I was sorry to hear the gentleman from Jessamine intimate that this was a lawyers' project. Is this so? If we were to look around the house and see how the lawyers stand, they would be found to be divided into two parties, those nearest the capital forming one, and those distant from it, forming another party. Those that live away off want justice extended to them, and those that live in the neighborhood of the capital want to get all the fees. I will not impute such motives, but it is a significant matter that the lawyers here are divided as I have intimated—the gentleman from Henry excepted. I find him at all times liberal, though I am not disposed to complain of the illiberality of any gentleman, because I believe all are disposed to do what they believe to be right.

It was enquired this morning if this court was to be migratory—a term which I do not understand to be applicable to the proposition to branch it; and if that was proper in reference to the court, why not apply the same principle to the legislature? I think there is a great difference between the two cases. They were the representatives of the people, from every county in the state, and fully understood what the people wanted. As in the convention the people were here by their representatives. Are they present in the court by their representatives? I think not. It is enquired also why should not the governor travel about the state as well as the court? What has he to do with the administration of justice, and the decision of causes! Nothing, as it appears to me. Gentlemen have also referred in the same connection to the reporter. The present reporter is as worthy a man, and as well qualified for the duties of his office as any man in the state, but is it his duty to be in court? Not at all. He has the opinion handed over to him as it is written out, and he gets it printed. I happened to be here when a proposition was before the legislature offering to print these reports for two dollars and twenty-five cents a copy; and although the gentleman was not a lawyer, nor indeed was he required to be; he agreed to have them done as well as those for which the state pays, I believe five dollars for every five hundred pages, and a dollar perhaps for every additional one hundred pages, or five or six dollars a volume. It is also enquired whether it is not a fair proposition to submit this question to the people? It is just as fair as to submit to them whether they will have three, or four judges, or even whether there shall be a court of appeals or not. I suppose the people sent us here for some purpose, and having come here, let us do our duty as the people require. And it does seem to me, when we look at the suits in the circuit courts, and compare the number of them that are brought up to the court of appeals, with the number that come up from around Frankfort, it will appear that either the lawyers are greatly superior in this part of the country, or else they are in possession of great facilities for having their causes adjudicated. These facilities I am desirous to see extended to every part of the commonwealth, as far as is possible. So far as the people of Frankfort are concerned, there is no man who has a higher esteem for them than I have, and in regard to the capital I hope they will always have it among them, and that it will never be removed.

Mr. LINDSEY. It is said that a learned coroner in Indiana on one occasion in charging his jury, laid down the proposition that there were three modes by which a man might come to his death, "by accident, by incident, and by the acts of an incendiary." The delegate from Montgomery has not taken exactly either of these modes of killing off Frankfort and her citizens, although his course may come under the head of one of the learned coroner's classification in the eyes of some. But I do not charge that he is doing it by the "acts of an incendiary." Yet for one who manifests such high regard for my town and people, as the gentleman has expressed, who has not suffered any inconvenience from attending the appellate court here, but found it pleasant, agreeable, and profitable, it might seem strange that he has been arming himself with such weapons as he has used on this occasion.

What delegate, let me ask, Mr. President, introduced Frankfort and her influences into this discussion? Certainly no one will charge me? Nor will the charge lie at the doors of any of those who oppose the branching of the court of appeals. I leave the convention to determine. When I am compelled to fall down in argument for objecting to any constitutional provision, or in its advocacy to the mere wishes or interests of a single county, or her influences, the question will not be considered worth the opposition or necessary to be established. I hope, sir, my vision is not so far limited that I cannot see great interests to be promoted in the state at large.

The gentleman asks what has the governor of Kentucky to do with the administration of justice? I respond much to do with it in the various executive branches. Had the gentleman spent a small portion of the time he devoted in making out tables, that prove nothing, that advances an argument for his branching proposition, in ascertaining the amount of business the people of Kentucky do in the executive branches of their government, he would have found that the arguments, on the score of inconvenience to the people in visiting the seat of government, would apply with much more force to the governor's being stationary at one place than to the court of appeals.

The gentleman asks "what has Frankfort not got?" and answers, "she has the governor, second auditor, register, clerk of the court of appeals, minister to Mexico, consul to Liverpool, and commissioner of Indian affairs." All true, sir. The citizens hold these offices. But the gentleman says he does not complain. If not, why does he introduce such statements, invidiously, or seemingly so?

Did the citizens of Frankfort create these offices, or fill them? What agency had her people in causing the distinguished gentleman, now at the head of the executive department, to fill that office? None, sir, whatever. He was selected by a convention of delegates from all parts of the state.

The mode of crying out "Frankfort influence" is no new thing to me. Frequently have I seen members of the legislature elect to the petty offices, necessary to the organization of both houses and the management of their business, citizens of Frankfort, and then heard them charging that it was brought about by Frankfort influence.

Because a turnpike road runs through the town, in which the state is interested, that is named as a great matter in the grave charges against the citizens.

I regret to see honorable delegates resorting to such means to promote their favorite projects; and again, sir, protest that they find argument and sound reason to sustain them, rather than denunciation, so unmerited as it has been, from any act of my constituents.

Mr. CLARKE. It is true that in the remarks I submitted to the house some half hour ago, I stated that there were lawyers in Frankfort and the counties adjacent who perhaps were as much interested in continuing the court of appeals here, as lawyers in the districts possibly could be in branching the court of appeals; but I did not intend by that remark to intimate that the feeling was stronger in the one class than in the other. I make the remark to meet the suggestion of the gentleman from Jessamine, who stated it to be a lawyer project, or rather that it would so be considered by the people, for he did not himself declare that he believed it to be so. Now, I have been considering upon the vote taken yesterday, and could not discover that this proposition of branching had received any strength from many lawyers either of Franklin or the surrounding counties. It has been asked—what has Frankfort got? In proportion to its population, Frankfort has received more from the public treasury than any other town in the state. If I am not mistaken the very streets that surround this capital were paved at the public expense, and not at the expense of the citizens of Frankfort. The gentleman from Franklin shakes his head, but I have been informed that the whole state has been taxed to raise money for that purpose. There are various other benefits Frankfort is continually receiving.—From the adoption of the present constitution down to the present moment, one hundred and thirty eight delegates have yearly assembled here, and it is a fair estimate that each one of them has left a dollar a day in Frankfort. They have assembled here yearly and have thus furnished a market for the county of Franklin and the surrounding counties, and thousands and tens of thousands of dollars have thus been annually spent here. Now, I have served in the legislature here for two years, and I have not a word to say against the citizens of Frankfort, for they have always treated me politely and hospitably. Nor have I made any attack on the people of Frankfort; but I have said this: That the people of a region of the state which I in part represent on this floor, want a branch of the court of appeals there. They want the means of justice brought nearer their doors, and I stated the reason why, and attempted briefly to enumerate the hardships under which they have been laboring for the last fifty years. I then said that if the representatives of the people in this convention withheld from that portion of the state a branch of the court of appeals by which justice could be obtained more easily than at present and at less expense, that we could try and take the court of appeals itself nearer to us. If we were to receive the cold shoulder, and to have the backs of the hands of the delegates of this convention turned upon us down there, when we asked for no more than simple justice, I then appeal to the whole delegation from that region of the state to stand up, and if we cannot do any better, we will try to have the court of appeals removed nearer to us than it is at the present time.

The objection to branching the court of appeals, as I understand it, is based upon two grounds. First, the increase of expenses, and secondly, that it will lower the dignity of the court. It has come to this, then, that these judges of the court of appeals degrade themselves if they go to the different parts of the state and mingle with the people! One of the strongest arguments against the life tenure of the office is, that the judge, after he has been on the bench a number of years, does not know the wants of the people, has not the least idea of their spirit, and does not appreciate their intelligence and virtue. If you branch the court, and require them to visit the different portions of the state, you enable the judges to know something of the people. And would it in the least interfere with the force and weight of the judicial decision, if it was rendered at Bowlinggreen instead of Frankfort? Not at all. There are thirteen states, I find, by a hasty examination of a book of constitutions here, in which their supreme court has been branched. In some they are required to hold courts in seven and eight different places, and in others in two, three, and four. What states are these? One is the Empire state. I call upon gentlemen who practice in the appellate and other courts of this state, and ask of them when they have found a point not decided upon by our own court of appeals, if there is any higher authority in the country than the decisions of the supreme, or appellate court of New York? There is Massachusetts, too—her court of appeals is branched. When you have not found the decisions of your own court to apply, I ask where you find higher authority than the decisions of Massachusetts? Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, in short, I believe more than a majority of the old thirteen states that assembled in convention and framed the federal constitution of this proud union, have branched their court of appeals, and the weight and authority of the opinions of those courts are not inferior to those of any courts in the union. I live on the very borders of the state of Tennessee—the county in which I live is on the state line—and I know something of the operations of the system in that state. The court is there called the supreme court, and sits in three different districts, and I have never heard the first man say that the decisions of that court rendered at Knoxville, were not just as dignified and authoritative as those rendered at the city of Nashville.

I trust I shall not be understood as imputing motives here, but it is a notorious fact, that the idea prevails, that there is an influence about this place, which, when exerted under a strong motive, and where the interests at stake are important enough to arouse it, it is difficult to resist. Why, how many turnpikes and railroads are there running to other towns with equal population to this? Where is the other town with one or two railroads starting out, and appropriations made for more, and turnpikes running in every direction, and navigation stopped at the town itself? And yet nothing has been done for Frankfort! I then only ask these people who have so long enjoyed all these advantages, to submit to the increase of a tax of half a cent, for the purpose of extending justice to us, when we have been paying into the coffers of the state for years, thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, to be expended here, and fill the pockets and purses of the citizens of Frankfort. And will they not now submit to a little increased taxation, to enable us to obtain free access to the court of appeals? That is all we ask.

Mr. STEVENSON. I regret exceedingly the character that this debate has now assumed. I think it portends no good. I dislike to see on this floor crimination and recrimination. I am pained to witness such an array of sectional feeling, and local prejudice, so well calculated to call up the worst feelings of our nature. This hall is an inappropriate theatre for such displays. It is unquestionably not a proper way to get at correct action. It certainly can lead none of us to expect that it will give any force to our work when we shall place the new constitution before the people for their approbation. And for what is it all done? It seems to me we can meet here and enter into an interchange of opinions, and convince each other of error, if error exists, without this personal feeling, this local, sectional jealousy, which is unworthy of the state, unworthy of ourselves, and entirely unworthy of the great cause in which we are engaged! For myself, I am opposed to branching the court of appeals. I shall give one or two reasons, without entering into a lengthened argument, by which I have been led to this conclusion. In advance, I say that I am actuated by no selfish feeling. I stand not here to-day as a representative from northern Kentucky alone, not as a gentleman blind to the interests of southern Kentucky, because I happen not to live among them, but I stand here as a Kentuckian, prepared to act for the whole state. I stand as a representative on this floor prepared to follow gentlemen when they shall convince me that their proposition is right, and to give it my humble support. But when threats are thrown out—when denunciations are made—when local prejudices are appealed to, and the worst passions of our nature are attempted to be aroused against this town, or that town, it creates a bitterness of feeling which, if persisted in, must lead to deleterious results and wrong conclusions. I do not know, myself, that I have any particular feeling of attachment to Frankfort, except that it is the capital of my state. If there are underhanded influences at work here—if there is certain wire-pulling behind the scenes here as certain gentlemen have intimated—a sort of central influence—in the name of God do not let us attempt to strike at great principles because we dislike Frankfort. Let us remove the seat of government, but do not let us do that which we know to be wrong because the seat of government, in the opinion of certain gentlemen, is in the wrong place. If it is wrong to branch the court of appeals, let us not do wrong because certain delegates on this floor desire to remove the seat of government! We had better remove the seat of government and get rid of this trouble. That is my idea; and when gentlemen tell how many officers Frankfort has had, what amount she has received from the public treasury, who paved the streets, and who built this house and that house, I pass it all by as irrelevant to this discussion, and as unworthy this hall. I think it has nothing to do with the great question whether the appellate tribunal in this state should or should not be branched. If Frankfort is unhealthy—if Frankfort is not central enough—or if any thing else is wrong, why let us select another place for the seat of government; but wherever the seat of government is, there, in heaven's name, let us have the appellate court held! It is, in my judgment, the proper place, and the only place where it ought to be held!

The first reason why I am opposed to branching the court is, that it tends to destroy the independence and the stability of the judiciary.—What leads to enlightened opinions from any judicial tribunal? What tends to judicial stability? Why, correctness in the settlement of the principles contained in legal decisions. How is that to be arrived at? By laborious, patient, unceasing investigation of all authorities within their reach, and by a calm consultation and deliberation over them. The science of the law, like every other science, is progressive. New books, as well as new principles, are every day being developed and brought forth. Late editions of English works and American editions, with American notes and authorities of these English works, are every day being published. The judges, in order to arrive at correct principles on any subject should have all the light, and all the means of consulting these new works. While judges must exercise the labor and patience of investigation, yet they must also have, in fine libraries, the materials and legal quarries upon which this labor and this patient investigation is to be exerted. Can you furnish these materials more readily by having four branches or one single appellate court? Is it easier to have one fine library, and a fund set apart in this constitution for its annual increase, by the purchase of new books, or is it easier to have four branches and four diminutive libraries, without increase? I think it is easier to have one. And by having but one, we are more likely to have a good one, with much better prospect of having it annually increased by valuable additions, than if we had four.

Look at the supreme court of the United States. Let any gentleman go into that court, and I care not how distinguished or how humble he may be—I care not how much prejudiced against the legal profession that visitor may be—let him be a lawyer or not, he will, on entering that august tribunal, feel proud of it as one of the institutions of his country. If he is a lawyer he will feel proud of his profession; if not a professional man he will be proud of the intellect, the dignity and imposing aspect of the tribunal itself, the ability with which questions are there discussed, and above all with the solemn and impressive manner in which the learned, able, and well digested opinions of that tribunal are delivered. Would gentlemen branch that court? It seems to me that if there is any thing in this argument of convenience in traveling to and from courts, as we have heard to-day, that gentlemen living in Texas would find a great many more reasons to urge against the inconveniences of having to travel to Washington city, than can be urged by any man in Kentucky? But I have never heard any such complaints from the people of any part of the confederacy. In the supreme court they have lawyers too from every part of the Union—they have two fine libraries, consultation rooms, printed briefs, printed records; no pains and no expense is spared in order to arrive at safe and correct, legal or constitutional conclusions. How consistent the opinions of that court—how stable—how uniform—how able—how distinguished? When we hear of a Mansfield and a Hale, and a host of other bright luminaries who have adorned the English bench in former years, what American heart does not thrill with pride and pleasure when he hears even upon the other side of the Atlantic, that we have, in the names of a Marshall and a Story, jurists worthy to sit side by side with them, and associated with them as distinguished compeers! I believe the branching of the court of appeals will be the first stroke at the stability of the judiciary. And it is not, Mr. Chairman, as a northern Kentuckian or as a sectional man that I speak, but as one who feels deeply the importance of a respectable and independent judiciary. I speak as one who desires to see the character of our jurisprudence raised and elevated—a jurisprudence which by its learning and stability shall rank with any in the Union. When gentlemen tell me that you can have the same light, the same mature deliberation in branching the court of appeals, I point them to those states where branching has existed, and I ask, has it given satisfaction? Let me tell my friend from Simpson, that some of the very states that he has quoted are now praying to be delivered from the system of branching their appellate court which they had unfortunately adopted in their constitution.

I know a state which has just called a convention, and one of the crying evils is the low character of their judicial decisions—the perfect begging of justice—I mean the state of Ohio.—There they have these migratory courts with a vengeance. Had I time I could, by the decisions of cases there, show the instability of such a system. I could show that in one prominent case at least, (Zercher vs. Good), after solemn determination of an important judicial question—under which the courts acted for years—they have recently taken it all back and unsettled all the judicial decisions of like principle.

Mr. Chairman: Judges are like other men.—They are subject to the same physical infirmities. Were I called in bad weather and over bad roads to go five hundred miles to argue a case, would not the fatigue of the journey render me, in some degree, unfit to perform the duty for some days. Gentlemen may talk about it as they please. There is no difference between judges and other men! Take the judges for eight or ten months to distant parts of the state—far from home—and there will be a natural anxiety to get home; a feverish restlessness in the minds of the judges to hurry through and get home, which, if it is not calculated to render them wholly unfit, will at least tend to banish and keep away that mature, calm, and patient deliberation which is so essential to the consultation room of every judicial tribunal. I am disposed as an humble member of the convention to go as far as any man could go to accommodate the whole state. But at the seat of government, which should be central in its location, some inconveniences must result to those living on the extreme confines of the state in their business with the state. It is not, Mr. Chairman, confined to the judiciary, but it applies to every other department of the government. If, to overcome this, it is necessary to branch the judicial department, why not branch the other departments of the government? Let me illustrate. Suppose the neighbors of my friend from Simpson (who utters such bitter complaints,) desire a land warrant—would they not have to apply to the county court first, then to come to Frankfort and bring a survey which they would deposit in the register's office, to get a receipt from the register, and at the end of six months receive their patent. Suppose again, money has to be paid by sheriffs into the treasury department. Do they not all have to come here and settle with the second auditor? Wherever the seat of government may be located, those who live in the distant parts of the state having business with the state, requiring them to be present, will be put to some inconvenience. Now, it strikes me that all the argument of my friend from Simpson, in order to get over the injustice which he speaks of, would require us to have traveling auditors, treasurers, and registers, and all these departments ought to be branched.

Mr. Chairman: The question which I commend to all the advocates of the branching system is, whether it is not better to have the court of appeals here and get justice, than have a court of appeals at every man's own door, and obtain a sort of peddling out of justice—a species of justice which will be only half administered, because settled on wrong principles. Is a man more benefited by having wrong decisions at his own door, than if he were to come here to the seat of government and have his suit decided on correct bases. I think myself that the people, if they believe they will have a better court here, a more enlightened court, more stable decisions, and a higher character given to the jurisprudence of our state, would prefer the appellate court here than to have a migratory court traveling through certain districts.

I shall not go into the large increased expenditure which would necessarily be incurred by a branching of the appellate court. That question, and the details of increased expenditure, has been gone into by the gentlemen who have preceded me. What I want is, that when I get here I shall find a learned, stable, safe, and independent judiciary; and I wish to have the salaries of the judges fixed in the constitution at an adequate minimum. Why? Because I think that also tends to preserve and keep the judiciary independent. When I was in the legislature for one or two years, I frequently heard propositions made to reduce the salaries of the judges, although they were but twelve hundred dollars. There were gentlemen in that body who thought they were too high, and bills were continually introduced, and time and money was continually spent in discussing the propriety of reducing the salaries; and the money thus wasted in useless discussions and fruitless efforts at reducing salaries, if it had been applied to the judges' salaries, would have given us the best talent in the state. I think that while I am not for paying any more respect to our judicial department than to any other, I am for keeping it firm and independent. I am for putting a limit, beyond which the legislature shall not come, whatever that limit may be. Let this convention agree upon what would be the true minimum compensation, and beyond that do not let the legislature go. Neither make it too high or too low, but make it adequate and sufficient! Make it ample to command the best talent in the state.

My friend from Montgomery remarked that it was strange that gentlemen supposed that the attorney general would ever be required to attend a court of appeals. My friend seemed to think that every thing could be done by brief. I do not think it at all strange, and I think the gentleman from Montgomery is entirely mistaken. Whether the attorney general would or not, be required to attend the appellate court in the several districts, would depend on circumstances. There are cases where he could not argue by brief. One is the prosecution for malfeasance of all public officers. But a few years ago the clerk in one of the largest counties, Fayette, was tried, and for two or three weeks was prosecuted before this court. Now, I ask if the court had been branched, and the court had been sitting at the time of said prosecution, if in Greene county, would not the attorney general have been obliged to attend? Whether he must attend or not, will depend on the business of the court, which none can foresee. The necessity of his personal presence will depend on the character of cases arising in the court.—When, however, you appoint an attorney general he will look to all these probable contingent services, and he will require a salary, if he be a man of fine attainments, that shall be a suitable compensation.

But, as I said, I do not intend to enter into the subject of expenses. I think that a secondary topic. I go on the broad principle that the character of our jurisprudence will be elevated, and I desire to see it stand among the first in the union. I desire to see good judges, that when our commonwealth comes into competition with others, for the service of her sons, she shall give good prices and command the highest talent.—Then fix some adequate minimum—give them the means of light and of investigating cases, and require them to sit at the seat of government. I do not speak of Frankfort—I speak of the seat of government, wherever it may be. There require them to sit, and proceed with the business until the whole docket is disposed of. I came here not absolutely pledged to an elective judiciary. I should prefer, and I expect to go for, the election of judges by the people, because I believe the people will disregard these minor, sectional, personal, and improper influences, which have hitherto operated, by the modes which have existed in Kentucky.

I prefer the people to the legislature; that with me is the last mode. When I was canvassing last summer, I expressed my preference for the people as against the governor and the legislature. I reserved to myself the right, as I still reserve it, to go for any other mode, if any should be suggested, in preference to that. But I believe that the people are fully competent; that they will not only disregard political, but all improper influences. No plan is thought of but that by the people. When I hear gentlemen say that one or two individuals will lead a whole district captive, and the whole will be in the hands of a few intriguers, I think they do injustice to the virtue and intelligence of the people. It is because I have the utmost confidence in that virtue and intelligence, that I prefer that mode of appointment over that by the governor, and the legislature. It is not so much in the mere appointment, as it is in their proper independence, after you have appointed the judges. Keep them above the influence of a bare majority of the legislature; hold them responsible to the people; let their living not depend upon the whims or caprice which from time to time may show itself in this hall. Fix a point beyond which that legislature cannot go; put them in for six or eight years; give them facilities and means of light, and I have no fear that we shall not have, not only a good and firm, but an able judiciary.

One other consideration, and I am done. I have very unexpectedly, and in a very desultory manner, given what I thought was the leading objection to branching the court of appeals. Others have given reasons which with me, are mere secondary considerations. But I would commend to the members of this convention, a spirit of harmony and conciliation in this matter. I appreciate the warm zeal of my friend from Simpson, and it is natural that my friend from Franklin should feel excited when sneers were cast against his county and town; but I appeal to both these gentlemen, as well as to every delegate on this floor, if we would not be acting wisely, to let this matter rest where it can be reached. If a majority of the people of Kentucky desire to branch this court of appeals, as an humble servant, I shall yield my opinion, however honest, and bow with the most perfect acquiescence to their will. Therefore, let us put it into the constitution, that it may be branched if it shall be demanded by the people—let us leave it for the legislature to determine when, if ever, this shall be done. This is a sort of olive-branch that meets with my most hearty approbation. It is not denying any portion of the people justice; it is not forcing them to come up here against their will. If they desire to have this court branched, all they have to do, is to instruct their representatives to do it. Their fiat would be the law of the land; then every gentleman would be satisfied; whereas, if they do not desire it, if it is unpopular, and not demanded by the popular will, we have still done wisely; because we have kept it out of the constitution. We shall go before the people with this new constitution, having both parties united in its favor. Those who have opposed branching, as proposed in the bill, will achieve what they want, unless a majority of the people of Kentucky should hereafter desire this court branched through legislative action—while on the other hand, those who are in favor of the plan of branching, as proposed by the committee, will have a mode of effecting their object.

On motion, the convention adjourned.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. STEVENSON from the committee on Miscellaneous Provisions, made the following report, which was referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered to be printed.

ARTICLE —.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

SEC. 1. Members of the general assembly, and all officers, executive and judicial, before they enter upon the execution of their respective offices, shall take the following oath or affirmation: I do solemnly swear (or affirm, as the case may be,) that I will be faithful and true to the commonwealth of Kentucky, so long as I continue a citizen thereof, and that I will faithfully execute, to the best of my abilities, the office of —, according to law, and that I have neither directly nor indirectly, given, accepted, or knowingly carried a challenge, to any person or persons, to fight in single combat or otherwise, with any deadly weapon, either in or out of the state, since the adoption of the present constitution of Kentucky, and that I will neither directly nor indirectly, give, accept, or knowingly carry a challenge to any person or persons, to fight in single combat or otherwise, with any deadly weapon, either in or out of the state, during my continuance in office.

SEC. 2. Treason against the commonwealth shall consist only in levying war against it, or in adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort. No person shall be convicted of treason, unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or his own confession in open court.

SEC. 3. Every person shall be disqualified from holding any office of trust and profit for the term for which he shall have been elected, who shall be convicted of having given or offered any bribe or treat to procure his election.

SEC. 4. Laws shall be made to exclude from office and from suffrage, those who shall thereafter be convicted of bribery, perjury, forgery, or other high crimes or misdemeanors. The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, and prohibiting, under adequate penalties, all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practices.

SEC. 5. No money shall be drawn from the treasury, but in pursuance of appropriations made by law, nor shall any appropriations of money for the support of an army be made for a longer time than two years, and a regular statement and account of the receipts and expenditures of all public money shall be published annually.

SEC. 6. The general assembly may direct, by law, in what manner, and in what courts, suits may be brought against the commonwealth.

SEC. 7. The manner of administering an oath or affirmation shall be such as it is most consistent with the conscience of the deponent, and shall be esteemed by the general assembly the most solemn appeal to God.

SEC. 8. All laws which, on the first day of June, one thousand seven hundred and ninety two, were in force in the state of Virginia, and which are of a general nature, and not local to that state, and not repugnant to this constitution, nor to the laws which have been enacted by the legislature of this commonwealth, shall be in force within this state, until they shall be altered or repealed by the general assembly.

SEC. 9. The compact with the state of Virginia, subject to such alterations as may be made therein agreeably to the mode prescribed by the said compact, shall be considered as part of this constitution.

SEC. 10. It shall be the duty of the general assembly to pass such laws as shall be necessary and proper to decide differences by arbitrators, to be appointed by the parties who may choose that summary mode of adjustment.

SEC. 11. All civil officers for the commonwealth at large, shall reside within the state, and all district, county, or town officers, within their respective districts, counties, or towns, (trustees of towns excepted,) and shall keep their respective offices at such places therein as may be required by law; and all militia officers shall reside in the bounds of the division, brigade, regiment, battalion, or company, to which they may severally belong.

SEC. 12. Absence on the business of this state, or the United States, shall not forfeit a residence once obtained, so as to deprive any one of the right of suffrage, or of being elected or appointed to any office under this commonwealth, under the exceptions contained in this constitution.

SEC. 13. It shall be the duty of the general assembly to regulate, by law, in what cases, and what deduction from the salaries of public officers shall be made, for neglect of duty in their official capacity.

SEC. 14. Returns of all elections by the people shall be made to the secretary of state for the time being, except in those cases otherwise provided for in this constitution.

SEC. 15. In all elections by the people, and also by the senate and house of representatives, jointly or separately, the votes shall be personally and publicly given, viva voce.

SEC. 16. No member of congress, nor person holding or exercising any office of trust or profit under the United States, or either of them, or under any foreign power, shall be eligible as a member of the general assembly of this commonwealth, or hold or exercise any office of trust or profit under the same.

SEC. 17. The general assembly shall direct, by law, how persons who now are or who may hereafter become securities for public officers, may be relieved or discharged on account of such securityship.

SEC. 18. Any person who shall, after the adoption of this constitution, either directly or indirectly, give, accept, or knowingly carry a challenge to any person, or persons, to fight in single combat, or otherwise, with any deadly weapon, either in or out of the state, shall be deprived of the right to hold any office of honor or profit in this commonwealth—and shall be punished otherwise in such manner as the legislature may prescribe by law.

ARTICLE —.

The seat of government shall continue in the town of Frankfort, until it shall be removed by law: Provided, however, That two thirds of all the members elected to each house of the general assembly, shall concur in the passage of such law.

ARTICLE —.

That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognized and established: WE DECLARE,

SEC. 1. That all freemen, when they form a social compact, are equal, and that no man or set of men are entitled to exclusive, separate public emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services.

SEC. 2. That all power is inherent in the people and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, happiness, security, and protection of their property. For the advancement of these ends they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform or abolish their government in such manner as they may think proper.

SEC. 3. That all men have a natural and indefeasible right to worship Almighty God according to the dictates of their own consciences; that no man shall be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent; that no human authority ought, in any case whatever, to control or interfere with the rights of conscience; and that no preference shall ever be given by law to any religious societies or modes of worship.

SEC. 4. That the civil rights, privileges, or capacities of any citizen, shall in no wise be diminished or enlarged on account of his religion.

SEC. 5. That all elections shall be free and equal.

SEC. 6. That the ancient mode of trial by jury shall be held sacred, and the right thereof remain inviolate.

SEC. 7. That printing presses shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the legislature, or any branch of government, and no law shall ever be made to restrain the right thereof. The free communication of thoughts and opinions is one of the invaluable rights of man, and every citizen may freely speak, write, and print, on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty.

SEC. 8. In prosecutions for the publication of papers investigating the official conduct of officers, or men in a public capacity, or where the matter published is proper for public information, the truth thereof may be given in evidence; and in all indictments for libels, the jury shall have a right to determine the law and the facts, under the direction of the court, as in other cases.

SEC. 9. That the people shall be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and possessions, from unreasonable seizures and searches, and that no warrant to search any place or to seize any person or things, shall issue, without describing them as nearly as may be, nor without probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation.

SEC. 10. That in all criminal prosecutions, the accused hath a right to be heard by himself and counsel; to demand the nature and cause of the accusation against him; to meet the witnesses face to face; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and in prosecutions by indictment or information, a speedy public trial by an impartial jury of the vicinage; that he cannot be compelled to give evidence against himself; nor can he be deprived of his life, liberty, or property, unless by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

SEC. 11. That no person shall, for any indictable offence, be proceeded against criminally by information, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger, by leave of the court, for oppression or misdemeanor in office.

SEC. 12. No person shall, for the same offence, be twice put in jeopardy of his life or limb; nor shall any man's property be taken or applied to public use, without the consent of his representatives, and without just compensation being previously made to him.

SEC. 13. That all courts shall be open, and every person, for an injury done him in his lands, goods, person, or reputation, shall have remedy by the due course of law, and right and justice administered, without sale, denial, or delay.

SEC. 14. That no power of suspending laws shall be exercised, unless by the legislature or its authority.

SEC. 15. That excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel punishments inflicted.

SEC. 16. That all prisoners shall be bailable by sufficient securities, unless for capital offences, when the proof is evident or presumption great; and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion or invasion the public safety may require it.

SEC. 17. That the person of a debtor, where there is not strong presumption of fraud, shall not be continued in prison after delivering up his estate for the benefit of his creditors, in such manner as shall be prescribed by law.

SEC. 18. That no ex post facto law, nor any law impairing contracts, shall be made.

SEC. 19. That no person shall be attainted of treason or felony by the legislature.

SEC. 20. That no attainer shall work corruption of blood, nor, except during the life of the offender, forfeiture of estate to the commonwealth.

SEC. 21. That the estates of such persons as shall destroy their own lives, shall descend or vest as in case of natural death; and if any person shall be killed by casualty, there shall be no forfeiture by reason thereof.

SEC. 22. That the citizens have a right, in a peaceable manner, to assemble together for their common good, and to apply to those invested with the powers of government, for redress of grievances, or other proper purposes, by petition, address or remonstrance.

SEC. 23. That the rights of the citizens to bear arms in defence of themselves and the state, shall not be questioned.

SEC. 24. That no standing army shall, in time of peace, be kept up, without the consent of the legislature; and the military shall, in all cases, and at all times, be in strict subordination to the civil power.

SEC. 25. That no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner; nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

SEC. 26. That the legislature shall not grant any title of nobility, or hereditary distinction, nor create any office, the appointment to which shall be for a longer term than during good behavior.

SEC. 27. That emigration from the state shall not be prohibited.

SEC. 28. To guard against transgressions of the high powers which we have delegated, we DECLARE, that every thing in this article is excepted out of the general powers of government, and shall forever remain inviolate; and that all laws contrary thereto, or contrary to this constitution, shall be void.

COURT OF APPEALS.

Mr. MANSFIELD gave notice that on Monday next, he should move to reconsider the vote by which the convention, when acting on the report of the committee on the court of appeals, had stricken out four and inserted three, as the number of which the judges of the court of appeals shall hereafter consist.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE subsequently rose and said he understood a notice had been given, that a motion would be made on Monday next, to reconsider the vote by which the fourth judge was stricken out of the article on the court of appeals. If such a motion were to be made, he suggested that it should be made at once, and that for that purpose, the rule which requires notice of one day to be given, of a motion to reconsider, should be suspended. He would not however, make the motion now, as the house was not full.

The convention then resumed the consideration of the report of the committee of the whole on the article on the court of appeals, the pending question being on Mr. A. K. MARSHALL'S substitute.

Mr. KELLY moved to amend the substitute by striking out the fifth and sixth sections, and inserting the following:

Sec. 5. The state shall be divided by the general assembly into three convenient districts, and in each of said districts, a judge of the court of appeals shall be elected by the qualified voters thereof, and that judge having the highest number of votes shall be chief justice: Provided, That the general assembly may increase the number of said districts and judges, not to exceed in number —

Sec. 6. The said court shall hold two sessions each year at the capital: Provided, That the general assembly may order said sessions to be held in the several districts.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I am now somewhat glad that I did not get the floor shortly after the time the vote was taken, by which the fourth judge was stricken out. The greater part of two long nights spent amongst books and musty records is pretty well calculated to cool the blood.

This question of branching the court of appeals necessarily and naturally divides itself into two propositions, one, so far as relates to the mere labor of the judiciary, and the other relating to the interests of the people. It is a natural division. If three judges cannot do the business delegated to them, then we should have four. The object is not only to have the business done, but to have it done well. I am satisfied that three judges can do the business, if ordinarily industrious. I do not believe that this convention desire to throw an amount of labor upon these judges, when at the age of from forty-five to sixty years, which must be ruinous to their constitutions. Will gentlemen look back to the number of judges on the court of appeals bench who have been absolutely compelled to resign or die. Their constitutions could not stand the labor when they became old. Bear in mind that as the wealth, the commerce, and the population of the state increases, as we want them to increase, as a matter of course litigation and law questions will increase, and a complication of law propositions, and with them an increased amount of the business of this court. I have said, and I say it with some forethought, that ordinarily three judges can properly discharge all the business that there is now, or has been for the last few years, in the court of appeals. But I believe that by the time the new court of appeals can be organized, the business will be more than they can discharge, even if that court is at the seat of government. Then it will be necessary, so far as the judges are concerned, to increase their number, in order to meet the increasing amount of the business of the court. Now, with reference to the interests of the people. The number of cases that are reversed by this court, is a matter in which they are directly concerned. I have examined the cases brought before this court during the last four or five years, and find that from sixty-one to sixty-five cases in every hundred, have been reversed, seven or eight of this sixty-five are reversed on mere technicalities; the people are not interested in such cases, property does not thereby change hands, and ultimately the decision stands as when at first pronounced. But about fifty four of fifty five of these cases are reversed for good cause, and then the property changes hands. The amount of property which is thus changed cannot be accurately ascertained, because it is not usually stated in dollars and cents, but from the best estimate I can make, from four to six hundred thousand dollars worth of property is thus transferred annually, by the decisions of the appellate court.

I have based my estimate upon the average value of the land, as I find it in the second auditor's books.

Now, lay that proposition down, and take up the next. I yield the question, that by branching the court of appeals the business will be increased, yes I may say it will be doubled. I am an advocate for branching this court, yet I agree that by having the court sit in four places, you will double the business; it is precisely for this reason that I want the court branched. Bearing this proposition in mind, will gentlemen tell me that four or five hundred thousand dollars shall remain in wrong hands, for the want of courts to review the decisions? Now, look to the amount of property that changes hands, stand by the proposition that some have laid down with regard to the increased amount of business of this court, and then answer to your consciences, and to your constituents, whether this amount of property shall remain in wrong hands, merely to save the additional expense of two thousand or twenty-five hundred dollars per annum, which this branching project will necessarily cost.

Perhaps the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) will answer, that this property will change hands improperly, if the court is branched; and in consequence of the rapidity with which the court must pass from place to place, there will be wrong decisions. There is no danger that the great principles of law will not be carried in the heads of the judges, libraries or no libraries. The necessity of books for reference, is not so much to settle the justice of a case, as to settle abstract and technical principles, and pleadings. It is strange, yet true, that nearly one third of the books comprising our law libraries, relate to pleadings and evidence.

It is not often the case, that a large amount of property changes hands on account of the laws of pleading. These laws are easily understood, and the main object is to get the action properly before the jury or the chancellor. The great principles of law and equity are easily comprehended and tolerably easily applied, and the judges would carry from place to place these great laws which have become, as it were, a part of their common sense. If there are not large libraries, this will be a very small matter compared with the benefits which the people will receive from branching this court.

My great anxiety is to get through with the business. First, I wish to make a good constitution that the people will accept, and then to accomplish this object as speedily as possible. What is necessary for this? I will call the attention of the chairman of the committee on the judiciary, and also the chairman of the committee on county courts to this point. If we fight over every solitary proposition that is submitted to this body, in relation to the court of appeals and the circuit court, it will be months before we get through. I want to transfer the arena of the contest to the committee room. I want also to add the committee on county courts, with its quiet thoughtful chairman. Let him with other gentlemen of that committee act as arbitrators; let all three of these committees meet of an evening, and let them bring their reports together, and my life for it we shall save weeks, if not months. I hope the chairman of one of these committees will make that proposition. I desire, if it would be in order, that the gentleman from Jessamine, who brought forward a proposition in which there is a great deal of merit, be added to one of the committees.

Mr. KELLY withdrew his amendments, in order, as he said, to enable the gentleman from Jessamine (Mr. A. K. Marshall) to offer an amendment with a view of perfecting his substitute.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL then moved to strike out all of the fifth section of his proposition down to the word "provided," and to insert in lieu thereof, the words "the judges of the court of appeals shall be elected by the qualified voters of the state."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I intimated a few minutes ago that when the house should be full, I would, in order to save time, adopt the course suggested by the gentleman from Daviess. I am ready to agree to any course that will meet the approbation of the house, and enable us to progress with the business, and I move now, if it is the pleasure of the house, to suspend the rule, which requires a motion to reconsider to lay on the table for one day. I understand that the gentleman from Allen has made a motion to reconsider the vote given on the proposition, and that other gentlemen of the house who voted with him, desire that it should be so reconsidered. If it should be the pleasure of the house to adopt that course, and then to recommit the bill and the amendment of the gentleman from Jessamine, as indicated by the gentleman from Daviess, I am ready to acquiesce, and as I have no doubt, are the other members of the committee on the court of appeals. I have at least satisfied myself that if we desire to give to the country an increased confidence in our judiciary department, the number of judges upon the appellate bench ought to be increased to four, though not beyond that number. That number was not agreed to by myself without reflection or examination. Before I came here to discharge the duties assigned me, I had conversed with gentlemen who had not only practiced in that court, but with those who had served as judges there, and their opinion is in accordance with my own, that there ought to be on that bench, an additional judge. I speak not of the present incumbents of the appellate bench, for I did not feel authorized to enquire of them, as I did not know that they would feel authorized to give me their opinion. I appeal also to the president, if he has not heard it demanded from every quarter within the last seven or eight years? I do not design at this time to enter in any lengthened discussion as to the propriety of having this additional judge, but I, as well as the committee with whom I act, prefer that we shall not meet the other committees, with the vote of the house declaring the opinion that the bill should be so constituted as to compose the court of three judges. We think the committee ought to be left as free to act as the other committees would be. If it is the pleasure of the house to reconsider the vote, I trust it will be done to-day, and then if the course indicated by the gentleman from Daviess be adopted, if no good results from it, at least there will be no harm, beyond perhaps the loss of a little time spent in trying to do good. The house can then proceed to the consideration of the reports from other committees. With a view of testing the sense of the house, I move to suspend the rule.

Mr. HARDIN. I am anxious that these three committees should get together, and in a spirit of conciliation, see if they cannot devise some general, harmonious decision, which will meet the concurrence of the house. But I would enquire if it is not just as well to refer this matter back without reconsideration, as with it? It will at least save time. I have looked forward to the action of the convention, on the circuit court bill, with a good deal of fear and trembling, in view of the labors which will be imposed upon them. They have already been so arduous as nearly to break down some of the members of the committee. I hope the motion to recommit, as indicated by the gentleman from Daviess, will be agreed to, and that the result will be the most harmonious action. I only regret that the gentleman from Washington (Mr. Kelly) has withdrawn his amendment, for it met my views exactly.

Mr. KELLY. It will come up again.

Mr. IRWIN. I am as anxious to get through as any gentleman here, but I am disposed to see a vote taken on the proposition of the gentleman from Jessamine, and then the house may determine which of the plans is really the best.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If there is any objection to dispensing with the rule, the desired result cannot be attained. If the gentleman objects, I will withdraw the motion.

