favor of a convention, but had voted against the new constitution because of such a provision as the one proposed. I should incline strongly to believe that such had never been dissatisfied with the constitution which we are attempting to amend. The people of Caldwell, no doubt, voted for the call of this convention, for the same reasons that citizens of other portions of the state voted for it—they were sensible that the existing constitution was defective in manys very important particulars, and that by its amendment in those particulars, the great end and aim of government, human happiness and prosperity would be promoted. If those great changes be made, which we all, or nearly all of us acknowledge should be made, in our form of government, then sir, I have no fear, no, not the shadow of a doubt, that our work will be received by our constituents, and will be by them most triumphantly adopted as the future constitution of our state. No sir, it will not be rejected by any portion of the people, because we have honestly thought that the common good demanded that some limit should be fixed in it upon the subject under consideration. The man must be timid indeed, if he be not labouring under a kind of mental aberration, who does, or can believe that the old constitution will be preferred to the new, for the absurd, and to my mind most ridiculous reason that the convention have said, or may say, that an old county shall not be reduced to less than four hundred square miles, nor a new one created containing less than an area of three hundred and fifty. If it be true, that persons will condemn and vote against the new constitution, if it contain the proposed restriction, why may I not argue on the other hand, that there are as many, not to say a greater number who will vote against it if it contain no such restrictive principle? Surely sir, I might with just as much reason and propriety insist that the constitution will be defeated if it contain no such provision, as gentlemen have for saying that such a provision will operate as a dead weight upon it, and will crush it. I do not however so argue, for the simple, and to myself very satisfactory reason, that whether the principle for which I now contend become part of the constitution or not, will not in the least degree affect either its reception or rejection—when it shall be submitted to the ordeal of the people. Suppose the question we are now considering was submitted to the voters of Kentucky, for their decision, what sir, would that decision be? Can any gentleman doubt, but that their votes would be at least twenty for it to one against it? No one will doubt this. Then sir, if a majority of the voters of the state would sanction the amendment proposed by the report of the committee, shall we hesitate to do that which they would do if here, and acting for themselves, and especially so, when we must know, that by the incorporation of this principle in the constitution, we shall greatly promote the general happiness, contentment and prosperity of the state and people, and check, to some extent at least, the drain upon the treasury, resulting from the mistaken and ruinous policy heretofore pursued on this subject, at the same time we give quiet and peace to the people of such counties as are afflicted by one of those vexatious and profitless questions of division.

Sir, I advocated the call of this convention, because I thought important changes should be made in our organic law. I am still for constitutional reform, and I expect and intend to do battle for the new constitution, if it contains those great principles of reform for which we have been contending so long. If we should unfortunately fail to secure the whole and only succeed in part, still I will be found for the new constitution, upon the ground that any improvement is better than none. I am not to be deterred from doing that which my honest judgment tells me is right, by the note so often sounded here, that if this principle or that, be adopted, the consequence will be, the defeat of the constitution? Whenever gentlemen are at fault, and can find no reasonable argument to bring to their aid, by way of sustaining their opposition to any proposition made here, they hold in terrorem over the heads of the friends of such proposition what they suppose to be a "knock down" argument, and that is, if you dare to do this, the constitution will be defeated.

Sir, if propositions are made here, and my judgment be satisfied, that by their adoption the general prosperity and happiness will be promoted, I, for one, shall be found in the support of such propositions and will trust to the good sense of my constituents to sustain me when I return home to mingle with them. If the people of Kentucky have, by an experience of fifty years, which they have had under the existing constitution, learned the deficiency of that instrument, and if they have felt a necessity for its amendment in any one particular, they unquestionably have ascertained the fact that it is exceedingly defective in not having in it some such principle of restriction as the one which the committee propose to incorporate in the new one—such a feature as will, in some degree, restrain the legislature in that wild and reckless course of policy heretofore indulged in in the creation of new counties—such a feature as will give peace to the state and to the people of the different counties upon these vexatious, disturbing, and distracting questions of division—such a principle, sir, as will save to the state treasury, and consequently to the people, large sums of money which will otherwise be uselessly and most improvidently expended and taken from the treasury, and from the expenditure of which no earthly good will arise, either in a public or private point of view, but much, very much, of evil.

Sir, the practice heretofore so extensively, and, as all must confess, so very improperly indulged in by our legislature, calls most loudly for constitutional remedy, and the question now before us is, shall we apply the remedy and place a check upon this great evil, or shall we leave it unchecked, although all of us confess that it has been, and now is, an evil, and that we have it fully in our power to apply the remedy.

The gentleman from Caldwell says that the old counties are satisfied, being conveniently situated, and having but little territory. How does it happen that the old counties are satisfied? (if such be the case.) Simply for the reason that they have no earthly power to increase their territory, and thereby to add to their respectability. How has it happened that those old counties, such as Woodford and others, are so small in point of territory as they are, and are now pointed to by such as desire the division of a county, or counties, as examples and precedents in favor of the system of division heretofore indulged in. It is, sir, the result of the unfortunate legislation of Kentucky upon this subject. Those old counties, reduced as they have been in territory, and consequently shorn of much of the influence they otherwise would have exercised, are prepared, I doubt not, by their representatives here, to condemn that course of policy which has, in a great measure, stripped them of many important advantages, and which has resulted in evil, nothing but evil, to the state, and to individuals, for, sir, whenever one individual has been benefitted by it, at least ten have been seriously injured—some in a pecuniary point of view have been almost ruined.

The committee do not propose, Mr. President, that no new county shall hereafter be established in the state—no such thing. It is only proposed to fix in the constitution a rule by which the legislature shall, in time to come, be controlled and governed upon this subject. Will any gentleman contend that the old counties in Kentucky, or any one of them, should be reduced in territory to less than four hundred square miles? Will gentlemen contend that the good of the citizens of any county demands that the legislature should have the constitutional power to reduce them below that size? And, sir, will it be contended, I ask, that the legislature should be permitted to create a county with an area of less than three hundred and fifty square miles? Surely not. Divide the whole territory of the state into one hundred counties, of equal size, and we have exactly that number of counties now, and it will be seen that each county will contain only some four hundred square miles. Then it is proposed that new counties shall not hereafter be formed, containing less than three hundred and fifty square miles, so that the legislature will have the power to create a new county with less territory, by fifty thousand, than the counties of the state now average.

Surely sir, this ought to satisfy gentlemen; no gentleman would, I presume, wish to live in a county having less territory. Mr. President, unless some constitutional barrier be thrown in the way of the legislature upon this subject, I hazard but little when I say that no county in the state, I care not what the extent of its territory may be, is or will be safe against the spirit of disorganization, which sometimes exists in counties and in the legislature. Gentlemen may feel safe now, sir—they may flatter themselves that their counties are so very small that no man but a madman could think of division. Let the constitution remain as it now is upon this subject, and if there be gentlemen who deem their seats of justice and their counties safe from disorganization for the reason that they have but little territory, they will find themselves mistaken. No man can tell when one of those vexatious and distracting questions will be raised in his county; and it is, sir, a singular fact, that when such a question has been once made, it has rarely ever been suffered to sleep. There are those, who from motives of self-aggrandizement, are always and at all times ready to fan the flame of dissatisfaction and to keep alive the strife, regardless of the injury which may result to the state at large or to individuals. All such persons aim at—all they care for is the promotion of their own fortunes; they care not what the sacrifice may be to others. There are but few, very few counties, Mr. President, where such persons do not live.

The gentleman from Caldwell tells us that there has been a disinclination upon the part of the legislature for years past to organize new counties. Well sir, I do not agree with the gentleman. As great as that disinclination may have been, if that gentleman will take the trouble to examine, he will find that within the last nine years the legislature has created and given life and existence to ten new counties. This is true, what does it prove? Unquestionably that, instead of a disinclination upon the part of the legislature so to act, a very strong inclination has existed, and doubtless will continue to exist in that body, by which it will be impelled, unless restrained as proposed, to the creation of new counties, and that too without any real necessity for so doing. The fact that within so short a time there has been created such a number of counties—most of them as I contend being unnecessary—satisfies me that some wholesome restraint upon this subject is absolutely necessary. View this question in any aspect in which it is susceptible of being presented, we shall see that some such provision as the one contemplated by the report under consideration is essentially necessary to the public good. If the question be one purely of state policy, then some such provision is unquestionably demanded. If it be a question of a local character, still this convention is bound to act on the subject; and if it be a question partaking both of a general and local character, we are called upon to act upon the subject, and place in the constitution such provision as will in future, in some manner, protect the state and the different counties from the positive evils which otherwise will result to both if we fail to act affirmatively upon this subject. Why, I ask, should we not so act, if there be counties in the state with territory sufficient to render their division at all reasonable? Such division may be had, notwithstanding the proposed restriction be made. If there be a county in the state with seven hundred and fifty square miles, it may be divided. I have said, sir, that if this be a question of state policy, apart from local considerations, then we are called upon by that duty which we owe to the state, to act upon this subject. I have also said that the question under consideration partakes both of a state and local character. And now I proceed to show the state aspect of the question. All admit it to be the interest of the people that the government be carried on and administered at the least possible cost. It is expected—and our fellow-citizens have a right to expect—that no expense will be incurred, unless it shall be absolutely necessary, to promote the public good; not that private interests may be advanced to the detriment of the general prosperity—and by the general prosperity I mean the welfare of the people of the whole state—not such as happen to inhabit any particular county to the exclusion of others.

Well sir, here the question arises—does the creation of a new county cost the people of the state at large anything? Does it subtract from the general wealth, and sir, are the people of the state at large taxed to any extent by its creation? I maintain that no county ever was or ever will be made unless at considerable cost to the state. The organization of each new county, when formed, costs the people of Kentucky not less than from $700 to $1,000. Taylor county, the last one created, and which completes the hundred, I see from the second auditor's report, cost the state for record books alone, $278 25. There are forty five volumes of the reported decisions of the court of appeals. The state is bound to furnish the circuit and county court clerk's offices each with a set of those reports—making ninety volumes.—They cannot be had at a cost of less than $5 per volume—making $450. The offices must be furnished each with a copy of Morehead and Brown's digest, and with Pirtle's digest—these at $10 a copy, amount to $40. And sir, the offices must be supplied with furniture—such as tables and desks—which I put down, I think, low enough at $75—making, when added together, the considerable sum of $843 25. These are all the essential articles to the organization, and putting into operation a new county. There are, doubtless, other incidental expenses which do not, at this time, occur to me; but which will, no doubt, be thought of by gentlemen. Up to the year 1840, there were, in the state, but ninety counties—enough, one would suppose, in all conscience. Since that time, however, we find that there has been formed ten others. If the organization of each one of these ten counties cost the state $843—as I maintain is the fact—then the organization of new counties by the legislature has, within the last nine years, cost the people of Kentucky the large sum of $8,430. This is not all there is annually paid to the clerk and sheriff of every county out of the common treasure, $80 for ex-officio services. These are positive annual burthens on the state, incurred whenever a new county is formed. There are, doubtless, others. Then sir, does not the public interest imperiously demand that some restriction, some constitutional rule be adopted upon this subject, beyond which the legislature shall not, in future, go. Examine them sir, as a question of state policy, and in that view, it certainly must strike all most forcibly. No gentleman here can, it does appear to me, fail to see that he must favor the report of the committee. But sir, I propose still further to show that the unnecessary multiplication of new counties has otherwise materially affected the revenue of the state, and has, consequently, operated most unfavorably upon the public treasury.

If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the last report made by the second auditor, they will find that some fifty counties pay the entire expenses of the government, and that the other fifty take from the treasury as much as they pay into it. It will then be seen that, for the year 1848, the counties of Breathitt, Cumberland, Clinton, Floyd, Grayson, Johnson, Knox, Letcher, Laurel, Lawrence, Livingston, Marshall, Morgan, Owsley, Perry, Pulaski, Russell, Rockcas-tle, Wayne, Whitley, and Harlan, being twenty one counties, took from the treasury $9,506 34 more than they paid into it. We learn from the same report, that the counties of Monroe, Pike, Adair, Ballard, Crittenden, Graves, Hickman, Meade, McCracken, Hancock, Estill, Allen, Butler, Casey, Carter, Clay, Edmonson, and Larue, sixteen in number, for that year paid, altogether, into the treasury, only $4,712 71 more than they took from it. Many of the counties which I have mentioned, it will be observed, are new, others of them are old; yet if you will inquire it will be found that the old ones have been so divided and curtailed as to reduce them from counties of the first respectability and importance, to their present condition. Now, Mr. President, take the sums paid by the counties which pay the smallest amounts into the treasury, and add these sums together until you have an amount equal to the sum taken from the treasury by the counties first named, and it will be seen that the whole, or very nearly the whole revenue, paid for the support of the government, is derived from about fifty counties, and that the other fifty afford little or no aid in support of the government.

This state of things is mainly and legitimately attributable to that mistaken policy heretofore indulged in by the legislature, and which we now propose in some measure to remedy. It is insisted, however, sir, notwithstanding all this, that this question properly belongs to the people of such counties as may desire their division, and that this convention would do wrong in laying down any rule upon this subject. And it is further insisted, that a majority of the people of a county should be permitted, without restriction, to divide it whenever they see proper to do so. I deny that the people of any county have the right, or should have the right to divide their county when they see proper to do so, regardless of consequences to the state. If this doctrine be true, then whenever a majority of the people of a county conclude to divide it, it must be done, be the size and situation of the county what it may, be it large or small. If this question be local to the people of the different counties, and I have said that in some respects it may be regarded as local, then I contend that we are positively instructed by our constituents to apply some such restriction upon this subject as is proposed by the report which we are considering. One of the greatest evils of which the people of the state complained, and which exercised as great and powerful an influence in bringing about, and in inducing the people to call this convention, was the fact, that under the existing state of things, there was excessive and improper legislation upon local subjects, greatly to the detriment of the public interest—subjects in which the people of the state generally had and felt no interest whatever. The people at large have no earthly beneficial interest in the division of a county. They, sir, are deeply, most deeply interested that the impolitic legislation such as has heretofore been indulged in on this subject, be checked. Yes, sir, checked at least. It tends to no general good, and the people know it. Its only tendency is to impoverish the state, as well as individuals. How many thousands of dollars has there in the last ten years been expended in useless legislation upon this subject, in discussions as to whether a county or counties should be divided, and upon the subject of removing seats of justice?

The legislature sits at a cost to the people of more than five hundred dollars per day; and it has been known to be engaged, repeatedly, for weeks, upon a question as to whether or not a county should be divided, or a seat of justice removed. I have said, sir, that excessive and unnecessary legislation upon this subject, had operated most unjustly and oppressively upon private interests. This is true, and all know it to be so. If you will examine the different acts establishing counties, it will be seen that the legislature in the law or act, by which the county is established, generally, if not in all cases, fix the seat of justice permanently (as the act reads) at some point named in the act, thus voluntarily giving a legal promise that if persons see proper to expend their money in the purchase and improvement of property at the seat of justice, such expenditure shall not be sacrificed by a removal of that seat of justice, yet how often have we seen this legal, this voluntary promise, wantonly and grossly violated, and the poor mechanic who upon the faith of this promise had expended his all in the purchase and improvement of a lot at one of those seats of justice permanently located by legislative enactment, stripped of all he has by an act of a succeeding legislature, which either divides the county or removes the seat of justice; and if a county be divided, it generally follows that the seat of justice is removed, and when this is done the town is deserted, and property in it is at once rendered valueless. Such was the case in Calloway county, which was but a few years ago divided by legislative enactment. The people were informed by the act of the legislature by which that county was created, that the seat of justice was permanently located at Wadsworth, and upon the faith of this legislative promise—voluntarily made—many good citizens in humble circumstances were induced to, and did expend their all in the purchase and improvement of property at that place. What is now the fact? The legislature some few years past, as I have before said, passed an act by which that county was divided; the division line being run just so as to miss the town, in consequence of which the seat of justice was immediately removed from Wadsworth; in consequence of which that place has been almost entirely deserted, and the property of its citizens rendered worthless; all this was done in defiance of the just and united opposition of the citizens of that town and a large portion of the people of the county. This, sir, is only one instance out of many that I could name of the flagrant injustice and wrong done to private persons under such circumstances. Look, sir, at Salem, destroyed by the division of Livingston county, some two or three years ago. Fulton county was organized by the division of Hickman but a short time since. Why was this new county made? Not because Hickman had too much territory, but because so much of her territory had been taken to aid in the formation of Ballard, that it threw Clinton out of the centre, and it became necessary, either to divide the county or remove the seat of justice, and break up the people of Clinton. I could, if I had time sir, refer to almost innumerable cases of wanton and unnecessary injustice done to private rights by the policy heretofore pursued by the legislature upon this subject, and from which no corresponding private or public benefit ever has or ever will result. Then sir, is it singular, or at all to be wondered at when it is seen that the legislature has time and again violated those legal pledges, voluntarily made to the people, that it should have forfeited their confidence and esteem. It is not. When our neighbor disregards and violates his promise made to another, he loses the confidence of that neighbor; so with the legislature, when it violates and disregards its pledges made to the people, and made too in the solemn form of law, that people so deceived and abused, must and will lose confidence in the person or body by whom they may have been deceived. I repeat that there is nothing in the proposition of the committee, so strange and new, that gentlemen need be startled by it. If gentlemen will examine, they will find that the new constitution of Tennessee provides that "new counties may be formed not to contain less than three hundred and fifty square miles of territory, such new county must at the time it is created contain four hundred and fifty qualified voters, that no line of such new county shall approach nearer to the court house of the county from which it may have been taken than twelve miles, nor shall the old county be reduced to less than six hundred and twenty five square miles," more than a third larger than the committee propose to leave the old counties of Kentucky.

Now turn to the constitution of Ohio. There we find that no new county can be made, having less than four hundred square miles of territory, nor can the old county or counties, or either of them, from which it may be taken, be reduced to a less number of square miles. We find that by the constitution of Texas, no county can be formed, when by so doing, the county or counties, or either of them, from which it may be taken, shall be reduced in area to less than nine hundred square miles, unless by consent of two-thirds of the legislature; nor shall a new county be established, unless it has as much territory. The constitution of Michigan has this provision: "No county now organized by law, shall ever be reduced by the organization of new counties, to less than four hundred square miles." The constitution of Missouri has this provision: "No county now established, shall ever be reduced by the establishment of new counties, to less than twenty miles square; nor shall any county hereafter be established, which shall contain less than four hundred square miles." Now, sir, look at the constitution of Alabama. In it we find this provision: "No new county shall be laid off hereafter, nor old county reduced to less contents than four hundred and thirty-two square miles." We find in the constitution of Indiana this provision: "The general assembly, when they lay off any new county, shall not reduce the old county, or counties, from which the same shall be taken, to a less content than four hundred square miles." In the constitution of Mississippi, this provision is found: "No new county shall be established by the legislature, which shall reduce the county, or counties, or section of others, from which it may be taken, to less contents than five hundred and seventy-six square miles; nor shall any new county be laid off of less contents." When we look into the constitution of Arkansas, we find this provision: "No county now established by law, shall ever be reduced by the establishment of any new county, or counties, to less than nine hundred square miles, nor to a less population than its ratio of representation; nor shall any county be hereafter established which shall contain less than nine hundred square miles, or a less population than would entitle such county to a member in the house of representatives." I will now read from the constitution of Iowa, which has this provision: "No new county shall be laid off hereafter, nor old county reduced to less contents than four hundred and thirty-two square miles." So we find that ten of the states of this Union have incorporated into their constitutions provisions similar to those proposed to be inserted in the constitution of Kentucky. Most of the states mentioned are new. Some of them, however, are old, and have remodeled their constitutions, and adopted this principle. Why have they done so? For the reason, I presume, that they have all seen, and some of them have felt, a positive necessity for it. They have seen, as we must now see, that it is the only means by which peace and quiet can ever be hoped for upon this disturbing subject; for, unless some such principle be adopted, questions of division will ever be present in the legislature, and by them the time of that body will be consumed in useless discussion, and the money of the people wasted. Shall we not, then, at least, confine the legislature within reasonable limits upon this subject. The people expect us to adopt some such principle as the one indicated by the select committee; they wish to know where this thing is to end. If our present constitution had such a provision, the advantages to the state, which would have resulted from it, are incalculable.

I wish now, Mr. President, to call the attention of the convention to the territorial size of each state in this Union—their population in the year 1840, and the number of counties in each state. It will be seen that states with largely over double the population of Kentucky, and with greatly more territory, have but little over half the number of counties we have. New York has 46,000 square miles of territory, has a population of 2,428,921 souls, she has only 58 counties. Pennsylvania has the same territory as New York, with a population of 1,724,033 souls, and only 55 counties. Maryland 13,959 square miles, with a population of 469,232 and but 20 counties. Massachusetts, 7,500 square miles, with a population of 737,699 and only 14 counties. Delaware, 2,120 square miles of territory, with a population of 78,085 and 3 counties. Connecticut has 4,674 square miles, with a population of 300,015 and 8 counties. Georgia, has 58,000 square miles, with a population of 691,392 and she has 93 counties. North Carolina has 48,000 square miles, with a population of 753,419 and she has 68 counties. South Carolina has 25,000 square miles, with a population of 594,398 and she has only 29 counties. Virginia has 64,000 square miles, with a population of 1,239,797 and has 119 counties. Our state, Kentucky, has 40,500 square miles, with a population of 779,828 and she has 100 counties. Tennessee has 45,000 square miles, with a population of 829,210 souls, and she has 72 counties. Ohio has 40,000 square miles, with a population of 1,519,466 and she has 79 counties. Indiana has 36,000 square miles, with a population of 685,866 souls, and she has 87 counties. Illinois has 50,000 square miles, with a population of 476,183 and she has 87 counties. Alabama has 46,000 square miles, with a population of 590,756 souls, and she has 49 counties. Florida has 57,000 square miles, with a population of 54,477 and she has 20 counties only. Arkansas has 54,500 square miles, with a population of 97,574 and she has 40 counties. Louisiana has 45,350 square miles, with a population of 352,411 and she has 38 counties or parishes. Mississippi has 45,760 square miles, with a population of 375,651 and she has 56 counties. Missouri has 64,000 square miles, with a population of 383,702 and she has 62 counties. Maine has 30,000 square miles, with a population of 501,793 and she has only 13 counties. New Jersey has 8,320 square miles, with a population of 373,306 and she has 18 counties. New Hampshire has 9,280 square miles, with a population of 284,574 and she has 10 counties. Rhode Island has 1,360 square miles, with a population of 108,830 and she has 5 counties. Vermont has 10,212 square miles, with a population of 291,948 and she has 14 counties. Michigan has 66,000 square miles, with a population of 212,267 and she has 32 counties. Iowa has 150,000 square miles of territory, with a population of 43,111 and she has only 18 counties; and Wisconsin has 90,000 square miles, with a population of 30,945 and she has 22 counties. I am not informed as to the extent of the territory of Texas, or her population, but this we do know sir, that she has had the prudence and forecast to lay certain restrictions on her legislature upon the subject of creating new counties. We see that Virginia is the only state in the Union, composed as it is, of thirty states, that has as many counties as Kentucky has, and that state has about one third more of territory and something like twice our population. If, sir, we are called upon as the delegates of the people in convention, to amend the existing constitution in any respect, we must unquestionably feel that this is one of the defects which calls most loudly for remedy. I have witnessed the rise and progress of these districting questions of division nearly all my life, and I do here declare that I never have known good, but evil, nothing but evil, unmitigated evil, to result from them. I might go on and show how they are generally gotten up and the common object had in view by such as originate them. It might be shown that the object in view is not at all times in truth the promotion of the convenience of the people who inhabit the county, the division of which is desired, but that the object of those generally, who originate and advocate such questions is in fact to promote their own personal interest.

But, sir, there has been so much strife and contention in the different counties upon this subject, that all understand it, and therefore, it would be a useless consumption of time to enquire into the causes which bring about and cause these questions to spring up and afflict the people; for the existence of a question of division in a county, is indeed a sore affliction to the citizens of that county. It impairs the value of lands and other property. It prevents the improvement and settlement of the county. It paralyzes, in a great measure, the energies of the people. It prevents the growth and improvement of the towns located in counties where such questions unfortunately exist. Many good citizens are, in consequence of it, driven from the county, and others who would, if no such question existed, settle in it, decline doing so in consequence of the existence of such a state of things. Divide a county and what follows as an inevitable consequence? The taxes of the people of that county are increased fourfold. Litigation receives a fresh impetus. You will find vice, immorality, and crime, greatly increased, besides other evils almost or quite innumerable growing out of it. The people of the divided territory have been disappointed; some of them in the location of the seat of justice, others because they wanted office, and hoped from the division to obtain it, but have failed. In fact, sir, dissatisfaction is one of the certain results of division; it never produces contentment and peace.

But, sir, I presume that gentlemen will, in giving their votes upon this proposition, act upon the general principle, and so far as their action shall be concerned, they will not enquire or know whether there be a question in any county in the state in relation to its division. Our votes will not, and should not be influenced either way from the fact that the people or a part of the people of any county in the state may desire its division. We should be actuated alone in this matter by the simple and plain proposition: Will it be right to fix some rule upon this subject, beyond which the legislature in future shall not go? I for one, am thoroughly satisfied that the principle contained in this report should be adopted as part of the constitution, and that its adoption will meet with the hearty approbation of the people.

Mr. NEWELL. This is a subject which has been heretofore before the convention. It is a subject in relation to which I presume every mind is made up. It is a subject which I am willing to leave to the legislature, and therefore, I move to lay it on the table.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Before the vote upon that motion is taken, I desire the roll to be called.

The roll was called accordingly.

Mr. MAYES called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table, and they were yeas 53, nays 39.

YEAS—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Lucius Desha, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Thomas J. Hood, Alfred M. Jackson, William Johnson, Geo. W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, Peter Lashbrooke, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, William C. Marshall, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Albert G. Talbott, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, John Wheeler, Robert N. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson—53.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, William K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Selucius Garfield, Ninian E. Gray, Ben. Hardin, Andrew Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Thomas James, Geo. W. Johnston, James M. Lackey, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Martin P. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, William Preston, Larkin J. Procter, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, Michael L. Stoner, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, Squire Turner, Henry Washington, Andrew S. White, Chas. A. Wickliffe, George W. Williams—39.

So the whole subject was laid on the table.

VOTE OF AN ABSENTEE.

Mr. HARGIS asked leave to record his vote on the subject of the basis of representation, which was disposed of in his absence yesterday.

MODE OF AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION.

The convention next proceeded to the consideration of the following report of the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery:

"Sec. 1. When experience shall point out the necessity of amending this constitution, and when a majority of all the members elected to each house of the general assembly shall, within the first twenty days of any regular session, concur in passing a law for taking the sense of the good people of this commonwealth as to the necessity and expediency of calling a convention, it shall be the duty of the several sheriffs, and other officers of elections, at the next general election which shall be held for representatives to the general assembly after the passage of such law, to open a poll for, and make return to the secretary of state, for the time being, of the names of all those entitled to vote for representatives, who have voted for calling a convention; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of all the citizens of this state, entitled to vote for representatives, have voted for calling a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next regular session, direct that a similar poll shall be opened, and return made, for the next election for representatives; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of all the citizens of this state, entitled to vote for representatives, have voted for calling a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next session, pass a law calling a convention, to consist of as many members as there shall be in the house of representatives, and no more; to be chosen in the same manner and proportion, at the same time and places, and possessed of the same qualifications of a qualified elector, by citizens entitled to vote for representatives; and to meet within three months after their election, for the purpose of re-adopting, amending, or changing this constitution; but if it shall appear by the vote of either year, as aforesaid, that a majority of all the citizens entitled to vote for representatives did not vote for calling a convention, a convention shall not then be called. And for the purpose of ascertaining whether a majority of the citizens, entitled to vote for representatives, did or did not vote for calling a convention, as above, the legislature passing the law authorizing such vote shall provide for ascertaining the number of citizens entitled to vote for representatives within the state."

"Sec. 2. All cases of contested elections, and where two or more candidates for delegate to any convention which may be called under this constitution, shall have an equal number of votes, shall be decided in the same manner as may be provided by law for similar cases arising in elections to the house of representatives."

Mr. TURNER moved to substitute the following for the report of the committee:

"In the year it shall be the duty of the several sheriffs, and other returning officers, to take the sense of the good people of this commonwealth, as to the necessity and expediency of calling a convention, at the several places of voting in their respective counties, on the first Monday in August, by opening a poll for, and making a return to, the secretary of state, for the time being, of the names of all those entitled to vote for representatives, who shall vote for calling a convention. And if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of all the citizens of this state, entitled to vote for representatives, have voted for a convention, a similar poll shall be opened and taken for the next election; and if a majority of all the citizens of the state, entitled to vote for representatives, shall a second year vote for a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there shall be in the house of representatives, and no more; to be chosen at the same time, manner, and places, and in the same proportion that representatives are chosen, and to meet in three months after the said election, for the purpose of re-adopting, amending, or changing, this constitution. The qualification of delegates to the convention shall be the same as members of the house of representatives, except that ministers of the gospel shall be eligible as members of the convention. If it shall appear by the vote of either year, as aforesaid, that a majority of all the citizens entitled to vote for representatives did not vote for a convention, none shall be called; and a similar poll shall be opened every year, until a majority, as aforesaid, shall, for two years in succession, vote for the call of a convention; and when such vote shall be given, the general assembly shall, at their next session, call a convention as above prescribed, and pass such laws for carrying the call into effect as may be proper."

Mr. TURNER. This proposition is not designed to provide for specific amendments, but it proposes to take the subject out of the hands of the legislature and of politicians, and hence to avoid the frequent discussion of excitable topics.

Mr. GRAY. I beg leave to offer the following as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Madison:

"The mode of revising and amending the constitution shall be as follows: Any specific amendment or amendments to the constitution, may be proposed in the senate or house of representatives, and if the same shall be agreed to by a majority of the members elected to each of the two houses, such proposed amendment or amendments shall be entered on their journals, with the yeas and nays taken thereon, and published for three months previous to the next succeeding election for representatives to the general assembly, in at least one newspaper of each county, if any be published therein, and shall be submitted to the people at said election, in such manner as the general assembly may prescribe; and if the people shall approve such amendment or amendments, or any of them, by a majority of all the electors of the state qualified to vote for members of the general assembly, such amendment or amendments, so approved, shall be referred to the general assembly chosen at said election; and if, in said general assembly, such proposed amendment or amendments, or any of them, shall be agreed to by a majority of all the members elected to each house, then it shall be the duty of the general assembly to again submit such proposed amendment or amendments, or such of them as may have been agreed to, as aforesaid, by the two general assemblies, to the people, at the next election for judicial officers, or members of the general assembly, and if the people, at said second election, shall approve and ratify such amendment or amendments, or any of them, by a majority of all the electors of the state qualified to vote for members of the general assembly, such amendment or amendments, so approved and ratified, shall become part of the constitution: Provided, That if more than one amendment be submitted, they shall be submitted in such manner and form that the people may vote for or against each amendment separately and distinctly; but no amendment or amendments shall be submitted to the people oftener than once in — years: And, provided further, That the article of the constitution concerning slaves, this article and the portion which provides that no man's property shall be taken or applied the public use without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being previously made to him, shall never be amended or changed, without the concurrence of two thirds of all the members elected to each house of the general assembly, at two successive sessions, and a majority of all the electors of the state qualified to vote for members of the general assembly, at two successive elections."

That sir, is the same proposition I presented to the convention early in the session, and it was printed and submitted to the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery. It is not my purpose, at this time, to detain the convention with any protracted remarks on this subject; for it is a question on which, I presume, the mind of every member is made up.

The mode in which our constitution shall henceforth be revised is certainly a question of the greatest moment. It was a question sir, that excited the community as much, probably more, than all others prior to the election of the delegates to this convention. Almost every other amendment proposed to the constitution was lost sight of, or overshadowed by the high wrought feeling and excited interest thrown around this question by the action of the emancipationists of the state. There are few members of this body who do not, in some degree, owe their elevation to their peculiar views in relation to this matter. And, all so far as I know, are committed, as well as inclined, to provide in the constitution we are about to make, as strong, safe, and certain guaranties, for the enjoyment and security of slave property, and all other property, as are to be found in the existing constitution. To insure the stability, security and uninterrupted enjoyment of property, and all other rights dear to freemen, much, very much, depends on the mode provided for revising the constitution; yet I am aware that, on this subject, great diversity of opinion exists amongst the members of this convention.

The gentleman from Madison appears to think that the mode of specific amendments will be so uncertain, and will result in so much instability to our institutions, as to keep us in a state of perpetual excitement and fear. So far from this being the case, sir, I am convinced that it will have a tendency directly the reverse—that it will be more certain in its operation, more stable and satisfactory in its results. If the gentleman will attend to the reading of the amendment I propose, he will find that no provision of the constitution can be altered or amended without the approval of the legislature at two sessions, by a majority of all the members, and that the changes thus decided upon by the legislature, must have the consent and ratification of a majority of all the qualified voters of the state, at two elections, before such changes can go into operation. The same deliberation, the same precaution, the same time, will be required, to change any single article, or section of the constitution, as will be necessary, by the plan of the committee, to change, or modify the whole instrument. The same certainty, the same security, the same guarantee of stability is, by this means, thrown, like a shield, around each article of the constitution, separately, and by itself, which you now propose to throw around the whole instrument; and I hold that these advantages will be much more effectually secured by the mode of specific amendments, thus suggested, than by the plan proposed by the gentleman from Madison, or the report of the committee. From what source does the gentleman anticipate the danger he appears so much to dread? Is it from the legislature?—is it from the people? I presume not. The gentleman admits that at first he was in favor of specific amendments, and says he was almost caught in the snare. I have no doubt he has retrograded a little on this subject, and I have as little doubt that most of the gentlemen in this hall, if they would speak their sentiments, would make similar confessions. And what has produced this wondrous change? Why, sir, there was a certain emancipation convention assembled here; and but for the propositions mooted in that assembly, I have not the slightest doubt that most of the members of this convention would have been warmly in favor of specific amendments.

I would ask gentlemen, if they believed, prior to the assembling of that convention, that specific amendments were wise and expedient, right and proper, what has taken place, so fearful in its aspect, to cause this almost universal change of sentiment? If this principle was right before, how can it be wrong now? If it was true before, how can it be false now? If it was safe and secure before, what has taken place to render it unsafe and dangerous in its character now? Why, sir, there was nothing in the proceedings of that convention which should have led gentlemen to adopt this singular change of sentiment. There were only two propositions that convention proposed to have engrafted upon the constitution—one, "the absolute prohibition of the importation of any more slaves to Kentucky"—the other, "the complete power in the people of Kentucky to enforce, and to perfect, in or under the new constitution, a system of gradual prospective emancipation."

These were the objects—the principles which were contended for; and because the emancipationists were in favor of specific amendments, or as some termed it, "an open clause" in the constitution by which the people might amend or alter it by a bare majority of their number, the hue and cry was posted over the whole state, as though it were on the wings of the wind, that the institution of slavery would be in danger. Thus gentlemen were induced to turn round and oppose a principle right in itself, and which commended itself to their better understandings, merely through fear of an imaginary evil.

Now, sir, I would ask, can we not provide for this specific mode of amending the constitution, and yet throw as strong a safe-guard, as certain guaranties, around the institution, by this, as by any other means? I think we can; and that we can do it much better by this plan than we can either by the mode suggested by the gentleman from Madison, or by that suggested by the committee.

I propose to guard against any emancipation, without the consent of the owner, or without full compensation, and the removal of the emancipated slaves from the state. And that that provision of the constitution, as well as the provision that secures to every man the enjoyment of all his property, and that provides it shall not be taken, even for public purposes, without compensation first paid to him, shall never be changed, without the concurrence of two thirds of the members of the legislature, at two sessions, and a majority of all the qualified electors of the state at two elections. Will not this place the institution on safe ground, and beyond danger?

The gentleman says, that if you allow the constitution to be amended by any proposition originating with the legislature, there will be so many propositions for a change that it will be necessary, by and bye, to have a digest of the constitution. Have not most of the states in the union power to amend their constitutions in this mode? Certainly they have; and even in the constitution of the United States, there is a provision for the amending of that instrument by the action of congress, with the concurrence of three fourths of the states. That instrument has been amended; and does he now require a digest to determine what is the constitution of the United States? Sir, it is true, there have been but few amendments adopted, and this proves the gentleman's fears are without foundation, and I conceive the gentleman is perfectly able to find them without a digest. The same principle which I here suggest has prevailed in twenty three out of the thirty states of this union, and, sir—

Mr. TURNER. I beg to inform the gentleman that it is disputed even now what the constitution of the United States is. This specific amendment system has been so loosely carried into effect that the Supreme Court of the United States have doubted whether two important amendments passed by congress are parts of that constitution.

Mr. GRAY. The gentleman may doubt any thing he pleases; he may say that the supreme court of the United States may have a doubt about these amendments, but I never have heard any doubt as to what were the amendments of the constitution of the United States. Some have entertained doubts about portions of our present constitution, and in relation to the mode of amending it. The Supreme Court of the State of Kentucky may entertain similar doubts about the amendments we are about to make here in the constitution of the state. The gentleman may also doubt whether these amendments are parts of the constitution or not; but sir, there can be no more doubt about amendments made in the way I propose, than there can be about those made in any other way; and I will say more, that every slave state in this Union, except Virginia and Kentucky, has adopted this specific mode of amending their constitutions. Is there any reason then on the score of danger to the institution of slavery, to prevent us from adopting a similar provision? Did the gentleman ever hear of a single slave state that had adopted this mode, abandoning it in revising their constitutions? In some of the states it was adopted as early as 1776, and continued to be approved of to the present time. Have they not all stood by it to the present time? We find, sir, that wherever this mode has been adopted and tried, it has given universal satisfaction. Does not experience teach us that it is a practicable, a proper mode, and that it is suited to the prosperity, the liberty, the happiness, of our citizens, and that it is peculiarly adapted to the genius of our institutions? It seems to me that gentlemen allow their fears to carry them away without reason.

Now sir, according to the plan which I propose, I contend that the institution of slavery or any other institution, is safer than when you throw the whole constitution—the entire machinery of government—open to the revision and amendment of a convention like this. Here we are voting and managing to get things to suit us, and when we have done all this, I ask you if the people can take one part of this new constitution which they may approve, and reject that which they disapprove? No sir. They must take it as a whole, as we have made it, or not at all. But by the mode of specific amendments, you may take it section by section, and in this way have it ratified by the people. Is not this a matter highly desirable? Here there can be no combination among the people for any ulterior political purpose, but they take each proposition by itself. They weigh and consider it deliberately and calmly, and it stands or falls, according as it receives their approbation or disapprobation. But sir, is that the case now? When the call of a convention is desired, every man who has an objection to any particular part of the constitution, combines and co-operates with every other man who has an objection to any other part. And thus the chances of calling a convention are multiplied in proportion to the various articles or sections that individuals may desire to have changed. At the same time that no one proposition for a change could secure a majority of the voters by this combination of various subjects, you involve the state in the agitation, excitement, hazard, and expense of calling a convention, and throwing the whole fundamental law in their hands, to be altered, modified, or abolished, as they in their wisdom or folly may think proper. Is this wise, is it prudent, is it good policy?

Our experience here amply proves, that the people cannot tell what changes will be made by a convention, for we have to take things just as we can get them; and there are propositions thrown in, and amendments carried, that were never spoken of before the people, or even dreamed of by them; and we have to take these amendments and propositions, just as a majority of this body may shape them. And, sir, when they are submitted to the people, it is not unlikely that there may be a vast deal in the constitution which they would reject, if each part could be taken separately. There may, sir, be many provisions in this constitution that the people will not approve of. And how are you to remedy the evil? Will you call another convention? Will you again unsettle the whole state, and come here to revise and amend, to rescind and curtail your own handiwork for the last three months? Will you again call a convention, at the cost and expense of forty or fifty thousand dollars, have the ship of state again cut loose from her moorings, and cast upon the boisterous and foaming sea of political excitement and agitation? The fear of this ought, sir, to deter gentlemen from refusing to engraft such a provision as I have proposed upon the constitution. If gentlemen will only take up the question and examine it under the dictates of reason and past experience, I feel satisfied they will no longer hesitate in coming to the conclusion that a specific mode of amendment ought to be provided in some shape or other.

I am not wedded to the particular phraseology of the amendment. If any better can be suggested that will secure the specific mode and guard the rights of property, I am willing to support it. I am as much in favor of continuing and protecting our slave institutions as any gentleman. And if there be any other plan by which it can be more surely guarded I would be willing to adopt it. By this mode any portion of the constitution that fails to secure the rights of the people, to answer the ends and purposes for which it was instituted; any portion that "experience points out the necessity of changing," may be changed by the legislature and the proposed alteration, singly and separately, submitted to the investigation and consideration of the people, for their ratification or rejection. This can be done too without that feverish excitement, that restless anxiety, that tumult and violence, that commotion and agitation, that invariably, unavoidably and necessarily attends the putting to hazard; the subversion and overthrow of the fundamental rules and principles that secure the citizens in the enjoyment of their inappreciable and inviolable rights and privileges, for the preservation of which civil governments are founded and instituted.

Does not experience teach us that this is right and proper—that it is safe, judicious, and wise—and that no evil can result from it? Then I beg of gentlemen to suffer their reason to operate; let them pass over those ghosts of emancipation which they appear so much to dread; let them discard these imaginary evils; let reason resume the throne; let them look at this matter in its true light; and if they will do this, I am persuaded they will at once come to the conclusion with me, that the mode of specific amendments is the very best that can be adopted.

There is also great economy in this plan. Many gentlemen of this body are rigid and strict economists. I trust I shall have the aid and co-operation of all such. Economy is a matter of great moment—and in a government of the people, like ours, entitled to due weight and consideration. It should have due regard and attention, both in private and public affairs. Without it in private affairs, estates the most magnificent, and fortunes the most princely, are soon dissipated and squandered, and utter ruin, bankruptcy, and distress, are brought upon individuals and families. Without it in public affairs, the highest prosperity and greatest happiness are soon lost, and insolvency, repudiation, and disgrace are fastened upon the state and government. This proposition will enable the people, whenever they desire it, to change, alter, or modify any portion of their fundamental law, without cost or expense. It is only necessary for the legislature to propose the amendment, and submit it to be voted upon by the people, at the general elections.

And, sir, I think the question of slavery, and the security of all other property, is guarded there in as ample a manner as any gentleman can desire. The proposition I make is one that I contend for before my constituents at home, and I believe it meets their approbation. But, sir, I am willing to compromise that matter, if you will only give us some way of reaching the evils which we may have incorporated in our constitution, without the trouble, expense, and agitation of a convention. Sir, we have launched out into an unknown sea.

We have adopted some features and principles in this constitution that are new and untried with the people of Kentucky. We know not how they will operate. Experience may point out the necessity of their change or modification. Yet no power is reserved to the people; no mode provided to make such changes—to secure such modifications, without the expense and excitement of another convention. The increase, growth, and business of the state, may require the addition of another circuit judge, and judicial district; it cannot be provided for, without a convention. Calamities or misfortune may render it necessary to borrow a few hundred thousand dollars. A convention must be called. The people may desire to change the mode of appointing the auditor, register, or any other officer of the government; a convention is the only means of securing it. They may desire to place some restriction on the taxing power of the general assembly. A convention is the only remedy. Will you, sir, deny to the people the power to make any—the slightest, the most unimportant change or modification of their fundamental law, without the expense of a convention? Certainly it would not be wise to adopt any such principle. If I could see any danger in the world that would be likely to arise from the adoption of the principle which I suggest, I would have much hesitation in coming forward with it; but when the experiment has been tried in every section of the Union, alike where slavery does not exist, and where it does exist; when it has been tried all over the Union, in the sunny south and in the frigid north; in every climate and where every kind of property and every kind of right exists; when it has thus been tried and approved by all. And not only have other states, in all times since the formation of our government approved of this plan; but the friends of a convention and constitutional reform in Kentucky, assembled in convention in this hall in 1847 and 1848 have recommended and approved this same principle. In their manifesto published to the world as containing the changes and amendments they desired to see engrafted on our old constitution, they unanimously say upon this subject, "By the ninth article of the present constitution, the whole instrument must be submitted, to make the most unimportant amendments. We think, rather than put the whole machinery and form of government to hazard for the purpose of correcting an isolated error, it would be better to submit a single proposition for amendment to the consideration, first of the legislature, and then of the people, under such restrictions as shall be deemed advisable and safe. Public opinion may then be consulted upon a single proposition without the danger of combinations on other subjects." Several members of this body, Mr. President, signed that manifesto, and under that banner the battle of reform was fought and won; and now we see the victors ready to abandon their own standard.

I ask if we ought now, in revising this constitution, to abandon it? Is it not cowardly? I hope the good sense of this body, notwithstanding the prejudice which has been created against this plan, will induce them to consider the proposition calmly and seriously; and that before we finally separate we shall have adopted some plan by which some portions of our constitution may be amended, when experience shall prove it to be necessary, without putting to hazard the whole instrument. Are not gentlemen fully aware that had we had such a provision in our old constitution, there would never have been the agitation in the state which we have recently witnessed? We should, sir, have had no excitement, no expense, no convention, and very probably a much better constitution than we will have when all our labors have terminated here.

If then, sound policy, common sense, and a proper regard for economy, require it—if reason supports and justifies it—if authority the most unquestionable favors it—if time and experience sanction and approve it, as the best, most economical, and safest mode of revising the constitution, why sir, will you hesitate to adopt it?

I felt it to be my duty, sir, to present this matter to the convention for its adoption; and I will only add, that if any other mode of specific amendment should be suggested, more in accordance with the views of a majority of the convention, and that will secure the rights of the people, I will, most cheerfully, accord it my support.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. President, I have no speech to make, but I have a resolution to offer when a fitting time shall present itself, to test the sense of this convention on the question involved in the article before us, on which, I presume the mind of every gentleman is made up. I will send my resolution to the secretary's desk that it may be read for information.

The secretary read it as follows:

Resolved, That this convention is opposed to any and all specific modes of amendment, and will not adopt any specific mode of amending the constitution."

The PRESIDENT said it was not now in order to offer the resolution.

Mr. BROWN moved to amend the original report, by inserting the words "except ministers of the gospel who shall be eligible," in the twenty second line. The object of the amendment was to render ministers of the gospel eligible to seats in any future convention that may be called to amend the constitution.

Mr. MERIWETHER said the words were omitted in his report by accident, and he intended to supply them.

Mr. CLARKE moved the postponement of the further consideration of this article, that he might take the sense of the convention on the resolution which he had caused to be read. He thought much time might be saved if this course were taken, as the sense of the convention would be indicated on a very important principle.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DESHA appealed to the convention to pass over the business before it, that the course suggested by the gentleman from Simpson might be tried.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, for that purpose, moved that the article under consideration be laid upon the table for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARKE then, by general consent, submitted his resolution.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE moved the previous question upon it, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. GRAY called for the yeas and nays, and they were, yeas 60, nays 29.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Aperson, John L. Ballinger, William K. Bowling, Wm. Bradley, Thos. D. Brown, William C. Bullett, Charles Chambers Jas. S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Henry R. D. Coleman, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Chas. teen T. Dunavan, Green Forrest, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, James W. Irwin, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, George W. Johnston, Chas. C. Kelly, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, George W. Mansfield, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, Wm. D. Mitchell, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Polard, William Preston, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, John T. Rogers, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, John D. Taylor, William K. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, Henry Washington, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe—60.

NAYS—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, William Chenaunt, Jesse Coffey, Benj. Copelin, Lucius Desha, Jas. Dudley, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Selucius Garfield, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Vincent S. Hay, M. E. Huston, W. Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, Martin P. Marshall, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Thomas Rockhold, Ira Root, Albert G. Talbott, John Wheeler, George W. William, Silas Woodson—29.

So the convention declared itself opposed to all specific modes of amendment.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. BROWN withdrew the amendment which he offered at the morning session, as it was now unnecessary.

Mr. GRAY also withdrew his amendment, the vote on Mr. CLARKE'S resolution having settled the principle which it contained.

The question was then taken on the substitute of the gentleman from Madison, and it was rejected.

Mr. THOMPSON. I beg to offer the following as a substitute for the report of the committee:

"When experience shall point out the necessity of amending this constitution, and when a majority of all the members elected to each house of the general assembly shall, within the first twenty days of their stated biennial session, concur in passing a law for taking the sense of the good people of this state, as to the necessity and expediency of calling a convention, it shall be the duty of the several sheriffs, and other returning officers, at the next general election which shall be held for representatives after the passage of such law, to open a poll in which the qualified electors of this state shall express, by vote, whether they are in favor of calling a convention or not; and said sheriffs and returning officers shall make return to the secretary, for the time being, of the names of all those electors voting at such election; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of the qualified electors of this state, voting at such election, have voted for calling a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next regular session, direct that a similar poll shall be opened and taken at the next election for representatives; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of all the electors of this state, voting at such election, have voted for calling a convention, the general assembly shall, at their next session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there shall be in the house of representatives, and no more, to be chosen in the same manner and proportion, at the same places, and at the same time that representatives are, by the electors qualified to vote for representatives, and to meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of re-adopting, amending, or changing this constitution. But if it shall appear by the vote of either year, as aforesaid, that a majority of all the qualified electors voting at such election, did not vote for a convention, a convention shall not be called."

I will briefly state the difference between this proposition and that of the committee. Under the old mode, all the qualified voters, according to the last enumeration, who did not vote—no matter whether they were in the state or out of it—would be counted as against a convention. For instance, if a man died or removed out of the state, his name still being on the roll, he would be counted as against a convention. This was the case in 1847, when many of our voters were in Mexico. My proposition is that you should only count the votes which are polled. This is the principle pursued throughout the country in other respects. In amending our constitution here, all our decisions are made by the actual vote; we do not count the votes of the absentees; and I well know that if you did, there are many sections that have passed, which would have been rejected, and many rejected which would have been carried. The law, sir, should go into effect by the vote which is cast. When we come to submit this constitution to the vote of the people, whose ratification or rejection is to be final as to all that is done here, I presume we will test that question by the vote polled, and that we will not permit these votes to be counted against the constitution, which have not been cast. This is the only difference between my proposition and that of the committee. I am opposed to specific amendments. There are, no doubt, many provisions in this constitution, which the people may wish to change. Under my proposition, they will have ample time to consider any proposed change; for from its first agitation till its final decision, will be a period of about four years. I think, therefore, that we ought to carry out the same principle which governs us in all other things.

Mr. MERIWETHER. This is a plain proposition, and the convention can easily decide it. The principle is not changed at all; and the committee adopted the old provision in the belief that it was the most just and equal in its operations. If it be the wish of this convention to let another convention be called, whenever those voting at the polls should go for it, they will adopt the gentleman's proposition; but if they deem it necessary that there should be a full expression of opinion, and that a majority of all the votes should be required, they will sustain the proposition of the committee. The gentleman mentioned the circumstance of the votes of absentees being counted against the convention; but he did not consider the votes of those who had attained their twenty-first year, and of those who had migrated into the state. I think, taking the two things together, the matter will stand about equal.

Mr. THOMPSON called for the yeas and nays on his proposition, and they were—yeas 9, nays 77.

YEAS—Milford Elliott, Thos. J. Gough, Wm. Hendrix, James M. Lackey, Elijah P. Nuttall, Ira Root, Wm. R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Silas Woodson—9.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, Wm. Bradley, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thos. D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, Wm. Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, Andrew Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, Johnson Price, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, John D. Taylor, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Chas. A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams—77.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the section reported by the committee, as modified.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. I move to amend by striking out the following words: "at the next regular session, direct that a similar poll shall be opened, and return made, for the next election for representatives; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of all the citizens of this state, entitled to vote for representatives, have voted for calling a convention, the general assembly shall."

I am in favor of retaining as much of the old constitution as possible, and averse to making any change, except such as are absolutely required upon principle; and if there had been no change made in the present constitution by the one we are about to propose to the people, I should not have moved for any change at all. I like the spirit of the present constitution, and also the spirit of the report of the committee. It is that the people in amending their constitution shall do it under calm reflection; and that it shall not be done under the influence of passion, or any sudden dissatisfaction with the instrument itself, at the time it shall be given to them for consideration. I should not have offered any amendment, if the carrying out of the plan proposed by the committee did not depend upon other parts of the constitution which have been made different. We have changed our time of holding elections. We now elect our representatives every second year instead of every year. If we adopt the report of the committee just as it is, it will require six years to call a convention. We have our elections but once in two years; the legislature will meet and direct whether there shall be a call for a convention or not. The election does not happen till two years afterwards; that will be four years before the action of the people will be known, and there will be a period of two years more before the legislature will meet to call a convention. I think this is rather too long. In my judgment, it is true, in a somewhat qualified sense, that the people have at all times the right to abolish their form of government; and I think that in a measure this right is taken away, by putting it out of their power, except after six years' delay. If it had been contemplated in the report of the committee, that those elections should have been held every year, as under the present constitution, I would not have been in favor of the people speaking but once upon the subject; but as it requires two years between each election,

I think it is attempting to fasten too decidedly upon the community the work of our hands, to say that however much they may be dissatisfied with it, however much it may militate against the prosperity of the people, and instead of being a shield to guard and protect their rights, takes away those rights which they have already enjoyed. I think under these circumstances, that we are fixing too long a period of probation in requiring six years before their will shall be carried into effect. I do hope that the mere statement of the fact will convince every gentleman here of the impropriety of keeping the people so long without an opportunity of amending our work.

Mr. GHOLSON. I should like to vote understandingly upon this question. If by the term "general election for representatives" it is meant to be confined to the time at which representatives to the legislature are to be elected, the gentleman's remarks would be true. If I understand the provision made by the convention on this subject, the election for judicial and other officers is to come off one year, and that of members of congress and the legislature another year. I should like, when a majority are to vote for any alteration of the constitution, that it should be done the next year, without the intervention of a year in which there is no election.

Mr. MERIWETHER. Instead of providing that the legislature shall act a second time, the general assembly shall direct that it shall be done at two successive elections. Strike out these words, if you please, which direct that the general assembly shall direct the alteration.

Mr. TURNER. Are we then to have the people consulted at one election when they vote for their representatives, and again at another election when they vote for their judicial officers, and thus have this matter agitated a thousand times? I for one, sir, have no wish to live under so unstable a form of government.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. I saw very well that the convention could have the matter so altered; but I understood that it was the desire of this convention to separate as far as possible from the judicial elections of the state all questions of an exciting political character; and as the proposition I have made appears to meet the case exactly, and cannot be objected to as forming an element of agitation in the civil elections of the state, I think it is better that it should be done. If the house is of a different opinion I must of course acquiesce. I am far from being anxious that anything that is done here should bear the impress of my hand; so that the object is attained, it is to me a matter of perfect indifference by whose instrumentality it is effected.

Mr. ROOT called for the yeas and nays on the motion to strike out, and they were yeas 5, nays 81.

YEAS—Vincent S. Hay, Alexander K. Marshall, Ira Root, Wm. R. Thompson, Silas Woodson—5.

NAYS—Mr. President (Guthrie), Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, Archibald Dixon, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfinkle, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Andrew Hood, Mark E. Huston, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, Wm. Johnson, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Martin P. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, Johnson Price, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, Jas. W. Stone, John D. Taylor, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, Henry Washington, Jno. Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams—81.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARLOW moved the previous question on the section. The main question was ordered to be now put, and the first section was adopted.

The question was next taken on the second section, and it was agreed to, and the entire report was adopted.

DEBATES AND JOURNALS.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE offered a resolution, which after receiving some modifications was adopted, as follows:

"Resolved, That one copy of the journal, and one copy of the debates of the convention be deposited in the county clerk's office of each county, to be kept as other public books are kept by the clerk, that one copy of each be presented to the delegates and officers and reporter of this convention, and to the ministers of the gospel in attendance on the convention, and that the remainder of the five hundred be deposited in the public library."

On the motion of Mr. GHOLSON the committee of the whole was discharged from the further consideration of the series of resolutions in relation to the quieting of land titles, &c., which he introduced at an early period of the session. The convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1849

Prayer by the Rev. STUART ROBINSON.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. ROBERT D. MAUPIN, delegate from the county of Barren, took his seat this day. The oath was administered to him by chief justice Marshall.

COMMITTEE OF REVISION.

On the motion of Mr. W. C. MARSHALL, Mr. TURNER was added to the committee to arrange and revise the several articles of the new constitution.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the committee on miscellaneous provisions, made the following report, and, on his motion, it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

SCHEDULE.

That no inconvenience may arise from the alterations and amendments made in the constitution of this commonwealth, and in order to carry the same into complete operation, it is hereby declared and ordained:

SEC. 1. That all the laws of this commonwealth, in force at the time of making the said alterations and amendments, and all rights, actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts, as well of individuals as of bodies corporate, shall continue as if the said alterations and amendments had not been made.

SEC. 2. The oaths of office herein directed to be taken may be administered by any judge or justice of the peace, until the legislature shall otherwise direct.

SEC. 3. No office shall be superceded by the alterations and amendments made in the constitution of this commonwealth, but the laws of the state relative to the duties of the several officers, executive, judicial, and military, shall remain in full force, though the same be contrary to said alterations and amendments, and the several duties shall be performed by the respective officers of the state, according to the existing laws, until the organization of the government, as provided for under this new constitution, and the entering into office of the new officers to be elected or appointed under said government, and no longer.

Sec. 4. Immediately after the adjournment of the convention, the governor shall issue his proclamation, directing the several sheriffs and other returning officers of the several counties of this state, authorized by law to hold elections for members of the general assembly, to open and hold a poll in every county of the state, and in the city of Louisville, at the places and precincts designated by law for the holding the presidential election in 1848, upon the first Monday of May, 1850, for the purpose of taking the sense of the good people of this state, in regard to the adoption or rejection of this constitution; and it shall be the duty of the said officers, to receive the votes of all persons entitled to vote for members of the general assembly under the present constitution. The said officers shall open a poll with two separate columns: "For the new Constitution," "Against the new Constitution," and shall address each voter presenting himself, the question: "Are you in favor of adopting the new constitution?" and if he shall answer in the affirmative, his vote shall be recorded in the column for the new constitution; and if he shall answer in the negative, his answer shall be set down in the column against the new constitution. The said election shall be conducted for one day, and in every other respect, as the state election for representatives to the general assembly are now conducted; and on the Thursday succeeding the said election, the various sheriffs conducting said election at the different precincts, shall assemble at the county seat of their respective counties, and compare the polls of said election, and shall forthwith make due returns thereof to the secretary of state, in conformity to the provisions of the existing laws upon the subject of elections of members of the general assembly. The county courts of the various counties of the commonwealth shall, at their March or April terms of their said courts, appoint two judges, a clerk, and deputy sheriff, to superintend and conduct said elections.

Sec. 5. Upon the receipt of the said returns, to-wit: on the first Monday in June, 1850, it shall be the duty of the governor, the secretary of State, the second auditor, and attorney general, in the presence of all such persons as may choose to attend, to compare the votes given at the said poll, for the ratification or rejection of this constitution; and if it shall appear from said returns that a majority of all the votes given are for ratifying and adopting this constitution, then it shall be the duty of the governor to make proclamation of that fact, and thenceforth this constitution shall be ordained and established as the constitution of the commonwealth of Kentucky. If it shall appear from said returns that a majority of all the votes given is for the rejection of the new constitution, then it shall be the duty of the governor to make proclamation of that fact, and, in that event, the present constitution shall be re-adopted as the constitution of the commonwealth of Kentucky. Whether the new constitution be accepted or rejected, it shall be the duty of the governor to cause to be published in the newspapers called the Commonwealth, and Yeoman, published in Frankfort, the results of the polls, showing the number of votes cast in each county, for and against the said constitution.

Sec. 6. Should the constitution be accepted by the people, it shall be the duty of the governor, as soon as the official vote is published, to issue his proclamation, declaring the legislature elected under the old constitution to be dissolved, and directing the several sheriffs of all the counties in this state to hold an election at the places designated by law, upon the of , 1850, for members of the general assembly. And the said election shall continue for one day, and shall be conducted, and the returns thereof made, in all other respects, in conformity with the existing laws upon the subject of state elections.

Sec. 7. It shall be the duty of the general assembly elected under this constitution, at its first session, to order and provide for an election to be held in every county of this state, on the day of for all state and county officers under this constitution, except those whose election have been already provided for and designated in this constitution.

Sec. 8. It shall be the duty of the general assembly elected under this constitution, at its first session, to make an apportionment of the representation of this state, upon the principle set forth in this constitution; and until the first apportionment shall be made as herein directed, the apportionment of senators and representatives among the several districts and counties in this state, shall remain as at present fixed by law.

Sec. 9. All recognizances heretofore taken, or which may be taken before the organization of the judicial department under this constitution, shall remain valid, and shall pass over to, and may be prosecuted in the name of the commonwealth. All criminal prosecutions and penal actions which have arisen, or may arise, before the re-organization of the judicial department under this constitution, and which shall then be depending, may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, in the name of the state.

Sec. 10. In the trial of any criminal case, the jury shall be judges of law and fact.

Sec. 11. The general assembly shall provide, by law, for the trial of any contested election of auditor, register, treasurer, attorney general, judges of circuit courts, and all other officers, not otherwise herein specified.

Sec. 12. The general assembly shall provide, by law, for the making of the returns by the proper officers, of the election of all officers to be elected under this constitution; and the governor shall issue commissions to the auditor, register, and treasurer, as soon as he has ascertained the result of the election of those officers respectively.

Sec. 13. That the sheriffs and other officers of the election shall be liable to all such fines and penalties for a failure to discharge the several duties imposed on them in this schedule, as are now imposed upon them by law, for a failure to perform their duty in conducting other general and state elections.

Sec. 14. Should the county court of any of the counties of this commonwealth fail or refuse to appoint judges, clerks, or sheriffs to superintend the election, as provided for in article four of this schedule, the high sheriff of said county shall appoint such clerks and deputy sheriffs.

SEC. 15. Should any of the sheriffs or deputies in any of the counties of this commonwealth, die, resign, or from any other cause be prevented from attending with the poll books, as directed in article four of this schedule, for the comparison of the votes on the adoption or rejection of the new constitution, it shall be the duty of the county court clerk, or his deputy in such county, to attend with said poll books, and aid in said comparison.

COURTS OF CONCILIATION.

Mr. IRWIN, from a select committee, made the following report:

"The general assembly may provide, by law, for the election in each civil or magistrate's jurisdiction in the several counties, cities, and towns of this state, two judges of conciliation for the amicable adjustment of all causes of dispute, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by law. The judges of conciliation shall have the same qualification as justices of the peace, and hold their offices for two years, and until their successors shall be elected and qualified. The first election of judges of conciliation shall be held on the second Monday in May, 1851, and every two years thereafter."

On motion, the consideration of the report was indefinitely postponed.

NATIVE AMERICANISM.

Mr. DAVIS offered the following resolution, and on his motion it was made the special order for three o'clock this day:

"Resolved, That the committee on the legislative department be instructed to report the following proviso to the eighth section of the report of that committee on the legislative department:

"Provided, That foreigners of the following descriptions and classes, only, shall be entitled to vote for any civil officer, or shall be eligible to any civil office, or place of trust or profit under the commonwealth of Kentucky: 1. Those who, at the time of the adoption of this amended constitution, shall be naturalized citizens of the United States. 2. Those who, at the time of the adoption of this amended constitution, shall have declared their purpose to become citizens of the United States, in conformity to the laws thereof, and who shall have become citizens. 3. Those who, twenty-one years previously thereto, shall have declared their purpose, according to the existing provisions of the laws of the United States, to become citizens thereof; and who then shall be citizens of the United States. 4. Minors, who shall have migrated with their parents, or parent, to the United States, twenty-one years after their names, ages, and a particular description of their persons, shall have been entered on the records of some court of record of the state of Kentucky, or some other of the United States: such foreigners, having also, in every case, the like qualifications of residence, and on all other points, that are required of native born citizens; and a properly authenticated copy of the record being in all cases required for the verification of the facts."

MODE OF REVISING THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BROWN moved a re-consideration of the vote adopting the first section in the article on the "mode of revising the constitution," for the purpose of offering the following amendment.

Strike out the words, "the general assembly shall, at their next regular session, direct that a similar poll shall be opened, and return made for the next election for representatives," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The governor shall direct that a similar poll shall be opened the succeeding year, and return made in same manner."

Mr. BROWN. Under the provision of this section, and with biennial sessions of the general assembly, provided for in this constitution, one year must necessarily intervene between taking the vote on calling a convention. My object in moving the re-consideration is, to provide by this amendment that the second vote of the people shall be taken the succeeding year; and this could be accomplished by authorising the governor, instead of the general assembly, to direct a similar poll to be opened the succeeding year for that purpose.

Mr. MERIWETHER suggested that they might dispense with the rule which requires a motion to re-consider to lie over one day, and dispose of this question at once.

Mr. BROWN moved to dispense with the rule.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARRARD moved to lay the motion to re-consider on the table.

Mr. BROWN asked for the yeas and nays thereon, and they were—yeas 54, nays 36.

NAYS—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, Charles Chambers, Jesse Coffey, Benjamin Cope-lin, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Milford Elliott, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, William Hendrix, Mark E. Huston, Thomas James, George W. Kavanaugh, James M. Lackey, Thos. W. Lisle, Alexander K. Marshall, William C. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, John H. McHenry, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, John W. Stevenson, Jas. W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G.

Talbot, Wm. R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, John L. Waller, Silas Woodson—36.
So the motion was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HARDIN, from the select committee of claims, made the following report:

Resolved by the Convention, That the following sums of money, not otherwise appropriated, be paid out of the public treasury, to the several persons named and entitled to the same, viz:

1. To the members of the convention, the same mileage and travelling expenses allowed to members of the general assembly.
 2. To the President of the convention, six dollars per day, during the present session.
 3. To each member of the convention, who qualified and took his seat in the convention, three dollars per day during the present session.
 4. To the Secretary of the convention, ten dollars per day during the present session.
 5. To the Assistant Secretary of the convention, seven dollars per day during the present session.
 6. To the Sergeant-at-Arms of the convention, four dollars per day during the present session.
 7. To the Doorkeeper of the convention, four dollars per day during the present session.
 8. To Selby Dixon Kuott, an assistant to the Sergeant-at-Arms, one dollar and fifty cents per day during the present session.
 9. To Culvin Sanders, jr., an assistant to the Sergeant-at-Arms, one dollar and fifty cents per day during the present session.
 10. To Geo. W. Gwin, as per voucher, marked A, four dollars and three cents.
 11. To William M. Todd, as per voucher, marked B, five dollars and fifteen cents.
 12. To Michael Barstow, as per voucher, marked C, sixty-five cents.
 13. To Joseph Taylor, as per voucher, marked D, nineteen dollars.
 14. To Doxon & Graham, as per voucher, marked E, twenty-three dollars and fifty cents.
 15. To Joseph Taylor & Co., as per voucher, marked F, four dollars.
 16. To William Tanner & Co., one hundred and twelve dollars and fifty cents, for one hundred and fifty copies of the weekly Yeoman, furnished the convention. (No. 1.)
 17. To A. G. Hodges & Co., three hundred and seventy-five dollars, for one hundred and fifty copies of the Daily Commonwealth, furnished the members of the convention. (No. 2.)
 18. To the Revs. Stuart Robinson, John N. Norton, James M. Lancaster, George W. Brush, and William Warder, twenty dollars each, for their services in opening the daily sessions of this convention with prayer.
 19. To Henry, a free man of color, for his attendance on the convention, one dollar per day during the present session.
 20. To Dennis, a free man of color, for his attendance on the convention, fifty cents per day during the present session.
 21. To Culvin Sanders, seventy cents, for expenses incurred in executing the summons of this convention on A. P. Cox.
- A brief conversation ensued, in relation to the power of the convention to adopt such a resolution, in which Mr. CHAMBERS, Mr. LISLE, and Mr. HAMILTON spoke in opposition to the appropriation of money by the convention. Mr. HARDIN defended the report.

The resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. HARDIN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee on claims be instructed to enquire into the expediency of providing for the payment of the expenses of the contested election from Henry county.

Mr. CHRISMAN moved to lay the resolution on the table, and on that motion he called for the yeas and nays, and being called, they were yeas 13, nays 75.