Mr. IRWIN. I was merely going to move the previous question, so as to enable the convention to come to a direct vote on the proposition of the gentleman from Jessamine.

Mr. W. C. MARSHALL. I understand the motion of the gentleman from Nelson to be, to dispense with the rule with a view of testing the sense of the convention on the question of the four judges, as decided yesterday. I am anxious that this course should be adopted, for the reason that I believe it will tend greatly to expedite business. There is a fitness in these reports from the several judiciary committees, and in my opinion, there should have been originally but one judiciary committee, who should have had the supervision of all the courts. But the same thing will be effected by the adoption of the proposition to require the three committees to act together. And I am satisfied, that if the house has any confidence in those committees, the results of their united action will have great weight in the house, and business be greatly progressed thereby. Without something of this kind is done, I am satisfied we shall remain here until June. I hope, therefore, that the rule will be suspended, and the vote taken at once on the motion to reconsider. If the house reiterates its preference for three judges instead of four, as I hope they will, it will act as a guide to the committees in the framing of their bill.

Mr. BROWN. I trust the house will dispense with the rule. The committee on the court of appeals have bestowed great labor on their bill, and with the exception perhaps of the proposition to branch the court, and to have four judges, it is as perfect as it can be made. I have no doubt that if the bill is referred as indicated, the result will be such as to meet the approbation of the house. I voted to strike out the four judges, not that I had any particular objection to that number, but because I was opposed to the adoption of the branching principle in the constitution. I am willing to leave it to the discretion of the legislature.

The question was then taken on the motion to dispense with the rule, and it was agreed to.

Mr. TURNER. I should like to define my position. I am utterly opposed to branching the court, but I am willing to go for the four judges, and think we ought to have four. I shall vote for the reconsideration, with a view of offering a proposition which I think we had better compromise upon. It is to fill up the blank with four judges, one to be elected by the state at large, to be styled the chief justice of Kentucky—the state to be divided into three districts, in each of which one assistant appellate judge should be elected, and the court not to be branched. I am willing to go for a proposition embracing that principle, and with that view I shall vote for the motion to reconsider.

The convention having dispensed with the rule referred to, the question was taken on the motion to reconsider the vote striking out the four judges, by ayes and nays on the call of Mr. Hargis, and it was agreed to—ayes 49, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Archibald Dixon, Chastain T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian B. Grey, James P. Hamilton, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, George W. Johnston, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Richard L. Mayes, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, James M. Nesbitt, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spaulding, James W. Stone, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, Phillip Triplett, Squire Turner, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe—49.

NAYS—John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, William C. Bullitt, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Thomas J. Gough, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, Vincent S. Hay, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Wm. Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Nathan McClure, Hugh Newell, Johnson Price, Thomas Rockhold, John W. Stevenson, Mich'l L. Stoner, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, John L. Waller, Henry Washington, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Silas Woodson—43.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. In accordance with the intimation of the gentleman from Daviess, I move to discharge the committee of the whole from the consideration of the two bills in relation to the circuit and county courts, and to refer them, together with the bill now under consideration, to the three committees to sit in joint session. I am very much in hopes, that by the adoption of this course, we may facilitate the harmonious and speedy action of this body upon these important branches of the constitution.

The motion was agreed to, and it was Ordered, That the committee of the whole be discharged from the further consideration of the report of the committee on circuit courts and the report of the committee on county courts, and that said reports, together with the report of the committee on the court of appeals, be referred to the standing committees on the court of appeals, circuit courts, and county courts to act in conjunction.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL then asked and obtained consent of the house to withdraw his substitute.

Mr. KELLY desired to offer his amendment as a resolution of instruction to the joint committee, but it was ruled out of order at this time.

Mr. CHAMBERS. If I knew how to get at it, in order, I should like to test the sense of the convention upon branching the court of appeals and upon the number of judges for that tribunal. These are the two subjects of difficulty; and to obviate them, we have just agreed upon a joint or consolidated committee, to be composed of the three committees upon the appellate, circuit, and county courts.

Now, this is just the committee that should have had the whole subject of the judiciary, from the first; but I am unwilling, after we have spent some three weeks on the report of the court of appeals, and have given an expression of the sense of the convention upon one of these subjects which does not agree with the report, to have the subject referred to this joint committee without instructions. Every member on this floor has the same right to be heard that any one of this joint committee has, and when once we know how many judges we are to make, and whether this court is to be made ambulatory, all difficulty is at an end. I shall, therefore, in the proper time, move to instruct the committee; for, if we do not, we shall have to fight the whole bill over again both in committee and in convention.

It does not seem to me right, that when a favorite measure of the committees on the court of appeals has met with a rebuff in the house, its friends should be permitted to call to its aid the assistance of two other committees, and thus strengthened impose it upon us for a second consideration. In such case instructions to the committee are proper.

The question is, shall the convention instruct the committees, or shall it be instructed by them? I had supposed that we were the people's agents, and instructed by them—and that these committees were our agents, and to be instructed by us.

Mr. TRIPLETT. The very object of recommitting these reports to committees in joint session, was to get clear of the identical thing the gentleman proposes. Let the committee get together and then report to the house, and their decision will have force and weight with the house.

Mr. CHAMBERS. I desire that the committee should have the instructions of the house, and will make my motion with that view.

The PRESIDENT ruled the motion out of order, as the time for receiving motions and resolutions had passed.

Mr. THOMPSON had a proposition which he desired to have referred to the joint committee, and with a view of attaining that object he moved to suspend the rule.

The motion was not agreed to.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. BOYD in the chair.

PREAMBLE, AND DEPARTMENTS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

On the motion of Mr. McHENRY the committee proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on Miscellaneous Provisions, on the preamble to the constitution, and the distribution of the powers of the government.

It was read as follows:

PREAMBLE.

We, the representatives of the people of the State of Kentucky, in convention assembled, to secure to all the citizens thereof the enjoyment of the rights of life, liberty, and property, and of pursuing happiness, do ordain and establish this constitution for its government.

ARTICLE 1.

Concerning the distribution of the powers of the government.

SEC. 1. The powers of the government of the State of Kentucky shall be divided into three distinct departments, and each of them be confided to a separate body of magistracy, to-wit: those which are legislative to one; those which are executive to another, and those which are judiciary to another.

SEC. 2. No person, or collection of persons, being of one of those departments, shall exercise any power properly belonging to either of the others, except in the instances hereinafter expressly directed or permitted.

The preamble and first and second sections were separately read and adopted.

It was then laid aside to be reported to the house.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT OFFICERS.

On the motion of Mr. TURNER, the committee next took up the report on the executive and ministerial officers for counties and districts.

The first section was read as follows:

"SEC. 1. There shall be elected a commonwealth attorney for each circuit, and a circuit court clerk for each county, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the circuit judges; a county court attorney, clerk, surveyor, coroner, and jailer for each county, whose term of office shall be the same as that of the presiding judge of the county court."

Mr. WOODSON. I move to amend that section, by striking out the words "county court attorney." In a great many counties in the state, there is no county attorney at all, and although it may be thought necessary for the despatch of business that there should be, yet in many cases the material is not to be found, out of which to make them; and to require the county courts to appoint such officers would be neither more nor less than burthening the county, with the payment of salaries to persons not properly qualified to discharge the duties devolving upon them. If it were left discretionary with the county courts to appoint them or not, I should have no objection, but to make it imperative would be improper. The courts are to be differently organized from the present mode, if the proposition now before us should be carried into effect. We are to have judges, we are told, who will thoroughly understand the law, and be capable of discharging the duties of their station, without the counsel or advice of an attorney. I think there is no necessity for these officers. It is creating an office hitherto unknown, and which will in many counties of the state be used as an engine, and a powerful one, in the elections. For these reasons I am for striking it out.

Mr. GHOLSON. It appears to me, sir, from the reading of the report, that the subjects embraced in it come properly within the scope of the duties of the committee to whom the reports on the court of appeals, and the circuit, and county courts, have already been referred.

The same matters, it will be perceived, are included in the report that have been referred to that committee, and by way of harmonizing the decision, it seems to me this had better go to that committee also.

Mr. TURNER. I have no great choice in this matter; but the subjects referred to this joint committee, relating to the various courts, are not all embraced in the report that is now under consideration. At the commencement of the session the labors of the convention were divided amongst ten committees, and the subject matter embraced in this report was referred to one of these committees; and unless we set aside the order of business, thus agreed upon, we must take up this report and consider it separately. I know and I have already suggested it once or twice, that much of the matter which is contained in this report, has relation to those matters that were considered by other committees; but unless we add the committee that made this report, to the combined committees to which we have just referred the reports relating to the various courts—and that would be, to have about half the convention on one committee—it is essential that we should proceed with the consideration of this report in committee of the whole. I think the motion of the gentleman from Knox should not prevail. There may be a few counties in the state where they do not employ a county attorney, but still an attorney is necessary to attend to the duties of that office in the county court particularly, to act in behalf of the commonwealth if anything should come before that court, of a public nature. For instance, in the matter of opening roads. That is a thing which strikes vitally at the interest of the public. And in such case, where a whole neighborhood is interested on one side, it becomes important that there should be an officer whose special duty it shall be to attend to the interests of the county. There is a class of cases also touching directly the public morals, which are brought up for trial in the county court. Such cases require a public officer, whose duty it shall be to see that the law against offences to which I have alluded, shall be carried into execution. In criminal cases that come before the county court, nine tenths of them do not originate with the grand jury. The individual committing an offence is first arrested and brought before a magistrate. If there are no proceedings instituted immediately, the individual in many instances gets beyond the law. And if there be no officer on behalf of the commonwealth, and there should be an error in the warrant when the trial comes up, a technical objection is made, the proceedings are quashed, and the individual is placed beyond the reach of the law. It is essential also to have a prosecuting attorney to examine witnesses; it is as important to have an attorney for such purpose in commonwealth cases, as in cases between individuals. With the salaries which we give both to county and circuit attorneys, we are seldom able to command the same legal attainments and talents, as will be found in the lawyer upon the opposite side. But without having any prosecuting attorney at all—in many instances the offender against the laws will be turned loose to prey upon society, without any person taking the initiatory steps to have him brought to justice.

There cannot be much injury arising from the appointment of this officer, as suggested by the gentleman from Knox, for this reason, that the salaries of the county attorneys are to be regulated by the electors of the country, and if there should be little or no service to be rendered, of course the salaries will be small, they will be proportioned to the service. I think that an officer ought to be appointed in every county of the state, and my colleague says that the old constitution either directly provided for the appointment of such officers, or recognized that as being proper and necessary.

Mr. BARLOW. I concur in the opinion of the gentleman from Ballard, as to the propriety of referring this report to the three committees to whom were referred the reports in relation to the various courts. I think it is a subject that is immediately connected with that which those committees have before them. I therefore move that it be passed by, to be reported to the house when this committee rises, with the view of having it referred to the committees on the subject of the courts.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I hope my friend will not persist in the motion to refer this motion also, to the three committees. It is said that it is the last furrow that breaks the horse's back. I think those three committees have as much as they can do, and if the gentleman will refer it to some other committee, it will be as well.

Mr. DIXON. Do I understand the gentleman as proposing to refer the whole of the report to the three committees, or only so much as relates to the commonwealth attorney.

Mr. BARLOW. I mean that portion of the report that is connected with the judiciary department.

Mr. DIXON. I believe it is all connected with that department. If the whole report is to be referred to that committee, perhaps we had better abolish the committee on ministerial and executive offices altogether. It takes every thing from that committee that appropriately belongs to it. I do not think that the committee ought to be deprived of its own work. I do not know if the motion is strictly in order. I am not at all satisfied that it is in order, to take any portion of the report, and to refer it to another committee, leaving the balance here. I have great doubts about it. I think we had better let the matter remain where it is.

The CHAIRMAN. It would be unprecedented, in my opinion, to refer it to another committee.

Mr. DIXON. I think myself, it would be wholly unprecedented, but still let the fault rest where it belongs. I merely make the suggestion.

Mr. CLARKE. I submit if it would not be well enough for the house to indicate by vote, or in some other way, the change that they desire should be made in the report. If this report should be referred now, to the three committees, or if it should be returned to the committee which reported it, they would have no means of determining, or of ascertaining the sense of the house, in regard to any action to be taken by the committee. They would not be advised whether it was the sense of the convention that there should be a county attorney or not. I apprehend that the better plan would be, to take some question in committee of the whole, upon the proposition submitted in this report upon a motion to strike out, or some other motion, and that, if it be necessary to refer it back, will enable the committee to make such change in the form of the report as will be conformable to the opinion of the convention.

Mr. BARLOW. I am by no means particular about the form of proceeding. I heard an intimation from gentlemen in different parts of the house, and a reason given why it was necessary to commit this report to the same committee to whom had been referred the reports in relation to the different courts, was that the subject might be made to harmonize, inasmuch as they were intimately connected.

Mr. BROWN. I consider that there would be no propriety at all, in referring this report to the joint committee on the court of appeals, the circuit court, and the county court. There would however, be some propriety in referring it to the committee on the circuit courts. For I find in those two reports, that provision has been made for the same class of officers, the same qualifications are required, the same duties, and the same mode of election are prescribed. I think it would be proper to refer back the report to the committee who made it, including the committee on the circuit courts.

UK LAW LIBRARY

I therefore move that the committee rise, with the view of so referring this report.

The PRESIDENT. I think we had better pass upon some principle and ascertain the sentiment of the convention, in relation to the election of these various officers, and how many we are to have, and after we have determined those points, we may refer the subject to a committee that they may put the whole in a connected form. But as to referring it now, without first obtaining the sentiments of the convention upon the subject, and determining what is to be done with it, I think it would be a loss of time. It seems to me, it would be throwing upon the committee a duty which we ought to discharge ourselves. I am against the committee rising, and reporting to the house, with the view of referring the subject to a committee.

Mr. TURNER. It appeared to me when the committee that made this report was formed, that it was not very essential except for the purpose of dividing the labors of the convention among its various members. I therefore feel no particular pride in having advocated the formation of this committee, or of assisting in its labors, but I should consider it an injustice to other members of the committee, if their labors were to be referred to another committee, without adding the committee also. Taking the fruits of their labor and placing them before these three committees, without adding the committee as a fourth, would be like treating them as ministerial sure enough, and the others as judges to try them. And that would be the effect of the motion of the gentleman from Hardin. I admit that the committees which made the various reports that were referred back this morning, are in many respects more important committees than this, still the officers here provided for are essential to the commonwealth, and there is a committee to which this particular branch of duty has been assigned; and they have reported the result of their labors. I think as a matter of course, we ought to consider this report. It is true the committees on the various courts have assumed to report upon matters which did not properly belong to them, and upon which they had no power given them to report, and I will say another thing; I do not believe the suggestions they have made as regards the same officers are equal, certainly not superior to those contained in this report. I believe in point of principle, and in every other point of view, that the report under consideration is superior to the reports that have been made on the same subject by other committees. I am therefore opposed to the motion to rise and refer this subject to the three committees.

Mr. NUTTALL. I doubt the propriety of the committee rising. This matter is before us in a tangible shape, and I think it would be economy, of time at least, to act upon the report as it is, without any further reference to a committee. The county attorney, or attorney for the county court, seems to be cutting a figure in this report, and notwithstanding the objections of some of the delegates on this floor, I look upon him as an important officer in this country. He is an officer who is to supervise, to a very considerable extent, the morals of the county. It will be incumbent that all offenders shall be brought before the proper officers for trial. In the county where I live—though I do not know how it is elsewhere—we look upon the office of county attorney as something like a stepping-stone for young men who are entering upon the profession of law, and we liberally reward him. Our county gives two hundred dollars annually to the county attorney; he receives it whether he renders twenty-five dollars worth of service or not. We never enquire into the fact. We look upon him as an officer who is necessary to the well-being of the county; but we look more especially upon this office, as a stepping-stone for young men, affording them a means of learning special pleading. Many lawyers are made out of poor men's sons; and it appears to me to be proper to hold out to them some degree of encouragement and assistance; I care not whether it be by voluntary contribution or by tax, so that they get it.

I am opposed to striking out the words, "county court attorney." It can do no harm to allow it to stand. This report, I think, is about as well written as any that has been presented to this house, and we have now got a committee of thirty gentlemen, to consider some three or four of the most complicated questions, and the Lord Almighty knows when they get tangled up together what will become of the subjects that have been referred to them. I was averse to the proposition for making that reference, but I am so often wrong that I thought I would vote with the majority once, and I am now going one step further, and am willing to add another ten to the committee, and let this subject be referred to the committee of forty; then we will select one other subject, and add ten more to the committee, and let them make a constitution, and when it comes in I pledge my honor to vote for any thing they propose.

Mr. RUDD. I think that an opinion ought to be expressed by the committee of the whole, upon the different propositions contained in this report, before we resolve to throw it upon a committee that already consists of thirty members. If the committee that made this report be added it will be equally objectionable; there will be a difference of three to one. I like to vote upon equal terms. I am certain that the joint committees do not wish to be encumbered with any further business than has already been referred to them. They are charged with the regulation of the three courts, and they have as much as they can get through with, without having this subject added. If they act harmoniously and report back a bill upon the subjects already referred to them, that will be acceptable to the convention, they will have done all that we ought to expect them to do; and they will be entitled to the thanks of this convention. You might as well refer the whole business of the convention to these thirty men. I hope the committee will not rise, but that we will go on with the consideration of the report, and finish the business that we have before us.

Mr. GHOLSON. I was very unfortunate in my suggestion. It was made to cut off the very thing I see it has produced—that is debate. I suppose that when the constitution is formed we do not intend to provide for one thing in two places in that instrument.

My object is to get along with the business for which we came here, and I have urged gentlemen to vote more, and talk less. I think we are spending much time uselessly, and if gentlemen will proceed to vote upon the propositions now before them, I will agree not to make a speech for the next three weeks.

Mr. NESBITT. I find by reading the twenty third section of the third article of the constitution, these words:

"An attorney general and such other attorneys, for the commonwealth as may be necessary, shall be appointed whose duty shall be regulated by law. Attorneys for the commonwealth for the several counties shall be appointed by the respective courts, having jurisdiction therein."

I think it is possible that the gentleman from Knox may be mistaken in supposing that there is any county that has no county attorney. The language of the constitution is imperative upon the county court, and they have carried it into effect.

Mr. WOODSON. I would ask the gentleman if "attorney for the commonwealth" there, includes attorneys for counties?

Mr. NESBITT. I presume they are included.

Mr. WOODSON. It is not so in the region of country where I live. That section of the constitution has never been so interpreted or understood, and in various counties they have no attorneys.

Mr. NESBITT. However to obviate the difficulty of the gentleman from Knox I would propose that these officers shall be elected, and that no qualification should be required, and I am of opinion that we would save time by taking up this report, and obtain the sense of the committee upon it. I agree with the gentleman from Jefferson, that by the time these three committees, acting conjointly, get a report prepared and presented to the convention, they will have done as much as they are able to do. If every thing is to be referred to this joint committee, it would be better to add every member of the house to it, and begin over again and take up the old constitution, section by section. I was for that at the start. If every thing is to be referred to this committee of thirty, it ought, I think, to be increased to a hundred.

The question being taken on the motion that the committee rise, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not understand, as the gentleman who was last up, that the office of county attorney as it now exists in our county courts, is a constitutional office. I apprehend that the attorney of the commonwealth for the county referred to in the existing constitution, discharged his duties at the quarter-session courts; but as the county courts are at present organized, being deprived of original common law jurisdiction, I apprehend that the county attorney is merely a lawyer employed by the court, and is not a constitutional office. The creation of such an officer, to act upon the part of the commonwealth, is of very questionable utility, and I would not like to see inserted in the constitution, an imperative provision for his appointment. The duty of the county attorney is merely advisory. It is very rarely that any duty devolves on him as a practicing attorney. I look upon the office as almost a sinecure. Before the jury law was passed—it is true—it was appropriately made the duty of the county attorney to attend to prosecutions for breaches of the peace occurring in his county, because the fines went to lessen the county levy; but since the passage of that law, those fines are a part of the jury fund, and that duty should be diverted from him, as a matter belonging rather to the state at large than the county. This would make the duties of the office merely advisory. It is proposed now to change the county court system entirely, to elect a county judge, and the individual chosen to fill that office, it is reasonable to suppose, will be so far learned in the law, as not to need the advice of a county attorney. Under all the circumstances, I think it will be the best to strike out.

Mr. CLARKE. I am not very much wedded to the retention of the provision for the appointment of the county attorney in the constitution, and I have thought that I would submit a compromise to the gentleman from Knox and Harlan. There may be some counties in which county attorneys may be necessary; and I submit whether it will not be best not to make it imperative—as this bill does—upon every county court to appoint a county attorney; but leave it discretionary with the court, by substituting the word "may" for the word "shall." There are counties where such an officer may not be necessary; and I would leave it to the judges to determine whether one should be appointed or not. They would very rarely, I think, employ a county attorney, and thus increase the taxation. They would employ them only when absolutely necessary, and the appointment would be approved by the people. I am in favor of allowing the court a discretionary power, and if my friend from Knox and Harlan will so modify his proposition, I will vote for it.

Mr. MAYES. As it is not a matter of very great moment—if the gentleman from Knox will permit me—in order to meet the views of the gentleman from Simpson, I will move, by way of amendment to his proposition, to strike out the words "county court attorney," and insert the following: "the county court may appoint a county attorney, whose duty shall be regulated by law."

Mr. WOODSON. I accept the amendment.

Mr. MAYES. I do not think it should be imperative on the county court to appoint a county attorney; it should be left discretionary with the court to appoint or not, as they shall think the business and interests of the county require.

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not see any necessity for the appointment of a county attorney; but if we are to have that description of officer—as the principle has been settled I believe that we intend to elect all other officers—I hope that this officer will also be elected by the people, and that his duties will be specified in the constitution, because in some counties in the state under the existing state of things, there are doubts as to what the duties are. In some counties where the duties are not defined, the county attorney has prostituted his office for sinister motives. I am not anxious that the appointment of this class of officers should be provided for, but if it be, it is better that they should be required to prosecute, in all cases in which the commonwealth is interested within the counties in which they reside. It is a very difficult matter sometimes for the commonwealth attorney to carry through a prosecution successfully—not being a resident of the county, and not being cognizant of the facts attending a case that may arise; hence, if a county attorney be appointed at all, he should be required to prosecute in all cases in which the commonwealth is interested, whether civil or criminal.

And as we are about to adopt the principle of making all other officers elective, I hold that the county attorney should also be elected by the people.

Mr. TURNER. In the aspect in which the question is now presented, I have no great solicitude whether it prevail or not. There was nearly an equal division in the committee upon the question whether this officer should be elected, or appointed by the court. I voted in committee in favor of the appointment by the court. There were two or three small officers, that really appeared to me, too unimportant to trouble the people about.

Mr. CLARKE. If it be in order now, I will move to amend the first section, in the third line, by striking out "county court attorney," and at the end of the section insert the following: "that the qualified voters of the different counties in the state may elect a county attorney, who shall hold his office for the same time as the presiding judge of the county court, whose duties shall be prescribed by law."

Mr. WOODSON. There is no one who would go further for the elective principle in every department of the government, than myself. My object is to give to the people as much power as possible—as far as the election of all officers is concerned—and if I shall ascertain that the constituents whom I represent here, are in favor of electing county attorneys, I shall vote to give them the power to elect them. My impression is, that neither of the counties I represent is in favor of having a county attorney at all.

In the county of Knox there has not been a county attorney for fifteen years, and perhaps they may not choose to have one for the next twenty years. I want the county courts to have it left to their discretion whether they will have an attorney or not, and I am willing to accept the amendment of my friend from Simpson, if he will insert, "that a majority of the qualified voters of the county may elect an attorney if they think proper."

Mr. CLARKE. I will put the amendment in that shape.

Mr. MAYES. I believe that my amendment was accepted by the gentleman. I regard this as an important question. From the reading of the proposition of the gentleman from Simpson, I do not know how the people are to determine that they will elect a county attorney. The court may very easily determine; but if left to the people, they will first be obliged to take the question whether they will have an attorney. I would greatly prefer to have the amendment which I proposed acted upon and adopted or rejected. If rejected, then I would propose to strike out the words "county court attorney," and leave to the legislature, according to the twelfth section of the report of the committee on executive and ministerial officers, for counties and districts, to provide for the appointment of such officers as may, from time to time, be deemed necessary and proper.

Mr. CLARKE. I would like to test the question whether the county attorneys shall be elected or appointed by the court.

Mr. WOODSON. The motion which I made was simply to strike out the words "county court attorney," and my object was to prevent making it the imperative duty of the county court to appoint, in each county, an attorney. If those words are stricken out, I am willing that the committee shall substitute any provision they may think proper, provided it does not impose upon the court the duty of appointing such officers.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have no particular objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Knox, but I hold that the county court attorney is an officer that should be elected by the people. Hence I will vote against any proposition that will give the appointment to the county court. If elected by the people, he will be responsible to them, for the proper discharge of the duties of his office.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise merely to suggest a modification of the amendment, which will obviate all difficulty on the subject. It is, "that the general assembly shall authorize the election of county attorneys, in such counties as may request it."

Mr. CLARKE. I accept it.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. I do not agree with the gentleman from Knox (Mr. Woodson) as to his view of the necessity of county attorneys. We have commonwealth attorneys in every district, and I wish to call the attention of this committee to their duties. It is their duty, in the first instance, to take up and prosecute cases in the circuit court, where an offence has been committed against the peace of society and the public safety. When any felony has been committed, the commonwealth attorney of the district has nothing to do with it, until it comes up into the circuit court. In every county there are courts of enquiry established, in order, after a felony has been committed, to guard against the escape of the offender before he has been returned to the circuit court. Now, unless it be provided by law that every county in the state shall have a county attorney, the most outrageous felonies may be committed, and as the county has no representative in the court of enquiry, the individual would escape. Therefore, there are strong reasons why we should have a county attorney. Again, in every county in the state, there are laws operating which relate to the state revenue, in regard to tavern licences, and to peddling clocks, watches, and other goods, which it is the duty of the county attorney to enforce. In such cases the whole state is interested. There are cases in which the county attorney is to protect the rights of the state, and it is important, therefore, that each county should have a practicing attorney. As to leaving it to the counties to decide whether they will have these officers or not, it will be unwise, inasmuch as the people or the courts could never decide in advance when the necessity for the officer would arise.

Mr. MAYES. The difficulty in my mind in relation to the election of the attorney, arises from the fact that the people could not determine whether they would have the county attorney or not, until they had had a special election for the purpose. It is a matter, therefore, which should be left to the county court to determine. It is impossible for any county to say whether the services of such an officer would or would not be required in advance. It is essential that in every case of felony the state should have a representative to act on the subject, in the person of the county attorney. Besides, in regard to county matters, it is his duty to see that the sheriff pays over the revenue, and to prosecute motions to recover it; and it is impossible for any county in advance to say whether or not he would be required to exercise these duties. I go, therefore, for requiring every county to have such an officer, and for his election by the people. We are electing all the other officers in the state, and we may as well elect him. If there were any officers, in regard to whom there are stronger reasons against their election than others, it seems to me they are the practicing attorneys, whether of the districts or the counties. I shall vote for their election by the people, however, as I do not consider the reasons against it to be sufficiently strong to induce me to pursue a contrary course.

Mr. CLARKE. As I am determined to vote for the section as it stands, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. G. W. JOHNSTON. I regret that the motion made some time since that the committee rise, did not prevail, as I desire to get clear of this report for the present. I think we are acting hastily in providing for officers, before we have created the offices they are to fill. This report provides for the election of a county attorney, and county court clerks, and if we go on in this way, we shall either have to undo what we are doing now, or the committee upon the courts will have to make their reports conform to our action to-day. Suppose we vote now for the election of county court clerks, and the convention should provide for a probate court having testamentary jurisdiction in each county, and a commissioner's court, what would we be obliged to do? Why, to reverse our previous action, and make provision for the appointment of the clerks of such courts. It is provided in this report that a judge and sheriff shall be elected, and at the same time the associate justices are elected. I believe, on the motion of the gentleman from Madison, associate justices have been stricken out of the report. This report should either go back to the committee or lie on the table until we have advanced a little further, and created some offices to be filled, before we provide for the appointment of the officers. I do not desire that we shall be obliged hereafter to go back and undo what we have done to-day. Therefore, if it is in order, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the convention, there to be either referred back to the committee, or to lie on the table. We can then take up some of the reports from other committees—the proposition for instance of the select committee in regard to the establishment of new counties—on which our action will not require to be undone, and time lost.

Mr. McHENRY. The gentleman can obtain his object by moving to pass over this report.

Mr. G. W. JOHNSTON. I make that motion then, and also to take up the report on the subject of new counties.

Mr. TURNER. I am satisfied myself from the experience we have had during the session, of the results of the practice of requiring every thing to be discussed in committee of the whole, that the best course is to consider these matters at once in the convention. I suggest, however, that we take the vote first on the proposition, whether we shall have a county court or not. And then we may rise and report, and have the subject in the convention, where these protracted discussions may be cut off by the previous question.

Mr. G. W. JOHNSTON. I am disposed to accommodate, and will withdraw the motion.

The question was then taken on striking out the words "county attorney," and the motion was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. It seems to me that if this convention means to do anything, it ought, when it takes up the report of any committee, to settle for itself its leading features and principles. For instance, as regards the institution of the office of county attorney, the committee ought at once to make known whether it proposes to have such an office. In relation to the matters which were referred to the grand confederated committee this morning—one question being, whether there shall be four or three judges, and another whether the court shall be branched or not—all these and similar questions should be decided by the convention, for itself. They should not be referred to any individual or associated committees for their decision, that they may come in and instruct the convention. Are we to do any thing, or get away from here at all? If so, some method of proceeding must be adopted, and the best in my judgment, is to take up these reports seriatim, either in the house, or in the committee of the whole, and at once decide what shall be done, without waiting the opinion of any committee. When a report is thus acted upon, the convention knows at once its settled opinion and decision in relation to all its principal features. It makes no difference how, but it ought to be done in some mode. This report under consideration, should be taken up and read by sections, either in committee of the whole, or in the house—and probably that would be best, as then a stop could be put to this eternal talking, and the convention brought to a vote—and then decide upon its features. The objection of the gentleman from Shelby (Mr. G. W. Johnston) was more specious than solid. He says if we decide now, in regard to these officers, it will be perhaps before this confederated committee has decided whether the offices shall be established or not. But the decision of this question here, will decide this point for them, and on this or any other proposition it would be the proper course to pursue. But all I desire is that we shall get to work in some form or other. Let us do something. Let the convention decide upon the great principles and features of the constitution for itself, and then let it be referred if necessary, to sub committees to frame and put in form.

Mr. MAYES said that as the convention had refused to strike out, he would withdraw the balance of his amendment, proposing to insert.

Mr. CHRISMAN moved to strike out the words "coroner and jailor." This would leave it to the legislature to provide for the appointment of these officers as they might deem necessary and expedient.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. LINDSEY moved to amend the first section by adding the following words: "whenever the county court of any county deem it to the interest of their county to dispense with the office of county attorney, they shall, at their court next preceding a regular election for the county, make an order discontinuing the office, and at any time thereafter, at a court next before a regular election, the county court may, by an order, restore the office; and the duties of said officer shall be regulated by law."

Mr. TURNER. This is about the same motion the gentleman from Knox made. Every county is intested in having those persons who violate the laws punished, and if they do not have the proper prosecuting attorney to prosecute them, they will escape into other counties. If you intend to punish crime at all, you should begin at its very incipient stages, otherwise, from a commencement with small violations of the moral law, the individual, if unchecked, soon becomes hardened and scruples not at the commission of greater and more heinous offenses. A prosecuting officer is therefore necessary in each county, to see that these lesser crimes and misdemeanors are at once punished. And it is an office, which, for the common safety of the state, every county should be required to possess, otherwise the duty might be thrown upon only a few counties who might desire his appointment. The absence of them in the border counties would also be an inducement for offenders to come in from other states to commit their depredations. The old constitution required that there should be a county attorney in each county, and yet I understand there are some counties which have no such officers. Let us however do our duty, and provide for these officers, and if the counties do not carry out the provisions of the constitution, the blame is with them, and not with us.

Mr. HARGIS. The only difficulty I can see in this matter is, that in some counties there is no man whom the court can appoint. If this should be the case, and it is made an imperative duty to provide for such an officer, what will be the situation of the court? They could not comply with the law. I prefer to leave the matter optionable with the court. As to its election by the people, it is a little trifling office, of no account, and the people care but little about it. Nor do they care about electing the coroner, jailor, and other little petty officers. They will have enough to do in the election of the judiciary, and other important officers.

Mr. LINDSEY'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. APPERSON moved to strike out the words "county court" before the word "attorney." Otherwise the section might be understood as referring to a county court attorney, county court surveyor, &c.

Mr. TURNER agreed to the amendment as right and proper, and

The section was so amended.

Mr. BRISTOW suggested that there was nothing in the report which provided how these officers were to be appointed. The term elected was used, but he preferred to have the words added "by the qualified voters."

Mr. TURNER explained, that they were to be elected as the bill stated, in the same manner as the circuit judges, &c. The object was to keep the constitution as free from verbiage as possible.

The first section was then adopted.

The second section was then read:

"No person shall be eligible to the offices mentioned in this article who is not at the time twenty four years old, a citizen of the United States, and who has not resided two years next preceding the election in the state, and one year in the county or district which he offers his services. No person shall be eligible to the office of commonwealth or county attorney, unless he shall have been a licensed practicing attorney for two years; no person shall be elected clerk unless he shall have procured from the court of appeals a certificate that he has been examined by their clerk under their supervision, and that he is qualified for the office for which he is a candidate; but the office of sheriff or constable may be filled by persons who have attained the age of twenty one years."

Mr. CLARKE. I move to amend the second section, by striking out the words "no person shall be elected clerk unless he shall have procured from the court of appeals a certificate that he has been examined by their clerk under their supervision, and that he is qualified for the office for which he is a candidate;" but,

When the report of the committee on the court of appeals was under consideration, I took occasion to assign some reasons why I thought no certificate should be required from a candidate for the office of clerk of the court of appeals. I heard no argument which satisfied me that I was not right. I will not now detain the committee. I am willing the vote should now be taken.

Mr. GHOLSON. I had the honor to introduce a resolution covering that point as well as some others, and I suppose this motion will test the matter which I had in view. I want to know how many honorable gentlemen are in favor of laying a tariff of from five to one hundred and fifty dollars, to operate upon all applicants for the office of clerk. It has been shown that a certificate is no protection to the people, and is not even prima facie evidence of fitness. This provision can have no other effect than to operate as a tariff for the protection of those who now have certificates, and it is imposing unjust restrictions upon those who shall be candidates. It is making invidious distinctions in society. It is circumscribing the number from whom the people may choose, and is thus violating their freedom. At a proper time I shall call for the ayes and noes.

Mr. TURNER. We had this debated the other day, and I would ask that the remarks made by the gentlemen from Ohio, from Henderson, and from Louisville, be considered as answers to the gentleman from Ballard and McCracken, and the gentleman from Simpson. I hope that we shall not have a repetition of the debate on the principle involved in this question.

Mr. McHENRY moved to amend, by striking out the words "by their clerk," and inserting the words, "any two of the judges of the circuit courts."

Mr. KELLY. I believe in this case, the examination will be a mere farce. No length of service at the bar will make a competent clerk. I have been a clerk for fifteen years, and I think I can judge in respect to this matter. I have no idea that the certificate will be of any use to the people; they are as competent to judge of the fitness of a person for this office as the judges of the appellate and circuit courts, and therefore I am opposed to the restriction. I do not think the requisition that a clerk shall be twenty-four years old is necessary. I know young gentlemen fifteen years old, who are as well qualified as many of the clerks in this state, or the clerk of the court of appeals, though there is none better than he is. I know too, that the examination is not thorough. The duties of the clerk of the appellate court are not as extensive as those of the circuit court. On that account the bare certificate will be of little consequence. I hope the restriction will be stricken out.

Mr. TURNER. I have no anxiety whether the circuit judges are added or not. I said nothing when the bill was before the house. I know that in many instances when a candidate finds a difficulty in getting a certificate from one judge he will go to another who may be more ready to grant it. I think we had better confine this matter where it was in the old constitution. The appellate judges are not likely to be influenced by local matters in different parts of the state, for they will not be acquainted with the counties except those immediately around them. I do not say that the judges would give certificates from any improper motives, but I know there have been those who would give a certificate to any one who desired to practice law. If you want the certificate to amount to any thing, let us confine it to the judges of the court of appeals. I believe there is nothing more essential to preserve the great interests of this commonwealth than to have a competent clerk, and we should have every restriction which we can put upon it. Every man's life, reputation and property, and every thing else is occasionally in the power of these officers. And if there is any part of this constitution conservative, I want this part to be so particularly. I have said, and I repeat again, that the requisition of this certificate, instead of giving the prospect of wealth to the sons of those who are already wealthy, it will secure it to those who are in lower circumstances as to wealth. It will go to the sons of the yeomanry of the country. At an early day, in this government, the sons of the wealthy performed this service, but now you cannot find half a dozen individuals in these offices whose fathers are wealthy, except in those cases where the father was a clerk. I say, therefore, it secures a better prospect to the great body of the community. I have frequently heard young men, who wanted a certificate as a lawyer, say "I'll not go to this judge, for he will ask me too many questions. He will take me through Coke; I'll go to another judge who will ask me but few questions, and sign my certificate directly." I want a judge to give an answer of the character that was given to me. I asked the judge, how long shall I have to read, and his reply was until you understand it. Now, I want a clerk to serve till he can answer all the hard questions that may be put to him. The report of the committee has not been acted on in the convention, and I intend that the circuit judges shall be struck out of that report.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. COFFEY, leave of absence, till Wednesday next, was granted to Mr. Ballinger.

The convention then adjourned.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. TAYLOR, leave of absence to Wednesday next, was granted to Mr. Proctor and Mr. Lashbrooke.

On the motion of Mr. FORREST, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Pollard to this day week.

PREAMBLE, AND DEPARTMENTS OF GOVERNMENT.

The first business was announced to be, the question of concurrence in the report of the committee of the whole, on the Preamble, and Article I, concerning the distribution of the powers of the government.

The convention concurred without a division.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT OFFICERS.

The convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. BOYD in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the executive and ministerial offices for counties and districts.

The pending question was on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. McHenry) to insert in the second section after the words "court of appeals" the words "or any circuit court judge of this commonwealth."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. McHENRY then withdrew another amendment which he indicated on Saturday, and which was connected with the amendment now rejected.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE moved to strike out the word "four," and insert "one," so that the section should read—"no person shall be eligible to the offices mentioned in this article who is not at the time twenty-one years old," &c.

Mr. TURNER. I think it should be shown that a man has fixed habits, and that those habits are known to the people, before he is entrusted with the records of the county which are preserved in these offices. At twenty-four, a man's habits are more likely to be fixed and known to the county in which he lives. I have been informed that in the state of Missouri important records have been lost, and the incumbent clerks disclaim all knowledge of them, for when there is a change of clerks the documents are not counted, and it is not therefore known who is responsible for the loss. I look upon the office of clerk as of more importance than the office of a member of the house of representatives, for in the latter case a representative has but a one hundredth part of the power of one branch of the legislature to do either good or evil, whereas the clerk has the sole care of the records, and the opportunity to alter them. The change of even a word in some of the records in the care of these clerks, might lose a man an estate, and hence no man should be elected to such an office, and thereby have such powers given to him, unless he is a man of discretion that will properly exercise the power entrusted to him.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The age of a clerk of the court of appeals has been fixed at twenty one years, as the age of responsibility. I will go as far as the gentleman from Madison—or as far as it is prudent to go—to fix a test of qualification, but when a man has attained the age of twenty one, which is the age of responsibility as a free agent, if he has other qualifications, I think the people ought to decide on his fitness in a moral point of view, and we should not debar those between the ages of twenty one and twenty four from the opportunity to compete with others for this office. The gentleman must know that a large portion of the business is often done in these offices by deputies under the age of twenty four, and I see not why this distinction should be made.

Mr. IRWIN. A few moments since the house rejected the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio and Hancock, which required the certificate to be signed by two of the judges of the circuit court. I think the house did not understand that motion, for surely we do not intend that there should be a restriction which does not exist in reference to the court of appeals. I hope some gentleman will move a reconsideration of that vote.