YEAS—Richard Apperson, John S. Barlow, Jas. S. Chrisman, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Lucius Desha, James P. Hamilton, Thomas James, Thomas W. Lisle, Nathan McClure, Jonathan Newcum, Michael L. Stoner, John Wheeler—13.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie) John L. Balinger, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Beverly L. Clarke, Benjamin Copekin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Archibald Dixon, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, James H. Garrard, Thos. J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, John D. Morris, Hugh Newell, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Albert G. Talbot, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, Andrew S. White, Chas. A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—75.

The resolution was then adopted.

ENGROSSMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

On the motion of Mr. APPERSON, the following resolution was agreed to:

Resolved, That two copies of the new constitution be prepared by the secretary, one on parchment and the other in a book to be prepared for that purpose.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention resumed the consideration of the unfinished section of the report of the committee on the legislative department, which provides for the apportionment of representation.

Mr. CLARKE, who had given notice of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the first branch of the sixth section, fixing the basis of representation had been adopted, consented, on consultation with friends, not to press the reconsideration.

The latter clause of the sixth section was the pending question, as follows:

"At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, and every eight years thereafter, provision shall be made by law, that in the year and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified voters of the state shall be made. The number of representatives shall, in the several years of making these enumerations, be so fixed, as not to be less than seventy five, nor more than one hundred; and they shall be apportioned for the eight years next following, thus: Counties, cities, and towns, having more than two thirds and less than the full ratio, shall have one representative; those having the full ratio, and a fraction less than two thirds over, shall have but one representative; those having the full ratio, and a fraction of more than two thirds over, shall have two representatives, and increase their number in the same proportion; counties having less than two thirds of the ratio, shall be joined to similar adjacent counties for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That if there be no such adjacent county, then such county having less than two thirds of the ratio, shall be united to that contiguous county having the smallest number of qualified voters; and the remaining representatives, if any, shall be allotted to those counties, cities, or towns having the largest unrepresented fractions."

Mr. BOYD had offered the following as a substitute for the latter clause of the sixth section of the legislative report:

"The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation as aforesaid, the state shall be districted into twelve districts.

FIRST DISTRICT. Fulton, Hickman, Graves, Ballard, McCracken, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston.

THIRD DISTRICT. Daviess, Ohio, Hancock, Grayson, Breckinridge, Hart, Larue, Hardin, Meade.

FOURTH DISTRICT. Todd, Mulenburg, Logan, Simpson, Allen, Warren, Butler, Edmonson.

FIFTH DISTRICT. Monroe, Barren, Cumberland, Clinton, Adair, Green, Taylor, Casey, Russell.

SIXTH DISTRICT. Jefferson, Bullitt, Nelson, Shelby, Spencer, Washington, Marion.

SEVENTH DISTRICT. Oldham, Trimble, Henry, Franklin, Owen, Carroll, Gallatin, Grant, Boone.

EIGHTH DISTRICT. Scott, Harrison, Pendleton, Kenton, Campbell, Nicholas, Mason, Bracken.

TENTH DISTRICT. Fayette, Woodford, Bourbon, Clarke, Jessamine, Anderson, Mercer, Boyle.

ELEVENTH DISTRICT. Madison, Garrard, Lincoln, Rockcastle, Laurel, Pulaski, Whitley, Wayne.

TWELFTH DISTRICT. Estill, Owsley, Clay, Perry, Letcher, Floyd, Breathitt, Johnson, Pike, Knox, Harlan.

"When a new county shall be formed of territory belonging to more than one district, that county shall be added to, and form a part of the district out of which the largest amount of territory was taken to form such new county.

"In the year and every year thereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified electors of the state shall be made in such manner as shall be directed by law.

"In the several years of making such enumeration, each district shall be entitled to representatives equal to the number of times the ratio is contained in the whole number of qualified electors in said districts: Provided, That the remaining representatives, after making such apportionment, shall be given to those districts having the largest unrepresented fractions.

"Representatives to which each district may be entitled shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, and towns of the district, as near as may be, in proportion to the number of qualified electors; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified electors to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjacent county or counties, within the district, may not have a residuum or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representation, it shall then be in the power of the legislature to join two or more together, for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining, and in the same district, which have residuums over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio, in that case, one representative shall be added to the county having the largest residuum."

Mr. WOODSON moved to substitute the following for the amendment of the gentleman from Trigg:

"At the first session of the General Assembly after the adoption of this constitution, provision shall be made by law, that in the year and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative population of the state shall be made. The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation, the state is hereby laid off into ten districts.

The first district shall be composed of the counties of Fulton, Hickman, Ballard, McCracken, Graves, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston, Crittenden, Union, Hopkins, Caldwell, and Trigg.

The second district shall be composed of the counties of Christian, Muhlenburg, Henderson, Daviess, Hancock, Ohio, Breckinridge, Meade, Grayson, Butler, and Edmonson.

The third district shall be composed of the counties of Todd, Logan, Simpson, Warren, Allen, Monroe, Barren, and Hart.

The fourth district shall be composed of the counties of Cumberland, Adair, Green, Taylor, Clinton, Russell, Wayne, Pulaski, Casey, Boyle, and Lincoln.

The fifth district shall be composed of the counties of Hardin, Larue, Bullitt, Spencer, Nelson, Washington, Marion, Mercer, and Anderson.

The sixth district shall be composed of the counties of Garrard, Madison, Estill, Owsley, Rockcastle, Laurel, Clay, Whitley, Knox, Harlan, Perry, Letcher, Pike, Floyd, and Johnson.

The seventh district shall be composed of the counties of Jefferson, Oldham, Trimble, Carroll, Henry, and Shelby, and the city of Louisville.

The eighth district shall be composed of the counties of Bourbon, Fayette, Scott, Owen, Franklin, Woodford, and Jessamine.

The ninth district shall be composed of the counties of Clarke, Montgomery, Bath, Fleming, Lewis, Greenup, Carter, Lawrence, Morgan, and Breathitt.

The tenth district shall be composed of the counties of Mason, Bracken, Nicholas, Harrison, Pendleton, Campbell, Grant, Kenton, Boone, and Gallatin.

"The number of representatives shall, at the several sessions of the General Assembly, next after the making of these enumerations, be apportioned among the ten several districts, proportioned according to the respective representative population of each; and the representatives shall be apportioned, as near as may be, among the counties, towns and cities in each district; and in making such apportionment the following rules shall govern, to-wit: Every county, town or city having the ratio shall have one representative; if double the ratio, two representatives, and so on. Next, the counties, towns, or cities having one or more representatives, and the largest representative population above the ratio, and counties, towns and cities having the largest representative population under the ratio, regard being always had to the greatest representative population, shall have one representative: Provided, That when a county may not have a sufficient number of representative population to entitle it to one representative, then such county may be joined to some adjacent county or counties to send one representative. When a new county shall be formed of territory belonging to more than one district, it shall form a part of that district having the least number of representative population."

Mr. WOODSON briefly explained the effect of his substitute, and a conversation ensued in which Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. M. P. MARSHALL, Mr. PROCTOR and Mr. APPERSON took part.

Mr. GARRARD offered the following proviso as an addition to the original section of the select committee, and it was agreed to:

"Provided, That whenever the operation of the foregoing rules will give more than one hundred members, the smallest counties of the two thirds class shall be attached to contiguous counties to send a member, so as to reduce the number to one hundred."

The yeas and nays were called for on the substitute of Mr. WOODSON, and were yeas 52 nays 42.

NAYS—John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, Beverly L. Clarke, Henry R. D. Coleman, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfiede, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, John Hargis Thomas James, Charles C. Kelly, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, John H. McHenry, John D. Morris, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Wesley J. Wright—42.

Mr. LACKEY moved to amend, by adding to the section the following:

"That representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of representative inhabitants therein. At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, and every four years thereafter, provision shall be made by law, that in the year _____, and every four years thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative inhabitants of the state shall be made. The number of representatives shall be one hundred, and apportioned among the several counties in the following manner: Counties having the ratio shall have one representative; those having three fourths of the ratio shall have one representative; those having the ratio, and a fraction less than one half the ratio over, shall have but one representative; those having the ratio, and a fraction of one half over, shall have two representatives; those having twice the ratio, shall have two representatives; those having twice the ratio, and a fraction of less than one half the ratio over, shall have but two representatives; those having twice the ratio, and a fraction of one half the ratio over, shall have three representatives; and so on. Counties having less than three fourths of the ratio, shall be joined to a similar adjacent county, for the purpose of forming a representative district: Provided, that if there be no such adjacent county, then the county having less than three fourths of the ratio, shall be united with that adjacent county having the smallest number of representative inhabitants, provided that their united numbers do not exceed the ratio, and a fraction of one half the ratio over; but if they do, the county having less than three fourths of the ratio shall have a separate representative. The remaining representatives, (if any,) shall be allotted to those counties having the largest unrepresented fractions; but in no case shall more than two counties be united for the purpose of forming a representative district; but if there shall ever be an excess of districts, they shall be reduced to the proper number, by taking from those counties having a separate representative, with the smallest number of representative inhabitants, their separate representation."

The yeas and nays were called for, and were—yeas 45, nays 49.

YEAS—William K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, William Cowper, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, John Hargis, Thomas J. Hood, Thos. James, William Johnson, Geo. W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, William D. Mitchell, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, James W. Stone, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson—45.

NAYS—Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, Thos. D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Wm. Hendrix, Andrew Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, George W. Johnston, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, John D. Morris, William Preston, John T. Rogers, James Rudd, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, Andrew S. White, Robert N. Wickliffe, Wesley J. Wright—49.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TURNER moved to amend, by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That no county having a less voting population, in any district, shall have a separate representative, when another county in that district, having a greater number of voting population, has no representative: And provided, That no county in any district, having a less voting population shall have two representatives, when another county in that district, having a greater number of voting population has but one representative."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. APPERSON moved to amend, by adding the following proviso:

"Provided further, That any county which has not the full ratio, when all the adjacent counties have the full ratio, may be added to an adjacent county having more than a full ratio, when the two may have two members, provided that two counties have a greater population than any one county in the district."

On this amendment, a conversation ensued between Mr. APPERSON, Mr. GRAY, Mr. MORRIS, Mr. TRIPLETT, and Mr. McHENRY. The delegates from Christian county opposed it, on the ground that it would operate unjustly to that county; and the other gentlemen defended it. Ultimately,

Mr. JAMES moved the previous question, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. GRAY called for the yeas and nays, and they were—yeas 19, nays 71.

YEAS—Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thos. D. Brown, James H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Andrew Hood, Mark E. Huston, George W. Kavanaugh, Thos. N. Lindsey, John H. McHenry, John T. Rogers, William R. Thompson, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Henry Washington—19.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John S. Barlow, Wm. K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, Wm. Bradley, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, Wm. Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Selucius Garfield, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Thomas J. Hood, James W. Irwin, Thomas James, Wm. Johnson, George W. Johnston, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thos. W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, Wm. C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thos. Rockhold, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, Squire Turner, J. L. Waller, Jno. Wheeler, Andrew S. White, R. N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson, W. J. Wright—71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DUNAVAN called for the yeas and nays on adopting the substitute of Mr. WOODSON for the original section, and they were—yeas 33, nays 60.

YEAS—John L. Ballinger, Wm. K. Bowling, Thos. D. Brown, Wm. C. Bullitt, Wm. Cowper, Lucius Desha, Thomas J. Gough, James P. Hamilton, William Hendrix, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, David Meriwether, Hugh Newell, William Preston, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, James Rudd, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, Howard Todd, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Silas Woodson—33.

Curd, Garrett Davis, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Alfred M. Jackson, Chas. C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, Wm. N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, John H. McHenry, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, Michael L. Stoner, Wm. R. Thompson, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Wesley J. Wright—60.

So the substitute was rejected.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the latter clause of the section, as amended.

Mr. DESHA called for the yeas and nays, and they were—yeas 43, nays 48.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, Luther Brawner, Thomas D. Brown, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Jas. H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Thomas J. Hood, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, William N. Marshall, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Jas. Rudd, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, William R. Thompson, Philip Triplett, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—43.

So the clause was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS then moved, as an additional section, the following, which was originally submitted by Mr. LACKEY:

"That representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of representative inhabitants therein. At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, and every four years thereafter, provision shall be made by law that in the year _____, and every four years thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative inhabitants of the state shall be made. The number of representatives shall be one hundred, and apportioned among the several counties in the following manner: Counties having the ratio shall have one representative; those having three fourths of the ratio shall have one representative; those having the ratio, and a fraction less than one half of the ratio over, shall have but one representative; those having the ratio, and a fraction of one half over, shall have two representatives; those having twice the ratio, shall have two representatives; those having twice the ratio, and a fraction of less than one half the ratio over, shall have but two representatives; those having twice the ratio, and a fraction of one half the ratio over, shall have three representatives; and so on. Counties having less than three fourths of the ratio, shall be joined to a similar adjacent county, for the purpose of forming a representative district: Provided, That if there be no such adjacent county, then the county having less than three fourths of the ratio, shall be united with that adjacent county having the smallest number of representative inhabitants, provided that their united numbers do not exceed the ratio, and a fraction of one half the ratio over; but if they do, the county having less than three fourths of the ratio shall have a separate representative. The remaining representatives, (if any,) shall be allotted to those counties having the largest unrepresented fractions; but in no case shall more than two counties be united for the purpose of forming a representative district; but if there shall ever be an excess of districts, they shall be reduced to the proper number, by taking from those counties having a separate representative, with the smallest number of representative inhabitants, their separate representation."

Pending this amendment, the convention took a recess.

EVENING SESSIONS.

CORRECTION.—The brief remarks of Mr. A. K. Marshall, delivered on Tuesday evening, December 11, as published in the volume of debates, page 920, do not correctly convey that gentleman's views. They should read as follows:

I am pretty well satisfied with the present constitution on the subject of slavery, but still I prefer the proposition I have offered. The present clause (which is proposed by the gentleman from Christian,) gives to the legislature the right to prevent the importation of slaves into this state, except by bona fide immigrants. I am opposed to this, and wish to except from legislative action, such as citizens of Kentucky may become possessed of by gift, inheritance, marriage, or devise. Again, sir, it will allow the subject of slavery to be agitated. It affords a legal constitutional mode of emancipation, and those who choose to press that dangerous question, are not agitators, but citizens, exercising a constitutional right. I desire to deny them any such right, under this constitution, and shall, therefore, oppose the proposition of the gentleman from Christian.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. JACKSON submitted to the convention a plan for the apportionment of representation, and on his motion it was ordered to be printed, and laid on the table:

"SEC. — In 1850, and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration shall be made of all the qualified voters of the state. The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and shall, at each enumeration, be apportioned among the several counties of the state in such manner that each county having the ratio of representation, shall have one representative, and each county having double the ratio shall have two, and so on. All qualified voters of the state, not included in such ratio, shall be regarded as residuums, and shall be apportioned among the counties in such manner, that the county having the largest residuum in the state, shall have attached to it adjoining residuums, until the ratio is obtained; then the county having the next highest residuum in the state, shall likewise receive adjoining residuums, until the ratio is obtained, and so on, until all residuums are consumed: Provided, That in thus adjusting the residuums among adjoining counties, the smallest residuums shall be taken first, and so on, in succession, until the ratio desired shall be completed; and the county from which, in this order the last number shall be taken, is still entitled to her residuums less by the necessary number so withdrawn."

NATIVE AMERICANISM.

The convention proceeded to the consideration of the resolutions offered this morning by Mr. DAVIS, which were then made the special order for this afternoon.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President: The resolution on this subject which I submitted to the convention at an early day of its session, has been so long suspended, as to have lost in a good degree its animation. The truth is, that I now feel somewhat awkward on this subject, and but for my avowal to debate it, so distinctly made about that time, I should not at this late day obtrude myself upon the time and patience of this body. But, omitting to discuss the subject, I should not be less a Native American, than if I were to attempt the most earnest and elaborate examination of it. However, I will proceed; and before I resume my seat, I will endeavor to revive the life and interest of my proposition.

Mr. President, in asking the attention of the convention and the country to this subject, it was no part of my purpose to win any notoriety, or any popular favor, general or party, or to endeavor to make it the means of reaching any office or distinction whatever. Were I possessed of youth and strength, it is possible I might have connected such vaulting hopes with it; but I feel an inexplicable consciousness that my years are to be so few, as to constrain me to take a view of things more personal and more sober, and to throw far from me such exciting aspirations.

Since my first examination of the matters involved in this momentous question, I have been a Native American; and during eight years of service in congress, I was pledged, and ever stood ready to vote for any extension of the time, which is required to entitle the naturalized foreigner to the right of suffrage. The reason why I did not move upon the subject myself was, my thorough conviction, during the whole period, that in congress I would do no good to the cause, immediate or prospective, by bringing it forward.

But, I was firmly resolved, if the time should ever come, and I should be thrown upon a theatre where the effort would seem more practical, and the auspices more favorable, I would ask the attention, not only of the people of Kentucky, but all my countrymen, to what I deem to be the greatest question of the day. I believe that time and that theatre are now here. I know that the number of foreigners in Kentucky is small, when compared with other states; but they are yet numerous and rapidly increasing, particularly on the line of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers; and there is wisdom in the old proverb: "an ounce of preventive is better than a pound of cure."

If we adopt such a provision in the constitution, its influence will not only pervade our whole state government and policy; it will have a small but direct influence upon congress, in the election of our representatives in that body; and it will operate with great moral power upon other states, especially when they go into convention for the alteration of their constitutions. Has not this state felt, and is not this body now acting under the power of similar examples? Who, five years ago, in Kentucky, was there to advocate the principle of the judges of courts being elected by popular vote; and if no state had yet adopted this system, who believes we would be now incorporating it in our constitution? Would it not be reasonable to conclude that the example of Kentucky, deciding and incorporating as a fundamental provision in her constitution, that her government belonged to, and should be administered by, her native born sons, and not by foreigners, would have a most powerful and salutary influence upon our sister states?

I presume, Mr. President, there can be no doubt upon the point of our competency and right to act upon this subject; and also of our duty to act upon it, if by so doing we can effect any essential good for the country. Congress has the power and has passed naturalization laws; and it has been assumed that it would infringe the rights of the foreigners, who have been naturalized in conformity to the provisions of those laws, for the states to prescribe any other or additional restrictions to their exercise of the right of suffrage in the state governments. It appears to me that this position is wholly fallacious and untenable. The states have the right to confer upon foreigners the elective franchise, and to make them eligible to all the offices of their governments before naturalization, and they have the undoubted power to exclude them, although they have become citizens of the United States; because such citizenship confers upon them only the rights of that government, conceded by the federal constitution, and not a single one under any state government. This power of the states, to withhold from naturalized citizens of the United States, the right to vote, has been often exercised, and is now in practical operation in many of them—indirectly in declaring the payment of taxes, being a housekeeper, owning a freehold, &c., &c., as qualifications. But in many states, and in Kentucky, the higher power is exercised of excluding the naturalized citizen from the more important right of eligibility to certain offices for long terms. A man must have been a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of this state also, "at least six years," to be eligible to the office of governor, lieutenant governor, or senator. The states are sovereign in forming and administering their own governments. They may deny to naturalized foreigners, wholly, the right of suffrage, and the privilege of holding office; or they may confer both class of rights fully, or with such restrictions, as to time and other circumstances, as they may wish.

They have often circumscribed and denied these rights to their own native born citizens, and it would be preposterous to assume they had not the same power over persons born in foreign countries, merely because they had been admitted to citizenship under the government of the United States. The point in debate is a question of expediency and policy only, and not of power; and as such, I freely admit, it should not be exercised without grave and sufficient reason, of which the people and the conventions of the states, alone, have the right to determine.

The proposition which I have submitted, deprives no man of any right which belongs to him, be it perfect or inchoate; for it concedes to all foreigners who now have the right of suffrage, or who have taken the first step towards naturalization, or who may hereafter be brought as minors to the United States, that right.—Have others any just claim to it? Europe has 280,000,000 of population. As relates to the government and people of the United States, all now have the right to come to our country, and millions upon millions of them will come. If all the male adult population of Europe have a vested and perfect right, on reaching our shores, to be admitted, after naturalization, under the laws of congress, to share all the political sovereignty, rights, and offices of all the states, each one of all the teeming millions across the Atlantic, now resident not only in Europe, but in Asia and Australasia, and all the isles of the sea, if not in Africa, have also the same right, it is true, imperfect and conditional, because any and all may come. In the universe, was ever before heard of so expansive and ramified a right, spreading over so many countless millions, not of the living only, but of their multitudinous posterity for all time, of all climes and countries, races and colors, languages, religions, and heathenisms, unless, indeed, the negro be excluded. The thing is absurdity itself. No foreigner has any right to any portion of the political sovereignty of a country in which he may choose to make his residence, except so far as it may be given to him by the people and government of that country; and then only to the extent, and upon the conditions which they may prescribe. Congress might rightfully repeal all laws for the naturalization of foreigners, and refuse to enact any others.

Having made these preliminary remarks, Mr.

President, I state the fact that Native Americanism is not a mushroom of yesterday. It dates back in the United States several generations; and has the weight of illustrious names to sanction it. To repel, in some degree, the imputations cast upon it, that it originated in small and factious motives, and among insignificant adventurers, I will read to the convention a few extracts. First, from a letter addressed to Gov. Morris, dated White Plains, July 24, 1778:

"Baron Steuben, I now find, is also wanting to quit his inspectorship, for a command in the line. This will be productive of much discontent. In a word, though I think the baron an excellent officer, I do most devoutly wish we had not a single foreigner amongst us except the Marquis de Lafayette, who acts upon very different principles from those which govern the rest."

From another, dated Philadelphia, Nov. 17, 1794, and addressed to John Adams, the elder:

"My opinion with respect to immigration is, except of useful mechanics, and some particular descriptions of men and professions, there is no need of encouragement."

A letter dated from his residence, Jan. 20, 1790, in reply to a letter applying for office, has this passage:

"It does not accord with the policy of this government, to bestow offices, civil, or military, upon foreigners, to the exclusion of our citizens."

These extracts are taken from letters written by the father of his country, George Washington; the first from amidst the conflicts of our war of independence; and the other whilst he was president; and in his life by Sparks, will not only they be found, but several others, with passages on the same subject, of equal distinctness and force.

I will read the sentiments of another on the subject of foreign immigration:

"Civil government, being the sole object of forming societies, its administration must be conducted by common consent. Every species of government has its specific principles. Ours are more peculiar than those of any other in the universe. It is a composition of the freest principles of the English constitution, with others derived from natural right, or natural reason. To these nothing can be more opposed than the maxims of absolute monarchies. Yet, from such, we are to expect the greatest number of immigrants. They will bring with them the principles of the governments they leave, imbibed in their early youth; or, if able to throw them off, it will be in exchange for an unbounded licentiousness, passing, as is usual, from one extreme to another. It would be a miracle were they to stop precisely at the point of temperate liberty. These principles, with their language, they will transmit to their children. In proportion to their numbers, they will share with us in the legislation. They will infuse into it their spirit, warp and bias its direction, and render it a heterogeneous, incoherent, distracted mass. I may appeal to experience during the present contest, for a verification of these conjectures. But, if they be not certain in event, are they not possible, are they not probable? Is it not safer to wait with patience twenty-seven years and three months longer for the attainment of any degree of population desired, or expected? May not our government be more homogeneous, more peaceable, more durable?"

Thus speaks Mr. Jefferson in his notes on Virginia. I presume that these two men of deathless names, had quite as much patriotism and wisdom as any clamorous advocate of the foreigner in this convention; and it might be safely assumed, that what they believed to be wise and wholesome, could not prove very pernicious. In the terrible throes of our revolutionary struggle, and when our young institutions were in their cradle, and the country contained a population hardly adequate to its protection against foreign and Indian aggression, these far-seeing sages deprecated and condemned a heavy foreign immigration; and Mr. Jefferson said with a thorough philosophical and practical knowledge of man, they would bring with them the maxims of despotism, or unbounded licentiousness, and produce "a heterogeneous, incoherent, distracted mass." If we wanted more numbers, he invoked us to await the slower, but so much more safe principle of natural increase, rather than hazard the great dangers with which foreign immigration was fraught.

But why am I opposed to the encouragement of foreign immigration into our country, and disposed to apply any proper checks to it? Why do I propose to suspend to the foreigner, for twenty one years after he shall have signified formally his intention to become a citizen of the United States, the right of suffrage, the birth-right of no man but one native born? It is because the mighty tides of immigration, each succeeding one increasing in volume, bring to us not only different languages, opinions, customs, and principles, but hostile races, religions, and interests, and the traditional prejudices of generations, with a large amount of the turbulence, disorganizing theories, pauperism, and demoralization of Europe, in her redundant population thrown upon us. This multimiform and dangerous evil exists and will continue, for "the cry is still they come." Large numbers in a short time, a few months or weeks, after getting into the country, and very many before they have remained the full time of probation, fall into the hands of demagogues and unscrupulous managers of elections, and by the commission of perjury and other crimes are made to usurp against law a portion of the political sovereignty of the country. They are ignorant of our institutions and the principles upon which they are founded; of the great interests of the country, and the questions of policy which divide our people; of the candidates for office, and their capacities, views, fitness and former course of life. Instead of being qualified to aid in the great and difficult business of upholding the most complicated structure of government that ever had existence, and of successfully administering it for the good and happiness of the people and its own perpetuation, they constitute an uninformed, unreasoning, and to a great extent immoral power, wielded almost universally by desperate and profligate men, who by this agency become enabled to carry into success their own bold, mercenary and pernicious purposes; and to defeat those which the wise and the good devise for the benefit of the country and the preservation of constitutional liberty. We cannot, with any safety, continue to admit with such lavish liberality those ever coming and ever increasing masses of immigrants into full political partnership, and share with them the sovereignty of government. We are taught this truth no less by nature and reason than by fact and experience. Let me give an illustration. There is no member of this body, and probably no man in Kentucky, who, if placed any where on the earth in a civilized community, but who could aid in upholding and advancing the civilization of that country. He would have a general knowledge of the modes of thought and feeling, of the manners and customs, of the wants and desires, and of the means of ministering to them, physically, morally, and intellectually, appertaining to civilized life. All this he has been learning every day of his life from his infancy. In these respects he would be qualified to perform his duty with the members of the new society of which he had become a member. But bring among us a son of the forest, a Wyandott or a Chippewa, and how would he get along in performing the same part in our society and civilization? He would be in a state of utter and savage isolation. The most of those European immigrants, having been born and having lived in the ignorance and degradation of despotisms, without mental or moral culture, with but a vague consciousness of human rights, and no knowledge whatever of the principles of popular constitutional government, their interference in the political administration of our affairs, even when honestly intended, would be about as successful as that of the Indian in the arts and business of civilized private life; and when misdirected, as it would generally be, by bad and designing men, could be productive only of mischief, and from their numbers, of mighty mischief. The system inevitably and in the end will fatally depreciate, degrade and demoralize the power which governs and rules our destinies.

I freely acknowledge, that among such masses of immigrants, there are men of noble intellect, of high cultivation, and of great moral worth—men every way adequate to the difficult task of free, popular, and constitutional government. But the number is lamentably small. There can be no contradistinction between them and the incompetent and vicious; and their admission would give no proper compensation, no adequate security against the latter, if they, too, were allowed to share political sovereignty. The country could be governed just as wisely and as well by the native born citizens alone, by which this baleful infusion would be wholly excluded.

I propose, Mr. President, before I close, to make a more particular application of these general views to the points of my proposition; and in the meantime, as having a general, but important and interesting bearing upon it, I will present some statements and tables of immigration and population, the most recent and the most authentic that I have been enabled to command from the limited sources of information within my reach. Though by no means full and entirely satisfactory, this examination has convinced me that the great body of the people, and indeed of intelligent men, have no information or belief, approximating the truth, of the fearful and growing numbers of immigrants, of their general destitution and pauperism, of their ignorance and demoralization, and of the vices and crimes of very many of them, and of the enormous frauds which, through them, are perpetrated upon the elective franchise. At least such was my situation, and to the mass of the American people, this whole subject seems to me to be a sealed book.

In 1790, the white population in the United States was 3,172,464. The rate of increase ascertained by the latest and most reliable calculations, upon the principle of compound increase, is about 2.39 per cent. by which the population would be doubled in somewhat more than 29 years. Make an estimate by this rule upon 29 years, and in 1840 there was a white population of 11,104,659. But the census returns show a white population of 14,189,218, in 1840; so that there were then in the United States upwards of four millions of persons, immigrants and their progeny. During the decennial period indicated by each of the named years following, I present the aggregate number of immigrants: 1800, 160,305—1810, 229,755—1820, 321,064—1830, 494,491—1840, 862,040.—Since 1840, the rate and aggregate of increase has been greatly beyond any prior period. These numbers here given, I presume are made up from the custom house returns: for the latter years, I have no doubt they are. I have been able to get the custom house returns for two years only since 1840; that of 1846 showing 158,648, and 1847 an increase on the former year of about 47 per cent. and an aggregate of 239,256. No returns are made by any ships under 20 tons burthen, and from some cause, none from the ports of New Jersey. It is well known that a great many vessels neglect to make any returns; and also that most of the immigrants who land at Halifax and Quebec, come through the British provinces into the United States. The great number of timber ships which sail annually from England to Quebec, afford large and cheap facility to the immigrants by that voyage, and great numbers annually come by it. It is estimated that one fourth of the immigrants to the United States, are either through the British provinces, or through our ports and not reported; and the actual white population reported upon each general return of the census, above the combined aggregate natural increase and custom house numbers, shows this estimate to be under the truth. I have however made some prospective estimates upon the supposition that 20 per cent. of the annual immigrants through all channels were not comprehended in the custom house returns. Upon these principles, I estimate the total white population of the United States in 1850 to be the rise of 21,000,000, of which upwards of 5,000,000 will be foreigners by birth, being about one fourth. Thirty years ago only one in forty of our population was estimated to be of foreign birth. In 1843 one in five, and this disproportion is rapidly decreasing. Take 158,648, the custom house returns in 1846, add 20 per cent. to it for immigrants not reported, and upon the product put 47 per cent., the actual rate of increase upon the custom house returns of those years from one to the other, and you will have 287,107 for the total of 1847, and for 1848, total 422,056; and by continuing the calculation for 1849, total 620,422, and 1850, total 912,020. This rate of increase may not continue, and the figures for the two last named years may be too large; otherwise they would authorise a larger estimate than 5,000,000 of foreigners in the country in the year 1850. But 620,422 immigrants for the year 1849, when the custom house returns shall be made out, and 20 per cent. added to their aggregate numbers will probably be shown not to be much above the mark. I have seen a statement that the immigrants from the port of Bremen, for the past year, exceeded 56,000; and of something like the same number from Liverpool, that four-fifths of them were Germans. The same rate of increase would bring immigrants to the country in 1851, 1,340,669—in 1852, 1,970,783—in 1853, 2,897,051—and 1854, 4,188,664. So that it becomes obvious that this rate of increase cannot continue through many years. Nevertheless the increase will be steady, great, and continuous—and I believe may be safely assumed at more than 1,000,000 yearly for the decennial period between 1850, and 1860. Upon this hypothesis I assume the total population of the United States in 1860, will be 36,606,178, of which, allowing for their decrease by death, about 14,000,000 will be foreigners by birth: and the slaves being then about 4,000,000 added to the foreigners will make nearly one half of the aggregate population of the United States. The census returns of 1870, will unquestionably exhibit the native white population to be less than the foreigners and the slaves united, a state of fact which must fill every patriotic and sober mind with grave reflection.

This view of the subject is powerfully corroborated by a glance at the state of things in Europe. The aggregate population of that continent, in 1807, was 183,000,000. Some years since it was reported to be 260,000,000, and now it is reasonably but little short of 283,000,000; showing an increase within a period of about forty years of 100,000,000. The area of Europe is but little more than that of the United States, and from its higher northern position, and greater proportion of sterile lands, has a less natural capability of sustaining population. All her western, southern, and middle states labor under one of the heaviest afflictions of nations—they have a redundant population. The German states have upwards of 70,000,000, and Ireland 8,000,000—all Germany being not larger than three of our largest states, and Ireland about the size of Kentucky. Daniel O'Connell, in 1843, reported 2,385,000 of the Irish people in a state of destitution. The annual increase of population in Germany and Ireland is, in the aggregate, near 2,000,000; and in all Europe it is near 7,000,000. Large masses of this people, in many countries, not only want the comforts of life, but its subsistence, its necessities, and are literally starving. England, many of the German powers, Switzerland and other governments, have put into operation extensive and well arranged systems of emigrating and transporting to America their excess of population, and particularly the refuse, the paupers, the demoralized and the criminal. Very many who come are stout and industrious, and go to labor steadily and thrifti-

ly. They send to their friends in the old country true and glowing accounts of ours, and with it the means which they have garnered here, to bring, too, those friends. Thus, immigration itself increases its means, and constantly adds to its swelling tides. Suppose some mighty convulsion of nature should loosen Europe, the smaller country, from her ocean deep foundations, and drift her to our coast, would we be ready to take her teeming myriads to our fraternal embrace, and give them equally our political sovereignty? If we did, in a few fleeting years, where would be the noble Anglo-American race, where their priceless heritage of liberty, where their free constitution, where the best and brightest hopes of men? All would have perished! It is true all Europe is not coming to the United States, but much, too much of it is; and a dangerous disproportion of the most ignorant and worst of it, without bringing us any territory for them—enough, if they go on increasing and to increase, and are to share with us our power, to bring about such a deplorable result. The question is, shall they come and take possession of our country and our government, and rule us, or will we, who have the right, rule them and ourselves? I go openly, manfully, and perseveringly for the latter rule, and if it cannot be successfully asserted in all the United States, I am for taking measures to maintain it in Kentucky, and while we can. Now is the time—preventive is easier than cure.

The governments of Europe know better than we do that they have a great excess of population. They feel more intensely its great and manifold evils, and for years they have been devising and applying correctives, which have all been mainly resolved into one—to drain off into America their surplus, and especially their destitute, demoralized, and vicious population. By doing so, they not only make more room and comfort for the residue, but they think—and with some truth—that they provide for their own security, and do something to avert explosions which might hurl kings from their thrones. After the allied sovereigns had conquered the mighty Corsican on the field of Waterloo, and had him safe on the rock of St. Helena, these crowned tyrants of Europe, impiously denominated the "holy alliance," had a breathing time; and they began to cast around themselves to devise means to attack, indirectly, slowly, and stealthily, our institutions and our principles of popular government, which they not unreasonably concluded had been the primary cause of the tremendous assaults which men, in their struggles to free themselves from the slavery of centuries, had made against their despotic thrones. Hear what the Duke of Richmond said on this subject:

"The following language of the Duke of Richmond, while Governor of the Canadas, and is reported by Mr. H. G. Gates, of Montreal, who was present when it was uttered.

"The Duke, a short time prior to his death, in speaking of the government of the United States, said: 'it was weak, inconsistent, and bad, and could not long exist.' 'It will be destroyed; it ought not, and will not be permitted to exist; for many and great are the evils that have originated from the existence of that government. The curse of the French revolution, and subsequent wars and commotions in Europe, are to be attributed to its example; and so long as it exists, no prince will be safe upon his throne; and the sovereigns of Europe are aware of it, and they have been determined upon its destruction, and have come to an understanding upon this subject, and have decided on the means to accomplish it; and they will eventually succeed by subversion rather than conquest.' "All the low and surplus population of the different nations of Europe will be carried into that country; it is and will be a receptacle for the bad and disaffected population of Europe, when they are not wanted for soldiers, or to supply the navies; and the European governments will favor such a course. This will create a surplus and a majority of low population, who are so very easily excited; and they will bring with them their principles, and in nine cases out of ten, adhere to their ancient and former governments, laws, manners, customs, and religion, and will transmit them to their posterity, and in many cases propagate them among the natives. These men will become citizens, and by the constitution and laws will be invested with the right of suffrage. The different grades of society will then be created by the elevation of a few, and by degrading many, and thus a heterogeneous population will be formed, speaking different languages, and of different religions and sentiments, and to make them act, think, and feel alike, in political affairs, will be like mixing oil and water; hence, discord, dissension, anarchy, and civil war will ensue, and some popular individual will assume the government, and restore order, and the sovereigns of Europe, the immigrants, and many of the natives will sustain him." "The Church of Rome has a design upon that country, and it will, in time, be the established religion, and will aid in the destruction of that republic." "I have conversed with many of the sovereigns and princes of Europe, and they have unanimously expressed these opinions relative to the government of the United States, and their determination to subvert it."

Schlegel was a learned historian, and professor of history in Vienna, and high in favor with the Emperor of Austria. At the close of one of his public lectures in that capital, against free governments, he declared: "The true nursery of all these destructive principles, the revolutionary school for France, and the rest of Europe, has been North America. Thence the evil has spread over many lands, either by natural contagion, or by arbitrary communication." About the same time, Francis, the Emperor of Austria, at the instigation of that arch minister of despotism, Metternich, and with the co-operation of the other allied sovereigns, established "the Leopold Foundation," the object of which was "to promote emigration, and the greater activity of the catholic missions to the United States." To send out the civil and religious despotism of Europe to supplant the principles which Schlegel denounced as destructive, and which made kings tremble upon their thrones. That same emperor proclaimed: "As long as I live, I will oppose a will of iron to the progress of liberal principles. The present generation is lost, but we must labor with zeal and earnestness to improve the spirit of that which is to come. It may require an hundred years; I am not unreasonable—I give you a whole age, but you must work without relaxation." You see those men know that popular institutions in this country are not to be put down by military operations, or by direct attacks; but they expect to achieve it by other modes; by sending forth in alliance the agents of civil and religious despotism, and only by such means in the course of ages; and they look to it patiently, as a distant but certain consummation.

The government of England had powerfully co-operated with the monarchs of the Continent in putting down Buonaparte; and but for the unconquerable fortitude and courage of those 'bull-dog Islanders,' the work had probably never been done. Her government then refused to co-operate in the schemes of absolutism which the allies were devising, and drew off from them. The long slumbering energies of Spain had been deeply stirred, by Napoleon driving Ferdinand VII from her throne, and placing in his stead his brother Louis. The chivalry and heroism of Spain revived in transient splendor, and the Castilian again buckling on his ancient armor, drove Soult and the legions of France from the Peninsula, and the miscreant tyrant, Ferdinand, regained his sceptre. The spirit of liberty having been re-awakened, it would not passively and at once fall to sleep again in the benumbing embrace of despotism. The regenerated Spaniards convoked a Cortes, and began the reconstruction of liberal institutions. Ferdinand resisted, and was the second time, by his own people, driven into exile. He called upon the holy alliance for succor, and they assigned the work of his restoration to Louis XVIII, whom they had so lately restored. The Duke of Angouleme entered Spain at the head of a strong and well appointed army—all resistance was put down, after obstinate and bloody combat—Ferdinand was brought back, and even the throbs of liberty stifled, from the Pyrenees to the ocean.

But Ferdinand had lost more than half his possessions by the revolutions and independence of Mexico and the South American possessions of Spain; and he invoked the allied sovereigns of Europe to re-conquer those countries for him too, and to bring them back under his galling yoke. They were ready to go to the bloody work, but at that momentous crisis, upon which hung for centuries the destiny of the world, England and the United States united in counsels, in policy and purpose, and declared to the allied powers and to mankind, that in such a war, such a crusade by them against the Spanish American Republics and their liberties, their cause would be madethe cause of them, the glorious mother and daughter. "The holy alliance" desisted from its diabolical and bloody scheme; and England and America stood gloriously before the world as the bulwarks of civil and religious freedom. Their noble interposition was not more generous and humane than it was wise and timely, because the fall of the liberties of the new republics would have been but the precursor of the exterminating war which the propaganda power of the civil and religious absolutism of Europe, were even then meditating upon the spiritual and political freedom of England and America—for though England had so much less than we, still she had a priceless amount, and the other nations of Europe comparatively none.

England is our glorious mother, and I look to her with much of affection, gratitude, and reverence. She has oppressed and wronged her daughter, but that account is long since settled, and I trust forever. We have inherited from her much of our best blood, our language, most of our science and literature, our religion, and many of the most valuable principles of human liberty. She commenced to rear her fabric of freedom, as it exists, in the reign of her John, at the beginning of the thirteenth century. She has, at distant intervals, added to the proportions and beauty of the edifice, and is still moving on according to her tenor towards its perfection. She has in this long train of time achieved much—she has still much to do, but in her own way and in God's good time, will she do it, I trust. But the other day, Hungary had been crushed by the combined arms of two iron despots, and the immortal Kossuth and his comrade exiles fled, conquered, but not subdued, from their enslaved country and an ignominious death, and found protection in the territory and from the power of the Moslem. And when these frozen hearted tyrants of the north demanded those noble men from the Ottoman Porte, that they might be offered up on the scaffold to appease a bloody Moloch, and the Turk refused this barbarian requisition of christian kings, though war was denounced against him; and England stood forth and made with him an alliance, offensive and defensive, to arrest greater barbarians than he in their aggression upon his rights and independence, and upon the rights of nations, of humanity and christian civilization, I could not read the story without my blood tingling in my veins. I thought of the lion-hearted Richard and Saladin—of their combats upon the field of death—of the union of their successors, and of the cause in which, and the powers against which, they were united; and my swelling heart could not withhold its tribute to England and Turkey. In such passages as those, what American does not proudly feel that England and America are kindred?

Mr. President, I have some documents and facts in addition, to show with what system many European states are throwing upon us their destitute and refuse population. I have not time to present them all, but I will a portion. In England, Ireland, Switzerland, Saxony, Bavaria, Swabia, Brunswick, Hanover, and other states, those operations are carried out upon a large scale.

In 1843, a society, composed of wealthy individuals of London and Dublin, was formed for the objects: "1st. To send into the western states of America the surplus population of Britain, Ireland, and the continent. 2d. To open a new market for British manufactures. 3d. To extend and to consolidate the Roman Catholic religion in the United States."

The accredited immigrant agent at Montreal, in a report bearing date 1843, says, "of 9,507 Irish paupers 8,625 came up the St. Lawrence along the borders of New York."

"The commissioners of the poor in England recommended that parliament pass an act authorizing the different parishes in England to raise money for the purpose of sending the most vicious and worthless of their parishioners, such as are irreclaimable, out of that country to America." So says Niles' Register. A few towns in England raised the sum of $11,820 to defray the expenses of three hundred and twenty paupers to this country.

In an official letter from our consul, F. List, from Leipzig, to the secretary of the treasury, he says: "A Mr. De Stain, formerly an officer in the service of the Duke of Saxe Gotha, has lately made propositions to the smaller German states of Saxony, for transporting their criminals to the port of Bremen, and embarking them from thence for the United States, at $75 per head, which offer has been accepted by several of them. The first transport of criminals, who, for the greater part, have been condemned to hard labor for life, (among them two notorious robbers, Pfiffer and Allbrecht,) will leave Gotha on the 16th of this month; and it is intended by and by, to empty all the work-houses and jails in this manner. There is little doubt that several other states will imitate the nefarious practice."

The mayor of Baltimore, in a letter to the President, said, "that fourteen criminals from Bremen had been landed there. They were shipped in irons which were not taken off till they were near Fort M'Henry." I could bring forward, Mr. President, a volume of evidence to the same effect. In corroboration of the general conclusions to which it leads all unprejudiced minds, the commissioners of the alms-house of the city of New York, in a report of 1843, say: "There are not more than one fourth of the immigrants who come to this country who possess the means to obtain a comfortable support for themselves and their families on their arrival here." Most of them, of course, are disposed to labor, and who, as soon as they can obtain employment, cease to be paupers. But many of them are unable, and more still of them indisposed, and who never will work. But this source of pauperism is a constant and ever increasing stream. Of one thousand two hundred persons admitted in the year 1843, into the hospital, two hundred and six only were native born Americans; and of three thousand three hundred and thirty two persons in Bridewell, the alms-house, and the penitentiary, two thousand and forty five were foreigners. The disbursements of the city in support of the alms-house amounted, for the current year, to $250,068. The number of paupers in the United States in 1830, was calculated to be one hundred and three thousand one hundred and seventy eight, and the number of foreign immigrants for that year was only thirty thousand two hundred and twenty four by the custom house returns; but add twenty per cent, for those not reported, and it will make thirty six thousand two hundred and sixty six. As American pauperism is the numerous spawn of foreign immigration, many of the immigrants of former years were paupers in 1830; and as the total number in the United States for that year, was one hundred and three thousand one hundred and seventy eight, how much must it have been, and be now increased when immigration has increased ten fold. The gentleman from Jefferson, (Mr. Meriwether,) told us in a speech a few days since, which seemed to be very carefully prepared, that the paupers in Boston at the present time, exceeded twenty eight thousand. Neither Massachusetts nor Boston give the great Lazar houses of American pauperism. The people of the old Bay State all work and are generally thrifty; and Boston, or any of her harbors, are not the great highways of immigration. Its great streams are through New York, New Orleans, and Quebec, and from those ports, the foreigners seek other localities than Massachusetts. The present permanent average number of foreign paupers in the United States, must exceed two hundred and fifty thousand; and according to the rate of cost of the paupers of Massachusetts, as stated by the gentleman from Jefferson, they must produce a charge of upwards of $5,000,000. The amount paid towards them by private charity, in all its forms, is large, and the grand total not less, but much more than $6,000,000. What a tax this matter brings upon our people, and how our own native born are often deprived of their birth right, the charity of their own country, by the enormous demand upon it by aliens, I have seen the reports of some years ago, from the principal cities of the United States; and the proportion between the native and foreign classes of paupers were about the same exhibited by the reports from the city of New York, and showed that swarms of foreigners crowded out from the hospitals, and other eleemosynary institutions, those who had the first right to be there, Americans by birth—men who, or whose ancestors, took possession of this land when it was a howling wilderness, reared in it cities and towns and temples dedicated to the worship of the living God—opened and cultivated its teeming fields, fought for and established its liberties, upheld its institutions in our days of weakness, trial and peril—all of which is, now that we are strong and rich, coveted and almost claimed by the stranger. The whole of this fair heritage belongs first and peculiarly to the native, and it his right to claim, and the duty of the government to protect it, to keep him in its peaceful, secure, and permanent enjoyment; and, so far as it may be necessary to those ends, to ward off the foreigner. It is his duty to share it with the poor and the down-trodden of other lands, only to the extent its safety and his proper enjoyment of it will allow.

I have in my possession, Mr. President, numerous official reports, some made to both houses of Congress, and others under the authorities of some of the Atlantic cities, all going to show extensive and flagitious invasion of the elective franchise by these foreigners; and the abuses to which it is subjected by unprincipled men through, often, their unwitting agency—for vast numbers of them are made the dupes and tools of more designing and worse men than themselves. Before every general election, thousands of them, but just arrived in the country are purchased by party managers and brought up to conniving courts, and by the false oaths of themselves and others, are spuriously naturalized in violation of law. This nefarious work is largely done before every election in the principal cities; and great numbers are made to vote without even a formal naturalization, upon perjury alone. By these, and similar frauds, general elections have been carried in New York, Pennsylvania, and Louisiana; and the voice of the citizens of those states, the constitutional sovereign power, is iniquitously superseded, and a spurious and corrupt power introduced in its stead to give law and destiny to this great country.

But, Mr. President, I will pass on to another view of this subject—one peculiarly delicate to touch upon—of deep interest to all our people, and probably connected with greater and more fatal consequences in the remote future than any one, or even all which I have presented.

I have heard it said by a member of this body, a gentleman of great experience and extensive information, that eight ninths of the foreign immigrants are Roman Catholics. We all know that they greatly preponderate, and I suppose that to take three fourths of them to be of that persuasion, would be quite within the limits of the truth. When I speak of Roman Catholics, I mean as well those raised in that faith as those who profess it.

The latest tables of the numbers of christians in the United States, by denominations, which have come to my knowledge, state the total to be 4,334,972, and that of these 1,231,300 are Roman Catholics, being more than one fourth of the aggregate—all of all denominations being told. I do not know, and have no means to form an opinion to be relied upon, what portion of the Romanists are native, and what foreigners by birth; but I would conjecture the latter class to be much the stronger in numbers. Over the subject of the religion of the Catholics, or of any other persuasion, as a rule of moral conduct in private life, as a matter of faith and a means of man's salvation, I, as a member of the convention, have no cognizance, nor do I presume to attempt to exercise any whatever. But so far as that, or any other sect or religionists, in the principles of its religious doctrines, or in their practice, in the present or to be in the future, does actively or supinely—so far as the general opinion of the people of this country, and all other circumstances may render prudent and practicable, or to any extent whatever, claim for the particular sect temporal power, or attempt to exercise it, or to mix itself up with the politics of the country to get possession of the governmental authority and control it, directly or indirectly, with a view to the acquisition of power and rule generally, or to promote any particular church views, to that extent and within that scope, I, as a member of this convention, have a proper and legitimate jurisdiction over it. It would be within the power and duty of this convention, by proper provisions, to exclude as far as practicable, such pernicious matters from our political system—as much so as to keep out of it any other mischievous and dangerous principle or power. Suppose, in a word, that the Pope of Rome was asserting himself to be the viceroy of God, and infallible; that all power on earth, spiritual and temporal, was given to him by divine appointment; that all countries and governments belonged to him, and were either subject to his will and command, or in a state of criminal rebellion; that all authority in church or state which did not profess to be under him, and to act in strict conformity to his commands was unlawful and wicked; that all religious opinions different from the dogmas of the Roman Church were heretical, and those who professed them heretics, with whom no faith was to be kept, whether plighted by contract or by oath; that it was the highest duty of Roman Catholics to God, to extirpate this heresy and these heretics by sword, fire and faggot; and by the same means to bring the political authorities to submit to the Pope in all things, and every human being to profess, and conform to the Romish faith; and to these ends they intended to devote their time, their labors, all their energies and powers, and even expend their lives, which would be glorious and happy martyrdom. Would not the convention have the right to withhold from foreigners coming to our country, whom the preceding picture would truly characterize, any power and agency in our government? There have been such Romanists, who, aided by despotic monarchs and their armed myrmidons, have, to a great extent, given effect to such monstrous doctrines and purposes, and desolated large portions of the earth with fire and sword. And what has been, however terrible, may be again!

Many years since, I heard, traditionally, as a saying of a French philosopher, "man says God made him after his own image: the truth is, man makes God after his image." This savors of impiety, but nevertheless embodies a good deal of truth. Man is very apt to assign some of his own properties to his God, or to give to his attributes a character and hue conforming to his own particular moral nature and conformation. I have known Roman Catholics resident of Maryland, of Louisiana, and of our state, excellent people—so far as I could judge the heart of man, as good as any whatever. I have had the happiness to make the acquaintance of several gentlemen, members of this body, who, I am informed, are of that faith; and none here have a larger share of my esteem and confidence. My belief is, I know no better men any where—none more fit to assume the responsibilities of self-government, or to discharge the duties of good citizens, both public and private. These men, and all Catholics born and educated in this country of light and liberty, are, and were, by me, intended to remain far from the operation of any principle which I have submitted to the convention; because our country and its institutions were as much their birth-right as mine, and they, as well qualified to take charge of both as myself, or any others. But not so the foreigner. The Romanism of Europe, and of its followers there, who come here, is a very different religion in the formation of character and in practical life, from that to which native Catholics are born, and in which they are trained, so far as I understand the matter. The Romanism of Europe, from my reading, is, in its constitution and principles, its essence, spirit, policy and administration, past and present, throughout its whole duration, a great, all-ambitious, all-grasping religious politico institution, claiming the whole earth's sceptre, spiritual and temporal, and waging perpetual war in different forms according to difference of circumstances, to break all others. It is a hierarchy, and the Pope a hierarchy, a spiritual and temporal despot. Such is my understanding of the religion which the Catholic immigrant brings with him to our land, cherishes here as his life's blood, and endeavors, perseveringly, to propagate among our people; and to this religion, so far as it is political, and its object temporal power, I avow utter hostility. I will attempt now to establish, by creditable proofs, all the points which I have stated as being parts of it. But men, who have seceded from it, inform us, that all books and documents which purport to reveal its hidden principles and its true interior nature and spirit, are sought to be discredited by its followers and defenders, pronouncing them to be false. So says Giustianiani, formerly a Roman priest, now a minister in the Lutheran church, and many others.

The title and assumptions of the Pope are thus set out by one of them, Martin V, in his despatches to his minister at Constantinople: "The most holy and most happy, who is the arbiter of Heaven, and the Lord of the earth, the successor of St. Peter, the anointed of the Lord, the master of the universe, the father of kings, the light of the world," &c. Most of the Popes have not set forth their style so pompously, but all have claimed to be the Lord of the earth, the vicegerent of God, to whom all power is given, to be holy and infallible; and to whom all authority, spiritual and temporal, is absolutely subject. That they have the right to depose kings, and give their kingdoms to whom they will; to put down all governments, and all authority, political or religious, which does not submit to them; to condemn as heretical, all religions, doctrines and faith that may be opposed to, or inconsistent with theirs, and to extirpate, as heretics, those who profess them; to release every person from all faith with heretics and all obedience to any other authority; to grant absolution for sins; and they and their priests to pray souls out of purgatory. Such are the leading features of Romanism, and none of its councils, or infallible pontiffs have denied or attempted to reform any of them, as it was for centuries propounded to the world, and it has in innumerable instances been enacted with the concurrence of the christendom of western Europe in all these terrible forms with resistless power. This is no exaggerated statement of the claims of Romanism and its head, however startling and incredible it may be to most persons in this country. During the period between the first and the seventh century, there were five bishops, whose dioceses were of so much power, wealth, or dignity, as to have prompted them to assume the title of patriarchs, and these were the bishops of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Jerusalem, and Constantinople; which claim and title come gradually to be acquiesced in, and at length to be universally accorded to them. These patriarchs were entirely independent of each other, and often had conflicting claims and warm disputes. An obscure council held at Sardis in 347, conferred on the Bishop of Rome a limited authority to direct a re-hearing of the case of a provincial bishop; and in 372, the emperor Valentinian enacted a decree empowering the bishop of Rome to examine and judge other bishops. But no supremacy was conceded to him by the emperor, or by the other patriarchs, or by the provincial bishops generally, until near 150 years afterwards; and prior to that time, John, bishop of Constantinople, in a council held in 588, had assumed the title of universal bishop. Gregory, called the Great, was then bishop of Rome, and he opposed, with signal ability and vehement spirit, this usurpation of him of Constantinople, and denounced his title of "universal bishop," as "vain," "execrable," "anti-christian," "infernal," and "diabolical." Mauritius was emperor, but Phocas, an obscure officer in his army, seduced the soldiery and marched upon Constantinople to dethrone him. Mauritius fled, Phocas entered the capitol, and the emperor having been brought back, he and six sons were put to death by the usurper, who had already seized upon the purple. The wife of Mauritius and his three daughters had fled to a sanctuary, to which Phocas despatched ruffian soldiers to drag them hence and murder them. John interposed his spiritual authority, and successfully resisted these forcible attempts against the empress and her daughters; but the new emperor at length decoyed the women away by sacred pledges, which he basely violated, and they were inhumanly murdered. Boniface was then third bishop of Rome of that name, and he, with promptitude and alacrity, acknowledged the new emperor, and earnestly besought him for the title and dignity of universal bishop. Phocas, piqued with John for having protected the wife and daughters of Mauritius, granted the title to Boniface and his successors, ordered John to discontinue it, and declared the church of Rome to be head over all other churches. This was the origin of popery, which was established by the arbitrary decree of one temporal despot who had just murdered another, upon the solicitation of a supple and ambitious prelate; and it was done to depress another, because he had recognized the claims of humanity against the demands of a cruel tyrant. The character of this beginning of popery is strongly illustrated in all its subsequent history.

This newly acquired power of the Bishop of Rome, now Pope, was resisted by many of the provincial Bishops and some of the succeeding Emperors for several ages; but by the policy of favoring the projects of the Emperors, and bringing their church authority to sustain them, they at length were fully established in their spiritual supremacy. They then began to cast around them for opportunities to attain the same eminence in temporal affairs; and it was not very long before their steady ambition, great talents, and untiring exertions were attended with encouraging success. About the year 760, Gregory II required the bishops and legates to take a solemn oath of allegiance to him, the Pope, in which the adjutant solemnly acknowledged him as the successor of St. Peter—promised by the Holy Trinity "to maintain to the last the purity and unity the holy Catholic faith; to consent to nothing contrary to either; to consult in all things the interest of your church, and in all things to concur with you, to whom power has been given of binding and loosing;" and after acknowledging the Pope to be his Lord, concludes with an emphatic imprecation of a terrible punishment to be visited upon his faithlessness. In the beginning of the eighth century began the debasing custom of kissing the Pope's foot; it was submitted to by the Emperor Justinian in 710, and has been continued to the present day. This was the darkest period of the dark ages.

But, before this time, Pope Theodore, who succeeded John in 642, had condemned as heretical the Monothalite doctrine, and excommunicated Pyrrhus, patriarch of Constantinople for embracing and upholding it. Paul having succeeded Pyrrhus, and not abandoning the new doctrine, was formally excommunicated by Pope Theodore, and deposed from all his ecclesiastical powers and dignity, by the authority of St. Peter. But Paul having died, Pyrrhus, who survived him, was reinstated by the Emperor to his former dignity, and his authority again acknowledged by the Bishops and people of the eastern empire. Theodore died in 649, and was succeeded by Pope Martin, who speedily assembled a council at Rome, and condemned not only the Monothalite doctrine, but also "the most wicked type, lately published against the catholic church, by the most serene Emperor, Constantine, at the instigation of Paul, the pretended Bishop of Constantinople." This was the first open attack of the Pope upon the supreme political authority of any country; and it was at once put down, for the time, by the degradation of Martin from the papacy, and his banishment to a distant country; in which exile he died. His fate rendered more moderate and prudent his two immediate successors. In 680, the Emperor, by advice of Agatho, the Roman Pontiff, convened another general council, which proceeded to excommunicate the Monothalite doctrine of one will of Christ, and its approval by Pope Honorius, so long before as 638; and by the decree of this council, it was condemned as heretical, and Honorius as a heretic; and both were anathematized.

For the period of near one hundred years previous to the coronation of Charlemagne in 800, the western empire had been administered nominally by the authority of the emperors, who for some centuries had resided at Constantinople; but sustained by an ignorant and superstitious multitude, the real power was vested in and exercised by the Popes. In 734, the emperor sent a military expedition to reduce the Pope and the refractory Romans to submission; but the most of his ships being lost in a storm at sea, the expedition was abandoned. The western possessions of the empire had been formed into an Exarchy, after the repeated capture of Rome by the Goths, the viceroy, or exarch residing at Ravenna; and from the failure of the attempt of the emperor to reduce the Pope, Rome had more formally but not yet fully, become subject to his authority. In 740, Luitprand, king of the Lombards, invaded and laid waste the territories of Rome; and in this need Pope Gregory III. applied to the renowned Charles Martel for succor. The appeal was first made to his piety to come to the rescue of the successor of St. Peter, but being disregarded in that form, the wily priest then addressed his ambition and his thirst for dominion, proposing to renounce for himself and the Romans, all allegiance to the emperor, to take him as their protector, under the title of consul, upon his undertaking to defend the Pope and the church. Those overtures were acceded to by the iron warrior; but before they could be carried out, he, the emperor, and the Pope, all, in the course of this year, 741, sunk into the grave. Childeric III, a man of feeble mind, was at the time, king of France, and Charles Martel, under the name of Mayor of the palace, had been his prime minister, and in truth exercised all his power. Pepin, the son of Charles, succeeded to the dignity and power of his father; and soon formed the design of seizing upon the throne of the degenerate monarch. He submitted the question, as a case of conscience, to Zachary, who was then Pope, "who best deserved to be called king, he who was possessed of the title without the power, or he who possessed the power without the title." Exposed on the one hand to the emperor's claim of supremacy, and his indignant hostility for its rejection; and on the other to the warlike incursions of the Lombards, the question had no difficulty in the mind of Zachary; and he promptly decided that he who had the power was entitled to the name of king. The clear and irresistible argument, which brought the mind of the worldly-minded and ambitious prelate to this conclusion, was his consciousness that he could not maintain his own vast pretensions against his assailants; and that this man of power could and would, because they could mutually serve each other. Pepin at once toppled Childeric from his throne, and was immediately crowned and anointed king by Boniface, the Pope's legate, and two years afterwards, Pope Stephen, the successor of Zachary, having journeyed to France to obtain aid against the Lombards, performed again in greater pomp the ceremony of the coronation of Pepin, to render still more sacred and imposing his title to the crown. The king and his court went three miles out to meet the Pope, and lavished upon him the most extravagant honors, Pepin alighting from his horse and attending him on foot a part of the way, and performing the office of his groom or equerry. In 753, Aistulphus, king of the Lombards, invaded the Exarchate, laid siege to and took its capitol, the city of Ravenna, and consummated the conquest of all the remaining possessions of the empire in the west. Flushed by his successes, the conquering Lombard despatched heralds to the Pope, demanding the submission of Rome and all her dependencies—asserting that they had belonged to the emperor, and were his by the right of conquest. In this extremity, Stephen applied first, but unavailingly, to the emperor; and then revisited France to see in person, Pepin, for his protection. The French king sent a powerful army to accompany him across the Alps into Italy, and to beat back from the eternal city its warlike invaders. The wily Pope, in the midst of the honors showered upon him by the court of Pepin, had the address to obtain from him a promise that the cities and country which might be conquered from Aistulphus, should not be restored to the emperor; but should be freely possessed by St. Peter and his successors. The invincible arms of Pepin scattered the power of the Lombards, and he sat down in siege before their metropolis, Pavia. Aistulphus was forced to sign a treaty, which bound him to deliver up to the Pope the Exarchate, "with all the cities, castles and territories thereunto belonging; to be forever held and possessed by the most holy Pope Stephen and his successors in the apostolic see of St. Peter." After hesitation and further resistance, the Lombard was forced by the restless Pepin, to execute this treaty literally, and the Pope was put in possession of all that it ceded to him as the successor of St. Peter; and thus to his spiritual, he united a temporal crown. The first was acquired through the instrumentality of Phoceus, the second of Pepin; and both by an unchristian and wicked combination with usurpers and men of blood.

This was the midnight of the world, and the little learning of Western Europe was confined almost wholly to the Monks; its people besides, with inconsiderable exceptions, were sunk in seemingly hopeless ignorance and superstition. The Popes, the monks, and all orders of its clergy, made available every opportunity to enlarge its territory and its spiritual and temporal authority; and the papacy went on steadily increasing in wealth, influence and power to the accession of Gregory VII, in 1073, when it reached its culminating point. For centuries, yet it receded not, but continued to perfect and consolidate its vast powers. It spread over Europe, and in every country exhibited itself with a grandeur which dazzled the imagination, and a strength against which no power could stand. It exercised a direct and absolute cognizance in all matters of church and religion, and one paramount and discretionary over all temporal governments, and claimed both to be of divine authority and infallible. Kings upon their thrones trembled under the frowns of its displeasure, and the world of mankind sunk in despair under its terrible excommunications. Gregory II excommunicated Leo the Isaurian Emperor; Gregory VII denounced a sentence of deposition against Henry IV, one of the most puissant of the German Cæsars; and forced the proud monarch to perform a pilgrimage across the appennines and to await bare-footed in his anti-chamber at Rome for three days before he would deign to notice the penitent. Celestine III excommunicated Henry VI, Emperor of Germany, Leopold, Duke of Austria, and Alphonso X, King of Galicia and Leon. Leo III, thundered an excommunication against Philip Augustus, King of France, because he hesitated to execute the command of that Pope, that he should take back his wife, whom he had divorced. Two successive Popes excommunicated Henry II, the ablest and one of the best of the German Emperors, because he would not submit himself and his power to them, and to enforce their decrees, they arrayed against him other monarchs in long and desolating wars. Boniface VIII pronounced a decree depriving Philip the Fair, King of France, of his kingdom; as Julius II did Louis XII. Henry II, one of the ablest men that ever sat upon England's throne, was constrained by the power of Pope Alexander to be scourged with rods upon Becket's tomb. Paul III and Pius V, respectively, thundered bulls of excommunication and deprivation of crown and kingdom against Henry VIII, and Elizabeth of England; but the reformation had dawned upon that proud island, and her disenthralled monarchs threw back their contempt upon the arrogant pretensions of the successors of St. Peter. But these imperial pontiffs invoked the Catholic Philip II, of Spain, to their subjection, and England and the reformation successfully withstood the shock of the Grand Armada. Urban II, interdicted bishops and priests from promising allegiance to kings and princes. Martin V awed the Emperor Sigismund into a violation of his safe conduct to Huss, on the argument that faith is not to be kept with heretics; and against the violated word of that sovereign, and with his extorted consent, had the great reformer burned as a heretic by the order of the council of Constance. In the beginning of the thirteenth century, Pope Innocent III, compelled John, King of England, to surrender to him his crown, and then to receive it back, as the vassal of him and his successors. The same Pope had, by his power, given the empire to Philip, Duke of Brunswick; he constrained the emperor, set up by him, to take an oath in this form: "I promise to honor and obey Pope Innocent as my predecessors have honored and obeyed him." "Appeals to Rome shall be made freely, and freely pursued." "I promise to extirpate all heresies, and to restore to the Roman church all her possessions," &c.

In 1204, Peter II, of Arragon, traveled to Rome and received his crown from the Pope, and on being crowned, swore "to be faithful and obedient to my Lord Innocent, to his Catholic successors, and the Roman church, and faithfully to preserve my kingdom in his obedience, defending the Catholic faith, and persecuting heretical pravity." A Pope deposed a king of Poland and granted his kingdom to another.

I have given some specimens of the manifestation of papal power, and the spirit of the religion of which the Pope is the infallible head; and which all true catholics believe is to overcome and absorb all others, and again to be the universal faith. Its long and eventful career, and its present existence, with more followers than in any former age, without any purification or reformation of its vices and deformities, fill the mind with curiosity and astonishment. It has never allowed any question of its authority, truth, or divinity. Free inquiry and discussion it denounces and punishes as the blackest crime against itself, because it knows full well, that it would crumble and fall before them; and it therefore seeks to fetter the souls of its children in eternal chains of ignorance, superstition, and despotism. In every generation of its being, the mind and moral sense of man has risen against it, and grappled with it in mighty battle. It was always prompt in putting into requisition its own temporal and spiritual authority—to raise armies and thunder its anathemas—to ravage heretical countries and to extirpate heretics with fire, faggot, and sword; and when it was unequal to the work, it called upon the political despots of the earth to come to the rescue of it, the great impersonation of the universal despotism of the mind, the soul, and the body; and the combination was always victorious.

The first light of general learning and civilization that dawned upon Europe, to bring to a termination the dark ages, was among the Albigences, inhabiting Languedoc and Provence, in the south of France. They rejected the supremacy of the Pope, and the benighting and benumbing dogmas and spirit of his faith. Being undisturbed for many years, truth, and peace, and the religion of the Saviour of the world flourished among them. The faculties and powers of men there, after having been enchained for ages, rapidly regained their innate strength and activity. Learning and the arts flourished—comforts, and wealth, and refinement, and happiness blessed their toil and their assiduity; and a pure, charitable, and holy faith shed upon them its hallowed influences. They became the admiration of the surrounding people, and their religious principles and freedom began rapidly to spread. The Albigenes have no sin to answer for but that of their bright example to a benighted world. They resided far from Rome, but the fears and apprehensions of the Pope were thoroughly aroused, for he saw in them a rising intellectual, moral, and religious power, dangerous to the universal dominion which he claimed. He called upon the mailed warriors of the north, whose arms in every field, from the western ocean to the holy sepulchre, had never known defeat, and sent them on the bloodiest of crusades against the Albigenes; and they were crushed in one of the most savage and desolating wars that ever blasted any portion of the earth. Prone to the earth, made red by its blood, Albigenism, sustained by the immortal truth and right of its principles, would, for generations, flame up in holy beauty and brightness, far illuminating the gloom of the surrounding darkness; but as often the inexorable Pope would march his armed myrmidons and have it again quenched in the blood of its martyrs.

About 1380, Wickliff began his vigorous reformation in England. He denied the power of the Pope, denounced his usurpations, exposed the interpolations and corruptions of the catholic religion, and interpreted the scriptures, and placed them in the hands of the people as the rule of their life and their faith. The Lollards increased greatly in England, spread into Germany, and soon almost possessed Bohemia. But the indefatigable and unrelenting Pope, brought down upon them, too, all manner of persecutions, and the armed power of his dependent kings. Another religious and exterminating war swept them from the earth.

Papacy seemed now to be all-dominating and invincible. Its corruptions, and the scandalous immoralities of the Popes and its clergy, went on increasing. One of them denied the immortality of the soul. That faith was not necessary for the remission of sins, had become an established principle of Romanism; and the sale of written indulgencies for the commission of sin, one of the sources of the Pope's revenue. Tetzel was pushing a traffic in those indulgencies for Leo X. and all the priesthood inculcating that tenet throughout Germany, when Luther began the great reformation. The truths, which he thundered in strong and burning words against Romanism, seemed to be the echoes of God's spirit, and the hoary ignorance and superstitious of centuries, receded before him as from the touch of the spear of Ithuriel. At the instigation, often repeated, of the Pope, Charles V summoned him to appear before the Diet of Worms, to answer for his heresies, for which Leo demanded that he should be burnt, as Huss had been more than a century before. The greatest spirit of the world, confronting its greatest monarch, in such an assembly of warriors, nobles and bishops, to question and expose the errors and power of the time-honored hierarchy, in the cause of truth, liberty, religion, and salvation, was one of the sublimest spectacles that has ever been exhibited upon the earth. God held Luther under his protection, and he was saved for an immortal work. By his teachings, aided by Melancthon and Swingle, and other great and faithful men, the light and liberty of the Bible, and of religious truth, spread rapidly, and promised at once to regenerate christendom. In less than fifty years, it swept from the Baltic to the Mediterranean, and was going on, "conquering and to conquer." The danger to the Pope was mighty, unprecedented. He summoned to the rescue every power, every tributary which he could command; and soon all his host, which had continued faithful, manifested extraordinary spirit and activity. Self-preservation, continuance, or annihilation, was the issue, and the spiritual portion of his forces in every branch seemed to be electrified. The great catholic powers flew to arms in this common cause of despotism, and every energy and faculty of Romanism came up to the eventful conflict. The newly instituted order of Jesuits brought genius, learning, enthusiasm, and an industry, perseverance, devotion, and endurance, that were never surpassed. All caught their spirit, and the trembling fabric of the papacy, over the largest portion of its domain, was upheld and become steady.

The state of things was different with the protestants. They had rapidly become strong and comparatively secure; and withdrawing much of their attention from their common foe, they divided into sects, and weakened their union and strength by mutual persecution. The voices of the first great reformers were hushed in the tomb, and there were no equal men to succeed them. Ferdinand, the second Emperor of that name, Philip II, of Spain, and Maximilian of Bavaria, espoused the cause of Romanism, with no less zeal than the Pope. Again, and again, they charged with their armed legions on the protestants and the powers that defended them, and re-conquered half that Romanism had lost, and as far as they overcame, the new faith was suppressed by the most relentless persecutions. The Pope, by every incentive, was constantly urging these bloody champions of his church on in their conquering career, and the reformers had probably met the sad fate of the Albigenes, if God had not raised up Gustavus Adolphus to defend, as he did Luther to establish, the reformation. The councils of the Pope, the Emperor and the French King, too, were distracted by mutual jealousies, and their conflicting claims for the highest power. Protestantism got rest from the terrible persecutions of its natural enemies, by the thirty years' war being brought to an end by the treaty of Westphalia. But in efforts to extinguish forever its faith, its liberty, its pure christian morals, and the eternal life which it gives, seas of innocent blood had been shed. Besides the wars in Germany and the north-east of Europe, in that of the league to suppress the Huguenots in France, a million of persons are computed to have perished. During the terrific night of St. Bartholomew, ninety thousand Huguenots are related to have been put to death, in cold blood, by their destroying persecutors, in different Catholic countries. In the Netherlands, the Duke of Alva, as the chief captain of Philip II, raged like a wild beast, never were sated with blood, although he boasted of having put twenty thousand unoffending protestants to death. But I retire, in disgust and horror, from presenting any more of these persecuting and bloody sketches of Romanism, with which history teems in frightful fecundity.

At the close of the last century, the papacy seemed to be at last overthrown, amidst the atheism and the destruction of old systems and institutions brought about by the French revolution. But after some years, it arose from the ruin, perfect in all its proportions, and in the possession of all its capabilities and faculties. Hear what Macauley, an Episcopalian, says of it:

"The papacy remains, not in decay, not a mere antique; but full of life and youthful vigor. The Catholic church is still sending forth to the furthest ends of the world, missionaries as zealous as those who landed in Kent with Augustin; and still confronting hostile kings with the same spirit with which she confronted Attila." "Nor do we see any sign which indicates that the term of her long dominion is approaching. She saw the commencement of all the governments, and of all the ecclesiastical establishments that now exist in the world; and we feel no assurance that she is not destined to see the end of them all. She was great and respected before the Saxon had set foot on Britain—before the French had crossed the Rhine—when Grecian eloquence still flourished at Antioch—when idols were still worshipped in the temple of Mecca. And she may still exist in undiminished vigor when some traveller from New Zealand shall, in the midst of a vast solitude, take his stand on a broken arch of London Bridge to sketch the ruins of St. Paul's."

It has not for generations attempted to claim, practically, any political or temporal power outside of the papal dominions, to depose kings, to control, by direct interference, politics, or to burn heretics. But still, in its constitution and principles the papacy adheres to these and all its other powers. It has renounced none—it does not intend to renounce any of them. None of her adhering children repudiate any of them; and if they did, they would be brought to recant by priestly visitation, or even now they would hear the spiritual thunder of excommunication denounced against themselves. These powers are only not active, because the condition of human affairs, the light, and liberty, and moral power of the world will not suffer them to be put in execution. It is not the advance and elevation of principle, of morals, and christian charity in that church and among its priesthood, which has purified it of these enormities. Let the state of the world favor it, and other Gregoryses and Innocents would arise to enforce the powers of the papacy in their utmost amplitude, and their most inexorable spirit. She believes that she is to be coeval with man, and ultimately to have his whole and perfect obedience. She has seen the great flux and reflux of her authority through many centuries, and she is looking forward patiently through other centuries, in confidence, when its strength in full tide is to come again to her. Ever watchful, the priesthood, for whom mainly this wonderful edifice has been constructed, and been progressing to perfection in its way for fifty generations, will patiently bide their time; and when it comes, if come it ever does, they will move with a policy, a courage, and a perseverance to command success; and the grandest and most awe-inspiring scenes of the papal drama will be again re-acted on the theatre of the world.

But whether it is the destiny of man to revolve back to papal supremacy in all his affairs or not, that is the consummation to which its whole priesthood devote themselves, their time, their energies, and their lives. That is their one great object, compensating and supplying the subjects of their affections, hopes, and ambitions; wife, children, friends, and country; wealth, social position, station, honors, fame, and distinction in the arts, sciences, politics, and war. This measurably lost ascendancy is their glorious tradition, and to regain it is the permanent, immutable, ever present policy of the papacy in all its parts. That the Pope is a heirarch, and they a portion of the heirarchy, is a part of the education, mind, soul, and personal identity of every member of the priesthood; and not less so, that the business and end of their lives and labors, is to expend themselves according to times and circumstances, for the restoration of the authority and splendor of both; and never to be disheartened or discouraged, whether or not there be any perceivable result. These are objects for which the foreign priests, especially, labor in this country. They summon every papist, upon his reaching the country, to his fealty, and hold them united and faithful to their religion, their priest, and their sovereign heirarch. They get possession of all the children they can, by means of schools, and of their parents, where even but one of them is a catholic, and they attend, and keep these children from the cradle to the grave. In every country where this priesthood has located itself, with signal flexibility and cunning, it has addressed itself to the ruling power, and paid it court and adulation, or used other means to win it; and when won, it may do what it will, on condition that it becomes subservient to the peculiar views of this priesthood and its heirarchy. They know that in our country the main spring of political power is the ballot-box, and the object of their unceasing efforts, is there to collect and consolidate strength. The members of all other sects divide in their politics and votes, but foreign catholics never, and the priest controls their votes with absolute will; and his calculation is, how can they be best turned to the account of priest-craft and Romanism. They never fail to make themselves felt in elections; and a few years since, he whom they denominated "The Lord Bishop of New York," John Hughes, was said truly to hold in his hands the issue of a presidential election.

That I have stated truly the objects and policy of the foreign catholic priesthood, in this country, will be proved by an extract or two from one of their principal organs, "Freeman's Journal and the Catholic Herald," published in New York. I have been informed that it is the organ also of Bishop Hughes, and is edited by his brother. The number of 17th March, 1849, makes this quotation from Bronson's Review, another catholic publication: "Our readers will perceive from this number, that we are preparing to give our Review a more popular character, of entering more largely into the discussion of the great political questions of the day, and are aiming to adapt it to the interests of a wider class of readers. We cannot, as catholics, blink the great political and social questions which are now agitating the public mind, both at home and abroad; and these questions will receive more attention hereafter than we have heretofore given them. It is of great importance to our community that these should be fully and boldly discussed in the light of catholic faith and morals, and we are sure that a catholic journal that will so discuss them, will, if it finds here and there an enemy, never want friends. The time has come when catholics must begin to make their principles tell upon the public sentiment of the country. Heretofore we have taken our politics from one or another of the parties which divide the country, and have suffered the enemies of our religion to impose their political doctrines upon us; but it is time for us to begin to teach the country itself those moral and political doctrines which flow from the teachings of our own church. We are at home here wherever we may have been born; this is our country, and as it is to become thoroughly catholic, we have a deeper interest in public affairs than any other of our citizens. The sects are only for a day, the church forever. We care little how the elections go, for that is a small affair, but we can never as catholics, be indifferent to the moral principles which enter into the laws and shape the public policy of the country." The editor of "Freeman's Journal" adds: "No catholic should be without a complete copy of Bronson's Review, past as well as future, &c."

The same paper, in the number 28th of March, 1849, says in an editorial: "Is it not possible for us catholics to do something to prepare our brethren for the trials that await them? Can we do nothing to direct and to shape the course of the new comers in a way that may afford more protection to their faith? Can we do nothing to keep them united to one another, and to make the cross the centre and object of their union? Can we not unite ourselves more firmly, and make abnegation of some of our personal opinions, pursuits and wishes, for the sake of securing our brethren as they reach us, to the catholic church, and of making them instruments of her more complete and speedy triumph in the land."

In the number of Bronson's Review of April 1845, which is a catholic oracle of such high authority, are the following passages: "But would you have this country come under the authority of the Pope? Why not? But the Pope would take away our free institutions! Nonsense. But how do you know that? From what do you infer it? After all do you not commit a slight blunder? Are your free institutions infallible? Are they founded on divine right? This you deny. Is not the proper question for you to discuss, then, not whether papacy be or not compatible with republican government, but whether it be or be not founded in divine right? If the papacy be founded in divine right, it is supreme over whatever be founded only in human right, and then your institutions should be made to harmonize with it, and not it with your institutions. The real question then is, not the compatibility or incompatibility of the catholic church with democratic institutions, but is the catholic church the church of God? Settle this question first. But in point of fact, democracy is a mischievous dream, wherever the catholic church does not predominate, to inspire the people with reverence, and to teach and accustom them to obedience to authority. The first lesson for all to learn, the last that should be forgotten, is, to obey. You can have no government where there is no obedience; and obedience to law, as it is called, will not be long enforced, where the fallibility of law is clearly seen and freely admitted. But it is the intention of the Pope to possess this country? Undoubtedly. In this intention he is aided by the Jesuits, and all the catholic prelates and priests. Undoubtedly, if they are faithful to their religion."

Mr. Brownson thus concludes: "That the policy of the church is dreaded and opposed by all protestants, infidels, demagogues, tyrants, and oppressors, is also unquestionably true. Save then, in the discharge of our civil duties, and in the ordinary business of life, there is, and can be no harmony among the Catholics and Protestants."

Those extracts avow, most distinctly, all the designs which I have imputed to the Roman priesthood in this country. The discussion of the great practical political questions of the day, fully and boldly in the light of Catholic faith and morals, that this country itself may be taught the moral and political doctrines which flow from the teachings of that church, and may become thoroughly Catholic—all other sects being for a day, and that church forever; and that our republican institutions may be made to conform to the papacy, by its principles being made to enter into the laws, and to shape the public policy of this country—are all here boldly avowed; and also that every Jesuit, Catholic Prelate, and Priest, who is faithful to his religion will aid the Pope, their hierarchy, to possess himself of this country. The means by which they expect to achieve all this, is, by the slow and cautious movements, the profound dissimulation and arts, which have ever characterized the operations of this priesthood, to get possession of the political power by controlling the ballot box. That is their sleepless effort, whether they ever succeed or not; and so subtle are they in their operations, thousands and thousands are unconsciously made their agents who would never knowingly submit themselves to any such purposes of mischief. The priesthood are encouraged by their own strong faith, that, if they do not succeed in this century, their successors may in the next. Whatever may be the results of these great projects, their prosecution is utterly opposed and hostile to the design, spirit, and practical ends of our system and institutions. Our ancestors came to this new world to enjoy, themselves and their posterity forever, perfect civil and religious freedom, and the right of inquiry, thought and the expression of opinion upon subjects, short of invasion of the rights of others, unfettered as the winds of Heaven. The divorce of church and state, of politics and religion, of temporal and spiritual affairs, they have provided for in our constitutions, and it was intended to be absolute, complete, and forever. In the scheme of the hierarchy of Rome and his emissaries—spread and spreading over the face of this country, to revolutionize silently and stealthily this order of things, they now have more than fifty thousand voters, legal and illegal, in America. At every election, local or general, this mighty force is made to act with a view, present or remote, to the grand objects of those who control it. The certain and the promptest way to get large accessions—accessions which, in another generation, may give them the mastery at the polls, is, to permit no restriction upon immigration or upon the faculty of the immigrant to vote and exercise a full share of political sovereignty. All attempts to put upon them any restriction will meet the inflexible opposition, the anathemas of every Roman priest, and probably of every Catholic in America.

All this host of foreign Catholics, now here and coming, are brought up to the confessional. By their faith, that is sinful which the priest tells them is sin; and so of religious duty, which they are to perform, or be lost. To him, who, in this matter with daring impiety, presents himself as personating, the Almighty, the sinner tells his tale of guilt and contrition. The father confessor grants him absolution, and claims too, the power to pray his soul, when he dies, out of the fires of purgatory. When this dread man bids that confessing sinner how to vote, Charles XII, Frederick the Great, or Bonaparte, never received a prompter or so willing an obedience from their best trained veteran.

It is only as a hierarchy, as a religious politico institution, having vast political projects, and organized for political action; and because its principles, purposes and operations, are utterly inimical to popular and American constitutional liberty, to all civil and religious freedom, that I stand up in opposition to it. When Roman American Catholics call their general councils, and purge their system of its interior and only quiescent political despotism; when they announce to the Pope and the world that his supremacy is only spiritual, and out of his papal dominions in Italy, he, nor his priests have right to interfere in politics or temporal affairs; that they owe him or his hierarchy no duty or obedience, incompatible with their full and perfect allegiance to the United States, or any of the states, or that is hostile to any of the principles of their governments; that they are opposed to and will ever resist the union of church and state, and any mixing of their affairs; when they bid, and will compel their priesthood to cease their meddling with the government and politics of the country, with a view to shape its laws and policy, and to desist from their efforts to control the entire Roman Catholic vote of America; then, and not until then, should every native born American, every true friend of American liberty, wherever born or whatever be his religion, whose paramount object is the security and preservation of that liberty, cease from his assaults upon this great religious politico institution.

Mr. President, the information which I possess, and have endeavored to give partially to the convention on this branch of the subject, I have derived from "Papal Rome, as it is, by Giustiania," "Elliott on Romanism," "Dowling's History of Romanism," and from general reading.

We have, Mr. President, a country of vast extent, with a great variety of climate, soil, production, industry and pursuit. Competing interests and sectional questions are a natural and fruitful source of jealousies, discords and factions. We have about four millions of slaves, and the slaveholding and free states are nearly equally divided in number, but the population of the latter greatly preponderating, and every portion of it deeply imbued with inflexible hostility to slavery as an institution. Even now the conflict of opinion and passion of the two great sections of the Union, upon the subject of slavery, is threatening to rend this Union and change confederated states and one people into hostile and warring powers. Cession has recently given to us considerable numbers of the Spanish race, and a greatly increasing immigration is constantly pouring in upon us the hordes of Europe, with their hereditary national animosities, their discordant races, languages, and religious faiths, their ignorance and their pauperism, mixed up with a large amount of idleness, moral degradation, and crime; and all this "heterogeneous, discordant, distracted mass," to use Mr. Jefferson's language, "sharing with us the legislation," and the entire political sovereignty. My word for it, we are nursing in rapid growth, a blind political Sampson, and sooner or later, he will grapple with the pillars of our temple of liberty and pull it down in ruins upon us.

Washington and Jefferson, and their associates, though among the wisest and most far seeing of mankind, could not but but deserv in the future many formidable difficulties and dangers, and thus be premonished to provide against them, in fashioning our institutions. If they had foreseen the vast, the appalling increase of immigration upon us at the present, there can be no reasonable doubt that laws to naturalize the foreigners and to give up to them the country, its liberties, its destiny, would not have been authorized by the constitution. The danger, though great, is not wholly without remedy. We can do something if we do it quickly. The German and Slavonic races are combining in the state of New York to elect candidates of their own blood to congress. This is the beginning of the conflict of races on a large scale, and it must, in the nature of things, continue and increase. It must be universal and severe in all the fields of labor, between the native and the stranger; and from the myriads of foreign laborers coming to us, if it does not become a contest for bread and subsistence, wages will at least be brought down so low as to hold our native laborers and their families in hopeless poverty. They cannot adopt the habits of life, and live upon the stinted meager supplies, to which the foreigner will restrict himself, and which is bounteous plenty to what he has been accustomed in the old country. Already these results are taking place in many of the mechanic arts. Duty, patriotism, and wisdom, all require us to protect the labor, and to keep up to a fair scale the wages of our native born people, as far as by laws and measures of public policy it can be done. The foreigner too is the natural foe of the slavery of our state. He is opposed to it by all his past associations, and when he comes to our state he sees two hundred thousand laborers of a totally different race to himself, excluding him measurably from employment and wages. He hears a measure agitated to send these 200,000 competitors away. Their exodus will make room for him, his kindred and race, and create such a demand for labor, as he will reason it, to give him high wages. He goes naturally for the measure, and becomes an emancipationist. While the slave is with us, the foreigner will not crowd us, which will postpone to a long day the affliction of nations, an excess of population; the slaves away, the great tides of immigration will set in upon us, and precipitate upon our happy land this the chief misery of most of the countries of Europe. Look at the myriads who are perpetually pouring into the north western states from the German hives—making large and exclusive settlements for themselves, which in a few years will number their thousands and tens of thousands; living in isolation, speaking a strange language, having alien manners, habits, opinions, and religious faiths, and a total ignorance of our political institutions; all handed down with German phlegm and inflexibility to their children through generations. In less than fifty years, northern Illinois, parts of Ohio and Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Minnesota, will be literally possessed by them; they will number millions and millions, and they will be essentially a distinct people, a nation within a nation, a new Germany. We can't keep these people wholly out, and ought not if we could; but we are getting more than our share of them. I wish they would turn their direction to South America, quite as good a portion of the world as our share of the hemisphere. They could there aid in bringing up the slothful and degenerate Spanish race; here their deplorable office is to pull us down. Our proud boast is, that the Anglo Saxon race is the first among all the world of man, and that we are a shoot from this noble stock; but how long will we be as things are progressing? In a few years, as a distinctive race, the Anglo Americans will be as much lost to the world and its future history as the lost tribes of Israel. But let us avert such a fate, let us postpone it at least. Let us withdraw from the lower corners the premium of political sovereignty. These strangers have neither the right nor the competency to govern the native born people, nor ought they to be allowed the power to misgovern them. It is our right and our duty to govern ourselves, and them too when they come among us; and it is best for all parties that it should be so; and this difficult and important work can be better performed without their taking part in it, even when their intentions are good; but misdirected and perverted by designing and wicked men, it is fatal infatuation to allow it. This truly foreign power, nestled in the bosom of our country, may in its arch and crooked policy, occasionally act with one or another of the parties that spring up inherent in this republic. But it has its own paramount ends to circumvent; and when it seems to ally itself to any party, it is only a ruse; and the true motive is the belief that it helps on to the consummation of those ends. With every civil right and liberty secured to the immigrant, and a full share of political sovereignty to be the heritage of his children, if he is not satisfied to come and remain with us, let him go to other lands.

Mr. President, no well-informed and observant man, can look abroad over this wide-spread and blessed country, without feeling deep anxiety for the future. Some elements of discord and disunion are even now in fearful action. Spread out to such a vast extent, filling up almost in geometrical progression, with communities and colonies from many lands, various as Europe in personal and national characteristics, in opinions, in manners and customs, in tongues and religious faiths, in the traditions of the past, and the objects and the hopes of the future—the United States, can no more than Europe, become one homogeneous mass—one peaceful, united, harmonizing, all self-adhering people. When the country shall begin to teem with people, these jarring elements being brought into proximity, their repellant and explosive properties will begin to act with greater intensity; and then, if not before, will come the war of geographical sections, the war of races, and, the most relentless of all wars, of hostile religions. This mournful catastrophe will have been greatly hastened by our immense expansion, and our proclamation to all mankind to become a part of us. Less limits, and the slow, but safe growth of natural increase, would have given us not so magnificent and striking, but a much more perfect and enduring republican empire. Hope may offer us the delusion that American liberty, won by the swords, and secured by a constitution devised by the wisest and best men of the earth, will be immortal. But that, like man and all his creations, will pass away; it is the law of his destiny. May the time be far, far in the dim and distant future, and may the people of America, to have it further off, confide the preservation of that liberty to those only who are competent and worthy of being trusted with the best hope of mankind!

Mr. PRESTON. I cannot, Mr. President, without proving recreant to the trust reposed in me by the constituency I have the honor to represent, permit the remarks which have fallen from the gentleman from Bourbon, to pass unanswered in this hall. They have been received with marked attention by the house, and the applause of the galleries at the utterance of sentiments so pernicious, when eloquently urged, makes me tremble for the fate of my country. But, sir, I will tell them before they applaud this proposition, to tear away the right of suffrage from the unfriended and defenceless immigrant, to pause, for if it be accomplished, the time is not far distant, when the pauper will be disfranchised, and by degrees the privilege will be alone enjoyed by the landlord and the capitalist. When that inauspicious day shall arrive when labor lies suppliant and manacled at the feet of capital, when the immigrant and poor citizen are alike enslaved and enthralled, then your loud applauses will be turned into wailings and lamentations, and you will curse the day on which you permitted the elective franchise to be invaded.

Mr. President, this is a question which is not alone confined to the realm of politics, but transcends it and interferes with the rights of conscience. It offers two stabs at liberty, one at the rights of the foreigner, the other at freedom of religious opinion: if carried out it will lead to the establishment of religious intolerance, and destroy the equal political privileges of the poorer classes of society. Politics and religion are blended, and the gentleman raises his warning voice, to persuade us to forbid the foreigner from landing on our shores, from enjoying that equality which should belong to every freeman on our soil, and by the power of eloquence arouses the passions of the worst classes of the protestant persuasion against their catholic brethren. I will not say such is his design, but I do say it is the inevitable result of his doctrine. O, how unnecessary, how uncalled for! Where around us are the evidences of the mischievous power of the poor foreigner. There are numbers of them citizens of the state, yet, when we gaze around this hall, we behold no single delegate born in a foreign land. Has ever a foreigner filled the executive chair, from the hour when Isaac Shelby was chosen governor of Kentucky? Have they ever filled great and lucrative offices of honor and profit among us? Thousands have been naturalized among us, and have passed their lives in unobtrusive obscurity and peace. They have lived quietly and honestly among us; they have contributed to the burthens of the state in peace, and they have fought, shoulder to shoulder with their adopted brethren in the battles of our common country. They have assisted us in subduing forests, draining marshes, and building up our stately cities; they have fought for us in battle, they have increased our prosperity in peace, yet how rarely do we ever see them aspiring to offices of importance and value in the state. These are facts which no statistics are necessary to establish, which none can disprove; for when we look around us, is there a delegate on this floor a foreigner? Not one. Is there a member of congress from this state a foreigner? Not one. A member of our legislature? Not one. A minister to any foreign court? Not one. The danger then, exists only in the imagination, and these apprehensions are mere phantoms of the brain.

My friend from Simpson, (Mr. Clarke) whispers that General Shields is a foreigner by birth. It is true, and I am indebted to him for the suggestion. He was baptized in blood a citizen of the United States, on the field of Cerro Gordo. In that memorable battle he earned his title to the rights and privileges of an American citizen. He fell gallantly leading a portion of his own brigade in a charge upon a battery of the enemy, shot through the body, a handkerchief might have been drawn through the wound, yet it was his fortune to survive. He returned to the state of his adoption and the gratitude of its people has caused him to be elected to the senate of the United states. However we may differ from him in opinion, never let our voices be lifted against him, for if he had a thousand faults he has wiped them off by the generosity of his conduct and gallantry of his bearing in behalf of our country.

But, Mr. President, the tendency of the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, is not merely to assail the rights of the alien, but it will terminate in tearing away from the poorer classes of our own people the inestimable privilege of the right of suffrage. Permit this principle to find favour among us, and war will next be declared against the pauper as it is in Massachusetts, and the other states of the atlantic border, where Native Americanism flourishes in full vigor. As Kentucky was the first state of the confederacy that extended the privilege of universal suffrage, to every freeman upon her soil, I trust in God she will be the last to commence the process of curtailing that right. She was the first to break loose from the shackles of feudalism. I trust she will be the last to re-adopt them. She extended to all classes this franchise, in the constitution of 1799. Let it never be said that she was the first to abandon that noble determination, in the constitution of 1849. This great principle asserted at Danville, and confirmed in the constitution of 1799, has pervaded the confederacy and mitigated the condition of the citizen in almost every one of our sister states. It has not stopped here. Borne to Europe by La Fayette, and those other foreign patriots who assisted us in our revolutionary struggle, it was the principal element in producing the first French revolution, that goal from whence sprung the germ of human liberty in Europe. The popular thirst for this very right was one of the chief causes of the revolution of 1830 which established the throne of Louis Philippe. It was also at the foundation of the movement which dethroned him, and established the French Republic. Never, sir, will I agree in this age of progress and political science, to abandon this principle, or seek to curtail the right of suffrage by invading it in the slightest degree, never will I agree that America, frightened by chimerical dangers, should be the first to retrace her steps, and destroy that very principle which has been our glory, our support, our ornament and our strength.

Nations have their fits of insanity like men. We know, in England, after the usurpation of Oliver Cromwell, and the abdication of the Stuarts, the cry of "popery" would throw the whole people into the most violent agitation. The dread of the Pope of Rome, was, at that time a national madness. All classes were terrified at the imaginary peril of the power of the pontiff, and shuddered at the prospect of a restoration of papal supremacy. No class or condition was exempted from this fear, however idle in reality. Now, sir, when I heard the gentleman, this evening, conjure up the imaginary dangers, which threatened the institutions of America, from the catholic religion and the power of the Pope in America, it seemed to me a similar insanity had seized him, and as if the cry of "no popery" was again uttered for the purpose of stimulating the angry passions of the protestant multitude, and of crushing to earth every principle of religious toleration in the land.

If it be the wish of the gentleman from Bourbon to proscribe the catholic religion as detrimental to the institutions of our country, he does not propose a remedy, adequate to the object. Let him introduce the laws imposing disabilities on catholics, which sixty years since encumbered, and yet partially encumber, the statutes of England; those laws framed—skilfully framed—for the proscription and oppression of the unfortunate people of Ireland. Import these laws, and engraft them here, if you wish Kentucky to occupy a similar attitude—an attitude so enviable. These are the statutes against which the oppressed people of Ireland have lifted their wailing voices 'till they have reached to heaven; these are the statutes that have forced from her tears of blood; these are the statutes whose iron despotism has imposed a bondage so bitter that the sense of the civilized world has compelled England, obdurate as she is, to relax their vigor, and mitigate their severity. To our shame be it said, these are the principles which this evening have been welcomed with applause by a Kentucky audience, in the capitol of Kentucky.

Sir, establish this principle, and we have proscribed the freedom of religious opinion in this state. Establish this, and we have struck down religious toleration and freedom of conscience; establish this, and you have laid the foundation of religious wars, to convulse, to distract, and to ruin our common country.

To a stranger, there are two remarkable features in our government. We are the only civilized state in the world which allows a foreigner to acquire rights of citizenship within it, and we are the only enlightened government in which the rich and the poor, the strong and the weak, have equal political rights and privileges, and enjoy the benefits of substantial liberty. The reason is, we are the only people of the world who have erected our government on broad and just foundations—on those principles of inflexible justice on which liberty alone can safely repose. But when we commence narrowing that foundation—when we commence qualifying those principles—when we undertake to depart from those truths, the pursuit of which have ensured us prosperity and happiness, we have sapped the foundations on which the edifice rests. When this is done, the thralldom of labor to capital is again renewed, the degradation of the poorest citizen is insured, and society will return to that barbarism from whence it emerged.

Accurate as the gentleman from Bourbon usually is, there must be some mistake in his statements relative to the views entertained in regard to naturalization, by some of the prominent patriots of the revolution. He cites Washington as concurring in his views, and quotes from his correspondence in regard to Baron Steuben. Washington was the President of the convention which framed our federal constitution, and that constitution provides for the naturalization of foreigners. I am not now prepared with references on this subject, but if my memory serves me, it will be found, by reference to the debates of that convention, that his warning voice was never raised in remonstrance against the insertion of that feature in the constitution of the United States, and I appeal to all who hear me, if he ever did.

Mr. DAVIS. I will refer the gentleman to Sparks' life of Washington, in which are the letters I read and many more.

Mr. PRESTON. I have no doubt of the accuracy of the transcript—none; but I say Washington was the president of the convention which provided in our constitution for the naturalization of foreigners, and lifted no warning voice against it, and that the naturalization laws were first passed in conformity to his first message to congress in which he says:

"Various considerations also render it expedient that the terms on which foreigners may be admitted to the right of citizens, should be speedily ascertained by a uniform rule of naturalization."

The gentleman has also quoted from Mr. Jefferson's notes on Virginia in relation to this matter, but I will refer him to more authentic evidence of Mr. Jefferson's political views. In speaking of the existing laws in regard to naturalization, he deemed a mitigation of them necessary, and in his first annual message to congress, he commends the subject to their attention in the following language:

"I cannot omit recommending a revival of the laws on the subject of naturalization. Considering the ordinary chances of human life, a denial of citizenship under a residence of fourteen years, is a denial to a great proportion of those who ask it, and controls a policy pursued from their first settlement by many of these states, and still believed of consequence to their prosperity. And shall we refuse the unhappy fugitives from distress, that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extended to our fathers arriving in this land? Shall oppressed humanity find no asylum on this globe? The constitution, indeed, has wisely provided that, for admission to certain offices of important trust, a residence shall be required sufficient to develope character and design. But might not the general character and capabilities of a citizen be safely communicated to every one manifesting a bona fide purpose of embarking his life and fortunes permanently with us? With restrictions, perhaps, to guard against the fraudulent usurpation of our flag."

The recommendation of Mr. Jefferson led to the enactment of that system of naturalization laws under which we have lived for half a century. At the time of their adoption it required a residence of fourteen years before an alien could be admitted to the privileges of citizenship. By those enactments the period of residence was reduced to five years, and under these laws we have lived from the year 1801 to the present day without inconvenience, injury or complaint. About seven or eight years since, however, a murmur arose against them—a movement called native Americanism began. Where was the principle of this new party born? Was it born in the closet of the philanthropist, the study of a philosopher, or the library of the statesman? No sir. It was conceived in ignorance and begotten in iniquity; it was ushered into existence from amid the vilest purlieus of Philadelphia; it was amid profaned altars, and by the red blaze of catholic churches; amid the drunken orgies of an infuriated mob, amid riot, robbery, sacrilege, murder, and civil bloodshed, that this monstrous bantling was born. I leave to others the task of tracing its progress. From time to time attempts have been made to renew and revive it; but it has always in the end been scorned, repudiated, and denounced, by the good sense of the country. The arch-priest of the faith, Levin—he who fed this unholy flame after all the agitation—is the sole representative of this party in the halls of congress. Long statistical tables of European pauperism and crime have been prepared and disseminated to irritate the popular mind against the defenceless foreigner; the worst passions of the human heart have been stimulated to urge the ignorant to persecution and injustice, but the whole attempt has been rejected by the good sense of the people of America, and the whole party has proved a political abortion, and their principles have sunk back to the obscurity from whence they emanated.

The gentleman has chosen to allude to the formation of the legion of St. Patrick in Mexico, composed of deserters from the American army. As a fellow to the picture, I will mention that when the war commenced, a gentleman of Philadelphia, a leader of the Native American party, intelligent, upright, brave, and enthusiastic, but injudicious and zealous—Captain Naylor—recruited a large company, almost a regiment in itself, exclusively of Native Americans. It was one of the most tumultuous and disorderly in the service, and its lieutenant, Hare, disgraced it and the American army, by one of the most horrid murders on record. In company with some ruffians in the city of Mexico, he murdered a Spanish clerk for the sake of a few doubloons in his strong box. The circumstances of the assassination, almost equalled in atrocity the murder which recently occurred in Boston. He was arrested, tried, and condemned to death, but to the regret of the army, General Butler, after the treaty of peace, granted him a pardon. I know that there are many worthy, upright, and honest men, who entertain views favorable to the Native American party; but I have alluded to this matter to show the fallacy of using such instances in argument, or of stigmatizing a party or a people by citing such isolated cases.

The gentleman from Bourbon must be mistaken in his statistical statements. He came to the conclusion that more than half a million of foreigners immigrated to America during the last year. This estimate is vastly too great. I now hold in my hand the returns taken from a letter from the secretary of State to the speaker of the house of representatives, showing the number of passengers who arrived in the United States during the year ending the 30th of September, 1848, and it seems they amounted to 229,492. But it is an error to suppose that all of these were immigrants. Passengers of all countries are included in the estimate. American citizens returning from abroad, and foreigners visiting us who subsequently return, and those traveling through the United States on their way to other lands, are all included in the statement. The number of immigrants has apparently increased, as the facilities of travel between the United States and Europe have progressed, and to this cause, in a great measure, is to be attributed the seeming enormous increase of immigration. I will read from the American almanac some comments on this subject:

"It is an object of considerable importance to ascertain how rapidly the population of this country increases from natural causes alone, or what would be the rate of increase if no immigrants came hither. There is reason to believe that great mistakes have been committed in this respect; that writers on the law of population—the Malthusians particularly, who wish to make out the human race as prolific as possible—have not made allowance enough for the effects of immigration, and therefore have greatly overestimated the rapidity of increase here, where it is certain that the growth of the population is not checked by a deficiency of food. A census of the people is taken every ten years, and these decennial returns would show very clearly what the rate of increase is, if it were not for the disturbing and fluctuating effect of the tide of removal, which constantly sets westward, and the magnitude of which it is impossible to ascertain from official returns with any approach to correctness. A list is made up from year to year, of the number of passengers who arrive in our Atlantic and southern ports, and the total is published in the official documents, with an air of precision and minuteness, as if the information were of some value. But it is notorious, that the enumeration is carelessly made, at many points of arrival no record is kept, no account is taken of those who subsequently return to the old world, and the multitude who yearly cross the Canada frontier, are not counted at all. Overlooking these causes of error, these yearly returns are held to prove that the effect of immigration was very slight, and during certain periods of our history, that it might be left out of the calculation altogether, without materially vitiating the result."

These are the reflections on this subject contained in the most authentic statistical work in the Union for the present year, and they exhibit the falsity of many of the data from which many statistical deductions on this subject are drawn.

The true extent of the immigration or the true statistics cannot be accurately ascertained from such means, and you might as well endeavor to ascertain the population of a city by the number of arrivals at its hotels. After this immense over estimate, for the immigration cannot be placed at above two hundred and fifty thousand a year, under any circumstances, he assumes that it will proceed in sort of compound ratio, so that in 1850, nearly 1,000,000 will arrive; in 1851, 1,340,000; in 1852, 1,970,783; in 1853, 2,897,510; in 1854, 4,188,664; and so on. He however admits that there are causes which would prevent the population increasing to that extent, but he assumes that the immigrant population will advance at something like this ratio. The fact is that after population shall have reached a certain density the immigration must constantly decrease instead of increasing; I have merely alluded to these statistics for the purpose of showing that the fear of over population from immigration was groundless. We have a large and thinly settled territory, and immense undeveloped resources which require labor, and this tide of immigration is not an injury but a benefit.

It is unnecessary to examine statistics to see how foreign immigration has affected the welfare and prosperity of our own state, and what effect it has had on our political institutions. When we look around us, we see no such evils—we behold no such detrimental influences flowing from the privileges we award to those of foreign birth; and when we look at our legislative bodies, we do not behold them subjected to any such injurious influences. During the last canvass, this state was agitated on the subject of emancipating the slaves. The constituency I have the honor to represent has a larger number of foreign voters than any other portion of Kentucky—some eight hundred or one thousand—yet when this struggle came on, these men who we are now told are so dangerous to the institutions of the state, when others supported the emancipation cause, and were about to violate the sacred rights of property—these men, when they were told that it was not just to deprive any citizen of his property without compensation—these adopted children of our land—coming from a clime where slavery was not tolerated—with every prejudice against it—cast a majority of some two hundred votes on the side of the rights of property, and in favor of the institutions of the people who had afforded them a shelter from the oppressions of Europe, and given them a welcome to the land in which we live.

We have but few aliens upon our soil. We have a large and thinly settled territory. We are not encumbered with them. There are not four thousand foreign votes in the state. The power to regulate the matter resides in congress. It was reposed there by the constitution. I grant we may exercise it if we choose, as I am unwilling to concede the general government possess this power to the exclusion of the states, but it interferes in spirit with the federal compact, and when we have experienced so little inconvenience or annoyance, when we are so remote from the Atlantic border, where the pressure of the foreign population—if it be a pressure—exists, why is it necessary for Kentucky, first of all the thirty states of the confederacy, to take the alarm and pass naturalization laws, when no other state has done it, to the exclusion of those laws passed under the administration of Jefferson, and acquiesced in by every other state of the Union? Sir, we are the last state of the Union that ought to be terrified at such illusory dangers. Have we countless thousands of these foreigners among us? No! When we visit the interior counties, or the mountains, or the green river region, we find but few, very few. A small number dwell in our towns and cities and along the river border to which they are principally confined. Shall we then in Kentucky, be the first to manifest a timidity so unnecessary on the subject of the foreign vote?

The city of Boston has, as we are informed, one fourth of her population composed of foreigners—three fifths of the inhabitants of New York city are of foreign birth, and when convenience suits, these noble cities with their vast wealth, magnificent edifices, great commerce, and forests of shipping, are pointed to as exemplars for imitation. If the foreign vote be so fatal to a state, whence their prosperity, whence their wealth?

No sir, these calumniated foreigners have brought new arts, new modes of industry, and new inventions to our country. The cotton and woollen manufactures have arisen among us, the culture of the vine is in progress, the looms of northern Italy will soon develop the silk manufacture of Piedmont and Lombardy, and if we pursue the policy we have heretofore followed, wealth and power will be the result. As manufactures and the arts have received a wonderful stimulus from this concentration of the experience, knowledge and ingenuity of Europe, so I believe that the admixture of the various bloods of the Caucasian varieties of the human species, has produced a nobler and more vigorous race. Look over the list of names of the delegates on this floor. We are sprung from various races.

The blood of the Italian, the German, the Castilian, the chivalrous Frenchman, the sturdy Englishman, and the generous Irishman, circulates in our veins. Are we improved or degenerated from this commingled current? Will our descendants be inferior to our ancestors? Will this admixture be injurious? A comparison was made between the negro defenders of New Orleans and our foreign population to justify the exclusion of the latter from the right of suffrage. The comparison is unjust. Is there no difference between the European and the African? If our own countrymen had sprung from such a source they would have been a very different nation. When Cortez conquered Mexico, the Castilian blood was intermingled with that of the Aztec, and we see the effects of that polluted current in the lepers, whom the pure blooded descendant of the Spaniard moves aside with his foot as he obstructs the street through which he walks. Such would be our fate if we amalgamated with the negro. But admixture with our kindred European races has improved and benefited our own.

We have been told that Napoleon first, and afterwards the Emperor of Austria, incited by professor Schlegel, determined to expel those who thirsted for freedom from the face of Europe. I know nothing of it, but if it be so, this is the true home for such refugees. It is said that it was part of the plan to plant catholicism in America. Do then catholicism and liberty go together? If so, let it come, for that religion cannot be so hurtful which inculcates the principles of freedom. I am no advocate of any particular sect, but I wish religious toleration to be extended to all.

We have had a graphic picture drawn of the wretched poverty of the emigrants from Europe who land upon our shores. I know full well that misery has driven hundreds and thousands from Europe to America, and that many are paupers when they land among us; but in a year or so those very men are no longer paupers. They engage in mechanical and manufacturing industry. They apply themselves to cultivating our fertile and unoccupied lands—they acquire competency, and finally they come in a few years to be citizens and freemen. Are we then at this day to declare we will no longer extend such an asyhim to the oppressed and unfortunate? Are we to adopt the policy of China, and forbid forever the entrance of these outside barbarians, so as to preserve ourselves free and uncontaminated? If we imitate such an example, we will gradually sink into the unsocial barbarism that marks that people, and instead of a liberal, civilized and just government, such as we now have, we will have a semi-civilized race such as China contains. But if it be desirable to prevent foreigners from entering our country, let us pass a law efficient to the end. We know that by merely disfranchising aliens, we will not keep them out. They will still come to this country for bread, even if we deny them liberty. Necessity drives them, and they must come. If they are to affect us so detrimentally, let us draw a sanitary cordon around our country, and proclaim that henceforth no foreigner shall ever come to America—let us, like the Duke, decree,

“————— If any Syracusan born,
Come to the bay of Ephesus, he dies.”

If catholicism be the evil we seek to redress, this will not reach it, for the catholic will still enter the country, and still worship after the manner of his fathers. Let us, at once, declare the catholic religion shall no longer be tolerated. Let us spread upon our statute book those iniquitous laws which so long disgraced the legislation of England. Let us copy the test acts, and fetter conscience by every legal contrivance and device, and then we have indeed struck at the root of the evil. But I maintain that this proposition contains no remedy. You still permit, you invite the alien to seek refuge in our country; you subject him to the burthens of taxation, you hold him liable to the laws, you leave him free, but yet you disfranchise him, you deny him political privileges, and you create a turbulent, ostracised, and disaffected class of freemen in the state.

Let the principle that poverty is a crime be established among us, so as to disfranchise the foreigner, and not long after, it will be declared a crime in the native born citizen. It will soon be declared as criminal in him, as in the unfortunate Irishman who dared to stand by Smith O'Brien, or Mitchell, for his country's rights. Poverty is a crime of which such are already guilty. How long, my country, will it be before poverty is a crime in Kentucky? But you tell me such a supposition is extravagant; that it is impossible; that it exists only in the fancy, and that no advocate for such a principle could be found on the soil of America. If so, I point you to the condition of the poor man in Virginia, to Massachusetts, to Maryland; and I point you to wherever landed property has accumulated in past times, and to wherever an agricultural aristocracy exists. At this hour, the pauper in New York is disfranchised, native though he be, while the free negro, if he has property, may vote. The right of suffrage cannot be too strictly, too jealously guarded. Ever permit it to be infringed by the pretexts of power, and the loss is never regained. I remember an Italian story of a duke of Milan—a Sforza—who in the punishment of his victims, tortured not only the body, but the mind. The objects of his vengeance were placed within an iron chamber whose walls and ceiling gradually contracted by the movement of secret machinery. Seven windows admitted the light. Day after day the wretched prisoner beheld a window disappear; the walls, the ceiling, and the floor contract. Filled with agony, he awaited his doom, and at length crushed by the slow, but steady pressure of the machine, he sunk, a mangled and lifeless mass within it. Let me then, tell the freemen of America, that there is a natural love of power, and lust of dominion in the great, which, if once tasted, is never willingly relinquished, and that if ever the rights of the people are brought within the grasp of aristocratic power, that they will be slowly, but certainly crushed. Such was the history of Venice, and such will be the history of all governments where a privileged class exercise unlicensed rule.

For myself I will meet this question at the threshold. Let us resist it in the beginning. Let us strangle the serpent when it is young, or when it is old it will strangle us.

Sir, is there any necessity for this measure, or is it a pretext? It is a pretext, and the real object is hidden from scrutiny. This is but the outwork. Wait till the columns of wealth and power rush over the rampart, and then too late will the freemen of America know the importance of the measure. Tolerate this assault on the right of suffrage; tolerate it as they tell you it is for its protection; tolerate its being torn from the foreigner who settles among us in good faith, with his wife, his children and his kindred, and you have commenced a career of injustice which will terminate in burying not only the rights of the alien, but of the poor native American also, in that grave in which the liberties of all free countries have been entombed.

MR. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Mr. President, I see that my friend Mr. Rudd is anxious to obtain the floor. I will yield it to him in a few minutes. When the delegate from Bourbon first introduced this subject at the commencement of the session, I submitted a resolution declaring that it was the settled purpose of the convention not to disturb the right of suffrage as it was fixed in the old constitution. My object was to prevent misconception and alarm in the public mind. The promised discussion between the gentleman from Bourbon and the delegate from Henderson (Mr. Dixon) was postponed, and since the convention has settled the right of suffrage as it was fixed in the old constitution, I have no disposition to waste the time of the convention in further discussion on nativeism. It is true, I had promised to be present when the two champions met.

Mr. President, when the motion to restrict and limit the representation of Louisville, because of her foreign population, was under consideration, I took occasion to express my opinion upon this native American question. Those opinions are before the public—I am willing to abide by them here and elsewhere.

I will not again obtrude them upon the convention in opposition to the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon, for which I do not believe a single member of the convention save himself will vote.

I rise, Mr. President, not to do myself an act of justice, as is often said in debate, but to discharge a duty I owe to those who sent me here. I am one of the delegates from a county which contains a greater catholic population than any county in the state. I represent the native born and the naturalized catholic. In the office I now fill, I enjoy their confidence, though a large majority of them are opposed to me on national politics. I should be unfaithful to my duty, and ungrateful to them, if I remain silent under the denunciations against them as citizens, dangerous to the institutions of their country. If I were to fail to deny in my place, the charge that they owed civil allegiance to the Pope of Rome—to deny that the Pope of Rome controlled, or could control their civil conduct, I would be unworthy their confidence. They owe him that respect and obedience only, as I have always believed, which is due from them as members of the catholic church, to one who, in church government, is acknowledged by them to be the temporal head of the church.

Mr. President, I was born and brought up in the first catholic settlement west of the Alleghany mountains. I have associated with them, priest and laity, from that time to this, and I must do them the justice to say, that I have witnessed in no portion of our population, more devotion to the true interests of our common country, a stronger allegiance and attachment to her laws and institutions than among the catholics, native and naturalized. As a whole, they are a law-loving and a law-abiding people.

I have seen them tried in political commotion, and when our country was engaged in war, their patriotism and love of liberty, bespoke them true-hearted American citizens.

With their religion, their faith, so unnecessarily introduced into this discussion, I have nothing to do. That is a subject which belongs to a higher tribunal; it is one between them and their God, and I thank my God this convention has nothing to do with it. We have, in this free government of ours, denounced all interference with the religious opinions of the citizen, and proclaimed the right of all to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience.

Mr. President, I have no false alarms upon the subject of the admission to the rights of citizens, those who have come to our shores, and elected to become citizens of our country. Their deportment in peace and war, give evidence of their attachment to free government. After the fugitive from oppression, aye sir, if you will have it, the fugitive from starvation in the old world, shall give evidences he is required to do under our naturalization laws, that he is of good character, has lived five years in the United States, I am willing to take him in to the American family, and permit him to enjoy with me the blessings of free government and equal political rights.

Mr. President, I said the other day, and now repeat the remark, here is not the forum to commence this work of ostracizing the foreign population. If the evil, present and future, be what the mover of this resolution has represented it to be, I would advise him to make his appeals to the congress of the United States. I would advise him to appeal to the State governments to change the federal constitution, and adopt his Chinese policy of total exclusion from this land of liberty and law the oppressed foreigner. Let him close the ports of the United States, and drive back the teeming millions of paupers which he says Europe is pouring into the United States. Kentucky has no control over this subject. As the constitution and laws now stand, a foreigner who has resided in the United States for five years has a right to become a citizen of the United States. Shall we deny to a citizen of the United States who has resided in Kentucky five years, or two years, the political rights which every other citizen enjoys, because of his birth? Let us act, Mr. President, consistently on this subject; let us rather take counsel from the past, and the wisdom of our fathers, than our fears—fears generated by partizan feeling.

So long as foreigners are permitted to come to the United States, my policy is—and it is the true policy of the country—after they have given evidence of their good character, and manifested a desire to become citizens, to admit them to the enjoyment of political as well as civil rights. They become attached to the country and government of their adoption. They feel and breathe the spirit of freemen, and will render more willing obedience to the laws of the country when they know they participate in the political power of their government.

I cannot look upon a mass of foreign population, denied for half a life time the privileges of citizens, but with serious apprehension for the quiet of society. They will not feel that regard and reverence for the laws and the rights of society, if denied the privileges of citizens, as when they are made to feel the majesty of American citizens.

The policy of the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis,) is to invite by the laws of the United States, the foreigner to land, but if he comes to Kentucky, to place him for twenty-one years, so far as political rights are concerned, beside the free negro. His policy would exclude every foreigner fit to be a citizen from Kentucky. He would drive from his state the enterprising and industrious, the honorable and high-minded, the wealthy and talented foreigner, and only permit the worthless vagabond, the man incapable of appreciating liberty, or the rights of a freeman. He would leave the good to settle in other states, and take the bad as Kentucky's portion. His policy would indeed give us the "off-scourings not only of Europe," but the rejected of other states. Against this policy, Mr. President, I protest. I desire the yeas and nays on the motion.

Mr. RUDD. The gentleman from Bourbon has again and again, in the course of his long speech, spoken of the political or temporal allegiance which he asserts the catholics of this and other countries owe to the Pope. Now, I deny that they acknowledge or owe this allegiance to him. It is untrue; it is entirely a mistake on the part of the gentleman; and if he had half as diligently sought from the proper sources correct information on this point, as he has studied the means to misrepresent the catholic religion, he would long since have learned his mistake. It is not the first time that this charge has been made against catholics and their religion, but whenever and wherever made, it has been denied and fully refuted.

The enemies of catholicism have been over and again challenged to bring forward one single proof or correct quotation from any of our doctrines, practices, actions, or standard writers, either controversial or dogmatic, to substantiate this charge. They never have, nor never can do it, because no such thing exists. But, on the contrary, proof without end—enough to fill volumes—such as no man in his senses can deny—has been adduced to show that the charge made by the gentleman is entirely groundless. If he seeks for correct information, I refer him to these works—the standard authors of our church—wherein the whole body of catholics acknowledge that the religious tenets which they profess are contained. But, the gentleman from Bourbon does not relish these authorities; they don't suit his purpose. His authorities are the writings of the bitterest enemies of catholicism, such as "Elliott on Romanism," "Dowling's History of Romanism," illustrated by engravings—pictures the most hideous—a book that was recently ushered into the world, as the gentleman will certainly recollect, by handbills, stuck up in every town, and at every public thoroughfare, wherein was printed in large capitals: "DOWLING'S EXPOSURE OF THE MYSTERIES OF ROMANISM." These are the works which the gentleman so pompously parades before this convention, to tell us what is catholicism. Let me ask him, would he go to a declared enemy to get a correct statement of his character or reputation? Would he abide by a history of his past life, coming from such a source, or would he not cry out injustice and persecution, if the world were to admit the truth of such evidence? Judge him accordingly, and refuse to hear any other testimony? And yet this is precisely the way the gentleman acts towards the catholic religion. He takes the evidence of her known enemies—of those who have sworn against her eternal hatred and ill-will. He reads their books, brings them into this convention, quotes them as authority, and turns with a holy horror from every work and every statement which gives a fair, candid, and truthful exposition of the doctrines and practices of the catholic church.

Mr. President, I would ask the gentleman if that is honorable and fair dealing? Is that the fulfilment of the great precept of the Bible—that Book which he has talked about so much in the course of his speech: "Do unto others as you would that they should do unto you?"

The gentleman has read from these books containing "the exposures of Romanism," extracts from councils, bulls of the Popes, and other catholic writers, to prove what he has said. I say these extracts are garbled, unfairly made, falsely colored, and do not give a correct version of the meaning and belief of the authors. On the same principle, I can take any book or document, and garble it so as to make it say the most absurd things.

I say, what we have heard from the gentleman is nothing more than a groundless tirade against catholicism, and does not originate in any well-founded danger, that the foreigners who are daily coming to our shores, will over run our country and subvert our institutions. Nearly one-third of the foreigners who come to the United States are protestants, not catholics. The catholics, as a political body, know what they are about, and do not suffer themselves to be led by any man, or body of men. The Pope has not half as much influence, politically speaking, over the catholics in the United States, as the gentleman has over his Native American brethren. No, not one-tenth part. I entertain a high regard for the gentleman, and I am sorry that he has wounded the feelings of some of the delegates by his remarks. It may be that he had no intention of doing so; at least I do not wish or intend to impeach his motives. But, when I heard the doctrines of my religion—that which I hold most sacred, misrepresented—that, too, under such august circumstances as are thrown around this body, assembled here to remodel the organic law of my country, I cannot help expressing my unfeigned regret that such an attack should have been made by a member of this convention—one whose name I have heretofore cherished. I say his speech will have the effect to array the protestant community against the catholic, and I should have thought that a man of his education and discernment would have seen that this must be the inevitable result. His speech is inflammatory in its tendency, and under certain circumstances would have the effect to arouse the worst feelings of perverse nature. Catholics have done much for this country, and I rather suspect that one of my blood connexions did more for it, or as much, as any other man in it, except perhaps in the heat of battle, and I cannot permit any reflections to be cast on the religion professed by such men, without speaking a word in its defence.

Mr. DAVIS. I endeavored to make a distinction between the catholic religion as it exists in this country and in Europe, and not between the catholic and the protestant religion. I did not know before I commenced my speech that there were more than two catholics in the house.

Mr. SPALDING. There are six.

Mr. DAVIS. There are six I understand. But I felt it my duty to express my views on the subject, and I deeply regret that any thing I have said has had the effect of hurting the feelings of any gentleman present.

Mr. RUDD. I am sorry the gentleman is not a catholic—a good catholic—for if I know him, and I think I do, he would be a better man than he is. I know he would be. He knows as much about catholicism as that boy, (pointing to one of the pages.) (Laughter.) His authorities are bad, and his quotations from catholic works are garbled and distorted—made to suit the prejudiced views of the enemies of catholicism. They do not contain a word of truth. The catholic church has produced such men, I mean among the Popes, for learning, piety, and intelligence, as the rest of the world has never equalled, and but few bad men—and very few. I will refer the gentleman to books and documents to prove what I say. What he has said is all false—all false.

Mr. DAVIS. I presume the gentleman does not mean to say I spoke falsely.

Mr. RUDD. No, I do not say that the gentleman has told a falsehood. But I say his quotations are false, his charges are false, and his authorities filled with falsehoods. If the gen-gentleman wishes to learn the truth with regard to the catholic faith, let him examine amongst other works: "The Decrees of the Council of Trent," Boswett's "Expositions," and others of his writings; Milner's "End of Controversy," &c., &c.

Mr. President, I will conclude by saying that I am sorry that the gentleman was not engaged in a better cause. Let the German and the Irish come, and receive them on our shores, and give them a christian reception, for they have done much for our country, and let religion stand on its own foundation. The catholic religion wants no props. It stands on the eternal word of God, and does exist, and will exist, to the consummation of the world, notwithstanding the gentleman's opposition and calumny.

Mr. CLARKE. I was necessarily absent during the speech of the gentleman from Bourbon. I have been advised by a friend that he desires to address the convention before the question is taken on the pending resolution. I know that gentlemen are anxious that the vote should be taken now. But, sir, I appeal to the convention—I appeal to their sense of right and justice, if, after indulgence at this late hour of our labors has been extended to the gentleman from Bourbon (Mr. Davis) to consume three hours in the delivery of a speech, after a preparation of months—a speech which strikes at the right of suffrage—a speech which inflames and harrows up the very worst feelings of the human heart, and arrays one portion of the citizens of our happy state against the other—I ask if it be not right and just that such a speech should be replied to? I have stated, sir, that I did not hear the speech of the gentleman from Bourbon; but if I have been correctly informed as to his positions and historical references, an honest vindication of the truth of history demands a refutation, for I know that part at least, if not all his history, and the deductions therefrom, are false.

Mr. President, in making this appeal, I cannot refrain from tendering to my much esteemed friend from Louisville, (Mr. Preston,) my sincere thanks, for his able and eloquent vindication of the rights of conscience, humanity, and the true spirit of republicanism.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I know the gentleman to whom he (Mr. Clarke) alludes. I therefore move to postpone the further consideration of this subject 'till 3 o'clock on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to, and then the convention adjourned.

MONDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LANCASTER.

DISTRIBUTION OF THE NEW CONSTITUTION.

On the motion of Mr. JAMES, it was

Resolved, That the printers to the convention print sixty thousand copies of the new, or amended constitution, for distribution among the people of the state; to be distributed to each county according to the number of qualified voters therein.

PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. TRIPLETT offered the following as an additional section to the general provisions:

"So long as the Board of Internal improvement shall be continued, the president thereof shall be elected by the qualified voters of this commonwealth; and hold the office for the term of four years, and until another be duly elected and qualified. The first election shall be held at the same time, and be conducted in the same manner, as the first election of governor of this commonwealth under this constitution, and every four years thereafter; and the general assembly shall provide by law, the method of filling vacancies and settling contested elections for this office. But nothing herein contained, shall prevent the general assembly from abolishing said board of internal improvement, and the office of president thereof."

Mr. GHOLSON moved the following as a substitute for the section:

"The board of internal improvement is hereby abolished, and its duties devolved upon the auditor's office."

Mr. TURNER moved to lay both the section and the substitute on the table.

Mr. TRIPLETT called for the yeas and nays, and they were yeas 23, nays 66.

NAYS—Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, William C. Bullitt, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Thomas J. Hood, Thos. James, William Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, Thomas P. Moore, James M. Nesbitt, Hugh Newell, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Philip Triplett, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson—66.

So the convention refused to lay upon the table.

The question was then taken on the substitute, and it was rejected.

Some conversation arose on this section in which Messrs. TRIPLETT, TURNER, and GHOLSON took part.

Mr. BARLOW moved the previous question and the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. TRIPLETT called for the yeas and nays and they were, yeas 56, nays 34.

YEAS—Alfred Boyd, Wm. Bradley, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Lucius Desha, Chas-teen T. So the section was adopted.

ENGROSSMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

On the motion of Mr. APPERSON the vote on Saturday last adopting a resolution directing two copies of the new constitution to be en-grossed, one of them on parchment, was re-considered, and so much as related to the en-grossment on parchment was stricken out in con-sequence of a difficulty experienced in procur-ing parchment of a good quality. With that amendment the resolution was again adopted.

EXPENSES OF A CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARDIN from the committee on claims made the following report:

The committee on claims to whom was refer-red a resolution to inquire into the expediency of providing for the payment of the expenses of the contested election from Henry county, re-port:

That your committee is of opinion that this commonwealth is bound, in justice, to indemnify Elijah F. Nuttall in all reasonable expenses incurred by him in said contest, but the com-mittee is opposed to the expenses and cost of Joseph Lecompte, being reimbursed to him by the state. Therefore,

Resolved by the Convention, That the follow-ing sums of money, not otherwise appropriated be paid out of the public treasury to the follow-ing persons entitled to the same, who attended as witnesses on behalf of said Nuttall, viz:

1st. To Samuel Eddy, Charles Allen, John Roberts, F. Roberts, Uriah Edwards, A. W. Pritchett, James Johnson, M. Luckett, Wm. Har-ris, John Shryock, James Hawkins, Gideon King, B. F. Owen, Thos. L. Martin, S. T. Drane, Ed. Ransdale, J. C. Shephard, John Radford, T. J. Bruce, R. Shockeney, Richard Neale, Thos. B. Posey, James Pearce and Thos. Han-cock, three dollars each.

2d. To Ed. P. Thomas, for bringing up the poll book, under a subpoena duces tecum, three dollars and fifty cents.

3d. To Henry Wingate, ten dollars to be paid to the Baptist church for the use of their bell during the present session.

4th. To Perry Ellis, three dollars and twenty five cents for summoning witnesses in said con-tested election.

After a few words from Mr. CHAMBERS in opposition to the appropriation of money by the convention, the report was adopted.

NIGHT SESSIONS.

On the motion of Mr. DUNAVAN, it was Resolved, That the convention will henceforth hold night sessions, meeting for that purpose at 7 o'clock, P. M.

APPORTIONMENT.

Mr. GARRARD submitted the following sec-tion as an addition to the report of the commit-tee on the legislative department, and on his mo-tion it was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

"Sec. — An enumeration of all the qualified voters shall be made, first in the year 1850, and again in the year 1857, and every eighth year thereafter. The number of representatives shall be one hundred, and they shall be apportioned at the first session of the general assembly after each enumeration, among the several counties, cities, and towns, in proportion to the number of qualified voters therein: Provided, Two or more adjacent counties may be joined to form a representative district; but in no event shall a representative district have more members than another district with a greater number of qual-ified voters; nor shall any county with a less number of qualified voters than another have a member."

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

On motion of Mr. WHEELER it was

Resolved, That no person shall be allowed to speak more than ten minutes upon any subject during the sitting of this convention, except on the naturalization question and the report of the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention resumed the consideration of the unfinished report of the committee on the legislative department.

The pending question was the additional sec-tion offered on Saturday by Mr. DAVIS, as fol-lows:

"That the representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be for-ever regulated and ascertained by the number of representative inhabitants therein. At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, and every four years thereafter, provision shall be made by law that in the year ———, and every four years thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative inhabitants of the state shall be made. The number of representatives shall be one hundred, and apportioned among the several counties in the following manner: Counties having the ratio shall have one representative; those having three fourths of the ratio shall have one representative; those having the ratio, and a fraction less than one half the ratio over, shall have but one representative; those having the ratio, and a fraction of one half over, shall have two representatives; those having twice the ratio, shall have two representatives; those having twice the ratio, and a fraction of less than one half the ratio over, shall have but two representatives; those having twice the ratio, and a fraction of one half the ratio over, shall have three representatives; and so on. Counties having less than three fourths of the ratio, shall be joined to a similar adjacent county, for the purpose of forming a representative district: Provided, that if there be no such adjacent county, then the county having less than three fourths of the ratio shall be united with that adjacent county having the smallest number of representative inhabitants, provided that their united numbers do not exceed the ratio, and a fraction of one half the ratio over; but if they do, the county having less than three fourths of the ratio shall have a separate representative. The remaining representatives, (if any,) shall be allotted to those counties having the largest unrepresented fractions; but in no case shall more than two counties be united for the purpose of forming a representative district; but if there shall ever be an excess of districts, they shall be reduced to the proper number, by taking from those counties having a separate representative, with the smallest number of representative inhabitants, their separate representation."

Mr. KAVANAUGH offered the following as a substitute for the section:

"The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation as aforesaid, the state shall be districted into twelve districts."

First District—Fulton, Hickman, Graves, Ballard, McCracken, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston.

Third District—Davies, Ohio, Hancock, Grayson, Breckinridge, Larnie, Hardin, Meade.

Fourth District—Todd, Muhlenburg, Logan, Simpson, Allen, Warren, Butler, Edmonson, Hart.

Fifth District—Monroe, Barren, Cumberland, Clinton, Adair, Green, Taylor, Casey, Russell.

Sixth District—Jefferson, Bullitt, Nelson, Shelby, Spencer, Washington, Marion.

Seventh District—Oldham, Trimble, Henry, Owen, Carroll, Gallatin, Grant, Boone, Kenton.

Eighth District—Scott, Harrison, Pendleton, Campbell, Nicholas, Mason, Bracken.

Clarke, Jessamine, Anderson, Mercer, Boyle, Franklin.

Eleventh District—Madison, Garrard, Lincoln, Rockcastle, Laurel, Pulaski, Whitley, Wayne.

Twelfth District—Estill, Owsley, Clay, Perry, Letcher, Floyd, Breathitt, Johnson, Pike, Knox, Harlan.

When a new county shall be formed of territory belonging to more than one district, that county shall be added to, and form a part of the district out of which the largest amount of territory was taken to form such new county.

In the year ———, and every ——— year thereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified electors of the state shall be made, in such manner as shall be directed by law.

In the several years of making such enumeration, each district shall be entitled to representatives equal to the number of times the ratio is contained in the whole number of qualified electors in said districts: Provided, That the remaining representatives, after making such apportionment, shall be given to those districts having the largest unrepresented fractions.

Representatives to which each district may be entitled shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, and towns of the district, as near as may be, in proportion to the number of qualified electors; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified electors to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjacent county or counties, within the district, may not have a residuum or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representation, it shall then be in the power of the legislature to join two or more together, for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining, and in the same district, which have residuums over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio, in that case, one representative shall be added to the county having the largest residuum."

Mr. KAVANAUGH explained wherein this amendment differed from others which had been submitted.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL, Mr. APPERSON, Mr. BRADLEY, Mr. IRWIN, and Mr. BROWN, participated in a brief conversation in relation to it.

Mr. BROWN moved to amend by transferring Hardin from the third to the fourth district.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. JAMES called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the substitute, and there were yeas 31, nays 57.

YEAS—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Beverly L. Clarke, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Benj. F. Edwards, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, Wm. Hendrix, Thomas James, George W. Kavanaugh, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Martin P. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Thos. Rockhold, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, John L. Waller, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe—31.

person, John L. Ballinger, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, Wm. Chennault, James M. Chrisman, Jesse Coffey, William Cowper, Garrett Davis, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Jas. H. Garrard, Thos. J. Gough, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, William Johnson, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thos. W. Lisle, Alexander K. Marshall, Wm. C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Nathan McClure, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, James M. Nesbitt, Jonathan Newcum, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, John T. Rogers, Jas. Rudd, Jas. W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, Wm. R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Squire Turner, Henry Washington, Andrew S. White, Wesley J. Wright—57.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. GARRARD offered the following as a substitute for the section proposed by Mr. DAVIS:

"Sec. — An enumeration of all the qualified voters shall be made, first in the year 1850, and again in the year 1857, and every eighth year thereafter. The number of representatives shall be one hundred, and they shall be apportioned at the first session of the general assembly after each enumeration, among the several counties, cities, and towns, in proportion to the number of qualified voters therein: Provided, Two or more adjacent counties may be joined to form a representative district; but in no event shall a representative district have more members than another district with a greater number of qualified voters; nor shall any county with a less number of qualified voters than another have a member: Provided, That two or more counties shall not be attached, except to form a single representative district, or from the necessity of their location."

Mr. MORRIS moved to lay the pending subject on the table with the view of offering a resolution to test the sense of the convention on the question of "districts or no districts."

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. PROCTOR called for the yeas and nays on the substitute of the gentleman from Clay, and there were yeas 42, nays 46.