Mr. HARDIN. There has been some little disagreement between the reports of the committees of these two courts. In the committee on circuit courts of which I am chairman, we require the state's attorney to be twenty five years of age; but we provide that no person shall be elected clerk of the circuit court, unless he has attained the age of twenty one years. The age of twenty one, has always been considered the proper age in this state.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. WOODSON. I have an amendment to offer nearly similar to one which has been rejected. I propose to amend the section by inserting the words "or a circuit judge" after the words "court of appeals," so that no person shall be elected clerk unless he shall have procured from the court of appeals or a circuit judge a certificate of qualification. I prefer that no certificate should be required, but that the whole be left to the discretion of the people whose officer he is to be. But I think the certificate from one judge will be as safe a guarantee as that of two. I offer it now only that I may have the opportunity to call the ayes and noes upon it in the convention.

Mr. CHAMBERS. Experience is the best teacher. Under the present constitution it is required that a clerk shall have a certificate, showing that he has undergone an examination by the clerk of the court of appeals? And have not these offices been filled by men who were well qualified? If then this provision has worked so well, why should we depart from it? The requisition of a certificate will operate as a stimulus to a man to prepare himself as I know from experience. It will make a man look into the duties of the office and fit himself for them. I am opposed to letting down our offices, and throwing them wide open for all, whether qualified or not.

The PRESIDENT. I desire to retain the same qualifications for clerks that existed under the old constitution, which requires an examination by the clerk of the court of appeals and a certificate of a majority of the judges, that he has been examined and is qualified. This was a means of safety in reference to the qualifications. I do not like this departure from the old course. I am not satisfied that a majority of the judges of the circuit or county court, or even of the court of appeals, are qualified to determine the proper qualifications of a clerk. I know that although I have been a practicing lawyer a long time, and might be qualified to be a judge so far as the qualification of age is concerned, yet I know that I should not be qualified to judge of the fitness of a person for the office of clerk. There are but few clerks who would not make a better examination. I object to the examination of the judges alone, because they may not know the duties of the clerk, but the examination of the clerk in the presence of the judges, is a quasi judicial act which can be trusted. In that way we have had good clerks, except in those cases where they had their appointment pro tem.

Mr. ROGERS. It is said that we live in an age of improvement, that arts and sciences have advanced, and that some progress has been made in the science of government. In the organization of our government the principle was recognized that man is capable of self-government, and that the people are qualified to judge, with no restriction except as to age. They can elect a senator of the United States at thirty years of age, and a member of congress at twenty-five. And after fifty years experience, during which time, this has worked well, we have come up here and intend to carry the science of government a little further, by restoring to the hands of the people the right to elect those officers which have been heretofore appointed by the governor. But are we advancing? Not at all. Take the report of the committee, and you find that no man shall be a judge unless he is thirty years of age and has been a practicing lawyer for a certain time. I have no objection to that. What next do you find? You do not permit a clerk to be chosen unless he has a certificate from the court of appeals. We are advancing in the science of government, by fixing in the hands of the court of appeals the right to control the whole. This court of appeals in fact will nominate, and the people will but confirm the nomination, as the senate confirm the appointments of the governor. I do not want to vote for a man in this way, nor do the people that I represent want to do it. This kind of nomination by the court of appeals, I object to, and shall vote against it.

Mr. CLARKE. I am always inclined to distrust my judgment, when it comes in competition with that of older gentlemen on this floor; but I beg to institute a comparison between the amendment proposed by the committee, and the provision contained in the old constitution. I understand the president of this convention to say, that he prefers that provision to the one proposed in lieu of it. But the latter does not correspond with the former. Persons were appointed under the old constitution, and held their offices for months and years without any certificate from the judges of the court of appeals. I know instances myself, where clerks were appointed pro tempore by those judges, and held their offices without first being qualified by them. Here is the tenth section of the old constitution on that subject:

"Each court shall appoint its own clerk, who shall hold his office during good behavior; but no person shall be appointed clerk, only pro tempore, who shall not produce to the court appointing him, a certificate from the majority of the judges of the court of appeals, that he had been examined by their clerk, in their presence, and under their direction, and that they judge him to be well qualified to execute the office of clerk, to any court of the same dignity, with that for which he offers himself. They shall be removable for breach of good behavior, by the court of appeals only, who shall be judges of the fact as well as of the law. Two thirds of the members present must concur in the sentence."

That was the old constitution. What was then allowed? You allowed, under the old constitution, the judges the power to appoint a man with no certificate of qualification whatever, and permitted him to hold the office, as I have already said, for months and years. And by whom was he appointed? By the judges; and these appointments were frequently made. Now, when we propose to elect a clerk by the people, it is argued that he must have a certificate from a majority of the judges of the court of appeals, before he shall have the office. You say that the judge is competent to select one who has undergone no examination at all, that he can take care of the public records, and of all the public papers, and important documents entrusted to his charge, without even having a certificate, and yet you now say, that if the people elect a clerk, he must have a certificate from the majority of the court of appeals. I cannot see any consistency in this argument. I understood my friend, the president, to say that he wished to require the same qualification as is contained in the old constitution. If you place it on the same ground, you will allow the people to elect a clerk before he has received a certificate from the judges of the court of appeals, and he will remain in office till he can obtain a certificate, just as the clerks formerly did when appointed pro tem. I shall favor the amendment of my friend from Knox and Harlan; but when we get back into convention again, I intend to offer the same amendment, as I did on Saturday, striking out all in relation to the requirement of a certificate from the judges of the circuit court, and to get the yeas and nays upon it. But if I cannot do better, I should much prefer the amendment of the gentleman from Knox to the one reported by the committee on executive and ministerial offices. I am satisfied the people are competent to judge of the qualifications of a clerk. I am convinced that if the amendment proposed the other day by the gentleman from Madison, who, I believe, is the chairman who made the report, were adopted, it would perpetuate the clerkships in the hands of the present incumbents. That proposition requires that the clerks shall have had an experience of two years in some clerk's office. Now, I put it to that gentleman, and to others, if that clause were put in the constitution, whether the effect of it would not be to perpetuate these offices in the hands of the present incumbents? Is it likely that Mr. Swigert, or any other gentleman who wanted to run again for the office, would take a young man into his office and instruct him, in order to make him a competitor? Would any clerk in this state, who was instructing a favorite young man, or perhaps his own son, be likely to introduce another, who it was probable would become an antagonist to either of them? Not at all. I would rather that the clerks should be elected by the people, without any certificate, than that such a clause should be engrafted in the constitution. If clerks have held their offices for one or two years without a certificate, when appointed by the judges, I maintain they ought to be permitted to do it now, when, as I hold, the people are qualified to judge of their ability. But even if the clerks were not qualified at the time they were elected, I have heard men say that in one or two months, a man of business habits might prepare himself to discharge the duties of clerk.

The PRESIDENT. I never supposed, nor designed, that there should be any pro tempore appointments of clerks by the people, and therefore I never supposed the people would elect pro tempore clerks while certificates could be obtained; and I hope and trust my remarks will not mislead the gentleman as to what I designed. I do not believe that the judges of the circuit courts, when elected by the people, will be endowed with universal knowledge—be good book-keepers, good clerks, and every thing else, by the mere certificate of election by the people. The representatives of the people are not always good ones, and are often rejected on a second trial. That fact ought to satisfy every gentleman that the people are not infallible. I believe it is the part of prudence to require proper qualifications for these important officers, to whom we are to confide the keeping of the records of courts, the titles to property, and the contracts and papers of individuals. I know many good lawyers who could not find a paper in a clerk's office, because they know nothing of the order with which the papers should be arranged. There is some skill required in knowing where to put things, and if all the clerks in Kentucky should tell me, even under oath, that a man could fit himself for the duties of a clerk in thirty days, I would not believe them. There are but few men in Kentucky who cannot learn book-keeping, but there are very few good book-keepers in this commonwealth, because few have made it their vocation. We lawyers often have to deal with accounts; and how do we do it? We send for a skillful book-keeper, and get his information and his aid in examining the books. What do we do in all complicated questions that arise in relation to machinery? We study the cases as they arise, and call to our aid skillful men to explain what we do not comprehend, in order that we may give a satisfactory explanation of the case. We are thus constantly extending our information. I prefer, therefore, that the examination of the clerk should be made by a clerk, in the presence of the judges, if this can be done without requiring them to come to Frankfort. I do not feel willing to multiply the qualifications of candidates for this office, but I desire that a man be properly qualified before he asks for the office.

Mr. CLARKE. I did say that I had been informed that a young man might be qualified to fill the office of clerk, in the course of twenty, thirty, or forty days. Whether the information was correct or not, I certainly had it from those who profess to be acquainted with the duties of a clerk. I did not suppose that a clerk would be elected pro tem. by the people, as the gentleman seems to think I understood him to say. I understand that under the old constitution, the clerks were appointed pro tem. by the judges, and I repeat the statement that I made before, that those clerks have held their offices from one to two years, without being in possession of a certificate. It is to be presumed they were not qualified at the time they received their appointment, at least they had not that prima facie qualification, which a certificate of the majority of the court of appeals indicates. Yet, in whose hands, I ask, were the papers that settle the rights of the people of the state? In whose hands were all the records that belong to the people of the county, if not within the hands of the men thus appointed pro tem. by these judges, without any certificate of qualification? I have known of no instances where complaint has been brought against those individuals thus appointed pro tem.

Now, if it has been the practice of this state for the last half century to appoint clerks, pro tem. where vacancies occurred, who had not the certificate of a majority of the judges of the court of appeals, and to allow them to remain in office, having in their hands important papers determining and settling the rights of the people of the county, and no injury has resulted from such appointments, I ask upon what ground it is claimed that the people cannot select a man, who in a short time, can be prepared to discharge the duties of the office of clerk? I do not argue that a clerk should be appointed pro tem. by the people; but if he were, he would have in his hands no more of the rights of the people than the clerk appointed by the judge pro tem. He who is a candidate for election by the people, will have his pride stimulated to qualify himself for the station, and I believe he will be qualified in less than two months. Indeed, I do not believe the people would elect a man who was not qualified at the time of his election. It has been abundantly proved that certificates have been frequently obtained without due and proper qualifications. And when thus obtained, what is the result? It is this, the court of appeals have sent forth among the people a man endorsed as qualified against one not thus endorsed, and who is perhaps in fact, better qualified. The people are thus imposed upon. How will the people reason when a candidate presents himself for this office? They will first inquire whether he is honest, and whether they can safely entrust these papers to his care. The next inquiry will be whether he is capable, and they will determine that question, because they are deeply interested in it, and in nine cases out of ten the man will be stimulated to qualify himself. I trust no certificate will be required, and that even the amendment of my friend from Knox will be rejected, and that the people may be permitted to elect.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I have an amendment which I propose to offer, and which I hope will be adopted now. Let us take a medium course and a safe one. If we turn to one portion of this house, they tell us that the circuit court clerks and judges are better qualified to judge of the fitness of the candidate for this office than the judges of the court of appeals. Another portion think the judges of the court of appeals are the best prepared to decide this question. I ask attention to this fact, which I think will be admitted, that a man best understands the business to which he has been accustomed. Let us turn our attention to the additional fact that long disuse prevents the discharge of the duties of any station with freedom and decision; and we come to the conclusion that judges of the court of appeals are not the best judges of the qualifications of a clerk. But, I cannot agree with the gentleman from Simpson, that the clerk shall have no certificate. A calm consideration suggests the safest course; there is no necessity of running from one extreme to the other. Why compel candidates to come a distance of two hundred or three hundred miles to Frankfort, to a tribunal not better qualified than that which you have at your own doors? If your circuit court judges are nearly as well qualified to judge, why not let them judge. In the county of Ohio, I do not believe there is a single soul who has a certificate, except the clerk, nor in Daviess, Breckenridge, nor Hancock. And I call upon the delegate from Henry to enquire how many, except the acting clerk, have certificates in his county. Now, there are one hundred counties in the state, and you do not intend to limit the number of candidates to the present incumbents, and I would inquire how many candidates the clerk of the court of appeals can examine previous to the election? There must be from one to two hundred examinations by one single court, with all the expense and trouble of travelling one or two hundred miles to the town of Frankfort for the purpose of going through this examination. They hold but two courts in a year.

At your own doors you have a tribunal, as I remarked, equally as well qualified to make this examination as the court of appeals. I am satisfied that the circuit court is fully as well qualified to make the examination, as to the qualification of clerks, as the court of appeals. And, furthermore, if any fraud is attempted to be practiced in the granting of a certificate to a man who is not qualified, there is a plain and simple plan by which it may be detected. Let the candidate be placed at the table, and let him keep the minute book for one day, and let him make up the record at night. This will prove whether he is qualified or not. All this can be done in the circuit court, but not in the court of appeals.

The amendment that I propose, is simply to insert after the words "court of appeals" the words "circuit court;" it will then read thus, "no person shall be elected to the office of clerk unless he shall have procured from the court of appeals, or from the circuit court, a certificate that he has been examined by their clerk under their supervision, and that he is qualified for the office."

Mr. WOODSON accepted that amendment.

Mr. TURNER. I dislike very much to detain the committee as this subject has been debated a good deal already, but there have been some suggestions thrown out which it will be necessary to notice. Whenever I find myself compelled to differ with the gentleman who has just spoken, I do it with great distrust of my own judgment, but in this instance, I rely upon my own more than upon his, because I have had an experience that he never has had, in regard to a clerk's duties, and I am satisfied that it is one of the most important points in our constitution, that we should make provision for the qualification of these officers. I have long thought so, and so declared during the canvass. My objection is, to your leaving this matter to the local judge in the circuit in which the applicant resides. He should not be under any local influences, though he may be as well qualified or better than a man living at a distance, who knows nothing about the individuals upon whose merit he is called upon to decide. There is a great advantage in having the certificate come from the judges of the court of appeals on that account. I admit, as was said by one of the gentlemen who addressed the committee, that superior qualifications are requisite for a clerk, to those of a judge. The clerk of the court must be a lawyer, or at least have considerable knowledge of statutory law. When I went into the clerk's office, the first thing I had to do was to read all the statutes that had been passed in relation to the business that properly belonged to the court in relation to devises, in relation to the duties of executor and administrator, and a hundred other things that come usually before the county court for adjudication. If the clerk does not understand the substance of what the law is, he never can make the record to meet the merits of the case. Will gentlemen tell me that an individual can understand these matters in six weeks, two months, or even a year? Sir, he ought to be a pretty good lawyer before he should be entitled to be appointed clerk of a circuit court. What has been the effect of having clerks who did not thoroughly understand the duties of the office? Many a man has been made a pauper in consequence of an error arising from the ignorance of the clerk. Many men have been turned out of their houses merely because the clerk did not know how to make out a certificate conveying the rights of a married woman in real estate, where the parties had an intention to convey, and where the conveyance was afterwards set aside in consequence of the error of the clerk. Many a man has lost his property after having made improvements to double and treble the value of the property originally. In the county of Madison there was a case in which the rightful owner of eleven hundred acres of land, in one place, was deprived of his property in consequence of an error of this kind. I allude to the great case of Shackelford, Miller, and others. The duties appertaining to the office of clerk are of transcendent importance. It is behind no other office in the gift of the people in importance. I could refer you to another case in the county of Madison, where fourteen hundred acres were lost after a man had recovered judgment because the clerk did not draw up the judgment correctly in the record, and the error was not discovered until it was too late.

Mr. CLARKE. Did that clerk have a certificate from the court of appeals?

Mr. TURNER. The principal clerk had a certificate, but the judgment was drawn up I suppose by the deputy. The form of reading the record, is gone through with before the judge, it is true, but in nine cases out of ten, he perhaps is smoking a cigar, and two or three lawyers are talking to him, and he pays little or no attention to the record. Every thing, therefore, depends upon the clerk having a knowledge of his business. The legislature is passing acts every year giving new jurisdiction to the courts, and it becomes necessary therefore, that the clerk should be able to make his forms agree with the substance of those enactments. One gentleman objects that the court of appeals is in the habit of granting certificates whenever they are applied for, and that another court never grants them, except upon the clearest evidence of qualification. It may be that in one case out of fifty a certificate may be granted to a man who is not qualified, but never did I hear the objection made, that they refused an individual who was qualified. It is merely an imaginary objection. Many men get into the legislature who are not qualified. There are sometimes judges appointed, and clerks also, who are not qualified for the stations they fill, but those cases are exceptions, and it is our duty to provide a means of ascertaining the qualification of those who present themselves as candidates for an important office like this. Are we not to have sound evidence of qualification?

In relation to another matter, that was alluded to by the gentleman from Louisville, I have had more experience than he has in that branch of business. It is more than thirty years since I went into the clerk's office in Madison county, and there are now records in that office, which could scarcely be found by any person but myself. The record is not always entered in the name of the individual whose estate is in controversy; it is indexed in the name of his son, or some distant relative, and a great portion of the persons interested in the case may be wholly unknown; there can be, therefore, no certain alphabetical mode of arrangement, and after the lapse of forty or fifty years, it becomes almost an impossibility to find the records of the case. A man who has no system, and no knowledge of the duties of the office, will perhaps cause the ruin of many individuals in the community. I want something that will secure uniformity, and not to have every thing in a state of confusion, or as the printers say in "pi." You will be tolerably certain of having plenty of printers "pi" in the office of every clerk in the commonwealth, if you do not take care that they understand their duty.

The gentleman from Simpson is a great lover of the people, and I admire his zeal and enthusiasm, but he seems to like the ignorant portion of the people better than the intelligent. I am for employing the intelligent portion for the purpose of protecting and preserving the rights of the ignorant. I wish to make men desirous of being intelligent, of qualifying themselves for places of trust; and that they should not come in as applicants for office, relying upon the fact of their being the most ignorant men that are to be found in the community, and consequently, according to the tenor of the gentleman, less liable to do mischief. I do not pretend to say that the gentleman from Simpson thinks in this way; but the result of his argument is, that you should give a free fight, and let every body come in and compete for the offices. Well it will be about as it was with the English officer who, happening to be in Frankfort, and being very desirous of witnessing a "free fight" at a time when there was a ball at the Mausion House, a servant came to him after he had gone to bed, and told him that there was a "free fight" going on in the bar room. He went down and encountered himself in a corner to look on, but each party thought he had come to help the other, and so they both turned to, and gave him a severe beating. Well he got enough of that "free fight," and told the servant never to awaken him again to see a "free fight," for he had seen and felt enough of it to last him as long as he should live.

Well if we have a "free fight" in relation to the selection of clerks, the people of Kentucky will never want another "free fight" as long as they live. You will get the records in such a condition that there will not be another "free fight" called for.

I want something like a conservative government. I want to give to the people the power to manage the affairs of the government; but in doing this they require that some restrictions shall be placed upon this power. Why do we make a constitution at all, unless it be that there shall be restrictions imposed upon the various departments of government? This is the very purpose for which the people have sent us here. It is essential in my judgment, that there should be some evidence required of a candidate for an office of this description, that he understands the duties appertaining to that office.

Mr. NUTTALL. I thought that this matter was pretty well ended, but I find it has become re-juvenescent, and is about to commence again. I was struck with the figurative remark that was made by the gentleman from Madison, that if the requisite qualifications are not provided for, every thing pertaining to the clerks office will be knocked into "pi." I suppose the people will have to swallow it too.

Now I think if there has been a good, a first rate, unanswerable speech made for our side of the house, the gentleman has just made it. He has convinced us beyond the possibility of a doubt, that the ground we occupy is the correct one. I was rather inclined that way before, but now I am satisfied, perfectly certain that I am right. Unless we can provide in the constitution that all the old incumbents, who have held these offices for the last ten, fifteen, twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty years, should remain precisely where they are—unless we can provide in our constitution that they shall live to the age of Methuselah,—we might just as well take a new set of clerks as not. If the gentleman from Madison should unfortunately die—and I acknowledge—for I have a very great respect for him—that the county would sustain a very great loss; what would be the condition of things in Madison county? What would be the condition of things in every county in the state, if these old clerks should unfortunately die? There would be no living man that could find a single record. I know that from the bungling manner in which the clerks have recorded deeds and acknowledgements, vast estates have been lost; there is just such a case in my county, that occurred through an act which I suppose the lawyers would call felo de se.

If gentlemen will refer to the decisions on this subject, they will find it is not more than twenty years since the question was first made concerning these clerks and certificates; there are recent discoveries in this country concerning the errors that have been committed by clerks heretofore, in relation to the relinquishment of dower in conveying real estate. These mistakes are not confined to the county of Madison, or the county of Henry; you will find them in every county in the state; they have occurred in counties where clerks have obtained their certificates of qualification, and those certificates were obtained when the most distinguished men occupied the bench of the court of appeals; when such men as Boyle and Mills and Bibb were judges of that court.

I do not know whether I am conservative according to the gentleman's construction or not, or whether I prefer the ignorant portion of the people—that the gentleman speaks of—to the learned. I have not got learning enough myself to know when I come in contact with a man of learning, what his attainments are; but I think the whole of the gentleman's argument just leads to this; that you must make clerks out of the present incumbents, or you must select good lawyers to fill these offices. Well I am in favor of the bar, that is certain. I am an humble member of the profession, and if clerks are to be made from the bar exclusively, I shall, of course, be satisfied; I think it is a great misfortune that we are not all clerks in this house, because according to the information we have received the last few days, no other than good lawyers can tell anything about the manner in which the duties ought to be discharged. I am sometimes erratic in my judgment, but I am desirous of doing that which shall best promote the public interest; and I do not see any necessity for throwing so many restrictions around the people, if you give them the liberty of electing the clerks of the courts at all.

I had hoped that as one clerk led off in this debate; and as there are several clerks in this house, we would have heard from them also, and have got all the information that was requisite; but they seem to hold back; they do not give us the least of their advice.

Mr. CHAMBERS. I am not a clerk at this time.

Mr. NUTTALL. Like myself I suppose the gentleman has resigned. There are however, many gentlemen upon this floor who are clerks, and I think that all who are so now, or who have been, will be inclined to go for this amendment.

I was myself of opinion that no certificate should be required, but when I heard the remarks of the gentleman from Daviess, I yielded—as this is a time when yielding seems to prevail—to the opinions of the gentleman, upon this subject. Having two terms of the court of appeals in a year, you require all applicants for clerkships to come up here to obtain their certificates of qualification; and if that court will devote its time to the examination of all those who present themselves as candidates; they will have within the next two years no time for the decision of cases. The circuit judges, and the clerks of the circuit court together, are certainly competent to examine into the qualifications of a man for the clerkship, without putting him to the trouble of traveling two or three hundred miles to this place, and waiting here day after day until his turn comes around for examination.

Mr. TURNER. The court of appeals can examine forty candidates at the same time, as easily as one.

Mr. NUTTALL. I suppose then, they would go upon the plea of the school master and examine them in classes, as they do boys at school, and upon putting a question to the first—such as this—if a feme covert comes in with her husband to convey real estate, what sort of certificate would you require? If he did not answer, the question would be put to the next, and the old fashion of tripping would prevail, and the fellow that got turned down would be served as the little boys are served at school.

Mr. MACHEN. I had the privilege—I do not know whether it will turn out to be an honor or not—a few days since, of introducing a resolution which I had hoped would, to some extent, obviate the discussion which is now going on. It is not however before the committee, and I do not know exactly how to get it there. It will be recollected that it was a requisition upon the legislature at its first session under the new constitution, to provide for the compilation of a book of forms, to be used in the clerk's offices. That proposition I suppose is not cognizable by the committee at this time, and the question comes up simply as to whether the certificate of qualification shall be required of the different persons who shall see proper to present themselves for the office of clerk.

It does strike me that the argument of the gentleman from Madison is based upon a very strange hypothesis. We have laid down as a fundamental principle, by which the action of this convention is to be governed, that the people of Kentucky are capable of self-government. That is a proposition to which, I understand, every one subscribes. If this principle be founded in truth, how are the doctrines which gentlemen advance here to be reconciled with it? It resolves itself into this, that notwithstanding the people are capable of self-government, yet when they want the assistance of a clerk to carry on the operations of government, they are incapable of making a proper selection. The clerk is an important officer, and should be perfectly qualified; but the people are capable of self-government, therefore, they are incapable of selecting a clerk. That is just about the tenor and effect of the argument.

I was very much pleased a few days since, with the argument advanced by the gentleman from Todd, upon this question of qualification; it was that we should endeavor as far as possible to elevate the people by giving all power into their hands, in order that when called upon to act, they should act with full responsibility resting upon them, and then like prudent men, they would set about seeking those qualifications which would enable them efficiently and prosperously to exercise all the power bestowed upon them. When we take from them the power of electing a circuit court clerk, what do we say to them? We say, gentlemen you are incapable of determining upon the qualifications of those in your immediate counties, as to fitness to fill this or that office. For one, I think they will exercise this power in a wholesome manner, not only as regards themselves, but the interests of the counties generally. I know it is important that we should have clerks who are qualified. The gentleman from Madison bases his argument upon the hypothesis that we will have incompetent persons to fill these offices. Where is the evidence of this? And he tells us of the immense estates that have been lost in consequence of having them filled by incompetent persons; and he goes on and tells us, that those very persons had certificates of qualification from the court of appeals. And he would have us go to the same tribunal for certificates of qualification of clerks hereafter.

Let the people of every county in the state determine for themselves, and I will guarantee that they will not put in such persons as the gentleman has described. He said we must have lawyers—

Mr. TURNER. The gentleman is mistaken. I said that before a person could be qualified for the office he must have studied the various acts which have relation to the business to be transacted by the court—that he must have made some degree of progress towards an understanding of the statute law.

Mr. MACHEN. I understand then, that he must be pretty nearly a lawyer. I admit the fact; but I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if we have not, among the yeomanry of the land, men who are capable of taking up the statutes of the state, and of construing them with as much correctness as the gentleman himself? The gentleman argues as if the people would put ignoramus in office, who ought not to be trusted with any part of the business of the government.

Mr. McHENRY. I am decidedly in favor of having some qualification prescribed. Under the old constitution, the candidate is examined and obtains a certificate from a majority of the court of appeals. It was presumed that the judges would be competent to decide upon their qualifications. I am, however, for going with the gentleman from Daviess, and others, in favor of an examination by the circuit court. Most of our judges of the circuit court, at least, are qualified to make examinations, for it has appeared on all hands that they have now good circuit court clerks. And I want to keep up the number of those clerks in the state. I do not think that the people desire that we should strike out all qualifications for clerks. A great many people in the state are interested in having the business of that office performed in a proper manner; and I think, although we give the election of these clerks to the people, yet it should be with the assurance that they will not elect a man who has not the proper qualification.

It is said that great injury has been done by the errors of the very men who had certificates from the court of appeals. I grant it. No man is perfect, no system is perfect. But take it in this way, that out of one hundred and fifty cases, where certificates had been given by the judges, the people have been imposed on by about ten, how often would they be imposed on by those who had no certificate of qualification? It is to prevent the people themselves from being imposed on, that I desire they should have some evidence of qualification. It is not merely a knowledge of forms that will make a good clerk; he must, as the gentleman from Madison has remarked, have some knowledge of the substance of those statutes, under which the proceedings of the court are taken. Like the story of the good old justice of the peace, who was required to issue a search warrant: the article to be searched for was a drawing knife. Well, when he came to issue the warrant, he could not find any form for a search warrant for a drawing knife, but he could find one for a turkey; so he said he would issue the warrant for the turkey, and if the constable found the drawing knife, he could take it. Now, I do not want those in the office to be as much at a loss as the honest old justice of the peace. I want them to understand something of the substance of the matters which they have to transact. The people can judge of a candidate, as to his honesty, and as to his being such a person as it would be agreeable to do business with, but as to his knowledge of the manner of doing business, they would rather have that certified by some one in whom they have confidence. I have never had much acquaintance with the nature of the duties of a clerk's office, never having acted in the capacity of clerk myself, although, perhaps, I might form as just an estimate of the qualifications of a person to fill that office, as most of the people in the country; yet, I would prefer not to rely exclusively upon my own opinion on that point, but would prefer that the candidate should have a certificate from some tribunal, indicated by the constitution itself, of his qualification.

Mr. LINDSEY. Mr. Chairman: If my friend from Caldwell was about building a fine house, and found it necessary to procure workmen and was not a mechanic himself, and did not know those who applied for the work, it would not follow that he should not build a house, nor have the right to choose the workmen. But it would show a necessity that he should either commit the whole thing to a competent person, or that he should require the applicants to present him some evidence of their capacity to do the work.

Prudence would prompt him to one of these modes, rather than risk having his materials destroyed and his building spoiled.

The people have directed us to provide what is necessary for a good government, keeping in their hands the right of appointing their own agents, of selecting their own mechanics. Prudence requires that we furnish them the means of knowing the qualifications of those who are to do the work. It is no reflection upon their intelligence or capacity for self-government, nor their right to elect all officers, that they are not all clerks, and therefore not capable of judging who are qualified to do the clerk's duties. They keep the right of appointing the clerk, but want us to fix a mode by which they shall not be deceived and be induced to select incompetent persons. It is a fact, Mr. Chairman, that one county in this state was within four votes of electing an individual to the legislature, who had graduated in the penitentiary. If the people of that county had known this fact, think you they would have voted for him? The people are misled often—let us keep them from being misled. The people should be in position, as far as practicable, at all times to know candidates for important offices, and especially those which require skill and qualification in particular duties, and where the whole service or duty is devolved upon one person, as in the case of clerk—an officer more important to the interests of a county to be fully qualified, than even a circuit judge, whose errors can all be revised and corrected.

In the case of county clerk, errors committed often pass unnoticed until there is no chance of correction, as in the cases of erroneous certificates to deeds, instanced this morning.

I am in favor of adding the test of qualification by the circuit court, or court of appeals. This will obviate the objection made, that candidates will have to go a great distance to procure certificates, and also the further objection, that examinations before the circuit judge may, through prejudice or local influence, be too much under the power of the circuit judge.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Daviess prevails, the candidates, if local influence operates, may go to the appellate court—if unjustly treated there, they may go to the circuit courts.

If provision is only made by law that both courts shall fully perform their duty of giving full examination before certificate, either court will suit me. If the circuit judge should be required to follow the mode indicated by the delegate from Daviess, of requiring candidates for clerkships to perform a day's work in court under the supervision of court, clerk, and lawyers, that would be better examination and test of qualification than a week's oral examination.

I am, sir, for qualification before any one shall even be a candidate for clerk, and for rigid examination before certificate shall be given, and in advocating this, I do not conceive that I violate in the least the proposition that the people are capable of self-government, but rather give them the means of exercising the principle correctly, and prevent the evil consequences flowing from the selection of persons incompetent to discharge important trusts through mistakes, or in any other way.

Mr. NEWELL. I am in favor of the adoption of the proposition of the gentleman from Daviess, in preference to the original provision in the report of the committee, but I am opposed to the requirement of certificates altogether. I think the whole question amounts exactly to this. Are the people capable of self-government or not? If they are, I hold they are capable of electing every officer in the state. If they are not, why then we had better choose a set of individuals to be guardians over them. The people are acknowledged to be competent to elect the first officer in the state, without any certificate of qualification, and they are competent to elect every officer, down to the clerk of the court, in the same manner. Why do you stop, when you come down to the clerk and say that he shall come before the people with his capabilities certified to, before they shall elect him. I want gentlemen to be consistent. As well might you say that the circuit judge, or the judge of the court of appeals, shall be required to obtain a certificate of fitness to discharge the duties of their offices. If you carry out the principle, even the members of the legislature might be required to obtain evidence of qualification. I will go for the amendment, and then if some gentleman will move to strike out the provision in relation to certificates, I will go for striking it out.

Mr. BROWN. I am opposed to these certificates of qualification. I think if the people can be trusted to elect a public officer, they should be trusted to judge of his qualifications. Every argument that is used in favor of requiring a certificate of qualification will apply against the election of the officer by the people. I know that the legal profession in this country is highly intelligent and a highly useful profession. No one appreciates its usefulness more highly than I do; but I understand the government to be the common property of the whole people, and I do not think that any class of men should be permitted to have the entire control of the government. I do not think that the legal profession should be permitted to prescribe to the people whom they shall select. I know very well, that to be a commonwealth attorney, or a circuit judge, it is necessary that the appointee should be taken from the legal profession. That is all right and proper, but at the same time I am opposed to their prescribing the qualifications that shall be required on the part of other officers. It is neither more nor less than giving them the power of nominating the candidate, and the people have only the right to confirm or reject the nomination.

And if a candidate obtain a certificate, is it any guarantee that he is really qualified? The gentleman from Madison has proved to you that a man may obtain a certificate without having any qualification. If he cannot obtain a certificate in any other way, he has only to go to the gentleman from Madison, and that gentleman's ingenuity and skill can procure it for him. What security then, have the people? None at all, according to the showing of the gentleman himself.

This provision in the report, if carried into effect, will be perpetuating the system of which the people have complained so much. Certificates will be granted upon principles of favoritism. I believe the people will be able to elect as good clerks without the certificate of qualifications as with it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am aware that as much time has been occupied already on this subject as should be bestowed upon it, but having had some little experience myself in relation to the duties of the office of clerk, I desire to say a word or two in reference to it. It seems to me that a great deal of unnecessary incense has been burnt at the shrine of popular intelligence. The question now before the committee does not involve the popular capacity, does not call in question the capacity of the people for self-government, does not trench upon the elective franchise, does not interfere with the reforms which have been demanded by the people, and which this convention has been called to carry out. In the existing constitution a certificate of qualification is required when a circuit judge has the appointing power. If that had been urged as an attack upon the intelligence of the people, it would have been the subject of discussion throughout the state. Every body knew that this was the provision of the existing constitution. When the people voted for this convention, in order that the present constitution might be changed, was it because the candidate for clerkship had to obtain a certificate of qualification before he could present himself for appointment to that office? No sir, that objection was never urged.

The objection was, sir, that being appointed by the court, it gave to the judge an influence that he ought not to possess; and it was interfering with the right of the people to select their own officers. That was the ground, as I understand, upon which the popular voice cried out for reform in this particular. I have never yet heard a man say that a certificate of qualification trenched upon the rights of the people. What does the certificate suppose? It supposes an examination necessary—it supposes that the office is so unobtrusive in its character that something is required, to show that the applicant has the requisite qualifications.

An individual who is a candidate for a seat in the legislature, goes before the people and declares his sentiments, his political opinions are known, his capacity to advocate those opinions is known. The man who is a candidate for a judgeship must have a reputation as a lawyer, as well as a reputation for integrity and honesty as an individual. His reputation is public. It is not so in the clerical department. This is a quiet, unobtrusive office; its duties are performed without a word spoken; and its requisitions presuppose an examination necessary.

It is not, then, a question involving popular capacity or intelligence. On the contrary the requisition supposes that no one is competent to judge of the qualifications of the clerk unless an examination be had by the proper tribunal.

Well, if it be true, that the people cannot examine into his qualifications—and it is impossible, in the nature of things, for them to do so—the mass of the people have no means of ascertaining his competency. It is a power which they cannot exercise. It is therefore necessary that they should delegate that power in some way. They want a tribunal, a board of examination, because, the examination being necessary, it is more convenient that it should be done by a board which is thus constituted.

Then sir, what is all this declamation about its effects upon popular influence and the infringement of the elective franchise? Why do you not throw off the other requisites of qualification? Why not, for instance, dispense with the requisition that the candidate shall be twenty-one years of age? There are other restraints besides this requisition of the certificate of the judges. There is no reason why one should be retained and another rejected. The people are better prepared to judge as to the merits of an individual, than as to his qualifications to discharge the duties of a particular office.

Much has been said about the advantages it will give to the existing officers. I differ with gentlemen on that subject. I believe the absence of this requisition will give them an advantage instead of the requisition itself. Those who already possess certificates will come forward and say, fellow citizens I am here with the evidence of my qualification. My competitor has none. I ask you if it does not operate in favor of those who have heretofore exercised the office? If you do not make this requisition, all who may be disposed to come forward as candidates will not stand upon an equal footing, because there will be no qualified tribunal to give the certificate; however desirous the individual may be, he cannot get it in an authoritative form, and is deprived of the privilege of presenting his qualifications to the country.—Now look at the operation of this thing in other departments of life. Why does a medical man obtain a diploma? Why is it that public opinion has forced on him the necessity of doing it? It is because his practice will not prevail without giving more evidence that will convince the people. Why not say this in derogation of popular rights? Why not let him go to work and practice in the neighborhood until he is qualified?

I do not know of any good reason why the requirement of a certificate should not be continued. It is not one of those questions of capability of the people to elect, and it never will be urged as a test of the rights of the people. And I really believe that by requiring the certificate you will do more to test the capacity of the candidate than by leaving it out. I believe the present incumbents now enjoy a decided advantage by having these certificates, and being able to point to them, to say we alone are possessed of the requisite qualifications. And will you deny to those who desire to come forward as candidates for these offices the opportunity of doing so, although they may be very well qualified, by refusing them the privilege of obtaining a certificate?

Mr. BROWN. I fully appreciate the experience and intelligence of the gentleman from Oldham, (Mr. Mitchell,) and think what he says is entitled to much consideration. He thinks that the absence of a requisition here of a certificate of qualification, would operate against those now in office. Now the absence of the requirement for it, would not deprive the candidate of the privilege of procuring a certificate and presenting it to the people, if he deemed it necessary.

Mr. MITCHELL. The objection was that there would be no board of examination, constituted by the laws and acting under the sanction of an oath, who would be bound to furnish the certificate of qualification. Any man might obtain private certificates, but they would not have so great a weight with the people, as those obtained from such a tribunal.

Mr. CHRISMAN. Before the vote is taken, I wish to define my position on this subject. I am sent here by the people to secure certain great principles, and this mission I mean to fulfill, so far as my action is concerned. I am instructed to give them the power to vote for judges of the court of appeals, and of the other courts of the commonwealth, and also for sheriffs, magistrates, and constables. But the people did not instruct me to vote for giving them the right of selecting county attorneys, jailers, and coroners, and hence the motion I made on Saturday last to strike out this class of officers. This is playing the game as I think rather too low down, and I am not disposed to take the step. The gentleman from Henry, (Mr. Nuttall,) remarked that he believed it would be unfortunate for the people of Madison, should the gentleman from Madison die. Now I think it would be unfortunate for this body, should that gentleman and some others be removed from it, for if they were we should be all sail and no ballast. I generally find him to be right, and in this particular I shall go with him. I am prepared to require certificates of qualification from these officers, although I am not particular where they may be obtained, whether as proposed by the gentleman from Daviess, from the circuit court, or from the court of appeals. All I desire is, what the interests of the people desire, that the candidates should be fully qualified for the important offices they are to fill. The gentleman from Simpson has remarked that almost any individual could qualify himself for it within twenty days, and he afterwards said that this thing of requiring qualifications was placing forever in the hands and at the disposition of the present incumbents the office of clerk. Now if a man can qualify himself in that short time, can he not obtain a certificate of the fact, and how then would it be placing the control of these offices forever in the hands of the present incumbents? I was raised in a clerk's office, and it is true also that I belong to a family that has always held that office in the county. I know the importance therefore of having a good clerk, not that I mean to say that I am a good one, for I acknowledge the contrary, yet I doubt whether, if the office be placed before the people without requiring any certificate of qualifications, any candidate could keep me out of the office. I acknowledge myself unqualified for the station, and hence I feel the importance of requiring the certificate. As the gentleman from Oldham remarked, the public complaint is not against this qualification as required in the old constitution, but against the manner in which the power of appointment has been exercised by the judges. We have seen clerks removed from one county to another, and we have seen also the office sold to the highest bidder. This is what the people complain of.

Mr. NUTTALL. I did not expect to bring down the wrath of the gentleman from Wayne upon me; I have never insinuated that I wanted the gentleman from Madison to die or leave the house; so far from that, from the year 1823, when we were here in the legislature together, down to the present time, I have always had the highest regard for him, and have ever esteemed him as a sound, able, and intelligent jurist; and the last thing on earth that I should desire would be to have him removed from this body. If the gentleman from Wayne wishes to sail under the colors of the gentleman from Madison, God knows I would not seek to prevent him. I can respect an opponent, or even the enemy of my country, so long as he does not sail under false colors. For myself, I am for the bright stars and broad stripes of my country. Now I am very much attached to the gentleman from Wayne, but if a young gentleman of his acknowledged talents and ability, who belongs as he confesses literally to the family of clerks, and who has been for such a length of time in a clerk's office, with all the means to qualify himself for the duties—if he has not been able by this time to become a good clerk, why it rather seems to me that no requirement of qualifications we might devise could secure one. He says, however, that he has no doubt that with or without a certificate he could beat all creation in Wayne. I have no doubt of it—none at all, for I understand it is a pretty strong whig county, and the very fact of his election in the face of that majority, evinces that he must be a gentleman of extraordinary fine abilities and amiable manners. Now, as to my friend from Oldham, (Mr. Mitchell,) if there is a gentleman on earth whom I esteem, it is him; and we are pretty much on all matters bone of the same bone, and flesh of the same flesh. Nor do I wish on this occasion to provoke his wrath, for I know he is well qualified as a clerk. And although his arguments had considerable weight on my mind, nevertheless I am not disposed to change the position I occupy, or further, to concede any more than is contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Daviess.