YEAS—Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Jas. Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Milford Elliott, Selucius Garfiede, James H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, George W. Kavanaugh, Thomas W. Lisle, William C. Marshall, John H. McHenry, Jonathan Newcum, William Preston, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, James Rudd, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—42.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, William C. Bullitt, Chas. Chambers, William Chennault, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Cope-lin, Wm. Cowper, Lucius Desha, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, William Hendrix, Thomas James, William Johnson, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, Thos. P. Moore, John D. Morris, James M. Nesbitt, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, John T. Robinson, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, Squire Turner, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe—46.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL offered the following substitute for Mr. DAVIS' section:

"The number of representatives shall be one hundred. In the year ——— and every ——— year thereafter an enumeration of all the electors in the state shall be made in such manner as shall be decided by law. The representatives shall in the several years of making these enumerations, be apportioned for the ——— years next following, as near as may be, among the several counties, cities, and towns, in proportion to the number of qualified electors; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified electors to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjacent county, or counties, may not have a residuum, or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representative, it shall then be in the power of the legislature to join two or more together for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining, each of which has a residuum over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio, in that case, one representative shall be added to that county having the largest residuum: Provided further, That a separate representative shall in no instance be given to a county having a less number of qualified voters than another county not separately represented, unless a residuum, or residuums, from a county or counties, immediately adjoining to it, sufficient to make up the ratio, be added; nor shall any county have two or more representatives when another county with a greater number of qualified voters has a less number of representatives, unless the first named county shall receive from the county, or counties, immediately adjoining it a residuum, or residuums, which, when added to the qualified voters of said county, shall entitle it under the ratio to the number of representatives given: Provided further, That the following rules and restrictions shall be observed by and control the legislature in apportioning representation:

1. The principle of adjacency shall be so as to prevent the rolling of a residuum from one county to another not in juxtaposition.

2. Where two or more small counties adjoin a large county having a sufficient residuum, that residuum shall be divided so as to give a separate representation to each of the small counties unless the residuum be greater than the number of qualified voters in either of the small counties, in which event two of the small counties may be joined as a representative district, and its excess, if any, bestowed on the larger county.

3. When a residuum is to be given to one of several counties, it shall be bestowed on that having the largest number of qualified voters.

Mr. STEVENSON called for the yeas and nays, and there were yeas 34, nays 57.

YEAS—Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, Francis M. Bristow, Thos. D. Brown, William Chenault, Edward Curd, Milford Elliott, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Vincent S. Hay, James W. Irwin, George W. Kavanaugh, Willis B. Machen, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, Wm. N. Marshall, Nathan McClure, John H. McHenry, Wm. D. Mitchell, James M. Nesbitt, Elijah F. Nuttall, Johnson Price, Thos. Rockhold, John T. Rogers, James Rudd, Michael L. Stoner, John D. Taylor, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, Charles A. Wickliffe—34.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, Wm. Bradley, Luther Brawner, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, Jas. S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benj. Copelin, William Cowper, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, Jas. Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaiher, Selucius Garfield, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, Thomas James, W. Johnson, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas W. Lisle, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, David Meriwether, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Henry B. Pollard, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Albert G. Talbott, William R. Thompson, Philip Triplett, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—57.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. CHAMBERS moved to amend the amendment of Mr. DAVIS by adding thereto the following:

"In apportioning representation among the several counties in this commonwealth, every county which is not entitled to a separate representative shall be attached to that adjoining county which contains the least voting population; and counties thus attached shall vote in conjunction for representative or representatives. The full ratios shall be first filled, and the remaining representatives, (if any,) shall be given to the counties or attached counties, having the largest residuums: Provided, That not more than three counties shall in any case be attached for electing a representative; and where the residuums of any two counties thus attached shall obtain an additional representative each county shall have one, and vote separately."

Mr. McCURE offered the following as a substitute for Mr. DAVIS' amendment:

"In the year , and every eighth year hereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified voters of the state shall be made in such manner as shall be directed by law. The number of representatives shall, in the several years of making these enumerations, be so fixed as not to be less than seventy five nor more than one hundred, and they shall be apportioned for the eighth year next following as near as may be among the several counties and towns in proportion to the number of qualified electors; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified electors to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjoining county or counties may not have residuum or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representation, it shall be in the power of the general assembly to join two or more together, for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining which have residuums over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio, in that case one representative shall be added to that county having the largest residuum; and residuums shall not be carried beyond the counties adjoining the county in which the residuum shall originate."

Mr. McCURE called for the yeas and nays, and they were—yeas 22, nays 64.

YEAS—Richard Apperson, William K. Bowling, Francis M. Bristow, Garrett Davis, James Dudley, Ninian E. Gray, Andrew Hood, Jas. W. Irwin, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Nathan McClure, John H. McHenry, Johnson Price, Thos. Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor—22.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Thomas D. Brown, Wm. C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaiher, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, Wm. Hendrix, Thos. J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, Thos. James, William Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, George W. Mansfield, William C. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, David Meriwether, John D. Morris, James M. Nesbitt, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Henry B. Pollard, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Ira Root, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Wm. R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Chas. A. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson—64.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. THOMPSON offered the following as a substitute:

"An enumeration of the qualified voters, and an apportionment of the representatives in the general assembly shall be made in the year , and within every subsequent term of eight years. The number of representatives shall, at the first session of the general assembly after each enumeration aforesaid, be apportioned among the several counties, cities, and towns, according to the number of qualified voters in each, and the number of representatives shall be one hundred: Provided, That any county having two thirds of the ratio shall be entitled to one member."

The substitute was rejected.

Mr. BARLOW submitted the following as a substitute, which was Mr. WOODSON'S proposition slightly modified.

"At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, provision shall be made by law, that in the year , and in the year , and every years thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative population of the state shall be made. The House of Representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation, the state is hereby laid off into ten districts.

The first district shall be composed of the counties of Fulton, Hickman, Ballard, McCracken, Graves, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston, Crittenden, Union, Hopkins, Caldwell and Trigg.

The second district shall be composed of the counties of Christian, Muhlenburg, Henderson, Daviess, Hancock, Ohio, Breckinridge, Meade, Grayson, Butler, and Edmonson.

The third district shall be composed of the counties of Todd, Logan, Simpson, Warren, Allen, Monroe, Barren, and Hart.

The fourth district shall be composed of the counties of Cumberland, Adair, Green, Taylor, Clinton, Russell, Wayne, Pulaski, Casey, Boyle, and Lincoln.

The fifth district shall be composed of the counties of Hardin, Larue, Bullitt, Spencer, Nelson, Washington, Marion, Mercer, and Anderson.

The sixth district shall be composed of the counties of Garrard, Madison, Estill, Owsley, Rockcastle, Laurel, Clay, Whitley, Knox, Harlan, Perry, Letcher, Pike, Floyd and Johnson.

The seventh district shall be composed of the counties of Jefferson, Oldham, Trimble, Carroll, Henry, and Shelby, and the city of Louisville.

The eighth district shall be composed of the counties of Bourbon, Fayette, Scott, Owen, Franklin, Woodford, and Jessamine.

The ninth district shall be composed of the counties of Clarke, Montgomery, Bath, Fleming, Lewis, Greenup, Carter, Lawrence, Morgan, and Breathitt.

The tenth district shall be composed of the counties of Mason, Bracken, Nicholas, Harrison, Pendleton, Campbell, Grant, Kenton, Boone, and Gallatin.

The number of representatives shall, at the several sessions of the general assembly, next after the making of these enumerations, be apportioned among the ten several districts, proportioned according to the respective representative population of each; and the representatives shall be apportioned, as near as may be, among the counties, towns and cities in each district; and in making such apportionment the following rules shall govern to-wit: Every county, town or city having the ratio, shall have one representative; if double the ratio, two representatives, and so on. Next, the counties, towns or cities having one or more representatives, and the largest representative population above the ratio, and counties, towns, and cities having the largest representative population under the ratio, shall have a representative, regard being always had to the greatest representative population: Provided, That when a county may not have a sufficient number of representative population to entitle it to one representative, then such county may be joined to some adjacent county or counties to send one representative. When a new county shall be formed of territory belonging to more than one district, it shall form a part of that district having the least number of representative population."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE called for the yeas and nays, and there were, yeas 52, nays 37.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, Wm. Bradley, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, James H. Garrard, James P. Hamilton, William Hendrix, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas W. Lisle, Geo. W. Mansfield, William N. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, Thomas P. Moore, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thos. Rockhold, Ira Root, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, John D. Taylor, Howard Todd, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson—52.

NAYS—Richard Apperson, William K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Charles Chambers, Garrett Davis, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Milford Elliott, Selucius Garfield, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, James M. Lackey, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, John H. McHenry, John D. Morris, James M. Nesbitt, Johnson Price, John T. Rogers, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, Henry Washington, Wesley J. Wright—37.

So the convention substituted Mr. WOODSON'S for Mr. DAVIS' proposition.

On the motion of Mr. WOODSON, the blanks were filled with "1850," and "1857, and every eight years thereafter."

The section was then agreed to as a part of the report on the legislative department.

Mr. JAMES offered the following as an additional section:

"The general assembly shall have no power to pass any act or resolution for the appropriation of money, or creating any debt against the state, or for the payment of money in any way whatever: Provided, The debt created, or money appropriated, may exceed one hundred dollars, unless the act or resolution creating the debt or appropriating the money, shall be voted for upon its formal passage by a majority of all the members then elected to each branch of the general assembly; said vote to be taken by the yeas and nays, which shall be entered upon the journals of each house."

I feel satisfied if this is adopted, the convention could not throw around the treasury a better guard. There is a similar provision in the New York constitution, and in that of Wisconsin. And the executive of Indiana, in recommending the call of a convention of that state, very strongly recommended the insertion of such a provision in their constitution. We know that the legislature have frequently, on the eve of final adjournment, when there was scarcely a quorum present, passed bills making large appropriations by a minority. And I take the ground, if the claim is just, it can get a majority of each branch of the legislature; and if not, it ought not to pass. If my proposition is adopted, it will prevent the representatives of the people from putting their hands into the treasury without proper authority and due reflection. For, when one legislature creates a debt, another has to make up the deficiency. And how is it done? It is done by taxation. I do not object to allowing just claims, but the people want to know who they are that vote for them. I have no doubt that every gentleman, when he votes for a claim, will be able to satisfy his constituents as to the reasons that induced him to do it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope the section will be adopted. I do not think, as the gentleman has said, that the convention could throw a stronger guard around the treasury. It is true we have restricted the legislature in their power to contract debts; but I consider that no restriction in relation to an appropriation of money. They can at one session of the legislature, as I conceive, make an appropriation exceeding the amount of the revenue $1,000,000. If the amendment is adopted, the people will know who has voted for these appropriations. If you will turn back to the history of Kentucky, you will find that in 1837, the legislature passed a law creating the office of chief engineer of this state, with a salary of $4000, which is $1500 more than the salary of the governor. In 1839-40, this salary was reduced to $2500; at the same time there were a number of assistant engineers, who received a salary of $3000. I do trust the convention will adopt the section. Then, if in after times, such an office should be created, we shall know the names of those who voted for it.

Mr. JAMES called for the yeas and nays, and they were—yeas 62, nays 28.

YEAS—John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Chas-teen T. Dunavan, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholston, Thos. J. Gough, Jas. P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Thomas James, Wm. Johnson, Geo. W. Kavanaugh, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thos. W. Lisle, Willis B. ard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, Thomas P. Moore, James M. Nesbitt, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, Jas. W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe, Wesley J. Wright—62.

So the section was adopted.

Mr. PRESTON moved the previous question on the adoption of the report of the committee on the legislative department, as amended.

The main question was ordered to be now put, and the report was adopted.

The convention then took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

ENUMERATION OF VOTERS.

On the motion of Mr. MERIWETHER it was Resolved, That the second auditor be directed to cause the commissioners of revenue for the year 1850, to take in and return to his office the number of legal voters in their respective counties.

NATIVE AMERICANISM.

The convention resumed the consideration of Mr. DAVIS' resolution, on which the debate was postponed from Saturday night to the evening session this day.

Mr. SPALDING. When canvassing for the seat I have the honor to occupy in this convention, I told my constituents that I expected to be a silent member, and up to the present time I have been so, not having attempted to address it before. I promised them that I would cast my votes with as much propriety and justice as the most talented and learned orator in the body. So far I have redeemed my pledge. And, had it not been for the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon, and the manner in which he spoke on the subject of it, I would not have troubled the house now. I shall not detain the convention long, for I have but little to say, and speaking is not my forte, having been more accustomed to handle the plough. I am aware of the heavy metal before me—a gentleman who is learned, and one of the best and most skilful debaters in this country, whose experience as well in the councils of this state as in those of the nation, have been great—and therefore I stand no chance of competing with him in those respects. I shall, however, express myself in a plain and simple manner, so that every gentleman will comprehend my remarks.

The resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon proposes, if I understand it, that persons coming from Europe to this country to settle shall not be entitled to the right of suffrage until they shall have been here twenty-one years from the time of declaring their intention to become citizens. I object to the gentleman's proposition and cannot give it my support. I regard this happy land as an asylum and refuge for the oppressed of all nations. We have plenty of room for millions and millions of people. If we receive, as we ought, in my opinion, those who come to our shores, without exacting this long probation from them, many of whom bring money with them, we shall be increasing the wealth of the country, and at the same time putting money into the treasury. Whilst the gentleman from Bourbon and myself are citizens of Kentucky by the accident of birth, there are thousands who come here from choice, their object being to seek a permanent residence in the "land of the free and the home of the brave." Why is it, when we have an almost boundless country, with a territory extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean, we should refuse to afford them a home amongst us unless they comply with the harsh requirements set forth in the resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon. Is the gentleman afraid that these foreigners will overrun the country? I cannot attempt to notice all the apprehensions, misgivings, and objections expressed and entertained by him, more particularly in relation to the Roman catholic immigrants from Europe. He seems to be seriously alarmed indeed. And why? Because he is afraid they will subvert the government, as they, he says, owe allegiance to the Pope of Rome. Now, this is a fact which I deny, and I will, in support of the position I assume, avail myself of this occasion to read some authorities on the subject. I will read an extract from a speech of the late Judge Gaston, delivered in the convention of North Carolina, called to amend the constitution of that state, and held in 1835:

"Oppressors in all ages and in all countries, set up pretences for oppression, and among the excuses under which the exclusion of Irish catholics from a share of political power was sought to be justified, the calumnies that catholics own a foreign allegiance and admit a dispensing power from oaths, were most impudently insisted on. The late Mr. Pitt, as prime Minister of England, contemplating an act of justice to these abused men, solemnly proposed a set of interrogatories to these charges to several of the most celebrated catholic Theological Universities in Europe. Suffer me to call your attention to some of these, and to their answers. The following questions were proposed: First, has the Pope, or have the Cardinals, or any body of men, or has any individual of the church of Rome, any civil authority, power, jurisdiction or pre-eminence whatever, within the realm of England. Second, Can the Pope, or Cardinals, or any body of men, or any individual of the church of Rome, absolve or dispense his Majesty's subjects from their oath of allegiance, upon any pretence whatever? Third, Is there any principle in the tenets of the catholic faith, by which catholics are justified in not keeping faith with heretics, or other persons differing from them in religious opinions, in any transactions either of a public or private nature? To these questions the Universities of Paris, Louvain, Alcala, Salamanca and Valladolid, after expressing their astonishment that it could be thought necessary at the close of the 18th century, and in a country so enlightened as England, to propose such enquiries, severally and unanimously answered: 1st. That the Pope, or Cardinals, or any body of men, or any individual of the church of Rome, has not and have not any civil authority, power, jurisdiction or pre-eminence whatever within the realm of England. 2dly. That the Pope, or Cardinals, or any body of men, or any individual of the church of Rome, cannot absolve or dispense his Majesty's subjects from their oath of allegiance upon any pretext whatsoever; and 3dly. That there is no principle in the tenets of the catholic faith, by which catholics are justified in not keeping faith with heretics, or other persons differing from them in religious opinions, in transactions either of a public or a private nature."

I think this is conclusive evidence against the gentleman's declaration that we owe civil allegiance to the Pope of Rome. Where, I would ask, did the gentleman get his authority? He obtained it, I suppose, from some protestant controversial work. I have nothing to say against the protestants, but I wish equal rights and privileges to be extended to all. And I did not feel authorized, as I represented, in part, a country which has a considerable number of catholics in it, to sit here and hear their tenets misrepresented, abused, and vilified as they were by the quotations which the gentleman has read in support of his argument. With regard to publications in the newspapers in relation to the controversies between the catholics and protestants, I have been used to them all my life. Let the two squabble and quarrel as they may, for then there is less danger of uniting church and state. And I would not care if they wrangled even more than they now do. I believe the gentleman said he would rather have the Mormons here, and he compared—

Mr. DAVIS (interrupting.) I did not compare the Mormons with the Catholics. I said if the Mormons were disposed to settle here, as many of them were foreigners, I should be in favor of excluding them.

Mr. SPALDING. Well, it is pretty near comparing us with them. I owe no allegiance to any man, or set of men, under heaven, save the commonwealth of Kentucky, and to the government of the United States, only in so far as this state has delegated, or given up some of her powers to it. I owe no allegiance to the Pope of Rome, or to the cardinals, bishops, or priests; and they have no right to send any persons here to cut our throats. The Pope has no more authority to alter or change the principles of the church of Rome than has the president to alter the constitution of the United States. If he dared to do it, he might be called to account by me or any body else belonging to the church. The gentleman quoted from Washington, and I do not recollect all his quotations, there were so many of them, probably he has been preparing for months, perhaps for years, and I don't know but all his life. I, however, shall make another extract from Judge Gaston's speech:

"Sir, although this alliance of religion and the civil power did not take place for many centuries after christianity was first promulgated to the world, it became at length so general, that when the American colonies were settled, there was no country in Europe which had not its established church. In the train of this establishment, followed all the usual consequences of intolerance and persecution. He who did not believe according to law, was punished as a disloyal subject. Degraded, fined, imprisoned, plundered and proscribed at home, because of the exercise of man's noblest prerogative, the right to worship God according to the dictates of his conscience, different sects of European christians fled from this detested tyranny to the Western side of the Atlantic. And here it was that religion was emancipated from her thralldom to princes and rulers, and the principle of freedom of conscience adopted as a political axiom, and placed at the very foundation of civil institutions. Sir, the honor, the immortal honor of being the first to assert this noble truth, belongs to the illustrious founders of the catholic colony of Maryland. Every friend of freedom throughout the world owes a large debt of gratitude to these benefactors of the human race. Let me avail myself of the occasion to lay before the committee some notices of them and of their doings, well worthy to be remembered, and which I have taken chiefly from a highly respectable work, "Bancroft's history of the United States." The research, love of truth and ability, by which this work is characterized, render it an authority on all matters of our early history, and on this subject especially, there is nothing to fear from any prejudice or partiality of the author.

"At the head of the founders of Maryland was George Calvert, Lord Baltimore. He was a gentleman of high character, talents and accomplishments, who, from the purest motives, had embraced the principles of the roman catholic faith. He made an open profession of his conversion, and was consequently obliged to surrender the high office which he held as one of the two Secretaries of state to James the first. While secretary, he had obtained a patent for the southern promontory of Newfoundland, and had expended much money in a fruitless attempt to settle its rugged and sterile shores. He afterwards obtained a patent for a tract of country north of the Potomac, then uninhabited, except by scattered hordes of Indians. The patent was drawn up according to his suggestions, although it was finally issued after his death in favor of his son, Cecil Calvert. In this fundamental charter of the colony of Maryland were to be found the most admirable provisions for civil and religious freedom. "Unlike any patent which had hitherto passed the great seal of England, it secured to the emigrant an independent share in the legislation of the province, of which the statutes were to be established with the advice and approbation of the majority of the freemen or their deputies." Sir George Calvert, "far from guarding his territory against any but those of his persuasion, as he had taken from himself and his successors all arbitrary power, by establishing the legislative franchises of the people, so he took from them the means, of being intolerant in religion, by securing to all present and future liege people of the English King, without distinction of sect or party, free leave to transport themselves and their families to Maryland. Christianity was by the charter made the law of the land, but no preference was given to any sect, and equality in religious rights, not less than in civil freedom, was assured." [1 Bancroft's History, 260.] "Calvert deserves to be ranked among the most wise and benevolent law-givers of all ages. He was the first in the history of the christian world to seek for religious security and peace by the practice of justice; to plan the establishment of popular institutions with the enjoyment of liberty of conscience; to advance the career of civilization by recognizing the rightful equality of all christian sects. The asylum of papist was the spot, where in a remote corner of the world, on the banks of rivers which had been as yet unexplored, the mild forbearance of a proprietary adopted religious freedom as the basis of the state." [Ditto, 262.] "Memorable was the character of the Maryland institutions. Every other country had persecuting laws." "I will not," (such was the oath of the governor of Maryland,) "I will not by myself, or any other, directly or indirectly trouble, molest, or discountenance any person professing to believe in Jesus Christ, for or in respect of religion." "Under the mild institutions and munificence of Baltimore, the dreary wilderness soon bloomed with the swarming life and activity of prosperous settlements; the roman catholics oppressed by the laws of England, were sure to find a peaceful asylum in the quiet harbors of the Chesapeake; and there, too, protestants were sheltered against protestant intolerance." [Do. 266.] Yes, sir, while the puritans persecuted the Episcopalians in New England, and the Episcopalians persecuted the Puritans in Virginia, the oppressed of every Province found freedom and security in Maryland. "The disfranchised friends of prelacy from Massachusetts, and the puritans from Virginia, were welcome to an equality of political rights in the Roman catholic province of Maryland" [Ditto, 277.] The early history of Maryland is one on which the eye delights to dwell; it is the history of benevolence, gratitude and toleration. The biographer of Baltimore could with truth assert, "that his government, in conformity with his strict and repeated injunctions had never given disturbance to any person in Maryland, for matters of religion; that the colonists enjoyed freedom of conscience not less than freedom of person and estate, as amply as ever did any people in any place of the world." [Ditto, 277.] There was one attempt, a most ungrateful attempt, to mar the scene of harmony and moral beauty, and, for a short time, it unfortunately succeeded. After the dissolution in England of the long parliament, and the assumption of all power by the lord protector Cromwell, some of his followers in this country seized the government of Maryland, and administered the affairs of the province by a board of commissioners. The result is thus described by the Historian:—"Intolerance followed upon this arrangement; for parties in Maryland had become identified with religious sects. The puritans, ever the friends to popular liberty, hostile to a monarchy, and equally so to a hereditary proprietary, contended earnestly for civil liberty; but had neither the gratitude to respect the rights of the government by which they had been received and fostered, nor magnanimity to continue the toleration to which alone they were indebted for their continuance in the colony. A new assembly convened at Patuxent, acknowledged the authority of Cromwell, but it also exasperated the whole Romish party by their wanton disfranchisement. An act concerning religion confirmed the freedom of conscience, provided the liberty were not extended to popery, prelacy, or licentiousness of opinion." (Pretty extensive exceptions!) "Yet Cromwell, remote from the scene of strife, was not betrayed by his religious prejudices into an approbation of the ungrateful decree. He commanded the commissioners not to busy themselves about religion, but to settle the civil government." Ditto, 281.

I think Oliver Cromwell was right in saying they should attend to the civil government and let religion alone. Here we see our forefathers fled from the oppressions and intolerance of Europe in regard to religion, and came to the new world—our puritanical forefathers, who were protestants. And how long had they been here themselves, before they raised the standard of persecution against the Episcopalians and the Quakers, and banished Roger Williams, one of the best men the world ever produced, from the face of civil society into the savage world, where he planted the colony of Rhode Island, and established in it free principles?

Now, I do not bring up this thing of protestant intolerance for the purpose of giving any offence to any one here, however humble he may be. But, I merely mention it to prove that neither party can be trusted. The trouble in England began with the church and state united. But the gentleman need not tell me that the catholics were the first to practice intolerance; for I have shown here that that is not the fact. As to the tenets of the catholics, it is not my purpose to expound them. I was reared a catholic, and I am as firm as the rock of ages in that faith; but I do not practice it as I ought to do, and more the shame for me. The gentleman quoted a little from Washington, and I will also do so; his language being contained in the following extracts from Judge Gaston's speech:

"But it has been objected, that the catholic religion is unfavorable to freedom—nay, even incompatible with republican institutions. Ingenious speculation on such matters are worth little, and prove still less. Let me ask who obtained the great charter of English freedom, but the catholic prelates, and Barons, at Runnymede? The oldest—the purest democracy on earth, is the little catholic republic of St. Marino, not a day's journey from Rome. It has existed now for fourteen hundred years, and is so jealous of arbitrary power, that the executive authority is divided between two governors, who are elected every three months. Was William Tell, the founder of Swiss liberty, a royalist? Are the catholics of the swiss cantons in love with tyranny? Are the Irish catholics friends to passive obedience and non-resistance? Was Lafayette, Pulaski, or Kosciuszko, a foe to civil freedom? Was Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, unwilling to jeopard fortune in the cause of liberty? Let me give you, however, the testimony of George Washington. On his accession to the Presidency, he was addressed by the American catholics, who, adverting to the restrictions on their worship, then existing in some of the states, express themselves thus: "The prospect of national prosperity is peculiarly pleasing to us on another account; because, while our country preserves her freedom and independence, we shall have a well-founded title to claim from her justice the equal rights of citizenship, as the price of our blood spilt under your eye, and of our common exertions for her defence, under your auspicious conduct." This great man, who was utterly incapable of flattery and deceit, utters in answer the following sentiments, which I give in his own words: "As mankind become more liberal, they will be more apt to allow that all those who conduct themselves as worthy members of the community, are equally entitled to the protection of civil government. I hope ever to see America among the foremost nations in examples of justice and liberality: and I presume that your fellow-citizens will not forget the patriotic part which you took in the accomplishment of their revolution and the establishment of their government, or the important assistance which they received from a nation in which the Roman catholic faith is professed." By the bye, sir, I would pause for a moment to call the attention of this committee to some of the names subscribed to this address. Among them are those of John Carroll, the first Roman catholic bishop in the United States, Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, and Thomas Fitzsimmons. For the character of these distinguished men, if they needed vouchers, I would confidently call on the venerable president of this convention. Bishop Carroll was one of the best of men and most humble and devout of christians. I shall never forget a tribute to his memory paid by the good and venerable protestant bishop White, when contrasting the piety with which the christian Carroll met death, with the cold trifling that characterized the last moments of the sceptical David Hume. I knew not whether the tribute was more honorable to the piety of the dead, or to the charity of the living prelate. Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, the last survivor of the signers of American Independence—at whose death both houses of the legislature of North Carolina unanimously testified their grief, as at a national bereavement! Thomas Fitzsimmons, one of the illustrious convention that framed the constitution of United States, and for several years the representative in congress of the city of Philadelphia. Were these, and such as these, foes to freedom and unfit for republicans? Would it be dangerous to permit such men to be sheriffs or constables in the land? Read the funeral eulogium of Charles Carroll, delivered at Rome by bishop England—one of the greatest ornaments of the American catholic church; a foreigner indeed by birth, but an American by adoption, and who, on becoming an American, solemnly abjured all allegiance to every foreign king, prince, and potentate whatever—that eulogium which was so much carped at by English royalists and English Tories—and I think you will find it democratic enough to suit the taste and find an echo in the heart of the sternest repub-hican amongst us. Catholics are of all countries—of all governments—of all political creeds. In all, they are taught that the kingdom of Christ is not of this world—and that it is their duty to render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things which are God's."

I shall read no more. The misfortune of the church and state being united in Europe has furnished the gentleman with some truths; but he must recollect a great many of them originated out of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Judging from the manner in which he recited them here, one would suppose that the Pope had commanded those horrible and inhuman atrocities to be committed, or that if he did not do that, he was cognizant and covertly encouraged those deeds to be done. Now, I deny the fact; he has been misinformed. He has been reading from the wrong book. I have not the authorities by me, but I know those assertions are denied by the catholics. Sir, the catholic bishops have never authorized crime. And, in this country, I think if the gentleman was as well acquainted with the catholics as many other protestant gentlemen on this floor are, he would say they are as good citizens as any in this state or in the United States. They are patriotic and faithful to this country, and discharge all their duties with alacrity and honesty, and are as ready to fight our battles as any other class of citizens in the United States. I have many catholic relatives who participated in the war of 1812, and also in that with Mexico. I ask, does it follow that because there happen to be a few rogues and paupers among the catholics who come here from Europe, that the Pope has taught them to be rogues and wicked men? Not at all; it is the misfortune of the times. I have shown that during the revolutionary struggle, the catholics bore as noble a part as any other set of men in this country. I have been told that almost the whole of the regular army of the United States that were in Mexico during the war, were foreigners. I presume, according to the statement of the elder gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Rudd,) one-third of the immigrants that come to the United States are protestants, and two-thirds catholics.

I did not name the persecutions of the protestants against the catholics, to show that they were not fit to be received here from Europe. Not at all. It was the misfortune of the times. But now, that we live in a liberal and enlightened age, when steamboats and railroads and telegraphs have taken the places of other mediums of communication—when the march of mind has kept pace in an equal ratio—and when, too, the arts of printing and paper making have increased a thousand per cent., as well in the old world as the new—we may, I think, regard the days of religious intolerance and bigotry as passed and gone forever.

In Europe, of late years, liberty of conscience has made rapid strides in most of the countries of that hemisphere. Can there be any danger apprehended from the catholics that now come from Europe—any alarm felt that they will subvert this government? I imagine not. There cannot be. There is no danger while the gentleman from Bourbon stands ready on the watchtower, to sound the tocsin of alarm. There is no danger where he is; and when he is gone there will be thousands and tens of thousands of Presbyterian preachers ready to sound the tocsin. But, I repeat, there is no danger on the face of the earth. The checks and balances in our form of government are too many, to admit of a doubt as to its stability. I am astonished at the extraordinary speech of the gentleman from Bourbon. I came here to the legislature once, and I was very much prepossessed in favor of the gentleman then, and I was almost induced to vote for him as a senator of the United States. If there had not been a democrat to vote for, I would have voted for him; but it happened there was a democrat, and I was glad of it. And I would vote for a democrat again from first to last. Now, when I came here, I still entertained the same opinion; for, I believe he is a high-minded and honorable gentleman, and I think no one will doubt his talents. But he is like an old man I knew once, that went to his lawyer to ask his advice in relation to the rights his daughter would have in her deceased husband's estate. The lawyer read from a book. "Well," said the old gentleman, "that's not the book out of which I read." Now, I can say the gentleman from Bourbon has read out of the wrong book all the time.

I thank the convention for the kind attention with which they have listened to the few desultory remarks I have made. I will trouble them no longer.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, we listened on Saturday last to one of the most remarkable speeches, which it has ever been the misfortune of a deliberative body to hear. Had the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis,) confined himself to the political character of native Americanism, I should have been content to have suffered it to pass unreplicated, though I am the son of an Irishman; but he has thought proper to interweave with it an unjustifiable assault upon the religion of a respectable, honest, and loyal portion of this great community—misled doubtless by authorities to which he trusted, to quotations which he had not sifted thoroughly, he has thrown himself upon a sea of declamation, calculated to arouse the worst passions of the human heart, to engender a fanatical spirit, which, if carried out, will lead ultimately to the overthrow of our liberties. As was eloquently said by my young friend from Louisville, in his reply, (for which reply, with the warm feelings of an Irish and catholic heart I thank him,) the tendency of the whole of the gentleman's speech is a stab at the right of suffrage, and though the foreign catholic may first fall a victim to this modern political religion, the poor man of all denominations, must follow him to the grave of a nation's liberties.

When, sir, was this new system first ushered into light. Born of fanaticism, watered with blood, and lighted on its path of destruction by the flames which consumed the Charlestown convent, it would long since have made the east mad with its infernal orgies, but even crime stands aghast at its own enormity, and public sentiment the ultima ratio reipublice withheld its progress for awhile. It lay dormant, until some eight or nine years since, a certain faction in the purlieus of Philadelphia, lead by Louis C. Levin, evoked its spirit to preside over burning churches, and libraries, and midnight murder. There sir, while the sanctuary of the living God blazed, and devils in the form of men shouted on to the work of death and arson, the poor immigrant, the citizen of a free land by choice, and not by the accident of birth, was marked as the expiatory sacrifice, to be offered upon the altar of this modern political high priest, who, if I mistake not, is a Jew by descent. Yes, sir, of the tribe of Caiphas—he who clamored that a God might die, lest the temporal power of the Herods of Juda should pass to the meek Nazarene—he, Louis C. Levin shouted on the mob. Great God! that such an enormity should have been enacted in a land set apart and consecrated as the home of the oppressed.

It may be that my notions are peculiar, but in them I have all faith. I believe that this land was made to receive the teeming millions of the old world, and that when population treads closely hereafter on the heels of subsistence, the same wise providence, which created this continent, will, from the hollow of his Almighty hand, in the broad Pacific, upheave another, to receive the redundant population of this hemisphere. God's providence must afford to the suffering millions of his creatures a refuge from want, or he has made the laws of increase in population to contravene his other work.

But to return to native Americanism proper. Where do you suppose it had its first origin? I will tell the gentleman from Bourbon, though, if he be descended of an Irish family, his own family traditions may furnish him the same. Native Americanism is but Orangeism transferred from the north and east of Ireland to the free land of America. 'Tis the same foul spirit, which, on the 12th of May in each year since the battle of the Boyne, has congregated its thousands in Ireland, with their Orange sashes and muskets, to provoke the catholic to conflict, backed as those Orangemen have been by an Orange magistracy—an Orange nobility—and to a great extent, an Orange church of England hierarchy. It was this spirit which, in the year 1828, when O'Connell was canvassing the county of Clare, for a seat in the Imperial Parliament, and the entire mass of the Orange party was stirring heaven and earth to defeat his return, because he was a catholic, and Sir Vesey Fitzgerald, the worst landlord that ever Ireland produced—a hell-hound of party—a fanatic, and extortioner—was his opponent—that a party of Orange police, headed by an English Major, passed a cabin inhabited by a poor widow and seven children—only one of whom was old enough to assist his mother in maintaining her family—and without provocation, fired upon these children, innocently playing on the green, and killed three of them, among whom was the poor widow's stay. Sir, the spirits that fired the party above alluded to, animates the native American party here. Of course I do not include the gentleman from Bourbon. He has been seized with a certain political madness, whose effects he does not see, nor fully comprehend; but yet, even he would scorn such cruelty. I could multiply instances of this kind—I could take you back to the year 1690, and from that time up to the present, I could present you with a series of horrors, such as no people, save the sons of the lone sea-girt isle, ever had to endure.

What occurred in last May in the county Down, in the kingdom of Ireland. In violation of the queen's proclamation, issued in virtue of the act of 1st Victoria, to suppress secret political societies, directed both against the Orangemen and Ribbonmen, the Orangemen of Down assembled at the Earl of Roden's, and after an inflammable address delivered by the Earl, and free libations to the "glorious, pious, and immortal memory of William the Third," they marched upon Dollys Brae, guarded by the bayonets of a whole regiment of queen's troops, and the magistrates of the country, and slaughtered without cause forty poor catholics. They fell unresisting before the bayonets of the infuriated Orangemen, and a fanatic soldiery, and, as yet, no one of the officers, civil or military, who assisted at that murder, has been brought to justice.

I do not attribute this to protestantism; no, sir. Far be it from me to do such a thing. I give it as a cause why the Irishman loves liberty for itself, and not involuntarily as the gentleman and myself do, both being native born. We are citizens of a republic, because our mothers lived here; they, because the holy fire of freedom burned freely in their bosoms, and because in their native homes they were slaves. The gentleman says they do not understand the genius of our government—nor does he, I fear. They comprehend the true genius of liberty—they love liberty for herself, as a true man loves the wife of his heart. He loves it because it ministers to his ambition. Such is human nature.

Will the gentleman from Bourbon examine critically the history of England, and he will find there, on every page from the time of Strongbow, the general of Henry II, to the year 1829, (when catholic emancipation became a law,) the wrongs and oppressions of poor Ireland written in her blood. Sir, under all circumstances she has suffered—and suffering, she has rebelled, she has fought, and she has fallen, but her spirit, the national mind, remains uncrushed.

Famine, it is true, in the last few years, has made her desolate, and death has enthroned himself on her green hills. A population which, three years ago, was estimated at 8,000,000, is now stated by the London Times at a little upwards of 5,000,000.

"The Nibbe of nations, there she stands Childless and crownless in her voiceless woe."

And when she appeals for a home to those who inhabit a great country for which the Irishman fought, and many died, shall it be said to him, go back to your earthly charnel house! America, when the storm of war hovered over her, received you with embraces, but now that she is strong and vigorous, she has forgotten her charity. Such, sir, is not the spirit of this people.

The Sabines, introduced to Rome after the fight between the Horatii and the Curiatii, felt more profoundly the spirit of her government than the Romans themselves, because they were new to her liberties—the Romans felt it less because it is the nature of man to be satiated with what he enjoys. So, sir, with the foreigner; he looks from his continental, or his island home, upon the beautiful and gorgeous government which our fathers of 1776 have provided, as the wanderer does on an oasis in the desert—an island of palms, betokening a refreshing spring. But, sir, shall those springs be dried up—shall those waters be turned to the bitter salt that pervades the sea—shall those palms be hewn down, and no landmark of liberty be left upon the desert waste of life?

Such is the tendency of the gentleman's doctrine. We would rationally suppose he was one of those pilgrim fathers, who, escaping persecution at home, persecuted the Quaker upon the virgin soil of America.

I would ask the gentleman, who was the first to proclaim, on this side of the Atlantic, civil and religious liberty. I will tell him—Maryland! a colony of catholics, founded by a catholic Irish lord, and composed, at the time the covenant of St. Mary's was made, almost exclusively of Irishmen; and yet the gentleman fears catholicism.

Strange perversion! Strange derangement of a great mind; for I yield my tribute to that of the many, that "He was born for much more,

And in happier hours."

I would ask this convention to look back upon the history of this country. Go back to 1774. Whose voice was first raised to cheer the colonies in their work of political redemption? It was that of Irishmen, assembled in the city of Dublin, under the patriotic O'Connor and the eloquent Flood. They cheered us to the conflict. Nor did they stop at this; they shipped to America stalwart men who, from Lexington to Monmouth, proved in the language of blood, that they loved liberty and hated oppression.

Sir, the gentleman has quoted from Washington to show that he did not favor foreign immigration. Who protected this gallant and good man—this cynosure in the political world, at the battle of Brandywine? Marylanders! who were foreign catholics in a great measure. Who is said to have written the song called the Irishman? Washington; and a prouder tribute was never paid to a gallant people. Who secured the southern army after Gates had fled at Camden? DeKalb, the gallant, the noble, the catholic Prussian, from Coblentz. Who stood by his side after the southern militia had fled? The Pennsylvanians; who, according to the gentleman from Bourbon, could not speak the English language, and the Irishmen of the Maryland line. May God grant me, that in all difficulties of this life, I may find Dutchmen and Irishmen like them.

The gentleman has forgotten the republics of the middle ages in his enthusiasm. He has forgotten that they were catholic. Milan, Venice, Padua, Genoa, Pisa, Piacenza or Placentia, Modena, Lucca, Florence, and many others. Who headed these people against oppression? I answer, their bishops and their priests. Let him read Muratori's Annals, and he will teach him, that catholics never opposed the diffusion of human liberty.

Has the delegate from Bourbon ever read the history of the little republic of San Marino, with only twelve miles square, and a population of 23,000? Who protected it? The Pope. Did Napoleon attack it? No, sir, he did not. It had stood for fourteen hundred years, a monument of catholic tolerance, and an attack upon it, would have outraged the moral sentiment of the world. Has he heard of the republic of Andorra, in the Spanish Pyrenees? Doubtless he has. That republic is catholic—a pure democracy—presided over by officers of its own choice, and protected by the Bishop of Urgil. Yet, forsooth, catholicism is inimical to human liberty. There is a prudery in the gentleman's political fears I cannot comprehend.

From the birth of Christ—the delivery of the gentile—to the present day, that church has taught liberty. In all ages, from the time the manger cradled God—attracted the wisemen of the east—to the time whose sands are now wasting fast before us, her tenets have been the same. She has taught one God, one faith, one baptism, and universal love.

The gentleman has charged catholicism with being cruel. I admit, sir, there have been times when princes, who professed the catholic faith, have been oppressive to their protestant subjects. This I deplore. No man feels more sensibly than I do, the cruelties inflicted by the French under Louis XIV, after the revocation of the edict of Nantz. They were unjust and uncalled for; but they sprung not from the religion, but the heart of the minister.

The gentleman has spoken of Frederic II, of Germany, (one of the latter Kaisers,) being compelled to yield allegiance to the Pope. I would call his attention to Sismondi's Italian Republics, to prove, most satisfactorily, that the Pope warred with Frederic to secure Italian independence—to save Lombardy from what she now suffers from the house of Austria, and against which, in the last two years, she has freely shed her blood, headed and led on by the catholic Archbishop of Milan. He spoke also of the Bavarian, Henry IV, who secured the empire by fraud, and sought to do what his greater predecessor failed in doing, the subjugation of the Lombard states; and failed, because a Pope, who loved liberty, headed the armies of independence, and at the battle of Alessandria, beat him and took him, and restored him to his empire on condition he would not further molest the Lombards. By this, the Pope, in his temporal domain, profitted nothing; the people gained much, and the world learned a sense of right; and yet the gentleman urges this act of the Pope as a violation of his pastoral duty.

Sir, since christianity began, from Peter, first Pope, to the present, they have been friends of rational liberty. They have not been agrarian—they have not been eutopian; but they have looked to the substantial blessings which each scheme of liberty promised. Catholics do not deny but that there have been a few bad Popes; men who, though vested with the tiara, have looked alone to the influence of temporal power. Of this number is Alexander VI, one of the Borgias. But I defy the gentleman, or any one else, to point to one change in doctrine during their reigns—one variation from the ancient faith, which was promulgated from the time christianity had birth in the east. The gentleman says it is a gigantic structure. True, sir; baptised in the tears and blood of a God, in Gethsemane, and on Calvary, it opens its maternal arms to receive into its sanctuary all people, all kindred, and all races. It says to the protestant, if you act up to the lights before you, and discharge all the duties, faithfully, of your civil and religious station, you will reap the reward accordingly. It says the same to the heathen. It spreads wide the portals of heaven to all who diligently seek the truth, and secure it, or fail—for its fundamental principle is, that God is just.

The gentleman says we owe civil and religious obedience to the Pope. Sir, I doubt not he believes so; but I know the reverse. I am a catholic in faith. I would die before I would yield it—like most Irishmen I am better prepared to die for it, than to live for it—but I know what the faith is, for I have been reared a catholic by an educated Irishman—my father—a man who understood his faith, who taught it to his children without constraint, and who left them free to choose among the six hundred and sixty-six faiths that now exist in the world. He did not say to me, be a catholic; but told me to read, not alone histories, of which he had many, catholic and protestant, but the dogmas of the churches, to acquaint myself thoroughly with their arcana, and not to stick in the bark. I think I have done so. He has gone to receive the reward of a life spent in the service of his adopted country, and the maintenance of the faith, while I, of his sons, stand alone; but the principles of right and wrong, I learned under him, shall never leave me, and his memory shall be as a pole star to me through the wanderings and cares of this life.

It will be recollected by this body that in 1828, Daniel O'Connell was elected to the British parliament from the county of Clare. Sir Vesey Fitzgerald contested his election, and when O'Connell was required to swear that catholicity, taught rebellion, and disorder, and sedition, he refused the vile oath. What was the result? Though one of the greatest lawyers of the world, he was ejected from parliament, and a new writ of election was issued. He offered again; was again elected, and the house of commons, fearing the people, caused a committee to be raised, and directed them to enquire of the catholic college of Maynooth, in Ireland; the college of Louvain, in Belgium; of Bologna, in Italy, and the college of Cologne, in Prussia, and I think the Propaganda of Rome, if the catholics owed civil or temporal allegiance to the Pope; and they all answered no. Dr. Doyle, one of the most distinguished catholic theologians who ever lived, asserted the same; and further, that such a doctrine had never existed in the church. And yet, the gentleman, on the authority of Elliott, an American, asserts the reverse. As did the senior gentleman, of Louisville, I would advise him to read more, and to feel that the same God made us all. I claim nothing, as a catholic, from him, which I do not fully and freely accord to him as a protestant. In the language of the song of the pilgrim fathers—

"I leave untouched what here I found, Freedom to worship God."

What matters it to me if the gentleman be a Socialist, a Fourierite, or a Moslem, if, in the exercise of his civil duties, he be a good citizen? Nothing. What if, as the Parish on bended knee at sunrise and sunset, he worships the eternal fire which he dreams to be a God? Nothing. What sir, if at the call of the Muezzin, on the rising of the sun and the going down thereof, he shout aloud, with his face towards Mecca, "there is no God but God, and Mahomet is his prophet?" Nothing. Sir, we here are all equals. The ægis of civil and religious liberty is over us all. While ever one star of the proud galaxy, which has lighted American valor to victory, remains undimmed—while ever a stripe remains untarnished on our national colors, the great truth of civil and religious liberty will remain enthroned in the hearts of the people, though demagogues may endeavor to destroy its efficacy.

Who was General Jackson—to name whom is enough to excite the liveliest emotions of the American heart? The son of an Irishman. Who was Richard Montgomery, who watered one of the earliest fields of the revolutionary struggle with his blood, and offered up his life as a sacrifice to his adopted countrymen? He, too, was an Irishman. Who was the Baron Steuben? An exiled Prussian, who sought a home in the wilderness, and fought for its liberties. Who was De Kalb? A Prussian also, who upon the plains of Camden gave out his life for us all, as freely as if it were for the liberties of his own loved home. And who, sir, was La Fayette? A French marquis, with wealth, with hereditary renown, with every earthly enjoyment. He gave them all up to make our country free. Go to every battle field, from Lexington to Monmouth, during the war of the revolution, and if the mute earth could speak, she would tell you how enriched her broad bosom had been with the life-blood of the poor foreigner, shed for the sacred cause of human liberty. Go, sir, to the fields of battle of the last war—beginning at Tippecanoe, where the most eloquent man the west ever saw, (I mean Jo. Daviess,) fell at the head of his gallant blues, and pursue the history of that struggle through the bloody Raisin, where the great and gallant Allen perished—Bridge-water, Queenstown, Chippewa, to Orleans—and you will find that wherever a native born American fell, an adopted citizen died beside him. There is no period in the history of this great nation, which is not pregnant with examples of patriotism displayed by the foreigner.

Who was Charles Carroll, of Carrollton—he who signed the declaration of independence, and pledged, with John Adams, Thomas Jefferson, and the other immortal men who affixed their names to that instrument, their "lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor," for the redemption of an oppressed land? He was a catholic. And I would ask, also, who was John Carroll, who under the recommendation of Gen. Washington, was appointed by the continental congress to a mission among the Canadians, to persuade them to join with our country in the struggle for freedom; and who fulfilled that mission in such a manner as to command the unanimous thanks of congress? He too was a catholic, and the first Archbishop of Baltimore.

Sir, I will go further, I will ask the gentleman what was the faith of Christopher Columbus—the Genoese—who, under the auspices of Ferdinand and Isabella, the sovereigns of Spain, cast himself upon a trackless ocean, and discovered a western land, as a refuge to the oppressed, both protestant and catholic? He was a catholic. And who, sir, was Sebastian Cabot? He, it is true, sailed under the flag of then catholic England, but he was a catholic. And from whom is the name of the western hemisphere—North and South America—derived? From Americus Vespucius, an Italian, and a catholic. Do these things argue nothing? If catholic science, catholic zeal, catholic mind, have done so much for mankind, are catholics to be proscribed—are they to be assailed as felons to the spirit of civil and religious liberty? Sir, it is unjust—a violation of the truth of history—and, to “vindicate that truth,” I have made this effort.

The gentleman has said that there was an affiliation among the catholics; that the priests control the multitude, and that a nod was only necessary from the priest to make the laymen obey his will. Sir, I will use a mild term, the gentleman is mistaken. I am a catholic, and run this year against a distinguished and chivalrous gentleman, who was a protestant, and the catholics were my most decided opponents. Some of them, it is true, voted for me; but the mass, who were whigs, voted for my adversary. The mass of the catholics of Kentucky are whigs, which proves that the gentleman calculated without his host, when he said “he would like them better if they differed more in national politics.”

It has been my interest, as well as my desire, to look into the discordancies of faith. I have read on both sides. I have read with charity, and while I have always respected the opinions of my protestant friends, I have never sought to enforce mine upon them. To the full, I have ever recognized the true spirit of the constitution of the United States, which guarantees freedom of religious worship; and in my county I number no truer friends than the Presbyterian, the Methodist, the Baptist, the Reformer, and the various protestant religionists. But, sir, it seems to me, that a theological discussion between the gentleman from Bourbon and myself is like a discussion on points of faith between Belial and Azrael. Neither of us, I presume, is a member of a church. I am not. He may be however. I have defended the faith of my ancestors. I have no ambition in this. I feel that the catholic has as many liberties under the constitution and laws of this Union, and of Kentucky, as the protestant, and no more. What will be the effect of Native American principles? John Mitchell, and Smith O'Brien, protestants; Thos. F. Meagher, Patrick O'Donohoe, and Belieu McManus, catholics, who fought for the liberty of Ireland, will be ostracised by it. Does the gentleman wish such a consummation as this? I believe he does; and I grieve to think so. I would welcome with as much warmth to these shores Dembinski, the protestant, as Kosuth, Klapka, or Guion, the catholic. As a catholic, I know no shade of opinion, so that all, politically, love liberty, and hate oppression.

The gentleman has spoken of the St. Leopold society, and he has talked largely of what the emperor Francis II said in regard to the conversion of America to catholicism. That, to me, sir, is an old tale. I saw it when I was a boy, in the paper published at Albany, New York, by seventy-two parsons, among whom was one of my own cousins—Stephen N. Rowan. Upon it they rung the charges for years, until the truth leaked out, and it was discovered that this society was formed to relieve the poor catholic of America from the charge of maintaining his bishop and his curate. This is an awful bugbear. Yet, we find every day, men who are begging for the heathen—and we give to them freely—and I, as a catholic, say it—I have given more to support protestant churches, than I have given to catholic ones. My means are small, but I have never yet turned a deaf ear to the voice which sought alms; for my church has ever taught me to beware, lest in refusing charity, I turned an angel from my door.

This, sir, is the spirit in which I have replied to the gentleman from Bourbon. He knows not my faith—he feels not my spirit—and, though he might malign me, were I a political catholic, I would yet ask him to be redeemed. Does he know our faith? He does not. He says we keep no faith with heretics. I will, in refutation of that, keep faith with him. He seemed to assume for himself the place of heretic. I did not place him there. I measure not God's mercy. He is omnipotent, omnipresent, and omniscient; and when we meet, as surely we shall, at the bar of the Great Judge, to that time will I defer the final settlement of our difficulties.

Sir, the gentleman has spoken of the legion of St. Patrick, in Mexico. It was composed of something near two hundred men—thirty-six of whom were Irishmen, ten Germans, two Frenchmen, and one Englishman—(I refer, sir, to the letters of Lieut. Denman, of the U. S. army, and Lieut. Cantwell, who fell at the Guata, a gallant son of the palmetto state.) Who were the remainder? Native born Americans, I blush to own it.

The gentleman from Bourbon says that native catholics entertain different opinions from the foreigner. In this he is mistaken. We all hold the same ideas. It matters not whether the catholic vegetates in the cold north; lives a life of ease in the temperate zones, or suffers under the tropics, his religion is the same. Its substance—its outward form—everything pertaining to it, is the same—one and indivisible. It looks to God for its author, and to man for the fruition of its blessings.

The gentleman has spoken much of the increase of the foreign population. He has counted every soul who arrived upon these shores, and allowed nothing for the ravages of death, nor for re-migration. If he will examine, carefully, the returns of the alms-houses, and other public charities, he will find that death destroys at least ten per cent. of the immigrants, while re-migration takes off at least ten per cent. more. I know it is said that the vast majority of the immigrants are paupers; but I have looked into this thing from 1828 up to the present, and I affirm that the returns to the British parliament, show that each Irishman brings with him an average of £10, or $50. Two years ago this matter was caused to be investigated by Harvie, a merchant of New York, a man of wealth and reputation, and a protestant; and what I have stated above is the result of ten years' experience. What has tended, sir, more than anything else, to keep up a wholesome condition in the monetary affairs of this government—I mean the specie? I answer immigration. It has brought the gold and silver of the old world to the new.

The gentleman has also alluded to Orestes A. Brownson, who, after being a member of almost all other churches, became a catholic. He has talked largely of what Brownson has said. I answer, as a catholic, I believe as much of Brownson as I please. Bishop Hughes recommended him, as a catholic, and a man of very great genius; and these he certainly is; and no more. Brownson is a layman. No catholic is bound to yield obedience to him.

He also alluded to the Freeman's Journal, published in New York, and charged Bishop Hughes with being its editor. I say he is not. Eugene Casserly and McMaster, the former an Irishman, and the latter a native born American, are the true editors, and Bishop Hughes has no control over the paper whatever; and is not any more responsible for its editorials than I am. These editors are both young men—wild and fiery—with the blood of the Celt, they feel its flow—and if at times they yield to it, and speak wildly, is the church to be made liable for it.

Sir, in the broadest terms, I, a catholic, assert, that the church, whose faith I profess, but of which I am not a member, loves liberty, and hates oppression; that she teaches perfect faith with all people, and despises and condemns the doctrine of temporal allegiance to the Pope, save in the Papal territories.

The gentleman has read Hallam's Middle Ages. He certainly is good authority with him. If he has read and studied him, as that great author deserves, he will yet feel that his speech of Saturday was a libel on the catholic faith.

Does the gentleman know who invented printing? He does, doubtless. A German monk, in the reign of Richard III. Who invented gunpowder? A German monk, in the reign of Henry IV. And though it is asserted that catholicism forbids the bible to her people, the catholic press has published two thirds more of that holy book than the protestant. But, sir, I would not be understood as maligning the protestants. They have published many editions of the scriptures, and have displayed a very great zeal in spreading its tidings among men. Though opposed to them in faith, I see, and admire the spirit of love, which animates them in the struggle for dominion over the human heart.

The gentleman has thought proper, perhaps to be fashionable, to attack the Jesuits. Who are they? Priests set apart, by the ordinances of their order, for the conversion of the heathen; for encountering the pestilence in the hovels of the poor, and for the education of the masses. I know there exists a wide spread prejudice against them, even in catholic Europe. I know that the order was suppressed by the Pope Ganganelli Clement XIV; but I will tell you why the clamors of the kings and princes, who governed Europe, were such that this good old man had to give way to them. The real cause why they became obnoxious to kings and princes, arose from the fact that they taught the doctrine of the Carmelite Friar of Spain, "that all power was inherent in the people, and that they had a right to bring their rulers to punishment, even to that of death." Out of this doctrine has grown their unpopularity. As a man, I say there is nothing in their canons or their statutes inimical to civil and religious liberty.

I have asserted that catholics owe no temporal allegiance to the Pope, and in proof of this, I refer to Charles Butler's book of the catholic church, 287 to 289; and, as the gentleman is a lawyer, to the oath of allegiance required by the English statutes of English catholics. This oath, sir, was not refused by Mr. O'Connell, when, though elected by a most triumphant majority, he was stopped at the bar of the house of commons. I would, also, refer to the published opinions of all the catholic universities of Europe.

The gentleman has referred to the writings of Cardinal Bellarmine. He was a great man, and whenever he treats of matters of faith, I accord him as much credence as to any learned and pious writer of the church; but his political opinions never were endorsed by catholics. If the gentleman will read the controversy of Hughes and Breekinridge—and Pope and McGuire, or Campbell and Purcell, he will be set right on this subject.

Why, the gentleman's ideas, as expressed in this body in regard to reform, might, with as much propriety, be quoted hereafter against his party, (which, as a party, has labored faithfully to correct and purify the government of our state,) as the political opinions of catholic writers against the church, with whose faith those opinions have no connection. Would I do so, I could recriminate; but that I will never do. Abiding in the purity, the integrity, the heaven born character of my faith, I will rely upon its merits, and will never assail adversary churches, because some of their members hold opinions which politically do not square with mine. He has also quoted from the writings of Antoninus, Archbishop of Florence, to prove that the catholic owes civil allegiance to the Pope. Sir, I again affirm, that as a catholic, I, nor any other man who understands the faith, is bound by the said archbishop's opinion. On this point, and in reply to all the stale and oft refuted calumnies which the gentleman has extracted from "Elliot's Romanism," and "Dowling's Romanism," I would refer him to Butler's book of the catholic church; the controversies above cited, and the works of the late distinguished bishop of Charleston, the Rt. Rev. John England.

He will also find in the above authorities, ample, full, and irresistible proofs, to an unprejudiced mind, that the faith of the catholic is pure, strictly consistent with civil and religious liberty—the duties of the citizen or subject, and that it teaches perfect faith with all men, as we hope to be saved. He has said the catholic church withholds the bible from the laity. If he will go back to those ages, mis-called dark, when the monk toiled for years in transcribing the word of God, that the people might have its light—if he will only examine D'Israeli's Curiosities of Literature—if he will read attentively D'Aubigne reviewed by the present coadjutor bishop of Louisville, he will find that before the days of Luther, there was scarcely a country in which the bible had not been published in the vernacular. The light of the sacred scriptures never was denied by the church to her people. She, on the contrary, commanded it to be read—who to be read with prayer.

Sir, who determined the canonicity of the bible? The catholic church. Who preserved it through long ages of most cruel oppression, inflicted by the pagan? The catholic church. Who beat back the fierce Saracen, when he swept like a flood from Western Asia, and threatened to visit Europe with worse desolation than that which followed in the footsteps of the Hun and the Vandal? Catholic Poland, headed by her glorious Sobieske, and Catholic Hungary. To preserve in tact the faith bequeathed from the cross, her capacious bosom has bled for ages.

"Time, war, flood and fire,
Have dealt ruin upon the seven hilled city."

The dominions of the pagan has passed away. The splendour of the empire lives only in history. The tread of the legion is no longer heard. The eagle has stooped from his proud eyrie, and yet the church lives—bright, vigorous, young—eighteen hundred years old; but her step is as elastic as if her patent was still wet with the blood of Calvary.

Who christianized the world? The gentleman can't deny the fact—the catholic church. Who traversed the wild steeps of Tartary—crossed the trackless and burning deserts—encountered the Bedouin, the Turcoman, the Bashkir, and the Tartar, to spread the blessings of the gospel? The catholic priest—the calumniated, and reviled. Who first taught the Chinese the truth of Christ's mission? The slandered Jesuits. Why, sir, without the efforts of the priesthood—a knowledge of the earth—her institutions and her people, would be a sealed book even to my learned adversary. He is deeply read, and yet he strikes at the hand that brought food and raiment to his own mind.

He has charged us with having a different faith in different nations. Let him read the fathers of the church—let him read Tertullian, St. Chrysostom, St. Cyril, St. Cyprian, St. Augustine, and the eloquent and beautiful Lactantius. Yea, sir, the works of the founder of the society of Jesus, a Spaniard; Drs. Lingard and Wiseman, who are Englishmen; Bourdaloue, Fenelon, and Bassuet, Frenchmen; Møhler, a German; England, Doyle, and McGuire, Irishmen; Hughes, Purcell, and Spalding, of America; and his own candor will compel him to admit that he has wronged us.

The gentleman has enlarged upon indulgences. Sir, he does not understand this doctrine. He has vilified the church by asserting that it was a license to commit sin. There is not now and never was such a doctrine. And I am sorry that a distinguished Kentucky lawyer has detracted from the prestige of the profession, by discovering a culpable ignorance of the doctrines of the oldest church of the world. Indulgences never were granted to authorise sin. They are a remission of temporal penalties, or penances. And if the gentleman were a catholic, and had assailed the faith of the great protestant community with the malignancy, with which he, a protestant, has attacked the faith of the catholic, his confessor would give him such a practical illustration of the doctrine of penance that he! even he might feel that an indulgence would be valuable.

He asserted, also, that the priest professed, of his own authority, to forgive sin, past, present, and future. Such never was the doctrine of the church; and he will pardon me, when I say, that the charge is the result of a distempered imagination—the mere fiction of a brain, which has trifled with itself, until 'tis mad. The church has ever taught that confession was necessary, because Christ commanded it; that the priest interposed as the agent of God; and that to the remission of sin, contrition, a resolve to reform, and restitution, (a doctrine in which the gentleman don't believe,) were absolute prerequisites. And yet, sir, with a spirit which would far better have become Exeter Hall, with its fanatic rabble, led by the right reverend John Philpots, the gentleman from Bourbon has converted this hall (consecrated to the defence of civil and religious liberty,) into an arena for polemical controversy. If he will pardon me, I would suggest to him, in all candor, and charity, the reading of Milner's End of Religious Controversy, and Challoner's Meditations. In the one he would meet a doctrinal disputant, an overmatch for himself, while in the other he would encounter the balm of Gilead—charity—brotherly love—gentleness—every attribute of christianity.

He has praised some of the Popes—Leo the 10th, for his literature; Adrian the 2d, for his spirit; Gregory the Great, for that pervading genius, which was felt so deeply in his own times, and which, like the voiceless but deep current of a great river, sweeps on through all ages, resistless and calm. His, sir, was the sublimation of genius. In the language of Grattan, applied to the great Chatham, "he struck a blow in the world which resounded through the universe." There is something mysterious in the inspiration of those great men, who, in violation of a world's learning, committed themselves with the Palinurus to the tempest-tossed deep, and discovered new worlds. The catholic Portuguese, headed by the great Albuquerque, braved the storms of the Cape of Good Hope, and flung his little argosy on the billow-washed shore of southern Africa. To him—yes, sir—to him the world owes the spices of the Moluccas, and the "odors of Araby the blessed." And who was it first trusted the frail barque to the iron-bound shore of Patagonia, on whose relentless bosom the wailing tempests never cease to play—Magellan—another catholic, who died for science on the shores of Terra del Fuego.

Sir, who discovered the mariner's compass—the voiceless, but unerring spirit which in every clime points to the pole, and shows to the wanderer on the heaving ocean the pathway to his home—though upon her broad bosom earth's teeming millions never yet have left a trace? A catholic and an Italian.

I assert, sir, science owes more—genius owes more to catholicism, than to all the world beside. She walked with the Saviour in Judea and Gallilee; she agonized with him in Gethsemine, and she sprang full fledged into vigor, when, with his expiring breath on Calvary, he commissioned her to save.

The gentleman has boasted of his Anglo Saxonism. I do not know how it is. Whether he was a descendant of the heavy Dutchman of the Zuyder Zee, or of the inflammable and mercurial Irishman, depends on the spelling of his name—whether his ancestors were a part of the hoards who followed Schomberg, or were of the old stock who bared the bosom to the foeman of Benburb, the Boyne, Aughrim, Limerick, and Londonderry, I will not attempt to determine. My name bespeaks my lineage. I am an ancient Irishman—Milisian—Celt. No Saxon blood disturbs the current which flows through my heart. 'Tis true, there are many of Saxon lineage in English history whom I reverence; the great catholic Alfred who secured to you and me, sir, trial by jury; and Mary, yeelped the bloody, Celt and Saxon, who first of England's sovereigns, guaranteed to the criminal the right to be heard by his counsel. Yet, this is nothing.

In conclusion, I will call the gentleman's attention to the speech delivered by the "forest born Demosthenes"—Henry Clay—in the market house in Lexington, during the Mexican war. What did he say of Pius the IX, the present Pope? "That he was now the most interesting person on the earth."

Sir, I do not recollect his words, but the spirit of his speech was, that catholicism was not, and never had been, inimical to liberty. I would also remind him of the rich and fervid eloquence of our present governor, when the proposition to succor Ireland was before the senate of the United States. When reading it, I felt as though the spirit of Grattan, of Flood, and of Curran, had taken up their abode in his great mind, for he poured upon the subject of Ireland's wrongs an eloquence such as has rarely, if ever, been heard on this side the Atlantic.

Sir, thus imperfectly I have endeavored to answer the gentleman from Bourbon. According to my poor ability I have discharged my duty to my country, my religion, and my God, without sectarian feeling, without bigotry and without any feeling except charity. If there be upon the earth's face a religion, against which I entertain bad feelings, I know it not. If towards the gentleman from Bourbon, who has assailed my faith with such virulence, I have any bad feeling, I am not conscious of it; and though unworthy to offer a prayer, I ask that he may be forgiven for the contumely he has heaped upon a religion he does not understand, and a faith, I fear, he has been taught to hate.

Mr. DAVIS. I entertain no prejudice against the catholic church as a system of religious faith, notwithstanding my total dissent from many of its dogmas and doctrines. I feel myself free from this offence. I avow that I am no bigot, and if I had no sins to answer for but those which I have, as yet at least, committed against the Roman catholic church, I should feel no apprehension to be now summoned to the bar of my maker and omniscient judge. I make no war against the religion of any sect as a matter of faith and salvation—not even against the Mormons. It is only in its political phases, and its spiritual connections inseparably blended with them, that I attempt any exposure, or indulge in any denunciation of Romanism. To that extent I have the right, and mean with freedom in the spirit of truth, to animadvert upon it. Its efforts to connect itself with the politics of the country, and to control the measures and policy of government, to imbue them with the spirit and doctrines of its peculiar faith, I will never cease to oppose while I have life; because though not so immediately threatening, I deem these machinations to be the most insidious, the most potent, and the most comprehensive, in their hostility to our system of civil and religious freedom of all the dangers which beset it. If that sect and faith in which my parents lived and died, and that other sect and faith which has been embraced by my wife and children, and to which I am most inclined, should assume the religious politico character, and commence systematic operations to control the politics of the country, I would oppose them with as firm a resolution, and denounce them as unsparingly as I do Romanism in the same connection. The union of politics and religion, of church and state, has ever proved itself to be one of the most direful curses of man; and in every pulsation of my heart, every ray of my reason, every emotion of my soul, I will make war against any religious association that seeks such an alliance in any form.

The eloquent gentleman from Louisville, however, (Mr. Preston,) has fallen into one error in relation to "Native Americanism." He exhibited it to us as the combination of the spirits of fanaticism and lawlessness, committing their excesses in outrageous aggressions upon the foreigner and the burning of Roman catholic churches by low and infuriated mobs. This point is somewhat illustrated by an occurrence which first met my eyes about two hours since. A Roman catholic monk, of the order of La Trappe, has been traveling and lecturing in the state of Ohio, on Romanism in general, and exposing the mysteries, the immoralities, and vices of that and other orders of monks. I read from the Louisville Courier, of the 13th instant:

"SANDUSKY, Dec. 12, 1849.

"RIOT IN SANDUSKY.—Our peaceful city, this evening, about 7 o'clock, was the scene of a disgraceful riot. The celebrated Monk of La Trappe had announced a lecture on Priestcraft, &c., for to-night. Just as he was entering the hall, he was surrounded and seized by a band of Irish and others, dragged into the street, and severely beaten with bludgeons. He was eventually rescued by the Mayor and others. One or two others were injured, being taken for the Monk. It is reported that some pistols were fired. No arrests."

As I have read the facts, the native Americans who perpetrated the excesses alluded to by the gentleman from Louisville, had previously received from foreigners similar, but greater and more atrocious wrong and outrage than even the monk of La Trappe. They have seen daily the coming and increasing multitudes of immigrants to our country. Many of them laborers and mechanics, have been crowded out of their business, and their means of subsistence rendered precarious by the competition of these strangers. The wages of all were likely to be seriously affected and reduced from this cause. The pauperism, the vices, the moral degradation of many of the immigrants, and their criminal invasion of the right of suffrage, had struck deep into the native mind. Their general, arrogant and domineering bearing, but particularly at the polls; and the political management and schemings of the Roman catholic priesthood, and their designs upon the government and religion of the country, were daily made manifest to these native Americans. They united and organized to endeavor by peaceable and legal means to put limits upon immigration, and to restrict the political power of those who might come, as they had the natural and constitutional right to do. They met in a quiet and orderly manner in public assemblies to devise measures to carry out their purposes; and in many instances, while thus engaged, large mobs of armed ruffian foreigners would rush in upon them, overpower them with numbers, knock them down with bludgeons, stab them with knives, make a general melee and break up their meetings. Such I understand to be the deep provocation which caused the excesses of the native Americans against the foreigners, and particularly against foreign catholics and their churches. Such outrages even upon the native Americans do not justify the acts to which they were impelled. Those acts were violent, lawless and deeply reprehensible; but there was much, very much to excuse them, and while the honorable gentleman from Louisville was, in vehement and indignant strains, denouncing the conduct of his own native born countrymen, I was surprised, that he uttered not a word in extenuation, even in explanation of what he was holding up to the unmitigated condemnation of the world. I thought he ought to have presented both sides of the picture, and in his glowing language have told the wrongs received as well as those which had been inflicted by his countrymen.

I stated distinctly, in my former speech upon this subject, that I had known personally, Roman Catholics, natives of Maryland, of Louisiana, and of my own state; that they were good citizens and excellent people—as truly devoted to civil and religious liberty, in my own belief, as I was, and as capable of taking charge of and preserving both. To the gentlemen of that faith in this body, and particularly to my friends from Louisville, (Mr. Rudd,) and Union, (Mr. Spalding,) with whom I am best acquainted, and I hope they will allow me so to call them, I take no manner of exception. No men here have a larger share of my esteem and confidence, both as men and citizens; and if they were asking of me, and my position would allow me to be of their constituents, and their political sentiments accorded with mine, as those of one of them do in the main, I would give them a hearty and a trusting support. Their religious profession would never enter my mind as an objection to them for office. If we were neighbors, we would not harmonize on the doctrinal points which distinguish particular religious persuasions, and occasionally, on a political question or measure; on all beside, I feel assured there would be no discord between us.

My friend from Louisville, (Mr. Rudd,) says I know nothing about the religious faith of his church. One thing is certain, from his speech on Saturday night, he and myself know it very differently on many, and very essential points. By its own constitution and principles, it is the only true and infallible church, and all the distinctive faiths of the sects are damnable heresies, and those who adhere to them doomed inevitably to hell as heretics. The Pope is the infallible head of the church, the successor of St. Peter, holding the keys of Heaven by divine appointment, the viceroy of God, Lord of all the earth, with all power, temporal as well as spiritual, to declare what is and what is not scripture—to grant indulgences for sins, to pray souls out of the fires of purgatory, and his priests under him have the two latter powers. The authority of the Pope, in spiritual matters, being direct and supreme, he regulates all of them by his infallible will; and may proscribe all heresies, and punish and extirpate all heretics, by sword, by stake, and faggot, by the inquisition, its judgments and racks, or in such other manner as he may select. To sustain his spiritual power and infallibility, and the purity of the church, the pope, to those ends, has a supreme indirect power in all temporal affairs, and over all temporal governments. Within this scope, he may put down, depose, excommunicate, and re-grant. Is this the Romanism, the Catholicism of my friend? If it is not, he is not the Romanist of the papacy in its days of glory; nor is he the Romanist of Europe at the present, nor the immigrant Romanist, nor the Romanist which Bishop Hughes and all the priesthood of America would have him to be.

I will proceed, Mr. President, to establish by proofs, each constituent of what I have here presented as the picture of Romanism. In the catechism of the council of Trent, there is this passage: "But as this one church, because governed by the Holy Ghost, cannot err in faith and morals, it necessarily follows that all other societies arrogating to themselves the name of church, because guided by the spirit of darkness, are sunk in the most pernicious errors, both doctrinal and moral."

The Jesuits, Canonists, Italians, and others, maintain the infallibility of the Pope personally. In the Romanish confession of faith imposed on proselytes to popery in Hungary, drawn up by the Jesuits in 1828, the second article reads: "We confess and believe that the Pope of Rome is the head of the church and that he cannot err." Lewis Capenses affirms: "We can believe nothing if we do not believe with a divine faith that the Pope is the successor of Peter, and infallible." Cardinal Ballarmino, one of the highest Catholic authorities says: "But if the Pope should should err, by enjoining vices or prohibiting virtues, the church, unless she should sin against conscience, would be bound to believe vices to be good, and virtues evil."

The Romanists claim that St. Peter was the first bishop of Rome, although there is no evidence, sacred or profane, that he ever was in that city; and that the Pope is his successor by divine appointment. Every Pope, in all his official acts, so styles himself; and the church, its councils, all its functionaries, so denominate him. The creed and oath of Pius the IV, made in conformity to the decrees of the council of Trent, is received by all Romanists as undoubted authority. The thirteenth article reads: "I acknowledge the holy catholic and Roman apostolic church, the mother and mistress of all churches; and I promise and swear true obedience to the holy bishop, the successor of St. Peter, the prince of apostles and vicar of Jesus Christ." Article fifteen reads: "This true catholic faith, out of which none can be saved, I now freely profess and truly hold" &c.

The bishop's oath of allegiance is long but of the most expressive obligation. It was originated by Gregory VII in the eleventh century; and in form and authority is far more ancient than Pius IV. Some of its parts run, "I, N. elect of the church of N. from henceforward will be faithful and obedient to St. Peter the apostle, and to the holy Roman church, and to our Lord Gregory, Pope Gregory IX, and to his successors," &c. "I will help them to keep and defend the Roman papacy, and regalities of St. Peter, saving my order, against all men." "The rights, honors, privileges and authority of the holy Roman church, of our Lord the Pope, and his aforesaid successors, I will endeavor to preserve, defend, increase, and advance." "Heretics, schismatics, and rebels to our said Lord, or his aforesaid successors, I will to my utmost persecute and oppose." The existence of the Pope's supreme and universal power, in all matters and over all persons, is a claim so arrogant, so daring, so iniquitous and impious, as in our age and country to appear incredible. But there is no truth in history better attested, or that is blended with a greater amount of human misery and crime. It was first claimed to that extent by Gregory II in 730, and was fully established by Gregory VII in 1080, has been asserted by all Popes and Roman catholic authorities to the present day: and in its diabolical and terrific execution for centuries, by means of remorseless and exterminating wars and every manner of cruel persecutions, it desolated and cursed the fairest portions of the globe. The Lateran council under Innocent III; that of Lyons under Innocent IV, and the Lateran council under Leo X, have asserted this doctrine of the universal supremacy of the Pope; and the decrees containing it stand in the canon law and in their collections of synods. The infallible Popes, and their great controversial authorities, have often declared and defined it in express terms. "Leo X, by a decree, asserted all power in earth and heaven is given to the Pope, and consequently the civil power is subject to the papal jurisdiction. Another Pope decrees: "The authority given to St. Peter and his successors exceeds all the powers of earthly kings and princes; it passes uncontrollable sentence upon all." Boniface VIII decreed: "We declare, say and pronounce it to be of necessity to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman Pontiff." I shall not multiply examples of the assertion of this power—they exist to an indefinite extent; but I will give an instance or two of its execution. The Province of Thoulouse, in France, was one of the strong seats of the Albigenses. In 1207, the reigning count, Raimond VI, was required by Innocent III to take part in the war of extermination against his own subjects, which the Pope had ordered Philip Augustus, king of France to undertake against them. The Pope after having directed the king to undertake this war in person, further addressed him: "We exhort you, that you would endeavor to destroy that wicked heresy of the Albigenses, and to do this with more vigor than you would use towards the Saracens themselves; persecute them with a strong hand: deprive them of their lands and possessions; banish them and put Roman catholics in their room."

Raimond would not undertake the butchery of his own unoffending people, and in a letter which the Pope wrote to him, is this passage:

"If you could open your heart we should find, and would point out to you, the detestable abominations that you have committed; but as it is harder than the rock, it is vain to strike it with the sword of salvation; we cannot penetrate it. Pestilential man! what pride has seized your heart, and what is your folly to refuse peace with your neighbors, and to brave the divine laws by protecting the enemies of your faith!"

Peter Castlemann, the Pope's legate, sought out Raimond, reproved him for his negligence, which he termed baseness, denounced him as perjured, as a favorer of tyrants and heretics, and excommunicated him. The legate met with a friend and supporter of the count, to whom he used the most insulting epithets, who thereupon drew his poignard and slew him. The Pope caused Raimond to be publicly anathematized in all churches, and published his proclamation which closed in these words:

"As following the canonical sanctions of the holy fathers, we must not observe faith towards those who keep not faith towards God, or who are separated from the communion of the faithful: we discharge, by apostolical authority, all those who believe themselves bound towards this Count by any oath, either of allegiance or fidelity; we permit every catholic man, saving the right of his principal lord, to pursue his person, to occupy and retain his territories, especially for the purpose of exterminating heresy."

A crusade against Raimond and his province was published by the legates and monks throughout Europe, under orders from the Pope, offering to those who would engage in the plunder and extermination of the Albigenses, "the utmost extent of indulgence which his predecessors had ever granted to those who labored for the deliverance of the Holy Land." Raimond was overwhelmed with terror and submitted, and was made "to strip himself naked from head to foot, with only a linen cloth around his waist for decency's sake, the legate throwing a priest's stole around his neck, and leading him by it into the church nine times around the pretended martyrs' grave, he inflicted the discipline of the church upon the naked shoulders of the humbled prince with the bundle of rods he held in his hand." But this degrading submission saved not Raimond or the Albigenses. He made and continued every observance of penance imposed upon him, and strictly conformed to the rites of the Romish faith, but was suspected, contemned and debased by the Pope and his adherents, as long he lived, and in his life time, after making a pilgrimage to Rome, he was stripped of his hereditary possessions, and they were conferred upon his relentless persecutor, De Montfort. The Albigenses were oppressed with the most savage war and merciless persecutions for many years, conducted also by the bloody Simon de Montfort, and other barbarians sent against them by Philip Augustus, and at last were nearly wholly extirpated from the face of the earth.

My friend from Union (Mr. Spalding) tells us that the magna charta, the beginning of English liberty, was extorted from King John by his barons, who were Roman Catholics; and he adduces that fact as evidence that this religion is not unfriendly to freedom. At that time all Christendom, except the Greek church and the Albigenses, were Catholics, and there were no doubt many good people among them. But let us look a little more at the history of John. The Pope claimed the right to elect and consecrate all bishops in England, which was violently resisted by John. The controversy became so violent, that "Pandolph, the Pope's legate, plainly told the king, even in the face of his parliament, that he was bound to obey the Pope in temporals as well as spirituals! And when John refused to submit to the will of his holiness without reserve, the legate with shameless effrontery, published the sentence of excommunication against him, with a loud voice, absolving all his subjects from their oath of allegiance, degraded him from his royal dignity, and declared that neither he nor any of his posterity should ever reign in England." In the following year, Innocent solemnly ratified the acts of his legate, and afterwards proceeded, with great solemnity, to pronounce a sentence of deposition against King John; and of excommunication against all who should obey him or have any connection with him; and he appointed Philip, King of France, to put his sentence in execution, and promised him the pardon of all his sins, and the kingdom of England for his reward. The awe-stricken John submitted. He not only acknowledged that the Pope had the power to appoint all bishops, and indemnified them for all damage which they had sustained in the contest, but even surrendered his crown to the Holy See, received it back as a vassal, swore fealty to the Pope, and agreed to pay him an annual tribute of seven hundred marks of silver for England and three hundred marks for Ireland. And what was the judgment of Innocent, a predecessor of the present Pope, who is the successor of St. Peter and the Lord of my friend from Union, (Mr. Spalding,) of this conduct of the Roman Catholic barons who extorted the charter from John, which my friend so much and so properly extols. He took part with John, and thundered his excommunication against these sturdy barons from the council of Lateran; and in writing to some ecclesiastics about this matter shortly afterwards, he thus magisterially delivers himself: "We will have you to know, that in general council we have excommunicated and anathematized, in the name of the father, and of the Son, and of the holy Ghost, in the name of the holy apostles Peter and Paul, and in our own name, the barons of England, with their partisans and abettors, for persecuting John, the illustrious king of England, who has taken the cross, and is a vassal of the Roman church, for striving to deprive him of a kingdom which is known to belong to the Roman church." If this haughty and imperial Pope could, with his stormy spirit, burst from his tomb, and appear in this hall, he would thunder an excommunication against my friend as an abettor of those bold barons who impiously defied his divine authority.

Is any more evidence needed to establish the claims of the Roman Catholic church, and its head, the Pope, to be infallible; that it has the power, by its general councils, and by the Pope, to condemn what it wills, to be heretical, and to call upon all temporal powers to extirpate the heresy and the heretics? Look to the decrees of the councils of Lateran, and the third chapter begins: "We excommunicate and anathematize every heresy extolling itself against this holy orthodox Catholic faith, which we before expounded, condemning all heretics, by whatever names called. And being condemned, let them be left to the Secular Power, or to their bailiffs, to be punished by due animadversion. And let the Secular Power be warned and induced, and if need be, condemned by ecclesiastical censure, what offices soever they are in, that as they desire to be reputed and taken for believers, so they publicly take an oath for the defence of the faith, that they will study in good earnest to exterminate, to their utmost power, from the lands subject to their jurisdiction, all heretics denoted by the church." "So that every one that is henceforth taken in any power, either spiritual or temporal, shall be bound to confirm this chapter by his oath." "But if the temporal Lord, required and warned by the church, shall neglect to purge his territory of this heretical filth, let him, by the metropolitan and comprovincial bishops, be tied by the bond of excommunication; and if he scorn to satisfy within a year, let that be signified to the Pope, that he may denounce his vassals thenceforth absolved from his fidelity, and may expose his country to be seized on by Catholics, who, the heretics being excommunicated, may possess it without any contradiction." "And the Catholics that, taking the badge of the cross, shall gird themselves for the exterminating of heretics, shall enjoy that indulgence, and be fortified with that holy privilege which is granted them that go to the Holy Land." "And we decree to subject to excommunication, the believers and receivers, defenders and favorers of heretics, firmly ordaining, that when any such person is noted by excommunication, if he disdain to satisfy within a year, let him be, ipso jure, made infamous." Pope Gregory VII in his maxims, declares: "It is lawful for the Pope to depose emperors. The Pope can absolve subjects from their oath of allegiance which they have taken to a bad prince. His judgment no man can reverse, but he can reverse all other judgments. He is to be judged by no man." Pope Pius V, in his proclamation of deposition and excommunication of Elizabeth, Queen of England, begins: "Pius, &c., for a future memorial of the matter. He that reigneth on high, to whom is given all power in heaven and on earth, committed one Holy, Catholic, and Apostolic Church, out of which there is no salvation to one alone upon earth, to Peter, the Prince of the apostles, and to Peter's successor the Bishop of Rome, to be governed in fullness of power. Him alone he made prince over all people, and all kingdoms, to pluck up, destroy, scatter, consume, plant, and build," &c. "We do, therefore, out of the fulness of the apostolic power, declare the aforesaid Elizabeth, being a heretic and a favorer of heretics, and for her adherence in the matter aforesaid, to have incurred the sentence of Anathema, and to be cut off from unity of the body of Christ. And moreover, we do declare her to be deprived of her pretended title to the kingdom aforesaid, and of all dominion, dignity, and privilege whatsoever; and also the nobility, subjects, and people of the said kingdom, and all others of any sort which have sworn unto her, to be forever absolved from any such oath, and all manner of duty, of dominion, allegiance, and of obedience; as we also do, by the authority of these presents, absolve them, and do deprive the said Elizabeth of her pretended title to the kingdom and all other things aforesaid. And we do command and interdict all and every one of the noblemen, subjects, people, and others aforesaid, that they presume not to obey her, or her admonitions, mandates, and laws; and those who shall do the contrary, we do inodiate with the like sentence of Anathema."

The true, but partial deliverance of the world from its long thralldom to the darkness, wickedness, and despotism of Romanism, began in the fifteenth century. An Englishman led it on; Wickliff is justly called the "morning star" of the Reformation. The orient dawn of that bright luminary from its insular horizon, was unmarked even by the Argus eyes of the Pope, though every priest was to him an orb that never closed. The rising luminary had shed its light broadly over Britain before the aroused papacy attempted its extinction, but it was then too late, that light was established forever. Wickliff was shielded against all the attacks of his enemies by the powerful protection of John of Gaunt, and he died in his bed. In a previous sickness, some mendicant friars obtruded themselves upon him, and after reminding him that he must die, exhorted him to retract what he had said against them. He directed his attendants to raise him up in his bed, and the intrepid reformer summoning all his strength, exclaimed in a loud voice, "I shall not die, but live, and shall again declare the evil deeds of the friars." His appalled visitors hastily withdrew. The immortal truths which he garnered pure from the book of life, he threw out in his writings to mankind, and also gave to his countrymen that book in their own tongue. His doctrines not only struck wide and deep in England, but they spread rapidly in the north of Germany, and in Bohemia became prevalent. Huss and Jerome of Prague, confirmed them at the stake, to which they were condemned by the council of Constance; and from the flames that consumed them, they handed the torch of truth to Germany, and heralded on the great reformation of Luther. The enraged council of Hiearchs at Constance, tracing the movement back to its author, Wickliff, decreed that his bones should be disinterred and hung upon a gibbet; but his immortal spirit and immortal doctrines were equally beyond the reach of their insane malice. Let me pause here, and say to my respected friend from Union, (Mr. Spalding,) that English freedom, civil or religious, owes nothing to the Popes or to Romanism. On the contrary, if the power of the papacy had been re-established in England, that ancient tree of liberty, which was planted in the noble Isle in the reign of John, and which struck such deep and vigorous root in her soil as to live and flourish through all the storms that have since rocked her, had probably, centuries ago, withered and perished; and in the seventeenth century, there had been no parent stock from which to transplant noble shoots to a new world.

Another power claimed, and daily pretended to be exercised by the church of Rome, and her priestcraft, is to grant absolution for sins. The council of Trent declared this doctrine very explicitly. Canon 3 says:

"Whoever shall affirm that the words of the Lord our Savior, 'Receive ye the Holy Ghost,' &c., are not to be understood of the power of forgiving and retaining sins, in the sacrament of penance, &c., let him be accursed."

Canon 9 says: "Whoever shall affirm that the priests' sacramental absolution is not a judicial act, but only a ministry, to pronounce and declare that the sins of the party confessing are forgiven, so that he believes himself to be absolved, even though the priest should not absolve seriously, but be in jest, let him be accursed."

This power of the priest, of himself to forgive sins, "to the believing sinner," is one of the most mysterious and important; and is another strong link in the chain which fetters his mind and his soul. To the eye of truth, the daring of the impiety, and the weakness of the credulity, are equally the subjects of indignant amazement.

Kindred to the power of granting absolution for sins, Romanism claims for the Pope that of granting indulgences. Peter Dens thus defines an indulgence:

"What is an indulgence? It is the remission of the temporal punishment due to sins, remitted as to their guilt, by the power of the keys, without the sacrament, by the application of the satisfactions which are contained in the treasury of the church."

The same author classifies indulgences into local, real and personal; into plenary, more plenary, and most plenary; and into perpetual and temporal. The creed of Pius IV contains this article on indulgences:

"I also affirm, that the power of indulgences was left by Christ to the church, and the use of them is most wholesome to christian people."

The council of Trent passed a decree relating to indulgences, from which the following tract is taken:

"Since the power of granting indulgences has been bestowed by Christ upon his church, and this power divinely given has been used from the earliest antiquity, the holy council teaches and enjoins, that the uses of indulgences, so salutary to christian people, and approved by the authority of venerable councils, shall be retained in the church; and it anathematizes those who assert that they are useless, or deny that the church has the power of granting them."

Indulgences were granted by different Popes, to the crusaders of Palestine, to the destroyers of the Albigenses, to the members of the Council of Constance, who condemned as heretical the doctrine of the Lollards, and Huss and Jerome to be burned, and the bones of Wickliff to be disinterred and exposed upon a gallows. It has been granted and promised, and publicly sold for money in innumerable instances; and this most abused, sinful and demoralizing practice is still kept up by the church in Rome. Robertson, in his life of Charles V., gives this translation of the form of the indulgences, which Leo X was vending by his agents over Italy and Germany in the time of Luther.

The form of the indulgences sold by Tetzel in Germany for Leo X:

"May our Lord Jesus Christ have mercy upon thee, and absolve thee by the merits of his most holy passion. And I, by his authority, that of his blessed apostles, Peter and Paul, and of the most holy Pope, granted and committed to me in these parts, do absolve thee, first from all ecclesiastical censures, in whatever manner they have been incurred, and then from all thy sins, transgressions and excesses, how enormous soever they may be, even from such as are reserved for the cognizance of the holy see, and as far as the keys of the holy church extend, I remit to you all punishment which you deserve in purgatory on their account, and I restore you to the holy sacraments of the church, to the unity of the faithful, and to that innocence and purity which you possessed at baptism, so that when you die the gates of punishment shall be shut, and the gates of the paradise of delight shall be opened; and if you shall not die at present, this grace shall remain in full force when you are at the point of death. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."—Robertson's Charles V., page 126, note.

These indulgences, aside from all the other usurpations and crimes of the papacy, were sufficient to have moved not only Luther, but the world to the reformation; and the only wonder is that it had not proved universal, complete and enduring.

Another source of the absolute and despotic dominion, which this faith enables its priesthood to exert over the will, imagination, and souls, of especially its ignorant followers, is its doctrine of purgatory. Here is the concise teaching of the creed of Pius IV on this point:

"I constantly hold there is a purgatory, and that the souls therein detained are helped by the suffrages of the faithful."

The council of Trent asserted it in an article which concludes thus:

"This holy council commands all bishops diligently to endeavor that the wholesome doctrine concerning purgatory, delivered to us by venerable fathers and sacred councils, be believed, held, taught, and everywhere preached by Christ's faithful."

The teaching is that all venial sins are punished, not in eternal hell, but in purgatory; and the pains and punishments of purgatory are represented in the highest degree gloomy, dreadful, and tormenting; all of which may be brought to a termination by mass, and other means, and the freed soul translated immediately to eternal happiness. The ignorant and superstitious are ever prone to think all the sins of themselves and their friends venial. The doctrine of purgatory seizes upon them at once and grapples them with hooks of steel; and the ascendancy which this terrible phantom, and the modes by which it may be divinely charmed away, gives to the priesthood over the ignorant masses of catholics almost incredible power.

Allied to it, is auricular confession, which is the private confession of sins to a priest, by whispering them into his ear. This is to be done at least once a year, and whoever omits it is to be excommunicated out of the church, and if he die, is not to be allowed a christian burial. This is the function of the priesthood, which brings up before it all the liegemen of the catholic empire, and bows all in utter subjection and submission to it. When the novice for the first time, with convulsive excitement, breathes into the ear of the listening priest the deep and criminal secrets of the heart, the soul is enslaved forever; a chain of adamant is thrown around it, and that chain is held by this priest. Even then he may grant or withhold absolution and forgiveness. Such are the mighty spells which Romanism brings over all her sons and daughters; and those who work them, control not only their acts and conduct, but their thoughts and emotions. And how often is this puissance of the priesthood, exhibited strikingly in our country. Bands of rude and stormy foreign catholics, who have traditionary feuds, are loitering in the same neighborhood. They meet in bloody affray. The civil officer of the law interposes and is unheeded. He calls to his aid a large constabulary force, which is laughed to scorn by the infuriated mob. The military is summoned to uphold the civil authority, and blank cartridges are fired among the combatants, but no more regarded than the whistling of the winds. At length death-dealing bullets begin their fatal office, and men fall, but the fight still rages. Lo! the priest makes his appearance, the contending mass of men pause at once, and give attention. He speaks a few words, the tempest of excited passion ceases, and savage men are subdued as children under the rebuke of a firm father. These men all vote, but not their will, it is the will of the priest.

I have, Mr. President, I think, brought forward enough of testimony to sustain fully my statement of the general constituents of Roman catholicism. If more were needed, I could produce volumes to the same effect, of equal distinctness and force; and my presentation of it is true, or all history is false. I have brought forward only a few of the innumerable instances of the enactment of its principles and powers on a public and large scale, in which the papacy controlled kings and all the forces of civil government, made war, ravaged the earth, put down conflicting religions, and extirpated communities, proscribed by it as heretical. But in its more private and secret operations and persecutions, its burnings at the stake, its imprisonments in deep dungeons for long years, its racks and tortures in the gloomy recesses of its murderous inquisitions, of men, women, and children, for no other offence than thinking and expressing a different religious faith, is to be found the horrid acme of its cruelty and its crimes. This narrative, verified by every thing that is authentic in history, is enough to produce against it a universal revolt, except with such as are possessed of the very demon of Romanism. If this most mysterious religious politico institution, in all its principles and their true significance, in its interior and mystical administration, in all its history, public and private, in the collected immoralities, crimes and guilt of twelve centuries, could be presented visibly to all the living at one view, mankind would rise up together and drive it from the face of God's earth.

Here, Mr. President, I will call the attention of the convention to the Jesuits, whom all catholics acknowledge to compose a part of the Romish church. My friend from Washington, (Mr. Kelly,) concedes that Romanism is the same in this day that it ever was, and insists that it was the same identical existence in the days of the Saviour. But Jesuitism was a creation of Ignatius Loyola, and his associates, in the sixteenth century; and the all-powerful and infallible Pope Paul III, in 1546, ingrafted this order upon the infallible church. I will read the Jesuits oath.

"I, A. B., now in the presence of Almighty God, the blessed Virgin Mary, the blessed Michael the Archangel, the blessed St. John Baptist, the holy apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul, and the saints and sacred host of Heaven, and to you my Ghostly Father, do declare from my heart, without mental reservation, that Pope Gregory is Christ's Vicar General, and is the true and only Head of the universal church throughout the earth; and that by virtue of the keys of binding and loosing, given to Holiness by Jesus Christ, he hath power to depose heretical kings, princes, states, commonwealths, and governments, all being illegal, without his sacred confirmation, and that they may safely be destroyed; therefore, to the utmost of my power, I will defend this doctrine and his Holiness's rights and customs against all usurpers of the heretical or protestant authority whatsoever, especially against the now pretended authority and church in England, and all adherents, in regard that they be usurped and heretical, opposing the sacred mother church of Rome.

"I do renounce and disown any allegiance as due to any heretical king, prince, or state, named protestant, or obedience to any of their inferior magistrates or officers. I do further declare the doctrine of the church of England, of the Calvinists, Huguenots, and other protestants, to be damnable, and those to be damned who will not forsake the same. I do further declare, that I will help, assist, and advise, all or any of his Holiness's agents in any place wherever I shall be; and do my utmost to extirpate the heretical protestant's doctrine, and to destroy all their pretended power, legal or otherwise. I do further promise and declare, that notwithstanding I am dispensed with to assume any religion heretical, for the propagation of the mother church's interest, to keep sacred and private all her agents, counsels, as they entrust me, and not to divulge directly or indirectly, by word, writing or circumstance whatsoever, but to execute all which shall be proposed, given in charge, or discovered unto me, by you my Ghostly Father, or by any one of this convent. All which I, A. B., do swear by the blessed Trinity, and blessed sacrament, which I am now to receive, to perform and keep on my part inviolably, and do call all the heavenly and glorious host of Heaven, to witness my real intentions to keep this my oath. In testimony hereof, I take this most holy and blessed sacrament of the eucharist, and witness the same, further with my hand and seal, in the face of this holy convent."

Was there ever such a piece of iniquity, under the garb, and ostensibly to aid the cause of pure and holy religion, devised by man? What other persuasion of christians, than the Roman catholics, have revolting oaths, with horrid and impious imprecations? The achievements of the Jesuits more than paralleled the enormity of their juramentary obligation. I will present a true and most masterly sketch of their spirit, their character, and their operations, from Macaulay.

"In the order of Jesus was concentrated the quintessence of the catholic spirit, and the history of the order of Jesus is the history of the great catholic reaction. That order possessed itself at once of all the strongholds which command the public mind—of the pulpit, of the press, of the confessional, of the academies. Wherever the Jesuit preached, the church was too small for the audience. The name of Jesuit on a title-page, secured the circulation of a book. It was in the ears of a Jesuit that the powerful, the noble, and the beautiful breathed the secret history of their lives. It was at the feet of the Jesuit that the youth of the higher and middle classes were brought up from their first rudiments to the courses of rhetoric and philosophy, literature and science, lately associated with infidelity or with heresy, now became the allies of orthodoxy.

"Dominant, in the south of Europe, the great order soon went forth conquering and to conquer. In spite of oceans and deserts, of hunger and pestilence, of spies and penal laws, of dungeons and racks, of gibbets and quartering blocks, Jesuits were to be found under every disguise, and in every country—scholars, physicians, merchants, serving-men; in the hostile court of Sweden, in the old manor houses of Cheshire, among the hovels of Connaught, arguing, instructing, consoling, stealing away the hearts of the young, animating the courage of the timid, holding up the crucifix before the eyes of the dying.

"Nor was it less their office to plot against the thrones and lives of apostate kings, to spread evil rumors, to raise tumults, to inflame civil wars, to arm the hand of the assassin. Inflexible in nothing but in their fidelity to the church, they were equally ready to appeal to the spirit of loyalty, and to the spirit of freedom. Extreme doctrines of obedience and extreme doctrines of liberty—the right of rulers to misgovern their people, the right of every one of the people to plunge his knife in the heart of a bad ruler—were inculcated by the same man, according as he addressed himself to the subject of Philip or the subject of Elizabeth. Some described these men as the most rigid, others as the most indulgent of spiritual directors. And both descriptions were correct. The truly devout listened with awe, to the high and saintly morality of the Jesuit. The gay cavalier, who had run his rival through the body, the frail beauty, who had forgotten her marriage vow, found in the Jesuit, an easy well bred man of the world, tolerant of the little irregularities of the people of fashion. The confessor was strict or lax according to the temper of the penitent. His first object was to drive no person out of the pale of the church. Since there were bad people, it was better that they should be bad catholics than protestants. If a person was so unfortunate as to be a bravo, a libertine, or a gambler, that was no reason for making him a heretic too."

The machinations and crimes of the Jesuits reached such a pitch, that they were at length by the civil power, driven out of most of the states of Europe, including those strongly catholic; and on the 21st July 1773, Pope Clement, XIV issued his bull, entirely abolishing the order. This measure was not hastily adopted, for before he resolved upon it the Pope was engaged four years in the patient examination of their history. When he signed the order, he is reported to have said: "The suppression is accomplished. I do not repent of it, having only resolved on it after examining and weighing every thing, and because I thought it necessary for the church. If it were not done I would do it now, but this suppression will be my death." Shortly afterwards the Pope died, with every symptom of having been poisoned. But in 1814, Pope Pius VII issued his bull, by which he restored and established the order of the Jesuits. Since then they have revived, and have been busy in Europe. They have come to America, and established sundry colleges in different states, and are scattering themselves over the land. They are deemed to be effective and necessary allies in reducing our government and people under the dominion of Romanism. The Romish Priesthood in New York, a few years ago, in the public newspapers, declared their "ardent admiration of the illustrious order of the Jesuits, which death alone would be able to extinguish in their bosoms." Fit auxiliaries, these Jesuits, of bishop Hughes and bishop Purcell, and the foreign priests, in the execution of their designs in this country.

The Romanism of the dark and middle ages is the Romanism of this day. A part of it only is active and controlling; but all will be if its hierarchy can bring back the world to enough of ignorance, superstition, and slavery, to submit to it. That is the great consummation for which the Pope, Bishop Hughes, and Purcell, and Brownson, and all labor. There has never been any expurgation of the usurpations and corruptions of the Roman catholic church by any of its councils, or Popes; and the necessary conclusion is that they do not admit that there is any. Every principle, power and feature which I have attributed to it, and many more of kindred nature, are found in the body of the canon law. That law is defined by Benedict XIV, who was elected Pope in 1740, thus: "Those constitutions are properly called canons which bind the whole church; such are those which emanate from the chief pontiff or a general council; because if the statute of a bishop be confirmed by the Pope, and extended to the whole church, then it is properly called a canon, as it is now authorized by the Pope." And in no form, either by decree of council or Pope, is their any renunciation or abandonment, in modern times, of any right or power ever claimed by the hierarchy.

Ferdinand VII, on his restoration, re-established the inquisition in 1814; but when the despot was again expelled by the republican Cortes in 1820, it was the second time suppressed, and has never been again re-established in Spain. In the Papal States it still exists, though its operations are shrouded in a great deal of secrecy. The Pope and his priests in every country exercise all the power, and persecute to every extent which the present opinions and condition of the world will allow. The following curse is annually pronounced, with all the solemnity of "bell, book and candle" by the Pope and other church dignitaries:

"In the name of God Almighty, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and by the authority of the blessed Apostles, Peter and Paul, and by our own, we excommunicate and anathematize all Hussites, Wickliffites, Lutherans, Zuinglians, Calvinists, Huguenots, Anabaptists, Trinitarians, and all other apostates from the faith; and all other heretics by whatsoever name they are called, or of whatever sect they may be. And also their adherents, receivers, favorers, and generally any defenders of them; with all who, without our authority, or that of the apostolic See, knowingly read or retain, or in any way, or from any cause, publicly or privately, or from any pretext, defend their books containing heresy, or treating of religion; as also schismatics, and those who withdraw themselves, or recede obstinately from their obedience to us, or the existing Roman Pontiff."

Even in our country, a catholic procession was moving along the public streets of Cincinnati, and a quiet spectator standing on the highway, and not pulling his hat off as the procession passed, had it knocked from his head by one of the attendants.

The advocates of Romanism have, in this debate, claimed that she is the patron of learning and of freedom. Free thought, free opinion, and their free expression, and interchange, are essential to learning, and the essence of liberty; and against those Rome draws the sword and throws away the scabbard. In relation to doctrines propounded by the council of Trent, it decreed: "If any one shall presume to teach, or to think differently from those decrees, let him be accursed." But let us hear what the Popes of Rome have said of the freedom of opinion, and of the press, and the free circulation of the Bible within a few years past. In 1832, Gregory XVII, published his famous Encyclical letter, in which will be found the following passages: "From that polluted fountain of indifference, flows the absurd and erroneous doctrine, or rather raving, in favor and in defence of 'liberty of conscience,' for which most pestilential error, the course opened by that entire and wild liberty of opinion, which is every where attempting the overthrow of civil and religious institutions; and which the unblushing impudence of some has held forth as an advantage of religion." "From hence arise those revolutions in the minds of men, hence this aggravated corruption of youths, hence the contempt among the people of sacred things, and of the most holy institutions and laws; hence in one word, that pest of all others most to be dreaded in a state, unbridled liberty of opinion." This Pope saw full well, that the hoary superstitions of Romanism could not stand the test of free inquiry and liberty of opinion. Hence his trembling apprehension of them, and his zeal to stifle them forever.

Some years ago what is termed the Christian Alliance was formed in the city of New York, the object of which was to circulate the Bible without note or comment, in catholic countries in their own language. The same Gregory in 1844, fulminated a bull against this association, from which this passage is taken:

"Moreover, venerable brothers, we recommend the utmost watchfulness over the insidious measures and attempts of the Christian Alliance, to those who, raised to the dignity of your order, are called to govern the Italian churches, or the countries which Italians frequent most commonly, especially the frontiers, and parts whence travellers enter Italy. As these are the points on which the sectarians have fixed to commence the realization of their projects, it is highly necessary that the bishops of those places should mutually assist each other zealously and faithfully, in order, with the aid of God, to discover and prevent their machinations.

"Let us not doubt but your exertions added to our own, will be seconded by the civil authorities, and especially by the most influential sovereigns of Italy, no less by reason of their favorable regard for the catholic religion, than that they plainly perceive how much it concerns them to prostrate these sectarian combinations. Indeed, it is most evident from past experience, that there are no means more certain of rendering the people disobedient to their princes than rendering them indifferent to religion, under the mask of religious liberty. The members of the Christian Alliance do not conceal this fact from themselves, although they declare that they are far from wishing to excite disorder; but they notwithstanding avow that, once liberty of interpretation attained, and with it what they term liberty of conscience among Italians, these last will naturally soon acquire political liberty."

Here is palpably revealed the natural connection and alliance between the despotism of the Papal See and the monarchs of Europe. The only object of the Christian Alliance was to give unadulterated the Holy Scriptures to the people of Italy. And how it excited the fears of the Pope. He knew that the light and power of the gospel would, wherever it was admitted, establish religious liberty, and that would be the precursor of civil liberty; and he knew full well that civil and religious deposits were its natural enemies, and therefore he invoked his natural allies to aid him in his attempts to exclude it from all their dominions.

The last bull of Gregory XVI, dated 8th May, 1844, is a long document, and shows throughout the greatest hostility and dread of the circulation of the Bible in Italy, and in Catholic countries. I will read one or two more passages from it:

"Subsequently, when heretics still persisted in their frauds, it became necessary for Benedict XIV to superadd the injunction that no versions whatever (of the Bible) should be suffered to be read but those which should be approved of by the Holy See, accompanied by notes derived from the writings of the Holy Fathers, or other learned Catholic authors."

"As for yourselves, my venerable brethren, called as you are to divide our solicitude, we recommend you earnestly in the Lord, to announce and proclaim, in convenient time and place, to the people confided to your care, these apostolical orders, and to labor carefully to separate the faithful sheep from contagion of the christian alliance, from those who have become its auxiliaries, no less than those who belong to other Bible societies, and from all who have any communication with them. You are consequently enjoined to remove from the hands of the faithful alike the Bibles in the vulgar tongue which may have been printed contrary to the decrees above mentioned of the sovereign Pontiffs, and every book proscribed and condemned, and see that they learn, through your admonition and authority, what pasturages are salutary, and what pernicious and mortal. Watch attentively over those who are appointed to expound the Holy Scriptures, to see that they acquit themselves faithfully according to the capacity of their hearers, and that they dare not, under any pretext whatever, interpret or explain the holy pages contrary to the tradition of the Holy Fathers, and to the service of the Catholic church."

"Let me know then, the enormity of the sin against God and his church which they are guilty of who dare associate themselves with any of these societies, or abet them in any way. Moreover, we confirm and renew the decrees recited above, delivered in former times by apostolic authority, against the publication, distribution, reading and possession of books of the Holy Scriptures translated into the vulgar tongue."

What a spectacle is here exhibited. The infallible head of the only true church, attempting most zealously and industriously, to exclude from the mass of mankind, the Holy Scriptures, the book of light and life. The ablest minds in the Protestant world could offer no refutation of the errors of Romanism, equal in point, force, and the power of conviction, to this conduct of the Pope. The sense of mankind will be, that it could have been suggested only by the spirit of darkness. But this has been paralleled in our country of gospel light and liberty. In the town of Champlain, State of New York, in 1842, a Mr. Belmont, a missionary of the Jesuits, held a protracted meeting, which was attended by a great number of Catholics from some distance; and they, who had any, were required to bring in their Bibles and testaments. Many were brought, and by this Jesuit, and other Catholics, publicly burned. How long before we may expect similar scenes in Kentucky where the gentleman from Washington, (Mr. Kelly,) says there are sixty thousand Catholics?

The example of France, in the subversion of her monarchy and the establishment of republican institutions, has been held up to us as a testimony that Popery and Romanism favors liberty. France always resisted the assumptions and aggressions of the Pope more perseveringly than other Catholic countries, her kings making with him the question, that they had the right, to his exclusion, of the appointment of all Bishops for and give him my opinion. I am particularly desirous of defining my position, especially as I do not go as far as the gentleman from Madison, who has so ably and clearly argued this question and defended my report, nor half as far as my venerable friend from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) who stated that the powers of this convention were absolute and unlimited except so far as restrained by the federal constitution; but before I get through, I will endeavor to make myself understood. I stand supported in my opinion as to the powers of this convention and the principles of this report by the action of nearly all the conventions which have assembled in this country. When you, Mr. President, placed me at the head of this committee, understanding that some doubt had been expressed by distinguished gentlemen as to the power of this convention finally to adjourn, I made it my duty to investigate it. I have consulted and conferred with some of the ablest lawyers in the state, and with but one exception, I have found none who doubt. I have carefully examined the proceedings of other state conventions, and although most of them have submitted their constitutions to the people for ratification, I know of but one that deemed it necessary to re-assemble. They have invariably left it to the governor and legislature, coupled with their own ordinances, to put the new government into operation, when it should have received the sanction of the people. The position of the gentleman from Nelson is contradicted by the practice of almost every state in the union.

Nor will it do for gentlemen to do away with the force of precedent and the practice of other states, in this particular, by attempting to show that the statutes calling the convention in those states have caused their action as to the mode of the submission of the constitution and their subsequent proceedings. To do so, would be to make a legislative act, calling a convention, the charter of its rights! This I deny! It is wholly at war with what I believe to be the nature and power of sovereignty as represented in a legally called convention. I have already admitted that we owe our existence to the law of the last legislature, but I have shown by our action here in regard to our pay, that we were not limited in our power by it. Could that act have limited us to action on the judiciary alone, by enacting that our action should be confined to that subject? Is there a gentleman who will contend for it? I apprehend not; and yet if the act is to have an effect upon us, and we possess no power ourselves, we should be forced to this conclusion! Sir, I cannot subscribe to this doctrine. As representatives of the sovereignty of the people, we are bound by no restrictions of a mere legislative enactment. No provision, it occurs to me, of any act of the legislature requiring a constitution to be carried into effect in a given way, would be binding on a legally organized convention called under it. The convention might recommend a different mode to the people, and they might choose to adopt it. I believe the exercise of sovereignty by this convention is on a more extended sphere than that by the legislature; and yet I do not agree with the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) and the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Turner,) that the powers of this convention are unlimited, save so far as they are restrained by the federal government. I believe the powers of this convention are great and plenary; but I deny that they have not a just and natural limit. It possesses delegated power, and like all other delegated power, is limited by the legitimate object for which it was delegated. I promised I would refer to this restriction of power, and I will now do so. What is it? I believe that it confines the power of this convention within the objects of republican government! We were elected and sent here to frame such a government, and are confined to that object! This restriction is as natural as it is just! Our delegated power, great as it may be, does not authorize us to overstep then the protection of life, liberty and property. If we do so, we are usurping power not delegated. If this convention were to ordain that any one should be hung by the neck who should hereafter make an abolition speech, or that property might be taken without compensation, is it contended that even if the constitution was ratified, that such provisions could be enforced? Would not such an ordinance be declared by any able and upright judge the vilest usurpation? The glorious writ of habeas corpus must have lost its efficacy, if any citizen could be thus ruthlessly dealt with, under the specious but hollow pretence of constitutional enactment. Away with such a heresy, and strike it away from any arch on which we propose to build!

While we act within the objects of a republican government, then we are sovereign, then we are supreme, and have power to carry this thing out. It was for this reason that I voted for the proposition of the gentleman from Bourbon, in which he declared that the right of property is before and higher than all constitutions. I voted for it with all my heart, for I believe the naked savage, where no human constitution exists, when he shall kill his dear, or his bear, is entitled, as the husbandman is to his axe, to the skins; and when they are attempted to be taken away from him, it is a violation of his natural rights. If he goes into a compact with others, I believe that he will go for safety to himself and protection to his property. I believe government is intended for the protection of life, liberty and property, and when any attempt to violate any of them, they overstep that compact and become usurpers. Such are my crude views of the limitations of the powers of this convention! Look into this book of thirty constitutions of thirty states and see how many of them re-assembled according to the proposition of my friend from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe,) to re-adopt that constitution or to proclaim it.

Examine them still further, and see how many of them, after a submission, have entrusted to the legislature, (after the ratification by the people of the constitution,) the duty of putting the new government into operation. Does it not occur to the gentleman from Nelson, that it is strange that none of these states foresaw the danger and difficulty that has occurred to him? I know that my distinguished friend is actuated by the purest motives in offering his resolution, I should be the last man upon this floor to question his zealous devotion to the cause of constitutional reform, or the ardent interest which he feels in the triumphant success of the new constitution; but he will pardon me for saying that I think it springs rather from his fears than his judgment.

Look to Virginia. There they submitted it, having first provided, by appropriate penalties, for the selection of a new legislature under, and requesting the old legislature to provide, by adequate penalties, for the proper submission to the people. Did they transcend their power? The great men then thought they possessed it. They provided for the election of members of legislature under the new constitution before it was adopted and inflicted penalties! Yet we are told we have not the power to put this constitution into operation. My friend from Daviess said, if we adopted this report a part of the constitution would be active, and a part passive; that we would be acting under the old constitution till the new one is adopted. We attach a schedule to it to say how it shall be put into operation, and I would ask my friend from Daviess this question. Suppose we should say this constitution shall not take effect till the year 1870?

Mr. TRIPPLETT. I will ask the gentleman in turn, suppose we say it shall not go into effect till the year 1870, but in the meantime appoint officers to discharge particular duties, how shall we punish them for a failure?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will endeavor to answer. If we say it shall not go into effect till 1870, we of course shall have the old constitution in existence; and if we request the present legislature to provide, by adequate penalties, for submission, and if they disobey, can we not under these laws thus passed punish them under the old constitution?

Mr. TRIPPLETT. I would like to have the gentleman answer me this question. The old constitution is in force till the new one is adopted, but the old constitution does not contain any clause requiring duties of clerks and sheriffs, which we require them to perform. Where do you derive power to punish at all? It is not in the old constitution, and the new does not go into operation.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will answer my friend with great pleasure, and I will show that both the gentlemen from Nelson have acted on what I regard mistaken principle. What have we said in the judiciary report? We have delegated power to the legislature to keep four or three of the judges of the appellate court in office if they please. We have, I say, also fixed the time of the election of these judges, which will be twelve months after the new constitution is adopted, and some months after the new legislature, under the new constitution, is elected. Will we not have a portion of the old and new constitution working at the same time? Unquestionably. But my friend would say that this has been provided for in the new constitution. Equally true; but this very provision answers my friend's objection, of the positive and negative action of the old and new constitution at the same time. It takes place by one provision in the new constitution. Have we not the right to put it there? But my friend from Daviess wishes again to know, how is it we can fine an officer for failing to perform a duty before the new constitution goes into effect, which is not provided for by the old? Cannot the legislature, about to assemble, at our request, provide by adequate penalties for the plan of submission as directed by us? Have they not this power under the old constitution? Would they not do it? Did they not do it on a former occasion; and if they did, would not our object be achieved and a return here unnecessary? So, in regard to opening the polls for members of the general assembly under the new constitution in 1850. We direct it to be done in this constitution, and we declare penalties against the officers who fail to comply. This duty will not be required of these officers until August, 1850, which will be three months after the ratification of the new constitution. If they fail, would they not be subject to penalties of the new constitution? At the time of their failure, the said constitution has been ratified by the people—our acts sanctioned—and I am at a loss to know why said officers would not be rendered amenable? In both cases then, suggested by my friend, ample provision can be provided for the contingencies suggested, and in no event could our re-assembly be absolutely necessary. So at least thought the committee, or a majority of them. At our first meeting my friend from Wayne and myself stood alone on this report; but before it was made, a majority of the committee came over and concurred in its suggestions. The committee, like all humanity, are finite and short-sighted. They may have overstepped the mark; but they cannot see, that in the power claimed for this convention in the recommendations of that report, that they have introduced any new and novel principle into the science of government, or that their claim is not sanctioned both by truth, authority, and precedent.

There is another ground on which the opposition to the report is strenuously insisted on. On that ground, I shall not have a great deal to say. That is a ground which comes home to every man's own heart, and must be decided by his own judgement.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFE. Did I understand the gentleman to say part of the judiciary report is to go into effect now?

Mr. STEVENSON. No sir. You misunderstood me. I replied in answer to my friend from Daviess, that we should have old judges acting and holding offices now held by them for a year after the adoption of the new constitution, in consequence of the time fixed in the constitution for their election.

With regard to the expediency of this question, I was about to remark, when I was interrupted, that I have not so much to say. I supposed that every delegate on this floor would have examined the subject with the lights which come nearest home to his own conscience and his own constituents; but there are one or two reasons which, as a matter of expediency, strike me with some force. While I believe that every man on this floor desires this constitution shall be approved, it may be an important question whether we shall, by coming back here, give strength to the new constitution. I came to the conclusion that we should weaken it by coming back. I may be wrong; but I will state the reasons of my opinion. If we re-assemble, we re-assemble the same body, with the same allegiance to our constituents which now binds us. Suppose that some six, or eight, or ten, should find out we had honestly mistaken what our people desired. Would not they be compelled to rise up and move a reconsideration of that portion of the constitution? If I recollect right, the report on the judiciary passed by a vote of two or four only. On other subjects, there were still closer votes. Gentlemen will return here with express injunctions that they shall change their votes, and it is done. We then really change the constitution. Does any gentleman suppose we would not be obliged to re-submit it when we had changed it in any important point? It is no longer the constitution which we first submitted. It is a new constitution, changed in some important feature. Two or three votes would do this. Does not honesty and good faith require that if we change it, we should re-submit it. To fail to do so, would be but, by our present submission, "to keep the word of promise to the ear, but break it to the hope." Well, suppose it re-submitted, and a second re-assembling. Further changes in public sentiment would require re-submission, and the only possible limit to our re-assembling would be the improbable contingency of adopting a constitution so perfect in itself, and so acceptable to our constituents, as not to demand any change. Suppose, again, some of the present convention were to die, or be absent, and the convention should think proper to introduce a proposition of amendment on some important subject which passed by a close vote, would not this require a re-submission; and if, in every submission, the ground is taken that we must come back, where is it to end? May not this very argument be used by skilled and talented opponents with great force in their crusade against the new constitution.

Again: how many votes will not this new constitution lose, should we come back, by men who, although they prefer it to the old one, yet in consequence of some objectionable feature, will vote against it, hoping that upon our return, that objectionable feature will be amended? These are some of the views which led me to my conclusion of the impolicy of our return.

The gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe,) seems worried and excited at an article in the Commonwealth, on which he has severely commented, and which he thinks was aimed at him.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Not at me, but at the whole body.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not understand the article as offensive to the whole house. I did not regard it as personally offensive to any individual in this house. I differ in politics with that paper, and it is not my business to defend it. There are able men prepared to do that who agree in politics with the paper. But while I differ with the editor of that paper politically, he is my warm, personal, and devoted friend. I have known him long and well. I had the good fortune to serve with him on this floor, and he stood by me, battling with me for this convention. And from that time to this his voice has never ceased, nor has his pen stopped sending forth articles in favor of this convention. I say that, because it might be inferred that he had some sinister motive in wishing to defeat the constitution. This is not so. I know him to be as warm a convention man as any that treads the sod of old Kentucky. I know him to be as chivalrous, enlightened, and liberal as any among the gallant sons of this proud old commonwealth. I know him to be above undertaking, indelicately, unjustly, or improperly, to wound the sensibilities of any living man upon this floor. I know this from long intimacy with him. He felt as a convention man, and I presume, under some excitement, he wrote the article. I say this, without seeing him, and without the slightest knowledge that the piece was to come out. I have not seen him since it came out; but I make the statement from my knowledge of the man. I am ready to vouch he did not mean any disrespect to this convention. As an editor he thought he had the right, and as a convention man he thought he was doing his duty to censure or advise what he thought might injure the constitution. I admire his boldness, and I love the man, though I may and do differ with him wholly in his political views.

Mr. NUTTALL. Have you ever seen an article in the Commonwealth in favor of the constitution, before the meeting of this convention?

Mr. STEVENSON. I know nothing about the course of the Commonwealth before that time, and what I have said, I have said to vindicate my personal friend, believing he did not intend to insult this convention. But I did hear the editor of that paper say he intended to patronize the constitution, and I know he did that in the legislature. He is not a man who can falsify his word. Mr. President, I am done.

Mr. MAUPIN. We told the people that we would refer the new constitution to them to accept or reject. There was no occasion for making any such promise, as all power is inherent in them. If they reject the new constitution, then they fall back upon, and re-adopt the old one. Every sensible man must know that when we adjourn and go home, we neither lose all our powers, nor have we any more conferred upon us. There is no interregnum in this government—the old constitution stands, or the new one goes into operation.

Mr. MAOHEN. The question now before the house is one of great moment. Is it one upon which there is no doubt? Is it not such a question as requires our careful consideration and cautious action? I came here with no disposition to return. My opinion was and is, that we have the power to submit our work to the people for their approval or rejection, and if accepted by them, to declare that it shall then be the organic law of the land. But is it a question upon which there is no doubt rationally entertained? We have the evidences in this house of not only doubt, but settled conviction, that we have no such power. When I see gentlemen of great legal learning and experience occupying this position, it is enough to satisfy me, as one of this body, as to the prudent course to be taken. If, upon a question of so much importance, there is doubt as to the legality of a proposed action, and another course can be taken, upon which there is no doubt, it seems to me that we should not hesitate as to our duty. Take that course which is plain and certain, and ensure the work. If, with the doubts in and out of this house, as regards our power to delegate authority to any other, of promulgating our work as the organic law of the land—if we separate and go hence to return no more, what difficulties may be drawn upon the commonwealth. Suppose that the office-holders of this state, opposed to a convention, should refuse to yield up their offices under the pretence that our work, from the manner of its submission, was void; in what condition, I ask you, would our state be placed? Commotion, confusion, and strife would necessarily be the result. I differ with some gentlemen here as to our powers. They are restricted in some respects, and the gentleman from Kenton in quoting from the action of the convention of Virginia, has not produced a case in point. Let me read from the preamble to the constitution of Virginia, the authority under which they acted. It proceeds as follows, to recite their powers:

"And whereas, the general assembly of Virginia, by an act passed on the tenth day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, entitled, 'An act to organise a convention,' did authorize and provide for the election by the people, of delegates and representatives to meet and assemble in general convention, at the capitol in the city of Richmond, on the first Monday of October, in the year last aforesaid, to consider, discuss, and propose a new constitution, or alterations and amendments to the existing constitution of this commonwealth, to be submitted to the people, and to be by them ratified or rejected."

Such is the authority under which the Virginia convention assembled. I ask you, if such power was delegated to this body by the legislative action under which we assembled? None will contend that it was. One of the requisitions of the legislature of Virginia was, that the work of the convention should be submitted to the people of Virginia for their adoption or rejection. That requisition carried with it all necessary powers, to be exercised in order to accomplish that which was required of the convention; and hence they might, with propriety, impose fines and punishment upon officers failing to do their duty. But our directions are, by the legislation of last winter, to alter, amend, or re-adopt the old constitution; and the submission to the people, is only in obedience to the demands of those from whom we received authority to assemble here. We may claim obedience to our mandate, but have no power to enforce it. Under these circumstances, our only safe policy is to return here and adopt the work we have put together, or re-adopt the old constitution, as directed by our constituents. I am for taking that course as the course of safety, and trust that this house will so determine.

Mr. HARDIN. If we cannot delegate to the governor and the second auditor the power to make a constitution, surely I cannot delegate to my friend from Ballard to make my speech. I rose and read from this book to show that we cannot delegate our power which is given on account of our skill. When an apprentice is bound to a master on account of his skill, and the master dies, he is free; because he was bound for a particular purpose. A judge cannot act by deputy, because he is appointed on account of his skill. A clerk can, because his is a mere ministerial act; but a judge cannot appoint a deputy. A legislator cannot act by his deputy. Why? Because he is sent here on account of his skill. How absurd would it be for one of the representatives of Nelson county to send his deputy here. I have a son-in-law, by the name of Thomas W. Riley, who is a representative. If he was to give me a power of attorney to take his seat could I do it? Or if my other son-in-law was to direct me to take his seat in the senate, it could not be done. Mr. Helm cannot act by deputy. We are sent here to amend, alter, or re-adopt the old constitution. What do we propose to do? Why, we propose to appoint another set of gentlemen to make this very thing which we are sent here to make. We are to submit our work to the people, and they vote on it. Can they make a constitution? No sir. Can the people, in their primary assemblies, make laws? No sir. Have they power under the organic laws, rules, and regulations, for future government? No sir. But under the great principle, that the voice of the people must be heard, and when heard respected and attended to, we ask them for their opinion on this subject; and, as faithful representatives, we are bound to conform to that opinion. But we are the power which is to make the constitution. Yet, under the great republican principle of instruction, we call on them for advice, for instruction; and what they advise and instruct, I have no doubt the whole hundred members here will conform to.

Well, we propose getting the opinion of the people. What next? The sheriffs are to compare the polls in each county where they have a precinct, and the returns sent to the secretary of state. What next? The governor is to call a council, composed of the secretary, the attorney general, and second auditor. And whoever may choose to attend as spectators, can attend and look on. Very well; they look on, and the governor, the attorney general, and the auditor count the polls. Suppose it comes to a hard contest whether votes are good or bad, cast for or against the constitution, who is to decide? Why, the governor, I suppose, and his secretary to help. Is the attorney general to throw in his weight, and the second auditor, too? Suppose it comes to within ten votes, and there are spurious votes, or supposed alterations in the record—the governor and his officers are to judge of this, and when the result is ascertained they are to make proclamation to the world. I say that in this we should delegate to these officers the very thing we were sent here to do. We are to come here, we are to count the votes given, and we are, by a faithful comparison and addition of the votes, to ascertain whether the constitution is adopted. If it is, then we are to announce it, and proclaim it to the world as our constitution.

The honorable chairman (Mr. Stevenson)—who is a man of great ability, and is a very fair new edition of a most illustrious father, and if I should say a little improved, I hope I would not be offensive, because all new books should be an improvement—says the committee had great trouble on this subject. He says they were all against him, save the gentleman from Wayne, who stood up to him most manfully. Very well, and how did you change them? They directed him to make a report to present to the committee when they met again, and he talked to them and talked to them, till they were willing he should make this report.

He says the Virginia convention did not re-assemble, and the Tennessee convention did not. Very well, the proposition may not have occurred to them. But the gentleman paid but a just tribute to the illustrious gentlemen he named, who framed the Virginia constitution, and every compliment he paid them I subscribe to, and I bow with profound reverence to the very names as they are mentioned. The names of Madison, Munroe, Marshall, Johnson, and Tazewell, I bow to, but I hold we are bound to come back and count the votes for and against the constitution, and then if there is a controversy, we are bound to decide that question ourselves.

I have had this question very much at heart for a long time—a long time. I repeatedly mentioned it in public speeches made last summer, and wherever I named it, it met with universal approbation. I knew the opposition which the constitution would have to encounter. When I first started this question of a convention, it was doubtful whether we would have a majority or not, but it was a growing question, and as it grew it gained proselytes and became stronger and stronger, and the prospect brighter and brighter, just like the sun in rising, the fox-fire of the opposition seemed to disappear, and at last the office-holders—the first year, great God, how they followed me round and spoke. When I first went to Washington, there was William Booker, and the judge, his brother, who mounted the rostrum and spoke against me. In Green Judges Buckner was present, and I expected they would mount me. But at last they all agreed with me, except the clerk and his family. Then I spoke the whole week in Nelson county, and on Saturday night at Bardstow I was haunted by the clerks and their families. On Monday morning a clerk asked the judges at a precinct to open the polls at 8 o'clock, and when the judge asked "what is the reason," he answered to prevent Hardin from speaking, for he will get the people to vote for a convention. After I spoke, every man but three voted for a convention.

Now we have done all the people claimed. We have taken the appointing power from the governor and restored it to the people, where of right it belongs. We have taken away the life tenure of office, which is an anti-republican feature in the present constitution. We have done more. By our whole regulations put together, we shall save from $30,000 to $35,000 a year. Every great object of the people is answered. But yet we know there is a party greatly dissatisfied. There are not less than thirty or forty thousand men against any constitution we may make, and in favor of the present. To be sure there were not so many the second year as the first. Why? Because the office-holders saw we would carry the convention, and then they pitched in, and swore they were in the hunt from the start, (laughter,) although we know they came in after the first year's voting. O, they were the greatest men for a convention; like Falstaff, when he found Hotspur dead, who was killed by the prince, he picked him up and he waddled off with him, the old fat drunkard, and threw him down before the king, and said I expect to be made a duke or an earl, if not the king may kill the next Percy himself. So with these men. The second year they swore they had killed Hotspur themselves, when they had not stuck a lance in him. (Laughter.) Nay sir, more. I saw men who at first stood off and never put their names to it till they saw the state of the weather out of doors. But when they saw the convention was a beautiful trade wind, how they spread their sails—great God how they pitched in! (Renewed laughter.)

We have all the opposers of the constitution to fight. We have all the emancipationists and all the office-holders for life, or a great body of them to fight. These will all combine, and thousands and thousands will be raised to defeat it.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. May I ask the question; suppose the people should reject this constitution, and this convention assemble in June, do you think it competent for this convention to make a new constitution or make amendments to the work? And if you think it competent, would you be in favor of it?

Mr. HARDIN. We should meet with the same powers as at first.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. Will we make any change?

Mr. HARDIN. Nothing material. I was saying these three classes of opposers we shall have. First the emancipationists, then those who prefer the old constitution, and next the old hunkers. Thank God, I am a barnburner, for I understand the old hunkers to be those who hold on to office until God takes them away, and as Jefferson said, "they scarcely ever die." I understand barnburners to be those who are opposed to those in office, and are as anxious to get rid of them as the old trapper when he said if he could not get rid of the rats, he would burn the barn, rats and all.

How long may a man hold on to office? Fifty or sixty years I suppose. I know men in office who have, by themselves or their vendees, been in office sixty years, and are now precisely like old brother Dobson. Dobson is represented as a handsome young man who was married at the age of twenty one. On the night of the wedding there was a knocking at the door, and a servant went and came back and told his master that a stranger who wished to see him was at the door. Dobson went and enquired who he was, and what he wanted. The stranger replied, "I am death, and I have come for you." "My God!" said Dobson, "you have called out of time." [Laughter.] Said death, "I know I have called in rather a bad time; I will wait a little." In sixty years he came again, and again he was asked what he wanted, and he said, "I have come for you Mr. Dobson." "Good God!" said Dobson, "have you come so soon? I did not expect you so soon as this." [Renewed laughter.] So it is with the office-holders; when they have been in sixty years, they say they have only been in a short time. Jacob said his days had been a hundred and twenty and five years, and they had been few and evil; so it is with the office-holders—they think after sixty years they have been in office only a few days.

I want to see rotation in office, and the corrupt sale of sheriff's offices at the court house door, or in the court yard, taken from this government; when you leave it to the people, you can do that. My dear friend, you cannot sell a clerkship then for $3,000, nor for $14,000, as was done in Lexington; nor in the streets, cry out the offices from one end of the street to the other.

Sir, I was unhappy from the day this convention was called till last night. I was afraid all these discordant interests, the emancipationists, the old hunkers, and the old constitution men, would combine and raise money—which is the sinews of war politically as well as civilly—and no man would subscribe one dollar for the constitution, and that they would mash it up. A dark cloud hung over our prospects till last night. The lightning seemed to flash, and the thunder to roll; but thank God, it is past, and I see the bright sun of Austerlitz now bursting on the people. Yes, sir, the bright sun is shining on us, and as sure as the Lord liveth we will have a constitution, and the people will take it. Where will be the emancipationists? Will they undertake to kill you, friend Meriwether? (Laughter.) Never. They will not be a thorn in your side. Where will be the old hunkers? They will swear they were with us from the first. Where will be the old constitution men? Like the rest of the horses when they ran against Flying Childers, they will be no where in the race. We will have an easy time of it if we determine to come back here. Did not the world say that Sampson was a fool for permitting his hair to be cut off by that woman Delilah? Why? He was shorn of his strength. If we adjourn sine die, we shall be like Sampson with his hair cut off. For what power have we then? None, not even to kick a dog from our feet; and like a dog we shall go sneaking home. And when asked what you have done—"nauthin, nauthin, nauthin." (Laughter.) Have you made a constitution? No. We have left it to the sheriffs and our county courts, whose very offices under the old constitution will depend on not doing the very thing we order them to do. We have left it to the governor and his council, and they are either to make it or not, as they please. Why, we shall feel as if we have no power at all—none.

We can pass resolutions, and they are to be enforced for the purpose of carrying into effect the great principles we establish here, but we cannot make laws. To be sure, I see there is an amendment for fixing a penalty, and whether right or wrong I will go for it; any thing in the world to get a good constitution adopted.

Sir, I regret very much a proposition offered last evening which was misunderstood, and that time was not given by my colleague to the chairman of the committee. He has been a very able man, and I may say more—he is a modest one. I am sorry I cannot get some one to pay me the same compliment. (Laughter.) I know I have spoken a great deal, but I think the gentleman from Madison speaks as long as I do; and what is more, he speaks better than I, except that he said his proposition was as clear as the sunshine on the hill yonder, when I took two or three witnesses to the window, and the sun did not shine at all, but was covered with clouds. (Laughter.)

I was sorry to see an article which appeared in the Commonwealth to-day. I have known Mr. Hodges a great many years, and I have had a great deal of experience in public printing, and I will take this occasion to say, that as an executive officer he is the best I have ever known, except one man I knew in the National Intelligencer office. The execution of his work is of such a character, and it is so promptly done, that he would always get my vote, no matter what might be his political principles. He does his work well, and that is the reason why I would vote for him. I have, however, thought that that paper should long ago have stepped forward and vindicated the members of this convention from the foul aspersions heaped upon them by the press of Kentucky. It has not done so. I would to God these expressions were not in that paper. But this has nothing to do with the public work. He does his work better, and prints better than any man I ever saw, and if he was a democrat this day, the most rabid one that ever lived, knowing his skill, I would vote for him.

My friend from Shelby was at the court in that county the other day, and the opposers of the constitution there were overjoyed, in hopes that we should adjourn without putting the constitution into operation. And so earnest was he that when he was telegraphed as to what was doing here, he hired a horse and buggy and came to the rescue in good time. There is an earnest wish by those opposed to the constitution, that we shall adjourn without an opportunity to return. I know it, and I beg of you who are in favor of the new constitution, to work for its adoption. You are staked upon it. We are bound, in vindication of our reputation, and in honor to the people, to see that they have their will carried out before we quit. But if we do not, we shall be the scorn and ridicule of every man, from Maine to the mouth of the Rio Del Norte. We shall be their laughing stock and scorn. I hope we shall come back, and that we shall not have to do much more than dot an i or cross a t. When will it suit you to come back? No day will suit me; but let us hold a recess, to keep the old constitution men in order, and to keep the emancipationists in order, and, above all things, to keep the old hunkers down.

Mr. PROCTOR. I am not in favor of the course suggested, because I am not willing to coerce the freemen of Kentucky by holding this thing over them in terrorem. If the people decide not to accept this constitution, I cannot consent to return here and make another constitution in opposition to the wishes of the people. I shall go home and do all I can to have the new constitution carried into effect. But I cannot return to my constituency, and say to them, "I have assisted in making a constitution, and voted to submit it to you for your adoption, or rejection, but if you do not coincide with my peculiar views, and do not endorse our work, I will return to Frankfort and lend my aid in framing another constitution." I cannot consent to lend my approval to the adoption of any such doctrine, or such course of proceeding. I would consider myself recreant to the high trust and confidence reposed in me by those whom I have the honor to represent on this floor. If the people reject the constitution, I shall bow with deference and respect to their will.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I rise to make a motion to re-commit this report, but before I do so I desire to submit two resolutions, which will elucidate my object. I desire to submit them as instructions to the committee, if the report be re-committed.

The Secretary read them, as follows :

"Resolved, That the constitution adopted by this convention shall go into effect on the day of June, 1850, unless by a vote to be cast by the qualified voters of the state on the first Monday of May, and the Tuesday thereafter, of said year, it shall be determined by said vote to reject said constitution.

"Resolved, That the legislature next to assemble do pass such laws as may be necessary to take the vote proposed in the foregoing resolution, and for due returns and a correct account and publication thereof; said laws to contain a provision providing that a majority of the votes cast shall decide upon the rejection or adoption of this constitution."

Mr. WILLIAMS. The difficulty in the minds of a great many delegates in relation to the pending proposition arises, it seems to me, from the fact that if the convention adjourns now, and does not return to adopt the new constitution, it will have done nothing. This is the principal argument enforced by the gentleman from Nelson, in the remarks he has just made. If we adopt the principle contained in these resolutions, the convention will not have to meet again in June and adopt this constitution, but if it should be rejected by the people, then the old constitution remains in force, and is the organic law of the commonwealth. According to the principle I have laid down, we shall be acting effectively, and it then cannot be said that we have done nothing. If the legislature fail to provide for the taking of the vote on the new constitution, it will not be our fault, and it will go into effect notwithstanding, and the argument respecting the failure of officers to do their duty, will amount to nothing.

COMMITTEE OF REVISION.

Mr. McHENRY moved the postponement of the pending question, to enable the committee of revision to make another report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McHENRY then made his report, and the amendments suggested were agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

The convention resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

Mr. WILLIAMS called for the yeas and nays on his motion to re-commit the report.

Mr. HARDIN asked that the roll be called, and it was called accordingly.