Mr. MITCHELL. Agreed, I will go for that.

Mr. NUTTALL. Agreed it is.

The question was then taken on Mr. TRIP-LETT'S amendment, and it was adopted.

Mr. BROWN then offered the following substitute for the section as amended.

"No person shall be eligible to the office of commonwealth attorney who has not attained the age of twenty four years, and who has not resided two years next preceding his election in the state; one year in the county or district in which he offers his services; and shall have been two years a practicing lawyer. No person shall be elected circuit or county clerk, sheriff, or constable, who has not attained the age of twenty one years, and resided two years in the county or district next preceding the election."

It was rejected.

Mr. TURNER moved to strike out all from the word "but" in the 10th line, and to insert the words "sheriff and constable" after the word "clerk" in the preceding part of the section, so as to require these three officers to be twenty one years of age, and the others to be twenty four.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLY moved to include the county court attorney within the 21 years limitation. All knew that the office was commonly given to some junior member of the bar, generally a poor one, and it was too small a matter to interfere with. We have been placing too many restrictions on the people in this constitution, and doing what they did not send us to do, and if we continue in this way, he did not doubt it would be rejected with as much unanimity as the convention itself was called.

The amendment was agreed to and the second section was then adopted.

The third section was read, and it was adopted without amendment.

The fourth section was then read.

Mr. TURNER offered an amendment to strike out the words "associate judges of the county courts," and insert in lieu thereof, the words "members of the general assembly," with a view that if the system of associate judges should not be adopted, the sheriff should then be elected at the same time as were the members of the legislature.

The PRESIDENT objected to this on the ground that it would interfere with the plan of separating the judicial from the political election.

Mr. TURNER withdrew the amendment, with the remark, that if the necessity for it should arise, it could be offered hereafter.

Mr. WOODSON moved to strike out all after the word "years" in the fourth line.

Mr. TURNER. The effect of the amendment will be to permit the sheriff to be elected without limitation as to time.

Mr. WOODSON. The office of sheriff is an important one, and is frequently exercised to the oppression of the people. If the officer prove to be a good one, I desire that the people, whose officer he is, may have the right to re-elect him. The fact that a man has served four years, is no evidence of disqualification, but rather of qualification, and if he has so discharged the duties as in the opinion of the people to deserve it, they should have the right to re-elect him if they choose.

Mr. TURNER. This office of sheriff is a most important and influential one, and my experience has been, that not one out of every five sheriffs, after they have served four years, make as good officers as they did during the first four. They attend to their duties very well during the first two years, but after that they fall off, and confining their attention to the most profitable of their duties, they learn how to avoid the discharge of those that are less so. The committee were divided on the subject—some being for a term of two years and re-eligibility after one term, and others for no restriction as to their eligibility—and they finally came to the conclusion as expressed in the bill. The object of extending the provision to deputies, I will explain. I have heard from those who were familiar with the workings of the constitution of 1792, and its system of allowing the deputies to be eligible, that it was customary for the high sheriff to select a man as deputy, who would succeed as sheriff. Then the new sheriff would select the old one as his deputy—and thus they went on repeating the operation, and pursuing a system of "ride and tie," which would have kept the offices within their control forever, had that constitution lasted so long. And in Madison, Bourbon, Clarke, and Fayette, the men first elected and their deputies, did retain the offices during the entire existence of that constitution. And it was the same in all the great counties of the state. Another reason why these officers should not be re-eligible is, that they would pervert the discharge of their duties to the attainment of a re-election. It was right and proper they should go out of office once in a while and take the air. The result would be that, if this provision was adopted, the counties would be blessed with far better sheriffs than under any system of re-eligibility.

Mr. CLARKE. I have an amendment which I should prefer to that of the gentleman from Knox, although I am opposed to the provision of the report of the committee. It is the 26th section of the report on the legislative department, in the following words:

"Sec. 26. No person who at any time may have been a collector of taxes, or public moneys for the state, or the assistant or deputy of such collector, shall be eligible to the general assembly, unless he shall have obtained a quietus, six months before the election, for the amount of such collection, and for all public moneys for which he may have been responsible."

I am unwilling to allow the sheriff to collect the public moneys and to electioneer on them from time to time. It would give him an advantage before the people over any competitor who was obliged to rely upon his own means. But, if the gentleman would incorporate this principle into his amendment, and require the candidate to have a quietus of all claims upon him on the part of the people, you then throw him on his own resources. If he thinks proper to spend his own money for electioneering purposes, let him do it, and the other candidate has the privilege to do the same. Under such a provision I should have no objection to his coming before the people three, four, or any number of times—none whatever. When he did come, under such circumstances, then the enquiry would be whether he was a faithful officer or not, and I have no objection, if the people choose, that they shall re-elect him as often as they see proper. But I do object to his being allowed to use the public funds for his electioneering purposes.

The PRESIDENT. The sheriffs and constables are a class, and I believe the only class of officers whom I do not wish to see re-eligible.

The truth is, there are a great many ways in which these individuals may fail to discharge the duties that devolve upon them, for the sake of benefitting themselves. They are the agents to execute the judgments of the courts, in the collection of all debts, that are collected through that medium. It is their duty to collect them fairly and according to the law, but there are a great many ways in which such officers have the power to favor individuals and thereby to enhance their popularity, and it was in their power also greatly to oppress individuals. Now, I do not wish them to exercise their offices either to the favor of individuals, or to the oppression of them, through any desire to advance their prospects for a re-election. It is generally the case, that these sheriffs and constables learn in some way or other, the circumstances of individuals in the community, and how to take advantage of them, and to make money out of them. They find out all the weak points in the condition of individuals, the amount of their indebtedness, and their necessities for money, and they carry on a system of shaming and extortion that is a disgrace to the country. I do not say that all do, but some of them; and whenever a man's appetite is whetted for making money in that way, it always increases. And the offices of sheriff and constable are sought for as offering greater facilities for acquiring money in that way, than any other in the land. I would therefore turn them out occasionally, and bring in a new set, who are not so well acquainted with the necessities of individuals, and whose knives are not so sharp. This class of officers should have but one term, and I commend the suggestion to those gentlemen who are in favor of rotation in office. I submit it to them whether it is not better to let the report stand, or amend it, so as to give the sheriffs one term of four years, if two is not enough, and then make them and their deputies ineligible for some period of time. Let them settle up their accounts with the public and with individuals, and give place to others.

Mr. ROGERS. We have been told here by almost every body who has spoken, that the people are intelligent and virtuous, and if this is so, why are there apprehensions suggested that the people will be bought up and controlled by those whom they have put in office? But they are subject to be influenced by no such considerations. It is not the Kentucky character, and it is contradicted most triumphantly, by the history of the last four years. The people desired that a convention should be called; and every judge and commonwealth's attorney, and every body who expects these offices, and nearly every clerk in the state, with some honorable exceptions, all opposed it, and yet the people, by a majority unprecedented, called the convention. Is that not a proof that the people are incorruptible, and that a man with money enough cannot buy their votes? Have you not had an example during the past year, that tells all over the union what the Kentucky character is? Look at the position taken in regard to one of her statesmen, whom the people delight to honor and love, as manifested in the vote taken at the last election. The party which Mr. Clay headed in that election, only received some twelve thousand out of one hundred and fifty two thousand votes. And will gentlemen tell me then, that Kentuckians are to be controlled by money or by such little offices as sheriffs and constables? I am one of the people, I expect no office, and I went for the calling of this convention on principle. I desire that the power of appointment shall now be restored to the people, unfettered with these restrictions. If the people are capable of self-government, they are capable of deciding upon the qualifications of these officers. This truth is axiomatic to my mind, and therefore if a man has discharged the duties of his office faithfully and well, I desire that the people may have the power to retain his services by re-appointing him, if they desire it.

Mr. DIXON. I have been listening a great deal to this eternal cry about the sovereign infallibility of the people, and really if the continual repetition of the assertion should convince any body, I ought by this time to be convinced of its truth. My friend over the way, (Mr. Rogers,) asks most emphatically if this thing of capability for self-government, and power of selecting officers is not the same. He says he can see no difference. But I think it is perfectly clear and manifest that there is such a thing as electing officers by the people, and such a thing too as the officer when he is elected, abusing the confidence of those who elected him. Does the gentleman mean to say that because the Kentucky character is as he describes it, that the people are never deceived in regard to men? Does he or any other gentleman mean to say that the people are never deceived in regard to the qualifications, the principle, the integrity, and the hearts of men? Does he mean to assert that capable, intelligent and discriminating as he is, he can look into the hearts of men, and see the secret influences operating there, so as to enable him at once to determine who should or who should not be placed in power? Does he mean to assert that the people are infallible and cannot be deceived? Does the gentleman not know that Judas Iscariot deceived the other eleven Apostles before he betrayed the Lord? And yet are the people so infallible that they never can be deceived? No one can assert such a doctrine. While then I would trust the people to the utmost I would guard them. While I fully believe in their capacity for self-government, I also believe it to be right and proper that they should be protected against all improper influences, come from what quarter it may. That is the principle I mean to maintain. Would the gentleman, because he believes the people are capable of self-government, not desire that the sheriff should execute a bond for the faithful discharge of his duties. Why do we require a bond in such a case? If the people are so far seeing as to be able to look into the very hearts of men and penetrating at once into their most secret motives, can they not tell in a moment whether the officer would discharge his duties faithfully, honestly, and efficiently or not? If they have this power, why in the name of heaven, require the execution of a bond at all? If the officer is faithful, honest, efficient and capable, and collects the money and hands it over, that is all that is wanted; there is no necessity at all for any other qualification. And I tell the gentleman if he believes this that he should offer an amendment declaring that the legislature shall require no bond from the sheriff, and let the reasons therefor be put in a preamble. For instance, that the people are capable of self-government, that they are endowed with the power of at once deciding upon the purity and integrity of men, and the motives which influence them, and that as it is utterly impossible they should elect any man to be sheriff who would not discharge his duties most faithfully, therefore let no security be required of him. I doubt whether the gentleman would go as far as that.

I agree with the gentleman from Louisville (Mr. Guthrie) precisely, that it is better that the sheriff should not be re-eligible. I can very well see how the office in such a case might be prostituted to the very worst of purposes. I can very well perceive that when his term is about to expire, and there is a competitor in the field against him, and the public money in his pocket how the officer's views of justice are liable to be perverted. The gentleman seems to think however that money does nothing in an election. It is a remark in which but few in this house will concur, when he tells us that the character of Kentucky is so pure that money will do nothing in an election. Money in an election, I admit will do nothing with pure men, but in Kentucky, as well as in any other country, there are impure men, and bad men. It is true and it cannot be denied that there are bad, artful and corrupt men in Kentucky, who can be seduced and will be by money and other influences. And there are men who can and will be corruptors of the men controlled by a sheriff, with a view to influence his election. The time approaches when the election is to take place, the sheriff is anxious for a re-election, he has little means of his own, but a great deal of the public money in his hands, and the temptation is irresistible for him to use it. Such inducements ought not to be held out to any official thus to pervert the duties of his office. But there are other means in his power. Does not every one know the power of the sheriff to oppress some and to favor others? He comes armed with the process of the law, he has the authority to seize on the poor man's estate, and to sell it out. Well, he has authority, it may be also, to seize on the rich man's property also, but he wants votes, and although it is his duty beyond all question, to execute the process at once, he can give it the go by if he can secure those votes by so doing. And he may have processes against forty men of influence in a community, and delay the execution of them all for the sake of securing the votes he wants. Is there not seen every day, vindictive men ready to go to law with each other, and for no other purpose than to harrass and worry each other? They do not care for the petty sum involved, the object is simply to harrass the man contending with them. The sheriff is armed with the process issued by the proper authority, and it is an immense power when employed by a vindictive spirit, and if such an individual was favorable to the sheriff would not the very purposes of the law be liable to be defeated, to advance the interests of the officer, and to pander to the revengeful feelings

There is another point of view—I hope I shall not be misunderstood. I have the highest respect for the profession of which I am a member, and I believe it to be an honorable and a useful one, that it has stood up for the rights of the people whenever they have been attacked. But like all other vocations, self-interest has some little influence over them. The elder gentleman from Nelson and myself had some conversation in relation to the federal court.—We counted the number of causes in the United States supreme court, and we found that the District of Columbia, small in population and territorial extent as it is, has about one-fifth of the whole number. Such would be the effect in the districts if you branch the court. Do we not now see when a court house is located in a little neighborhood, however peaceable it has been before, very soon every body gets to law, and litigation increases rapidly and to a great extent. Carry a branch of the court of appeals to every neighborhood, and what will be the effect? Instead of bringing up such causes as engage the attention of that court here, cases involving the interests and rights, very often, of the whole people, a lawyer, when his client's case is lost, would perhaps tell him that the merits of the case were in doubt, but there was a technical error, by which, if carried up, the other party could be put to an expense of from $50 to $100, as he would have to pay all the clerk's and lawyer's fees on both sides. The man who was defeated, feeling hurt and excited, would agree at once to carry up the cause, as a matter of spite. And the result will be, that a host of causes will be carried up, to result in the benefit of no person, except the clerk and others who attend at the court house. Now all will agree that this is a condition of things which ought not to be encouraged.

There are other bearings of this question which might be referred to, but as others intend to speak, I will not occupy time by touching upon them.

Now as to the number of judges. For many years—I dislike to tell how many, because I am told that I look like a younger man than I am really—I have practiced in the court of appeals, and my experience has been that these judges at present have not the time to write out their opinions as they should do. As the court is now organized without branching, they have not time fully to examine the subject, and mature and write out their opinions thereon. And one cause of the confusion in practice, and the frequency of appeals, is that too often these opinions do not settle any point of law. I once heard Judge Ewing say, and he was a sensible man, "that the court had not time to write out short opinions." It looks a little paradoxical, but it is as much a truism as any thing that was ever said. In such an opinion generally the law points are all thoroughly sifted, and fully examined, and stated clearly and distinctly. Read the opinions in the court of appeals where they have been hurried out by a press of business, although they may have been written by able men, of reasonable capacity, who understood their business, and you will find that one quarter of their opinions are rather of the character of a review of arguments than of a decision with the reasons therefor fully and distinctly set forth. All this results from a want of time. I shall be in favor of the four judges, and for another reason—for the very reason the gentleman from Nelson gave as influencing him to oppose it. He says if a cause comes up and the court is equally divided and it is therefore affirmed, and if the same question comes up in a reverse view, that the court being again divided it is also affirmed, and thus a contrary decision on the same principle is established. I have always supposed that when the first cause was decided it would be considered as establishing the precedent, and be the law, unless there should be cause for the whole court unanimously to reverse it. And if the court of appeals did stand two and two, there would be the circuit judge on one side, and thus the case would be decided by three against two. On the other hand with three judges, unless the court was unanimous, every decision would, counting in the circuit judge, stand two and two.

There has been something said in reference to an election by ballot. I do not consider it an important matter. Most of our people have inherited from Virginia the custom of voting openly and manly by viva voce. And the idea that a citizen would be afraid to vote against the judge because he might be influenced thereby against him, seems to me rather a degrading idea. I do not believe that our population is composed of any such material. I believe there is a fearless independence in the disposition of the elective franchise among our people, and that no man cares who knows how he votes. But there are a set of slanderers who go about attacking candidates although they may be as pure as the angels; but I will not refer to that. As to giving the vote by ballot, a great portion of our people unfortunately are not capable of filling out their ballots, and we should under that system have at every election fifty or one hundred political managers, who would be inducing men to come to them, and get their votes filled out. Such a system I do not desire to see introduced in this state.

Something has been said about the competency of the people to elect their officers. It is, I believe, pretty generally admitted that they are fully competent to elect their judges and clerks of the courts. But, as regards the fitness of clerks for office, I would not only require a certificate of competency, but I would require the further guarantee that the candidate for a clerkship had served two years apprenticeship before presenting himself as a candidate for office. It is an office that should be filled only by competent persons, those who are acquainted with the duties of the office by experience.

A great deal depends upon the accuracy of a clerk, a large amount of property may depend on his correctness in drawing up the records of the court in which important papers are embraced. A slip of the pen may bring entire ruin upon a man who has business before the court.

In drawing up the records of the court the utmost precision is requisite, for, although they are read over in the morning, it is seldom that the judge pays attention to their correctness, owing to the interruptions that constantly occur. If you have a clerk, who is not acquainted with his duties, you are in danger of doing irreparable injury to persons having business before the court. A mere slip of the pen, in drawing up an order of court, may ruin a man. It is very important, therefore, that there should be a form of proceedings which should be perfectly understood by every candidate for a clerkship. I am in favor of having some guarantee when a man comes before the community as a candidate for clerkship, that he has the requisite qualifications. You might as well permit a man to undertake the business of a silversmith or watchmaker, without having any knowledge of the business, as to permit him to undertake the duties of a clerk without the proper qualifications. It is a trade by itself, which ought to be understood in all its parts. I suggest, therefore, for the consideration of the committee, that the candidate for a clerkship ought not only to be required to procure a certificate of qualification, but he should be required to serve for two years, at least, before presenting himself for election. I have, myself, assisted many young men in obtaining a clerkship by putting them in possession of the proper formula of business. But, in a few weeks after their appointment they had forgotten the routine, and they were no more capable of performing the duties of clerk than a man who had never had anything to do with office. I would provide, if I had my way, that the candidate for a clerkship should previously serve a two years apprenticeship.

Mr. W. JOHNSON. I do not desire my position to be misunderstood, and therefore I will occupy the time of the committee for a very few minutes to state the views I entertain. I am opposed to the election of judges altogether, though I will not dwell on that point now. There is another question to which I shall address myself, and if that can be secured my objection to the elective principle will be somewhat diminished. The independence of the judiciary has ever been preserved by a life tenure. It has been so preserved in England as well as in this country; and the destruction of the life tenure will be the destruction of the independence of the judiciary, unless you make the judges ineligible for a re-election. A long term of service and ineligibility alone can preserve that independence which is so essential to the proper administration of justice, if the life tenure be destroyed. Gentlemen must decide between a dependent and an independent judiciary. I know it has been said that the judges in England, being dependent on the crown for their appointment, were the obsequious tools of the reigning monarch. And what will be the condition of things here if you make your judges dependent on the people in a popular election? What, sir, were the views of the convention party on this subject, which they published to the people of Kentucky upwards of a year ago, to induce them to call a convention for the purpose of framing a new constitution? Were they not unequivocally in favor of an independent judiciary? They were. And were it not that such sentiments were put forth in the published manifesto of that party, this convention would not have been called by the people. I have before me the language which the convention party used in addressing the people on this subject; and hence, sir, there can be no mistake about it, for it is susceptible of but one interpretation. From that manifesto I make the following quotation:

"Whilst we are in favor of such modes of appointment of judges as will strictly preserve the independence of the judiciary, and opposed to any mode which would be calculated to weaken or destroy the independence of that department, we hold that the members of the courts should be amenable to practicable responsibility—we are decidedly in favor of limiting the term a judge shall hold his office—good behavior for a limited term of years should be the tenure of judicial station."

Such was their language sir; and it was the language of some fifteen or twenty delegates on this floor, for they signed that document, and I cannot be brought to believe that they will disregard and do violence to so solemn a pledge. I am aware that the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) has here reiterated his intention to maintain the principle of the ineligibility of the judges after one term of service; and on no other principle can their independence be maintained. Frequent elections of a judge would be pernicious in their consequences, for they would thus be made more solicitous to meet popular favor than to administer righteous judgments. Sir, ought our judicial bench to seek instruction from the people? Ought they not rather to administer the laws of the land uninfluenced by an approaching election? If it were otherwise, they ought to leave the judicial bench and mingle among the people to ascertain how they are required to decide a particular case? And are there any gentlemen in this convention who are willing to reduce our judicial officers to such a degrading and disgraceful condition? I fear there are extreme opinions held here on this subject, and I say it with regret. One honorable gentleman frankly told me that he saw no distinction between the office of a representative of the people in the halls of legislation, and the judge on the bench, and that if the representative was dependent on the will of the people, the judge should be put in the same position. But sir, is there not a marked difference between the two. The representatives of the people are to make laws in accordance with the sentiment of the community, which those laws are to protect; but when made, it is the duty of the judge to administer the laws with impartiality until they shall be changed by the same popular will that gave them being. In the making of laws, therefore, the popular voice must be heard, but no influence should swerve a judge from the upright administration of those laws which have thus been made.

The rights, the persons, and the property of the citizens of this commonwealth, are dependent on the proper administration of justice, and hence there is a deep necessity that the judges should be removed from all improper influences, and from the tendency to court popular applause, to which a re-election would subject them. The judiciary, I repeat, must be independent, if our rights and liberties are to be secured; and the life tenure is well calculated to preserve that independence. But make the judiciary removable by a majority of the legislature, and on the legislature they become dependent. Their independence will also be gone if they shall be compelled to court popular favor after a short time of service. What is it sir, that protects the weak against the strong? What is it that protects the poor against the rich and the powerful? Certainly sir, not a dependent judiciary. I am in favor of an independent judiciary, and I am willing to agree to a long term of service and ineligibility for a re-election, by which I hope it may be maintained. And why sir, should judges be re-elected? We are to have twelve circuit judges and three judges of the court of appeals, which will be one man to a population of about 10,000. Now suppose we say to this one man in 10,000, having held the office for eight years, having been sucking at the treasury pail during that time, you must now stand aside and give place to one of the 9,999. What hardship will be inflicted? Is rotation in office so very objectionable? In my judgment it will be a means whereby we may secure our safety.

It is a well settled principle, that a judge should not decide nor a witness testify in a case in which either has a personal interest; nor should a judge be placed in a position in which he may be tempted to pervert the administration of justice to secure a re-election to the bench, which may be worth to him some $10,000. He should not be tempted, in times of popular excitement, to meet by his decisions popular favor, and to guard against this, I implore the committee to preserve the independence of the judiciary.

Mr. NUTTALL. I have a small proposition to make, by way of amendment to this bill. I do not claim to belong to that class of the profession who occupy, or are supposed to occupy, such a distinguished position in the country as some gentlemen in this convention. I have had all my life a limited practice in one of the circuit courts on the border of the State; and I suppose that my friend from Oldham knows that some times I get a fifteen shillings fee. I have never yet had the honor to appear in this court of appeals. The idea of coming before so enlightened a tribunal has always had a marked effect upon me. I know nothing else, save my modesty, that has produced it. I came into the legislature in 1823, and I met on that occasion more distinguished men—this body excepted—than I have on any other occasion; such men as the lamented Rowan, a man whose fame will live in the recollection of his countrymen as long as any other shall live. I met here a Green, a Hardin, a Robertson, a Wickliffe, with many other distinguished gentlemen, as I conceive, forming the brightest galaxy of statesmen that have, in any age, or in the history of this country, assembled together. And last, not least, I met a man whose thrilling eloquence in the other end of the capitol, had an influence throughout the commonwealth of Kentucky, that will scarcely die so long as it shall last. But, from that time to this, since those men have passed off the stage of action, I have been hunting about for a great man to whom the gentleman alluded in his speech. But, where to find him, if we undertook it with a search warrant, God only knows, unless you go up into the caves of Madison county.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think, when we district this State, as I hope will be done, that there is sufficient material—if not in this house, there is, at least, certainly out of it, and of the right sort too—gentlemen of the bar, who are well qualified to fill the office of judge in the court of appeals. I disagree with one of my friends from Nelson on the subject of districting the State and making the court of appeals branchable, and the very reason the gentleman from Nelson and the gentleman from Madison urged against it, is the most cogent reason with me that it is the most practicable and best. And what is that objection? It is, that out of the cases that have been decided in the supreme court of the United States, the greatest amount of business has been brought up from the district of Columbia. And why is this? Because justice is brought nearer to the door of the suitors.—Now, that is the very reason why I will go for branching the court of appeals, that the people of the State may have an appellate tribunal nearer their doors, where justice may be administered.

With regard to the cost for libraries, court houses, and many other things that will arise from branching the court of appeals, that is a matter of very little consideration with me; for the people who desire that the court of appeals should be thus branched are the very people who will pay the expenses. The whole people of the state of Kentucky are now taxed, in common, for these expenses. The civil list is swelled for the purpose of keeping up and separating the court of appeals, as it now stands, while some of those who contribute to its support, live hundreds of miles off. And the poor man who has a case which he desires should be tried before the appellate court, is alarmed when he is told that he will have to go some two hundred miles with his witnesses to attend court. I am for branching the court, and I shall vote for it. There is no constitutional question now in the way, and I desire the distribution of justice equally throughout the commonwealth.

I shall therefore vote for branching the court of appeals, and I shall go for the four judges. The gentleman from Nelson assumed that if a case came up before four judges, and they disagree, the decision of the circuit judge is held to be the law of the land, and other cases will be governed by the principle thus settled. Well sir, thus far I am understood. Now as to the section about clerks. The gentleman from Nelson understands thoroughly the duties of the clerk's office, I have no doubt; at all events, he knows something on the subject; but there is a difficulty which seems to haunt his mind in regard to the judges' decisions. The gentleman from Madison says, that he knows a judge who could not write a short decision, because he had not time. Well, if our judges instead of trying to show so much learning, instead of running into every book on the face of the earth, that has the name of a law book, if, instead of doing this, they would take a little time to write their opinions, there would be no difficulty about it. If they would prepare their opinions as Lord Mansfield was accustomed to do, or Lord Hardwicke, from whose decisions not more than three appeals were ever taken, and these were affirmed—if he would write them out on one page, there would be no objection on that ground. If they would—as judge Scott used to do in the court of admiralty—if they would write out their opinions in a few lines, no difficulty would arise on that subject. Whether they wish to build up a reputation by giving long decisions, I do not know, but it seems that our judges have got into the habit of giving decisions that will fill entire books. Yes sir, books. They must enlarge, dilate, run into every sort of legal ramification, do every thing to show to the bar and the country, that they are men of profound learning. I do not pretend to be a judge of their decisions—I never wade through them. As far as the points at issue in law cases are concerned, the examination of these long decisions is too often an unnecessary work.

With regard to the term for which they are appointed, the gentleman has discussed that with his usual ability. I have already said as much on the subject as I wish to say, although I have said nothing yet on the subject of balloting for these judges. It seems to me, though I do not know myself which way to vote upon that, I am very much like a justice of the peace in our county by the name of Searcy. There was a trial concerning the right of property, and the constable got him to come and act as one of the appraisers and sit as judge. While there, a question came up, whether such and such evidence should be permitted to go to the jury. Henderson, a distinguished lawyer, argued that the evidence ought not to be admitted. "To be sure," said the magistrate to Mr. Henderson, "you seem to take very correct ground on this subject. I think as you do that this evidence ought not to be admitted." Chas. Allen, the lawyer on the other side then interposed. "Don't decide the point until you have heard me," said he. "Certainly I will hear you," replied he. Allen went on for fifteen or twenty minutes, and the magistrate observed, "Allen seems to be right." Henderson says, "don't decide yet, you were right at first," and he argued the point over again, and the magistrate again came to the conclusion that he was right. Allen then insisted upon arguing it over again, and the magistrate became at last so confused, that he said to the lawyers, "come up and decide it for yourselves." Some gentlemen have argued so ably on the ballot side of the question, and others so ably on the vice voce side, that I cannot tell which way I ought to go, and perhaps I had better reserve my opinion until the yeas and nays are called, for I have great difficulties on both sides. I did think that a man of my boldness, or the gentleman's boldness, would hate to go up and vote against a judge right full in his face, and perhaps too, when he had an important case of ours pending before him; while on the other side, it does seem to me, that the independent character of our people would be lessened very much, by saying that if the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Turner,) has not himself moral courage sufficient to go up and vote against the judge, the great balance of the people of the state would not have.

On the subject of the clerks, I do not know whether I am radical or not. I believe I am about like the balance—not of the members on this floor—but of the people generally. I believe I am as often wrong as right. I do not claim to be perfection in matters connected with my legislative duties; but it rather seems to me, that if we are determined, and if it is right that we should do so, and if we have the capacity to elect our judges we have the capacity to elect the clerks; and I go for electing them—without taking lessons from any man—for I take lessons from no man on earth. The gentleman says, license is required before you can practice law. That is true, but did that ever make a man qualified on the face of the earth? How many men will appear with the certificate or license of the judges, recommending him to the community, who can not bring or try a suit to save his life? It takes, as Coke said—no I won't quote authority—it takes, according to my experience, a man at least twenty years, steady, continuous training to become anything like qualified to hold the situation of circuit judge, or judge of the court of appeals. And sir, let the people judge of the qualifications of candidates for office—whether for a clerkship or a judgeship. I have come out for the people. I am a people's man, and I say if we elect one officer let us elect all; and let us not say to the people in one breath that they are qualified to elect every officer provided for by this constitution, and in the same breath tell them there are some officers whom they are not to be permitted to elect, unless they have a certificate of qualification. Do not the people vote for President of the United States? Does the President have to undergo an examination? Has he to pass the ordeal of some political junta, to ascertain whether he is qualified or not? I know many Presidents who have been elected within the last twenty five years, who, as old Ben. Craig said, "If they had had to get a Deplorum, they never would have been Presidents of the United States." I think the "toiling million" that we hear so much of before the election and so little after, are as capable of electing a clerk without his having a certificate of qualification from a judge, or from any body else, as they would be if he had ever so many certificates. Has not the gentleman from Madison (Mr. Turner) told you, that he has procured clerkships for persons who were not qualified? He helped them through by his ingenuity, although they were not qualified for the office before they got it, and were not qualified afterwards. I suppose from what he said, that for a good fee he could put in a stock or a stone. Whether he took his fee from these men, I don't know: I suppose he did not, for I am told he doesn't love money. Sir, there is a more important consideration than that. If you will convince me that the judges who are to be elected to the court of appeals bench will be infallible—that they will have none of the imperfections of our nature—none of our affections or partialities, then sir, I have no difficulty with regard to giving them the power of licensing clerks or of throwing around them these restrictions. But suppose that two or three gentlemen of the court of appeals should have some son, or brother, or other connexion whom they wanted to make clerk. Why they would refuse to grant a certificate to every other man who applied to them, or else they would certify that they were not qualified. How long is it since the office of reporter to the court of appeals became vacant, when one judge insisted upon having his nephew appointed, and another had a friend he wished to give the office to, and it was a long time before we knew whether we would have a reporter at all or not. If a judge of the court of appeals be guilty of a proceeding like this in the face of the country, might he not be influenced in the same way in relation to the clerkship? How would it be with the circuit court judge? You would have perhaps twenty men who could get certificates, and not one of them qualified for the office. Do gentlemen desire to put the judges in a position that would subject them to suspicion? If we throw the whole responsibility of electing public officers upon the people, let them judge of the qualification of the candidates, and I have no doubt it will have a happy influence in making the people themselves investigate the pretensions and claims of the various gentlemen offering their services to fill the offices that we intend to provide for in this constitution. The great object that we all have in view, is to secure for the country an enlightened, learned judicial tribunal—a tribunal that is intended to protect the weak against the strong—to protect the rights of the poor man against the powerful. If this can be done, and I have no doubt it can, the amendment I have offered, proposes that any gentleman who has offered for judgeship, shall be found treating or speaking in public during the canvass, he shall be wholly disqualified for holding office.

I am not afraid to trust the people—not at all. It has not only been so here, but it has been so from the foundation of the government down to the present day, that when a person undertakes to defend the rights of the people against any sort of oppression, he is denounced as a demagogue. I have heard the cry of demagoguism from one end of this body to the other? Well, gentlemen and myself differ with regard to the origin of the word "demagogue." I am going with the convention men, particularly with those who are not for stealing any of the rights of the people away from them. I am for taking the right to elect the officers of this government boldly and fearlessly from the department to which it has been entrusted, and for restoring it back into the hands of the people, where it of right belongs. Every great man in the world that has raised his voice in behalf of the people against the oppressions of the few, has been denounced as a demagogue. Those who have been the friends of the poor man have been proclaimed as demagogues. Now sir, I do not wish to see anything of this kind in this country if it could be avoided. The greatest evil that can arise from electing our judiciary would be, that we should have the judges of the circuit court defending themselves against the decisions of the supreme court and vice versa. My amendment contemplates that the man who will enter upon a system of public speaking or canvassing a district or the state, shall be disqualified from holding office, and that the governor shall not commission him. I do not wish to see the time arrive in the history of this country, when this state of things will exist. I have no idea that the people will be misled. It is not that I have an objection to allowing the people to elect their judges, but I have an objection to see a man canvassing for an office of this sort, where he is to have in his keeping, the rights, the liberties, and even the life, property, and happiness of the people.

I sir, shall have nothing to regret if my amendment gets no vote at all; but if I find out that I cannot get a pretty hearty support for it, I believe I will withdraw it; and I intend whenever I have a proposition that I do not like, to back out myself; and I intend to do it boldly, so that every man may know what I am at. Not like the gentleman who last addressed the house. He is climbing down faster than any man I ever saw.

Now, I hope I am going to speak some sober sense! I do not know that I shall have credit for it, however, for I rarely get credit for any thing. I am not going to draw any invidious distinctions, and I consult no gentleman as to what I shall say. I am neither to be led nor unled. I did not consult the leading men of this convention whether I ought to introduce my proposition, and I am not going to consult them whether I shall withdraw it. There is one leading gentleman who, I know, was not consulted, and that is, I myself. Now, if we are going to make a constitution, I think it is time we set about it; and I want my two friends from Nelson, and the distinguished President of the convention, and all the balance of the distinguished members of the convention—for we are all distinguished alike—and when I say distinguished, I do not mean to say that one is distinguished above another—I desire that we shall harmonize, consult together, and determine upon a constitution that will be acceptable to the people. For myself, sir, I am not ambitious of fame. I do not care that in twenty five years from now, or fifty, when I shall be lying under the cold sod of the valley, in all probability, and when no mortal can find out the spot where I lie, my name shall be remembered. I have no ambition of extending my fame beyond the lids of the coffin, or my winding sheet. Nothing of the sort. But I want to unite in making a constitution that will be acceptable to the people because other men's fame is involved in it. I would make it live in eternal freshness in the memory of our countrymen. I care nothing for such considerations as those of personal celebrity. They do not influence me. The great breakers that are before us, are, that we have too many great men among us. I am willing, for the balance of the session, to lay down all my pretensions. I think I have had my full share now; and I do not wish to act the part of a glutton, who does not know when to quit. I am going to deliver up into the hands of the balance of this convention the further conduct of the business. I only hope they will not crowd the constitution too much with details. The great object is to have it made, and have it made in short order, and not to have too much put in it. I know that I have wearied the convention, but this is the last time, perhaps, that I shall trespass upon their patience; if I do not get into so bad a humor as I did last evening, and for acting so bad on that occasion, I ask the pardon of this house.

Mr. APPERSON. I do not know that I should have risen on this occasion, but for the heavy blow that was aimed by the gentleman from Madison against one of the provisions embraced in the report. I supposed that we had assembled here for a special purpose; that there were a few things that we had to do; and in saying this much, I hope it will not be considered that I am reading a lecture to this committee. I supposed that the people had demanded that our organic law should be remodelled. And, as far as I can learn, the great principle which the people have insisted is erroneous and requires change is, the life tenure of office of the judges. There are some gentlemen who seem disposed to concede that the people shall have the right to elect their judicial officers, but at the same time they seem to think that it is granting too much to permit the tenure of office to be limited. I supposed, sir, that this was a fact, a fixed fact, on which the people had determined all over the land, that there should be a limitation upon the term of office. With regard to other matters, as that the judiciary should be elected by the people, there was a general concurrence, and I thought there was also a concurrence that the tenure of office should be limited. I understood that this was the great object for which this convention was called, and as the people had generally declared in favor of electing the judges, we had nothing to do in reference to that matter, but to carry out the will of the people. Having done that, and having said that the election should take place in one day, there was but little else for this convention to do, and it was wholly unnecessary that we should be here three weeks, discussing abstract principles. I think my friend from Henry alluded to me when he said that three or four gentlemen seemed determined to have the business of making the constitution in their own hands. If he had said nine or ten I should certainly have concluded that he meant to embrace me among the number. We have had nothing tangible before the convention till the committee on the court of appeals made their report. Since we have had something tangible as the result of that report, and as I was one of the committee who made that report, I take his remark as applying to myself.

I did not design to discuss the whole argument presented to the committee, but there were some heavy blows administered by the gentleman from Madison, and by the elder gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) and especially on the subject of branching this court. But this is nothing new certainly. So long ago as 1816 this principle was introduced, and there we find in favor of it some of the first names of that period. Subsequently, it has been introduced here and favorably received. But how frequently have we heard the objection that we have no right to do this, because it is not recognized by the constitution. There is the stumbling block. There has been an expression all over the country that the court of appeals should be branched, and hence the legislature itself has frequently undertaken to branch this court. Now, I am not at all surprised that the gentleman from Madison is opposed to it, not that I would impute to him any improper motive, and I would hope that I have a proper estimate of his talents, for he was my teacher, and I confess that that estimation for him is very high. But he does not undergo any of those inconveniences which those meet who live at a great distance from Frankfort. He lives near the centre of the state, within a few hours ride of the capital, and I will show that it is those who live immediately around the capital that are in the habit of doing the business of the court of appeals. We were told more than once that the docket of the supreme court in the district of Columbia was crowded. But there are more reasons than one for that. It was said that it was because the sitting of the court being there, made it so convenient, and that is one of the strongest reasons that could possibly be given why the court should sit in more places than one. But there is another reason that has not been alluded to. In all the circuit courts of the United States we have a judge who is a judge of the supreme court also, but in the district of Columbia they have their own judges who have no voice and no seat upon the bench of the supreme court. And the presumption is, that where a judge of the supreme court presides, more satisfaction is given, and there are fewer appeals. But the other reason is the main one, because the court is held at the very doors of the suitors, and they are put to no inconvenience in having justice administered to them.

But it is said, here is to be an increase of cost. Cost of what? Of court houses to be built? Many counties will say send it to us, and it will not cost the state a cent. It is said there must be a library. I know that the gentleman from Madison has a library little inferior to the public library here. Will not the library of every lawyer where the court may be established be opened to the service of the court, and will they not thus have every possible facility for consulting authorities? This looks like a kind of scare crow, to deter us from branching the court, because it is to cost something. It is said you will have to carry books about, or have a library in every place. But it is not so. I want to show to the counties in the vicinity of Frankfort that if you will examine the docket of the court of appeals you will see a great disproportion between the number of cases brought from the counties in the vicinity and those more remote. If it be said that if you branch the court there will be more courts held, and more litigation, I reply, that if that is a good reason against branching the court, it is equally good for abolishing it altogether. If it be objected that the court of appeals should not be branched on account of the cost; the same reason applies for not having any court of appeals. I want to show another thing, it is, that as you go away from the capital the disproportion of suits brought to the court of appeals is most manifest. I have a little table of statistics on this point, and if any gentleman will just take the docket of the court of appeals and look at it, and compare it impartially, it will be impossible for him to come to the conclusion that it is not proper to sit in more than one locality. I have taken first five counties where there are four judges. Now it cannot be possible that they are all the worst judges in the state. In these five counties of Woodford, Fayette, Bourbon, Nicholas and Fleming, there were fifty cases sent to the last court of appeals, which is equivalent to one hundred cases in a year. But there were thirteen hundred and twelve new suits in the circuit courts in those counties during the year 1848. Now look at the same number of counties on the borders of Tennessee, and remote from Frankfort, and see what is the number of cases brought to this court. From the counties of Pulaski, Green, Barren, Warren, and Logan, where there were nine hundred and seventy one cases brought in the circuit courts in 1848, there were ten whole cases sent to the court of appeals at the last term, and ten only. If we compare the number of voters in these counties, we find that in the five first named counties, from which fifty cases were sent to the court of appeals at the last term, there are nine thousand six hundred and thirty six, and in the last named five counties, there are eleven thousand seven hundred and fifty six voters, making a balance of some twenty one hundred more voters in those counties from which only ten cases were sent to the last court of appeals.

Again, take the counties of Estill, Madison, Garrard, and Mercer, which are comparatively near to Frankfort, and you find that they sent fifty one cases at the last term, to the court of appeals, while they had during the year 1848 seven hundred and fifty two new suits brought in the circuit courts. Now, in opposition to these four counties, take the four counties of Caldwell, Hopkins, Henderson, and Daviess, and you find that while they had during the year 1848 seven hundred and seventy six new cases in the circuit courts, they had only three cases come up to the court of appeals at the last term. Here were three judges, and only three appearances in the last court.

I will now take a number of counties in the neighborhood of my friend from Nelson; taking Washington, Marion, Nelson, Jefferson, and Meade, counties that are not distant from Frankfort, and I find that there were seventy nine cases sent up at the last term, and to the court of appeals, while ten counties, at the extreme southern border of the state, viz: Fulton, Hickman, Graves, Calloway, Marshall, Ballard, McCracken, Trigg, Crittenden, and Livingston, sent only ten cases to the court of appeals; ten counties, and only ten cases. Now, sir, I can take fourteen counties in the state that have brought more cases to the court of appeals than all the other counties in the state. To what other conclusion then, can we come, than that here in the centre of the state is the centre of the talent, and hence arises the amount of business of the appellate court. Is it possible to conclude otherwise, when we see that in the remote parts of the state, the rights of the citizens are as frequently contested in the circuit courts as in the centre, while in the appellate courts, the rights of litigants from those counties are scarcely ever heard.

I know that the gentleman from Madison has a most extensive practice, because we have a very accommodating law allowing suits to be brought from all the circuit courts. How does it happen, when this may be done, and when we are told that it may be done by brief, and that a brief is all that is necessary, that so few cases come from remote counties to this court?

It may be said, that in the comparison which I have instituted, I have selected the pauper counties, and that the counties nearer the capital have the wealth. But on a comparison of Mercer with Daviess, or of Garrard with Henderson, and it will be found that there is a preponderance of wealth in the two latter counties, and yet from Garrard there were nineteen cases in the last court of appeals, and from Mercer ten, while from each of the counties of Daviess and Henderson there was only one. Does not this prove something? If you look at the voting population, if you look at the wealth, you find that in those counties where the least business has come to the court of appeals, there is the greatest number of the voting population, the greatest amount of wealth, and the most business done in the circuit courts. But when you go from Frankfort, then the business, except that in the circuit court, ceases. How is this, if the business may be done in the court of appeals by a brief as well as by actual attendance? Gentlemen know that it is necessary to make oral motions, and that a lawyer must be present for this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I am becoming hoarse, and I find it inconvenient to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I move, as a favor to my colleague on the committee on the court of appeals, that the committee now rise.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1849.

CIRCUIT COURTS.

Mr. HARDIN, from the committee on circuit courts, made the following report:

ARTICLE —

SEC. 1. There shall be established in each county now, or which may hereafter be erected within this commonwealth, circuit courts.

SEC. 2. The jurisdiction of said courts shall be and remain as it now exists, hereby giving to the legislature the power to change or alter it.

SEC. 3. The right to take an appeal, or sue out a writ of error to the court of appeals, is hereby given in the same manner and to the same extent as it now exists, giving to the legislature the power to change, alter, or modify, said right.

SEC. 4. At the first session of the legislature after this constitution shall go into effect, the legislature shall lay off the commonwealth into twelve judicial districts, having due regard to business and population: Provided, That no county shall be divided.

SEC. 5. The legislature shall, at the same time that the judicial districts are laid off, direct elections to be held in each district to elect a judge for said district, and shall prescribe how and in what manner the elections shall be held and conducted, and how the governor shall be notified of the result of the election, and who has been chosen: Provided, That such election shall be held at a different time from that at which elections are holden for governor, lieutenant governor and members of the legislature.

SEC. 6. All persons qualified to vote for members of the legislature, in each district, shall have the right to vote for judges.

SEC. 7. No person shall be elected judge who has not attained the age of thirty five years at the time of his election, and been a practicing lawyer eight years, and resided in the district five years immediately preceding his election.

SEC. 8. The person elected as judge shall continue in office for — years, unless he shall move out of the district for which he is elected, or be removed from office as hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 9. The governor, so soon as he is notified of the election of a judge, shall issue a commission to the person, so elected, for the term of — years from the date of the commission.

SEC. 10. If the judicial business of this state shall so increase, from time to time, as to make it necessary for other judicial districts to be created, the legislature is hereby authorized to create one district every — years, but in no event shall there ever be more than — judicial districts.

SEC. 11. The legislature shall provide by law a competent and adequate compensation to be paid to the judges out of the public treasury, but in no event shall the compensation of each judge be less than sixteen hundred dollars.

SEC. 12. The judges of the circuit court shall be removed from office by a resolution of the general assembly, passed by — of all the members of each house. The reasons for the resolution shall be entered at large on the journal of each house.

SEC. 13. The judges shall likewise be subject to impeachment, to be instituted, carried on, and tried in the same manner that impeachments are directed under our present constitution, and for the same offences as therein pointed out, and a conviction shall have the same effect.

SEC. 14. There shall be an attorney for each judicial district, elected by the qualified voters of each district at the time the election is held for judge, whose duty it shall be to attend to the business of the commonwealth as now prescribed by law, and such other business as the legislature may, from time to time, direct and prescribe.

SEC. 15. No person shall be elected attorney for the commonwealth unless he shall have attained, at the time of his election, the age of twenty-five years, and been — years a resident of the district for which he is elected, and — years a practicing lawyer.

SEC. 16. The election for commonwealth's attorney, after the result shall be ascertained in the manner the legislature may direct, shall be certified to the governor, who shall issue a commission to the person elected, to serve for years from the date of the commission.

SEC. 17. The legislature shall, from time to time, fix and regulate the annual compensation of the attorneys, but in no event shall it be less than three hundred dollars.

SEC. 18. Upon every conviction on a presentment or indictment for a misdemeanor, there shall be allowed to the commonwealth's attorney, to be fixed and regulated by law, not less than two dollars and one half.

SEC. 19. The governor shall have no power to remit the fees of the clerk, sheriff, or commonwealth's attorney, in penal and criminal cases.

SEC. 20. The commonwealth's attorney shall, after his election, continue to reside in the district for which he is elected, during his continuance in office, and if he shall move out of the district he shall forfeit his office, and the vacancy shall be filled in the same manner as if he had resigned.

SEC. 21. At the same time that judges and attorneys for the commonwealth are elected for each district, each county of the district shall, by the qualified voters thereof, elect a clerk for the circuit court of said county, whose duties, fees, and responsibilities shall be the same as now fixed and regulated by law; but the legislature may, from time to time, change, modify, and alter the same, and regulate how, and in what manner, the governor shall be notified of the result of the elections.

SEC. 22. No person shall be elected clerk of the circuit court, unless he has attained the age of twenty-one years, been a resident of the county for which he may be elected — years, and have a certificate from the judges of the court of appeals, that he is qualified to discharge the duties of clerk.

SEC. 23. When the governor is notified, in the manner prescribed by law, he shall issue a commission to the person elected clerk, to serve as clerk for said circuit court for — years, from the date of his commission.

SEC. 24. If a vacancy shall occur in the office of judge of the circuit court, or in the office of attorney for the district, or in the office of clerk of a circuit court, the governor shall issue a writ of election to fill such vacancy, and the person elected shall continue in office during the unexpired portion of the time which he may be elected to fill, and until his successor shall be duly qualified.

SEC. 25. The judges, attorneys, and clerks, provided for in this article, shall not only continue in office the times herein prescribed, but until their successors are duly qualified to enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 26. The judges of the circuit courts, attorneys, and clerks, who are now in office, or who may be put into office under the present constitution, shall continue in office until their successors, as are prescribed in this article, shall not only be elected, but qualified to enter upon the discharge of the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 27. The legislature shall not have power to change the venue in any prosecution for treason, felony, or a misdemeanor; but upon the accused presenting a petition to the judge of the court where the prosecution may be depending, out of term time or to the court when in session, which petition shall be verified upon oath, stating in said petition that he does not believe he can have a fair and impartial trial by a jury of the county, to direct a venire facias to any adjoining county the judge may select, and the sheriff of the county to which the venire facias may be directed shall summon twelve good and lawful men as jurors to try the accused, who shall, at the time appointed in said writ, repair to the court as therein directed, and who shall be a jury to try the accused unless challenged by him, and if challenged, the place of the person challenged shall be supplied with bystanders: Provided, They live out of the county where the trial is about to be had; and if bystanders, as herein prescribed, cannot be had, the court shall have the power to send the sheriff into the adjoining counties to summon bystanders.

SEC. 28. The legislature shall have power, and is hereby directed, to provide, by law, for the pay of the jurors and sheriffs for the services herein required.

Mr. HARDIN. Before I sit down I shall move to have the report printed, and referred to the committee of the whole and made the special order for Monday next. It is proper, perhaps, that I should give some explanation in regard to some of the provisions of the report. The committee have convened on a great many occasions, and as was to be expected, on some propositions they agreed almost unanimously, while on others they were divided. There was no question on which the division was so exactly equal, as in regard to eligibility. It was agreed last night that we should not report on that point, but leave it open until we might collect the judgment of the house, and then to report in accordance with that judgment.

There are at present nineteen circuit judges in the State; and this report proposes that there shall be only twelve. The circuit judges now get $1200 each per annum; this plan proposes to give them $1600. This plan proposes to add largely to the duties of the judge, and to increase his pay $400 per annum. We believe that take the average of the judges under the present system, and their duties do not engage them over 80 days in the year. And they have not considered $1200 so adequate a compensation as to exempt them from the necessity of following other pursuits. We desire to relieve them from that necessity, and the report proposes that they shall sit 150 days in the year, and receive $1600 a year, to be increased, if it is not enough, by the legislature.

We have not raised the salaries of the commonwealth's attorneys, but by way of inducing the best lawyers in the State to take the office, we have restored the old law in relation to the collection of fees on indictments, and presentments for misdemeanor. I had between the years 1807 and 1815, the duties of commonwealth's attorney to perform, and during that time the court appointed me for four counties and after that, the law being altered, the governor appointed me for five counties. My receipts from the taxing of fees amounted to something like $1500 to $2000 per annum. The fees do not come from the people, but from those who violate the law, and they will not amount in most instances to more than fifteen shillings each. We were very much embarrassed in our action on the subject of attorneys and clerks, as we found the matter had been referred to another committee, yet connected as it was with the duties devolving on our committee, we must be excused for reporting on the subject. The committee of course could decide between the two reports.

The circuit court system as it now exists, including commonwealth's attorneys' salary, costs the State $28,600. Under the system we propose, including also the pay of the commonwealth's attorneys, it will cost the State but $22,800. Thus if it goes into operation, it will save the State $5,700 per annum. One ground of complaint on the part of the people, was that the government was too expensive, and the desire was that if practicable we should retrace our steps in this particular. These complaints the committee have endeavored to remedy, and at the same time to secure a more efficient system of circuit courts. I have no fault to find with the present judges that I am aware of—either of the court of appeals or of the circuit judges.—They are about as able men as we can get; but I want to give them such a compensation as will obviate any necessity of their resorting to other business to secure a living. I am acquainted with all the circuit judges in the country, and with all the appellate judges, except the last gentleman appointed, whom I hear very favorably spoken of. I do not desire a change in the system because I have any objection to the judges, for I have no idea that we shall get better men than chief justice Marshall and his associate judge Simpson, or the gentleman last appointed, but I desire that it shall be improved. This report relates to what I consider the most important branch of the judiciary, who have our lives and liberties in their care, and the committee have bestowed the utmost care and labor on their report. I therefore move that the report be referred to the committee of the whole, made the special order of the day for Monday next, and that 500 copies of it be printed.

This motion prevailed.

COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the court of appeals.

Mr. APPERSON having the floor, said: I feel myself under obligations to the committee for the courtesy it displayed towards me yesterday in rising and adjourning until to-day, so as to afford me an opportunity further to address them on the subject which occupied my attention at the time of the adjournment.

I had dwelt more particularly on the subject of branching the court, and although it was not then wholly disposed of, yet I was so nearly through with it that I will not undertake to travel over the ground again. It may be said, and perhaps since I closed yesterday it has been said, that in making out the table I then submitted, I had selected a particular portion of the state most suitable to my purpose, and that perhaps other counties lying nearer Frankfort would not have presented the same inequality. That I deny. I laid down yesterday as one of my propositions, this inequality; and that one of the reasons I referred to the particular counties I did, was to have as many different judges in the counties as possible, so as to obviate the objection that it was a bad judge whose district was selected. Hence it was that I selected as many judges as I could. But to satisfy the committee on this point—there was the county of Nicholas which had but four causes in the court of appeals. Had I chosen, I could have selected counties immediately adjacent to Nicholas—one with eight, another with ten, and another with the same number—eight and twenty cases in all. Why did I not do it? Because they were not in the way of the line I was drawing. I did not undertake to present a one-sided view. There were the counties of Harrison, Mason, and Bath, not one of which brought up to the court less than eight cases, and unitedly twenty eight causes. Yet I omitted them and put in the county of Nicholas, sending but four causes. That appeared to me, at any rate, to be fair. But I can extend my tables a little further. If every gentleman could look at that map (of the State of Kentucky) I would desire him to trace a line with me. I will take a section of the state, of which I have made a table, commencing with the county of Whitley, and embracing Pulaski, Casey, Green and Taylor, Hardin and Breckinridge, and down the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, and around the Tennessee line to the beginning, and embracing forty two counties of the southern portion of the state. And how many cases were brought up to the court at its last term from that whole region of country? The whole number at the June term of the court was three hundred and sixty five for the whole state, and out of that number, this region, embracing almost half the population of the state, had only sixty four causes—leaving to the other portion of the state three hundred and one causes. Take more than half the territory, and nearly one half of the voting population of the state, and they had brought up just sixty four causes, whereas the remaining portion of the state brought up three hundred and one! But if I were disposed to make it appear still worse than that, I might have gone to the head of the Big Sandy river, the great Chatteroi of the Indians, and beginning at Harlan, have included also the counties of Harlan, Knox, Letcher, Perry, Clay and Laurel. You will see at once what an immense territory it comprises, and yet those counties, so distant are they from the seat of government, have sent up but one cause here. Sixty five causes only have come from two thirds of the state so far as territory is concerned, and embracing upwards of sixty thousand voters, out of one hundred and forty one thousand, the whole number in the state as reported by the auditor last year. This is almost half of the voting population of the state, and while they have sent up but sixty five causes, the remaining portion of the state has sent up exactly three hundred. Now am I to be told that this table is a partial one, and does not truly represent the facts? My object was to select the counties so that they would run regularly and have as many judges as possible, that it could be seen whether the fault was on the part of the judges, or whether there were not some other reasons for this disparity. Suppose on the other hand that I had selected a class of counties with the least possible business, I should make a different sort of table from what I did. The counties of Adair, Allen, Ballard, Butler, Caldwell, Casey, Calloway, Edmonson, Grayson, Hart, Hickman, Marshall, Monroe and Whitley, did not have a single cause in the court of appeals. Now if I had been disposed to make as bad a comparison as possible, I could have made the selection from these particular counties. And I might have named counties adjacent to these and have one continuous line too, with even still fewer causes at the court of appeals. I mean by this, counties lying on the south of those I have named.

Now some gentleman may say that this proves too much—that there is too much litigation, and that these counties are better off if they do not enjoy the facilities within the reach of those immediately around the capital. If their lot is so blessed in being distant from the court of appeals, let us at once say to the people here, this is a great curse to central Kentucky—you have to pay all this expense—the costs come out of you, and this court is a great curse. Why if there be all these objections to it—if it is not a blessing, why are we making provision that there shall be a court of appeals? I insist it is a blessing, and those who live at remote parts of the state, should, as near as may be, have the same facilities to have their rights adjudicated upon, as those immediately around the capital. My attention was called to the question as to how the court would stand in regard to the affirmation or reversal of cases brought there from the different circuits. Without undertaking to refer to any particular causes, I will state that the court of appeals commenced its session on the 5th day of June, and up to the 2d July, on looking at the record, I find that there were sixty reversals and seventy affirmances. Well, we must suppose that in these sixty cases thus reversed, there was something to reverse, and some error in the court below; and if these counties in the neighborhood are thus to enjoy the privilege of having their rights maintained, do, if you please, extend the same privilege to the distant portions of the state. Give us the same facilities as near as may be, for, of course, I do not expect they will travel into every county.

An objection has been urged in regard to the furnishing of law libraries; and we were told that the public library has cost the state about $3,000. I presume there are very few county towns in the state, where the libraries of the lawyers residing there did not cost much more than that amount. There was a time when such men as Trimble, Boyle, Bibb, Mills, and divers others who have never been surpassed in Kentucky, so far as I have any knowledge, sat on the bench of that court, and where was the state library then? And there were as learned and as eminent lawyers in those days as now, but where was the public library then? And yet the absence of one is now one of the greatest objections urged against branching the court of appeals, if we shall decide to have one. Another objection was the cost, and yet has any gentleman, who has advanced it, told the committee how it was to cost a single dollar more. Are the people to be taxed? No, the expenses are to be paid by the litigants just as at present. Not a dollar is to be drawn from the treasury. What else is there? There is the tipstaff. How will he be an additional expense. He is hired by the day, and will not there be just the same expense to be incurred, whether they sit in one or four places? What other expenses are there? I have heard it said this system is to be more expensive, and yet wherein it is to be so, has not as yet been pointed out. I have heard it said, also, that to branch the court, would be to crowd the court houses with lawyers—but is that so? The gentleman comes here to the court of appeals—he goes into a fine room, finely carpeted, and furnished with every convenience, and sometimes he may find two lawyers there—one on each side of the case—and the three judges, a clerk, and tipstaff. Sometimes that is all the company in the court room. When was there ever seen as many as twenty lawyers in the court at one time? I have been in the habit of attending every term for the last few years, and I am certain that I have never seen twenty assembled there at a time. Branch the court, and if every lawyer in the district attended they would not fill the court house. We have no need of the attendance of any other than lawyers, though of course all who desire it, have the privilege of coming. One gentleman has said, you may be permitted to practice by brief, and that the legislature has so determined. But those in the habit of practicing in, or of frequenting this court, are aware that motions are to be made, which even if a lawyer at a distance is practicing by brief, he must employ a lawyer residing here to make. So much for the question of cost. And when a gentleman again asserts that this branching system is to cost more, I am fond of figures and I want to see it proved to me. It is a mathematical proposition, and therefore can be easily put down in figures; but a mere declaration that it is to be so, amounts to nothing. There was one remark made by the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Turner,) which I very much regretted to hear. It was, that the court of appeals was not as it ought to be. I do not know how that is so. They are eminent judges, and have given as much satisfaction to the people, perhaps, as any other three men who could have been selected.

Mr. TURNER. The gentleman has misunderstood me. I said that the salary ought to be such as always to secure the very best men on the bench of that court. I said that the present judges were men of capacity and industry, and filled the office very well.

Mr. APPERSON. I am exceedingly gratified that the gentleman has made this explanation, for I am sure he did not design to do injustice to the judges. And as I certainly misunderstood the gentleman, I will let the matter pass. But the gentleman did say that they could not do all the business, and there we agree exactly. I think three judges cannot do the business, and those who have been in the habit of attending here, may be aware that they are compelled to sit up almost every night during the winter until twelve o'clock. That is imposing too much labor upon them.

It was objected to having four judges, that it was an equal number, and that the decisions, when the court should divide, would not be uniform. No proposition I suppose can be stated, which will be entirely perfect. Let us suppose a case where there are three judges. A farmer is sued in ejectment for his land. The circuit judge instructs the jury so that they find in favor of the tenant in possession, but the claimant to the land, brings the case to the court of appeals, and two of the judges going in favor of the claimant, the decision is reversed, and the occupant is turned off the land. Yet he had two judges and the plaintiff had but two. The circuit judge who ought to be qualified—and I know some who are admirably so—and one of the appellate judges are on one side, and their opinions are overruled by the two other judges of the court of appeals. I think a man would have a right to feel in tolerably bad humor at losing his land in such a case. This same objection will apply to any even number, and yet I believe a majority of the states have an even number. The rule is that if the court is equally divided the judgment of the court below shall stand.

We hear very much about the expense of putting a fourth judge on the bench. Why when we had not near the business, perhaps not half that is now before the court of appeals, we had four judges. We were told the other day by the chairman of the committee, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) that for something like twelve years, we had four judges on the appellate bench. And there were very many states in this Union who had exactly that number, and many had six and New York had eight. The expense would be just that of adding one judge more to the bench, which I believe to be entirely necessary, and in that particular also I agree with the gentleman from Madison. We shall probably have a great deal said on this matter of expense. The elder gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) is very fond of talking about the enormous expenditures of our government. We have heard him declare that our government once has been carried on on a tax of six cents on the $100 when the valuation was much less than at present, and when many articles that are now taxed were not then—and that now our taxation is nineteen cents on the $100. It is easy to account for much of it. Two cents of it goes to pay us, the expenses of this convention—two more for educational purposes—and five more for the sinking fund, to extinguish the interest on the public debt. If we look at the growth and prosperity of the state, if we regard the increase in its population, we shall see the necessity for this additional judge.

With regard to the subject of re-eligibility, I know that I shall be separating from some of my best friends, for whose opinions I have the highest respect. But let me call the attention of gentlemen on this floor to a few facts. Where is the state out of the thirty in this Union, whose judges are ineligible for a second term? Where is it adopted, with all the experience we have acquired since the foundation of this government, since state constitutions have been made, a period now between sixty and seventy years? If it be true that it is so radical a principle, that a good officer should be re-eligible, how is it we never found the contrary principle to have been adopted? It may have been discussed on divers occasions, but so far as I have been able to discover, there is not a state constitution where the officers are not re-eligible. Why should it not be so? From whom do they get their appointment? From the people. I know that when you begin to talk about the people, you will hear some one springing up and saying that is demagoguism. Those who made our constitution did not think so. Had I made the remark that I am about to read from that instrument, it would have been said directly that I was resorting to demagoguism:

"All power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness."

This is a correct principle, and we feel and know that it is. And now we are endeavoring to return in some degree to that principle thus declared in 1799. And as all power is inherent in the people, let us undertake to trust the people. They have elected us here, and I know that there are very many of us, myself among the number, who once had prejudices against the election of judges by the people. We have never been accustomed to it, and perhaps have always thought that the judiciary should be placed as far as possible from the people and not as in England, as far as possible from the crown. Now inasmuch as all power is inherent in the people, they certainly should be trusted to select all their officers, whether judicial or executive. We say that they shall elect the governor—his duties are to see that the laws are executed. They elect also the legislature, the law-making power, and are they not competent to indicate the particular individual who shall administer those laws? It is but another form of the exercise of the same power. And inasmuch as it is conceded that all power is inherent in the people, why not go to the source at once, when you are about to provide for the appointment of officers? I confess that my prejudices were early enlisted against the system, but when I come to reflect upon it, and learn its effects in other states, my mind becomes more reconciled to it. I learned from a particular friend of mine who has removed from Montgomery county to Illinois, that in that state, under the new constitution, the people elect their judges, and he believes it to be the wisest plan in the world, and that it secures the ablest judiciary. I lately met a gentleman from Louisiana who studied law with me, and he states that there is a great desire prevailing there to have their judges elected by the people. He resides near the Mississippi line, and the testimony of all the lawyers who go into that state to practice, is that they have much better judges, and that the business is far better done than in Louisiana. How is it in Tennessee? They have been appointed there by the Legislature, and they have recently decided that the people shall elect them. And if this principle is so dangerous a one—it has been in operation for a considerable time—how is it that its dangers have never been discovered? And there seems to be a tendency all over the Union to adopt it. As the people are the source of all power, let us therefore require those who desire office, to seek it from that source.

I have omitted one thing on the subject of branching the court, and I must now beg the indulgence of the house, to return to that subject. If this idea of branching the court is so very objectionable, how is it that so many of our sister states have adopted that very plan? In New Hampshire, the supreme court sits in every county; in Vermont, the same; in Massachusetts, in eight different places; in Connecticut, in every county; in New York, in every other year, in each judicial district, there being four of them; in Pennsylvania, in four districts, at such places as are pointed out by the constitution; in Delaware, there are but three counties, and the supreme court sits in every one of them; in Virginia, it sits in two places; in South Carolina, the same; in Georgia, in every county; in Alabama and Mississippi, it is not branched; in Louisiana, uncertain; in Texas there are three branches, and in Tennessee there are branches. In Kentucky, we know there are none yet, but we hope to have them very soon. In Ohio, they sit in each county, but they have a right to adjourn questions in bank where they all sit. In Illinois, there are three branches; in Missouri, four; in Wisconsin, five, and in Indiana, they seem not to have any. Thus it will be seen, that there are a great majority of the states, in which the supreme court is branched. There is the old state of Pennsylvania, for many a long year, the court has sat at Philadelphia, at Harrisburg, at Sunbury, and at Pittsburg. Have they a state library travelling about in a cart? In old times here, a wheelbarrow or two would have carried all the law books the judges had to consult. But they had to reflect more and read less in forming their decisions. And one objection that I have to the court of appeals is, that they write rather too much. The old opinions of years ago, were very short, and came directly to the point, and when they disposed of that they wrote no more. With regard to the manner of selecting judges in other states, in Vermont, they are elected by the legislature every year, or oftener if the legislature choose. Well, did you ever hear that they were not re-eligible there? In reading the biography of the present Post Master General, (Collamer,) I found that he had filled the office of Judge, and as his biography said, he was re-elected every six months for years until he went to congress. From those who know the Post Master General, I learn that he is admirably qualified for the station, and that he was always re-elected without opposition. In Rhode Island, the judges are elected by the legislature, and are to hold their seats until the legislature declares them vacant, which may be done at once. In Connecticut, they are elected by the legislature, and hold during good behavior. In New Jersey, they are appointed by the governor and senate, and hold their offices for seven years, and are then re-eligible. In Pennsylvania, the governor and senate appoint; they hold their offices for fifteen years, and are then re-eligible. In Michigan, by the governor and senate, for seven years, and re-eligible. In Arkansas—by the legislature, to hold for eight years, and re-eligible. In Texas, the judges are appointed by the governor and senate, to hold for six years, and re-eligible. In Louisiana, they are appointed by the governor and senate for eight years, and re-eligible. In Mississippi, the people elect for six years, and they are re-eligible. In Ohio, they are elected by the legislature for seven years, and are re-eligible. In Tennessee, they are appointed by the legislature, and hold for three years, and they are re-eligible. In Georgia, by the legislature, for three years, and re-eligible. In New York, they have eight judges, four of whom have been elected in one particular way, and four in another way. Theirs is a travelling court. Pennsylvania is the same; and what objection is there to our adopting the same plan? We only ask that the same judicial facilities may be extended to the people of the exterior portions of the state, as are enjoyed by those of the interior. They are not compelled to be dissatisfied with the decision of the circuit judge, but let them have the same facilities for reaching the appellate court, if they desire to do so.

Now, these judges in New York have a distinguished reputation. Go into your state library, and you will find there about one hundred volumes of the New York reports. And are these celebrated judges a set of travelling tinkers? Are they going about, as the tinkers of old, for the purpose of running up old spoons and basons? Are not their decisions among the highest legal authorities in the land? The old constitution of New York, it is true, provided that after a judge had arrived at the age of sixty, he should vacate his office, but what regrets had the people that such a provision drove chancellor Kent from the bench. What a great loss was it to the jurisprudence of the state, nay, to the union, that he was not permitted to continue in the discharge of his high duties? What, under such a provision, would have become of Chief Justice Marshall, the brightest ornament of the American bench? He lived to be a very old man, and up to the last retained full possession of the finest intellect in the land. And to declare that a judge should not be eligible, was it not to say to the people, we are better qualified to judge of his capacity than you?—We are not going to permit you to select these old men, or to re-elect those men who have served you for eight years, and whom you are satisfied have served you well. That is the amount of the declaration of ineligibility.

There has been a wide range taken in the discussion of this report of the committee, and particularly on the proposition that the legislature shall have the power to remove the judge by a majority. And it does strike me as remarkable, that my old friend, the old patriarch, whom I have delighted to follow, should desire to have the legislature supreme, and that a majority should have the power to do—what? To turn out—not an officer selected by another power than the one from whom they derive their own authority—but that a majority of the people's representatives should turn out of office a man whom the people themselves have elected. Let us see how it would work. A district selects their judge and he comes up here, and in the legislature charges are preferred against him.—Every representative from his district is aware that the people there know him to be honest and qualified, and they accordingly vote against turning him out. But the majority, who know nothing of him, vote him out. There is a direct disregard of the voice of the people. The time once was, when that same old friend of mine—he is now a patriarch—stood up most manfully and battled most resolutely against this principle. He once contended that officers appointed not by the people, but far removed from the people and appointed by the executive, should require two-thirds of the people's representatives to turn them out. What is his position now, when connected with that which he held then? Why that when the officers were removed as far as possible from the people, it ought to require two-thirds of the people's representatives to remove them, but if you bring their appointment directly to the people themselves, then a majority of the people's representatives ought to be sufficient to remove them! That is the position. But as was enquired by the chairman of the committee, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) where is the instance that has occurred under the two-thirds principle, of a judge not being broken when he deserved it? I have heard it said that there were never removals at all under the two-thirds principle, yet my friend gave an instance where a judge was removed by a nearly unanimous vote. My old friend, the patriarch to whom I have referred, has a happy tact of bringing every man to his support. His arguments on the subject of removal by the legislature, brings to his support a gentleman who was, at first, opposed to the election of judges, yet he now advocates their election, and wants a majority of the legislature to turn them out! My friend from Fleming (Mr. M. P. Marshall,) was just as much opposed to the majority turning out as possible, yet he goes against branching the court, and therefore he is also a supporter of my old friend. It seems to be wholly immaterial to him how he does it, but he is sure to gather around him a host of supporters. The old patriarch has been a leader all his life, and I have no doubt always will be. I, myself, have heretofore been happy to follow his lead, but we shall have to separate now.

Let us examine the objections to the re-eligibility of the officer. Nearly everybody who has spoken has been a lawyer, and all have praised the judiciary. I think it is the strong arm of government. It is the weak department, but the strong arm. If a judge is not to be re-eligible, where is the lawyer willing to leave his lucrative practice, and break up all his business connections to accept the office? A man, pretty well advanced in years, and rich, might, perhaps, be willing to take it; but where is the man of from thirty five to forty years of age, with a good practice, who would be willing to surrender that practice to go on the bench, and there to serve for eight years and not to be re-eligible? The judge, under such a system, would be at the end of eight years, after having lost all his customers, and got out of his traces, as it were, in the practice of law, and having become more familiar with the drawing up of decisions and opinions than of declarations and bills in chancery, in a most unenviable position. Here is at once a powerful reason why the judge should be re-eligible. There is another reason. He is to return, again, to the appointing power—the people, who are the sources of all power, and if he has not acted properly, if he has been corrupt in any way, or discharged his duties in a partial manner, I ask you if he will be re-elected? I have heard it said that this proposition for re-eligibility is a radical one. It seems to me a most conservative one, and further, it is leaving the office open to the greatest number. The gentleman from Scott (Mr. W. Johnson,) says he is for rotation in office, and for that reason, it seems, he is not willing that the people shall say whom they prefer for office. It is not proposed to say to the people that these men shall be elected, or that they must re-elect them. It is only casting their lot among the claims of other citizens whom the people are to pass upon. If they think the former judge to be the best man, give them a chance to re-elect him.

It has been inquired of me whether or not, in the division of the state into districts, I did not expect a branch of the court would be brought near to me. I have not looked forward to this, but the county in which I live is the Piedmont of Kentucky—it is right at the foot of the hills—and if it should so turn out that it will come there, it will be received with open hearts and open doors. It will never be necessary to call upon the state to build a court house, and so far as expense of living is concerned, I do not see that it will cost the judges any more than to come and sit at Frankfort. Some there was who call such a court migratory, but I do not think the term applicable to a court that is to sit in four different places in the state. It would not be a roving or wandering court, but would have stated points of meeting.

Objection has been made to the vote by ballot. I have not much to say about this, but as we have got to vote very shortly on the question—let me make one inquiry. Has there ever been a state in the Union that ever adopted the ballot system, and abandoned it, for the viva voce system? Are there not many states who once practiced the viva voce system, who have abandoned it for the ballot, and never again returned to it? The ballot system therefore, would appear to be the better one. In regard to political offices, I do not care any thing about it. It is, perhaps, not so manly a plan to go and deposit a vote in a ballot box, so that the candidate cannot know whether you voted for, or against him, as to come out and declare your preference. I believe that our constituents are entirely satisfied—so far as the election of the judicial officers is concerned—that they shall be elected by ballot. Indeed, there are, throughout the state, very many, we know, who are in favor of balloting for all the officers. But whatever complaints are made upon other subjects, there are no complaints, so far as I am aware, as to viva voce voting; therefore, I would be disposed to leave it as it stands at present. I would leave that point untouched altogether.

The amendment which I desire should be made to the report of the committee, and which I intend to offer when the proper time arrives—and I suppose it will be more appropriate to do so in the house than in committee—is this: I want a general election of the judges. And here it is I shall have to separate I suppose from some of my friends. I insist that these judges as they are to pass upon the rights of the people of the whole state, ought to be elected by the people of the whole state; that you should not elect one in the north and have him pass upon the rights of the people of the south, who had no hand in electing him. He is under no responsibility to them. I would have each candidate brought before all the people, and let them vote for the men of their choice. When you bring them before all the people of the state you will not find so great a tendency to centralize; but they will be diffused through the state. I say that, inasmuch as the judge has to pass upon the rights of all the people of the state, let us give all the people the same privilege in electing him. I insist that it is but right to give all parts of the state, as nearly as can be, equal facilities and an equal opportunity of voting for all the judges. And, in regard to the matter of expense, it is not a tax that is to be levied upon the community; it is a voluntary contribution on the part of those who have cases to be tried before the judges of the appellate court. Let an opportunity then be offered to the people in every part of the state, south as well as north, to carry their cases into that court. There is no mathematical proposition that can be more easily proved than that professional men, residing at the capital, do the greater part of the business in that court. I believe that I have said about all that I intended to say. I feel grateful that I have had an opportunity to address this committee; and as I have been a very silent member heretofore, I may be permitted perhaps to add a few remarks. It seems to me that we have not got a great deal to do. We may talk a great deal about abstract propositions upon slavery, but will not the subject remain exactly as it is now? So far as I can learn from conversations with delegates around me, we are not going to disturb it. There are certain purposes, however, for which the people have sent us here. There are certain reforms which they desire shall be made. Prominent among those is a change in the tenure of the offices of the judges; that is one of the great objects for which we are assembled: their tenure of office being now for life, and it being desirable to change that tenure to a term of years. Another great object is that the judges shall be elected by the people. And another change that is required to be made is a change in the county court system. Another is, that we shall provide for biennial sessions of the legislature, and that there shall be no special legislation, such as the granting of divorces. If there be anything else of great importance that the people have required to be done, I am not prepared at this time to say what it is. In regard to the branching of the court of appeals, if we effect those other great objects that I have referred to, which ever way we may determine that question, I think we shall have made a pretty good constitution after all. This self-constituted county court will not be in existence. There will be a general election of all the officers by the people, and if nothing more be done, though there may be a few other changes which I would be pleased to see made, yet, upon the whole, I shall be content, and even if I shall be overruled in this matter of the general election I shall still be satisfied.

The following tables, alluded to in Mr. Apperson's remarks, are appended, for the better understanding of the subject discussed by him. The tables are made up from the court of appeals docket at the last spring term.

Mr. DIXON. I am anxious sir to make a few remarks upon two other propositions which have grown up in the course of this debate, although I am not disposed to discuss any other questions than those which came fairly and legitimately before this committee, and I shall not therefore, say anything upon the abstract question of slavery, to which my friend who has just preceded me has alluded. I am no flatterer of the people. I am the people's friend, however, and I trust in God I ever shall be their friend; and if I could be their protector, I would employ such feeble abilities as I possess to that end. I am among those who think it right that in some respects, the people should be protected against themselves. Not sir, that I have not the utmost confidence in the capability of the people for self government. I have every confidence in their ability to govern themselves, and I take occasion here to remark, that I am very decidedly in favor of the people electing most, if not all, the officers of government. I am for electing the judges; but although I am for electing the judges, I am not for weakening the judiciary department. I am not for making it dependent. I am for placing it in an elevated position, such as may enable it to administer justice in the very spirit of the constitution without sale, denial, or delay. These are the principles to which I hold. I am for electing the judges because I believe it is better to elect the judges than to have them appointed in the manner in which they have been heretofore appointed under the present constitution of Kentucky. I believe that the appointing power has been abused, and it was from the idea, whether correct or not, that the appointing power had been abused, that I became a convert to the doctrine of electing the judges by the people. I confess that the time was when I entertained a different opinion, and I confess that I approached this great subject with fear and trembling, because I had been taught from my infancy to believe that upon the independence of the judiciary depended the safety of the people of this commonwealth. I have cast my mind back to the history of that people from whom we are descended, and there I have discovered, that the judiciary has been prostrated at the feet of power, and made the mere registers of the edicts and decrees of the ruling monarch. I have beheld the judicial power of England prostrated at the foot of the king, and made the mere organ of the dictations of the despot, instead of being as they ought to have been, the protectors of the freedom of the people. I beheld the struggle going on between the oppressed people and their kingly oppressor, and I saw that the purpose of the struggle was to relieve the judiciary from their continued servility to those in power. I traced the struggle on, until at length the intelligence and love of liberty of the people of England, triumphed over the despotism which had so long kept them in slavery, and made the judicial officers of the government independent of the appointing power. When its independence was established, it arose to a high elevation and dignity, which it had never before attained. It arose in all its great and lofty attributes until it acquired the character of being the protector of the freedom of the people. It was no longer the servile tool of power, moving at the will of a despot, to the shedding of blood, and under the constructive doctrines of treason, making victims of the innocent, in obedience to the behests of power. It saved the people from the scourge of despotism. Such sir, was the influence that it exerted over the liberties of England. I was taught to reverence this great department of the government—great in its results—having for its object the enforcement and illustration of the laws and the vindication of the constitution of the country. And as I remarked before when this question came up as to the election of the judges by the people, it was a question which I approached with fear and trembling. If the effect of electing the judiciary by the people will be to prostrate it at the feet of any other department—I care not what department—if prostrated and enslaved, the people will be the victims. I asked myself the question, whether or not the election of the judges by the people, was to enslave the judges and render them dependent. And sir, if it was to render them dependent, I for one, declared that I would not subscribe to a constitution which contained that feature. I would not aid in the adoption of a constitution which would render them the slaves of any power within this commonwealth. I satisfied myself however that the judges could be elected by the people, and their independence still be maintained, and having satisfied myself on that point, I yielded at once to the propriety of changing the mode of appointment. I thought the present mode bad because it might be abused, and I was apprehensive that the election of the judges by the legislature would be worse; but I came to the conclusion that the true source to which this matter should be referred was to the people themselves. But whilst I am in favor of throwing it back upon the people and giving them the right to elect the judges, let no man say that because I differ with him upon abstract propositions of preserving their purity in office, I am therefore opposed to a change in the organic law of the state. I am for everything which is to protect the people of the state—for everything which is calculated to build up the defences of human freedom.

We are assembled here because it is believed there are important improvements that may be made in our constitution. We have solemn duties to perform, and instead of constituting a judiciary that shall be dependent upon another department of the government, let us make them the guardians of the people's liberties. I would rather sink into utter oblivion, than be instrumental in bringing about any other result. I say sir, that I came here to provide for the election of the officers by the people, but I came here to render the judicial power independent of the people. I do not mean sir, that they shall not be properly responsible somewhere, but I mean to assert that I am opposed to making them responsible merely to the power that creates them. I am, like the gentleman from Nelson, and like the honorable president of the convention, and like many distinguished gentlemen who have addressed this committee, I am for making them responsible to the legislative department in the manner indicated by the report of the committee, and I shall not pause here to discuss the plan proposed by them. It is proposed to make the judges responsible to the legislature. Is that the proper department to which they should be held responsible? If you mean to make them responsible to that department, let it be so; but if you do not mean to make them responsible, where is the necessity of spreading out in the report the responsibility of the judges to the legislature?—There was some design in it. Those who framed the report must have understood it themselves. They must have intended that the responsibility should rest, and I for one sir, am decidedly of their opinion, that to that tribunal the responsibility of the judges should belong. Then sir, if we make them responsible to that tribunal, are we also to make them responsible to another? If that is the tribunal before which they are to be arraigned, and by which sentence is to be pronounced upon them for malfeasance in office, or for misfeasance, or any other act that amounts to disqualification, why, I ask again, the necessity that any other responsibility should be indicated? We have directed that the judges shall be elected by the people. So far it is right. We have declared that there shall be responsibility, and we have indicated where it shall be. Sir, if this is not a proper tribunal before which the judges shall be tried, strike it out, and proclaim that the true tribunal, and the only one before which the judges shall be tried, is the people at large. I say strike it out, let it fall, because it has no business there at all. But I am for that tribunal, it is the right one, and I am not for any other. I am not for making them responsible directly to the people, and although the people might desire that they should be made responsible directly to them, it ought not to be so; for it would be ruinous to the people and destructive of every thing that is most dear to them.