Mr. HARDIN. I will inquire of the honorable mover of that proposition, as he does not propose that the convention shall come back again, if he proposes to have the legislature designate how the constitution shall be proclaimed? We shall be through with it soon. The house last night decided to come back. The gentleman says it will go into effect if something does not happen. But the legislature may make something happen, and then we shall be what may be called functus officio.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The proposition offered by me adopts the constitution as our work at this time, but to take effect at a certain day hereafter, unless, in the mean time, the people shall cast a vote that it shall not be the constitution. I propose that the legislature shall pass such laws as may be necessary, in the mean time, to provide for taking such a vote as will be necessary to decide whether the people will receive or reject the constitution. Suppose the legislature pass no such law, the constitution will be the law of the land, because we have adopted it, and had the power to do so. Suppose there should be no vote taken, even if the legislature should provide for it by law, we have adopted the constitution, and it will be the constitution of the country. I am not unwilling to trust the legislature. I have no such apprehensions as the gentleman from Nelson. If upon my plan, as he says, we shall be functus officio, upon his plan, if the people reject the constitution, the convention, I think, will be non est inventus in June.

Gentlemen seem to have some doubt as to the power of this convention. Upon what is that doubt founded? I think it must be on this, if any thing: that the constitution, if not adopted by the people, can have no binding force before it is adopted by this convention. I humbly conceive that my proposition does away with that doubt; because we adopt the constitution, and it is the constitution, unless the people reject it. Where is there room for doubt? Is not our power complete? If there can be a doubt, I cannot see whence it can come. If gentlemen are determined to come back here, I think it will be to do nothing, because every thing we can then do, we can do now. Every thing we ought to do, if the people reject it, we can do now.

Permit me to say, there is no one more sincerely desires that this constitution should be adopted than myself. I will work as hard as any other man to secure that end, and my great objection to returning here, is, that it will put into the hands of the opposers of the constitution a most powerful weapon.

Mr. TURNER. The gentleman from Nelson has argued this question ingeniously. The constitution of the United States was adopted just in this way. The ratification of the federal constitution by nine states was required, and when given it became the constitution of the United States. The states ratified it and reported to congress. The convention dissolved and gave up all authority to congress, and left congress to proclaim the constitution if adopted by nine states, which was done. Cannot we give the legislature the power of declaring whether the people will consent to have this constitution put into operation? I think there is no doubt that we have the power.

Mr. HARDIN. I once met with William T. Willis, an eminent lawyer, at Marion court, and there never was a case occurred but he had had one in Green, or Adair, or Cumberland, which would just fit it. So my friend from Madison. He always has some case to fit, exactly. We cannot delegate our power, because we are sent here on account of our capacity. The states which adopted the federal constitution were a set of sovereignties, and their whole power, as states, had to be surrendered. But here are no sovereignties to be surrendered.

My worthy friend from Bourbon (Mr. Williams,) says he has labored hard for the convention. I know he has, and I hope he will not give out just now. We have made the constitution in a spirit of compromise, and I hope we shall hold on to it till it becomes the glorious constitution of Kentucky, and not let it go out of our hands till then.

Mr. KELLY. I have been opposed, from the first, to our meeting here a second time. I think there is a time when there should be an end to our voting and our talking; and, for the first time since I have been here, I will usurp the peculiar privilege of the gentleman from Madison, and call for the previous question.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The question was then taken on re-committing the report, with instructions, and the yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. IRWIN, there were yeas 31, nays 59:

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John L. Balingier, Wm. K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Wm. C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Jas. S. Chrisman, Edward Curd, James H. Garrard, Ninian E. Gray, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, James W. Irwin, Chas. C. Kelly, John H. McHenry, Thos. P. Moore, William Preston, Johnson Price, Thomas Rockhold, James Rudd, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson—31.

So the house refused to re-commit.

The amendment offered by Mr. BROWN was then agreed to.

The question was next taken on the section, and it was adopted.

Mr. STEVENSON, on behalf of the committee, withdrew the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the report, which were rendered unnecessary by the adoption of the amendment to the fourth section.

The eighth and ninth sections were next read, as follows, and adopted:

"SEC. 8. It shall be the duty of the general assembly elected under this constitution, at its first session, to make an apportionment of the representation of this state, upon the principle set forth in this constitution; and until the first apportionment shall be made as herein directed, the apportionment of senators and representatives among the several districts and counties in this state, shall remain as at present fixed by law.

"SEC. 9. All recognizances heretofore taken, or which may be taken before the organization of the judicial department under this constitution, shall remain valid, and shall pass over to, and may be prosecuted in the name of the commonwealth. All criminal prosecutions and penal actions which have arisen, or may arise before the re-organization of the judicial department under this constitution, and which shall then be depending, may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, in the name of the commonwealth."

The tenth section was read, as follows:

"SEC. 10. In the trial of any criminal case, the jury shall be judges of law and fact."

Mr. LINDSEY. I move to strike out the entire section, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"In all criminal trials, the courts having jurisdiction thereof shall be judges of the law, and the juries of the facts."

Mr. APPERSON. According to my recollection, the same proposition has been once rejected, and I would ask if it can be brought in again?

The PRESIDENT. If it has been once offered, it cannot again be offered.

Mr. LINDSEY. I supposed it was proper to offer it in this place. I offered it some weeks ago as an original proposition, when another branch of the constitution was under consideration. There is now a principle reported by the committee which involves a portion of the same proposition, and I desire now to offer it as an amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The proposition is, to strike out the section offered by the committee, and insert this. If this amendment has been once rejected, the chair is still of opinion it is not in order.

Mr. LINDSEY. Then I will move to strike out the section, as reported by the committee. It contains a strange principle, to my mind, to be incorporated in the constitution of the state. It is true, judges now differ as to the power of expounding the law in criminal cases under the existing constitution. Some have held that it was their right and duty, when asked, to state the law to the jury, and some have maintained that the power of the jury was just what is declared in the section proposed to be stricken out. The convention certainly have not reflected on the effect of this section, and the high principles it involves, or I am sure they will pause before they will declare that juries shall be exclusively judges of the law in cases involving liberty or life. So particular have we been that we have provided that no person shall be eligible to the office of judge of the circuit court, or court of appeals, until he has been a regular practicing attorney for eight years; and yet after this provision, which is intended to secure persons sufficiently acquainted with the law of the land to enable them to say what it is, and apply it to all questions in civil cases involving property, we are to conclude our great work by declaring that those learned and experienced as we require, and provide they shall be, are not to be trusted in criminal cases, but we are to have juries composed of men selected as they can be picked up from the court house yard, having the least acquaintance with the law, to make another tribunal before whom the judge is to bow, and on whose decisions life and liberty are to be determined. Sir, I cannot value the constitution, with such a provision in it, as worth having.

Too high do I value the personal rights of the subject to be ready or willing to place them under the entire control of men not sufficiently acquainted with legal forms to know when they are right, or why they are required.

Will the gentlemen of the committee inform the convention, if the section is adopted, where they contemplate the duty of the judge ends, and the power and authority of the jury begins? Will it be when the jury is empannelled and sworn, or after the evidence is heard? The competency of witnesses—the admissibility of proof offered, are questions in every cause of great moment. If the jury is to be judges of law and fact, necessarily they should determine upon these questions suggested, and then the whole power of the learned judge will be to preside over the assembly and keep order, or cause his officers to keep it.

What power will the judge have to grant a new trial, if an accused is improperly found guilty, either through the prejudice and passion that operate unjustly against him, or the erroneous determination of the law? I have never, as I remarked upon a previous occasion, been able to find out on what grounds judges who hold that juries are judges of law and fact in criminal cases, justify the power they exercise in granting new trials, after a jury has returned a verdict of guilty.

The judge, sir, must sit and quietly hear propositions urged upon the jury, which he knows not to be the law of the land—see counsel use books as authority that are not recognized, and if the section is retained, he is to be powerless in correcting such flagrant wrong—such terrible injustice.

I know, sir, there are greater chances of escape to the criminal, if the jury is to decide the law in Kentucky, as the impulses of our people are averse to the higher and more ignominious punishments allowed by our laws. But now and then spring up unaccountable cases, where condemnation is in advance of trial in the public mind, and the prejudiced and undisciplined citizen is left to determine the fate of an unfortunate person, and there is to be no power to stay the tempest, or arrest the sacrifice.

To those who know how long it takes to learn even the grades of offences, and how to distinguish, on facts, the particular class to which they belong, no argument need be offered of the utter fallacy, of expecting, at any time, to procure twelve jurors, in any court, who could of themselves, unaided, say what crime an offender they were trying had committed. And when the counsel prosecuting shall argue one way, and the counsel defending another, such a tribunal is an unsafe one to decide between them.

I have no disposition to extend my remarks, though I could give examples where juries, under the excitements improperly awakened amongst the people, have been led unjustly to condemn, and but for the action of the judges in arresting their verdicts and granting new trials, the victims of their prejudices would have been sacrificed of character or of life.

As much, Mr. President, as I prize the right of trial by jury, and as unwilling as I would be to see it abolished, I am still for confining the jury to the trial of fact, and of letting those whose time is devoted to study, and whom we select for their learning, be judges of the law. I hope, sir, the motion will prevail, and the section be stricken out.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to see this settled, one way or the other. With my experience, I have been in the habit of seeing the law read to a jury, and sometimes I have known lawyers forbidden by the judge to read law. I do not consider the man who may be a judge, in all instances the best lawyer. There may be those equally good at the bar as the one on the bench. But in addition to that, the commonwealth is supposed to have an able man to act for her. We have also in this state no appellate jurisdiction, so far as criminal cases go. I think this should be settled, and I am in favor of it as our ancestors adopted it, and as it is practiced throughout the United States.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. We had better leave this question, Mr. President, where we find it. The right of trial by jury is well understood, I think, in the country, and if we undertake to remedy the defects of the human intellect, or of the legal attainments of our judges—if we, for the purpose of producing harmony or uniformity in the opinions of the judicial incumbents, by constitutional provision on this delicate question of the rights of the jury in a criminal trial, I fear we may jeopard, in some degree, the value of the trial by jury, both to the commonwealth and the citizen.

The right to decide the law in a criminal case is one of joint possession, by court and jury. If the jury mistake the law and convict the accused, the judge has the right to award a new trial. The amendment proposed as a section to the constitution would deprive the judge of that all-important power—a power necessary to protect the unfortunate against the improper excitement of the public feeling, which always, more or less, infuses itself into the jury box.

I hope the new mode of appointing our judges will improve the judicial manners of the incumbents complained of; if not, that others will be selected, whose minds will look upon this question with an eye single to the pure administration of public justice, and the constitutional rights of the citizen.

I had supposed that since the trial of Fries, by Judge Chase, and the trial of the Judge himself, for his opinions and conduct on that trial, the question of the rights of the jury in a criminal trial, as well as the duty and power of the judge, had been understood. In that case, Judge Chase and his associate instructed the jury upon the law of treason, and left the jury to decide the law and fact. The counsel for the prisoner complained and protested against the right of the court to decide the law; the court told the counsel that they had instructed the jury what, in their opinion, was the law of the case—they had a right to do so, and the counsel had the right to argue to the jury, and satisfy them that the law was not as the court had decided. So I have understood the law to be. If by constitutional provision, such as that now proposed, you make the jury judges of law and fact, you open the door by which a popular criminal will certainly escape, and the unfortunate victim of unjust prejudice will be denied the protection of the impartial judge, in the exposition of the law. Better, in the language of our bill of rights, hold the ancient mode of trial by jury sacred.

Mr. STEVENSON. The honorable gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe), has referred us to the instance of Judge Chase, a judge who, although he instructed the jury in a criminal case, yet permitted the counsel of the prisoner to combat the law as expounded by the court. If the judiciary of Kentucky would invariably follow the example of Judge Chase in this particular instance, then I frankly admit there would be no necessity for this provision. But, is such the fact? Far from it. There are scarcely two judicial circuits in the state where there is any uniformity in the practice and management of criminal cases. In one circuit we see the counsel of the prisoner permitted to read and combat the law; in another, the judge, upon the motion of the attorney for the commonwealth, rules what the law is, and the prisoner's counsel is not allowed to combat or contradict it! Now, if we had an appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases, where errors committed by a nisi prius judge could be corrected, I should not be disposed to doubt the correctness of the rule by which the judge should always expound the law in criminal cases. But we have no such appellate tribunal for criminal cases. If the judge rules the law improperly, it is as immutable as the laws of the Medes and Persians, in those circuits where the prisoner's counsel is not allowed to combat the law as laid down. Now, I have as high an opinion of the judiciary of my own state as any gentleman upon this floor. In my own circuit we have in our judge an exemplar of judicial integrity, learning, and worth, which would adorn the highest supreme tribunal in this, or any other state. But while I admit all this, I am unwilling that where a man's life and liberty are at stake, the mere private and fallible opinion of one man as to what the law is, should not be controverted by the prisoner's counsel, who may be a much more learned jurist than the judge himself.

I see no injury to the commonwealth in this. The judge may rule the law as he honestly thinks it to exist. The prisoner's counsel may rebut it, and the attorney for the commonwealth has the opportunity, in conclusion, of showing the fallacy and error—if it exist—in the argument of the prisoner's counsel. I have no peculiar solicitude in this matter; my great object was to secure uniformity in the practice throughout the state. If it is not settled, as proposed by the committee, adopt the proposition of my friend from Franklin. In either event, we shall have a uniform practice. I submit the whole matter to the better judgment of the convention.

Mr. TURNER. I think this an exceedingly mischievous provision. If the whole law of the case is to be decided by a jury, every question of evidence will have to be submitted to them. On questions of law, running back to English law, should they not rely on the opinion of the judge? When he gives his reasons, and reads the law to them, that respect should be paid to his opinion which his station entitles him to. Suppose a jury convict contrary to law, shall there be no power to grant a new trial—no power to overrule the mistake?

This is one of the most important provisions in the whole constitution. There is nothing that reaches the citizens so deeply and powerfully as this, because it makes the jury the whole judge of the case, and allows them to take the life of a man under the influence of prejudice.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to amend, by adding the following:

"Except as to the admissibility of evidence; but the right of the court to grant a new trial on the application of the accused, shall not be questioned."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. APPERSON. I agree with the gentleman from Franklin in urging the convention to come to some conclusion upon this very important matter. He knows that the criminal law is administered differently in different circuits in the state. When we declare that the ancient mode of trial by jury shall remain as heretofore, the question arises, what has been that ancient mode? The answer is, one judge, at the instance of the commonwealth or the accused, instructs the jury as to the law of that case, and will not permit his instructions and expositions of the law to be called in question, nor a book to be read to the jury, whether to sustain or to overturn his instructions. Another judge will expound the law to the jury, but will tell them that they have the right to find the law to be different from his instructions, and hence the prosecution and the defence have the right to argue against the instructions of the court, and of course to read the law to the jury from the law books. Another set of judges (who compose the greatest number, from all that I have heard,) will not instruct the jury, unless the prisoner, as well as the commonwealth, agrees for the court to give instructions to the jury.

I ask gentlemen if we ought not to have this question settled? The gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Wickliffe,) states the law and the practice to be one way—the gentleman from Madison

(Mr. Turner,) another way. They differ most widely, and notwithstanding that difference, they both oppose any action by this convention on this subject. The senior gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) in a conversation which I had with him, some days ago, on this subject, said to me that it was unnecessary to put any provision in the constitution as to this matter, because he was satisfied that no judge would so far leave the old beaten track of the criminal law as to forbid the discussion of the law to the jury, and to read authority from the books.

The chairman of the committee (Mr. Stevenson,) has just told us of the mode of a jury trial, which he recently witnessed, in which the court instructed the jury, at the instance of the commonwealth, without the assent of the accused, and that no law was permitted to be read to the jury. When gentlemen find the contrariety of opinion is so great, it does seem to me that they must feel the necessity of having the matter settled; and I cannot see how gentlemen, entertaining views so different, should still insist that it is wholly unnecessary for us to declare what was "the ancient mode of trial by jury."

For myself, I believe that the jury should judge of the law as well as of the facts. As a lawyer I have been brought up under this mode of administration of the law, and I believe convictions are quite as common in those circuits where the law is tried by the jury, as well as facts, as in those in which the court assumes the prerogative of the jury, and expounds the law to them.

If the proposition submitted by the committee, as amended, declaring that the jury have the right to try the law and facts, except on the admissibility of evidence, and leaving to the court the right to grant a new trial to the prisoner, if improperly found guilty, be not in accordance with "the ancient mode of trial by jury," let us say what that mode was, so that in all time to come, there may be uniformity in the administration of the criminal laws. Although it is late in the session, I do hope that gentlemen will come up to the question, and not dodge it. It is very important to the rights of the citizen, that he should know what the law is. Let it be settled as the convention may deem right, but I do insist that it shall be settled in some way.

The PRESIDENT. I ask leave to make a few remarks on this question. (Leave, leave.)

There are periods of time when there are excitements which are strong and prejudices exist against a criminal. If the jury are to be the exclusive judges of the law, through their prejudices the most innocent man in the community may fall, while the judge who is acquainted with the law and in the habit of deciding upon it will not be influenced by it. There may be certain descriptions of crime which if committed the jury will lean toward the criminal, and under the pretence of deciding law and fact will find out a way to excuse, when if the judge declared the law, under the evidence they could not fail to convict. We have had a constitution without any such provision, and in making it imperative on a jury to decide law you will open a way for the greatest criminals to escape, or for prejudice to strike down any man in the community. My opinion is, decidedly, that we should not put this in the constitution.

Mr. NUTTALL. It seems to me we are taking dangerous ground. We all know that even with a judge to instruct a jury there is little chance to convict a man, and the greater the offense, the less chance is there. Such a principle as is in that section will do away with the effect of all criminal laws in the country. Crime is stalking abroad now. I want to know if we are to trammel a court in this way? Of what use will it be to have judges if this section is adopted? It is a monstrous principle, that I hope will be rejected.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move the previous question.

The main question was ordered to be now put. The question was then taken on striking out, and it was agreed to.

Sections eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen and fifteen were adopted without amendment, as follows:

"SEC. 11. The general assembly shall provide, by law, for the trial of any contested election of auditor, register, treasurer, attorney general, judges of circuit courts, and all other officers, not otherwise herein specified.

"SEC. 12. The general assembly shall provide, by law, for the making of the returns by the proper officers, of the election of all officers to be elected under this constitution; and the governor shall issue commissions to the auditor, register, and treasurer, as soon as he has ascertained the result of the election of those officers respectively.

"SEC. 13. That the sheriffs and other officers of the election shall be liable to all such fines and penalties for a failure to discharge the several duties imposed on them in this schedule, as are now imposed upon them by law, for a failure to perform their duty in conducting other general and state elections.

"SEC. 14. Should the county court of any of the counties of this commonwealth fail or refuse to appoint judges, clerks, or sheriffs to superintend the election, as provided for in article four of this schedule, the high sheriff of said county shall appoint such judges, clerks, and deputy sheriffs.

"SEC. 15. Should any of the sheriffs or deputies in any of the counties of this commonwealth, die, resign, or from any other cause be prevented from attending with the poll books, as directed in article four of this schedule, for the comparison of the votes on the adoption or rejection of the new constitution, it shall be the duty of the county court clerk, or his deputy in such county, to attend with said poll books, and aid in such comparison."

The convention then adjourned.

NOTE.—In the course of the preceding remarks of Mr. Hardin, he alluded to the circumstance of Mr. Meriwether's having been shot at during the canvass of last summer, in a manner to create the impression that the attack was made or instigated by the emancipation party. Mr. Meriwether was unable at the time to obtain the floor for explanation, and he desires us to say that he is of opinion that Mr. Hardin has done injustice to the party alluded to, in supposing them capable of such an act. It may have been the act of a mono maniac, or some deluded enthusiast, but he believes the emancipationists, as a party, are as incapable as any other set of men on earth, of committing or instigating so foul a crime.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On the motion of Mr. BALLINGER, it was Ordered, That Mr. COFFEY have leave to withdraw the papers, &c., presented by him in relation to the election of the delegate from the county of Casey.

PER DIEM IN THE RECESS.

On the motion of Mr. HARDIN, it was Resolved, That the members of this convention shall not be entitled to any per diem during the recess which the convention may take after the end of the present session, until the first Monday in June, 1850.

DUELING.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move to add to the twelfth article on the general provisions of the constitution, the following:

"The governor shall have power, after five years, to pardon all persons who shall in any wise participate in a duel, either as principal or seconds, and restore him, or them, to all the rights, privileges, and immunities to which he, or they, were entitled before such participation."

I am in the condition of one who is about to leave an important matter with the feeling that he has not done all he ought to have done. That idea keeps boiling up in my heart and my head. We know that if a man's "sins be as scarlet they shall be as wool," and I ask if this convention will incorporate in the constitution that there is one sin which shall not be pardonable? When General Root was on the northern frontier in the last war, General Scott sent him with a flag of truce to the British camp. When there, one of the British officers drank as a toast, "here is to James Madison, dead or alive." Root immediately responded, "here is to the Prince Regent, drunk or sober." Who could find it in his heart to disfranchise such a man, if the result of that act had been a duel? When the officer asked if he meant to insult him, he replied, he meant to answer that which was intended for an insult. Shall we say there is one crime for which there is no pardon? If I understand, there is no mode of trying the accused, nor any court of conciliation. I hope there will be no offence which the arm of mercy cannot reach.

Mr. WOODSON moved the previous question.

The main question was now ordered to be put.

The yeas and nays being demanded by Mr. NUTTALL, were yeas 50, nays 39:

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, William Chenault, Beverly L. Clarke, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Garrett Davis, Lu-

cious Desha, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Thos. J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, William Johnson, G. W. Johnston, Geo. W. Kavanaugh, Peter Lashbrooke, Thos. N. Lindsey, Alexander K. Marshall, William N. Marshall, David Meriwether, John D. Morris, James M. Nesbitt, Hugh Newell, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Rogers, James W. Stone, John D. Taylor, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, A. S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson—50.

NAYS—Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Chas. Chambers, James S. Chrisman, Jesse Coffey, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Andrew Hood, James M. Lackey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Martin P. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, John H. McHenry, Thomas P. Moore, Elijah F. Nuttall, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, Ira Root, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, William R. Thompson, John L. Waller, George W. Williams—39.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. NUTTALL. I move a re-consideration of the vote adopting the clause of the constitution on the subject of dueling, for I think the vote just given has destroyed its efficacy.

Mr. WOODSON moved to dispense with the rule requiring a motion to re-consider to lie over one day.

The motion was not agreed to.

ADDRESS TO THE PEOPLE.

Mr. CLARKE. I am instructed by the committee, to whom the duty of preparing an address to the people of Kentucky was assigned, to make the following report:

TO THE PEOPLE OF KENTUCKY.

FELLOW CITIZENS:—We, your delegates in convention assembled, in submitting to your consideration the constitution we have framed, deem it necessary to announce the chief alterations in that organic law under which you and your posterity will live. The progress of political science, and the advancement of popular privileges, have demonstrated, in the half century which has elapsed since the adoption of our present Constitution, that the people could more safely and wisely exercise many of those powers which were formerly delegated to others.

The restoration of this power to the source whence it emanated, has been a controlling principle of the convention.

We have boldly, but we trust not incautiously, removed those barriers which our ancestors deemed necessary to impose on the direct exercise of popular sovereignty; and thus we have done without apprehension, as we felt an abiding confidence in the wisdom and moderation with which these great powers would be exercised by the freemen of Kentucky.

The people, anxious as they are for reform, have been, nevertheless, extremely jealous of the exercise of this power in reference to the judicial department; republican experience has, however, taught that the selection of the judiciary, directly by the people, though the most important of all other departments—one which directly controls the lives, the property, and the liberty of the citizen, can as well be exercised by the people themselves; and hence to your hands, after mature deliberation, we confide it.

The great object of all governments should be to improve and elevate the condition of the governed—this can, in no wise, be better or more profitably done than by opening to all the door to social, civil, and political preferment; the result will be honorable, and crowded competition for office and thorough preparation to discharge the duties incumbent on its possession—hence the elective power by the people has been greatly extended, whilst the just and proper independence, and yet frequent and salutary accountability of the officer secured.

Among the changes made in the Constitution, are the following: Biennial sessions of the legislature, limited in their duration to sixty days. The protection of the public credit, by expressly prohibiting the legislature from contracting any debt, save for the expenses of the government, without the assent of the people, given at the polls. Private and special legislation is forbidden, and this hitherto fruitful source of expense, including the grant of manifold divorces, so long borne and so strongly condemned, is entirely removed.

The power of selecting the agents necessary to the just and proper administration of the government in its several departments having been vested directly in the people, has necessarily shorn the Governor of much of the power and patronage hitherto entrusted to him; it is still, however, his duty to enforce the faithful execution of the laws, and to secure and maintain, by executive authority, the safety and dignity of the commonwealth.

The mode of appointing the judges has been altogether changed, and for the first time in the history of this commonwealth, been given directly to the people. The court of appeals is to consist of four judges. The state is to be divided into four districts, in each of which an appellate judge is to be elected for the period of eight years; with the power, on behalf of the legislature, to reduce the number to three, should it be deemed expedient. The number of circuit judges is reduced from nineteen to twelve, and they are to be elected every six years in their respective circuits.

The old county court system is entirely abolished. The judges, one president and two associates, are to be elected by the people of the several counties, having the same jurisdiction, in all respects, which has heretofore been exercised by county courts, as organized by the Constitution of 1799, except when the county levy is to be imposed, or county debts created, when the General Assembly may require the justices of the peace, also elected by the people, to form a part of the court in the exercise of the great power of county taxation.

The clerks of the several courts, sheriffs, justices of the peace, and constables, and all other county officers, and officers of the militia, are to be elected by the people at stated periods.

The public credit, that great element of social and political power, has been still further sustained, by rendering inviolable the resources of the sinking fund, and by requiring the faithful application thereof to the payment of the interest on, as well as the principal of, the public debt.

The promotion and diffusion of knowledge among our citizens, has been secured by the dedication of the school fund to a system of public instruction in primary schools, which, if properly fostered and managed by the legislature, will, we hope, in time, as each county is secured by the Constitution in its due proportion of that fund, bring the means of a common education within the reach of all the children in the commonwealth.

It will be seen that the relation between master and slave remains as it was under the old Constitution. Public sentiment, so far from demanding any change, expressly rebuked any constitutional action thereon. Hence it has been untouched; and this great element of wealth, and of social and political power, will remain undisturbed and secure, so long as this Constitution shall continue the paramount law of the land.

The free negro population among us is conceded by all to be worthless, and highly detrimental to the value of our slaves, as well as the security of the owner. The new Constitution provides that no slave shall be emancipated but upon condition that such emancipated slave be sent out of the state.

The mode of amending the new Constitution is the same as in the old. Various plans were presented to the consideration of the convention, upon this deeply interesting and important subject. It was one which received, as it deserved, the attention of the people, and was ably discussed throughout this Commonwealth—a mode sanctioned by time, and irrespective of approval by the people, commending itself to our consideration by the stability that it imparts to the organic law—a stability so necessary to the safety and security of private rights, and to a fair and proper trial, and consequently to a just appreciation of the new Constitution.

The great personal, civil, and political rights which were declared and secured by the old, have been still further secured in the new Constitution.

It may be, that we have been engaged longer in this great work, than, in the estimation of many, was deemed proper. But amid the conflict of opinions and interests, so diverse and antagonistic in their character, time, patience, and discussion were necessary, and produced a spirit of conciliation and compromise—one so fruitful of good in all the relations and avocations of human life, and not less so in the political pursuits and in the discharge of the duties of the citizen.

This Constitution, the product of concession and compromise, may not be in all its parts perfect; yet we hope the same spirit which actuated us will pervade you, and procure for it your support and approval.

The article of the Constitution under which the convention was assembled, makes it the imperative duty of the convention, "to re-adopt, change, or alter the present Constitution." We have changed and altered that Constitution, but before we proclaim it as the organic law of the Commonwealth, we have determined to submit the same to you for your approval or rejection.

We would prefer to have closed the labors of the convention, by adjournment without day, and leave the duty of ascertaining the result of your judgment upon the new Constitution, and the annunciation of it as the supreme law of the land, to some other agency, did we believe we had the rightful power to require this duty to be performed by others; and more especially by officers over whose official conduct the convention, after adjournment, would have no control; whose obedience it could not command, and whose disobedience it could not punish.

The Constitution must emanate from the convention as the only constitutional organ of the people to carry into effect their will, upon the vital question, whether they will retain the old Constitution or adopt the one which is proposed. This issue should not be placed upon a contingency beyond the control of the convention and the people. The convention thought they were not permitted to leave the question of what shall be the Constitution of Kentucky, to be finally decided by any other human tribunal than the people themselves, through their delegates in convention assembled. We will, therefore, re-assemble on the first Monday in June, under the hope that our labors will be approved, and with a determination to submit to the expressed will of the people, and faithfully to give that will whatever it may be, its full power and effect.

C. A. WICKLIFFE, of Nelson.

R. APPERSON, of Montgomery.

ARCH. DIXON, of Henderson.

JN'O. D. TAYLOR, of Mason.

Mr. CLARKE. I will just remark, that this address met the approbation of all the gentlemen whose duty it was to prepare it. It contains barely a statement of the facts as that committee believed. Not facts entertained by any particular member of the convention, but those which we believed to exist in the action of the convention down to the present moment.

We have not been unanimous in the adoption of every article of the constitution, and this address is predicated on what is supposed to be the sense of the convention as determined by a majority. Though I am opposed to some things which it contains, I am prepared to say that I intend to support the new constitution, and to use every honorable effort in my power to secure its adoption by the people. I hope and trust the address will meet the favorable consideration of this convention.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. I concur in the main features of that address, but I think it has failed to embody my sentiments and that of others, on a very important matter. Whilst I wish slavery to stand as it does, and that there should be no interference with master and slave, I cannot concur in the sentiment that slavery is a source of wealth or of political power. I wish it to be understood that I believe slavery is a social and political evil, and not a source of political power or wealth.

There is another thing in which I cannot concur. I believe we had the power to submit the constitution to the people, and there was no necessity of returning here again.

Mr. HARDIN. I have not attended to the reading of the address. I have got to go to heaven by faith; and as I have great confidence in the committee, I am willing to take the address in the same way. I shall do what I can to get the constitution adopted.

Mr. TURNER. I am in favor of the institution of slavery as it now exists in Kentucky, and about that part of the address I have no scruples. Where it speaks of our not having power to put the adoption of the constitution on a contingency, I cannot agree with the address. I desire the word majority should be put in so that it shall not go out that we all agreed to that principle. This will not weaken the constitution, but give it power before the people. I cannot sign the principle that I believed it was necessary to come back.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If the address purported to be the individual views of members, if the subject of it was to go out as the expression of the opinion of each member, perhaps the remarks of the gentleman from Madison would be entitled to consideration. But it will be observed that the address speaks in the name of the convention and of the act of the convention. It was in contemplation by the committee, if the address should be adopted, to move that it be signed by the president of the convention. Therefore it speaks as it does upon the point alluded to. It will certainly appear that there was a division of this house on the question referred to. We thought as we were preparing an address, and as part thereof, an abstract of the decisions of the convention, we could not employ other language than we did.

Perhaps I have more cause to regret the participation I have had in this portion of our action than any member on this floor. Yesterday morning I took occasion to allude to an article published in "The Commonwealth," which I thought reflected in terms too strong on the action of this convention. I did that without any expression, without the feeling of any emotion of unkindness toward the conductors of that print. And I alluded to the fact, that from the high source in which the condemnation, so strongly expressed, of the action of the majority of the convention, was published to the world, from the respectability of the organ, and from the further fact of the confidence of this house in it as its printer and organ, I felt myself more justified in the remark I made, in giving the reasons which influenced me and a majority of the convention in the course we have taken.

Sir, am I alone, in this house, of the opinion that the remarks made in that paper were too strong in their condemnation of the action of this convention. If I am, then perhaps I deserve to be selected as the peculiar object of severe denunciation. I have been used to the vulgar assaults of editors, and therefore, personally, the one in the morning's "Commonwealth," does not affect me; and the only reason why I have obtruded on the house a notice of it is, that the article seems to present me as having expected from the conductors of that press, because of their being public printers, a species of subserviency to the wishes of this convention, of which if they were guilty, I should scorn and condemn them. The long personal, social, and friendly relations between myself and the senior conductor of that press, would forbid me to entertain such an opinion of him. My opinion of him as a gentleman and christian have been favorable. Amid all the conflict and abuse of party, our friendships have remained unbroken, and I hope will ever so remain.

With the junior editor, my acquaintance has been more limited and less familiar, and respect for myself and this house would have prevented me from using expressions calculated in the slightest degree to authorize the impression to be made, that my object was to stifle the freedom of debate, thought, or action of that press. I am a lover of the freedom of the press; I tolerate its abuse and vituperation even of myself, for the sake of that freedom. Upon this subject I have nothing more to say, nor shall I dread its threatened assaults. I consider that this convention have decided that it was necessary and appropriate to submit this constitution to the people, and take a recess in the meantime, and then, if it should be adopted, to meet and proclaim it as the organic law. And, sir, you will allow me, in taking leave of any further active discussions upon this floor, to return my thanks to the convention for the kindness and liberality with which they have treated me, and to say to each member, that if in word or deed I have given offence, or wounded the feelings of any one, it was not intended, and that I deeply regret having done so.

Mr. APPERSON. I, like the gentleman from Madison, thought we had a right to submit this constitution to the people, and there were many who agreed with me. Whilst we give reasons, let us give the reasons of a majority. Whatever a majority have determined on, I design to support. I believe what we have done will redound to the general good. There are things in the constitution which I did not admire, and did not advocate; but, on the whole, I think we have done as well as the people expected; indeed, admirably well. I think the address embodies the sentiments of a majority, and as such I yield to it.

Mr. MAUPIN. I hope this address will be unanimously adopted, and that we, like a band of brothers, shall go home determined to do all we can to secure the adoption of the constitution.

Mr. GARRARD. I hope delegates will not set up their individual opinions against the action of the majority of the convention. I believe no good can come from a further discussion of the subject, and I move the previous question.

Mr. BALLINGER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for a moment. I wish to say a word or two.

Mr. GARRARD. I will do so to accommodate the gentleman.

Mr. BALLINGER. I am not willing to sign this address without the alteration suggested by the gentleman from Madison. I am opposed to saying it was necessary for this convention to return here. There is another matter that I do not entirely wish to endorse; and that is, when we say there has been no unnecessary time spent here in debate. That I do not believe. I cannot go for the address without the alteration I proposed.

Mr. GARRARD. My view is, that the members will not sign the address, and I think we may adopt it with propriety. I renew my motion for the previous question.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

The question was taken on the adoption of the address, and it was agreed to.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I wish to offer a resolution that the address be signed by the president of the convention.

Mr. CHAMBERS. I move to amend by adding, "and countersigned by the secretary."

The amendment was agreed to, and it was Ordered, That the address be signed by the President, and countersigned by the Secretary, and that the printers to the convention print sixty thousand copies of said address, to be appended to the copies of the new constitution heretofore ordered to be printed.

RESOLUTION TO ADJOURN.

On the motion of Mr. MERIWETHER, it was Resolved, That when this convention adjourn on Friday the 21st, inst. it will adjourn to meet on the first Monday in June next."

DELEGATES TO SIGN THE CONSTITUTION.

On the motion of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, it was.

Resolved, That the constitution, as enrolled, be signed by the president and delegates of the convention, and countersigned by the secretary.

BINDING OF JOURNAL.

On the motion of Mr. MITCHELL, it was Resolved, That the printers to the convention be directed not to bind the journal of the proceedings of the body, until its final adjournment in June next, so as to have it complete in one volume.

COMMITTEE OF REVISION.

The committee of revision, by Mr. McHENRY, its chairman, reported other articles of the constitution, and the convention approved of the arrangement and amendments which had been made in them.

FEDERAL AND STATE POWERS.

Mr. GAITHER gave notice that the select committee, of which he was chairman, to whom was referred a resolution on the subject of the powers of the general and state governments, would be ready to report to the convention when it re-assembled in June.

SLACKWATER NAVIGATION.

Mr. KAVANAUGH desired the views which he entertained in reference to the section he had the honor of offering a few days ago, declaring the proceeds of the slackwater navigation of the state, part of the sinking fund, to be placed on record, especially as a speech was published in this morning's paper, (Mr. Lisle's,) on the other side.

In offering that section he said, I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am the friend of common schools. I have been favorable to securing the school fund by a constitutional provision, and I have voted accordingly, I hold that that fund has been already set apart and secured, and cannot be infringed or violated by the adoption of the section which I offered, because the legislature in any state of case, is bound to pay the interest on that fund.

The proceeds of the slackwater navigation of the state have always rightfully and properly been part of the sinking fund; but the legislature last year directed and set apart their proceeds to pay the interest on the school fund. This provision was intended to go into effect next year, and the interest on the school fund, by the provision in the constitution, must be paid, no matter what may be done with the avails of our slackwater navigation. As the constitution has set apart the sinking fund to pay the public debt, doubt might arise as to whether it was intended that the slackwater navigation was to be part of the sinking fund. I believe it was so intended. My object then in offering the section was to carry out the intention of the provision setting apart the sinking fund for the payment of the state debt. I am for paying that debt, and holding the sinking fund for that purpose. But if that fund is to be taken for other purposes, the provision in the constitution setting it apart to pay our debt, will amount to nothing, and the debt will remain unpaid. If that fund is held and sacredly applied to the payment of the debt, it will accomplish it; and that is what I am for, and that was the reason of my offering the section.

I again say that good faith also requires the payment of the interest on the school fund; and that I am for it, and have so voted; and so far from being against common schools, I am for them, and would, individually, be willing to be taxed ten cents on the hundred dollars if it would bring a good education within the reach of all the children in the state; but I would lay no tax on the people for that purpose without their consent. This is what I have always said. Any tax which the people themselves require for educational purposes, will always be cordially and cheerfully met and paid by me without a murmur. In justice to myself I have thought it proper to make this statement.

ENGROSSMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

The convention having disposed of every article as it was reported from the committee of revision and arrangement, and as it was being engrossed, an adjournment to 9 o'clock, P. M., was moved and agreed to.

It was subsequently discovered that the engrossment would not be accomplished until a late hour of the night, and therefore the convention adjourned to to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1849.

The convention assembled at 7 o'clock, A. M.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE PRESIDENT.

The President having retired from the chair, Mr. WALLER moved the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention be presented to the honorable James Guthrie, for the able, dignified, and impartial manner in which he has presided over the deliberations of this body; and that in retiring therefrom he carries with him the best wishes of every delegate.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE REPORTERS.

On the motion of Mr. MITCHELL, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention are due and are hereby tendered to Richard Sutton, Esq., the reporter of this convention, and his associates, for the able and faithful manner in which they have discharged their arduous duties.

VOTE OF THANKS TO THE OFFICERS AND CHAPLAINS.

On the motion of Mr. G. W. JOHNSTON, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the thanks or this convention be and they are hereby tendered to Thomas J. Helm, secretary; Thomas D. Tilford, assistant secretary; Culvin Sanders, sergeant-at-arms; and John M. Helms, door-keeper, for the faithful discharge of their duties as officers of the same.

Resolved, That the thanks of this convention are also tendered to the ministers of the gospel of the city of Frankfort for opening its daily session with prayer to a throne of grace.

SIGNING OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BRADLEY from the committee on enrollment, presented the constitution correctly engrossed, as follows:

PREAMBLE.

We, the representatives of the people of the State of Kentucky, in Convention assembled, to secure to all the citizens thereof the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and property, and of pursuing happiness, do ordain and establish this Constitution for its government.

ARTICLE FIRST.

Concerning the distribution of the powers of the Government.

SECTION 1. The powers of the Government of the State of Kentucky shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to-wit: those which are Legislative to one; those which are Executive to another, and those which are Judiciary to another.

SECTION 2. No person, or collection of persons, being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted.

ARTICLE SECOND.

Concerning the Legislative Department.

SECTION 1. The Legislative power shall be vested in a House of Representatives and Senate, which together shall be styled the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

SECTION 2. The members of the House of Representatives shall continue in service for the term of two years from the day of the general election, and no longer.

SECTION 3. Representatives shall be chosen on the first Monday in August, between the hours of six o'clock in the morning and seven o'clock in the evening, in every second year; and the mode of holding the elections shall be regulated by law.

SECTION 4. No person shall be a Representative, who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States, and hath not attained to the age of twenty-four years, and resided in this State two years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof in the county, town, or city, for which he may be chosen.

SECTION 5. The General Assembly shall divide the several counties of this Commonwealth into convenient precincts, or may delegate such power to such county authorities as they may by law provide; and elections for Representatives for the several counties entitled to representation, shall be held at the places of holding their respective courts, and in the several election precincts into which the counties may be divided: Provided, that when it shall appear to the General Assembly that any city or town hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such city or town shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation, in either or both houses of the General Assembly, which shall be retained so long as such city or town shall contain a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio which may, from time to time, be fixed by law; and, thereafter, elections for the county in which such city or town is situated, shall not be held therein; but such city or town shall not be entitled to a separate representation, unless such county, after the separation, shall also be entitled to one or more Representatives. That whenever a city or town shall be entitled to a separate representation in either house of the General Assembly, and by her numbers shall be entitled to more than one Representative, such city or town shall be divided, by squares which are contiguous, so as to make the most compact form, into Representative Districts, as nearly equal as may be, equal to the number of Representatives to which such city or town may be entitled; and one Representative shall be elected from each district. In like manner shall said city or town be divided into Senatorial Districts, when, by the apportionment, more than one Senator shall be allotted to such city or town; and a Senator shall be elected from each Senatorial District; but no ward or municipal division shall be divided by such division of Senatorial or Representative Districts, unless it be necessary to equalize the Elective, Senatorial, or Representative Districts.

SECTION 6. Representation shall be equal and uniform in this Commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified voters therein. In the year 1850, again in the year 1857, and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified voters of the State shall be made; and to secure uniformity and equality of representation, the State is hereby laid off into ten districts. The first district shall be composed of the counties of Fulton, Hickman, Ballard, McCracken, Graves, Calloway, Marshall, Livingston, Crittenden, Union, Hopkins, Caldwell, and Trigg. The second district shall be composed of the counties of Christian, Muhlenburg, Henderson, Daviess, Hancock, Ohio, Breckinridge, Meade, Grayson, Butler, and Edmonson. The third district shall be composed of the counties of Todd, Logan, Simpson, Warren, Allen, Monroe, Barren, and Hart. The fourth district shall be composed of the counties of Cumberland, Adair, Green, Taylor, Clinton, Russell, Wayne, Pulaski, Casey, Boyle, and Lincoln. The fifth district shall be composed of the counties of Hardin, Larue, Bullitt, Spencer, Nelson, Washington, Marion, Mercer, and Anderson. The sixth district shall be composed of the counties of Garrard, Madison, Estill, Owsley, Rockcastle, Laurel, Clay, Whitley, Knox, Harlan, Perry, Letcher, Pike, Floyd, and Johnson. The seventh district shall be composed of the counties of Jefferson, Oldham, Trimble, Carroll, Henry, and Shelby, and the city of Louisville. The eighth district shall be composed of the counties of Bourbon, Fayette, Scott, Owen, Franklin, Woodford, and Jessamine. The ninth district shall be composed of the counties of Clarke, Montgomery, Bath, Fleming, Lewis, Greenup, Carter, Lawrence, Morgan, and Breathitt. The tenth district shall be composed of the counties of Mason, Bracken, Nicholas, Harrison, Pendleton, Campbell, Grant, Kenton, Boone, and Gallatin. The number of representatives shall, at the several sessions of the General Assembly, next after the making of the enumerations, be apportioned among the ten several districts, according to the number of qualified voters in each; and the Representatives shall be apportioned, as near as may be, among the counties, towns and cities in each district; and in making such apportionment the following rules shall govern, to-wit: Every county, town or city having the ratio shall have one representative; if double the ratio, two representatives, and so on. Next, the counties, towns or cities having one or more Representatives, and the largest number of qualified voters above the ratio, and counties having the largest number under the ratio shall have a Representative, regard being always had to the greatest number of qualified voters: Provided, That when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified voters to entitle it to one Representative, then such county may be joined to some adjacent county or counties to send one Representative. When a new county shall be formed of territory belonging to more than one district, it shall form a part of that district having the least number of qualified voters.

SECTION 7. The House of Representatives shall choose its Speaker and other officers.

SECTION 8. Every free white male citizen, of the age of twenty-one years, who has resided in the State two years, or in the county, town, or city, in which he offers to vote, one year next preceding the election, shall be a voter; but such voter shall have been, for sixty days next preceding the election, a resident of the precinct in which he offers to vote, and he shall cast his vote in said precinct, and not elsewhere.

SECTION 9. Voters, in all cases except treason, felony, breach or surety of the peace, shall be privileged from arrest during their attendance at, going to, and returning from elections.

SECTION 10. Senators shall be chosen for the term of four years, and the Senate shall have power to choose its officers biennially.

SECTION 11. Senators and Representatives shall be elected, under the first apportionment after the adoption of this Constitution, in the year 1851, and every two years thereafter.

SECTION 12. At the session of the General Assembly next after the first apportionment under this Constitution, the Senators shall be divided by lot, as equally as may be, into two classes; the seats of the first class shall be vacated at the end of two years from the day of the election, and those of the second class at the end of four years, so that one half shall be chosen every two years.

SECTION 13. In the apportionment of representation, the number of Representatives in the House of Representatives shall be one hundred, and the number Senators thirty-eight.

SECTION 14. At every apportionment of representation, the State shall be laid off into thirty-eight Senatorial Districts, which shall be so formed as to contain, as near as may be, an equal number of qualified voters, and so that no county shall be divided in the formation of a Senatorial District, except such county shall be entitled, under the enumeration, to two or more Senators.

SECTION 15. One Senator for each district shall be elected by the qualified voters therein, who shall vote in the precincts where they reside, at the places where elections are by law directed to be held.

SECTION 16. No person shall be a Senator who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States; has not attained the age of thirty years, and who has not resided in this State six years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof in the district for which he may be chosen.

SECTION 17. The election for Senators, next after the first apportionment under this Constitution, shall be general throughout the State, and at the same time that the election for Representatives is held, and thereafter there shall be a biennial election for Senators to fill the places of those whose term of service may have expired.

SECTION 18. The General Assembly shall convene on the first Monday in November, after the adoption of this Constitution, and again on the first Monday in November, 1851, and on the same day of every second year thereafter, unless a different day be appointed by law, and their sessions shall be held at the seat of Government; but if the public welfare require, the Governor may call a special session.

SECTION 19. Not less than a majority of the members of each house of the General Assembly shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and shall be authorized by law to compel the attendance of absent members in such manner and under such penalties as may be prescribed thereby.

SECTION 20. Each house of the General Assembly shall judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members; but a contested election shall be determined in such manner as shall be directed by law.

SECTION 21. Each house of the General Assembly may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish a member for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member; but not a second time for the same cause.

SECTION 22. Each house of the General Assembly shall keep and publish, weekly, a journal of its proceedings, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on their journal.

SECTION 23. Neither house, during the session of the General Assembly, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which they may be sitting.

SECTION 24. The members of the General Assembly shall severally receive from the public treasury a compensation for their services, which shall be three dollars a day during their attendance on, and twelve and a half cents per mile for the necessary travel in going to, and returning from, the sessions of their respective houses; Provided, That the same may be increased or diminished by law; but no alteration shall take effect during the session at which such alteration shall be made; nor shall a session of the General Assembly continue beyond sixty days, except by a vote of two-thirds of each house, but this shall not apply to the first session held under this Constitution.

SECTION 25. The members of the General Assembly shall, in all cases except treason, felony, breach or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the sessions of their respective houses, and in going to, and returning from, the same; and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place.

SECTION 26. No Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, nor for one year thereafter, be appointed or elected to any civil office of profit under this Commonwealth, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased, during the said term, except to such offices or appointments as may be filled by the election of the people.

SECTION 27. No person, while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society or sect, nor while he holds or exercises any office of profit under this Commonwealth, or under the government of the United States, shall be eligible to the General Assembly, except attorneys at law, justices of the peace, and militia officers; Provided, That attorneys for the Commonwealth, who receive a fixed annual salary, shall be ineligible.

SECTION 28. No person who, at any time, may have been a collector of taxes or public moneys for the State, or the assistant or deputy of such collector, shall be eligible to the General Assembly, unless he shall have obtained a quietus, six months before the election, for the amount of such collection, and for all public moneys for which he may have been responsible.

SECTION 29. No bill shall have the force of a law, until, on three several days, it be read over in each house of the General Assembly, and free discussion allowed thereon, unless, in cases of urgency, four-fifths of the house, where the bill shall be depending, may deem it expedient to dispense with this rule.

SECTION 30. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose amendments, as in other bills: Provided, That they shall not introduce any new matter, under the color of an amendment, which does not relate to raising revenue.

SECTION 31. The General Assembly shall regulate, by law, by whom and in what manner writs of election shall be issued to fill the vacancies which may happen in either branch thereof.

SECTION 32. The General Assembly shall have no power to grant divorces, to change the names of individuals, or direct the sales of estates belonging to infants, or other persons laboring under legal disabilities, by special legislation; but by general laws shall confer such powers on the courts of justice.

SECTION 33. The credit of this Commonwealth shall never be given or loaned in aid of any person, association, municipality, or corporation.

SECTION 34. The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws to diminish the resources of the Sinking Fund, as now established by law, but may pass laws to increase it; and the whole resources of said fund, from year to year, shall be sacredly set apart and applied to the payment of the interest and principal of the State debt, and to no other use or purpose, until the whole debt of the State is fully paid and satisfied.

SECTION 35. The General Assembly may contract debts to meet casual deficits or failures in the revenue, but such debts, direct or contingent, singly or in the aggregate, shall not at any time exceed five hundred thousand dollars; and the moneys arising from loans creating such debts, shall be applied to the purposes for which they were obtained, or to repay such debts: Provided, That the State may contract debts to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, or, if hostilities are threatened, provide for the public defence.

SECTION 36. No act of the General Assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of the Commonwealth, except for the purposes mentioned in the thirty-fifth section of this article, unless provision be made therein to lay and collect an annual tax sufficient to pay the interest stipulated, and to discharge the debt within thirty years; nor shall such act take effect until it shall have been submitted to the people at a general election, and shall have received a majority of all the votes cast for and against it: Provided, That the General Assembly may contract debts without submission to the people, by borrowing money to pay any part of the public debt of the State, and without making provision in the act authorising the same for a tax to discharge the debt so contracted, or the interest thereon.

SECTION 37. No law, enacted by the General Assembly, shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be expressed in the title.

SECTION 38. The General Assembly shall not change the venue in any criminal or penal prosecution, but shall provide for the same by general laws.

SECTION 39. The General Assembly may pass laws authorising writs of error in criminal or penal cases, and regulating the right of challenge of jurors therein.

SECTION 40. The General Assembly shall have no power to pass any act, or resolution, for the appropriation of any money, or the creation of any debt, exceeding the sum of one hundred dollars, at any one time, unless the same, on its final passage, shall be voted for by a majority of all the members then elected to each branch of the General Assembly, and the yeas and nays thereon entered on the journal.

ARTICLE THIRD.

Concerning the Executive Department.

SECTION 1. The Supreme Executive power of the Commonwealth shall be vested in a Chief Magistrate, who shall be styled the Governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

SECTION 2. The Governor shall be elected for the term of four years, by the qualified voters of the State, at the time when, and places where, they shall respectively vote for Representatives. The person having the highest number of votes shall be Governor; but if two or more shall be equal and highest in votes, the election shall be determined by lot, in such manner as the General Assembly may direct.

SECTION 3. The Governor shall be ineligible for the succeeding four years after the expiration of the term for which he shall have been elected.

SECTION 4. He shall be at least thirty-five years of age, and a citizen of the United States, and have been an inhabitant of this State at least six years next preceding his election.

SECTION 5. He shall commence the execution of the duties of his office on the fourth Tuesday succeeding the day of the commencement of the general election on which he shall be chosen, and shall continue in the execution thereof until the end of four weeks next succeeding the election of his successor, and until his successor shall have taken the oaths, or affirmations, prescribed by this Constitution.

SECTION 6. No member of Congress, person holding any office under the United States, nor minister of any religious society, shall be eligible to the office of Governor.

SECTION 7. The Governor shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the term for which he was elected.

SECTION 8. He shall be Commander-in-Chief of the army and navy of this Commonwealth, and of the militia thereof, except when they shall be called into the service of the United States; but he shall not command personally in the field, unless he shall be advised so to do by a resolution of the General Assembly.

SECTION 9. He shall have power to fill vacancies that may occur, by granting commissions, which shall expire when such vacancies shall have been filled according to the provisions of this Constitution.

SECTION 10. He shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures, grant reprieves and pardons, except in cases of impeachment. In cases of treason, he shall have power to grant reprieves until the end of the next session of the General Assembly, in which the power of pardoning shall be vested; but shall have no power to remit the fees of the Clerk, Sheriff, or Commonwealth's Attorney, in penal or criminal cases.

SECTION 11. He may require information, in writing, from the officers in the executive department, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

SECTION 12. He shall, from time to time, give to the General Assembly, information of the state of the Commonwealth, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he may deem expedient.

SECTION 13. He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene the General Assembly at the seat of government, or at a different place if that should have become, since their last adjournment, dangerous from an enemy, or from contagious disorders; and in case of disagreement between the two houses, with respect to the time of adjournment, adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper, not exceeding four months.

SECTION 14. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

SECTION 15. A Lieutenant Governor shall be chosen at every election for Governor, in the same manner, continue in office for the same time, and possess the same qualifications. In voting for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, the electors shall distinguish for whom they vote as Governor, and for whom as Lieutenant Governor.

SECTION 16. He shall, by virtue of his office, be Speaker of the Senate, have a right, when in committee of the whole, to debate and vote on all subjects, and when the Senate are equally divided, to give the casting vote.

SECTION 17. Should the Governor be impeached, removed from office, die, refuse to qualify, resign, or be absent from the State, the Lieutenant Governor shall exercise all the power and authority appertaining to the office of Governor, until another be duly elected and qualified, or the Governor absent or impeached, shall return or be acquitted.

SECTION 18. Whenever the government shall be administered by the Lieutenant Governor, or he shall fail to attend as Speaker of the Senate, the Senators shall elect one of their own members as Speaker for that occasion. And if, during the vacancy of the office of Governor, the Lieutenant Governor shall be impeached, removed from office, refuse to qualify, resign, die, or be absent from the State, the Speaker of the Senate shall, in like manner, administer the government: Provided, That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of Governor, before the first two years of the term shall have expired, a new election for Governor shall take place, to fill such vacancy.

SECTION 19. The Lieutenant Governor, or Speaker pro tempore of the Senate, while he acts as speaker of the Senate, shall receive for his services the same compensation which shall, for the same period, be allowed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and no more; and during the time he administers the government, as Governor, shall receive the same compensation which the Governor would have received, had he been employed in the duties of his office.

SECTION 20. If the Lieutenant Governor shall be called upon to administer the government, and shall, while in such administration, resign, die, or be absent from the State during the recess of the General Assembly, it shall be the duty of the Secretary, for the time being, to convene the Senate for the purpose of choosing a Speaker.

SECTION 21. The Governor shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appoint a Secretary of State, who shall be commissioned during the term for which the Governor was elected, if he shall so long behave himself well. He shall keep a fair register, and attest all the official acts of the Governor, and shall, when required, lay the same, and all papers, minutes, and vouchers, relative thereto, before either house of the General Assembly; and shall perform such other duties as may be required of him by law.

SECTION 22. Every bill which shall have passed both houses, shall be presented to the Governor. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it, with his objections, to the house in which it originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, a majority of all the members elected to that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, with the objections, to the other house, by which it shall likewise be considered, and if approved by a majority of all the members elected to that house, it shall be a law; but in such cases, the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for and against the bill, shall be entered upon the journals of each house, respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the Governor, within ten days (Sundays excepted,) after it shall have been presented to him, it shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the General Assembly, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall be a law, unless sent back within three days after their next meeting.

SECTION 23. Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the Governor, and before it shall take effect, be approved by him; or being disapproved, shall be re-passed by a majority of all the members elected to both houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill.

SECTION 24. Contested elections for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be determined by both houses of the General Assembly, according to such regulations as may be established by law.

SECTION 25. A Treasurer shall be elected biennially, by the qualified voters of the State; and an Auditor of Public Accounts, Register of the Land Office, Attorney General, and such other State officers as may be necessary, for the term of four years, whose duties and responsibilities shall be prescribed by law.

SECTION 26. The first election, under this Constitution, for Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Treasurer, Auditor of Public Accounts, Register of the Land Office, and Attorney General, shall be held on the first Monday in August in the year 1851.

ARTICLE FOURTH.

Concerning the Judicial Department.

SECTION 1. The judicial power of this Commonwealth, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in one Supreme Court, (to be styled the Court of Appeals,) the Courts established by this Constitution, and such inferior Courts as the General Assembly may, from time to time, erect and establish.

SECTION 2. The Court of Appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the State, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this Constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law.

SECTION 3. The Judges of the Court of Appeals shall hold their offices for the term of eight years, from and after their election, and until their successors shall be duly qualified, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed; but for any reasonable cause, the Governor shall remove any of them on the address of two thirds of each house of the General Assembly: Provided, however, That the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in such address, and on the journal of each house. They shall, at stated times, receive for their services an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law, which shall not be diminished during the time for which they shall have been elected.

SECTION 4. The Court of Appeals shall consist of four Judges, any three of whom may constitute a Court for the transaction of business. The General Assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, shall divide the State, by counties, into four districts, as nearly equal in voting population, and with as convenient limits as may be, in each of which the qualified voters shall elect one Judge of the Court of Appeals: Provided, That whenever a vacancy shall occur in said Court, from any cause, the General Assembly shall have the power to reduce the number of Judges and districts; but in no event shall there be less than three Judges and districts. Should a change in the number of the Judges of the Court of Appeals be made, the term of office and number of districts shall be so changed as to preserve the principle of electing one Judge every two years, and the term for which the Clerk shall hold his office, shall be made to correspond with that of the Judges.

SECTION 5. The Judges shall, by virtue of their offices, be conservators of the peace throughout the State. The style of all process shall be, "The Commonwealth of Kentucky." All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and conclude "against the peace and dignity of the same."

SECTION 6. The Judges first elected shall serve as follows, to-wit: one shall serve until the first Monday in August, 1852; one until the first Monday in August, 1854; one until the first Monday in August, 1856, and one until the first Monday in August, 1858. The Judges, at the first term of the Court succeeding their election, shall determine, by lot, the length of time which each one shall serve; and at the expiration of the service of each, an election in the proper district shall take place to fill the vacancy. The Judge having the shortest time to serve shall be styled the Chief Justice of Kentucky.

SECTION 7. If a vacancy shall occur in said Court from any cause, the Governor shall issue a writ of election to the proper district to fill such vacancy for the residue of the term.

SECTION 8. No person shall be eligible to the office of Judge of the Court of Appeals, who is not a citizen of the United States, a resident of the district for which he may be a candidate two years next preceding his election, at least thirty years of age, and who has not been a practicing lawyer eight years, or whose service upon the bench of any Court of record, when added to the time he may have practiced law, shall not be equal to eight years.

SECTION 9. The Court of Appeals shall hold its sessions at the seat of government, unless otherwise directed by law; but the General Assembly may, from time to time, direct that said Court shall hold sessions in any one or more of said districts.

SECTION 10. The first election of the Judges of the Court of Appeals shall take place on the second Monday in May, 1851, and thereafter, in the district as a vacancy may occur, by the expiration of the term of office; and the Judges of the said Court shall be commissioned by the Governor.

SECTION 11. There shall be elected, by the qualified voters of this State, a Clerk of the Court of Appeals, who shall hold his office, at the first election, until the first Monday in August, 1858, and thereafter for the term of eight years from and after his election; and should the General Assembly provide for holding the Court of Appeals in any one or more of said districts, they shall also provide for the election of a Clerk by the qualified voters of such district, who shall hold his office for eight years, possess the same qualifications, and be subject to removal in the same manner as the Clerk of the Court of Appeals.

SECTION 12. No person shall be eligible to the office of Clerk of the Court of Appeals, unless he be a citizen of the United States, a resident of the State two years next preceding his election, of the age of twenty-one years, and have a certificate from a Judge of the Court of Appeals, or a Judge of the Circuit Court, that he has been examined by the Clerk of his Court, under his supervision, and that he is qualified for the office for which he is a candidate.

SECTION 13. Should a vacancy occur in the office of Clerk of the Court of Appeals, the Governor shall issue a writ of election, and the qualified voters of the State, or of the district in which the vacancy may occur, shall elect a Clerk of the Court of Appeals, to serve until the end of the term for which such Clerk was elected: Provided, That when a vacancy shall occur from any cause, or the Clerk be under charges upon information, the Judges of the Court of Appeals shall have power to appoint a Clerk pro tem., to perform the duties of Clerk until such vacancy shall be filled, or the Clerk acquitted.

SECTION 14. The General Assembly shall direct, by law, the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns to the Secretary of State, of all elections of the Judges and Clerk or Clerks of the Court of Appeals, and of determining contested elections of any of these officers.

SECTION 15. Whenever an appeal or writ of error may be pending in the Court of Appeals, on the trial of which a majority of the Judges thereof cannot sit; or on account of interest in the event of the cause; or on account of their relation to either party; or where the Judge may have decided the cause in the inferior Court, the General Assembly shall provide, by law, for the organization of a temporary and special Court, for the trial of such cause or causes.

SECTION 16. A Circuit Court shall be established in each county now existing, or which may hereafter be erected in this Commonwealth.

SECTION 17. The jurisdiction of said Court shall be, and remain as now established, hereby giving to the General Assembly the power to change or alter it.

SECTION 18. The right to appeal or sue out a writ of error to the Court of Appeals shall remain as it now exists, until altered by law, hereby giving to the General Assembly the power to change, alter, or modify said right.

SECTION 19. At the first session after the adoption of this Constitution, the General Assembly shall divide the State into twelve judicial districts, having due regard to business, territory, and population: Provided, That no county shall be divided.

SECTION 20. They shall, at the same time that the judicial districts are laid off, direct elections to be held in each district, to elect a Judge for said district, and shall prescribe in what manner the elections shall be conducted, and how the Governor shall be notified of the result; and the first election of the Judges of the Circuit Court shall take place on the second Monday in May, 1851.

SECTION 21. All persons qualified to vote for members of the General Assembly, in each district, shall have the right to vote for Judges.

SECTION 22. No person shall be eligible as Judge of the Circuit Court, who is not a citizen of the United States, a resident of the district for which he may be a candidate, two years next preceding his election, at least thirty years of age, and who has not been a practicing lawyer eight years, or whose service upon the bench of any Court of record, when added to the time he may have practiced law, shall be equal to eight years.

SECTION 23. The Judges of the Circuit Court shall hold their office for the term of six years from the day of their election. They shall be commissioned by the Governor, and continue in office until their successors be qualified, but shall be removable from office in the same manner as the Judges of the Court of Appeals; and the removal of a Judge from his district shall vacate his office: Provided, That their first term of office shall expire on the first Monday in August, 1856.

SECTION 24. The General Assembly, if they deem it necessary, may establish one additional district every four years, but the judicial districts shall not exceed sixteen, until after the population of this State shall exceed one million five hundred thousand.

SECTION 25. The Judges of the Circuit Courts shall, at stated times, receive for their services an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law, which shall be equal and uniform throughout the State, and which shall not be diminished during the time for which they were elected.

SECTION 26. If a vacancy shall occur in the office of Judge of the Circuit Court, the Governor shall issue a writ of election to fill such vacancy, for the residue of the term: Provided, That if the unexpired term be less than one year, the Governor shall appoint a Judge to fill such vacancy.

SECTION 27. The Judicial Districts of this State shall not be changed except at the first session after every enumeration, unless when new Districts may be established.

SECTION 28. The General Assembly shall provide by law for some person to preside in each of the Circuit Courts, when from any cause, the Judge shall fail to attend, or, if in attendance, cannot properly preside.

SECTION 29. A County Court shall be established in each county now existing, or which may hereafter be erected within this Commonwealth, to consist of a Presiding Judge, and two Associate Judges, any two of whom shall constitute a court for the transaction of business: Provided, The General Assembly may at any time abolish the office of the Associate Judges, whenever it shall be deemed expedient; in which event they may associate with said Court, any or all of the Justices of the Peace for the transaction of business.

SECTION 30. The Judges of the County Court shall be elected by the qualified voters in each county, for the term of four years, and shall continue in office until their successors be duly qualified, and shall receive such compensation for their services as may be provided by law.

SECTION 31. The first election of County Court Judges shall take place at the same time of the election of Judges of the Circuit Court. The Presiding Judge, first elected, shall hold his office until the first Monday in August, 1854. The Associate Judges shall hold their offices until the first Monday in August, 1852, and until their successors be qualified.

SECTION 32. No person shall be eligible to the office of Presiding or Associate Judge of the County Court, unless he be a citizen of the United States, over twenty one years of age, and shall have been a resident of the county in which he shall be chosen, one year next preceding the election.

SECTION 33. The jurisdiction of the County Court shall be regulated by law; and, until changed, shall be the same now vested in the County Courts of this State.

SECTION 34. Each county in this State shall be laid off into districts of convenient size, as the General Assembly may, from time to time, direct. Two Justices of the Peace shall be elected in each district, by the qualified voters therein, for the term of four years, whose jurisdiction shall be co-extensive with the county; no person shall be eligible as a Justice of the Peace, unless he be a citizen of the United States, twenty one years of age, and a resident of the district in which he may be a candidate.

SECTION 35. Judges of the County Court, and Justices of the Peace, shall be conservators of the Peace. They shall be commissioned by the Governor. County and district officers shall vacate their offices by removal from the district or county in which they shall be appointed. The General Assembly shall provide, by law, the manner of conducting and making due returns of all elections of Judges of the County Court and Justices of the Peace, and for determining contested elections, and provide the mode of filling vacancies in these offices.

SECTION 36. Judges of the County Court and Justices of the Peace, shall be subject to indictment or presentment for malfeasance or misfeasance in office, or wilful neglect in the discharge of their official duties, in such mode as may be prescribed by law, subject to appeal to the Court of Appeals; and, upon conviction, their offices shall become vacant.

SECTION 37. The General Assembly may provide, by law, that the Justices of the Peace in each county shall sit at the Court of Claims and assist in laying the county levy and making appropriations only.

SECTION 38. When any city or town shall have a separate representation, such city or town, and the county in which it is located, may have such separate Municipal Courts, and executive and ministerial offices as the General Assembly may, from time to time, provide.

SECTION 39. The Clerks of the Court of Appeals, Circuit, and County Courts, shall be removable from office by the Court of Appeals, upon information and good cause shown. The Court shall be judges of the fact as well as the law. Two-thirds of the members present must concur in the sentence.

SECTION 40. The Louisville Chancery Court shall exist under this Constitution, subject to repeal, and its jurisdiction to enlargement and modification by the General Assembly. The Chancellor shall have the same qualifications as a Circuit Court Judge, and the Clerk of said Court as a Clerk of a Circuit Court, and the Marshal of said Court as a Sheriff; and the General Assembly shall provide for the election, by the qualified voters within its jurisdiction, of the Chancellor, Clerk, and Marshal of said Court, at the same time that the Judge and Clerk of the Circuit Court are elected for the county of Jefferson, and they shall hold their offices for the same time: Provided, That the Marshal of said Court shall be ineligible for the succeeding term.

SECTION 41. The City Court of Louisville, the Lexington City Court, and all other Police Courts established in any city or town, shall remain until otherwise directed by law, with their present powers and jurisdictions; and the Judges, Clerks, and Marshals of such Courts shall have the same qualifications, and shall be elected by the qualified voters of such cities or towns, at the same time, and in the same manner, and hold their offices for the same term as County Judges, Clerks, and Marshals, respectively, and shall be liable to removal in the same manner. The General Assembly may vest judicial powers, for police purposes, in Mayors of cities, Police Judges, and Trustees of towns.

ARTICLE FIFTH.

Concerning Impeachments.

SECTION 1. The House of Representatives shall have the sole power of impeachment.

SECTION 2. All impeachments shall be tried by the Senate. When sitting for that purpose, the Senators shall be upon oath or affirmation. No person shall be convicted without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present.

SECTION 3. The Governor and all civil officers, shall be liable to impeachment for any misdemeanor in office; but judgment in such cases, shall not extend further than to removal from office, and disqualification to hold any office of honor, trust, or profit, under this Commonwealth; but the party convicted shall, nevertheless, be subject and liable to indictment, trial, and punishment by law.