I am then for an independent judiciary. Independent of whom? Independent of the power which appoints them. In England the judges are not responsible to the appointing power. In Kentucky, the governor nominates and the senate confirms the nomination—not the people. They are responsible to the legislature collectively, a power different from that which appoints. In all the states, they are made responsible to a power different from the appointing power.

Having decided how they shall be appointed, and how they shall be tried, let us see what sort of safe-guard we can throw around our judiciary, because that is a matter which touches us all. It is a matter that concerns not only us, but our posterity—those in high places and those in low places—all have a deep interest in protecting the judiciary. What are the various plans that have been suggested, by which the independence of the judiciary shall be maintained? I have not heard any man contend that the independence of the judiciary ought to be destroyed. I like the remarks that were made by the gentleman from Scott, (Mr. W. Johnson) on this subject. There was wisdom in every word he uttered. He spoke like an honest man and a patriot. There was that in his manner and his remarks, which indicated that he would not

"Flatter Neptune for his trident, Nor Jove for his power to thunder."

I love the man, because he rose here in the midst of the confusion and strife, and proclaimed those noble sentiments in defence of the independence of the judiciary. I think there is no one here who is opposed to their independence; but what is to bring about that independence? Is it to be done by making the judicial department directly responsible to the people? Do gentlemen mean to maintain that that will make them independent? Will it not prostrate the judicial power at the very feet of the people, and if the judicial power of the state is to be prostrated at the feet of the people, who are to be the sufferers? Not the rich and the powerful. They will escape—there can be no doubt about that. Who, then, are to suffer? The poor and the defenceless. Well has it been said, by that greatest of English poets:

Through tatter'd clothes small vices do appear—
Robes and fur'd gowns hide all. Plate sin with gold,
And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks:
Arm'd in rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it.

I advocate the independence of the judiciary, and I do so upon this ground among others; and I know that in this respect I am in a hopeless minority. It matters not to me, however, I utter what I think is right, and whether it meets with favor or not, I shall not refrain from uttering the honest sentiments of my heart. I believe that the judges, if elected by the people, ought not to be re-eligible, because I believe their power might be used for the very worst purposes. Let not gentlemen tell me, when I contend against the re-eligibility of the judges, that I am contending against their election by the people. The influences which operate upon a judge before his election will operate after it, and at a time when his conduct will affect the rights of every citizen in the commonwealth. It is only when he is called to administer justice, that his power, if he be corrupt, is felt; and it tells with withering influence upon the people of the state, crushing the last hope of the poor man, who seeks protection from oppression, at the hands of the judiciary. Will gentlemen tell me that judges are incorruptible? Will they tell me that a judge has not the frailties to which all human nature is subject? Will they proclaim such a sentiment as this? If they do, they must have read the book of human nature to little advantage. Let them cast their eyes to the judicial records of England, and there behold the judiciary prostrate at the feet of the monarch, and let gentlemen not tell me that because the people are competent to self-government, they may not select unworthy agents, that they may not be deceived, that they may not select such persons to administer justice as will be subject to the influence of bribery and corruption. Let it not be proclaimed that such will not be the fact. Such will be the fact, unless human nature greatly changes from what it has been.

The day of re-election approaches, and with it, comes the temptation to mingle with the crowd, and discuss those questions in which the people are interested, men of power and influence arrayed on one side, and men of neither power nor influence on the other; the man of fortune and influence comes to the candidate for the judgeship, and demands of him that he shall avow his opinions upon a question; he then infuses the poison into his soul, and drops the consolation that he will be instrumental in bringing about his election. A man on the other side makes the same insinuation: the judge weighs the comparative influence opposed by the two, and he inclines in favor of the most powerful. Does any gentleman mean to say that this will not be the current of events, upon which will glide away the independence of the judiciary of the state? Will any gentleman contend that such will not be the effect? Figure to yourself a judge going down from the judgment seat, mingling with the populace, mounting the hustings, and proclaiming his opinions upon the subjects that are agitated. Will any gentleman say that he is willing to have such influences operate upon the candidates for this office? He must be more than man if he can rise above them. Why then will you make the judges re-eligible? What is the object of it?

I ask where is the necessity for making them re-eligible? I am told that unless they are re-eligible you cannot get another one to supply the place, and I am told again, that you deprive the people of the right to select their officers according to their wishes. Why do you declare in the constitution, that the governor of your state shall not be re-eligible for a certain period of years? What is the reason of that? Because they believed that he might prostitute the power of his office, in order that he might secure his return to office. They intended that he should not be permitted to pander to the popular passions and prejudices, with a view to again being placed in power. That was the great principle. That is why it was declared in that instrument, which we are about to change and alter, that the governor shall not be re-eligible. It was intended to guard against the corrupt influences that might be brought to bear upon the weakness of human nature; and though the principle was not incorporated in the constitution of the United States, yet throughout the land, from the centre to its extremity, has been proclaimed the propriety of incorporating such a principle, in reference to the office of President of the United States. It was feared that the power confided to him, by the people, might be used in such a manner, as would be destructive of the very ends of justice, in order to secure a re-election, and it was proclaimed to the whole democratic party of the nation, that it was wrong in principle that the president should be re-eligible to office. I ask every man, is it to be believed that when Jackson proclaimed this sentiment, he meant to deny that the people were capable of self-government? Such was not the intention. Such is not the legitimate construction of the language he used. The principle has been asserted time and again. It is a principle which is dear to the democratic party of the nation, and it should be dear to the hearts of the whole nation. Let it not be disregarded here. What have you gained by making the judges re-eligible? Is it true we have no other men capable of filling those offices? Give your judges salaries commensurate to the important services to be performed; place them above improper influences, and then you will have what is so desirable in every community, justice administered without denial or delay. Why do you want this principle of re-eligibility? Surely not because you are afraid of depriving the people of the right to select the officers they may desire.

No such thing. You have created an officer to discharge certain duties, and you wish him to discharge them fairly and honestly. Is it wrong toward the people to protect them from those corrupting influences which would drag him down from the high position in which they have placed him? They will thank you in their hearts, should you have saved them from those corrupting influences.

I have thrown out these remarks, desultory as they may be, for the consideration of the committee. They contain truths that come gushing from my heart and that are sanctioned by my judgment. I have thrown them out because I thought it due to myself, and to the question. I know not whether they will find a response in the judgment of others. It is enough for me to say, in the language of that distinguished man, the elder Adams, amidst the storms of the revolution, on the very day when the declaration of independence was signed, and when he had placed his signature to that instrument, "while conscience claps let the world hiss."

There are some two or three propositions to which I desire briefly to refer—not for the purpose of discussing them, but merely to call the attention of the committee to them. I like the principle that is contained in the bill that was reported by the chairman of the committee on the court of appeals. I believe it a great conservative principle, the judges being elected as it is conceded on all hands they will be, by the people; and I, myself, am decidedly in favor of electing them. That being conceded, the great conservative principle starts up and strikes my mind with powerful force. What is that principle? You elect one judge from each separate district. If you have but one court of appeals, or rather of the court sit but at one single point, as for instance at the seat of government, and you have but four judges, and you and I, sir, come up from a single district with our causes to this tribunal, but one of those four judges will have been voted for by us, the other three will be wholly elected by others. And whether favorable to us or opposed to us, they will be wholly irresponsible to us, and the main reason which gentlemen assign for being opposed to the elective principle will be entirely swept away. I am therefore for the election of all the judges by the whole people of the state; and I believe there will be no difficulty in finding suitable men. I believe there is talent enough to be found in every district, and that men may be selected who are abundantly competent to discharge the duties of the office properly. I do not entertain a doubt on the subject. I am therefore in favor of this particular principle because I believe it is right in itself and conservative in its influence.

There is another principle engrafted in the report to which I give my assent, and do so from the necessity of the case. I believe it will be found to be the public sentiment. I believe that the people desire that that principle shall be established—I mean that the courts shall sit at different points. This is no new thing, sir, with me. While a member of the legislature I advocated the proposition, and the only obstacle in the way of carrying it out was a want of constitutional power on the part of the legislature. But I will tell gentlemen with whom I agree as to the propriety of incorporating that principle, I am not sure but that it would be better to leave the constitution open, so that the legislature may hereafter act as it may be deemed advisable. When you have laid off twenty five counties together, you have got either by yourself or by the legislature to designate some point where the court is to be held; the question then comes up whether some of the parties would not rather come here than to go to some place in the interior. I will suppose the counties lying on the Ohio river. Take the lowest county and trace up to Louisville, and the question is whether they will not find it more convenient to come to the seat of government than go to the interior, with all the attending inconveniences of bad roads. I merely throw out to gentlemen this suggestion for their consideration.

There is another reason why it would be preferable to leave it open, rather than to incorporate the principle in the constitution, and it is this. Suppose that hereafter, you may wish to change the system, and bring back the sittings of the court to the seat of Government, gentlemen will perceive that it will be too late to make that change. They will have made a constitutional provision from which they cannot escape. There is another difficulty. I have said to you in all honesty, for I feel it, that I am for making a constitution that will be acceptable to the people of Kentucky. I feel that not only my character as a delegate to this convention, but that the character of the whole state is involved in it. It will not only be disgraceful to us if we make a constitution that will be rejected by the people, but it will be a disgrace to the state itself. We shall be a laughing stock to the people of all other states. The people of Kentucky have said we will change the organic law of the state, but after having assembled for that purpose, it was found that there was not wisdom enough in the state to frame a constitution. I want no such imputation as this to be cast upon us. And I want no such imputation to be thrown upon the state at large. Well then, I put the question in this form, do you not see that by incorporating this provision in the constitution, you may array a powerful party against that constitution? Does not every man see that you run the risk of destroying the very instrument that it is so very desirable we should protect and defend. But if you leave it to the legislature, can you not accomplish all that you desire in regard to this important matter? By leaving it open what do you do? You merely leave it to a majority of the people of the state to determine whether they will have the court of appeals brought near to their respective homes, or whether they will have it remain at the seat of government. Why not leave it to them to determine? Are you afraid to trust a majority of the people? Why, is not the very court intended as a safe-guard for the rights and liberties of the people? Why not let them decide whether the court of appeals shall be branched or not? That is the question which I submit for the consideration of this committee. You will lose nothing by it, because if the people want the court, they will have it carried to the districts; and if you incorporate it in the constitution, you cannot afterwards get clear of

it. It cannot weaken the constitution, if you leave it open; and you will, by doing so, avoid arraying a formidable party against you. This is a matter that ought to be looked to.

If it is not best to refer the whole matter to the decision of the people through the legislature, at least let such a provision as this be inserted, that the legislature may, when any district desires it, have power to direct that the court of appeals shall no longer be holden in such district. You may do this, and it will relieve you of the great difficulty which stands in the way of making this principle a permanent provision in the constitution.

Mr. PRESTON. I was glad that the discussion of the subject of the appellate court came up, and though it will seem that a great deal of time has been consumed, yet the great principles in the report itself will probably regulate the other articles in regard to the judiciary that will be subsequently brought before the convention. Various principles are embraced in it, but they have been so irregularly discussed that I am in some doubt what part of the bill is properly under consideration. I know that the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, that the majority of the legislature should dismiss the judges, has been voted down, and if I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Madison, I conceive these questions to be within the scope of his proposed amendments—first as to the number of the courts, second as to whether the judges shall be elected by general ticket or by districts, third whether the court shall hold sessions at one or more places, fourth whether the judges shall be re-eligible, and fifth, whether they shall be chosen by ballot or the ancient viva voce system.

These I regard as the questions involved in the bill before us; but as they are too numerous to discuss here unless in a speech longer than I propose to make, I will allude to that portion of the bill only which contemplates the re-eligibility of the judges. On this subject I differ with the gentleman from Henderson as well as with others on this floor. I have been accustomed to attend with too much reverence probably to the lessons of experience which the past has given us, and am too much disinclined to differ from the settled course of things, to adopt with facility new suggestions as regards the mode of appointing the judiciary or to apprehend the full force of the objections levelled against the plan indicated in the report even when urged with all the eloquence which has distinguished the effort made by the gentleman from Henderson.

That the mode is novel is true, for throughout this confederacy, now numbering thirty states, there is not, so far as I am informed, a single member of it that has required such a feature in its constitution. In framing their organic law all have been moved by a similar desire to secure an independent judiciary; but none have deemed it necessary to insert such a safe-guard in their constitutions; and shall Kentucky then first undertake to do this, and to do it rather impelled by the eloquence of its advocates than by the solidity of the reasons urged? Or shall we adopt blindly and insert this feature without knowing whither it tends or what is its use.

I heard a part of the remarks of my friend from Fleming (Mr. M. P. Marshall) in whose simple, truthful, yet strong and argumentative mind I have the utmost confidence, and in whom I can see a mental resemblance to his great kinsman, who so long distinguished the bench of the supreme court of the United States. But I see no valid reason advanced by the gentleman to whom I allude, to sustain this assault upon the report of the committee on the court of appeals. But it is asked, on the other side, what is the use of re-eligibility, and whether the independence of the judiciary will not be better secured by ineligibility than re-eligibility. Sir, there is no good ground why any faithful servant who has discharged his duties to the country and earned its gratitude, should be excluded from the subsequent confidence of his fellow citizens. This is the general principle, and if there is any exception to it it must be shown that it is necessary to secure the independence of the judiciary. This cannot be done.

From the first establishment of the government of this country, no such principle has been adopted in our state or Federal constitution, except as relates to the office of governor of Kentucky. The president of the United States, congressmen, judges and all other officers are re-eligible. The provision in our constitution in relation to the governor is the only precedent that I know to the contrary. Sir, the principle of ineligibility is founded on fear, and should only apply to those officers who are clothed with great powers—the president of the United States should possibly be declared ineligible. Why? The president of the United States holds the army of the country in one hand, and the navy in the other. He has thirty millions of revenue to be distributed among the officers of the government. He holds a veto on all the laws of Congress, and at this time he exercises as great power as any limited monarch in Europe. Is there then no difference between him and the defenceless judge of the appellate court? One possesses the patronage of thirty thousand offices, of salaries for these offices—has the third navy in the world under his control—and has an executive veto upon the representatives of twenty millions of people. The other wields no such patronage, controls no such power, the check of ineligibility, even if necessary to control an office of such vast powers, as the president is wholly unnecessary in regard to a judge. The gentleman from Henderson says, that the judge will be seen descending from his place mixing with the populace, seducing their affections, disturbing their judgments, and finally by a sort of reciprocal corruption, destroying not only his own independence, but the honesty of the people.

Mr. DIXON. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not say that he would destroy the honesty of the people, but that corrupt men would destroy his honesty, if he had any.

Mr. PRESTON. If it does not destroy their honesty then there is nothing to fear. If it does not destroy the honesty of the people they will have intelligence enough to rebuke any such attempts on the part of an electioneering judge.

But I will pursue the parallel which I would draw between the President of the United States and a judge. Will the gentleman say that a judge can in fact ascertain who is to have an influence upon his election, or if he could, that it would be of much importance? Let us examine what this bill actually proposes to do. It proposes to divide this state into four great parts, and in each part to establish a judicial district. It is not a court of original but only of appellate jurisdiction. We find, as was stated by the gentleman from Montgomery, more than two hundred to one of the cases which arise in circuit courts never reach the court of appeals. A judge is appointed by the electors of a judicial district containing two hundred and fifty thousand souls, and has only one vote out of four on the appellate bench, when the court is organized. He has no clerks to appoint, no patronage to bestow, no army within his grasp, no fleet under his control, but he is simply an unarmed and powerless officer of the law—a man shorn of influence, but chosen by the people to sit and determine on their rights and their property. The statistics in relation to this matter, show that there are about six hundred cases in the appellate courts in one term, and that this number of appeals is taken from about thirteen thousand appearances in the circuit courts; which makes about one appeal in two hundred appearances. If so the chance that any particular individual's case will come before the court of appeals, is remote indeed. If it does, the judge will only have one vote in four, and that after the decision of the tribunal below. The assertion, therefore, that the judge would sacrifice his independence to secure personal support, based upon such remote contingencies, is contrary to every fair presumption. Is not the apprehension so remote that it may be called fanciful? But, sir, engraft this principle in your constitution and you destroy the whole theory of an elective judiciary—you blow hot and cold with the same breath. You say at one moment that the people are sufficiently honest, intelligent, and incorruptible, to elect their judges; in the next, that they are too corruptible to re-elect them. Put it on the ground that the gentleman from Henderson does—that is, that the judge might be corrupted by the people—then he should never be elected by the people. Admit the argument, and you admit that the judge, when he is thirty years old and first a candidate, is incapable of corrupting the people, and assert the next moment that he becomes capable after he has been eight years in office. I do not think that any investigation will show that there is any solid objection to the report on this account. No, sir, there are more real evils that will spring up from the ineligibility of the judiciary than from their re-eligibility. It is claimed that an ineligible judiciary will be honest, but let me ask the gentleman one thing—whether it depends so much on the mode of appointment as upon the character of the man himself. I believe that if a man is a good man he will be a good judge. If he is a bad man he will be a bad judge. If he is an independent man he will be an independent judge. If he is a servile man he will be a servile judge. The mode of the appointment will not alter the character of the man.

Well sir, if the gentleman's proposition was to go into effect and the election should fall on a man so servile that he would sacrifice his independence, what would be the result? Would ineligibility make his character pure? No sir. A man of such a character would leave his docket encumbered with the most important cases, so that he might be employed in the same cases when he should come to the bar; so that he might obtain practice so soon as he should be excluded from the bench. And the fact would be that you would have an encumbered docket, and you would inflict an evil without obtaining a corresponding benefit. The eligibility of the judges has been permitted in every state in the union, and if we prohibit it now, it will be the first time that it has been done in this country. I have seen no reason why we should thus deviate from the practice of our sister states. We will not secure more fully by such a course that independence in the judges which is both necessary and desirable. The court of appeals is not so constituted that it can affect directly the people themselves. Even if we preserve the feature which is now engrafted in it, we shall sufficiently secure the independence of the judiciary, and meet the approbation of the people themselves. And if we place their salaries beyond the reach of the legislature we shall be enabled to carry out the great principles which are contended for by the friends of progress in every part of this union, and establish an independent elective judiciary.

The gentleman has given us a quotation from Shakspeare. He tells us in the language of Lear that "Through tattered clothes small vices do appear."

And that the rags of the beggar are but a poor shield against injustice. But sir, if you let the poor man have the power of telling by his vote at the polls whether he believes his judge just or unjust, you will never hear of the rags of the beggar being a poor shield against the injustice of the judge. For myself I want to halt at no half way house in the election of the judiciary. Let us either have the judges appointed by the governor, or elected by, and responsible to, the people. Let us have no legislative election, but let us come up fully and fairly to the question.

In Ohio they have halted at the half way house. A distinguished gentleman yesterday gave me an account of the condition of the judiciary in that state. The judges have heretofore been appointed by the legislature. But the people are now seeking to substitute popular elections, and it will be done. We cannot, in my opinion, by any mode of reasoning, arrive at the conclusion that if the judges should be elected by the people they should not be re-eligible. There are no reasons for entertaining fears that the judges will be servile to the people, which would not apply with equal force if we were to render them ineligible. We should not, I think, Mr. Chairman, deviate from the established rule which exists in thirty states of this confederacy, without more cogent arguments than have yet been advanced.

On the motion of Mr. MITCHELL the committee rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. DESHA leave of absence was granted to Mr. Talbott, till Monday next.

The convention then adjourned.

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. GEORGE W. BRUSH.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On the motion of Mr. GAITHER leave of absence was granted to Mr. W. N. Marshall to Monday next.

RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. TAYLOR offered the following resolution, and it was adopted:

Resolved, That the Second Auditor be requested to furnish to the convention a statement showing the whole number of parents and guardians, in the State of Kentucky, by counties, who have children between five and sixteen years of age, as follows: 1st. Those that have no property entered for taxation, and number of children. 2d. Those who are worth less than $100 in property, and number of children. 3d. Those who are worth from $100 to $400 in property, and number of children. 4th. Those who are worth from $400 to $600 in property, and number of children. 5th. Those who are worth over $600 in property, and number of children, for the year 1849.

Mr. HARGIS offered the following, and it was adopted:

Resolved, That the Second Auditor be requested to furnish this convention with a tabular statement of the receipts and expenditures, annually, of the government of the State of Kentucky, from the year 1823 until the end of the fiscal year 1849; showing the receipts and expenditures from each source.

PETITIONS—COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. WALLER presented a petition from sundry citizens of Fayette and Clarke counties, on the subject of common schools, which on his motion was referred to the committee on education, and ordered to be printed.

THE COURT OF APPEALS.

The convention again resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. HUSTON in the chair, on the article in relation to the court of appeals.

Mr. MITCHELL. The few remarks which I propose to submit for the consideration of the committee, will be addressed to the subject of judicial re-eligibility. This, although not the immediate question upon which a vote is about to be taken, is embraced in the series of amendments offered to the report under discussion, and because it involves principles of higher and greater moment than any other amendment proposed, is, I apprehend, the most important matter to be discussed.

I listened with the greatest pleasure to the gentleman from Henderson on yesterday, while addressing the committee on this subject. His stormy eloquence, to employ the beautiful and appropriate figure which he himself used, was to me like light bursting from a dark cloud. It led my imagination captive, but it failed to convince my judgment. The positions which he assumed, if tenable, and the arguments deduced from them, apply with equal force to the election and re-election of judges. I regard the principle of re-eligibility as inseparable from, and identical with, that of the election of the judiciary. If re-eligibility be wrong in principle, it would, I conceive, be wrong to elect by the people judicial officers. In the examination of this subject, it will be necessary to go back and see upon what principles the proposed reform extending the elective franchise, so as to embrace the judiciary, is predicated. I will endeavor to show, that if it be right to make this proposed reform, it will not be right to stop short at the point which the gentleman from Henderson indicates as a proper terminus to it. I will endeavor to show that we shall be compromising a great principle in pausing at that point; and instead of obeying the popular impulse—instead of obeying the will of the people as expressed throughout Kentucky on this subject, we, by adopting the views of the honorable gentleman from Henderson, should be but making a concession to popular prejudice, which would contain in itself a compromise of the principles upon which we profess to act. That that form of government is best which secures the exercise of the greatest amount of power to the people, compatible with successful progress, is a postulate which I apprehend few in this country are disposed to controvert. There is no doubt a difference of opinion, and an honest difference of opinion as to the exact point at which the exercise of power on the part of the people, should terminate, and the exercise of delegated power should commence, or, in other words, when the people should cease to act by themselves and begin to act by their representatives.

In a government like ours, with a population such as we have, want of intelligence in the masses can in no event be alleged as a reason for withholding from them the exercise of power. To make such an assertion would be to deny the truth of that political maxim upon which our whole system reposes—the capacity of man for self-government. This, sir, is the atlas upon whose broad shoulders our political globe is sustained. To say that the people are the fountain of all power—that their wisdom, intelligence, and virtue are equal to any political emergency which may arise, and yet to deny to them the exercise of that power on the score of incapacity, would, in my humble judgment, be to perpetrate an absurdity.

Our political theory presupposes popular capacity adequate to the conduct and management of all the operations of government. But at the same time it concedes the necessity of representation—a necessity arising not from the want of intelligence on the part of the people, but from the impracticability, in many instances, of direct popular action. It is impossible, sir, with a population as great as ours, extending over so large an area, for the people, as in democratic Athens, to legislate primarily, and hence the representative feature from necessity is engrafted on our system. This great cardinal principle should ever be kept in view, that representation in popular governments is a concession to necessity. And hence, therefore, whenever representation is carried beyond the point of necessity in a government which assumes to be popular in its structure, its practice pro tanto departs from its theory, and to that extent is a direct attack upon the capacity of the people for self-government. That the tendency of power is ever from the many to the few is a political proverb which has come down to us sanctioned by the sad experience of the world. The chains which bind enslaved nations are but so many links of power, stolen one by one from the popular grasp. Popular concession is the material out of which have been constructed the loftiest thrones that despotism ever reared. The only sure guaranty for the preservation of popular rights is the vigilant and continued exercise of popular power. As in the physical, so in the moral world, inaction is the parent of weakness. As our physical nature requires activity to preserve its vigor, so does our moral being, our political existence. The arm whose muscles swell with strength, if kept in a state of inaction shrivels away and becomes a thing of weakness. Even the tongue itself by disuse forgets its cunning, and the power of speech which indicates our kindred to divinity, is lost.

Out of the curse pronounced on man's first disobedience, by the beneficence of divine providence, grow the issues of human prosperity. When the lesson of activity is so impressively taught in every department of life—when we behold health and strength, yielding to the paralyzing influence of indolence—when we see intellect moulded in the god-like proportions of genius sinking into driveling inanity, are we not admonished that from the same cause our liberty may lose somewhat of its swelling proportions—may shrink into a shadowy phantom that shall mock the patriot's hopes. It is not, sir, on the disastrous battle field that a people's liberties are cloven down. Greece, it is true, had her Cheronea and Rome her Pharsalia; and although the proud note of the war trumpet which proclaimed ambition's triumph may have told that Grecian liberty and Roman liberty were no more, yet long before had it perished, expiring in the fatal embraces of popular inactivity. The liberties of a free people fall not by the sword. A nation's gratitude may mingle civic wreaths with the laurel that clusters around the successful warrior's steel-clad brow—the glittering cohorts of hereditary power may seek to trample the rights of man under the iron heel of military force—the sword of faction may leap from its scabbard—civil dissension under the guidance of unhallowed ambition may imbrue its hand in kindred blood—but unavailing are all the dazzling attributes of military glory, the fierce ukase of imperial despotism, the internal strifes that blood-stained faction may generate to overturn the liberties of a free people, so long as they are found vigilantly exercising the power which of right belongs to them. So long as this is the case we need not despair of freedom. Our institutions are now in their youthful vigor. Shall we pause, sir, till we sink into political decrepitude—until the vital energies of our government shall have been exhausted—until its recuperative powers shall have been lost? Is not this the propitious period to infuse the great principle of popular activity into the institutions of the country, and thus build up its intelligence and its patriotism. The more direct control the people take in the management of their government the greater will be their interest in it. The exercise of political rights cultivates political knowledge, cultivates popular patriotism. The love of country, sir, exists no doubt to some extent every where. It is found amid the snows of Lapland—it exists on the arid plains of India—it dwells in the tent of the Bedouin—it is the only gleam of sunshine that cheers the dark fate of the Russian serf. But this love of place and of the associations connected with place is rather a social than a political feeling. Who that does not bow at the domestic altar around which the holiest and purest feelings of our nature cling—who that does not worship his own household gods—who that does not carry with him through all his wanderings a fond remembrance of the spot marked by the footprints of his infancy? This is mere love of place—alone engendered by early and intimate association. But patriotism, that high souled patriotism which soars above domestic affections, nestles no where save in the heart which throbs with the strong pulsations of freedom.

Now, sir, is the time, relying on the firm basis of popular intelligence, to rear the judicial superstructure with a boldness of architecture commensurate with the strength of its foundation. Now is the time for the people to resume the full power to which their intelligence entitles them. They have striden forward to the accomplishment of this object with a giant step, trampling as they went the dogmas which conservatism had thrown in their path. I am not unmindful, sir, that the subject of judicial reform has presented difficulties to those who from their patriotism and their wisdom are entitled to our highest respect. But sir, I am not to be deterred from carrying out what I conceive to be a great principle by the timid warnings even of those who claim to be guided by the light of experience.

According to the theory of popular government, which I have endeavored to state to the committee, the first inquiry which presents itself is as to the necessity of delegating power in the election of judges, for it will be remembered that representation is the result of necessity. This inquiry involves another question—the practicability of their direct appointment by the people. And if sir, direct appointment be practicable, of which I presume there cannot be a doubt, then any other mode of appointment is a departure, a practical departure, from the theory of popular government, and therefore a direct attack, if I am correct in the position which I have assumed, upon popular rights.

I am aware, sir, that those who object to reeligibility as well as those who object to the election of the judge, hang that objection not upon the want of popular intelligence, not upon the incapacity of the people for making wise and judicious selections, but upon the baneful influences that are to be exercised upon the judge himself. They concede popular intelligence. They concede ability upon the part of the people to meet this emergency. They contest the propriety of such a course upon the ground that the officer himself will become corrupt. Now I take it that these two propositions are the converse of each other. The objection overcomes the concession. The objection which goes to the conduct of the judge is in fact an objection to the ability of the people. Let us for a moment examine the question. If the people are capable of electing their judges, then must they be equally capable of deciding upon the manner in which the judicial functions have been discharged. The capacity to elect officers pre-supposes the ability to judge of the qualifications for office before appointment, and the manner in which its duties are performed during incumbency. The two things are inseparable. To say that the judge by courting the rich, by discriminating among suitors, by prostituting his office, can secure his re-election, is in effect saying that the people are so corrupt as to be conciliated by dishonesty; or else so foolish as to be gulled by it. If dishonest courses can secure the re-election of the judge, the same dishonest courses would secure his election in the first instance. The objection applies as well to election as to re-election—to one set of influences as to the other. If it prove that the judge should not be re-elected, it equally proves that the judge should not be elected. If it prove that the people are incapable of re-electing, it equally proves that they are incapable of electing in the first instance; and as I before remarked, it is but stating the same proposition in two forms. Besides the reasoning by which this objection is attempted to be sustained, if it can be established, makes a direct attack upon the whole elective franchise. It goes to show that popular elections are corrupting in their influence. It goes to show that popular responsibility is degrading and therefore no officer should be elected by the people. If the same judge be honest when he does not look to the people for a continuance of his official existence, and dishonest from necessity, in order to continue it, then the degradation of the officer is the result of the low standard of popular morals—a standard so low as to unfit the people for the exercise of political power.

Something has been said in relation to the independence of the judiciary, and we have been referred to England. Now sir, as I understand it, the independence of the English judiciary depends on no principle which is controverted in the report of the committee. Originally, the crown had not only the bestowal of judicial office, but that office was held at its will and pleasure. The king was a part of the government. He constituted the executive branch. He placed his creatures in judicial stations. They were dependent on his smile for the continuance of their official existence. The judiciary then became a part of the executive, and all its energies and powers were exerted to build up the royal prerogative. When afterwards, the judges held their office by a certain tenure, and were placed beyond the influence of the executive, it was declared that they were independent; and that is the independent judiciary of which Englishmen boast.

Now, it is proposed that our judges shall hold their offices by a certain tenure—for a certain term of years—that they shall be during that time, independent of the power that created them, and of every department of the government, so long as they are faithful in the discharge of their duties. But, says the gentleman from Henderson, the only way to secure the independence of the judge is, to make him entirely independent of the power from whom he received his office. The crown, he said, in England, made the judge, and he was therefore placed above the influence of the crown. The people make the judge here, and he should be placed above the influence of the people. The honorable gentleman, in defining judicial independence, and reasoning as to what should exist here, from what exists in England, has certainly lost sight of the fact, that the English judge, although independent of the crown, which is but one department of the British government, still holds his office at the will and pleasure of the parliament, in which the sovereign power resides. It is apparent then that the judge, under our system, will be more independent than the English judge, for instead of a bare majority, two thirds of the legislature are required to evict him from office, and they are required to exhibit on their journal the causes of his removal. While the gentleman approves of this responsibility, he does not seem to take the distinction that here the legislature are but the representatives of the people, and should reflect their will, so that their action is presumed to be the people's, the power which is interposed between the judge and the people being a delegated power.

I therefore regard it as a new principle as applied to our political system, to say that the judge shall be entirely independent of the power that created him. All our officers are created directly or indirectly by the people; and they are held directly or indirectly responsible to the people. The question, so far as judicial responsibility is concerned, is to whom the delegated power shall be entrusted, because in this instance it is impossible for it to be held by the people and exercised by them. But, says the gentleman, the effect of re-eligibility will be to drag down the judge at the feet of the people. Why that was one of the great objects for which this convention was called. For my part I should say that the haughtiest nature that was ever stamped on the human soul could ask for office without humiliation or degradation at the hand of a free and enlightened people.

The gentleman indulges the fear that if re-eligibility becomes a feature in our judicial system, the judge will mount the hustings and that the discussions of private rights will become the medium through which public office is sought. Well, I do not perceive that that would not as well be the case if we permit the judges to be elected by the people as it will should they be made re-eligible. Enlightened public opinion must control this subject, and that is the only control, that is the only safe-guard we have for our whole political system.

Our institutions rest upon the intelligence of the people, which is the only guaranty for the perpetuity of free governments. He says, and says perhaps correctly, that it may occasionally occur that a bad man will be placed in high judicial station. Grant that it is so; it will not be contended that, let the appointment come from what quarter it may, bad men will not sometimes be placed in high stations. This may occur in any state of things. A bad man placed on the bench to serve his own base purposes, whether he be re-eligible or not, will be tempted to employ sinister means to accomplish his sinister ends. I cannot perceive that re-eligibility will produce this effect. Besides, this very argument wars against the very principle on which, as I conceive, our whole system rests. If the employment of such means as these is to operate on the public mind, then the public mind has not the capacity to elect or to re-elect. Talk about the judge lending himself officially to influential men for the purpose of securing their aid. I ask you what is the number of the litigants compared with the whole voting population? Scarcely a tenth. And of this number how many would become the subjects of judicial bounty, and the creatures of the judge? Not a tithe of that tithe. And for every friend that is created there will be an enemy made. Favors cannot be bestowed on some without making enemies of those at whose expense they are obtained. Granting that the rich and influential will be favored by this corrupt judge, we all know, who know the character of the people of Kentucky, that the complaints of the humble and obscure will always find a listening ear, and a ready sympathy, and a spirit of indignation in the public mind that would trample under foot such baseness.

But sir, you prove nothing by showing that a bad man would go on to perpetrate his evil deeds. You must show that the good man becomes a bad one. It is necessary that this violent presumption be indulged before it can be presumed that evil will result from re-eligibility. Men that are good before their appointment will not be led to commit evil deeds without some strong and powerful motive. What then would be the motive? To gain popular favor and influence, and their conduct would be predicated on a presumption of popular weakness; and the belief that by corruption, and by converting office into an engine which should be made to effect evil to some and good to others, with a view to secure re-election, they could accomplish success. I say the whole argument is predicated on popular ignorance. If the people have the intelligence that is attributed to them they could see the influences which were brought to bear, and would visit, as they ought, upon the judges the indignation which they would merit. On the other hand, supposing the people to possess that intelligence and virtue which are requisite to make judicious selections, the judge looks forward, as the means of securing his re-election—to what? To the faithful discharge of his official duties. He regards the public as an enlightened tribunal, before which he is again to come; and he knows that unless he brings evidence to show that he has been a good officer he will be rejected. But shall we say that it would be impolitic to re-elect, but that it would be judicious to elect our judges? In the first instance they present themselves before the people who have to take them on their reputation. They are then untied; but the next time they present themselves their whole official course is known, and the people are better prepared to judge. They have more material out of which to form a correct judgment, supposing they are capable of judging. But on the other hand, the officer who is placed in a judicial station, and looks to the end of his term as the termination of his official existence—who knows that let his course of conduct be what it may, there is for him no longer the hope of official life—who knows that he is to sink again to the popular level, from which he cannot, according to the iron rule of the constitution, arise, let his merits be what they may. I say what stimulus, what incentive is there to industry, to the building up of a high judicial reputation, to the acquisition of large judicial attainments—what stimulus is there? He may sink into indolence, he may neglect his official duties, and the result is the same. Sir, it was regarded by the inspiration of heaven as a curse upon man that he should labor. It is, therefore, a part of the constitution of man to be indolent. You have to stimulate him. You have to hold out to him inducements. Exertion is not voluntary. It is dragged forth by some powerful extraneous cause. Our holy system of religion is a system of rewards and punishments, constituted according to the nature of man.—Man by that system is held in check. He is constrained to pursue the path of rectitude. He is taught to walk in the ways in which he should go by rewards held out for good conduct, and punishment denounced for evil deeds. Yet we are told that re-eligibility, although it holds out rewards for faithful service, would destroy the independence of the judge, and therefore render him corrupt, and that by prostrating the judiciary at the feet of the people the ermine would be soiled, the station degraded. In the language of Shakspeare, my friend from Henderson exclaims:

“Plate sin in gold, and the strong lance of justice
hurlless breaks—
Clothe it in beggar’s rags, a pigmy’s straw will pierce

This language might have suited the English court in the days of Henry the VIII, and his daughters the bloody Mary, the imperious Elizabeth. It may have suited the days when the English judiciary was the creature of the English crown, but it can scarcely apply with any force in this enlightened age, either to the tribunals of that country or this, nor can I think that it portrays the course of popular action in our country. Sir, if I wanted to excite the public mind—if I wanted to concentrate indignation on any object, I would charge that object with having perpetrated injustice, not on the rich, and the proud, and the influential, but on the man who wears the rags. Such is my experience of Kentucky character.

I have perhaps said as much on this subject as I ought to say. I have given my views in a very imperfect manner in reference to these questions. I conceive that the two are inseparably connected, and that they cannot be severed. If you say the judge should not be re-eligible, you say in fact that the judge should not be elected. It seems to be on all hands agreed that an elective judiciary will be established by this convention. I have endeavored to show that it will be in accordance with the true principle of a popular government—that the people are to exercise the power because there is no necessity to delegate it. I have endeavored to show that re-eligibility rests on the same principle, and having done so, I shall close my remarks.

Mr. DAVIS. I am in very feeble health, and I have thought that I should take no part in the debate on this question. I will, however, endeavor if my strength will enable me to maintain the floor, in some measure to redeem the pledge which I have given. In coming to this discussion I regret that I do not possess my usual amount of physical health, but much more deeply do I regret the absence of that intellectual strength, which will enable me to vindicate my position, not only to the house, but to the country. I am happy to know from the published debate, so far as I have attended to it, that we all agree in one position; that is, that the judiciary department of the government should be able, learned, honest, and independent. Now, any system of appointment of the courts that will secure these great and essential ends of the judiciary, would be satisfactory to me; and if my reason could be convinced that the mode of popular election would secure to the country these most important and essential ends of government, I would withdraw the feeble opposition which I shall endeavor to present. But I go in this matter of an able, honest, and independent judiciary, for an essence, for a thing that will exist in practice and in effect, not for an abstraction or a theoretical ideal. I am not satisfied with the declaration of gentlemen, that they are pledged and devoted to such a judiciary as I have indicated. I want them to convince me that they propose to give to the country that judiciary, and that mode of constituting it, which will secure these ends. And it is because I am wholly incredulous as to the results of the system which the committee has proposed, and which I have no doubt the convention will give to the country. It is because of my utter scepticism in regard to the practicability and the aptitude of the system to its great ends, that I am induced to oppose it here, as I will elsewhere. The great improvement of modern political science and statesmanship over that of ancient times and the middle ages, is the division of the government into departments, and its distribution among various officers and classes of officers, who shall be co-ordinate, and who shall be a check against the encroachment of each other. These form a protection to the people, and to the rights which are reserved by the constitution for the people, and which are not at all intended to be given into the political scheme.

Now, the chief advantage of our American system of governments over all that exist elsewhere, and over all that preceded them, through the long lapse of political history, in my judgment, resolves itself into these two general principles. We, the representatives of the people of Kentucky assembled, ought to preserve and guard, with the most sedulous vigilance and watchfulness, these important principles, and if it be a matter of doubt whether any provision which we are about to adopt and incorporate into the constitution, or any mode of appointing the magistracy, which we are about to establish, will jeopardise these principles, it seems to me that every member of this convention should feel it incumbent upon him to repudiate all such propositions. We have three co-ordinate departments of the government, according to the understanding of the country, and according to the constitution itself; a legislative, executive, and judicial department. We have been taught by the sages of the law, not only in our own country, but in that from which we sprung, and by all the experience of mankind, that that man or body of men, who engross all these functions and exercise them all in their own persons, is the government, and it is essentially and practically a despotism.

Now take the projects and schemes, not of reform, not of amendment, which seem to be engrossing the attention of this body, but of destruction and revolution, especially in regard to the judiciary, and adopt them in the new constitution, and you swallow up and engross all the departments of the government in the legislative department; you subvert and overthrow the judiciary, and practically take away that protection to the citizens of the state, which the constitution and the laws have provided for them, and I would go home to my people, and I would proclaim from the stump, and every where, that such a constitution was not worth their confidence nor their acceptance, and I would invoke them to reject it. We are asked, and particularly by my friend from Henderson, (Mr. Dixon,) who made us a most eloquent and forcible address yesterday, "are you afraid to trust the people? are not the people competent to do their own business?"

I answer in the most precise and unequivocal language, I am afraid to trust the people in all things, I am afraid to trust myself. The people themselves, our fathers, who had as much wisdom and patriotism as we have, acted on that principle in forming the instrument now under consideration, and which we are to say whether we will amend, or whether we will subvert. They adopted a constitution that was to be paramount not only to the legislature, but to the entire government, the fundamental law of government, the law of laws. They prescribed and defined the powers of the three branches. They erected limits and barriers, beyond which they were not to pass. They withheld expressly from the political scheme of government, great fundamental rights which they were resolved the government should never have cognizance of, and without which reservation our social fabric never could have been reared in that beautiful proportion in which it now exists.