ARTICLE SIXTH.

Concerning Executive and Ministerial Officers for Counties and Districts.

SECTION 1. A Commonwealth's Attorney for each circuit, and a Circuit Court Clerk for each county, shall be elected, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the Circuit Judges; also an Attorney, Clerk, Surveyor, Coroner, and Jailor, for each county, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the Presiding Judge of the County Court.

SECTION 2. No person shall be eligible to the offices mentioned in this article, who is not at the time twenty-four years old, (except Clerks of County and Circuit Courts, Sheriffs, Constables, and county Attorneys, who shall be eligible at the age of twenty-one years,) a citizen of the United States, and who has not resided two years next preceding the election, in the State, and one year in the county or district for which he is a candidate. No person shall be eligible to the office of Commonwealth's or County Attorney, unless he shall have been a licensed practicing Attorney for two years. No person shall be eligible to the office of Clerk unless he shall have procured from a Judge of the Court of Appeals, or a Judge of the Circuit Court, a certificate that he has been examined by the Clerk of his Court, under his supervision, and that he is qualified for the office for which he is a candidate.

SECTION 3. The Commonwealth's Attorney and Circuit Court Clerk, shall be elected at the same time, and in the same manner, as the Circuit Judge. The County Attorney, Clerk, Surveyor, Coroner, and Jailor, shall be elected at the same time, and in the same manner, as the Presiding Judge of the County Court.

SECTION 4. A Sheriff shall be elected in each county, at the same time and manner that the Presiding or Associate Judges of the County Court are elected, whose term of office shall be two years, and he shall be re-eligible for a second term; but no Sheriff shall, after the expiration of the second term, be re-eligible, or act as deputy for the succeeding term.

SECTION 5. A Constable shall be elected in every Justice's District, who shall be chosen for two years, at such time and place as may be provided by law, whose jurisdiction shall be co-extensive with the county in which he may reside.

SECTION 6. Officers for towns and cities shall be elected for such terms, and in such manner, and with such qualifications, as may be prescribed by law.

SECTION 7. Vacancies in offices under this article shall be filled, until the next annual election, in such manner as the General Assembly may provide.

SECTION 8. When a new county shall be erected, officers for the same, to serve until the next stated election, shall be elected or appointed in such way and at such times as the Legislature may prescribe.

SECTION 9. Clerks, Sheriffs, Surveyors, Coroners, Constables, and Jailers shall, before they enter upon the duties of their respective offices, and as often thereafter as may be deemed proper, give such bond and security as shall be prescribed by law.

SECTION 10. The General Assembly may provide for the election or appointment of such other county or district ministerial and executive officers as shall, from time to time, be necessary and proper.

SECTION 11. A County Assessor shall be elected in each county at the same time and for the same term that the Presiding Judge of the County Court is elected, until otherwise provided for by law, who shall have power to appoint such assistants as may be necessary and proper.

ARTICLE SEVENTH.

Concerning the Militia.

SECTION 1. The Militia of this Commonwealth shall consist of all free, able-bodied male persons (negroes, mulattoes, and Indians excepted,) resident in the same, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years; except such persons as now are, or hereafter may be, exempted by the laws of the United States or of this State; but those who belong to religious societies, whose tenets forbid them to carry arms, shall not be compelled to do so, but shall pay an equivalent for personal services.

SECTION 2. The Governor shall appoint the Adjutant General, and his other staff officers; the Majors General, Brigadiers General, and Commandants of Regiments shall, respectively, appoint their staff officers; and Commandants of Companies shall appoint their non-commissioned officers.

SECTION 3. All other militia officers shall be elected by persons subject to military duty, within the bounds of their respective companies, battalions, regiments, brigades, and divisions, under such rules and regulations, and for such terms, as the General Assembly may, from time to time, direct and establish.

ARTICLE EIGHTH.

General Provisions.

SECTION 1. Members of the General Assembly, and all officers, before they enter upon the execution of the duties of their respective offices, and all members of the bar, before they enter upon the practice of their profession, shall take the following oath or affirmation: I do solemnly swear, (or affirm, as the case may be,) that I will support the Constitution of the United States, and be faithful and true to the Commonwealth of Kentucky, so long as I continue a citizen thereof, and that I will faithfully execute, to the best of my abilities, the office of _____ according to law; and I do further solemnly swear, (or affirm,) that since the adoption of the present Constitution, I being a citizen of this State, have not fought a duel, with deadly weapons, within this State nor out of it, with a citizen of this State, nor have I sent or accepted a challenge to fight a duel with deadly weapons, with a citizen of this State; nor have I acted as second in carrying a challenge, or aided, advised, or assisted any person thus offending—so help me God.

SECTION 2. Treason against the Commonwealth shall consist only in levying war against it, or in adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or his own confession in open court.

SECTION 3. Every person shall be disqualified from holding any office of trust or profit for the term for which he shall have been elected, who shall be convicted of having given or offered any bribe or treat to procure his election.

SECTION 4. Laws shall be made to exclude from office and from suffrage, those who shall thereafter be convicted of bribery, perjury, forgery, or other crimes or high misdemeanors. The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, and prohibiting, under adequate penalties, all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practices.

SECTION 5. No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in pursuance of appropriations made by law, nor shall any appropriations of money for the support of an army be made for a longer time than two years, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published annually.

SECTION 6. The General Assembly may direct, by law, in what manner, and in what Courts, suits may be brought against the Commonwealth.

SECTION 7. The manner of administering an oath or affirmation, shall be such as is most consistent with the conscience of the deponent, and shall be esteemed by the General Assembly the most solemn appeal to God.

SECTION 8. All laws which, on the first day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety two, were in force in the state of Virginia, and which are of a general nature, and not local to that State, and not repugnant to this Constitution, nor to the laws which have been enacted by the General Assembly of this Commonwealth, shall be in force within this State, until they shall be altered or repealed by the General Assembly.

SECTION 9. The compact with the State of Virginia, subject to such alterations as may be made therein agreeably to the mode prescribed by the said compact, shall be considered as part of this Constitution.

SECTION 10. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to pass such laws as shall be necessary and proper to decide differences by arbitrators, to be appointed by the parties who may choose that summary mode of adjustment.

SECTION 11. All civil officers for the Commonwealth, at large, shall reside within the State, and all district, county, or town officers, within their respective districts, counties, or towns, (trustees of towns excepted,) and shall keep their offices at such places therein as may be required by law; and all militia officers shall reside in the bounds of the division, brigade, regiment, battalion, or company, to which they may severally belong.

SECTION 12. Absence on the business of this State, or the United States, shall not forfeit a residence once obtained, so as to deprive any one of the right of suffrage, or of being elected or appointed to any office under this Commonwealth, under the exceptions contained in this Constitution.

SECTION 13. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly to regulate, by law, in what cases, and what deductions from the salaries of public officers shall be made, for neglect of duty in their official capacity.

SECTION 14. Returns of all elections by the people, shall be made to the Secretary of State, for the time being, except in those cases otherwise provided for in this Constitution, or which shall be otherwise directed by law.

SECTION 15. In all elections by the people, and also by the Senate and House of Representatives, jointly or separately, the votes shall be personally and publicly given, viva voce: Provided, That dumb persons, entitled to suffrage, may vote by ballot.

SECTION 16. No member of Congress, nor person holding or exercising any office of trust or profit under the United States, or either of them, or under any foreign power, shall be eligible as a member of the General Assembly of this Commonwealth, or hold or exercise any office of trust or profit under the same.

SECTION 17. The General Assembly shall direct, by law, how persons who now are, or who may hereafter become securities for public officers, may be relieved or discharged on account of such securityship.

SECTION 18. Any person who shall, after the adoption of this Constitution, either directly or indirectly, give, accept, or knowingly carry a challenge to any person, or persons, to fight in single combat, with a citizen of this State, with any deadly weapon, either in or out of the State, shall be deprived of the right to hold any office of honor or profit in this Commonwealth, and shall be punished otherwise in such manner as the General Assembly may prescribe by law.

SECTION 19. The Governor shall have power, after five years, to pardon all persons who shall in any wise participate in a duel, either as principals or second, and to restore him or them to all the rights, privileges, and immunities to which he or they were entitled before such participation.

SECTION 20. The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave, and its increase, is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever.

SECTION 21. At its first session after the adoption of this Constitution, the General Assembly shall appoint not more than three persons, learned in the law, whose duty it shall be to revise and arrange the statute laws of this Commonwealth, both civil and criminal, so as to have but one law on any one subject; and also, three other persons learned in the law, whose duty it shall be to prepare a code of practice for the Courts, both civil and criminal, in this Commonwealth, by abridging and simplifying the rules of practice and laws in relation thereto; all of whom shall, at as early a day as practicable, report the result of their labors to the General Assembly, for their adoption and modification, from time to time.

SECTION 22. So long as the Board of Internal Improvement shall be continued, the President thereof shall be elected by the qualified voters of this Commonwealth, and hold the office for the term of four years, and until another be duly elected and qualified. The first election shall be held at the same time, and be conducted in the same manner, as the first election of Governor of this Commonwealth under this Constitution, and every four years thereafter; and the General Assembly shall provide, by law, the method of filling vacancies and settling contested elections for this office; but nothing herein contained, shall prevent the General Assembly from abolishing said Board of Internal Improvement, and the office of President thereof.

ARTICLE NINTH.

The seat of government shall continue in the town of Frankfort, until it shall be removed by law: Provided, however, That two thirds of all the members elected to each house of the General Assembly shall concur in the passage of such law.

ARTICLE TENTH.

Concerning Slaves.

SECTION 1. The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of their owners, or without paying their owners, previous to such emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated, and providing for their removal from the State. They shall have no power to prevent immigrants to this State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any of the United States, so long as any person of the same age or description shall be continued in slavery by the laws of this State. They shall pass laws to permit owners of slaves to emancipate them, saving the rights of creditors, and to prevent them from remaining in this State after they are emancipated. They shall have full power to prevent slaves being brought into this State as merchandise. They shall have full power to prevent any slaves being brought into this State, who have been, since the first day of January, one thousand seven hundred and eighty nine, or may hereafter be imported into any of the United States from a foreign country. And they shall have full power to pass such laws as may be necessary to oblige the owners of slaves to treat them with humanity; to provide for them necessary clothing and provision; to abstain from all injuries to them, extending to life or limb; and in case of their neglect or refusal to comply with the directions of such laws, to have such slave or slaves sold for the benefit of their owner or owners.

SECTION 2. The General Assembly shall pass laws providing that any free negro or mulatto hereafter immigrating to, or being emancipated in, and refusing to leave this State, or having left, shall return and settle within this State, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and punished by confinement in the Penitentiary thereof.

SECTION 3. In the prosecution of slaves for felony, no inquest by a grand jury shall be necessary; but the proceedings in such prosecutions shall be regulated by law, except that the General Assembly shall have no power to deprive them of the privilege of an impartial trial by a petit jury.

ARTICLE ELEVENTH.

Concerning Education.

SECTION 1. The capital of the fund called and known as the "Common School Fund," consisting of one million two hundred and twenty five thousand seven hundred and sixty-eight dollars and forty-two cents, for which bonds have been executed by the State to the Board of Education, and seventy-three thousand five hundred dollars of stock in the Bank of Kentucky; also, the sum of fifty-one thousand two hundred and twenty-three dollars and twenty-nine cents, balance of interest on the School Fund for the year 1848, unexpended, together with any sum which may be hereafter raised in the State by taxation, or otherwise, for purposes of education, shall be held inviolate, for the purpose of sustaining a system of Common Schools. The interest and dividends of said funds, together with any sum which may be produced for that purpose by taxation, may be appropriated in aid of Common Schools, but for no other purpose. The General Assembly shall invest said fifty-one thousand two hundred and twenty-three dollars and twenty-nine cents in some safe and profitable manner; and any portion of the interest and dividends of said School Fund, or other money or property raised for school purposes, which may not be needed in sustaining Common Schools, shall be invested in like manner. The General Assembly shall make provision, by law, for the payment of the interest of said School Fund: Provided, That each county shall be entitled to its proportion of the income of said fund, and if not called for, for common school purposes, it shall be re-invested from time to time for the benefit of each county.

SECTION 2. A Superintendent of Public Instruction shall be elected by the qualified voters of this Commonwealth, at the same time the Governor is elected, who shall hold his office for four years, and his duties and salary shall be prescribed and fixed by law.

ARTICLE TWELFTH.

Mode of revising the Constitution.

SECTION 1. When experience shall point out the necessity of amending this Constitution, and when a majority of all the members elected to each house of the General Assembly shall, within the first twenty days of any regular session, concur in passing a law for taking the sense of the good people of this Commonwealth as to the necessity and expediency of calling a Convention, it shall be the duty of the several Sheriffs, and other officers of elections, at the next general election which shall be held for representatives to the General Assembly, after the passage of such law, to open a poll for, and make return to the Secretary of State, for the time being, of the names of all those entitled to vote for representatives, who have voted for calling a Convention; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of all the citizens of this State, entitled to vote for representatives, have voted for calling a Convention, the General Assembly shall, at their next regular session, direct that a similar poll shall be opened, and return made, for the next election for representatives; and if, thereupon, it shall appear that a majority of all the citizens of this State, entitled to vote for representatives, have voted for calling a Convention, the General Assembly shall, at their next session, pass a law calling a Convention, to consist of as many members as there shall be in the House of Representatives, and no more; to be chosen in the same manner and proportion, at the same time and places, and possessed of the same qualifications of a qualified elector, by citizens entitled to vote for representatives; and to meet within three months after their election, for the purpose of re-adopting, amending, or changing this Constitution; but if it shall appear by the vote of either year, as aforesaid, that a majority of all the citizens entitled to vote for representatives did not vote for calling a Convention, a Convention shall not then be called. And for the purpose of ascertaining whether a majority of the citizens, entitled to vote for representatives, did or did not vote for calling a Convention, as above, the General Assembly passing the law authorizing such vote shall provide for ascertaining the number of citizens entitled to vote for representatives within the State.

SECTION 2. The Convention, when assembled, shall judge of the election of its members and decide contested elections, but the General Assembly shall, in calling a Convention, provide for taking testimony in such cases and for issuing a writ of election in case of a tie.

ARTICLE THIRTEENTH.

That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized and established; WE DECLARE,

SECTION 1. That all freemen, when they form a social compact, are equal, and that no man, or set of men, are entitled to exclusive, separate public emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services.

SECTION 2. That absolute, arbitrary power over the lives, liberty, and property of freeman, exists no where in a republic—not even in the largest majority.

SECTION 3. That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, happiness, security, and the protection of property. For the advancement of these ends, they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish, their government, in such manner as they may think proper.

SECTION 4. That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; that no man shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; that no human authority ought, in any case whatever, to control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and that no preference shall ever be given, by law, to any religious societies or modes of worship.

SECTION 5. That the civil rights, privileges, or capacities, of any citizen, shall in no wise be diminished or enlarged on account of his religion.

SECTION 6. That all elections shall be free and equal.

SECTION 7. That the ancient mode of trial by jury shall be held sacred, and the right thereof remain inviolate, subject to such modifications as may be authorized by this Constitution.

SECTION 8. That printing presses shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the General Assembly, or any branch of government, and no law shall ever be made to restrain the right thereof. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of man, and every citizen may freely speak, write, and print, on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty.

SECTION 9. In prosecutions for the publication of papers investigating the official conduct of officers or men in a public capacity, or where the matter published is proper for public information, the truth thereof may be given in evidence; and in all indictments for libels, the jury shall have a right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the Court, as in other cases.

SECTION 10. That the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and possessions, from unreasonable seizures and searches, and that no warrant to search any place, or to seize any person, or thing, shall issue, without describing them as nearly as may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation.

SECTION 11. That in all criminal prosecutions, the accused hath a right to be heard by himself and counsel; to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him; to meet the witnesses face to face; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and in prosecutions by indictment or information, a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage; that he cannot be compelled to give evidence against himself; nor can he be deprived of his life, liberty, or property, unless by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

SECTION 12. That no person shall, for any indictable offence, be proceeded against criminally, by information, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger, or by leave of the Court, for oppression or misdemeanor in office.

SECTION 13. No person shall, for the same offence, be twice put in jeopardy of his life or limb; nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use, without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being previously made to him.

SECTION 14. That all Courts shall be open, and every person, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have remedy by the due course of law, and right and justice administered, without sale, denial, or delay.

SECTION 15. That no power of suspending laws shall be exercised, unless by the General Assembly, or its authority.

SECTION 16. That excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel punishments inflicted.

SECTION 17. That all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient securities, unless for capital offences, when the proof is evident or presumption great; and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

SECTION 18. That the person of a debtor, where there is not strong presumption of fraud, shall not be continued in prison after delivering up his estate for the benefit of his creditors, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

SECTION 19. That no ex post facto law, nor any law impairing contracts, shall be made.

SECTION 20. That no person shall be attainted of treason or felony by the General Assembly.

SECTION 21. That no attainer shall work corruption of blood, nor, except during the life of the offender, forfeiture of estate to the Commonwealth.

SECTION 22. That the estates of such persons as shall destroy their own lives, shall descend or vest as in case of natural death; and if any person shall be killed by casualty, there shall be no forfeiture by reason thereof.

SECTION 23. That the citizens have a right, in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for their common good, and to apply to those invested with the powers of Government, for redress of grievances, or other proper purposes, by petition, address, or remonstrance.

SECTION 24. That the rights of the citizens to bear arms in defence of themselves and the State, shall not be questioned; but the General Assembly may pass laws to prevent persons from carrying concealed arms.

SECTION 25. That no standing army shall, in time of peace, be kept up, without the consent of the General Assembly; and the military shall, in all cases, and at all times, be in strict subordination to the civil power.

SECTION 26. That no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

SECTION 27. That the General Assembly shall not grant any title of nobility, or hereditary distinction, nor create any office, the appointment to which shall be for a longer time than for a term of years.

SECTION 28. That emigration from the State shall not be prohibited.

SECTION 29. To guard against transgressions of the high powers which we have delegated, we declare, that everything in this article is excepted out of the general powers of government, and shall forever remain inviolate; and that all laws contrary thereto, or contrary to this Constitution, shall be void.

SCHEDULE.

That no inconvenience may arise from the alterations and amendments made in the Constitution of this Commonwealth, and in order to carry the same into complete operation, it is hereby declared and ordained:

SECTION 1. That all the laws of this Commonwealth, in force at the time of making the said alterations and amendments, and all rights, actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts, as well of individuals as of bodies corporate, shall continue as if the said alterations and amendments had not been made.

SECTION 2. The oaths of office herein directed to be taken may be administered by any Judge or Justice of the Peace, until the General Assembly shall otherwise direct.

SECTION 3. No office shall be superseded by the alterations and amendments made in the Constitution of this Commonwealth, but the laws of the State relative to the duties of the several officers, Executive, Judicial, and Military, shall remain in full force, though the same be contrary to said alterations and amendments, and the several duties shall be performed by the respective officers of the State, according to the existing laws, until the organization of the Government, as provided for under this new Constitution, and the entering into office of the new officers to be elected or appointed under said Government, and no longer.

SECTION 4. Immediately after the adjournment of the Convention, the Governor shall issue his proclamation, directing the several Sheriffs and other returning officers of the several counties of this State, authorized by law to hold elections for members of the General Assembly, to open and hold a poll in every county of the State, and in the city of Louisville, at the places and precincts designated by law for the holding the Presidential election in 1848, upon the first Monday and Tuesday of May, 1850, for the purpose of taking the sense of the good people of this State, in regard to the adoption or rejection of this Constitution; and it shall be the duty of the said officers to receive the votes of all persons entitled to vote for members of the General Assembly under the present Constitution. The said officers shall open a poll with two separate columns: "For the new Constitution," "Against the new Constitution," and shall address each voter presenting himself, the question: "Are you in favor of adopting the new Constitution?" and if he shall answer in the affirmative, his vote shall be recorded in the column for the new Constitution, and if he shall answer in the negative, his answer shall be set down in the column against the new Constitution. The said election shall be conducted for two days and in every other respect, as the State election for Representatives to the General Assembly are now conducted; and on the Thursday succeeding the said election, the various Sheriffs conducting said election at the different precincts, shall assemble at the court houses of their respective counties, and compare the polls of said election, and shall forthwith make due returns thereof to the Secretary of State, in conformity to the provisions of the existing laws upon the subject of elections of members of the General Assembly. The County Courts of the various counties of the Commonwealth shall, at their March or April terms of their said Courts, appoint as many Judges, Clerks and Deputy Sheriffs to superintend and conduct said elections as shall be necessary.

SECTION 5. That the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, about to assemble, be and they are hereby requested to make all necessary provisions, by law, for the proper carrying out of the submission of the new Constitution to the people of this Commonwealth, as provided for in section four of this schedule.

SECTION 6. That when this Convention adjourns, it will adjourn to re-assemble, in the town of Frankfort, on the first Monday of June, 1850, with the view and for the purpose of ascertaining the result of the vote upon the new Constitution. If the same shall have been ratified by a majority of all those voting for and against it, this Convention will then publish and proclaim this Constitution as the Constitution of Kentucky, and proceed further to provide for putting the new Government into operation. If it shall be found that a majority of all those voting for or against it, has been cast against it, then said Constitution shall be declared rejected, and this Convention will forthwith re-adopt and republish the present Constitution as the Constitution of the State.

SECTION 7. It shall be the duty of the General Assembly, which shall convene in the year 1850, to make an apportionment of the representation of this State, upon the principle set forth in this Constitution; and until the first apportionment shall be made, as herein directed, the apportionment of Senators and Representatives among the several districts and counties in this State, shall remain as at present fixed by law: Provided, That upon the adoption of this Constitution all Senators shall go out of office, and in the year 1850, an election for Senators and Representatives shall be held, and those elected shall hold their offices for one year and no longer.

SECTION 8. All recognizances heretofore taken, or which may be taken before the organization of the judicial department under this Constitution, shall remain valid, and shall pass over to, and may be prosecuted in the name of the Commonwealth. All criminal prosecutions and penal actions which have arisen, or may arise, before the re-organization of the judicial department under this Constitution, and which shall then be depending, may be prosecuted to judgment and execution, in the name of the Commonwealth.

SECTION 9. The General Assembly shall provide, by law, for the trial of any contested election of Auditor, Register, Treasurer, Attorney General, Judges of Circuit Courts, and all other officers, not otherwise herein specified.

SECTION 10. The General Assembly shall provide by law for the making of the returns by the proper officers, of the election of all officers to be elected under this Constitution; and the Governor shall issue commissions to the Auditor, Register, and Treasurer, as soon as he has ascertained the result of the election of those officers respectively.

SECTION 11. That the Sheriffs and other officers of the election shall be liable to all such fines and penalties for a failure to discharge the several duties imposed on them in this schedule, as are now imposed upon them by law, for a failure to perform their duty in conducting other general and State elections.

SECTION 12. Should the County Court of any of the counties of this Commonwealth fail or refuse to appoint Judges, Clerks, or Sheriffs, to superintend the election, as provided for in article four of this schedule, the high Sheriff of said county shall appoint such Judges, Clerks, and deputy Sheriffs.

SECTION 13. Should any of the Sheriffs or deputies in any of the counties of this Commonwealth die, resign, or from any other cause be prevented from attending with the poll books, as directed in section four of this schedule, for the comparison of the votes on the adoption or rejection of the new Constitution, it shall be the duty of the County Court Clerk, or his deputy in such county, to attend with said poll books, and aid in such comparison.

NAYS—Garrett Davis—1.

So the resolution was adopted.

The delegates present then proceeded to sign the constitution, in the order they are printed in the preceding pages.

PRESENTATION OF BOOKS.

On the motion of Mr. G. A. WICKLIFFE, the resolution adopted a few days since directing a copy of the journal and debates of the convention to be presented to delegates, officers, reporter, and chaplains, was so amended as to direct that additional copies be delivered to the reporter to the convention, for presentation to his assistants.

PRESIDENT'S VALEDICTORY.

The PRESIDENT having resumed the chair, and the business of the convention having been accomplished he rose to deliver his valedictory address, and spoke nearly as follows:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONVENTION:

I congratulate you upon the completion of your labors.

I also avail myself of this opportunity to return you my thanks for the kind manner in which you have given your assistance to the chair in preserving order, and the forbearance with which you have treated the waywardness of my temper upon sudden emergencies.

When I was elected to this situation, I was conscious how much I should require your indulgence. To you, then, I am deeply indebted for being enabled to get through the duties with so little difficulty to myself. And if, at any time during the period I have presided over you, there has appeared any thing harsh in my conduct, I beg to say, that it was not indicative of unkindness towards any one, and that I was influenced only by a desire to enforce the rules of order and decorum which are so essential to the progress of business. I hope every gentleman in this convention will be satisfied that I was influenced by no other motive.

I will take this occasion further to remark, that it has been my fortune to have taken part in the proceedings of twelve or thirteen sessions of the legislature of this state, and I have never seen so much order and decorum observed as I have witnessed in the deliberations of this convention.

I might say to this convention something in relation to the constitution itself, but I feel it would be scarcely necessary upon this occasion. I am glad, however, that in laying the foundations of this government, we have walked in the footsteps of those who preceded us, and laid them in justice, to the preservation of the lives, the liberties, and the property of the citizens. Having done this, all else in relation to the organization of the government is but a matter of expediency, to be tested by time.

A representative democracy, like ours, is based upon the will of the people, and as all cannot participate in the government, we select the free white male inhabitants over the age of twenty one years, and give them the rights of suffrage. They elect our executive, they elect our legislature, and now we have confided to them the election of all our judicial and ministerial officers.

The government being divided into three distinct sets of offices, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, the officers who will fill these several departments will receive their appointment from the hands of the people themselves; and this system of self-government works beautifully in its operations upon society, and is scarcely seen, or scarcely felt. The state is divided into counties, and they have municipal powers for the government of their internal affairs. In these counties there are cities and towns, and they also have municipal regulations to govern, direct, and control their peculiar interests, while the executive and legislative departments control the matters appertaining to the state at large, and at the same time the judiciary enforces the public justice of the country, and the rights of individuals as they arise under the constitution and the laws. In our constitution we instruct the executive and legislative departments in relation to the great and essential principles of liberty, which we tell them they shall not touch; we instruct the judiciary in regard to those great and essential principles, and to take care that neither the executive nor the legislative departments interfere with them to the prejudice of private right; and in the laws passed by the legislature and executive, we further instruct the judiciary in reference to all matters of contract and private right; and they will go forth with the warrant of the people to decide upon the public justice of the country, and the rights of private individuals.

In this scheme, the judiciary is the great executive branch of the government which brings the constitution and the laws in direct operation upon the people; and, for the preservation of the private rights of the citizen, it is essential that this body of magistracy should be learned, able, and upright men; and, I believe, the success of the scheme of an elective judiciary will depend essentially upon our being able to obtain such men.

I could have wished, personally, that we had provided adequate compensation in order that we might procure competent men to fill these offices. We have left these salaries to the legislature; and in going back to the people with this constitution, it will be our duty to impress upon them the necessity and importance of giving sufficient salaries, in order that the best talents of the state may be brought into our tribunals, so that public justice shall be administered correctly, and the private rights of the citizen be properly cared for, and promptly decided. If adequate salaries should not be given, the poor man, with talents, will not be able to take these offices, and they will necessarily fall into the hands of a secondary order of men who have some property inherited, and who are not in possession of the requisite abilities for the discharge of these high duties. It is essential in a government like ours, that due encouragement should be given to all the talents of every portion of the community, so that they may fill the highest offices of government. I beg, therefore, to impress upon you that the success of this experiment of an elective judiciary will mainly depend upon giving the best compensation for the best talent, thus calling the best men to fill these situations.

I have no earthly doubt that this constitution will be accepted by the people. I do not believe that the emancipationists, as a body, will rise up and battle against the will of the people of Kentucky, expressed by this convention in relation to that particular matter. They are in a minority, and many of them are intelligent men, and men of property, and standing. I do not believe they will be willing to agitate the country again on that subject, and attempt to create discord and dissatisfaction in the community; but that, as good citizens and republicans, they will bow to the will of the majority.

I do not believe that the office holders, as a body, will go against this constitution. Those of them who are men of talents and standing will consider that they have as fair a chance for office as any other individuals, and will not attempt to set up their individual interests against those of the great majority of the people. I doubt not that we will find that portion of them using their best influences to sustain this constitution. Those of them who have not high attainments and influential friends will be able to do but little to resist the great popular will. For these reasons I fear nothing, either from the emancipationists or the office holders, in relation to the success of this constitution. There are some individuals who come to this question of selecting judges from the people with reluctance; and, twelve months ago, how many doubted on this subject who are with the movement now? And how many, who doubted up to the time of the assembling of this convention, will cease to doubt when this constitution has been presented to them; especially when they consider the immense majority of the people of Kentucky who are in favor of it, and have listened to the argument and experience that have been had upon this subject? The volume of intelligence in the great mass of the people, is greater than the volume of intelligence that exists in any number of individuals you can select, in relation to the appointment of officers; the volume of integrity of purpose, in relation to public right, is far greater in the districts, where the laws are to be applied, than in any body of men we can select; and hence I believe that those who have doubted and hesitated will come in and support this constitution, because they will see the impossibility of rolling back the great tide of popular feeling that has been exhibited in favor of restoring these offices to the people, and I trust that this constitution will be sustained by a large and overwhelming vote.

We have every reason to believe that this constitution will be adopted. From this place I have seen cast almost every vote that has been given in making this constitution. The people were not governed by party considerations, in selecting the delegates to this convention, and in this convention I have witnessed no vote in making this constitution that I could trace to party. Every vote, so far as I have been able to observe, has been the act of both parties, coming up singly to the purpose of doing the will of the people in relation to the fundamental law of the land; and if these two parties should unite as heartily and zealously in carrying this constitution into effect as this body have united in framing it, there can be no possible doubt about the result.

Gentlemen, we are about to separate. We shall, perhaps, never all meet again. If we should it will be a rare occurrence. When we return to our constituents, I have no doubt, we shall be received with kindness. It has not unfrequently happened that concessions have been made, and the people will see the necessity of making concessions themselves. You have discharged your duties to the country zealously and impartially, and have entitled yourselves to the favor of your constituents.

Gentlemen, I hope on your return to your homes, you will find that your families have been graciously preserved during your absence by a kind providence, and that you will be long spared to be useful to them, and to your country in the various stations you may be called upon to fill; and that none of you may ever have reason to regret the part you have taken in framing this constitution.

CLOSING PRAYER.

The Rev. G. W. BRUSH, offered up the following prayer:

ALMIGHTY God, our Heavenly Father; at the close of the labors of this convention, during which Thou hast granted unto us so many blessings, we desire to lift up our hands, our hearts, and our tongues in a united expression of gratitude and thanksgiving. Thou hast preserved the lives and the health of the members of this convention; and Thou hast given us peace, quiet, harmony, and friendship. We are therefore greatly indebted to Thee; and we pray that Thy blessing, may go with the labors of this convention to the people of the commonwealth, and that this reorganization of the government may be a blessing to us, and to our children after us. Grant us now thy pardoning mercy wherein we may have acted amiss, that we may leave this place with the blessing of our God. Hear us in these our imperfect petitions; accept our humble acknowledgments, and, ultimately, through thy great mercy, bring each one of us to reign with Thee in everlasting life; and to the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit shall be eternal and everlasting praises; Amen.

The PRESIDENT then proclaimed that this convention stands adjourned to the first Monday in June next.

France. Louis XIV, and her monarchs most imbued with Romanism, were her greatest tyrants. That had always been her national religion, and all other faiths were generally persecuted and proscribed by her. Of late years, as the light of true liberty and religion began to make further encroachments upon the dark domain of popery and despotism, other sects became to be partially tolerated; and one of the first fruits of the late popular revolution was, the proscription of Romanism as the established religion, and the free toleration of all religious persuasions. But still the example of France, as asserting and upholding freedom, cannot be quoted with triumph, or indeed without shame to her.

A few months ago, and Rome herself awoke from her long night of slavery, and declaring herself free, her spiritual and temporal despot, the Pope, fled from her walls and took refuge in Gaeta. The tyrant of enslaved Spain, and he of Naples, having but just re-subjugated her after a convulsive effort for freedom, and republican France, undertook the overthrow of the Roman Republic, and the restoration of the Pope to his spiritual and temporal throne. The regenerate Romans offered to receive the Pope as their spiritual head, but resolutely insisted on the abolition of his temporal power and that of his college of cardinals. The overture was scorned, the work of subjugation to despotism was assigned to France, she marched her armies upon Rome, bombarded and carried the city by assault, and crushed the new Republic and that liberty, for which France herself had taught by her example, the Romans to strike. Shade of Brutus, why didst thou not rise up to confound these bastard republicans of France! At the same time Hungary was heroically combatting against the destruction of her nationality and of her ancient rights. In the days of the trouble of the Hapsburgs, that great race of people had upheld their tottering throne, and the requital they were to receive from those they had saved, was slavery. But the love of liberty with these sturdy northens was manly, vigorous, deep, and enthusiastic. They rose upon their oppressors, overthrew the armies of Austria, menaced Vienna, and the trembling emperor called upon the Russian Czar to save him; and to quell this tempestuous spirit of northern freedom which seemed to threaten the destruction of every throne. Too promptly, and too well, the imperial despot of the north answered to the call; and he and Austria poured in upon Hungary armies numerous as all her men. The triumph of despotism was completed, and Hungarian liberty is the noblest ruin of the age. Her heroic struggle, with which every heart, all over the world, devoted to the rights and liberty of man, was held in convulsive sympathy, these miserable French republicans turned coldly from, and marched in a crusade against a kindred cause in Rome.

But, Mr. President, of all the strange and extravagant claims which ever fell upon my ear, this, that the papacy and Romanism favored the liberty of mankind, is to me, the most remarkable. Her dark mantle still hangs like a pall over the most of Europe. Schlegel says truly, that Romanism favors monarchy—Protestantism, republican liberty; and such is the history of both faiths. The one is genial to the advancing rights and civilization of man, the tendency of the other is to fetter him in ignorance, superstition, and sloth. Compare England with Spain, Prussia with Italy, the United States with Mexico and the South American countries. In each case, the Catholics have the greater natural advantages of country, but how striking the present inferiority of people in everything which constitutes the power, dignity, and happiness of man. Nor does this result from any inferiority of race. In the sixteenth century the Spaniards were the first people of Europe.—That race had been formed in a conflict of eight centuries with the Moors, and the world never knew superior men naturally than to the conquerors of the Aztecs and the Incas, and those missionaries that established themselves as early as the fifteenth century in the Celestial Empire, and on the bay of California. It is the spirit and tendency of their religion which has degraded them to their present position.

I freely admit the good and the wise are now to be, and have in every age, been found without number among the Catholics even of Europe. It could not, nor cannot be otherwise. The children of this church for many centuries constituted almost the whole of christendom; and number something like 180,000,000 more than all christians besides, in the aggregate; and excluding the Greek church, probably three times as numerous as all the other sects. As long as this faith endures, if it be throughout time, it will have among its followers myriads of excellent christians doubtless. But this only proves that, even great and gross corruptions, interpolated in any religious faith founded upon the Bible, cannot prevent many, very many, from being good and pious. But Romanism in America, practically—at least, is greatly modified by the general intelligence, spirit of inquiry, and religious liberty and privileges of the whole people. In the purity of morals, exemption from superstition and bigotry, and independence of the priesthood, the native born Catholics are immeasurably elevated above the Catholics of Europe. All our countrymen who travel abroad into Catholic countries, so inform us, and we see it verified every day in the person of the immigrant Catholic. Against those who have been born amongst us, I make no move. And against those who come from abroad, if they and their priests will cease to connect their religion with the politics and government of the country; to indoctrinate the people with the moral and political doctrines which flow from the teachings of the Catholic church; and through political combinations and the power of the ballot-box to make the country wholly catholic, and bring it under the dominion of the Pope and Romanism; if they will drive their Bishop Hughes and their other political missionaries from political machinations to advance the triumphs of their church by spiritual means and dropping as churchmen, their temporal projects and aspirations in the country to which they are by birth aliens, will attend only to spiritualities, and in any way they may please, for one humble individual, I will promise never to molest them. But whilst they continue their political labors in the cause, of what they claim is to become a universal hierarchy, and of a supreme and infallible hierarchy resident in another hemisphere, I stand up in opposition to them, and will to life's end.

Mr. WOODSON moved the previous question, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

W. Williams, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—58.

So the convention refused to take them up.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

The convention proceeded to the consideration of the last report of the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

The first, second and third sections were read and adopted as follows, without amendment:

"SCHEDULE.

"That no inconvenience may arise from the alterations and amendments made in the constitution of this commonwealth, and in order to carry the same into complete operation, it is hereby declared and ordained:

"SEC. 1. That all the laws of this commonwealth, in force at the time of making the said alterations and amendments, and all rights actions, prosecutions, claims, and contracts, as well of individuals as of bodies corporate, shall continue as if the said alterations and amendments had not been made.

"SEC. 2. The oaths of office herein directed to be taken may be administered by any judge or justice of the peace, until the legislature shall otherwise direct.

"SEC. 3. No office shall be superceded by the alterations and amendments made in the constitution of this commonwealth, but the laws of the state relative to the duties of the several officers, executive, judicial, and military, shall remain in full force, though the same be contrary to said alterations and amendments, and the several duties shall be performed by the respective officers of the state, according to the existing laws, until the organization of the government, as provided for under this new constitution, and the entering into office of the new officers to be elected or appointed under said government and no longer."

"SEC. 4. Immediately after the adjournment of the convention, the governor shall issue his proclamation, directing the several sheriffs and other returning officers of the several counties of this state, authorized by law to hold elections for members of the general assembly, to open and hold a poll in every county in the state, and in the city of Louisville, at the places and precincts designed by law for the holding the presidential election in 1848, upon the first Monday of May, 1850, for the purpose of taking the sense of the good people of this state, in regard to the adoption or rejection of this constitution; and it shall be the duty of the said officers, to receive the votes of all persons entitled to vote for members of the general assembly under the present constitution. The said officers shall open a poll with two separate columns: "For the new constitution," "Against the new constitution," and shall address each voter presenting himself, the question: "Are you in favor of adopting the new constitution?" and if he shall answer in the affirmative, his vote shall be recorded in the column for the new constitution, and if he shall answer in the negative, his answer shall be set down in the column against the new constitution. The said election shall be conducted for one day, and in every other respect, as the state election for representatives to the general assembly are now conducted; and on the Thursday succeeding the said election, the various sheriffs conducting said election at the different precincts, shall assemble at the county seat of their respective counties, and compare the polls of said election, and shall forthwith make due return thereof to the Secretary of state, in conformity to the provisions of the existing laws upon the subject of elections of members of the general assembly. The county courts of the various counties of the commonwealth shall, at their March or April terms of their said courts, appoint two judges, a clerk, and deputy sheriff, to superintend and conduct said elections."

Mr. WOODSON. Mr. President, I will propose an amendment for the purpose of testing the sense of the convention on the mode by which this constitution is to be ratified. I believe it was the universal opinion that when this convention finished their business here, they would adjourn sine die. I would wish that the sense of the people should be taken on the question of adopting the new constitution or re-adopting the old one. And for that purpose I would move to amend this section of the report of the committee on miscellaneous provisions, by striking out the words "the new constitution" in the thirteenth line, and substituting the words, "for the old constitution."

Mr. HARDIN. The people have already decided against the old constitution by calling this convention. The old constitution was promulgated in 1799, and the people of our day have declared, by an overwhelming majority, that it should be amended.

Mr. STEVENSON. It is but right to state, that when this report was drawn up, a large majority of the committee thought it would be necessary for this convention to re-assemble to put this constitution in operation. If it be the determination of the convention to re-assemble, then the question will not be between the 'new' and the 'old' constitution, but 'for' or 'against' the new constitution. The committee having directed me to make a report, are not yet determined how they will vote upon the subject.

Mr. WOODSON then withdrew his amendment.

Some verbal amendments were made on the motion of Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. With the view of ascertaining the sense of the convention on the question whether we shall dissolve this convention and submit the constitution in the mode indicated by that report, and thus make the constitution of Kentucky depend upon a contingency, over which this convention has no control, or whether we shall finish this work and proclaim the constitution from our hands as a convention; and, if we cannot do that, perform the other duty imposed upon us by the article of the constitution in the re-adoption of the old one, and then go home—with a view of testing the feelings of the convention on this question, I desire to offer a resolution, which will bring the subject immediately before the consideration of this house. It would accord with my wishes, personally, not to return to this hall again as a member of the convention, if my absence could take place consistently with the duty I owe to my constituency; and if I could satisfy myself that we ought to permit this constitution to depend upon a contingency; but I believe it is the duty of the convention to proclaim this constitution; and I am unwilling to transfer the business and power of proclaiming what is the constitution of Kentucky to any agency—whether select committee, governor of the commonwealth, legislature, or any officer of state. We have, in my opinion, the right of consulting the wishes of our constituents, either before we came here, while we are here, or hereafter; and I am in favor of submitting our work to their judgment. If the majority of them should approve of it, then it is the duty of this convention to proclaim it from this hall as the organic law of the land, and then to put the government of the state under this constitution. These are the views I hold on this matter, and I wish to test the sense of the house on this question. For that purpose, I move to lay down the report of the committee, now under consideration, with the view of taking up the resolution which I am prepared to offer.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative.

The resolution of the gentleman from Nelson was then reported as follows:

Resolved, That the convention will take a recess and submit the constitution as agreed upon, and proposed to be adopted, to the people for their approval or rejection; and that the convention will re-assemble to ascertain the result of the vote, and to close the labors and duties devolved upon the convention, by proclaiming the new constitution, and providing for putting the government into operation, or to re-adopt the old constitution.

Mr. HARDIN. I am very happy to say that I entirely concur with my colleague in this matter. I have a few words to say on the subject, but shall wait until some other gentleman has spoken.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope this report will be acted upon now. The committee has drawn up a report with the view of settling this question, and I think we ought immediately to set about its settlement. I feel as sensibly as any gentleman on this floor, that the sands of this convention are ebbing fast, and I am as anxious as any gentleman to get through with business so as to let us get home. But, sir, this is one of the nicest questions that has yet come before this body. When it is remembered that the people have called this convention, that it has assembled in obedience to their will, and passed through the greater part of the task that has devolved upon it, and, further, that the success of the constitution depends upon our action here, we cannot but feel how deeply important it is that this question should have a careful consideration.

I should like to understand, sir, what the mover of this resolution proposes to do when we re-assemble. The object for which we are to re-assemble must have some weight in determining the policy of the step. Is it proposed that this convention shall re-assemble simply for the purpose of declaring that this constitution is the work of our hands, and that we approve of our own work? Or is it proposed that the convention shall re-assemble for the purpose of districting the state, and of putting this constitution into practical operation? If the latter is the object of the gentleman, I can see some sense in it; but I cannot see any propriety in re-assembling here merely to assert that this paper, which everybody knows to be our work, is our work. We have already imposed a great deal of work upon the legislature, and why not the duty of proclaiming this constitution? I think, sir, we ought to know definitely and distinctly, what we are to do when we re-assemble.

Mr. GHOLSON. In proposing to submit this constitution to the vote of the people, the question comes up "when is this constitution to take effect?" If it is not to take effect until after the day it is to be voted upon, I ask in what way any obligation is placed upon the state to hold an election; or, if the proper officers should refuse to hold such election, how will they be punished? How can you enforce such an election unless you declare now that this constitution is the paramount law of the land? When I first came here I was as much in favor of a sine die adjournment as any man. I believe that the convention have the power to put a contingent clause into the constitution to submit it to the people; but then how comes the question that it shall not be the permanent law of the land until the first of May. It seems to me to be a mere matter of courtesy to the people, and that it might as well be ratified by the convention now.

Mr. HARDIN. I have a few remarks to make upon this question, and I may just as well make them now as at any other time. I understand sir, that we are assembled for the following purpose: "And to meet within three months after the said election for the purpose of re-adopting, amending, or changing this constitution."

We are to meet, and when we meet, we have the power to readopt the whole of the old constitution if it so please us—we are to meet, and when we meet, we are to amend that constitution if we please, or to make a new one out and out; but whatever is done, we are to do it. The act of assembly which was passed last year endeavored to conform to the constitution, but it did not do it exactly in so many words.

That constitution was made fifty years ago, when our state was in its infancy. We had not then a population of over twenty five thousand voters. After a lapse of nearly fifty years, the people became greatly dissatisfied with the constitution made for us, and the question being put to the people whether they would have a convention to amend that constitution, it was decided by a majority of forty eight thousand votes. In pursuance of that vote, the legislature again put the question to the people, and by a majority of ninety thousand votes, they declared in favor of calling a convention to amend this constitution, and we, Mr. President, have been elected in pursuance of that call. We are sent here to make a new constitution or to change or alter the old one. The people, in the strongest manner have proclaimed to us and to the world at large, that they are opposed to the old constitution.

Well, sir, we are sent here by them, for what purpose? To alter or change the old constitution, or to promulgate a new one. Well now have we the power to adjourn until the first of

June, as some gentlemen think it to be necessary? I say that we have the power; that we can adjourn from day to day, if we choose; that we can adjourn for a month if we choose, or for six months if we choose; but if ever we dissolve then there is an end of it. If ever we adjourn without a day fixed in our adjournment, then there is an end of the vitality of this convention. I suppose there is no question of our power to adjourn till the first of June. I came here, sir, with a full determination to submit the new or altered constitution to my constituents. But when it is submitted to them, are they to make it? No, sir, we are to take their advice and opinion upon it; and when that is done, we are to pronounce the final action of the convention, because it is the convention alone that is to make the constitution. Sir, to use a legal illustration, we are like a court of chancery, when the chancellor sends his interlocutory decree to a commissioner; the commissioner is to make out his report, and the chancellor acts upon it and gives his final judgment. It is not the commissioner who furnishes the decision; he furnishes but the facts on which the chancellor pronounces. We present the new constitution to the people, but do they make it? No, sir. We have framed a set of laws and submitted them to the people for their examination and approval; and when they have given or withheld that, we act understandingly in relation to their opinion on the subject. They don't make the constitution, we are to make it; we are to publish it; we are to promulgate it to the people of Kentucky, and to the world, that they may know what we do. But, sir, how is it by the present regulation? We are to submit it to the people; a vote is to be taken, and the several county courts are to appoint judges. If they don't appoint them, the sheriff is to appoint them. The regulation is most excellent. The polls are to be opened in every county and in all the precincts of the counties. Returns of the sheriffs are to be made on the Thursday afterwards; and when the vote is ascertained each sheriff of each county is to certify to the secretary of state. That is all very well, but what then? After that is done, it puts in the aggregate vote of the people, and the governor, secretary of state, attorney general, and auditor, are to count and compare the polls, and they are to proclaim what is the constitution, and not us. They are the men to whom we thus delegate the power to make the constitution; they are to give it life and vitality. Now I say it is our duty to do it; and I will here remark, in reply to the gentleman from Knox, that I don't think it was universally agreed not to come back here. I never heard of any such universal agreement. I verily believe that, in some states, conventions have published their constitutions without submitting them to the people at all. We did so in 1799; in other states constitutions have been so submitted. Well, be it so; but I do think it is our duty to meet here and compare the polls for and against the constitution, and say whether the majority of all the votes cast are for the constitution or against it; to say whether the election has been rightly conducted, and whether every county has cast its vote. Suppose one or two counties have not voted, what then? We are to do whatever we may think advisable to be done. I believe, Mr. President, that it is our bounden duty to appear here at some convenient time after the election to ascertain what the people say on the subject, and then to act accordingly. That this is within our power no man denies. Now as to the propriety of doing that, I think it is our bounden duty.

As there appears to be a difference of opinion in the house, whether this is a matter of duty or expediency, I will call the attention of the house for a few moments to the question of expediency. The people have called us together to make a constitution, and we have assembled pursuant to that call. The state has expended, up to yesterday, inclusive, forty thousand dollars, in this convention, and before we adjourn the expenses will, in all probability, amount to forty five thousand dollars. The people expect a constitution at our hands; they look for it, they demand it, and we are not to break up here and leave our work unfinished. Sir, if we adjourn without a day for re-assemblage, then we have no power; and then will come on the death struggle; then the great object of this convention is to be defeated, and again all the discordant elements of the state will close in and put down this constitution. The abolitionists, or call them by the tenderest name you will, and say "emancipationists," of whom there are not less than 30 or 40,000 in Kentucky, will use every exertion in their power to put down this constitution, and they will do it, because we have then no power left. And what is to be the result? The same battle which we fought last year will have to be fought over again, with new and increased violence. Efforts will be made in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and other states to throw a vast amount of this kind of influence into this state. Men are to take the stump again, and then when the vote comes, they will say they did not vote because they saw they could not carry the election. They will poll every vote, and exhibit a force of 40,000 votes. But in addition to that, what more will they show? They will produce the same spirit of insubordination, outrage, and violence among the black population which there was before the election for this convention, if we now finally adjourn. Your celebrated preaching men, in their black coats, dedicated to the service of God, but alas! too many of them in the service of the devil, will endeavor to serve the negro population, and the same distracting battle will have to be fought over again. What else is to be done? Your office holders, your judges, your sheriffs, your magistrates, who are to succeed the next, and the next, and your constables who are losing their places, your office holders from the highest to the lowest will start into the field, and show their hands, and will make every exertion; what for? For the purpose of defeating this constitution. The constitution defeated, the convention adjourned, and what then? Why you are thrown back upon the old constitution.

Who was it that called this convention and for what purpose was it called? It was called by the people of Kentucky for the purpose of bringing down the appointing power of the government and bestowing it upon those to whom it legitimately belongs—the people. And for what other purpose? Why for the purpose of bringing down the life-tenures of office, and the scandalous sale of offices. To all this the emancipationists and office-holders are keenly alive. And what more? At least sixty thousand of this class were against calling the convention, and they were well united. You will find the houses of Austria and Russia uniting once more to crush the Hungarians and to put us back where we were before. And who is to take the field for this new constitution? Nobody that I know of. Who is to raise the sinews of war? Nobody. Thousands and hundreds of thousands will be raised to put down this constitution. Do you ask who are to raise it? Your emancipationists in the adjoining states and your office-holders will raise it; and the great object of the people will be defeated. But, sir, if we adjourn to meet on the first Monday of June, then there will be a fair voting; no emancipationists will be interested in sowing the seeds of discord, because we have to meet again, and we have the power to carry it into effect. There will be no chance then to fall back upon the old constitution; and if such an event should happen by any possibility, the people will be so dissatisfied with the old constitution, that in less than ten years they would call another convention.

But one gentleman says, what are we to do when we come back here? I am not mealy-mouthed about what I intend to do if I get here; other gentlemen can do as they please, I am but one. I will endeavor for myself, and I trust it will be so with the other ninety-nine delegates, to confirm and promulgate the constitution, if the people are willing; to come here and shake hands, and say "well done thou good and faithful servant." If the people should not approve it in all its provisions, we can see what is the matter, and rectify it, and endeavor to conform to public opinion. There is no paper in the world, that ingenious men cannot find fault with; there is no language used that they cannot pick holes in; even the Almighty himself, when he delivered his divine laws to the Jews, was not always understood. They misunderstood him occasionally, and not unfrequently departed from his commands. The best language that ever was used—not Webster himself—and he was a perfect master of ours—can use language that cannot be misinterpreted. But the opponents of this constitution can have no motive of this kind, if we adjourn over their heads. No ingenious sophist can then undo our work, because we have power to meet again, and correct anything we may have done wrong; and the people will not cavil at anything which is not wrong.

I have given in a few words what my views are. First, that we have power to adjourn; secondly, that we are either to abolish the old constitution and make a new one, or we are to alter and amend it. We cannot delegate that power. But, thirdly, and most of all, we owe it to ourselves to see that this constitution is properly ratified. Sir, we have met here to make a constitution, and it is not unknown to gentlemen that there are some persons in this state who have done all in their power to traduce us by stating that we were spending our time needlessly and wasting public money. Some of these persons are probably now preparing the public mind to crush our labors; and I will say this—that I have never seen a set of men labor more assiduously, more honestly, more earnestly than have the members of this convention. They have gone into no dissipation, no frolics; they have labored almost day and night to make the best constitution they could, and that would suit the wishes of their constituents. The great body of the intelligence of Kentucky is here; and we owe it to ourselves, to posterity, to our constituents, that we should never adjourn until we have made them a constitution. If we should do so, what will be the result? Why, we will be a laughing stock, a scoff, and the scorn not only of Kentucky, but of all the surrounding states. Self-respect, the high consideration of this convention, the duty which we owe to our constituents, tell us not to quit till we have made a constitution which will be satisfactory to the people. Some objection, I believe, has been made to our constitution, on account of its running a little too much into detail. Be that as it may, we have fulfilled the expectations of the people; we have taken away the appointing power from the governor; we have changed the tenures of office; we have given them an elective judiciary. And, sir, what instrument is there in the world that is without defects? We have done all we could do, and I do hope we shall never consent finally to leave here, until we have proclaimed this as the new constitution of the state of Kentucky.

Mr. MAUPIN. The duty which I owe to my constituents is paramount to everything. I came here at a late season, but I promised my constituents that I would endeavor to make them a constitution, and that we would submit it to them when finished, for their approbation.

My friend's proposition is one of great moment, and one that we are bound to look to. I heard a great deal said when I was at home about the wisdom of the hundred men who were making this constitution, and not a little too about their delaying their business so long and spending the people's money; but to this I replied that it was difficult to get a hundred men to think alike, and that every man had his opinion and would express it too, as he was bound to do. The proposition of the gentleman from Nelson is nothing more than what we promised the people we would do. Adjourn without a day, and the constitution incomplete, or not brought into effect, and the people will say, "you have tantalized us." They did not want a great deal done; the chief thing which they were anxious to see abolished was this life tenure of office, and the power of filling offices vested in the proper hands. This has been effected in a manner highly satisfactory. The convention has broken, as it were, into a hornet's nest, and though there may be a little stinging, the mischief has been effectually eradicated. Our fathers gave us a constitution and left us their example; and from both we may learn that they were anxious our government should be established in as independent a basis as possible. The right of acquiring property, of having open courts, of the liberty of speech, of justice without sale, denial, or delay, were sacred privileges secured to us by our fathers in making their constitution; they thus gave us these four pillars of polished marble, and all they required of us was to turn a good arch over them. Here, then, are a hundred men, influenced by the most patriotic motives, neglecting their business, away from their families, working like a band of brothers, harmonizing on all great subjects of interest, compromising their feelings, come together for the purpose of laying down—and they have laid down—the foundation of our government, giving to every man equal rights and privileges. Do not talk to me of the government becoming unwieldy. All we want is unanimity of feeling, and concert of action, to destroy what is called dengogism. Let us throw self out of doors, and come here with hearts declaring that we love our country better than every thing else. This constitution is to last, not like a rope of sand, but I trust it will continue forever. Then let us take action at once, and give our enemies no occasion to attempt to destroy the work that we have done. Let us act with caution and judgment. We have erected a pillar which we hope will stand, and not be thrown down in a night. Close your business now and adjourn sine die, and the people will say you have neglected your work, you have refused to do what they sent you here to accomplish.

Let me say to this proud body of men, that I cannot say enough in their praise when I return to my constituents. It is true that I have had comparatively no hand in their deliberations, but my heart has been with them. They have discharged their duty with great ability—I have never seen anything like it in my life; and to the honor of Kentucky, I say that two-thirds of the people will receive this constitution with open arms.

Gentlemen, you have done great honor to your country. Now carry out, fulfill, accomplish to its perfection, what you have already done. Do not leave that unfinished, which was a sine qua non with the people. Adjourn without a day, and leave this matter to the people, and how can they settle it? They care not for the expense so that the work is completed; and they have left it to you to begin and to end it. Finally, I trust that no gentleman will go home and speak against the constitution, to his constituents. There may be points to which some would object, and others to which others would object; but we have acted with comparative unanimity here, and have compromised many of our feelings, and perhaps some of our local interests, for the general good; let us keep up that spirit, let us cultivate it among our constituents, and if we do this, there is not the shadow of a doubt that the constitution will be accepted by an overwhelming majority, and that all you will have to do when you return to this hall, will be to affix your names to the instrument and proclaim it to the people as the organic law of the state of Kentucky.

I leave the subject, hoping that the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson will be carried by acclamation.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. The question which this resolution presents, involves two propositions, of which the first is, "shall we submit this constitution to the people of Kentucky for their adoption?" The old constitution authorizes us to submit the constitution we may now make, to the votes of the people of Kentucky; but I conceive that whether such authority is, or is not given by the old constitution, matters nothing in the determination of the first question involved in the resolution. The people who have sent us here, and who have imposed upon us the sole agency of making an organic law, have given us the power of disposing of that proposition according to our wise discretion. Wisdom and experience teach us that public sentiment should be adopted by this body. I therefore, cannot discover a dissenting voice in this house to that part of the proposition which relates to the reference of the constitution to the people. The elder gentleman from Nelson in his remarks, introduced a legal illustration which I do not think he applied with very happy effect; certainly I cannot coincide with his application of it, and must take the liberty of placing it in direct contrariety with his position. The people of Kentucky, sir, in this case, constitute the high chancellor who have instituted an interlocutory decree to this house as commissioners, to carry out at discretion. The principle of that decree, devolves upon us the duty of making a constitution, as the result of the labors, in which we have been engaged during the last three months. We have made a report upon which is to be based the decree of this great high chancellor, the people of the state of Kentucky. This report is embodied in the constitution which is to be submitted to the sovereigns of this state. They are to consider it in all its bearings, and to say whether it accords with the principles laid down in that decree; and if, upon examination of the labors of this house, they can say that this principle is fairly carried out, it becomes then the decree of this great high chancellor, and goes forth the law and constitution of Kentucky. Is not that the correct position, and the state of the fact, in reference to this question? If it is, we have been engaged for three months past in doing that duty which we ought to be proud to say was confided to us by this high chancellor, and we refer to it the inquiry into the truth of the statement we make, when we ask him to put his name to this as his final decree; and when his name is affixed to this decree there is an execution; and the question arising on this second proposition is this: "in executing this final decree, are we bound to come back here to sign our names to it, and give it efficiency, or whether, by the powers conferred upon us as a convention, we have a right to assign this duty to some other agency less expensive to the state and equally solemn in its office." I insist that this power can be as legitimately exercised through the agency created in this fifth section of the report, as it can be through the agency of this house.

We delegate solemnly the power of proclaiming the result of the popular vote, as to the acceptance or non-acceptance of the constitution, to the governor of Kentucky. Cannot this be effected as well through that medium as through the re-assembly of this house? And does not the assemblage of this house, to perform an act which can be as well done through the executive of the commonwealth, involve a little absurdity and ridicule in itself? Shall the congregated respectability and intelligence of the state—for I will not subscribe to the idea which some gentlemen entertain of the magnificent abilities of this assembly, (I believe it is a fair sample of the honesty and intelligence of Kentucky, but I believe it falls far short of the intellect of which this state so proudly boasts; I believe that some of the highest order of intellect in this state has been excluded from this convention, but I believe also that this house is a fair representation of the virtue, intelligence and honesty of the good people of this country, and I am proud of the character of the state)—but, sir, shall the congregated intelligence and wisdom of Kentucky re-assemble here for the purpose of doing an act which, in my opinion, can be as well performed by any delegated agency? The re-assembly of this body for such a purpose appears to me to be wholly without necessity. Suppose that resolution requiring us to assemble here again is to be adopted, what is to be the effect? What are we to do? Are we to do more than ratify the will of the people who have passed their votes upon the subject, or are we to constitute ourselves into a permanent body which shall go again and again into operation? Were we elected with any view of re-assembling after we once adjourned? Did it enter at all into the minds of the people that we were to constitute ourselves a perpetual body; or was it not merely to do what we were sent to do, and then adjourn? If we were assembled for any other purpose except to register the will of our masters, what is that purpose? To make another constitution? If when we have been found wanting in ability to make one, are we to come back to do it—to try again to do that in which we have already failed? Will the people have unlimited confidence? If when once we have failed, will they trust us again? If we are to come here again and go to making a new constitution, I ask you whether that is consistent with the original design of the electors who sent us here? Well, we assemble again and make another constitution, what is to be done with it? Have you considered what is to be done in a second convention? You have already expended from forty to fifty thousand dollars, you are to assemble again in June and make another constitution and expend forty-five thousand dollars more? And what is to be done then when you have made another constitution? Will you say that shall be the constitution of the state? No sir; you will have to submit it again to the people, and thus you will go on, like a drowning man grasping at a straw, holding on to the office to which you were elected in 1849, and you assemble and re-assemble, and assemble again, until the people become indignant and they come here in a body and push you out of the doors of this hall.

Is this drawing too strong a picture? I think not. I do not think the elder gentleman from Nelson will agree to come here without the direction of the people; and if he would so agree, would the house agree to it? But he says if you do not agree to meet, you will weaken the estimation in which the people will hold this constitution. I ask you gentlemen who sent you here? The people of Kentucky. Are you to control them or they you? But the gentleman says there are forty thousand emancipationists in the state. And what if there are? Are they not to be here for all time. If he submits the constitution to them now he has to meet them; and if he submits it a second time he has still to meet them. They have as much right as he to the freedom of their opinions; and there is not a bold spirit in this hall that will challenge them to show why our constitution should not be accepted.

But, sir, this constitution is going to be accepted. It has pushed some things to extremes, and in my opinion, beyond propriety; but I think it will meet with the sanction of the great majority of the people. They are going to accept it, and when they have accepted it, I will observe that it can be as well proclaimed through the agency of the governor, as through this house. It is not denied that this house has the power of conferring such agency upon the governor, and in my opinion it ought to be done. If we come back for no other purpose, that purpose is ridiculous; if for any other purpose then we are transgressing the warrant of attorney under which we have assembled here.

Mr. CLARKE. Under the ninth section of the constitution of the state of Kentucky, after repeated efforts within my recollection, the people have called this convention by a majority of over forty thousand of the legal voters of the state, taken against the commissioners report the year before last, and by ninety thousand polled last year. By this overwhelming majority of the vote of this state, the people have sent us here to make those changes in the old constitution which they desired, or to adopt an entirely new one, should we deem it expedient. Now I ask this convention, what does this section propose? We are assembled here, a hundred delegates from different parts of the state, to do what? To cure those defects that exist in the old constitution, or to make a new instrument altogether. I appeal to the gentlemen composing this convention, whether it is not a matter of impossibility that we could have known every change which the people might desire should be made in that instrument; and whether it was not next to impossible that we should come here entertaining similar views and opinions as to all these changes. Now, sir, if after the labor of three months we should present a constitution to the people which should fail to satisfy a majority of them—say by ten, twenty or thirty thousand votes, is it right and proper, after the struggle that has taken place within the last four or five years, that we should part with the power they have wrested from the present office holders, by their action at previous elections? Adjourn without a day and all the labors both of the people in that struggle and the labors of this convention will be endangered. I maintain that we have no authority to lay down that power, when we adjourn here, for the moment we adjourn sine die, without having received the approbation of the people and proclaimed the constitution, that moment we have done what the convention party never intended we should do, and what they will not sanction even if we should do it.

I will ask my friend from Fleming, if he was originally a convention man?

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. The people of my county gave a majority of 1,700 votes for a convention in 1847. I did not give my vote at all.

Mr. CLARKE. I will ask him, does he intend when he goes before his constituents, to support the constitution?

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. I intend to do so, for several reasons—but for none more strong than this—that I do believe if the convention decides to meet again, and goes to tinkering up the constitution we have now been making, they will make a worse one than we have now. This constitution does not meet my views in every respect, but still with one or two exceptions it accomplishes most, if not all that the people desired—and perhaps a little more than they desired.

Mr. CLARKE. I think the gentleman has answered the question sufficiently, he need not proceed further.

Mr. M. P. MARSHALL. Yes, but the gentleman having asked a question I beg to tell him he must please to wait till I give him the whole answer. (Laughter.) Sir, I have said that with one or two slight exceptions the constitution has my approbation. I wish to say further, that I take no impracticable, theoretic, high sounding views in relation to my position here; I am not disposed to put myself in opposition to the cataraet of Niagara, and fill this house with the roar of declamation, (laughter,) but I come here as a plain sensible man, entertaining sensible opinions, and wishing to submit this constitution to the decision of the sensible people of the sensible state of Kentucky. I do not wish this convention to return here with high and impracticable notions of power; but I wish to serve my country as a plain honest country gentleman, and then go home to my constituents and sustain the constitution. Now sir, the gentleman has my answer in full. (Laughter.)

Mr. CLARKE. I will not say that the explanation is more difficult to understand than the thing explained; but this I will say, that the gentleman would have been as well understood with half the response he has made.

I am aware of the anxiety of the convention to close their labors so as to return to their families; but I am sensible no question has yet been presented to our consideration, of equal importance to this. While I am in favor of taking the sense of the people upon the adoption or rejection of this constitution, I am unwilling to part with all the power which the people have won during a struggle of three years past, by that submission. A majority of 90,000 against the poll books have declared against the old constitution of this state. Now suppose you submit the new constitution to the people and a majority of 10,000 should decide against it, what do we do? Why, if we do not ratify this constitution, we permit that 10,000 to overrule a majority of 90,000. This constitution has been framed in a spirit of compromise and concession. It may possibly contain within it, sections, provisions, or principles that may be obnoxious to the people of this or that region; it would be a miracle if it did not; but I say again that if you submit this constitution to the people and then part with all the power they have given you, you will see an opposition raised to it that you little expect. Every emancipationist in the state, every man in favor of the old constitution, every office holder, past and present, will unite in brotherly love and friendship; and thus you will have a combination of the most discordant elements coming up in favor of the old constitution, and against the new one. I want to submit this constitution to the people; I want them to come up in the exercise of their sovereign will and say whether they are satisfied or not, with the work we have performed. And if they should not be satisfied, where can be the harm, where the danger of the delegates returning to their constituents and consulting with them? When we go back to our people from here, we can ask them what particular opinions they entertain on this or that section; we can thus learn what they want, and if their be any thing radically wrong when we return here in May or June, it can be remedied; for we should return clothed with full power to effect such changes as the people may have determined upon.

Now, sir, mark my prediction here to-day—that the very moment we part with this power to so change the work of our hands as to meet with the people's wishes, just so surely will all the discordant elements in this state unite to destroy the work in which we have been engaged during the last three months. Every man opposed to change will throw in his mite; and millions of dollars will be raised to defeat this constitution. Part with the power you now have, and the people will be thrown back to where they were four years ago, and cannot make any change in the constitution unless they can overrule a dead majority against them of twenty or thirty thousand.

Now let me ask, suppose the present office-holders should refuse to hold any election at all, where is your power to compel them? Have you affixed any penalty for such refusal? None whatever. And if they should refuse, then the whole work of three months goes by the board, and the old constitution is re-adopted. There can be no danger, Mr. President, in submitting this constitution to the people with the reservation of power on the part of their servants on this floor to meet here again, if what we have done does not accord with their will and pleasure. The very act itself will display mutual confidence between the people and the convention. There can be no question, that so far as we are concerned, there has been a full intention to their will, and that our labors will meet with their full approbation throughout the state, I have but little doubt. Adopt the resolution of either of these gentlemen, (and I must say I prefer that of the elder gentleman from Nelson,) and we can go back home and meet our constituents and say to them, we want to talk with you in reference to the various changes in the constitution; we have not parted with the power which you entrusted to us, but we want to exercise it in accordance with your will. And then, sir, when we meet here again in June, all we have to do is, to submit to each other those improvements suggested by our constituents, and instead of entrusting the matter to the governor, or any other officer of the state, we establish this constitution at once as the paramount law of the land. I will not consent, sir, that a mere majority of ten, twenty, or fifty, or a thousand, or ten thousand, shall declare and decide against what a majority of ninety thousand have already determined upon. If, so far as I am concerned, I have not carried out the will of the people who sent me here, I have mistaken their will. I have no authority to part with the power which the people gave me until the work they delegated me to perform is completed; it is their power, not mine; they have said those changes should be made; and if the manner in which we have made them does not suit their approbation, they ought to have the right to instruct us to come back and make such alterations as will meet with their approbation. I am opposed to the old constitution; and I have been so since I was old enough to read a constitution. Sir, save only in the name, there is not a constitution in the United States that contains the elements of the old British laws, conferring titles of nobility in so high a degree, as the present constitution of the State of Kentucky. True, 'tis said that there shall be no titles of nobility; but, sir, with the mere exception of the name all the advantages connected with lordly titles were kept up and have been sustained. This, sir, in our new constitution, we have, I apprehend, effectually prevented. I shall go for the resolution of the elder gentleman from Nelson; and if that resolution does not meet with the views of the convention, and this fifth section should be adopted, I predict that you will again see such an array in opposition to this new constitution as has never been known to exist in any land as will exist in April or June next, if one or other of these propositions be not adopted for the determination of the question.