I have said that the people distrusted themselves, that they were not willing to confide to themselves, much less to either the legislature, the executive, or the judicial departments, certain great and fundamental rights which they have declared in the most explicit language, shall not be the subject of governmental cognizance. Take the definition of treason, take your bill of rights, and read them carefully, and ponder upon them. Treason is to consist in levying war by overt act, to establish which, there must be two positive witnesses to the same fact. This was a great subject which those who framed the constitution were resolved to regulate, and they

of his supporters? But the gentleman says, if the officer thus acts, the people will not re-elect him. Will that relieve the man who has been injured, oppressed, and down trodden by the sheriff? Would that restore to the man his rights, abused by the sheriff in failing to discharge the duties of his office, in a desire to secure the votes of his adversary? Not at all. The people have turned out the sheriff, but still here are men suffering under the exercise of a power intended for the good of the country, but which has been perverted to corrupting of purposes. This is a question that I do not like to discuss, but it is unavoidable, in view of the importance of guarding these officers from an interference with the best interests of the people, when they have in their hands the power of sacrificing whom they please. Let the sheriff be elected, I care not whether for two or four years, but let him be ineligible. When he goes out let him wind up his business, and then after an interval of two or four years afterwards, if the people want him again let them elect him. And I think with the gentleman from Louisville that rotation in office, especially in regard to sheriffs, is the most advisable policy to adopt.

I have thought proper to make these remarks, because I am satisfied that if we turn these sheriffs and constables loose, armed with all the process of the law, with the power to exercise it for the advancement of their own interests, it will be an injury to the country, that years will not remedy.

Mr. WOODSON. The scarcity of any article is said to enhance its value. If this be true, and I think it is, consistency, in this convention, cannot be too highly appreciated, and by none more than my friend from Simpson (Mr. Clarke.) I do not pretend to say that I have, or shall be consistent in my course, in this convention, but I think that I shall try at any rate to preserve it as far as possible. But I have been particularly struck with the course of gentlemen here. When a clerk is to be elected, we are told no man should be eligible without a certificate of qualification. And why? Because the people are not capable of judging of his qualifications. When a sheriff is to be elected by the people, I am told, do not let him be elected again. And why? Do not the people of his county know all about his qualifications by that time, whether he has been oppressive or not, or discharged his duties properly or improperly? Most certainly. My position is, that we ought to interpose no more restriction than is possible here, and I am not to be deterred from it by the gentleman from Henderson (Mr. Dixon) and others who are continually taunting people here, with a disposition to pander to the prejudices of the people, and seeking thereby, to deter us from asserting that the people are capable of self-government. Nothing of the sort has any influence on me. Above all, do not say in one breath that the people are capable of self-government, and in the next that they shall not select their own officers, after they have served them one term, for fear they may be improperly influenced. It reminds me of the election of Napoleon to the first consulship. It was declared that it should be a perfectly free election, but accompanying it was the proclamation, that he who voted against Naoleon should be shot. It was like the liberty of the press proclaimed during the reign of terror in France, where every article was subjected to the censorship of those in power. Here we are told the people are free, and can govern themselves, irrespective of all restrictions, but they are told also, that they cannot even elect a clerk without a certificate from a judge of the court of appeals, or of the circuit court; and for what purpose? In order that the people may know who ought to be permitted to serve them? And when a sheriff was to be elected a second time, we were told, in effect, that the people, instead of being capable of self-government, were incapable, or otherwise, that a majority of the people are corrupt and accessible to bribery and improper influences. Gentlemen ought not thus to say in one breath that the people are capable of self-government, and in the next that they are not. But, says the president, sheriffs and constables are to be found, who would pervert their offices to the oppression of the people to secure their re-election. I am reminded by that remark, of one of Aesop's fables—that of the fox and the flies. The fox objected to the flies, when they had satiated themselves, being driven off from him, for fear that another hungry set would come and deprive him of the last remaining drop of blood in his veins. Thus, if a man discharges the duties of his office in the way described, it is to be hoped by that time he will be sufficiently satiated with the best blood of the people, and that they would suffer less under him, than those who had not as yet tasted a single drop of it. My impression is that the people, in the selection of these officers will be governed by proper considerations. If a sheriff discharges his duties faithfully and properly, they will re-elect him; if not, they will not re-elect him. If these two positions were not true, I would vote to deprive them of the power of exercising this privilege, and vest it in another tribunal. Let us be consistent, and not proclaim to the world in the same breath, that the people shall elect their officers, and they shall not; and that they are capable of discriminating in their choice, and that they are not thus capable. Do, at least, let us be consistent. To use a homely phrase, "I want to go the whole hog, or none." Let the people have the whole power of electing whom they wish.

Mr. ROGERS. This thing of drawing general conclusions from particularities, is all wrong. It is true, that Judas Iscariot was a traitor, and so was Benedict Arnold, but these isolated cases do not prove that all the people of America are traitors, or that all the members of the christian church are impostors; not at all.

Mr. DIXON. The gentleman did not understand me. My idea was, that the people could not discover instinctively who were and who were not traitors.

Mr. ROGERS. I am coming to that. The gentleman was arguing from particular instances, and applying them generally to the people. I would have the sheriff elected for two years, for I go for a short term, and then re-eligible, and the people I believe have too much intelligence to re-elect a corrupt man. As to the argument of not requiring bonds of the sheriff, I have heard similar things during the whole of last summer from those who were opposed to an election of these officers by the people at all.

Thus, in my county, it was said by those who sought to cast ridicule on the principle, that we desired to elect standing jurors and witnesses. As to a sheriff oppressing the people in view of securing his re-election, that would be just the opportunity for the people to pay him back, and I desire that he shall pass that ordeal. If he is a good officer I want the people to have an opportunity of rewarding him by re-electing him to the office.

Mr. CLARKE then offered the following amendment to the amendment:

"That judges of the circuit courts are elected, but no person shall be eligible to the office of sheriff, or the assistant or deputy of any sheriff, unless he shall have obtained a quietus six months before the election for the amount of all public moneys or dues for which he may be responsible."

On motion, the committee rose and reported progress.

The question being on granting the committee leave to sit again, leave was refused—a count being had—ayes 25, nays 29.

And then the convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1849.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. LANCASTER.

LOUISVILLE CHANCERY COURT.

Mr. HARDIN from the committee on Circuit Courts, offered the following, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole, made the special order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed:

SEC. —. The Louisville chancery court shall exist under this constitution, subject to repeal, and its jurisdiction to enlargement and modification by the legislature. The chancellor shall have the same qualification as a circuit court judge; and the clerk of said court as a clerk of a circuit court, and the marshal of said court as a sheriff; and the legislature shall provide for the election of the chancellor, clerk, and marshal, of said court, at the same time that the judge and clerk of the circuit court are elected for the county of Jefferson, and they shall hold their offices for the same time.

COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the committee on education, made the following report, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole, and ordered to be printed.

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. The diffusion of knowledge and learning among men being essential to the preservation of liberty and free government, and the promotion of human virtue and happiness, it shall be the duty of the general assembly to establish, within _____ years next after the adoption of this constitution, and forever thereafter keep in existence, an efficient system of common schools throughout this commonwealth, which shall be equally open to all the white children thereof.

SEC. 2. The fund called and known as the school fund, consisting of $1,225,768 42, secured by bonds given by the state, and payable to the board of education, and $73,500 of stock in the Bank of Kentucky, also the sum of $51,223 29, being the balance of interest on the school fund for the year 1848, over and above the charges against that interest for said year; all of which said sums of money and stock, and the interest and dividends accruing thereon and therefrom, be, and the same is hereby, set apart, dedicated, declared to be, and shall remain, a perpetual fund; the principal of which shall never be diminished by legislative appropriation or enactment. The interest thereof, together with any other fund that may arise by taxation, heretofore or hereafter imposed by the general assembly in aid of common schools, shall be inviolably applied and devoted to the creation, support, and encouragement thereof in this commonwealth, for the equal benefit of all the children therein, whose instruction shall be provided for by law; and no law shall be made authorizing said fund, or any part thereof, to be diverted to any other use or purpose whatsoever, than that to which the same is hereinbefore dedicated.

SEC. 3. The interest arising from the fund in the second section of this article mentioned, as also any sum which may have arisen, or may hereafter arise from taxation imposed for the purposes aforesaid or otherwise, shall, in any system of common schools which the general assembly may establish, be distributed among the several counties, in proportion to the number of children therein.

SEC. 4. It shall be the duty of the general assembly to provide for the investment of the sum of $51,223 29, in the second section of this article mentioned, in some safe and profitable manner, the interest upon which shall be applied as in said second section directed.

SEC. 5. Whenever, for the period of one year, there shall remain unused of the fund set apart and made applicable by the second section of this article to the establishment and support of common schools, the sum of ten thousand dollars, it shall be the duty of the governor to fund the same, which shall constitute a portion of the permanent fund for the support of common schools; the interest arising thereon only to be applied in aid thereof, as in the second section of this article mentioned: Provided, That if any county have failed to organize common schools therein for five years, it may, at any time after an organization, draw whatever sum may then be due to it, provided the same has not been funded as herein directed.

SEC. 6. The general assembly shall provide the ways and means for the prompt payment and safe custody of the interest now due, or which may hereafter accrue upon the bonds given by the state, and payable to the board of education.

SEC. 7. There shall be elected, by the qualified electors in this commonwealth, a superintendent of public instruction, who shall hold his office for _____ years, and whose duties and salary shall be prescribed and fixed by law.

BILL OF RIGHTS.

Mr. DIXON. I desire at the proper time to offer an amendment as a substitute for the second section of the bill of rights, or the article which is placed third in order in the report made by the chairman (Mr. Stevenson) of the committee on miscellaneous provisions. I wish now to give notice of my intention, and if in order, I will present my substitute that it may be printed for the information of the convention, and referred to the committee of the whole.

The secretary read it as follows:

Sec. —. That all power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority and consent, and instituted for their peace, safety, and happiness, and the security of their property. For the advancement of these ends, but not for their defeat, they have at all times an unalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their government in such manner as they may think proper.

Mr. MORRIS. If I understand the proposition of my honorable friend, he means to insert, by his substitute, into the general provisions of the constitution, into our bill of rights, the spirit of a preamble and resolution which he brought into this house some weeks ago, to provide solemnly and explicitly, that whilst the sovereignty of this land resides in the people—whilst the people have a right to change, alter, and to abolish the fundamental law of the land, and to do every thing for the security of their lives, liberty, and property, yet that they have no right, no legal power to destroy any of these great principles which were the inducements to all governments—the pillars upon which all society rests—and without which our government would loose the features of republicanism and degenerate into despotism. He means to place the constitution in such a light as that there shall be no mistake with regard to the powers which they have a right to exercise, and those which are even beyond the people themselves, or any set of men clothed with authority from them. He means to place it beyond all cavil and construction, that the lives, the liberties, and property of our people cannot, even by the people themselves, be taken away. He wishes that hereafter there shall be no misunderstanding with regard to this point—that the constitution shall plainly set forth that the power to destroy property without compensation or the consent of the owner does not exist. This is clearly established to my mind, by the original resolution reported to this house by the committee; but it is plain to my mind only by implication, and it has and will again admit of great variety of construction and difference of opinion. It is to avoid this variety of construction, to place the matter clearly and distinctly before the country, that this substitute is offered. I most heartily concur in the propriety of the provision, and when the proper time arrives will, if it be necessary, give my reasons fully and explicitly. I hope it will be printed and duly considered by every member of this house. It is a proposition involving a great principle.

Mr. STEVENSON. I concur in the propriety of printing the substitute now offered by my friend from Henderson. The object of the committee in altering this section—it will be seen, was to render it more specific. They have changed this section by adding after the words, "peace, safety, and happiness," the words, "security and protection of their property." I concur with the gentleman from Henderson, as well as with the gentleman from Christian, (Mr. Morris,) that nothing should be left to a doubtful construction in the bill of rights, so far as security goes, and I shall go most cheerfully for the proposed amendment, if in the opinion of the convention the object has not been already clearly secured by the section as reported. The only change, if I understand it, in the proposed amendment, is by adding the words, "and not for their defeat." I had supposed when this matter was discussed in the committee, that after setting out clearly, openly, and distinctly with the proposition that the object for which all free government was framed, was the peace, safety, happiness, security, and protection of the property of the people, that any government founded in contradistinction to these principles, would be contrary to the whole spirit and genius of the government. But if the amendment is not sufficiently strong, no gentleman will go further than myself in making it so. I hope this amendment will be referred to the committee, that an opportunity may be given for a mutual interchange of opinions, and if the present section is not considered sufficiently strong, I shall go with my friend in his amendment, to make it stronger.

Mr. DIXON. I will remark that in presenting this amendment my object was to make the thing clear, which I thought somewhat doubtful. I did not wish any mis-construction to be placed on the language in the second section, and I thought it better to place the whole matter beyond even a doubtful construction. I think, gentlemen, on examination of the second section, will perhaps concur with me, that the words which I have added, "but not for their defeat" are not only necessary, but all important to prevent any mis-construction of the powers of this, or any future convention, over property.

The motion to print and refer was agreed to.

INSTRUCTIONS TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. CHAMBERS. When the convention was in committee of the whole a few days ago on the report of the committee on the court of appeals, the word "four" was stricken out and the word "three" was inserted by a majority of the convention, who thus expressed the opinion that there should be but three judges of that court. The whole report was afterwards referred to a joint committee, consisting of three of the standing committees of this body, to whom I desire this convention to give instructions on this subject, to govern them in preparing the report which they may hereafter present. I believe the subject has been sufficiently discussed, and therefore I shall say no more than to ask for the yeas and nays upon the resolution which I now offer.

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to increase the number of judges of the court of appeals, or to branch that court by constitutional provision, but that power should be given to the legislature to effect these objects, when the same shall be demanded by the people.

Mr. APPERSON. I move to lay that resolution upon the table. My reason is this. The grand committee has had a meeting, and they seem to be going along very well. If we undertake to instruct them on the subject, there will be resolutions of instruction offered in relation to others, and the committee may be embarrassed. Now, as they yesterday proceeded so very well, I hope no such resolution will be adopted, and I move to lay it upon the table.

The motion was put, and it was understood to have been carried; but a conversation ensued on the propriety of calling the yeas and nays upon it, which was terminated by the withdrawal of the resolution by its mover, until there should be a better attendance in the house, the sense of which he desired to obtain.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT OFFICES.

The convention having yesterday refused the committee of the whole leave to set again on the report of the committee on the executive and ministerial offices for counties and districts, the question now came up on that report in convention.

Mr. GRAY. I move that the convention resolve itself into committee of the whole, and resume the consideration of that report.

The PRESIDENT. That report is not now in possession of the committee of the whole.

Mr. GRAY. I presume it can be recommitted.

The PRESIDENT. It may be again referred to the committee of the whole, and then the gentleman may move that the convention resolve itself into committee of the whole upon it.

Mr. GRAY. I make that motion and my reason for making it is simply this. It will be better to consider this report in committee of the whole, for according to the rules which govern the committee every gentleman can more freely express his views and sentiments there. I think also that it is due to the president of this body that he should have an opportunity to give expression to his views upon the amendments that may be offered or to offer amendments himself, which he will not be able to do in convention. At an early period of the session of this convention there was an understanding that the president should be allowed such an opportunity, and I think that when the convention yesterday refused leave to sit again, this understanding was not properly considered. By refusing to go into committee of the whole again, I think we shall not expedite business, for I suppose the previous question will not be moved until all have said what they desire to say. Sir, I move that the report be again referred to the committee of the whole.

The PRESIDENT. I beg to state to the convention that I do not wish it to change any course it may desire to pursue for the convenience of its presiding officer. I have already frequently, perhaps too often, addressed the committee of the whole, on the subject involved in this report, and I do not wish them now to change their course on my account.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I voted yesterday against granting leave to sit again, deeming it unnecessary. I supposed that we were nearly through, and that any further discussion that might be thought desirable could take place in convention.

Mr. GHOLSON. If the president has no desire to speak on these questions or to offer any amendments to the remaining sections of this bill, I can see no necessity for again going into committee of the whole upon it. To go into committee and there consider it, when it will have afterwards to be acted upon in convention, will be to do that twice, which it is sufficient to do but once. I am opposed therefore to the motion which is now pending.

The motion to recommit was then rejected.

The report was then taken up, and the first question was on concurring in the amendment of the committee of the whole to the first section, striking out the words, "a county court" and inserting "and."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was by inserting in the second section after the words, "no person shall be eligible to the offices mentioned in this article who is not at the time twenty four years old"—the words "except clerks of county and circuit courts, sheriffs, constables, and county attorney, who shall be eligible at the age of twenty one years."

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was by adding the words "or a circuit court" after the words "court of appeals," in the same section, to give the judges of the circuit courts power to grant certificates of qualifications to candidates for the clerkship, as well as the court of appeals.

Mr. KELLY. I move to amend the section, under consideration, by adding the words "in open court" after the words "circuit court." I wish this examination to take place in open court. These examinations heretofore have been made at night after the adjournment of court, when the clerk has been fatigued with the labors of the day, or before its sitting in the morning. I believe, if we wish to have thoroughly qualified certificated clerks, they should be examined in the presence of the multitude.

Mr. TURNER. If a young man is examined in open court, when there is a great crowd, the tendency will be to excite and alarm him so much that it will be difficult to ascertain whether he is qualified or not. I think a private examination would be much better.

Mr. HARDIN. I think there would be some inconvenience attending a requisition of this kind. If a man wants to run in August and the spring session of the court has passed by, he will have no opportunity for an examination unless a court is called to sit for the purpose, which I presume no one would think desirable.

Mr. KELLY. I have not moved this amendment with a view to restrict the rights of any individual in this commonwealth. I believe the rights to office should be as free as air, and no restriction should be cast on any man not tainted with crime. I have some knowledge on this subject, and I know how the best evidences can be obtained; therefore I have moved that the examination be made by the circuit court, in open court. I know if it be made at night, while the judge and the clerk are tired, it will not be thorough, and there will not be that inspection that the people will give. I am opposed to restrictions altogether, and if possible I wish to kill it.

Mr. McHENRY. I am glad the gentleman has avowed his object. It is to kill this provision; and I hope those who wish for restriction will consider this object in the vote they give upon this amendment. It seems to me that there is sufficient opportunity to examine candidates for this office, without being in open court. There is another thing that should be considered, which is, that the commonwealth is spending about twenty four dollars per day, while the court is in session; an examination in open court, then will tend to increase their expense in this proportion, and the only object to be attained by it will be to gratify a few individuals. We shall save expense and trouble by having the examination made by the judge and the clerk in private, and I conceive that it will be decidedly better.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad the gentleman from Washington has called attention to the phraseology in which the clause of that report is couched. I think the candidate will be examined in open court, according to the provision of the section under consideration. By the expression "court of appeals," I do not understand the judges, but the open court, and I shall move to amend so that a judge of the court of appeals, or a judge of the circuit court may make the examination. It would be exceedingly inconvenient to have this examination made in open court, for the court sits but twice in a year.

Mr. CLARKE. While a number of propositions were pending on this second section in reference to clerks, I proposed in committee to strike out all after the word, "years," in the seventh line down to the second "the," in the tenth line, which would destroy the necessity for a certificate from a majority of the judges of the court of appeals. I would prefer that no certificate should be required from any judge. There are those in this convention who believe a certificate from a majority of the judges will be necessary, and those who believe that the people are capable of judging, and that a certificate will be only prima facie evidence of fitness, and might be procured by persons not qualified. There seems to be a middle ground, which is that the candidates should have the certificate of one judge of the circuit court. I, therefore, desire to have the words which I have indicated struck out, letting the requisition as to age and citizenship, as it is, remain, and leaving the people in the exercise of their sound discretion and good judgment, the right to determine whether the candidate is qualified or not. I do not desire to press what I do not believe to be right, but I am convinced that no certificate that would be obtained, would furnish satisfactory evidence to the people. On the contrary, I think it would enable the candidate who held it to impose on the people, and perhaps defeat one better qualified than himself. I have no idea of requiring young men from distant parts of the state to come to Frankfort for a certificate. It is fair to presume that there will be two candidates in each county, and if they have no certificates, they must come here to get them, and when obtained they will furnish no satisfactory evidence of qualification in my judgment. I then move to strike out the words I have indicated, and on that question I call for the ayes and noes.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman's motion is not in order at this time, there being an amendment pending.

Mr. KELLY withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MITCHELL moved to amend the passage under consideration, by inserting certain words, so that it would read as follows, the words proposed to be added being in italic:

"No person shall be elected clerk unless he shall have procured from a judge of the court of appeals or a judge of the circuit court, a certificate that he has been examined by the clerk of the court giving said certificate under his supervision, and that he is qualified for the office for which he is a candidate."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. CLARKE then renewed his motion to strike out the entire passage, as amended, and on this he called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were taken and resulted thus: yeas, 33; nays 52.

YEAS.—John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, Beverly L. Clarke, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, William Hendrix, James W. Irwin, Thomas James, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Willis B. Machen, William N. Marshall, David Meriwether, James M. Nesbitt, Hugh Newell, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Michael L. Stoner, Silas Woodson—33.

So the convention refused to strike out.

The convention next concurred in the amendment of the committee of the whole, striking out the concluding words of the section, a provision to the same effect having been made in another part of the article.

The second section as amended was then adopted.

The third section was read and approved, without amendment.

The fourth section was next read as follows:

"Sec. 4 Sheriffs shall be elected in each county at the same time and manner that [associate judges of the county court are elected, whose term of office shall be two years, and they shall be re-eligible for a second term; but no sheriff, or deputy, who qualified under him, shall after the expiration of the second term, be re-eligible for the succeeding term.]"

Mr. CLARKE renewed his motion which he offered in committee of the whole yesterday, to strike out all the words of this section which we have placed between brackets, and insert the following: "that judges of the circuit court are elected, but no person shall be eligible to the office of sheriff or an assistant or deputy of any sheriff, unless he shall have obtained a quietus six months before an election, for the amount of all public moneys or dues for which he may be responsible."

Mr. HARDIN. If I understand the gentleman's proposition, it is that the sheriff may be re-eligible so long as the people will elect him, provided he has obtained a quietus six months previous to the election, of the whole amount of revenue and county levy, for which he is responsible. If that be the case, I cannot vote for the amendment. I listened with much attention to my friend from Madison yesterday, and from my own long experience I am led to believe that every word he said was literally true. I am in favor of rotation in office and practical responsibility; and to insure a practical responsibility as to some officers, I know of no way but ineligibility, because there is no way to get at him, except by suits for malfeasance, misfeasance, or nonfeasance, unless we reach him by putting an expiration to the time for which he may be elected. I have no cause of complaint against any sheriff in any court where I practice, nor against any clerk or judge. I did not, in striking for a convention, and in aiming to make a constitution, do it with a view to provide places for men out of office, nor to turn present incumbents out. The sheriffs, as I remarked, do their business well, and the clerks also, and I have no cause of complaint against the judges, except as I said in relation to the judges of the court of appeals, that I think they are sometimes in too much of a hurry. But if a sheriff is re-eligible after four years, when is he to cease to be so? So long as the people will elect him he can be elected, provided he has complied with the provision of this amendment.

Now in practice, what will be the effect? The sheriff has the vantage ground in all sharpening, foxing, hooking, and every thing else, and in all manner of ways. There is no conceivable way in which the people can be ground down in which he will not be able to do it. He will have, perhaps, considerable arrearages of money behind, but he will pay up, because he will have funds in his hands, and he will get his quietus, and when the election comes on he will have from one third to one half of the voters under his thumb, so that they cannot resist him. I heard a speech some forty years ago in Bullitt from a candidate for the office of constable, by the name of Wilcoxon, and he claimed his election, on the ground that he had been a constable, and had favored the people. But a sheriff can have one third of the revenue of the county out of the treasury, and yet if he has six months to make his quietus, I ask if he will fail of his election while he has claims against one half to one third of the voters of the county. Surely he cannot be resisted. He may have executions against a man who controls a hundred votes and how can that man resist him. The sheriff may make a return upon an execution, "not sold for want of time," or "not sold for want of bidders" and no damages can be obtained from him. He has a lever of power which I do not want a sheriff to possess.

I will venture to say, if you have no other clause except that of a quietus, the same office can be in the same family for twenty or thirty years. Do you not intend to leave the office open to all? Do you not wish to leave a competitor, a rival of the man exercising the office of sheriff, a chance to be elected? Give him a fair competition. You give the sheriff the vantage ground more than fifty per cent. It is a vantage ground that cannot be resisted at all. Suppose two thousand votes have to be given, and one thousand have an arrearage of county levy behind, and a remnant of the rest have an execution hanging over their heads; and they resist the sheriff! You might as well attempt to dam up the Mississippi river as do so. I strike for rotation and responsibility in office, and I say there is no responsibility if you allow a sheriff to be re-elected after such a term. I have reflected on this subject a good deal for the last twelve months, and I had made up my mind exactly to such a report as has been made by the gentleman from Madison, that a sheriff should be appointed for two years; and re-eligible for one term and no longer. It is a very important office. It is not so high and dignified as that of the judge of the court of appeals, or of the circuit court, but it is a most important office to the great body of the community, as much so as any in the state, for this officer operates on the high and the low and on every body; and through him, the whole administration of the law is visited on the heads of every one. I have gone as far as I can possibly go in this levelling doctrine. I was afraid when Monsieur Tonson came again, this morning, that he would take us, but he failed by nineteen votes. And I hope we shall put into the constitution enough of the conservative principle to make it at least healthy. I have struck a great deal for reform, but I cannot go to this length. I want a sheriff to go out of office at the end of four years.

Mr. GHOLSON. I suppose gentlemen will now concede the fact that the people do not know enough to govern themselves, and therefore, we must put leading strings on them, or they will go astray. We were told yesterday and this morning, that you shall not elect a clerk whom the people please, because you do not know whether the candidates are qualified or not. And now, when we come to the office of sheriff, you shall not elect, because you do know. You shall not elect a man, although he has served you honestly and faithfully. You turn round and say, we must put the bridle in the mouths of the people, because otherwise, the candidates for office will buy votes at a dollar and a half. If the gentleman from Nelson chooses to make such a declaration in relation to his own constituents, he is welcome to do so. I disclaim it as applied to mine. On the one hand, we are told what we shall not do, and on the other, we are emphatically told that the object for which the people have called with stentorian voice, shall be denied, and a restriction is to be laid on them, in the choice of a clerk, and now in the choice of a sheriff, because the sheriff will buy up the votes. It was remarked by my talented friend from Henderson yesterday, that consistency is a jewel. I think our friends are about to act consistently in one thing, at least, that is to deny to the people the return of that power which they have called for. They begin to denounce persons as demagogues, and turn up their noses, and say they are sick of hearing of the supremacy of the people. For my part, I am not tired of it. Gentlemen have shown their consistency in trying to put leading strings on the people, and I will resist it at every step; though I may be overpowered by numbers, I will contend for what I believe to be broad republican equality. I can point to one on this floor, who has held the office of sheriff for thirty years, and I would ask him how he appreciates the compliment which has been paid to the sheriffs? If I ever heard the doctrine fall from the lips of mortal man, that the people cannot govern themselves, it has been uttered by my friend from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) this morning. Away with freedom, away with self-government, when we, in this hall, are to be told that our constituents can be bought for a dollar and a half by the office holder! Yet this is the argument used on this floor. We are told that after we have tried an officer, and found him faithful, we shall not elect him again, while at the same time, we are told that all power is to return to the people. And this is the way it is to be done. I have heard of such a thing as riding the people booted and spurred, and I used to think that some office holders did it; but if this, which it is now proposed to do, is not the thing, then I do not understand the use of language. My friend from Nelson has tried to convince us that the circuit court judges will be scoundrels, if they are allowed to be elected more than once. Why not carry out the principle in relation to clerks? When it suits the gentleman's proposition, then the people are any thing that is noble, great, good, and generous; and when it suits his proposition, they are knaves and scoundrels. If the sheriffs have been honorable in his neighborhood, I ask why in the name of high heaven he wants to turn them out? He has named a great many rascalities of clerks, and I wish him now to name the sheriffs who have been guilty of such rascalities as require that they should be turned out.

I believe we are going to make a farce of this constitution, and I offer the prediction, that so much will be done, that the people will vote against it; and if any thing will induce them to do it, it will be these illiberal, unjust, and anti-republican discriminations; this bridling of the will of the people, and this denying of the free choice of those who are to preside over them. If it should happen that a sheriff should succeed in one election by bribery and corruption, "murder will out," and the rascality will soon be exposed, and he will sink into the lowest depths of infamy. The whole thing resolves itself into this, that we must protect the people from themselves. If the people are exposed to Shylocks and shavers, to be sold like sheep in the shambles, will they not be conscious of these facts? If not, they are no better than sheep, and they are the last people on the face of the earth to be trusted with the rights of self-government. If this principle is adopted in the present case, I hope that it may be made to apply to other cases also. I protest against the life estate granted to others. If the sheriff is to be cut off, cut off the clerks, and the judges; treat all alike, and do not make fish of one, and flesh of another.

Mr. KELLY. Whether the facetious allusion of the venerable gentleman from Nelson to Mons. Tonson is designed for me or not I do not care or know. He says he has gone as far in radicalism as he is willing to go, and I confess he has gone further in substantial reform than I expected, and I am glad now to see his words become the echo of his thoughts.

Mr. HARDIN. I do not intend to say but a very few words. I never said that my constituents could be bought for a dollar and a half—and I had supposed that the gentleman (Mr. Gholson) had suffered enough the other day from the gentleman from Henderson (Mr. Dixon) when he attempted to put words in that gentleman's mouth which he did not use, to warn him against playing that kind of game in future. I have never uttered a word that would justify him in declaiming for a quarter of an hour in the way he has. I said that I had been for rotation in office from the governor down, and I appeal to him if he has not heard me argue against the ineligibility of officials over and over again, as the only practical means of securing responsibility, of which heretofore there has been none at all. As I before remarked, the sheriff has advantages in entering a canvass, greatly superior to any other man. He has been sheriff for four years, and has three or four deputies in the large counties, and at least two in any county, who will know every man in the county. They will have the remains, though you require a quietus, of levies and fee bills unexecuted and due. They will pay up, out of their own means, to the government, to the lawyers, clerks, and others, and get a quietus, and still have these debts scattered about the county, no doubt, perhaps, to the extent of a thousand cases. What will be the effect? The gentleman says, that under such circumstances, he can come up and vote boldly; and it is no doubt true, though I cannot tell. He says, also, that he thinks I might have the same boldness, and perhaps I might, but I do not want to be placed in that situation. The word of God says, "Lead us not into temptation," or some such expression as that; at any rate, if it is not there it ought to be. But I can say for myself, that if the sheriff came with an execution to seize upon and sell all I possessed, even to my last bed, and was to promise to favor me a little until after election, I do not know how I should act. I should be seized, I am afraid, at least with fear and trembling. And yet my friend would come up boldly and without fear. Perhaps he would if he had the money in his pocket, and who then would be afraid? I have gone for ineligibility to secure responsibility in every office, from the beginning, and shall advocate it to the end. I do not know that I heard distinctly what the gentleman from Washington (Mr. Kelly) said, and perhaps may not have understood him. He at least is under no obligation to me of any kind or character, nor am I under any to him, except so far as entertaining a good opinion of him, is concerned; but there was no particular necessity for his saying what he did. I advocated a convention, and have advocated it for years. I want the people to elect all their officers, and I want practical responsibility, and ineligibility to secure it. I am not against the sovereign people, but whenever I hear a man talk about loving the people over much, I let it go for about what it is worth. I love the people too; I owe every thing to them; and I have never appealed to them in vain; I do not know that I shall ever appeal to them again, but if I should, I will stake my life upon it, it will not be in vain. They know me, I mix with them, and am one of them, and no more than one of them. And in reference to my constituents, I will say that they are equal to the gentleman's constituents, in integrity, intelligence, and in every quality that ennobles men. I will not say that they possess those qualities to a greater extent than his, by any means, for I presume the gentleman's constituency are just as respectable as any other in the state.

And in relation to the sheriff, I do not know that they ever voted against me, and in my practice of forty three years, I declare most solemnly that I never sued a sheriff, for they have but a hard time of it any how. We are on the best of terms, but I do not want any man to hold the office for more than four years with the power the sheriff can exert.

I did say, and I repeat it, when it was proposed that a man should be elected clerk, possessing no qualifications, that it was a leveling principle to which I was opposed. I appeal to my friend, for I still must call him so, from Washington, if the clerk of his county did not die, and if a very popular lawyer did not get elected clerk of the county court. He is a very worthy man, a good clerk, and writes as good a hand as myself, and perhaps the only thing in which I can excel him, is in the grammatical construction of sentences. Well, the first order he made was to notice the death of his predecessor, and it was entered in this way. "At a court begun in hell it was suggested that the county court clerk had died, &c." (laughter). I saw the record brought into court four years afterwards to prove that the gentleman was a clerk, and on his being pointed out to me, I turned to him and said, "In the name of God why did you take such advantage of your competitor, as to go to hell, when every body is your friend, to hold the election?" (renewed laughter.) Since then the record has been changed, and reads, "at a court begun and held, &c." The requisition of a certificate then would have done no harm. In relation to coroners I appeal to the gentleman from Hardin if the facts I am about to relate are not true? During one of the terms of the circuit court, there was a terrible battle fought between two bullies, commencing in a grocery on the west side of the street and extending clear across the street, resulting in one of them being caught and thrown down so as to cause his death. A coroner's jury was summoned, and the verdict of the jury, drawn out from the forms, was that one man had killed another, with six thrusts of a small sword and other weapons, and a variety of places in the body were designated as having thus been wounded. Is it not possible then that men may fill offices without possessing the proper qualifications?

I am for the people electing their governor, but let him be at least thirty years of age. I am for their electing a representative, but let him be twenty four years of age. I am for their electing a senator, but let him be at least thirty years of age, and I am for electing a judge, but let him be at least thirty years of age, and a practising lawyer. These are wholesome restraints, necessary for the safety of the great body of the community.

Mr. GHOLSON. I find that offices are made to grow in importance as it may suit the convenience of gentlemen. First of all it was the judge, then the clerk, and now it is the sheriff that is the most important officer under the canopy of Heaven. I wonder that my friend from Nelson, does not desire to provide that a certificate of qualification shall be required of the sheriff. The gentleman, I am glad to hear, now disclaims that the people can be bought like sheep at the shambles, but I submit to the gentleman if he did not distinctly, openly, unequivocally, and in so many words, declare that with the revenue means in his hands, the sheriff would buy votes, which revenue would amount to about a dollar and a half a head? I affirm that he did do it, and he has not pretended to deny it. And it was, so far as the charge applied to my constituency, that I repelled and protested against it. And he has also failed, and forever will fail to designate a sheriff who has acted in the manner he says they will do. And the story the gentleman told us about the coroner was after all merely an instance where an honest farmer was led into error by copying a legal fiction, and which form never had common sense or common honesty in it. And the gentleman and others with him, when the question comes up will contend for the retention of all these senseless legal forms and fictions. Yes sir, when the motion is made to reject all these things which stand like drift wood in the current of justice, and through whose filtering the heavenly attribute is only to be obtained, if at all, but which indeed oftener turns the current the other way, and causes the withholding of all justice, you will find him stoutly contending for their retention. Just look at the writ of ejectment and see what an utter fiction and string of falsehoods it is from beginning to end. This is lawyers sense, and it is no wonder that plain honest farmers are led astray by it.

Mr. HAMILTON. I have been listening attentively to the protracted discussion of this question, but gentlemen have failed to convince me that the sheriff should not be re-eligible. Some have said that the sheriff would take the money out of his own pocket and pay it over in order to secure a quietus. That however, is no objection to me. Others have contended that he would oppress and ruin the whole country, but this I think is a mistaken view. So far as I am acquainted with the duties of the sheriff, his duties are prescribed by law, and a penalty provided for every neglect or violation of them. Where a precept is delivered to him, or an execution comes to his hands, he is bound to return it on a certain day, and not only that, but to endorse thereon what he has done with it. And if he fails to endorse an execution, he is liable not only for the amount of the debt, but for thirty per cent. damages. And after the execution is returned the plaintiff has the right to go and see what has been done, and to demand his money at once—the sheriff being liable to that amount, if he does not immediately account for it. If then, great evils are to arise from the exercise of the power in the sheriff's hands, which gentlemen seem to apprehend, I would go for abolishing the office at once. Experience is the best of authorities, and I can point to instances where the deputies have been in office for six, eight, or more years, and with no complaint, so far as I have ever heard, against them. In Green, the deputy has served some six or eight years, and performed his duty well. He never has carried out this desolation and oppression in that county that gentlemen have here pictured. It was the same with Barren and Hart counties; but there was a prejudice among the democrats in Hart in favor of rotation in office for the sheriffalty, and in that county the whigs had had the office so long that the incumbent, although a clever fellow, was run out, and a democrat substituted in his place. I was called upon to become one of the endorsers for the new officer. He swore in a couple of his sons as deputies, and about twelve months afterwards I heard that there were judgments out against him. I thought it best to go and see about it, and had hardly got into town when a constable handed me the notices of his failure to return executions. I went a little further, when three more notices were served on me, of his not paying over moneys—and when I got to the court house the sheriff gave me a handful of them, for his misdemeanors in office. The sons had destroyed the father, and thus involved his sureties. Some of these cases I have been obliged to follow up to the court of appeals. This is one of the results of the application of that principle for which the gentleman from Nelson is so strenuous a stickler—rotation in office. If the gentleman and others would apply this rule to their speaking, the convention would get along much faster and better. And this experience proves to me, that if a man in office is discharging his duties well, he should be re-eligible again to it.

But, says the gentleman from Henderson, was there not a Judas, and did he not betray his Lord with a kiss? Yes, the school boys in my county know that. But I ask the gentleman if this did not occur during his first term, and if he was re-elected? (Laughter.) My good book tells me that this occurred during Judas' first term—and that he was not re-elected, though he sought to be with tears in his eyes. And further, says the gentleman, what is the use of a bond from the officer? Cannot his experience tell him that so long as the officer was receiving moneys, it was necessary that he should give a bond? The first endeavor is to select a moral man—if you fail in that, then the bond secures you. I had supposed a gentleman of his experience would not have asked such a question. His experience while speaker of the senate, in the case of the state treasurer, by which the people lost thousands of dollars, should have taught him better than to have asked such a question.

Mr. KELLY. My friend from Nelson says that by the record, the county court of Washington in 1835, was opened in hell. Whether that is the fact or not I do not know, never having been there—he may have however. But I do know that the gentleman who was the incumbent of the office, discharged his duties well, and I have never heard a complaint against him. I am sorry to see the gentleman take occasion so often to allude to the county of Washington. He denounced a distinguished member of the bar there the other day—Dabney Cosby—while speaking on the subject of branching the court of appeals. He was born and raised in Washington, and has been a candidate in the district, and the vote of the county has always told against him, and I think that to be the moving cause in this matter. The gentleman says he supposes he may call me his friend. I tell him I am his friend, and have ever been, and I have no desire to engage in a war of wit with him. He is an overmatch for me with that weapon.

Mr. NUTTALL. As I shall differ with some of my friends with whom I have been associated, in regard to this office of sheriff, it is proper that I should give my reason therefor. In the first place however, I will remark that I have not discovered in this convention any desire on the part of any one to introduce what the gentleman has styled the levelling doctrine. I suppose that every gentleman here is controlled in his action by what he considers the best interests of his constituents, and I have no idea that any vote they may give, will be governed by sinister motives. I will say one thing, and I appeal to the judgment, and well bought experience I may say, of every gentleman here, to vouch for its correctness. I will not make an invidious distinction as to counties, for I believe the people are alike all over the state, but if you give me all the sheriffs and all their deputies, and all the constables on my side of the question in a political canvass, I think I stand a very good chance of being elected in any county in this state.

A few words as to the use of money in an election. I do not say that any person of good sound understanding and virtuous habits can be bought, but I can tell what I know and what I think has been the experience of every man who has been a candidate for office. It is that money used properly or rather improperly, in an election has great power. Why do the whigs and democrats make up pony purses just before the election if nothing is to be gained by its application? Why do they do it if it is to have no effect and to produce no result? It is made up to be expended in certain sections, and parts of districts, and no man or set of men would act so idly and so foolishly as to make up these purses of money just before an election, unless they were aware that something was to be accomplished by its expenditure.