Mr. NUTTALL. To my mind, sir, it is important that we should re-assemble here, and finally adopt the constitution when it shall have been submitted to the people. We are assembled here for the purpose of re-adopting, amending, or changing, the old constitution. I would ask if there is in that provision any power to submit this constitution as a complete instrument to the people, with the qualification, that if they adopt it, it shall be the constitution of Kentucky? If, when it is presented to the members, they sign this instrument, the matter is ended; and neither we nor the people, have any further control over it. We submit it to the people merely as an advisory measure; and if, after it has been submitted to them and approved, we come back here and sign and proclaim it, then it becomes the constitution of the country. All the power that was delegated to us will have been officially exercised when we sign this instrument. We have no qualified power; it is absolute unconditional. Much has been said here about assembling and uniting all the discordant elements of the state against the new constitution; but, sir, I would have those discordant elements to understand that the power of the people has not been parted with, and that when we do go home, if in their judgment and sober deliberation, after examining the result of our labors, they, in their primary assemblies should give us advice upon the subject, we are not going to put ourselves in such a position as to be unable to carry out their wishes. We ought to act with all possible discretion on this subject, and clear the constitution of every difficulty which may stand in the way or be attempted to be thrown around it. I have no doubt it will be received by the people with acclamation; but let us not put our names to it until we have received the acknowledgment of the people; and when we have received that acknowledgment we can meet again and ratify the whole. I hope and trust this resolution will be adopted.

Mr. TAYLOR. I very much question whether we have the power to adjourn as is suggested, and if we have, there is a question about its policy. I will not, however, discuss this question, for I am not prompted to do so either from inclination or a sense of duty. But grant that we have the power. I would like to ask some two or three homely questions. It is provided in one section that, immediately after the adjournment of the convention, the governor shall issue his proclamation, &c. Now, I do not pretend to say that the present governor would refuse to comply with the requirements of the convention, yet, have you any guaranty that he would comply; or that his mandate would be obeyed by the subordinate officers of the state? Suppose the governor of Kentucky should repudiate your power, and say you have no authority to impose such duty upon him, and refuse to obey you, what would become of all your labor? You go home, and you stand a monument of the scorn and contempt of every honest man of this country. And why? Because in framing this constitution you will have left a loop-hole through which your adversaries may effect an entrance. What else? You have called upon the county officers to appoint judges of election, and the sheriffs are commanded to make the returns. But suppose some of the great anti-reforming counties should refuse to hold any election; in that case, too, the great object of this convention would be defeated. The magistrates and justices of the peace are next called upon to support the new constitution, and what is their answer? They will say, "oh, no; I cannot do anything of the kind. I have sworn to support the constitution of the state of Kentucky as it now exists, and I cannot violate my oath." (Laughter.) This was said by some of the magistrates in the state of Indiana; and I should not be surprised if some in this state were found making the same objection. Now, I ask if this would be right? I ask if we are to place ourselves and the trust confided to us by the people, in the power of any men that God ever made, except it be the people themselves, acting in their aggregate capacity? You will place it in the hands of our justices of the peace will you? No, sir; no, sir. And, sir, whether we have the power or not, the question is, whether we are going to place the adoption of this constitution upon a mere contingency, as it would be, if the provision contained in the report of the committee should be finally adopted. These officers to whom you would entrust this business, may or may not obey you; and thus, in consequence of a species of fraud, we may be driven back to the old constitution, and be compelled to sit under the old "vine and fig tree," with none but the office holders to make us afraid. (Laughter.)

But now to the policy of this matter. While I have sat here day after day looking upon the proceedings of this assembly my heart has felt deeply thankful to the great governor of the universe that my lot has been cast in this goodly land. Look sir, now, when we are about to close our labors, at the cheering exhibition of popular power as here manifested; we have come here from all parts of this commonwealth, and where can be found a more spirit-stirring display of the influence of our institutions than in this assembly, when now we are about to submit the work of our hands to the people who sent us here? We came here to do the people's will; and I would ask is there any thing wrong in coming back to perfect that which we have already done, and proclaim the will of the people as it will then have been declared? Ah, Mr. President, have you ever thought of the elements of opposition that are to combine against this constitution? Proud as we are of it, sir, the mortifying spectacle may be exhibited of its rejection, notwithstanding the 102,000 votes in the year 1847 cast in favor of constitutional reform; sir, the sad spectacle may be exhibited of our being remitted to the old constitution. Who do we expect to be arrayed against us? The entire office-holders of the country. They are men of intelligence and power; they have too their aiders and abettors; every man among them, no matter how small his office, has his influence, just as though you would throw the smallest pebble into the largest pool, and you will see the circles on the water to the very verge. So is it with these men. They have their friends and relations, their sons and their sons-in-law, and sons-in-law in expectation, and their daughters too all arrayed against this constitution, not because it does not accord with popular sentiment, but because it strikes at the root of their monopoly. Well, sir, besides these, you will have the emancipationists against you, and it has been represented that there are a great many of them in this commonwealth. They are many; they are intelligent; they are powerful and wealthy, and—though I do not say it with any unkind feeling towards them—they are, on this question at least, fanatical; and this very fanaticism would induce them to work hard, and spend money in this cause. You will have them against you in conjunction with the office-holders. Now who else have you? I speak it in no mood of disrespect, but it is a fact that a gentleman came here one morning with a whole constitution ready made. (Laughter.) There are a great many constitution makers outside of this hall, and if the new constitution does not answer their expectations, you will find them following you closely up.

Besides these you will find some men, who have peculiar notions, which they want engrafted into the constitution—and, as my friend from Nelson said, inspriguated into it—and when all these elements are combined, you may depend upon it they will make a formidable array. I know that many gentlemen suppose they will have nothing to do but go home and tell the old woman and the children what fine things they had seen, and what fine eating and drinking they had had, especially since the convention had determined that the seat of government should remain at Frankfort. (Laughter.) But I can tell gentlemen if they want this constitution to stand, they will have to gird on their armor and fight as a father fights for his offspring; they will have to "fight on, fight ever," until this constitution is firmly settled as the law of the land; for until that is done, all these opposing elements will be combined to the extent of their power to effect the downfall of this constitution. Thank God the sceptre has not yet departed from Judah; we have it yet in our hands; and I trust we will not permit it to go out of our hands until we have perfected the great work which the people sent us here to perform; and that cannot be completed until the constitution has been referred to the people and we have come back, in conformity with public sentiment, and proclaimed it. As my friend from Simpson remarked a little while ago about having been in favor of constitutional reform ever since he was able to read a constitution, so has it been with me. I have been in favor of constitutional reform ever since I could read a constitution and understand for myself. I can conceive nothing so horrible as to be remitted back to the old constitution, because if once remitted we are there forever. That may be a strong assertion, but, sir, I believe it is true. I ask the friends of constitutional reform, if I dare make an appeal of that sort to them—and perhaps it may be going too far, but it results from the common interest I feel in the common success of our labors—I ask gentlemen to take counsel from their fears, and never to suffer the sceptre to depart from Judah until the constitution is made the law of the land, and the old one is forever abolished. Take counsel from your hopes also, and the time may come, and I hope it will come, when we shall convene here, and—though not like the prodigal son in having wasted our substance—that the fattened calf shall be killed, and we shall have joy and dancing over the strongest opposition to the most useful and necessary measure ever proposed in our state.

COMMITTEE OF REVISION.

During the preceding proceedings the committee of revision and arrangement of the constitution reported the preamble and several articles which they had revised, and the verbal changes, alteration of construction, and the amendments, which they had deemed it necessary to make, were acted upon by the convention.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. MITCHELL gave notice that he would move a reconsideration of the vote of yesterday, adopting the amendment of Mr. JAMES, to the report of the committee on the legislative department.

The rule requiring notice of a reconsideration to lie over one day having been dispensed with, the question was taken on reconsidering, and it was decided in the negative.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I hold in my hand a resolution which I wish to submit to the consideration of the convention. I will present it as a substitute for the resolution now before the convention:

"Resolved, That the convention will take the sense of the people of this commonwealth as to the propriety of adopting the new constitution which they have formed, or re-adopting the present constitution, and will provide for the adoption of the new constitution, or the re-adoption of the present constitution, in accordance with a majority of the qualified votes which shall be cast in favor of the one or the other."

This resolution is offered for the purpose of testing the wishes of this convention upon the isolated proposition as to whether or not we intend to submit the new constitution to the people. The first proposition which arises, is, whether or no this convention is compelled by absolute necessity—and by absolute necessity, I mean lawful compulsion—for I take it for granted if there be one member of the house who believes it to be his duty to come back here he will come back here—to return here and ratify the constitution after it has been approved by the people. There is no man more opposed to coming back than I am, and perhaps there are few who will suffer so much as I would do.

But I wish to say one word on the question now before the house. The argument shall be short, and I would like to have it answered. We are assembled here for the purpose of adopting, or changing, or amending the constitution. If this was an original convention under God, we would have omnipotent power. Under God the constitution of Kentucky was first framed; and the convention framing that constitution would have all power. Under the constitution of the United States, and that of the state of Kentucky, this convention is omnipotent unless restrained by the old constitution. We are restrained, what for? We are restrained to three things: you are to assemble within three months after your election, to re-adopt the old constitution, or change it; and beyond that, you have no power of attorney. You have assembled under that power of attorney, knowing that it was; you have assembled at the call of the people, knowing that it was. You have no right, after you have assembled, and before you have discharged your work to adjourn sine die, and leave to somebody else to decide whether you have discharged your work or not. I can best illustrate this by a legal argument, that cannot fail to be comprehended by the most ordinary understanding.

Are we to leave this constitution as it stands now upon a contingency? If we have a right to do so, have we a right to go one step further, and bind somebody else besides ourselves, to determine whether that contingency has happened or not? I say we have not, because that power was not delegated to us. We did not assemble here under a power of attorney, in which that power was contained; and why? Because we were to "adopt the old constitution, or to amend or change it." We were to do this, and not another person.

One other idea, and it appears to me to be a strong one. How much of the new constitution is imperative, and how much of it is not imperative, if you should adjourn to-morrow? A part of it, every man will say, must be imperative, or you leave the taking of the vote of the people to a contingency. How much of this new constitution is active or passive, between this day and the day the people shall vote, and have the majority of them voting one way or another? Understand me. Here's to-day; there's the day the people have voted. What is the state of the new constitution in the meantime? Is it partly passive, and partly active, or is it all active, or all passive? It is either one or the other; it is either all active, or none of it is active. Then, sir, what becomes of this clause in which you require—it is not a request, it is mandatory—but what becomes of this clause that "requires" if you will, that your county courts and your sheriffs shall perform particular duties in order that the vote shall be taken? Suppose the county courts and sheriffs fail to perform the duties you have required them to discharge, what is the result? It may be replied that there is no danger of their doing so. So far as many of them are concerned, there may not be any danger, but you know, and I know, that there are counties in the state which were opposed to calling any convention at all; and for the purpose of defeating the constitution adopted by the convention, some fifteen or twenty counties, following out their original designs, will fail to discharge the duties required of them. What will be the result? We may re-assemble or not; if not, the governor must settle the question as to whether the vote of part of the state shall settle the question or not. If we re-assemble, we will have to settle that question. But there is this difference between the convention upon one side, and the governor, and attorney general, and secretary of state, upon the other. We have authority to settle that question; they have none, or ought to have none. What will be the argument used before the people? It will be that we have neglected to discharge our duties, and have thrown the responsibility from our shoulders to the shoulders of others. This is, however, merely an argument as to propriety. The legal argument is the one which I wish to press upon the attention of the house, and I hope it will be intelligible and produce the effect desired.

MR. TURNER. I suppose I might as well commence by stating my position under which this constitution is being made. I am in favor of the constitution being ratified by the people. I am in favor of an elective government; and taking the constitution as a whole, I am decidedly in favor of it when compared with the old one. Having defined my position, I will now address a few remarks to the convention. We are about to separate, and I do trust that we will separate in that same good friendship which has marked our deliberations, and that we will seal this constitution in peace.

MR. PRESIDENT, I am not convinced that it is necessary for us to re-assemble, and I do not want to do so unless it is absolutely necessary. If we have the power to make a constitution, have we not the power to settle the particular manner in which it shall be ratified? The attorney general, a man of great legal ability, is of opinion that we can do so, and I think so too. Before I came here, this subject was mooted with the distinguished gentleman at the head of the government of Kentucky. He had no doubt whatever of the power to do it; it was what he denominated an incidental power, growing out of the main power delegated to us, and that it could in that way be carried into operation. Possibly I may be trespassing upon private conversation and opinion to make those statements here, for neither of these gentlemen expected I should say a word about it here. Now, there is no vast difference between a convention like this and a convention of revolution. We came into existence by virtue of the old constitution, and coming thus into existence, our powers are limited.

If I have power to make a government have I not all the incidental powers to say what part shall be carried into operation now, and what part then? Have we not power over all the legal officers of the country? We have unlimited power—power to do anything. The federal constitution does not interfere with any of our acts here, in relation to this matter of making a constitution, and upon what contingency it shall go into operation. Now, to illustrate this, let me tell you what happened some years ago. A man of the name of John Anderson, undertook to bribe a member of congress. The attempt was discovered and the speaker ordered the sergeant at arms to arrest the delinquent and bring him before the house. He was arrested and thrown into jail. Now, congress is a limited body, having limited powers; we on the contrary are in possession of unlimited powers. Anderson afterwards sued the sergeant at arms; but the supreme court decided that the action of congress was right, and that that action was taken in accordance with the incidental powers possessed by that body. Well, if the attorney general is right, we are in possession of all powers, and can, if we please, ordain that we should pay ourselves ten dollars a day for our services. We can, if we please, put part of the constitution into operation to-day. Have we not been putting it into operation ever since we came here? Have we not been directing the auditors of the state as to what they should do? Now I take it, that as we have the power of turning out every officer to-morrow, so we have the power to appoint to any office, which does not interfere with the government of the United States. We have within the scope of these powers, the power of addressing any officer of our government; and if he refuses to perform what is required of him, he may be brought up and punished, and the courts would recognize our power, and command him to perform what he was desired to do. I think, sir, upon this subject there can be no reasonable doubt.

Now, I will go on to another proposition. The gentleman from Nelson made a very ingenious argument this morning, and he always conjures up some tremendous despot to come in and whip people into his notions. It was a very artful address; but the sum and substance of it was this: and I ask gentlemen here whether they are prepared to go the length of the argument which the honorable and distinguished gentleman has made. He says that the people are a good deal like a commissioner in chancery under the chancellor; that they are the commissioner and we the high court of chancery. What! is that the position of things! The people a little commissioner, and we the high court of chancery to do as we please! But that is the sum and substance of his argument. It smelt to me a little like Napoleon when the whole people were under arms.

Mr. HARDIN. I beg you will not put words into my mouth which I never used.

Mr. TURNER. Well, that is the effect of your words; if not get up and answer it. When the whole French people were under arms, and Napoleon was anxious to be made emperor, what did he do? Why he threatened to shoot every man who would not vote for him. We send the people a constitution, and if they are not pleased with it, we are to come back here and force it upon them.

Well, then, the gentleman raises a bug-bear about the emancipationists. I don't believe there are 15,000 emancipationists in the state; and as to the office holders, we have fought them, and can fight them again if need be. I believe, sir, that this constitution will be adopted by a more overwhelming majority than we had in 1848 for a convention. We shall see the people who have been kept out of office coming forward and shouting for the constitution, and the old aristocracy will be thrown off who have been hanging like a mill stone about the neck of the treasury. They will come and shout "hosannah!" for the new constitution. And the office holders too will say that this change is good for themselves.

Well, the gentleman said that our position was something like that of Hungary, in relation to Austria and Russia, and that our enemies would come and attempt to crush our constitution. Do not you suppose that the people who called for it will defend it? They will rise like a giant in their majesty, and there is no power that will be able to resist them; and I put it to the honorable gentleman from Nelson, and the other gentleman from Nelson too, as they are together, whether we have not got Austria and Russia here, and whether we who oppose this measure are not the Hungarians? (Laughter.) Now, I asked the younger gentleman from Nelson what his view was of his own proposition. He said, we are to come back and see whether the people have adopted or rejected the constitution, or adopted the old one, or to do any thing else we please. Now, what does that mean but that we are to put it in force against the will of the people; and to that, sir, I never will consent? When the people elected us, did they believe our sessions were to be permanent? When are we to settle it? When are we to resign the power with which the people have entrusted us? There is, there must be, a limit somewhere. There was a mutual understanding on the part of the people, that when we finished our labors we should quit, and not come here from time to time. And when are we to give up? We make a constitution; the people object to it; we come back and amend it; the people say "we don't like this," and we come back again; and thus we go on from time to time, and never get done.

But there is another view of the question. Does any gentleman here suppose that the governor, and attorney general and the auditor will refuse to carry this constitution into effect? We all know these officers well, and who suspects that they will refuse? Neither of the gentlemen who say we are to come back and require a majority of all the votes in the state; but it is this; we are to come here, and the governor is to issue his proclamation, if a majority of the members should not come, and in that way the constitution is to be ratified. But take it the other way; you submit this to the people and they do not accept it, what will be the result? Why you would have your delegates from this county and from that county voting against the constitution in its various sections. But on the other hand, if you put it before the people entire, it is for them to say whether they will have it or not. I would ask the people this question: "Do you believe it is better than the old constitution, and will you sustain it, taking the good and the evil together? Why, sir, by this mode, you will have all the people voting for it together.

Now, gentlemen, is not this true? If you go home and are decided, and don't go to fighting, you will carry the constitution; but you cannot expect to carry it unless you go to voting in a body. If we go home and vote in a body, our success is as certain as that the sun is shining on yonder hill.

Finally, the gentleman said he hoped they would all come back and shake hands once more in the completion of their work. It will be unpleasant for me to part with the members of this convention. I will admit that there is a great deal of talent and gentlemanly deportment here; I respect every man in this house, and desire to take every man by the hand; but it is scarcely within the scope of human probability, that we shall all live till next June. If there are not exceeding half a dozen called to their long home before that time we shall be lucky. And would you desire to come here and decide this great question by a mere majority of one or two votes, as some questions have been decided here? And in case of death, are you to issue your own writ, and wait till the people elect another representative? Taking the question in the way you propose, a hundred difficulties will arise; but if you leave the matter entirely to the people, it will gladden their hearts, and there can be no question that it would be most gratefully accepted. Every provision of the constitution may be altered before we come back, and the convention will not be in any better position to decide then than it is now.

For these reasons, I shall vote against the resolution, and in favor of the report of the committee.

Mr. DIXON. I shall, of all men here, feel in the most awkward position, if the constitution goes to the people and is rejected. I am in favor of the constitution, and intend to devote what little abilities I possess, to have this constitution adopted. But although I am decidedly in favor of the adoption of the constitution, I will take occasion to announce that I am not in favor of coming back here to proclaim to the people that we have adopted it, because I do not believe it is necessary, and because we can just as well do what we were sent to do without coming back here. If I entertained any doubt as to the contingency, I would come back; but I do not believe that there is any contingency, except the approval of the people; and if they do not approve it, why then let it go. Should they reject it, I am not in favor of coming back to make another constitution; and I think I would say I could not be induced, under any circumstances, to come back. I should think myself sufficiently disgraced by the rejection of this constitution, without coming back to have the disgrace repeated.

Now, sir, if I understand the whole force of the argument of the gentleman from Simpson, it is, that if the constitution is not approved of by the people, we are to reserve to ourselves the power of making a good constitution, or changing this one in such form or manner, as will meet the approval of the people. If that is not so, I will readily stand corrected.

Mr. CLARKE. The gentleman quotes me correctly. I hold it would be wrong to reject the new constitution, because five hundred people rejected it, when ninety thousand were opposed to the old one.

Mr. DIXON. Well I don't see that the matter is changed. If the people reject this constitution, then we are to come back here either to amend this constitution, or to do something else. Now, if we come back to amend this constitution, are the amendments which we adopt to be absolute, or are they again to be submitted to the people? The gentleman, I apprehend, will not insist that they are to be absolute; and if not, what will be the consequence? We come back not with the sanction of the people, and then when we re-assemble, we are to make a new start for another constitution such as will meet with the approbation of the people. Well, sir, it comes back; it is amended in its form, and we proclaim it; not being approved by the people, we amend it again, and so it goes on ad infinitum. Does the gentleman mean to tell me that we are to sit here for the next twenty years to make this constitution? Are we to assemble and re-assemble; are we to make a constitution any how, and drive it down the people's throat? Are we to stultify ourselves by making a constitution which the people will not ratify; and when they refuse, and refuse, and refuse, are we to go on mending up, mending up, mending up? I will not go for any such measure or proposition, unless I believe that we have not the power to submit it to the people without coming back. And if any gentleman will convince me that we have not the power, and that this is the organic law of the land, I will vote to come back again.

Now, have the convention or the people the power to declare this as the constitution, provided that the people of the state should ratify it. We make this constitution, each man signs his name to it and he attaches to his signature this proviso, that it shall not be the organic law of the state, until the people of Kentucky shall have ratified it.

Now, am I to understand the gentleman from Nelson, that this power does not exist? If I understand him, it does not; that we have no power under the old constitution to declare that this shall be the law of the land, upon condition that the people accept it. Now, I understand my friend to maintain another position, which is, that the power of this convention is absolute, except so far as it is controlled by the constitution of the United States.

Mr. HARDIN. And acts of congress passed in pursuance of that constitution, and of treaties.

Mr. DIXON. Now is there any thing in the constitution of the United States, which limits us in the exercise of this particular power? I put the question to him, to show me any clause in the constitution of the United States, under which there is any inhibition to the exercise of this power. Where is this power? Let any man point it out if he can. The constitution of the United States, limiting us here in declaring the mode of revising the constitution of Kentucky!! Surely the gentleman cannot be in earnest. Sir, what law, made under the constitution of the United States, imposes any limit upon us, as to the manner in which we shall make this constitution? Sir, the gentleman will not pretend that such restraints are imposed upon us, either by the constitution or the law, or by any treaties; and if not, then the power is an absolute one.

Now, there being no restraint upon us, the next consideration is, what are the powers which we derive under the constitution of Kentucky? Sir, the great proposition which I maintain to be true is this—that wherever the power is ample, all acts done under that power, and in pursuance of that power, are valid. It is only when you transcend the power conferred upon you that it ceases to be obligatory. Turn then to the constitution of Kentucky, and see what the power is. It is so perfectly clear, that there cannot be a cavil about it. If I understand anything of the power here conferred, it is full and ample. You have power to re-adopt the old constitution, to amend it, or to make a new constitution. You have ample, full, uncontrolled power, excepting only those powers which lie at the foundation of the laws of independent colonies. Now, the power being given to us to make a constitution, are we prescribed in the manner of doing it? There is the question. What is the limit? As a convention, we have the power to do it, and may we not prescribe to ourselves the manner and form of doing it? The convention shall assemble—for what? To amend the constitution. Is not that precisely what is left to our decision? It seems to me so; I cannot see how we can doubt it. What is the proposition now before us? It is that we shall sign this document, provided that a majority of people of the state of Kentucky shall ratify it. That is the proposition. It is to be ratified by the people, in a particular way at the polls. But the gentlemen say we have no such power to submit it; we have no right to make such a provision. And why? Not because the constitution restricts it. Can we not act to the extreme limit of our power. If you can go to the extreme limits of your power, there can be no controversy about it, and the gentleman does not dispute it; but if you keep within the extreme limits, then the gentleman says the power does not exist. You can do all, but you cannot do a part. You may make a deed in fee simple; but you cannot make a deed with a condition. You give him the power, and can a man exercise the major power, and yet not exercise the minor power? Suppose, Mr. President, you give me a power of attorney to convey your land, in the county of Henderson, and I made a deed with this proviso—"that you approve of it." Does any body believe that if I have made such a deed as that to the gentleman from Kenton, if that condition be complied with by you—does any body believe that such a deed is not binding upon you, and upon all the parties concerned? It is true, you gave me absolute power to make a deed without condition, and then I make it with a condition that you shall ratify it; and you do ratify it; where is the difference. Now, we are the agents of the people of Kentucky. The power is ample and complete. We can proclaim the constitution here, if we please, and where is the man that will say "it shall not be so." The power is complete; but we do not choose to exercise that power, without referring the constitution back to the people for their approbation. We exercise the power amply and fully, and will any gentleman question that this constitution, if not approved by the people is still binding upon them. This is the great question in the case, but I do not believe any gentleman will maintain that the constitution should be established without the sanction of the people.

Now some gentlemen argue that the sheriffs or judges may refuse to call the election. That is a thing within the range of possibility; but I would not sink to such a level of dishonesty and corruption, any portion of the people of this state, as to suppose for a moment, that when this convention assembled in obedience to the authority of the people, they will shrink from carrying into effect the express wishes of the people of Kentucky. But if it be necessary to attach any penalties to the neglect of these duties, why not impose such penalties as would at once insure prompt obedience? I will not reply to that portion of the argument further than to say, that if the executive should refuse to issue their proclamation whenever the voice of the people of this state had proclaimed that this is the organic law of the land, you had better call upon the rocks and mountains to fall upon you, and hide you from the anger of the people. Sir I would sign it, and write it in my blood, that no officer of distinction will be so recreant to the high duties imposed upon him by the new constitution. I see no manner of objection, none whatever, to our leaving the constitution now in the hands of the people; and I should like to hear some argument on this matter if there is any to be adduced.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. This question having already been fully debated by gentlemen learned in the law, I should not have felt myself justified in addressing the convention, had I not been on the committee which had charge of this subject. As the house has been informed, this question was debated in committee, and the voice of its members heard upon it. I do not now remember the number who were present. I think there were eight—certainly a large majority; and I think there were but two who were in favor of a final adjournment. I had supposed that there would have been two reports made to the convention. That was the understanding when the committee adjourned; but the chairman has informed the house that he was induced to pursue a different course, upon the members of the committee expressing to him, in private, a change of opinion, which in his judgment authorised him to hand in the report before us, as emanating from a majority of the committee.

I am not of the number who changed position on this question. I entertain now the opinion which I expressed in committee, that it was not only right and proper, but absolutely necessary that this convention should reassemble to learn the decision of the people upon the constitution submitted to them by us, that we might then do that for which we were called together—that which we are commanded to do in the present constitution, under which we are assembled, and from which we derive our authority.

This is to me no new question. In the county which I have the honor to represent, the enemies of constitutional reform, urged that it would be impossible for the convention to submit its work to the people, that the new constitution must be "adopted" by the convention, and to submit it to the people for adoption was not permitted in the present constitution, in which the duties of the convention were clearly defined—duties which could not be delegated or intrusted to any other body.

The answer to this was simple and plain. Admitting, as I was compelled to do, that to "adopt" was no less the peculiar duty of the convention than to "amend," or "change" the constitution, yet the power to frame and submit the instrument to the people—to adjourn until the public will had been expressed—to then re-assemble and conform its action to that expressed will, could not be questioned. Such power has not been denied either here or elsewhere. Now, sir, I know that I have not the legal acumen to catch the very nice distinctions which have been drawn by gentlemen in the discussion of the question now before the house. I am not sufficiently "learned in the law" to see no difference between doing a thing myself, and allowing another to do that for me. I have but a plain common sense way of looking to these matters, and when clothed with delegated powers, and directed to do certain things, I am not more bound to do them than I am to do them in the way directed. The constitution of Kentucky is submitted to us for amendment or change. I grant that we can alter every line, every word, every letter, in that constitution, and "adopt" that which we make. But we alone can "amend"—we alone can "adopt."—Sir, we are a constitutionally assembled body—we are here under the constitution of Kentucky—it is still the supreme law of this land, binding upon every individual in the state, and especially binding upon the members of this convention; and the provisions of that constitution which bear upon us, we are sworn to observe. How can we expect the work of our hands to be held sacred and inviolable if we disregard the injunctions of that constitution from which we receive our political existence? Not only should we observe the spirit of the present law, but the very letter of that law. And if we err, it should be in the abundant care we take to do nothing doubtful or uncertain. Now, sir, what are the provisions of the present constitution which bear upon our conduct; and which should control our action? What power is conferred upon us by it, and in what language does it address itself to this convention? "To re-adopt, to amend, or to change," the constitution. This we are to do. It is as much the peculiar province of this body to "adopt"

as it is to "amend" or "change" the instrument. And as no other body of men can alter or "amend" the constitution, so no other—no, sir—not all the people of the state can legally "adopt" what we may propose. The gentleman from Henderson, (Mr. Dixon,) has said that we have a kind of power of attorney—plenary powers—and that as we have full power to do all, we can do a part—power to do our duty, and power to leave that duty but half performed! I can scarcely think so. I would ask the gentleman, have we any authority to transfer or delegate these powers, or any part of them, to another? If I am employed as your agent or attorney to do certain things, and in a certain way, does that give me the right to do a part and leave a part undone; and can I transfer the authority with which you have clothed me to another? I think not. Granting, then, all that the gentleman has said to be true, that we have the power to do a part and leave a part undone, we cannot empower others to finish up that which we have neglected to do. So far as we go, the work is ours—that which is left cannot be legally done by any other. It is competent for us to sign this constitution conditionally, but that condition compels us to return and do that which will not be done at all unless we do it. And if that condition be not complied with, we must return and "re-adopt" the present constitution. Suppose, sir, the people reject the instrument we submit to them. What constitution have we then for Kentucky? Sir, we have none. The life, if I may so speak of the present constitution, is suspended upon the action of this body. Upon the dissolution of this convention it dies, unless it be "re-adopted." It dies by its own provisions. Now let the people reject—

Mr. DIXON. I fully agree with my friend from Jessamine, that we cannot transfer our power to any agency; but that is not what I propose to do. I do not propose to transfer any power from this convention to any body else. But what do I propose to do? You have made me your agent; all the power is vested in you, and all the power I have is derived from you. Now you give me ample power to convey; and although I cannot give my friend from Jessamine the power to convey, I take it that you, in whom all the power resides, may give me authority to exercise that power with your approbation. That is my position.

Mr. MARSHALL. For one so unused to public discussion as myself, to attempt to meet, in debate, the very able gentlemen who are opposed to me, may appear almost impertinent; but I will try to answer the arguments of my friend. I do not understand that the cases are at all parallel. We are empowered by the people not only to frame a constitution, but to "adopt" it. We have met here to confer together—to agree upon the great principles which will best secure the citizen in all his rights—to fix these principles and express them in appropriate language. But this is not all; the last, the most important act is, to "adopt," and we alone can do this. Could the legislature of Kentucky authorize any body of men, or, if you please, the whole people of the state to pass laws? And would laws, thus enacted, be binding? Is it competent for this convention, called together by the people, to delegate to any man, or body of men, the power to frame a constitution? Could we authorize the governor, attorney general, and secretary of state, to make a constitution—to say what should constitute this, that, or the other article? There is not a man in this house who would so far stultify himself as to say that we could have met, elected our president, secretary, &c., and resolved "that the governor, auditors, attorney general, and a secretary of state, should "amend" or "change" the constitution—submit it to the people—receive their opinions, and either publish their work as the constitution or "re-adopt" the present one." If we could not delegate all our powers, how can we delegate a part of them? To "adopt," is as important and necessary as to frame; and both must be the act of the convention, or our work is unfinished, and of no force or effect whatever. I am aware, sir, that some gentlemen claim for this convention unlimited power; while others have intimated limits which rob it of its sovereignty and absolve the citizen from all allegiance to the constitution we may make. I am of opinion that within our proper sphere we have all power not denied to us by the constitution of the United States. But this power can only be exerted to frame and adopt a constitution, and in its exercise we must observe the requisitions of the present constitution, so far as its provisions bear upon us. Whatever we may choose to "adopt" as the constitution of Kentucky, is the law of the land, and, unless it militates against the general government, every officer and citizen is bound to obey it. But our "resolves," outside of that instrument, are as impotent as though they came from a body of fish-women in the common market place.

But, gentlemen say, "we will affix penalties." Well, sir, who is there to enforce them? Have we an executive officer? Is any one responsible to this body after we dissolve? Can we punish any one for disobeying our mandate, when that mandate forms no portion of the law of the land? That constitution is as powerless as a blank sheet until it is formally "adopted." Like that dust of Eden when fashioned into man, e'er he became a living soul, to hold dominion "over the fish of the sea, and over the fowls of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth," it awaits in weakness this life-imparting act at our hands. And gentlemen would entrust this last important act to the doubtful authority of the office-holders! Would Satan, think you, even if he had possessed the power, have given life to that glorious mould destined so soon "to bruise the serpent's head?" Would these gentry of the gown and staff be more apt, could they be endowed with authority to do so, to give effect to that which dooms them to political banishment? Like my friend from Mason, I would rather not trust them. They might think they were "sworn to support the old constitution." And suppose they say—and they have a right to say it—to disregard any resolution we may pass. It is in vain for us to command, all the homage and obedience they choose to render us is through courtesy, they may disobey every command, until those commands reach them as imperative, speaking the authoritative language of the "adopted" constitution of the state—suppose they disregard our request, and say, we will not appoint judges of elections—we are very well satisfied with the constitution we have sworn to observe, and we don't find that it confers upon you legislative powers—you were a convention to make and "adopt" a constitution, and if you have failed to do so, that is your business, not ours—we have no power to correct your errors, and would not do it if we had—we are magistrates under the good old constitution, and no convention to "adopt" a new one." Suppose they were to act thus, and we "shorn of our strength," what sort of position would we be in? Why, sir, it is madness to risk it. All here know that this may happen. The gentleman from Henderson admits that it is possible. And the moment of that admission he should have given up the argument.

Sir, it is enough for me to know that it is possible; for after all the labor, time and money this convention has cost the people of Kentucky, in framing a constitution, so far as I can prevent it, there shall be no possibility of its loss except by the rejection of the people themselves. I will submit the work of our hands to them—hear their verdict, and act in obedience to their commands.

The gentleman from Madison (Mr. Turner) is in extacies, and joins in anticipation those hal-lalujahs which are to resound from one end of Kentucky to the other upon the reception of this constitution. I hope the gentleman may be disappointed, though I fear some fault will be found with our work. I am not quite so sanguine as he seems to be. And yet, Mr. President, if this convention fail to make a constitution, it is our own fault. If we do not place before the people an instrument which they are willing to accept and approve, I cannot but believe, that never before in the history of legislation, has the confidence of a people been so cruelly abused. And why? Because, sir, there came not up to this assembly one single man who did not understand distinctly and fully what would satisfy his constituents. All knew what gave rise to the call of this convention. All knew what were the objections to the present constitution. I do not pretend to say that we all knew how much the people would bear. How far we could go in unexpected and uncalled for changes of principle and elaborate detail without danger to the constitution we have made; but there was not a man returned to this convention, unless he were wilfully ignorant, who did not well understand what he was commanded to do. In most things I think we have come up fully to the commands of our constituents. In some things I fear we have gone beyond their permission. And woe to that man who has, from personal, sectional, or professional considerations, (if indeed any such motives have operated here,) been induced to press into this constitution any rule or detail uncalled for and unexpected which may militate strongly against its acceptance. The people required that we should change the tenure of office; that we should strike from the constitution every aristocratic feature, and place the servants of the people within the pale of a practicable responsibility. This we have done; but we have gone a little further. They required us to take from the executive the appointing power and give to the real sovereigns the authority to select their own officers. This has been almost done; but we have done a little more. They required us to change the sessions of the legislature, and to place that department of the government under wholesome restraints. We have done this also; but this is not all we have done. They required that we should give to every man ample security for the peaceable possession of his property—and especially for that species of property which is the object of attack at home as well as abroad. That we should throw around it all the guaranties of legal protection and constitutional sanction. Sir, I cannot but fear that we have fallen far short of our duty on this subject. Vaporous and abstract declarations of rights, claims based on neither law nor constitution, but placed above both, may nerve and stimulate, but will never serve to check or restrain fanaticism. God grant that we may not soon feel the need of a more practical and living law.

But, sir, I have said already much more than I intended, and ask pardon of the house for having detained it so long. I shall be compelled, from a sense of duty, so far as my vote will go, to place this constitution, when it leaves the hands of this convention, beyond the reach of any power but that of the people themselves. I cannot, and I will not, place it in other hands than theirs. And when this body is dissolved, I desire that it shall dissolve either under the old constitution "re-adopted," or under one which having met the full approbation of the people, shall have been "adopted" in its stead. In reference to what I shall deem my duty when we return here, though I know that is a matter of little moment to any but myself, I will say, that if the people refuse our work, like the gentleman from Henderson, I shall not want to come back, and shall return in sorrow and in shame, for although I have very often voted with the minority in this house, there is much in the new constitution which meets my most hearty approbation. But if it be rejected unconditionally, I shall vote to "re-adopt" the present constitution. But if—and such I hope and believe will be the case—our work is accepted, I shall return to "adopt" and sign it; and do whatever else may be right and proper to put the government to work under it. If, however, in talking with my people, they say to me, "we prefer this new constitution to the old one, but would rather have this or that provision out of it"—for there is no fear that they will want any thing added—there is enough already and to spare—but if my people tell me, "we will take the instrument as it is, but would rather this provision or detail was out;" when we meet again, I will endeavor to have the parts objected to taken out. And if you, gentlemen, have learned the same thing from your people, why then we will be able to make the constitution more perfect, more acceptable, than it now is. But if a majority of the state say we take it as it is, I shall gladly admit that I have been mistaken, and rejoice to learn that our work is more perfect than I now believe it to be.

Mr. MORRIS. I stand forward, sir, as the friend of this constitution, to entreat its friends, that they will not, by their closing act, smother the offspring which has cost us so much labor, even before it has been fairly ushered into the world; that they will not lay the axe at the root of the tree before it has commenced to blossom, and bear fruit. Sir, I look upon the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Nelson, sustained as it has been by its friends upon this floor, as calculated to inflict the most deadly wound upon the instrument which we are about to promulgate to the world. They have told us that their object in taking this recess is not, alone, that they may return and certify the will of the people by placing this instrument in operation, but that when they return home, they may be enabled to collect and ascertain the sentiments and wishes of their constituents, and upon their return, make such alterations as will conform to their wishes. They say that they are unwilling to surrender the power which they now have again into the hands of the people—unwilling to trust this work, which they have made, fully and fairly to their decision. That they have determined to hold on to the power which has been confided to them, until such an instrument as they will accept shall be made. I should have no particular objection to returning here for the simple and sole purpose of putting this work into operation—of ratifying what we have already done—was there the least necessity for such a proceeding—could this power not be properly and safely delegated to others. But I do most solemnly protest against the idea of returning here in order to make such alterations as our constituents may desire. Such an avowal must prove absolutely destructive to the end which we as friends of this constitution should ardently desire, its adoption.

I presume, sir, that there is, perhaps, not one solitary man in this house who has succeeded in obtaining all those reforms and amendments in our constitutional law, which he could have wished, had his individual inclinations been consulted—too much has been done to meet the tastes of some gentlemen—too little for others. I can well imagine, that such is likewise the case with all the thinking convention men of the state. The wishes and opinions of men upon these points are as various and as widely different as it is possible to conceive. My own plans for constitutional reform have by no means been carried out. There were certain prominent features of reform upon which nearly all of us united, which were demanded by the people. These we have adopted, and by mutual compromises and concessions we have harmonised the many conflicting opinions of our fellow members, and have produced an instrument with which, in the main, I am satisfied, and which I doubt not, will meet the decided approbation of the great mass of the convention party, provided it be placed fairly before them on its own merits. But when we go home and say that the door is still open for amendments; there is still an opportunity for further changes; all the peculiar sentiments of all the people will be brought to bear against it, and a party will be arrayed in opposition to its adoption which no instrument, however perfect, could withstand. You will have its natural enemies, the friends of the old constitution, forming a very imposing phalanx. You will have all the office holders of the country, with all their interests. Emancipation will again play its mighty and all-absorbing game. Those opposed to an elective judiciary will then stand boldly forward. Our county court system will not meet the views of a great many; and a thousand matters of minor consequence, which have their peculiar advocates upon this floor, and before the people, will again be brought forward, and the friends or enemies of each particular measure will all unite in opposition to our constitution. It was this union of various and conflicting sentiments which broke down the old constitution by such an overwhelming vote. It is this same union, which, if it be brought to bear, will blast the work of our hands.

We pledged ourselves that this constitution should be submitted to the people; that they should have the opportunity of selecting between this and the old one; and whether the changes be made now, or hereafter, it will be equally imperative upon us to submit them. How will it be possible for us to advocate this constitution before our constituents. I can say to them—this is what we have done—these are the amendments we have made—but I cannot say that these changes are permanent, that further alterations will not be made. No sir, if this resolution be adopted, we shall have the same mighty fight before the people which characterized the last summer's canvass, and the same terrible conflict which has just been concluded upon this floor.

And should any alterations in our work be made, shall we not again submit them to the people? They certainly will demand it at our hands; and should we again submit, we will perhaps again change, and so on until there would be no end to our labors. The people sent us here to abolish lifetime offices. But they had not the least expectation, that in electing us, they had established a hundred officers for life—whose business it would be, to be forever tinkering at their constitution. They had no idea they were establishing a perpetual parliament—"Rump Parliament," I believe it was called—upon which no power could be brought to act. Sir, they never dreamed of such thing. They intended that the old and the new constitution should be submitted to them, and between these they expected to select the least objectionable.

Should the people decide that our labours for the last three months are not satisfactory, I think it would be but right that we throw up our commissions, and place it in their power to select others more competent to carry out their wishes. Sir, with this meeting of our convention my work, as a constitution maker, closes. Should the majority so declare, and the people accept what we now tender to them, I will return and put the new wheel in motion, but I will do no more. Not one solitary change will I consent to hereafter.

Mr. W. C. MARSHALL. I have been labouring to bring this session to a close, and when it is brought to a close, I trust we shall submit the work of our hands to the people of the country, and I have no doubt that it will be approved; for after all I have heard, I have no doubt that the people will approve what we have done. But while I am convinced of this, there is a question, and I find there have been a great variety of opinions expressed on this floor, in relation to it—there is a question which ought to induce every gentleman to reflect seriously upon what we are about to do. I ask the last gentleman who has taken his seat, if he believes that any member of this convention entertains a doubt as to what is the safer course to take on this matter.

Mr. MORRIS. I stated that I should have no objection to come back if it was found to be necessary.

Mr. MARSHALL. And if the gentleman comes back, does he not come back clothed with all the power which he now possesses. I ask him if the people reject this constitution, have we not the power to go over all we have done, and to meet, as far as possible, the views of the people of this commonwealth? If he comes back at all, I ask him is he willing to place restrictions upon the action of this body? I tell him that whatever we do in this respect is utterly powerless. The people have delegated to us the power to make a constitution. If we fail to make it when the people have passed their votes upon it, and leave the ratification of it to some other power, what have we done? We have conferred upon others the power to do that which we have been required to. We have the power to perfect this instrument, but how is it to be carried out? We are to open the polls and ascertain the will of the people.—Now, what power has this convention to pass an act or resolution which would require action on the part of the officers of the commonwealth? Suppose the magistrates should refuse to open the polls, and there is no election, I ask have we then a constitution? No; it will be made in such case to depend entirely upon a condition. Suppose on the other hand that the election should be conducted, and a large majority should say this shall be the constitution of Kentucky, you require it to be proclaimed; and suppose when the returns are made, the governor finds a majority in favor of the constitution, I ask you if the governor refuse to make the proclamation, is it, or is it not the constitution of the state? You have said the people are to ratify it, yet there is another condition which is to be coupled with that—a condition resting in the mere will of an individual; and thus after all, when the people have voted you leave it to another power, and that power is unwilling to carry it out. Where do you stand in such case—under the old or under the new constitution? It is not under the new constitution which the people have ratified that the magistrate holds his office, but it is under the old constitution; and under that he stands responsible to the people. These are suggestions that have caused me to doubt; and if they could be removed; I am anxious that they should be removed, and till they are removed, I shall be constrained to take a different course from that which I anticipated. But I would go further—the gentleman from Christian says he is willing to come back and endorse what the people will do. He says the office-holders and emancipationists will be armed against it; but I say submit this constitution to the people, and you will neutralize both the office holders and emancipationists.

I expect to go home and sustain this constitution. Although it does not meet with my entire approbation, yet as a whole, as a matter of compromise, I am willing to take the stump and stand by my constituents and maintain this constitution.

Reserve the privilege to come back, and if the people should refuse, of which, thank God there is no danger, the power is still vested in us to come back and ratify this constitution ourselves; but once let us adjourn indefinitely and all power is lost forever. Here we can exercise the power, here we can enforce it 'ere our opponents have the power to stifle the action of this convention. That is the condition in which it would be placed. If any gentleman can satisfy my mind that it is unnecessary to return, I shall be most happy, for I do not wish to return. To me it will be a great inconvenience; but I will most willingly make any sacrifice to secure the stability of this constitution, believing as I do, that in securing it, we are securing the welfare of our citizens at large.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Mr. President, as I remarked in the early part of the day, when this debate first commenced, I read my authority for the step suggested, in the constitution of Kentucky—that this convention is to make and proclaim that constitution. I believe, sir, that we have no power to authorise any other human agency to perform that act; that we cannot, and ought not to place this instrument, and its taking effect, upon any contingency whatever, which we, as a convention, cannot control and correct. With a view of testing the sense of the house on this matter, I will ask the previous question.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. PRESTON called for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the substitute of Mr. TRIPLETT, and they were yeas 27, nays 67.

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) William K. Bowling, Francis M. Bristow, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Archibald Dixon, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Vincent S. Hay, James W. Irwin, William Johnson, Peter Lashbrooke, William N. Marshall, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, Thomas P. Moore, Jonathan Newcum, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Rogers, Jas. Rudd, Albert G. Talbott, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Philip Triplett, Henry Washington, Silas Woodson—27.

So the substitute was rejected.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution proposed by Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. PROCTOR, and there were yeas 55, nays 38. Several gentlemen were afterwards permitted to record their votes, and then the result was, yeas 56, nays 41.

YEAS—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Beverly L. Clarke, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfield, Thomas J. Gough, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Mark E. Huston, Thomas James, William Johnson, Geo. W. Johnston, Geo. W. Kavanaugh, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, William C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, William D. Mitchell, James M. Mesbitt, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, John T. Robinson, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, Philip Triplett, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Chas. A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, Wesley J. Wright—56.

So the resolution was adopted.

On the motion of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, it was Ordered, That the portion of the report of the committee on miscellaneous provisions, made on the 15th inst., not adopted, be re-committed to the committee on miscellaneous provisions.

And then the convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1849.

RECESS OF THE CONVENTION.

Messrs. T. J. HOOD, PRICE and KELLY, asked and obtained leave to vote on the resolution of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, which was adopted last night, by which the convention agreed to take a recess until the first Monday in June. They severally voted "nay," and the final result therefore stands, yeas 56, nays 41.

COMMITTEE OF REVISION.

Mr. McHENRY, from the committee of revision, made a further report, and the amendments and modifications in the articles of the constitution which they suggested, were agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION FOR CASEY COUNTY.

Mr. HARDIN, from the committee to which was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Casey county, in relation to the election of the delegate from that county, asked that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, which was agreed to.

DEPOSIT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

On the motion of Mr. MERIWETHER, it was Resolved, That one copy of the constitution, which the secretary is directed to prepare, shall be deposited with the president of this convention, and the other with the secretary, during the recess.

POWER TO FILL VACANCIES.

On the motion of Mr. GARRARD, it was Resolved, That the president be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a writ of election to fill any vacancy that may occur in this convention before the final adjournment.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. APPERSON. The vote given by me for the nineteenth section of the report on general provisions, I am not satisfied with, and therefore do now move a re-consideration of the vote by which that section was adopted. In making this motion, I have no expectation that a re-consideration will be obtained, but being satisfied that my vote was wrong, I desire to place myself right on the record. The proposition is an abstract one, having, in my judgment, no right to a place in the constitution. Nothing practical can grow out of it, even though the proposition be assumed as true, which I do, by no means, admit. For the first time during the session of this convention, I call for the ayes and noes on the motion to re-consider.

On motion, the rule which requires a notice to re-consider to lie over, was dispensed with, and, on the motion to re-consider, the vote was—yeas 25, nays 64.

Waller, Charles A. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson—25.

NAYS—John L. Ballinger, Alfred Boyd, Wm. Bradley, Luther Brawner, Thomas D. Brown, William C. Bullitt, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Archibald Dixon, James Dudley, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Nathan Guthrie, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Thos. J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, William C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Robert D. Maupin, Richard L. Mayes, Nathan McClure, James M. Nesbitt, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Johnson Price, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Thos. Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Robert N. Wickliffe, Wesley J. Wright—64.

So the convention refused to re-consider.

COMMITTEE OF ENROLLMENT.

On the motion of Mr. BRADLEY, it was Resolved, That a committee of enrollment, to consist of five delegates, be appointed by the president, for the purpose of comparing the enrolled constitution with the engrossed copy; and that said committee report their action to the convention.

The President appointed Messrs. Bradley, Boyd, Apperson, G. W. Johnston, and Preston, as that committee.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the committee on miscellaneous provisions, to which was re-committed the report of that committee, made on the 15th instant, reported the same back to the convention, with an amendment, in accordance with the decision of the convention on the adoption of the resolution of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The sections reported were as follows:

"That the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky about to assemble, be, and they are hereby, requested to make all necessary provisions, by law, for the proper carrying out of the submission of the new constitution to the people of this commonwealth, as provided for in section four, of this schedule.

"That when this convention adjourns it will adjourn to re-assemble in the town of Frankfort on the first Monday of June, 1850, with the view, and for the purpose, of ascertaining the result of the vote upon the new constitution. If the same shall have been ratified by a majority of all those voting for and against it, this convention will then publish or proclaim the new constitution as the "Constitution of Kentucky;" and proceed further to provide for putting the new government into operation. If it shall be found that a majority of all those voting for or against it, has been cast against it, then said constitution shall be declared rejected, and this convention will forthwith re-adopt and re-publish the present constitution as the constitution of the state."

Mr. JAMES moved to amend the fourth section of the report by adding "Tuesday" after the word "Monday" so as to provide that the poll shall be opened two days instead of one, in the month of May, to take the sense of the people on the new constitution.

A brief conversation ensued on the amendment, in which Mr. STEVENSON, Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, Mr. JAMES, Mr. BRADLEY, and others took part.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLLARD moved to strike out the words "first Monday and Tuesday of May" and insert the words "second Monday and Tuesday of April."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAY moved to amend the fourth section by inserting after the words "general assembly" in the 26th line, the following:

"At the same time and places, and in the same manner, the sense of the people of the state shall be taken, in regard to the mode of revising the constitution, and regulating taxation. It shall be the duty of the several sheriffs and officers conducting the election, to propound to each voter the following questions: "Are you for or against the specific mode of revising the constitution?" "Are you for or against the provision, that taxation shall be equal and uniform, and imposed upon property in proportion to its value?" And said officers shall, in the same manner, make due return to the secretary of state, of all the votes cast, for and against each of said propositions."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN moved to amend the section, by adding the following:

"And any sheriff, or other acting officer, who shall fail to perform the duties herein prescribed, such sheriff or other returning officer so failing, shall be liable to all the fines and penalties, now prescribed by law for failing to perform their respective duties."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I may as well ask the indulgence of the house, to make a few remarks which it is proper I should make, circumstanced as I am in relation to the vote of last night. I do not think we can set ourselves up to prescribe penalties and enforce, by judgments of law, fines and imprisonments and make them obligatory; neither do we possess the power to refer the question to any one to say what shall be the constitution of Kentucky, to any man, save the people themselves, speaking through this convention. It was therefore, under this opinion, that I ventured to offer the resolution I did, that the convention should take a recess as it proposes, and meet again and perform the last and final official act required at our hands—the proclaiming, as the immediate delegated organs of the people, the constitution that shall govern them and their posterity, when we shall be satisfied that that constitution shall have met the approbation of the people for whom it was made. I entertain the opinion that the constitution of Kentucky must emanate from the people, and that the only human agency or organ to proclaim that fact, assembled as we were, was the delegates chosen by the people to perform this work. That we could not, in the language of the gentleman from Jessamine, any more delegate this high and final act to any human tribunal over whose official action we had no control after our adjournment, any more than we could delegate the whole power with which we were clothed by the people. Could I, had I brought my mind to the conclusion that we could do this and comply with the solemn duty imposed on me, I should have most cheerfully closed my labors not only in this convention, but in all other public assemblies that may hereafter assemble in this commonwealth. The house decided this question upon its best judgment. They sustained that resolution. I know some gentlemen were influenced by the apprehension, that if this convention were dissolved by final adjournment, certain combinations would be gotten up, and the labors of this convention would be ultimately defeated by a vote of the people. These considerations, however, did not influence my action, or control my judgment in the vote I gave on that resolution. I had no want of confidence in the public functionaries. I did not distrust their fidelity, or their disposition to carry out what might seem to be the wishes of the convention, and the final action of the people, but I was unwilling to transfer, beyond the control of this convention, the power to do that which I believed was required to be done at my hands, the final act of proclaiming the constitution.

But we have had read to us a lecture on our conduct last evening, which I confess I do not very well relish. Coming from the high source and respectable quarter it does, I have thought it proper to state the reasons and grounds upon which I acted. The editor, after speaking of the resolution, and proclaiming as a fact known in this commonwealth, that there were organized arrangements to defeat the new constitution, brings to our minds the promises made by the convention party, that the constitution should be submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection, and to choose between the old and new constitution, and reminds us of the promises made during the canvass for seats on this floor. We are told that all these promises and pledges are about to be violated, that by the resolution which was adopted, the people we represent are about to be defrauded and cheated by the delegates of this house; that submission is a "mere form, an idle mockery." The mode and manner in which this convention is to submit this constitution to the people; the mode and manner in which we have advocated the carrying out of that judgment, whatever it may be, is announced by the printer to this house, as a "mere form, as an idle mockery," as a violation of the high pledges—the sacred pledges—we owe the people. What do you propose to do by the resolution? That the people shall meet in the most solemn form known to a free people, fully informed, so far as we can inform them by throwing out our work before them, in order that they shall decide by their votes, whether they will accept the work proposed, as the constitution of this commonwealth. Is this an idle ceremony? Is this mere mockery? Is this to be proclaimed from the capital of the commonwealth, before we disperse, as a violation of the pledges we have made? What else could we propose? Had we adjourned, and suppose the result of that vote should have been left to the chances of human agency, as I remarked, over which we have no control—had we have left the result to chances, since I admit there is a remote possibility of equal votes in determining this question, then we have no power to settle the controversy between the old and new constitution; had we adjourned, leaving this contest to be affected by spurious and illegal votes, with no power to purge the polls, with no persons, save the office-holders, to look out the spurious votes, on one side or the other, with no power to make such provision as is necessary to ascertain the final result—I suppose, then, we would have been considered as having faithfully carried out our pledges, and the people would have had a fair chance to vote for the adoption of the new constitution, or for the retention of the old one. But what is this conjecture? What are the apprehensions of gentlemen? That if the people of Kentucky, after they have looked at our work, shall become satisfied that the change of the tenure of office, and the mode of appointment, that the whole principles of the constitution are wrong—that the old system of appointment and the tenure of office—the frame work and principles of the construction of government, as prescribed by the old constitution, were now preferred by them—that we should come back as a set of usurpers, as corrupt delegates, as men unworthy the places we occupy, and again and again attempt to re-establish the same principles of the same constitution, forcing it upon the people against their will, and proclaiming it as the constitution, or again to re-submit it to the people for approval or condemnation. I act in public life as I do in private life, upon the presumption that my fellow-men are honest till the contrary appears; and that man, that delegate on this floor, who, after the people shall have proclaimed their judgment against this constitution, and their preference for the old, who shall dare to get up and propose to re-enact the same constitution, in principle if not in detail, would not only manifest a degree of political boldness and desperation which could not find approval in a majority of a hundred delegates, constituted as this house is. He would be condemned as unworthy a seat on this floor. No, I for one approved that resolution, and as one who voted for it, as one who intends, as far as his feeble abilities will enable him, to explain the constitution to the people who have honored him with their confidence, I will maintain it in its whole as the best that could be expected to emanate from the hands of a hundred men who necessarily had to compromise much of individual opinion and thought.

If, after this is done, and a majority of the people of Kentucky shall reject that constitution, because of a preference for the principles of the old one, I should return here not feeling, in the language of some gentlemen who spoke of themselves yesterday, a disgraced man, but as one who feels disappointed with reference to the fruits of his humble labors, but one who will bow with submission and yield a willing obedience to that expression of public opinion, to that public sentiment, to that inalienable right which belongs to the great sovereigns of the commonwealth, to determine for themselves the principles of government, and rules of propriety, and rules of right, personal and political, that shall govern them and their posterity. Why, then, this alarm? Why this denunciation, immediately upon the eve of our departure for home, by the accredited organ of this assembly? Does the proposition I submitted yesterday make that constitution we have adopted better or worse? Does it change its features in principle or detail? Can any man—will any sane man who approves of the constitution, vote against it, because the majority of this body thought it was their duty to meet here, at great private and personal inconvenience, to fulfil the high duty they had voluntarily sought to be imposed upon them by their constituents?

You may blame me, as an individual member, for incurring what some may deem an unnecessary expense; but certainly, whether we meet and proclaim the constitution, or whether we leave it to the governor, or the secretary of state, to do it, does not change the constitution, or alter the judgment of any man upon this floor, or in this country. Again, I have heard it said the effect of that resolution is, that when this convention re-assembles in June next, they will go to work, in violation of the constitution which the people themselves had approved, which point out certain duties to be performed by the legislature—those districting the state for circuit jurisdiction, and appellate jurisdiction, and apportionment of representation, because of a democratic majority on the political side of this house in regard to national politics, for party and political purposes, lay their sacrilegious hands upon the constitution which the people had approved, in order to gerrymander this state in its districts and apportionment, to prejudice the whig party in this commonwealth. It is hardly necessary for me to disavow, for myself or associates, such an intention. I only regret that such an idea ever entered the imagination of the most violent and heated partizan out of this house. I am here, as is well known, elected by a constituency with whom I differ politically, and in reference to questions of party politics I have endeavored to discharge the duty which was confided to me without feeling or knowing on which side of the political questions of the union I stand. And I should feel myself a dishonored man, and I think I may say there is not one here who would not feel himself a dishonored man, to attempt to violate the provisions of that constitution by thus usurping power to promote party purposes.

As I have remarked before, I labored to bring my mind to a right conclusion on this subject, and would have been glad to be relieved from the necessity of re-assembling, if I could have believed it right—if I could have brought myself to the conclusion to risk that constitution against all attacks and all machinations to defeat it. I undertake to say that the article which I have referred to, which declares the act of yesterday an idle mockery, is undeserved, and is a false judgment upon the action of this house.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desired last evening to have stated the reasons which operated upon the committee in bringing forward the report upon which the house was then acting. I had hitherto deferred mingling in this debate, because I desired all gentlemen who wished to attack the report to have an opportunity of doing so, and then I designed to reply in a brief and humble manner to such assaults as should have been made upon it. I had supposed that parliamentary usage would have entitled, and extended to me the privilege of such a position! It was, I thought, due to the committee, due to myself, I thought it was due to you Mr. President, who had placed me, an humble, young and obscure individual, at the head of so important a committee, to have given its chairman at the close of the debate at least an opportunity to state the reasons upon which that report was founded. I therefore confess I was surprised when the distinguished gentleman from Nelson rose last night to deny me that privilege.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I certainly did not deny that privilege. I offered the gentleman the floor, and said if he chose to occupy it I would not call the previous question.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am still constrained to think I am right. These are the facts: I remarked that I wished to address the convention. The gentleman told me I must address it then if I did so at all. I told him, as chairman of the committee, I wished to address the convention after he should have made his assault. He went back to his seat and called the previous question. Was not my position the same as that of the distinguished gentleman himself, when the elder gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) moved to amend his report on the appellate court? Did he not then claim the privilege of closing that debate? I thought the same courtesy would be extended to me, but it seemed the rule in the gentleman's opinion, at least, was altered, and when he was chairman, and when I happened to be, I was plainly told I must either speak before him or not at all.

I have felt no peculiar or personal interest in the adoption of this report, and the only reason why I desired to speak at all, was, to justify the committee and myself before the convention and the country, that I had not proved recreant to your confidence or that of the commonwealth, by making a report without full examination of every principle contained in it. I was clearly satisfied that it was not necessary to come back. I was thoroughly convinced that we possessed the power of saying when, how, and upon what contingency, the new constitution should go into effect. I honestly thought that this convention ought not to re-assemble for the mere idle ceremony of proclaiming the constitution to be "the constitution." When the report was made containing these views, with the power of the convention to enforce a compliance with its terms was denied, but the impolicy of a final adjournment was eloquently portrayed—for myself, if I know myself, all that I desired was to meet fairly this question of the power of the convention. I desired briefly to offer a few remarks, putting this question on its true ground, and leaving the expediency of our coming back to the good sense of the convention. I did not desire to change the opinion of any member of this house. It was a question of expediency, on which honest minds might well differ. I questioned no delegate's honesty who differed from me. I measured no man's devotion to constitutional reform, by his opposition to this report. I was willing, after justifying the report, to have left the whole question to the good sense of this house; and I shall now proceed to do what I should have done last night, if I could have gotten the floor—state the grounds upon which it is founded.

I differ with the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe,) toto calo, as to his proposition broadly laid down, that this convention has no power to enforce any thing that it does. I understand him to rest his proposition to re-assemble on that ground. I understand him boldly to assert that we possess no power to enforce any ordinance we adopt. If there is anything in precedent and authority, I would point him to almost every convention that has ever assembled to form a constitution, as contradicting his position, I would point to the Virginia convention, where this very question arose and was decided. In that body the proposition to fine the sheriff for a failure to open the polls, five thousand dollars, was offered and was adopted. Of the character of that convention it is not necessary for me to speak here. It is known to us all. In it I believe were the most distinguished lawyers, and the most exalted statesmen the world has ever seen collected together. There was a Marshall, a Madison, a Barbour, a Tazewell, a Leigh, a Johnson, with a host of other imperishable names—men who have passed in glory to the grave, but the light of whose genius has formed a sort of milky way in the galaxy of legal talent, that has not and never will disappear. The proposition proposed here was introduced and adopted there, and not a word was heard there, from any man in that distinguished assembly in opposition to it.

In Tennessee, which was a later convention—if new lights have recently dawned on the world, and if our ancestors were such dark, benighted creatures as not to understand the powers of conventions—Tennessee, our neighbor, has this provision. In the schedule of her constitution I find the following provision:

"Be it further ordered, That if any sheriff or other acting officer shall fail, within the time prescribed by this ordinance, to discharge any of the duties hereby required, such sheriff or other returning officer so failing as aforesaid, shall forfeit and pay the sum of $5000, to be recovered by action of debt in any of the courts of record in this state; to be sued for in the name of the governor for the use and benefit of common schools."

Look, I beseech gentlemen who are questioning this power, to all the modern constitutions, and they will at once perceive, that the various conventions adopting them have submitted their work to the approval of the people, and upon its ratification, have required the governor and legislature to put it into operation. To declare the constitution the work of our hands, and that it is the constitution of the commonwealth of Kentucky, upon the happening of a particular contingency is one thing—to put the government into operation under it is another. Now, we have already, in our report, declared that the constitution submitted is the constitution, as soon as ratified by the people. We, having the power, declare it to be the constitution, to take effect at a future time. We do not delegate, as some gentlemen have supposed, our power to the governor, nor do we delegate it to any one else? We exercise, ourselves, legitimate power in declaring either the old or new constitution to be the constitution of the commonwealth of Kentucky, upon the happening of a peculiar contingency; and we select the governor as the organ to make known the happening of that contingency, and the promulgating of our declarations. Why cannot this be done? Why have we not the power? Why have so many conventions pursued the same course, and why has not this objection been hitherto raised?

I considered that there was not a doubt on this subject. Sir, who are we, and for what have we assembled? Do we represent here the sovereignty of Kentucky? We do. Is this convention a collection of people unrestrained by law; or are we a legally existing convention. We must be one or the other, for sovereignty can express itself but by two ways? It must be expressed, either by a constitutional convention, assembled as we are, by color and sanction of law, or by revolution, when the people themselves, tired and oppressed, determine to take the power into their own hands, and by physical force overturn the existing government. We constitute the former, I apprehend, and we represent the sovereignty of Kentucky. How were we assembled? We were called into existence by the law of the last legislature—which was enacted in response to the voice of the same sovereignty, expressed at the polls! The legislature, four years ago, passed an act that the people should be consulted to know whether they desired a convention. That question was submitted under, and in accordance with, the provisions of the present constitution. That organic law required it to be twice submitted, and it was twice submitted. The people responded that they desired a convention; that same sovereignty, through the legislature, provided for the assembling of this convention; and it is to that law that we owe our existence as a convention; and it is that law which distinguishes us from the wild and mad revolutions which have blotted and disgraced the world.

It was thus, through legitimate legislative action, sanctioned by the provisions of the existing constitution; further sanctioned for the two succeeding years by the voice of the people of this old commonwealth, (with a unanimity too, never before equalled,) that we found ourselves assembled, some eighty days ago, in this hall, representing the entire sovereignty of the state. The legislative act which called us into existence did not attempt to limit the power of this convention. It did not attempt to clog popular suffrage by attaching qualifications, as requisites, for membership to this body. It fixed the pay of members of this body. It designated the time of meeting. It provided, by appropriate provisions, for our election; but was in all other respects silent. The election came on—delegates were elected, and we found ourselves a regularly organized convention on the first Monday in October—met together for the purpose of framing a new constitution. This convention, as I have before stated, owed its existence to legislative enactment; but when it was organized, that law had no longer any binding influence upon it. If the act which called us into existence had have attempted to restrain us in the exercise of our power as delegates, by setting out particular defects in the present constitution, restricting our power to those amendments, is it contended that we would have been bound by such an act. Unquestionably not. Our acts as members of this convention already contradict such a supposition. We have seen this body auditing their accounts, and fixing their pay at three dollars per day for the whole session, instead of three dollars for the first sixty days and two dollars for the remainder. We did this in express violation of the legislative act, as construed by the attorney general—fixing our pay. By what authority was this done, except by the power of this body? Indeed, I am told the attorney general did not doubt our power to fix our pay. His construction of the act of the legislature fixed our pay at three dollars for the first sixty days and two dollars for the remainder of the session; but I am credibly informed he did not doubt our power to change, and so informed the second auditor! Sir, did we not exercise that power. Have we not, as our journal shows, acted upon it? And shall we now be told, that we have no power to do anything, until this constitution is ratified? If this be true, of what utility will be the action of this assembly? If we can do nothing without re-assembling—possess no power to get our work before the people—have no authority for asking either the governor or the legislature to aid us in putting this constitution into esse—it strikes me that our labours are fruitless—a mere rope of sand, which crumbles away and is inoperative as soon as made. Mr. President, I ask you how can such a doctrine be maintained? Are we to go home and tell our constituents that after all their labor and toil for four long years in the cause of constitutional reform—after all their money expended for this convention and in the calling of it—we have no power either to coerce a sheriff to receive the expression of the popular voice upon the result of our labors, and no power to ask the legislature or executive to aid us in bring this result about? Why may not the present legislature, about to assemble, enforce, by ample penalties, the provision that we have made for submission? Have we any reason to doubt they would not; and if they do, why need we come back? I have always understood that when there was a clear grant of power given to any body, that such a grant carried with it all implied and necessary authority requisite for its full and complete execution? I had always supposed—

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I should be glad to hear the gentleman discuss this question. Does the gentleman understand that this convention has the power, by resolution, to declare a crime or misdemeanor and prescribe punishment for it; not by organic law, but by resolution?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will before I get through most cheerfully answer my distinguished friend