Now, I have as little good feeling for the constables as any man living, but as for the sheriffs, I make no war on that class of respectable citizens. But as for these men who go about into every poor neighborhood, and poor man's house, in the country, day in and day out, just before an election, to say that, with their executions and fee bills in their hands, they have no controlling influence in an election, is to say what no intelligent man will believe. I recollect being called into a neighboring county once, to make a speech to a large congregation of people. On such occasions I am very apt to look at the topography of the country, and the character of the people to whom I am to speak, and to enquire and find out who are the drill sergeants of parties,—and these last I have always found in the shape and persons of constables—the men who always have their saddle bags loaded down with munitions of war for the occasion, in the shape of fee bills and executions. Well, on this occasion I saw some of these gentlemen, with their saddle bags, on the ground. There was no distinguished man to meet me, and they could get no one to do it but a constable. Thinks I, old fellow, smart as you are, I shall get you; for I am some in a scrape of this sort. Well, I saw the moving of the waters, and it was my business, while they were concocting their schemes, to take care of myself. "Now," said I, "fellow citizens, I have come here to talk politics to you, but I see that this ground is infested with a set of cattle that are called constables. Now, I will stake my vote upon the fact, that what I am going to tell you is true—if it is not, I will agree to vote for your man, and if it is, you shall agree to vote for mine. Here is an election to come off in about two or three weeks. It is an important one,—the whigs have got their secret circular out, in which they tell you that the halt, the lame, and the blind, must all be brought up to the polls, and the democrats have also got out their circular, in which they urge the same thing in regard to the same kind of men on their side. Now," said I, "these gentry, these constables, will have you all out to-day, and I will tell you what they will say. They will tap you on the shoulder and take you one side, and say, 'here is a little execution against you of $15 or $20; if you will really agree to pay me it, say two weeks after the election, I will wait for you; and this is a very important election going on now, in which we all feel interested, as it is a matter of great consequence to the people.'—Now, fellow citizens, I want you to rise up here and say how many of you have the constables taken out in this way." First one and then another, and in all some seven or eight, got up immediately and avowed that the thing had occurred to them. Tell me not then that a sheriff or a constable can exert no influence with his office. Let one of these officers approach a poor man, with his little family of four or five white headed children, all depending upon him for support, with an execution in his hands, to turn him out of house and home and sacrifice his all, and it will stagger almost any man, however independent he may be. I know many sheriffs who are worthy and respectable and talented men, but if I had my way, when a man had once consented to be sheriff or constable, he never should, as long as time lasts, have a seat in any deliberative body.

My friend from Ballard, (Mr. Gholson,) whom I believe to be pursuing his notions with all candor and sincerity, says that consistency is a jewel. I am afraid then that there are very few jewels here. And in my course on this question I do not wish to be understood as crossing my tracks, but merely as yielding a little. But that money is not used for electioneering purposes, and sheriffs and constables cannot pervert their stations to the same end, is not my experience. I have run some heavy political races in my county, and there never was an occasion when I could get an equal division of these officers—say half of them in my favor—that I could not lick my competitor all hollow. But when, as is frequently the case, they all go against me, if I get elected at all, it is rarely by more than a baker's dozen. As to the use of money, I think I ought to know something about it. In the most celebrated race I ever ran, my opponent was supplied with dollar bills by the hatfull, and they were used to induce men not to vote for Nuttall. I did not spend much money to get here, because I had it not, but if I had, God Almighty knows it would have went like water. With the influences that were exerted against me, I would not have been defeated for as much money as this house could hold. I will not say that other men did not spend their thousands for me, but there were thousands spent against me. Well, my constituents are just as good as those of any other gentleman here; quite as intelligent, and they pay about $12,000 a year of revenue to the state government.

I am for a compromise of this matter; I started in this convention with an intention to compromise on non-essentials. I yielded on the matter of requiring qualifications from clerks, and if gentlemen will all act in the same spirit, we shall give to the people a constitution which will be adopted by a large majority.

Mr. KELLY offered the following amendment to the amendment, to be added at the end thereof: "Who is not a defaulter, but willing to pay over, when legally required to do so, money collected upon any legal process to him direct."

Mr. WOODSON enquired what had become of his amendment, offered in committee of the whole, yesterday?

The PRESIDENT replied that it was out off by the refusal of leave to the committee to sit again.

Mr. KELLY'S amendment was then adopted.

Mr. BOYD moved to strike out six and insert three months, as the time before the election when the officer should be required to have a quietus.

Mr. CLARKE accepted the amendment.

Mr. GHOLSON urged that the six months requisition ought to be retained.

Mr. CLARKE. My own preferences had been for six months. I will leave it to the house to decide, however.

The motion of Mr. BOYD was rejected.

Mr. HARDIN called for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

Mr. CLARKE. Having offered the amendment, it is proper that I should submit a few remarks on the subject. I offered it in good faith, and I am sure with no purpose to detain this convention. We have a question that involves a principle that I regard as of some importance, and which has been pending in this house for the last two or three weeks. It is as to the re-eligibility of the judges. I myself intend to vote upon that question that the judges may be re-elected by the people just as often as they come before them. I intend to impose no restraints upon the people in regard to that particular subject. I want him to be re-eligible upon the great principle that the people themselves are competent to determine whether they ought to be re-elected or not. You propose to allow the circuit court and court of appeals' clerk to be re-elected, but when you come to the office of sheriff, it is then said he shall not be re-eligible, and why? Because he is the collector of public moneys, and will secure his re-election by their use, and the use of the means he has to collect from individual litigants, against the better judgment of the people. If that were satisfactory to my mind I should at once go against the re-eligibility of the sheriff. But I am in favor of allowing every officer in the state to be re-eligible, just so long as the people shall think proper to place them in power. It is enough when you have said that they shall have a quietus for six months. And when you have said that, in the name of common sense and justice, let them be re-elected if the people think proper to do it. And when you take into consideration the amendment of my friend from Washington, requiring that they shall have paid up all the moneys collected from private litigants, you throw him then upon his own resources. He has no means to electioneer with then, save his own. Why not say that a judge shall not be re-eligible after he has served four or five years? Is there not just as much propriety in it? I refer gentlemen to the able speeches made by my friend, the elder gentleman from Nelson and others upon this floor, who are opposed to the re-eligibility of the judges. They tell you that he has more power than any other officer in the country—that the lives, liberty, property and reputation of the citizens are in their hands, and that he stalks through this land and by his fiat, strengthened by the power thus conferred in his hands, oblige those to support him who otherwise would not. Yet I have understood it to be the sense of this convention, expressed, as I am informed by the clerk, by its vote, that these judges shall be re-eligible. Talk to me about rotation in office. I ask my friend from Nelson what is his experience on the subject. Go to Washington and there you will see the southern and northern delegations in congress. Compare the delegations from Maine, New Hampshire, or New York, with those from Virginia, South Carolina, and the other southern states, and you will perceive the invariable superiority of the southern delegation in every congress. Why is this so? Because the doctrine of rotation in office obtains in those northern states. There every county composing a congressional district has its turn as it is called, and when a candidate is taken from one county at one congressional election, his turn does not come again until every other county in the district has presented its man.

Hence you rarely see in congress from these states more than one or two men who have had any congressional experience. This rule obtains in most of the districts in New York, Maine and various other northern states, and it is the rule of rotation in office. I have ever been in favor of rotation in office where it is conferred by appointment, but where the people themselves confer it, being the judges of the qualifications and the manner in which the officer has discharged his duties, I say, let the people, if he deserves it, have the power to re-elect him. Provided, however, you do not permit such election, if such things can occur in Nelson, to be secured by bribing the voters with the public moneys.

I repeat I have offered this amendment in good faith, and I want to test the question. I do not perceive myself the force of this argument, why a sheriff should not be re-eligible after he has served two or four years, and while at the same time, a judge or a clerk of the courts shall be re-eligible. I do not intend to be troublesome if I can avoid it, but there are certain great principles I intend to carry out if I have the opportunity of so doing, and if I fail in regard to this great principle of re-eligibility, so far as the office of sheriff is concerned, I then desire to test the sense of the house upon the subject of the re-eligibility of the clerks, and judges of the courts. I intend for myself to be consistent on this subject. I will not indulge in such remarks as have characterized the speeches of some gentlemen here, for it would afford me no pleasure to bring discredit on the gentleman from Nelson, if I could by any thing I might say here. If I could tell ten thousand anecdotes that would place him in an unfavorable position, I would not tell one. When I came to the legislature the first time, it was with a determined purpose, never to be personal in any remarks, if I could avoid it, and to always treat the opinions of gentlemen with respect, believing them to be expressed in candor and sincerity. And until this convention has closed its labors, I shall be found, though determined to advance such principles as I think to be right and proper, at all times pursuing the course I have indicated. It has been said by one gentleman, that I was wonderfully taken with the people, and that I had a great affection, particularly for the illiterate over the learned. Well, I regard it as a compliment, even if it be true. I do not object to it, and I am willing to be so considered. It is an old saying in regard to those who are rich, that they are able to take care of themselves, but that those who are poor require sometimes the assistance of others. Those who are learned in this community, will be able to take care of themselves, but the masses, who may be to some extent, unenlightened, compared with the gentleman, do require some assistance and some protection. I have an abiding faith and confidence in the virtue and intelligence of the people. I do believe that the people are capable of self-government, and to the election of their officers. I do believe that they are able to discriminate between the competency and incompetency of men, in making this selection. I do believe that all political power is inherent in the people, and for one, when I was a candidate before them for the honor to represent them in part on this floor, I told them that too much power had been wrested from them by the old constitution, and that if I came here I would be disposed to restore that long lost power to the people, and let them exercise it according to their will and pleasure.

How many sheriffs are there in this state, who have held their offices for the last ten or fifteen years? And I call on the gentleman opposed to my proposition and who were opposed to the calling of this convention, believing that the old constitution was good enough, to say if it is an evidence of their consistency, when they declare there is danger in allowing the officer to hold more than four years? Why the very old constitution favored by those gentlemen, the platform upon which they stand, allowed the office to be hawked about the streets, and sold like a horse in the public market, so that he who had the most money might get the office, and perpetuate it in his hands, just so long as by a system of shaving, he could raise money to buy it. That is the system under the old constitution, and then we are told that under it, the sheriff was not a dangerous man, but now when he is to be elected by the people, and I propose that he shall obtain a quietus of all demands six months before the election, it is urged here that a most tremendous influence is concentrated in his hands, by which he will buy up all the votes of the county, in which he is a candidate. If I were satisfied that the people of this state were so corrupt, as that a sheriff, by the bare exercise of the legitimate functions of his office, could buy up the voters in the different counties of the state, I should be opposed to his being elected by the people. If I believed that such a state of moral depravity and corruption pervaded a majority of the people, I should be opposed to the people electing their judges. And I would again repeat, that there is more danger to be apprehended from allowing the judges to be re-eligible to office, than the sheriff. The sheriff may have some control over the purse of the citizen, and it may be in his power to oppress him, but the law lays down the rules which are to govern him, and if he violates those rules, he becomes responsible. But has he the life, liberty and reputation of the citizen in his hands? Not at all; but merely his purse to some extent, and that no farther than the law allows him. Then if we shall determine here that the judge shall be re-eligible, I insist upon it, that the sheriff should be, with the qualification required in my amendment. And if we determine that the sheriff shall not be re-eligible, then I shall be glad to hear a reason why the judge should be.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I have paid some attention to the amendment that was last adopted, and it appears to me there is some danger if we continue to act upon this subject, that we shall make confusion worse confounded.

Take the amendment as it now is, and it provides that no person shall be elected sheriff unless he has a quietus from the auditor, and this amendment goes one step further, and says that he shall have a quietus from all private individuals, provided a legal demand shall have been made upon him.

Now I will call the attention of the convention to this single point, when and how is the fact to be determined that he has obtained a quietus from all individuals? If you try him before the court of appeals or an inferior court, when will the case be determined and the facts ascertained? Perhaps not for six months after the election. He has in the mean time been elected sheriff, but he cannot act as such, if there is any money in his hands belonging to individuals, which he has not paid over. Why, it will take months before the fact can be ascertained. Again, what is to be the consequence provided it can be ascertained some six months afterwards that he has retained money belonging to individuals, and has not complied with the requisitions of the law, in paying it over when legally demanded. The election itself will necessarily be declared void under the constitution, according to the provision you now propose to insert, "that no man shall be elected to the office of sheriff who has not obtained a quietus." What is to be the effect of a judicial declaration that the tests which you have required at the hands of the sheriff, shall exist before the election, did not in fact exist. Are all of the acts done by him in the mean time to be void? You have made it a constitutional requisition that he shall not be elected sheriff without having complied with this provision, therefore the ordinary decision of law, that where an officer is in office, de facto, his acts are not void but voidable, will not apply. Why? Because the courts cannot change your constitution; they can construe the law sometimes so that great and material inconvenience shall not happen to the people—but you have engrafted in your constitution a provision that no man shall be sheriff until he has obtained a quietus, and here is a legal decision by two courts of record, that he has not done so. Take this thing into consideration then and see whether or not you can adopt the amendment as it now stands.

I occupy this position; I am opposed to the re-eligibility of the judges, and shall give my views in relation to that matter when the proper time arrives. I am also opposed to the re-election of the sheriff, and the reason is so plain "that he who runs may read" it. Gentlemen may talk about a "free fight;" they mistake the expression, it is not a "free fight" but a fair fight, that is required, and what man can have a fair fight with the sheriff for election to that office? He knows every man in the county; he knows the circumstances of every man; he has executions in his hands; he has the money of other individuals in his hands; he has the means and appliances which put it in his power—if you make him re-eligible—to secure his re-election.

Now, I want a reasonable time to elapse, at least, after his first term in office, before you permit him to become a candidate for the same office. That is the object I have in view. I do not wish that he should come forward with all the advantages which the possession of that office gives him, to contend against men who have no such advantages. The candidates for office should occupy equal ground, and have a fair fight. It is for this reason that I am opposed to the re-eligibility of sheriffs. I think that upon further reflection, gentlemen must be convinced that such a provision as this will not work well, and ought not to be embodied in the constitution.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I understand that the object of the gentleman, in altering this clause, applies to the paying over of money on execution. If the sheriff be a defaulter in failing to pay over money, he is to be made ineligible. My friend from Daviess objects, because the fact cannot be ascertained until long after the election has taken place, and can only be ascertained then by judgment being rendered against him. But if there be no judgment rendered against him, then there is no disqualification; that is the criterion of disqualification.

Mr. TRIPLETT. The gentleman does not precisely state the ground of my objection. Judgment entered upon the record is evidence when entered, and not until then. The sheriff is a defaulter, but he has in his hands fifty or a hundred executions, and he is a candidate for re-election. The money has not been legally demanded of him; but it is demanded between the time of becoming a candidate and the time of the election; or the motion may not have been made against him until after the election, and it is then ascertained that he was, in fact, a defaulter at the time of the election. This is the case that I put, and there cannot be a diversity of opinion in regard to it, that the sheriff may be a defaulter, in fact, at the time of the election, though there be no proof of that fact upon record. The sheriff becomes a candidate, having in his hands money which he has collected upon executions. The return day is past, but no legal demand has been made. After the election he is sued for the money; it is then entered upon the record—then it is that the very thing the gentleman from Nelson speaks of has happened. But the record of the fact is not furnished until after he has been elected, and it then appears in evidence, that at the time of the election he was not in a situation to be elected, and therefore he is no sheriff at all.

Mr. CLARKE. I understand the gentleman from Daviess to be in favor of the report of the committee. If all these evils are to result from the use of the public money by a candidate, why allow him to be eligible for two terms? If in the case of a sheriff who has been in office for two terms, or four years, and has in his hands public moneys, it is dangerous to allow him to go out among the people as a candidate for re-election, lest he attempt to buy up votes, does not the same danger exist after having served two years?

Mr. TRIPLETT. I did not say any thing about buying votes.

Mr. CLARKE. That is the argument that has been used by gentlemen against my amendment. Every solitary argument that I have heard against it, is based upon the idea that the sheriff will have the means in his hands of securing his re-election. I want to know, and I ask the chairman of the committee by whom this report was made, how it is, that a sheriff having served two years, cannot use the same means, the same influence, to secure his re-election, as he can after having served four years? If you want to get rid of an evil you must go to its root; you must say he shall not hold the office for a second term, until he has been out of office for a certain number of years. I would like very much to know by what course of reasoning the honorable chairman of the committee, and the members of the committee who ordered the report to be made, were influenced, when they provided that a sheriff shall be elected for a second term, if there is such a manifest danger of his exercising an undue influence by means of the moneys he may have in his possession?

While up, I will refer for a moment to the remarks that were made this morning on the subject of the vote that was taken in favor of the certificate of a candidate for a clerkship. I consider that question, sir, as settled. I did all in my power to allow the privilege to them who desired to do so, to go forth to the country and offer their services without this mock evidence of qualification—as I regard this certificate to be—but I was defeated. It has been alluded to in some remarks made in reference to a motion which I submitted since. That question is now renewed, for it involves the same great principle that is involved in the question before the house—at least to some extent—that is, the capacity of the people to judge for themselves, regarding the qualification of candidates for office. And here you say the sheriff shall be elected for a second term, but that he shall not be elected after the second term—however well qualified he may be. Why should you make him eligible for a second term and then stop there?

Mr. TURNER. I am very reluctant to say any thing upon this subject, as the debate has been prolonged to such an extent, but called on as I am, and occupying the position that I do, I feel it my duty to make a few remarks.

This matter of self-government has been brought up here so often, that I think it is necessary to examine it a little, and see upon what it is based. I suppose there is no gentleman in this convention who denies that the people are capable of self-government. But although the people have a right to govern themselves, the government must be carried out upon certain fixed principles. Do gentlemen contend that the people desire to govern without fixed principles; that every one is to do as he pleases? That there are no limits or boundaries to power? That would be no government at all. This matter of liberty and equality was proclaimed in another hemisphere—if I may be permitted to allude to it—and even Napoleon himself, when at the head of his army in Italy, when seeking the subjugation of other nations by force of arms, in every letter that he wrote to his wife, invariably commenced with the words "liberty and equality." When he was endeavoring to erect one of the worst despotisms that ever existed under the sun, he had constantly on his lips the words "liberty and equality." What are liberty and equality, in their true meaning? Why, that a man may be secure in his person and property. This principle ought to be better understood in this country than in any other part of the world.

I do not talk a great deal about the rights of the people; because—and I do not intend this as any disrespect to gentlemen who do—I have never found in my experience, that those who were eternally talking about the rights of the people, felt any greater attachment to the people than those who said but little about them. I have never found, when danger and difficulty arose, that they were more ready to expose themselves in defence of the people's rights than those who said but little about them.

The gentleman from Simpson intimates that I am in favor of the old constitution and not for making a new one. I will not refer to my action at home. If I did, it would be seen that I was among the very first in the convention movement. I believe we can make many useful amendments to the constitution. But at the same time, I wish to pursue a conservative course. It is our duty to do this, and not run beyond the power that was given to us by the people; and not pull down and destroy every sound principle of the government that has been provided for us by the wisdom of our fathers. I wish to pursue a cautious and prudent course.

Mr. CLARKE. I certainly did not wish to make a false impression in reference to the gentleman's position. Really I am not advised whether he was actually opposed to the convention or not; and if my manner indicated that I entertained such an opinion as that, it was unintentional. I remarked that there were those who were opposed originally to the convention, and I doubt very much whether the gentleman from Madison advocated the convention as far back as the year 1838, though since that time he may have discovered some new reason for doing so.

Mr. TURNER. I was not a convention man in 1838, but I voted for a convention before I was aware that so many as ten men in my county were in favor of it. I voted for it in 1847, and again in 1848, at the very opening of the polls. If the gentleman from Simpson was for the convention in 1838, he ran greatly ahead of public sentiment and public feeling. There were developments between 1838 and 1847 that convinced me the government ought to be changed in some particulars, and one great thing that led me to such conclusion was the annual elections. The people became careless as to the selections they made, in consequence of the term of service being thus limited. The mode of holding the elections, also was objectionable. I wanted to have the elections held in precincts, and I wanted the principal powers of government in regard to appointments at least, placed in the hands of the people, and not entrusted to individuals, to make appointments through favoritism, to the exclusion of merit.

The gentleman has asked why it is that we permit the sheriff to be elected for a second term and not to be re-eligible thereafter. My convictions were against the re-eligibility of this officer even for a second term, though I voted for the re-eligibility of some other officers. I voted in committee against his re-eligibility, but there was a majority for giving him a second term, while some were for leaving his re-eligibility entirely unrestricted, and this plan was a compromise made between the extremes. Those who lived under the old constitution from '92 to '98 have informed me that a sheriff could never be removed from office so long as he was permitted to be re-eligible. There may, however, be good reasons why the sheriff should be re-eligible for a second term, and not afterwards. If you allow him to hold his office only until the expiration of a second term, he does not, within that time, acquire that degree of influence that he would have after holding the office for six, eight, or ten years. The influence of a sheriff goes on accumulating like a rolling ball of snow and becomes a tremendous machine which he can wield to subserve his purposes. If you permit this principle to exist, you will sap the very foundation of government.

Can any man make me believe that the sheriff, when he becomes a candidate has not a very decided advantage over every other candidate? In addition to his other sources of influence, he is acquainted with every lady in the county, he goes to their houses, and remains all night, he is polite to every pretty girl he meets with, and they are all enlisted in his favor. He thus brings to his aid an increased support, and unless you intend to make him a life officer, there should be a limitation upon his eligibility. Why is it that a physician who has practiced for a long time in a community, can get more votes than any body else? It is not because he has more influence over the voters directly, but it is because he reaches them through the influence of the ladies. This is an influence that is not apparent at the polls, but it is one which nevertheless has a very considerable effect. I might consume hours in showing the influence that sheriffs may acquire in this way, by which he is enabled to overcome any one who opposes him. It was thought by the committee that it would be better that he should not be permitted to be elected after the second term, inasmuch as he has it in his power, more than any other officer, to do good or evil in influencing public sentiment, because his business is with every body. You might accidentally get a bad man in that office. It is a fair compromise, I think, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. NEWELL. The question before the house I believe at present is the re-eligibility of sheriffs. I have listened to a great deal of argument on both sides, and I confess I am somewhat at a loss to know how to construe them. The gentlemen who appear to be opposed to the re-eligibility, say that the sheriff, after having served one term, will gather around him, such an influence that he can control the election. And how will he do it? One gentleman says, the sheriff will get acquainted with every lady and gentleman in the country, and secure an influence in that way! Another says he will use the public money which he collects, for the purpose of procuring votes, and that he will do every thing but what an honest man ought to do, and that will make him so popular that he cannot be defeated. Now in my county, if a sheriff was to act as gentlemen here say they will, he would be the most unpopular man in the county. But if the doctrine be true, that if we are to reward a public servant according to his just deserts, why should we say, he shall not be eligible for a second term? "If thou hast done well, shall it not be well with thee? But if thou hast not, let sin be at thy door." If he conducts himself well the people will say to him, "Well done, good and faithful servant," "you have faithfully discharged the duty that was entrusted to you, we will put you again in office." But to say that the people will re-elect a man who has behaved improperly, is to falsify the true spirit and understanding of the people. It is an imputation that I am not willing my constituents shall have thrown upon them. I am in favor of the re-eligibility of the sheriffs.

Mr. MACHEN. I know the convention is becoming a little restless, and anxious to get a vote on this question; but I trust I shall be indulged for a few moments. I am aware there are members in this house, who hold the opinion that there are lawyers here who are disposed to consume too much of the time. To such gentlemen, I will say, that although I am not so much of a lawyer as I might be, those whom I represent, sent me here, not to vote merely, but to assign the reasons for my votes, and I trust I shall have an opportunity of doing so.

I am here as an advocate for the re-eligibility of these officers, and I trust I am here as the advocate also of conservative principles. I shall have to receive new teaching, before I have learned that I am departing from conservative principles, when I vest the power of election in the hands of the people. I have an illustration here of the capacity of the people to choose the second, third, ay! twentieth time an officer who has served them well. The elder gentleman from Nelson, who has so ably attempted to resist the re-eligibility of the officers of government, stands here to-day as a sentinel upon the ramparts—what ramparts, I need not say—he is placing himself against every proposition that seems to meet with favor in this house; but perhaps he is exercising a conservative influence over our deliberations, that will be wholesome in the end. At present, my judgment does not lead me to that conclusion. I believe that if we recognize the capacity of the people to elect their officers, and judge of their qualifications in one instance, we have committed ourselves to a principle that we cannot depart from. The gentleman from Henry says he will not be found crossing his tracks. I will not accuse him of it; he is not crossing his tracks, but he is rubbing them out.

The gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) says he is in favor of rotation in office; so am I. It is a doctrine that has greeted my ears, for "lo! these many years" past. But I never understood that rotation in office, implied ineligibility after having served. The people have a right to rotate and re-elect. I recollect when quite a youth, hearing much said about this doctrine of rotation, but I never adopted the doctrine in any other way than that the people should exercise the power of rotation. And certainly no constitutional provision should be made upon the question, but leave it to be settled by the people.

It does seem to me, that if we yield this point, we are in the power of those who are contending for the opposite doctrine. If we yield to those who are contending that these officers shall not be re-eligible, we yield one step, one important point, in regard to the right of the people to exercise the power of electing their officers according to their own reason and judgment. It is for this reason, that I am contending against the doctrine that is attempted to be established here. I am contending for the doctrine set forth in the substitute that is proposed by the gentleman from Simpson. But I regret that the amendment was made to that substitute, and I hope it yet will be stricken from it. I trust the house will retrace its steps. It does seem to me that the house will bring itself into some difficulty by the amendment that has been adopted.

Gentlemen in this convention travel with great facility across the broad Atlantic for illustrations in support of their arguments, and they apply them without much reference to their applicability. It is said that Bonaparte began by professing the utmost sympathy for the people, and ended by seeking to establish the worst despotism the world ever beheld. This may be the opinion of some gentlemen; but it was never mine. I think that he was a burning and a shining light, and although the spirit of despotism did ultimately pervade his heart, yet he was instrumental in bringing forward, and strengthening the love of republicanism, not only in this, but in all other portions of the civilized world. What was his system of laws? The code-Napoleon is a monument of purity, wisdom and greatness, such as few, if any of the European nations have given to the world. I consider it superior to anything that ever emanated from England. We adhere too pertinaciously to the examples that are furnished us by England. Our ancestors when they separated themselves from Great Britain, severed all political connection and became in every thing except the feeling and affections of the heart, a distinct people, having a government based upon entirely different principles. It does seem to me that we should not seek abroad for principles of republican government. Here the first lessons of wisdom manifested themselves in the formation of a free government. We can gain nothing for our republican institutions from abroad. I know that the sheriffs have a great deal of power, but to tell me that they will exercise that power dishonestly and thereby coerce a re-election, is to tell me that the people are incapable of electing at all, and that the power to do so should be withheld from them.

I should, perhaps, not feel so much interest in this subject, if I did not conceive that it was striking a fatal blow at other propositions that will be before this house. I know that gentlemen make distinctions that are satisfactory to their own minds, and come to a different conclusion. I cannot see the force of the reasoning by which they arrive at that conclusion. I trust we shall leave it to the people of the state, to say who shall serve them, and how long continue to serve them, and that this convention will not attempt to apply the system of rotation. If this be done, I have no doubt our work will be favorably received, and that we shall be greeted by the people with the welcome plaudits, "well done good and faithful servants."

But the gentleman from Madison tells us, that sheriffs will pass around from house to house, and secure the influence of all the female portion of every family, and use that influence for the advancement of his selfish views. Sir, I believe the influence of female purity is a salutary influence, and that it is not to be obtained in behalf of the unworthy. I trust the gentleman will take back the insinuation, that female influence can be enlisted to subvert the institutions of republicanism. I believe that if we allow ourselves to be directed by that influence, and the patriotism which is to be found in their breasts, we shall scarcely ever err.

Mr. President, I will no longer detain the house. I shall vote to strike out, as proposed by the gentleman from Simpson, and insert his amendment.

Mr. KELLY. When I offered the amendment sir, to the amendment of the gentleman from Simpson, I offered it with the view of obviating some of the difficulties which seemed to rest upon the minds of gentlemen, who opposed the re-eligibility of sheriffs. I did not suppose sir, that I was throwing into this house an apple of discord; but I find that I have done so, and if it be within my power, I will withdraw that amendment.

The PRESIDENT. The amendment has been adopted by the house, and cannot now be withdrawn, without a re-consideration of the vote by which it was adopted.

Mr. KELLY. I will move then a reconsideration of that vote.

The motion to reconsider was, upon a division, carried; yeas, 40; noes, 23.

Mr. KELLY then asked and obtained leave to withdraw the amendment.

The question then being upon the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Simpson, a division was called for, so that the question should be first taken on striking out.

On this question, the yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken were yeas, 43; nays 41.

So the convention agreed to strike out.

The question then recurred on the motion to insert, pending which,
The convention adjourned.

COUNTY COURTS.

Mr. MERIWETHER offered the following as a substitute for the article heretofore reported in relation to county courts, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee of the whole having charge of that subject, and was ordered to be printed.

ARTICLE —.

SEC. 1. There shall be established in each county now, or which may hereafter be erected within this commonwealth, a county court, to consist of a presiding judge and the several justices of the peace of the county.

SEC. 2. The presiding judge shall be elected by the qualified voters in each county for the term of four years, and until his successor shall be duly elected and qualified, and shall, from time to time, receive for his services such compensation as may be fixed by law, to be paid by fees, or out of the county revenue.

SEC. 3. No person shall be eligible to the office of presiding judge of the county court, unless he be a citizen of the United States, over twenty one years of age, and a resident in the county in which he shall be elected one year next preceding his election.

SEC. 4. The presiding judge of the county courts shall be sole probate judges for their respective counties, with testamentary and such other jurisdiction as may, from time to time, be given by law.

SEC. 5. The jurisdiction of the county court shall be regulated by law; and until changed, shall be the same now vested in the county courts of this state, except as herein provided.

SEC. 6. The several counties in this state shall be laid off into districts of convenient size, as the general assembly may, from time to time, direct. Two justices of the peace, and one constable, shall be elected in each district by the qualified voters therein. The jurisdiction of said officers shall be co-extensive with the county. Justices of the peace shall be elected for the term of four years, and constables for the term of two years; they shall be citizens of the United States, twenty one years of age, and shall have resided six months in the district in which they may be elected, next preceding their election.

SEC. 7. Presiding judges of the county court, and justices of the peace, shall be conservators of the peace, and shall be commissioned by the governor. County and district officers shall vacate their offices by removal from the district or county in which they shall be appointed. The legislature shall provide, by law, for the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns of all elections of presiding judges of the county court, justices of the peace, and constables, and for determining contested elections; and also provide the mode of filling vacancies in these offices.

Sec. 8. Presiding judges of the county courts, justices of the peace, and constables, shall be subject to indictment or presentment for malfeasance or misfeasance in office, in such mode as may be prescribed by law, subject to appeal to the court of appeals; and upon conviction, their offices shall become vacant.

SUBMISSION TO THE PEOPLE.

Mr. MITCHELL offered the following resolution, which, on his motion, was referred to the committee on miscellaneous provisions, and ordered to be printed.

Resolved, That in obedience to public sentiment clearly manifested throughout the state, and from a sense of the intrinsic propriety of such a course, this convention will submit the result of its labors to the people for their ratification; and to that end, that it is expedient either to insert in the constitution which is now being framed, a clause making its establishment conditional upon such popular ratification, or else to devise some other plan by which the approval of a majority of the voters of this commonwealth shall be a necessary preliminary to its adoption.

CONSTRUCTION OF COUNTY COURTS.

Mr. ROGERS. I have a resolution which I desire to offer, in these words:

Resolved, That the committee on county courts be instructed to inquire into the propriety of constituting the county court of all the justices in said county.

I wish to offer a very few remarks, giving my views explanatory of that resolution, and I shall do so by referring to what we have done, and what the convention seem determined to do, as I judge, from their action on the report of the committee on county courts. We first organize a county court from the bar, and that is all right, I suppose; then a circuit court from the bar, and that is all right; and then we select attorneys from the bar, and that is all right. We want to make them re-eligible too, and I believe that is all right. We proclaim our love for the people, and say that they are not only sovereign, but intelligent and wise. But it strikes me that when the report of the committee on county courts was before us, we did not carry out the principle which we had acted upon before, and that although we believe the people intelligent, we do not consider them sufficiently so to form a county court. I think the justices of the peace in the several counties should be empowered to do the business of the county court. There is no necessity of creating offices with fixed salaries of two or three hundred dollars per annum, when the labor can be performed by the magistracy of the county. We all must have some respect for this court that has done all our business in relation to estates and elections. With regard to pay, it is the cheapest court in the country. But if we create county court judges, they must have a salary, and I should not be astonished if we should be compelled to select them from the bar. I do not wish to increase the expenses of the government, unless it is necessary. I voted for the fourth judge because I thought it necessary, and I also voted for branching the court, for the same reason; but I am opposed to dispensing with the county court. If there is not intelligence enough to select a proper court from the people, then the people are not capable of self-government. It seems to me the tendency of the doctrines we have heard here is to give the few the power to control the many, instead of giving the many the power to make laws for the good of the whole. I am in favor of county court judges from the people, because if you give the magistracy the power of jurisdiction in riots and small matters only, you allow their office to dwindle in importance, and strip from the position that which will induce any man of worth to seek it; whereas no man will refuse to sit on the county court bench. I move to refer the resolution to the committee on county courts.

Mr. MAYES. It will be remembered that the committees on the court of appeals, and the county and circuit courts are now united in one committee. If it is intended to refer the resolution to that committee, as it is now composed, I have no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. That is my motion.

Mr. BRISTOW. A resolution of that sort would seem to imply that the committee on county courts have not thought of any such thing, although it is a matter which they have been discussing for several weeks. It is necessary now, it seems, to make this a matter of solemn inquiry, because forsooth, we want to manifest our great love for the people. Our love may be misdirected, and I would inquire whether my friend who offers this resolution has not made a mistake in this case. The report of the committee on county courts, proposes to give to the people an unrestricted choice, but the gentleman wishes to restrict this office to the magistracy, in his love for the people. The whole ground suggested by the gentleman, has been considered, and I think well considered, by the committee, and I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT announced the next business to be the consideration of the report of the committee on the executive and ministerial officers for counties and districts. Before the adjournment yesterday, the convention agreed to strike out a part of the 4th section, and the question now recurred on inserting Mr. CLARKE'S substitute for the matter stricken out.

Mr. GARRARD. I desire to offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Simpson.

Mr. CLARKE. Do I understand that the motion to amend my amendment is entertained by the president?

The PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. CLARKE. The history of this amendment so far as I recollect is this: I offered an amendment to the fourth section of the report by striking out and inserting. That was one proposition, but divisible. Afterwards a motion was made to divide the question, and a vote of the house was taken on the proposition to strike out. Mine was a single proposition but it was subject to a division. Now I apprehend that if before the vote is taken on the second branch of my proposition, another amendment is entertained, a parliamentary fraud may be practiced on the mover and the house. I do not know what the proposition of the gentleman from Clay is. It may be a proposition that I cannot vote for. It may be designed to destroy the effect of the amendment that I offered. What is the result? You take a division of the question, and make me vote first to strike out. With what view? With a view of taking a vote on my amendment; and when this is done, the chair entertains a proposition which destroys my amendment and makes me vote to strike out what I would prefer to the proposition of the gentleman himself. You thus make me assist him in striking out, and then insert what I would object to as more injurious than the matter struck out.

I submit if this is not placing every gentleman who voted for striking out, in a very peculiar attitude. I submit that the vote should be taken on the second branch of my proposition. If that is rejected the gentleman's proposition may then be brought forward to fill the blank which has been occasioned by striking out.

There is another point. I supposed I should have the right to perfect my amendment, before a vote was taken upon it. This is a parliamentary privilege; but it is not in order for another gentleman to offer for it a substitute; my motion was to strike out and insert, and why did gentlemen vote to strike out? Because they wished to insert my amendment. If then, this be so, it seems to me that no other motion can be entertained until my motion is disposed of; and then if that which I propose is rejected, the question can be taken on the gentleman's amendment. I appeal from the decision of the chair.

Mr. DIXON. I am satisfied the decision of the chair is correct. I understand the gentleman to have made a motion, which embraces two distinct propositions—the first is to strike out, and the second to insert. Now, that there were two distinct propositions is certain, from the fact that there was a division called for, and it was decided by the chair to be in order. I believe the gentleman will not deny that it was so. A rule of this house makes a motion to strike out and insert, divisible. It was not so, however, under the old rules of the senate. The first question then is on the motion to strike out, and it having been decided in the affirmative, the question is on the motion to insert. I understand the gentleman to say, that all who vote for the motion to strike out, are bound to vote for the motion to insert. He is mistaken in that. Gentlemen voting to strike out, may be actuated by different reasons; some may do so for the purpose of getting rid of that portion of the section, with a view of getting in other matter, which would be more acceptable to them and to the people of Kentucky. And others may have a different object in contemplation. Then there is a blank to be filled, and the gentleman says it is not to be amended by any other person, and he tells the house, he alone has a right to perfect it. But is that so? Has he a right to perfect it? And if he has, has nobody else the same right? Does he take the sole control of the proposition, and have we nothing to do with it? Why, I understand we have a right to vote for that proposition as well as the gentleman. The very argument he uses shows at once that he is wrong. If one has a right to perfect it, another has. But, as it now stands, it is merely a proposition to fill a blank, and we have a right to perfect it. Each member of the convention has that right as well as the mover. There can be no difference of opinion about the matter. I do not myself care any thing particularly about it. I voted to strike out, because I did not like the proposition as it stood. Others may have had a different motive. Perhaps they intended to substitute something else in its place. I have yet to learn that because a mere motion is made to strike out, that every gentleman intended to vote for the proposition which the gentleman was about to offer as a substitute.

Mr. CLARKE. I have been struck with the facility with which gentlemen put words into the mouths of others, and then make speeches on them. Now, I tell the gentleman from Henderson I did not say that those who voted to strike out were bound to vote for the insertion of my amendment.

Mr. DIXON. I certainly understood the gentleman, in effect, to say so, but I do not wish to misrepresent him.

Mr. CLARKE. I stated that I had made a motion to strike out and insert. It was a divisible proposition. The vote might have been taken upon it as a single question, or the question might have been divided, as it was divided, and the question taken on striking out.

Now, here is a section reported by the chairman of a committee. It is before the house to be acted upon. I make a proposition in relation to it, that is entertained by the chair. But, under the rule, a delegate has a right to call for a division of the question. What is there pending? It is my proposition, and nothing else. But a division of the question is called for, and the first vote is taken on striking out. Those who vote for striking out, vote with what understanding and for what reason? They vote for it because a proposition has been submitted which they prefer to the report of the committee. They are not bound to adhere to the proposition which has been proposed, but they vote for striking out, because they would rather have the amendment proposed, than the original section, or that part of it proposed to be stricken out. That is the purpose for which they vote. The gentleman from Henderson says that they have a right to amend. I admit it, at the proper time, and no gentleman in this convention would be more unwilling to restrain that right than I should be. But has any proposition been made to amend by any friend to striking out? No sir. There are two ways to defeat a measure. One is, by getting a gentleman who voted with the majority to move a reconsideration of the vote. Another is, by clogging the amendment proposed, so as to defeat it by cutting up those first in favor of it. I deny that the proposition which has been offered this morning, comes from any friend, or any one favorable to the amendment I proposed, but it is one of those means used for breaking down an amendment. I would not restrain my friend from Henderson or any other gentleman from perfecting the amendment, but it seems to me there is a fitness in the time when the amendment should be made. Now, if the proposition I have offered be accepted by the house, take a vote on it. If there are those who think they can propose a better one, they will not vote for mine. But when forty-three delegates on this floor have voted for striking out with a view to the insertion of this amendment, to say that it shall be clogged and crippled, before the vote is taken, and that too, by the enemies of striking out, it appears to me, with all due deference to the opinion of the chair, will be placing a hardship upon the friends of striking out, which may hereafter result in unpleasant consequences; for you may insert something more objectionable than the original section itself. If you entertain the proposition of the gentleman from Clay, you make us assist you in voting for a proposition more objectionable than the original section was. I trust every gentleman on this floor who voted for striking out for the purpose of testing the great question, whether the officers of this government shall be re-eligible or not, will vote against any efforts made by the enemies of this proposition.

Mr. BROWN. I voted with the gentleman to strike out, but I think he is wrong if he supposes that those who voted to strike out are bound to vote for the insertion of his proposition. We may vote to strike out, but may not like what is proposed to be put in. If that is not the case, there is no propriety in dividing the question at all.

Mr. CLARKE. Sir, I have accomplished my purpose, and I will withdraw my appeal from the decision of the chair.

The PRESIDENT. I rise to explain—

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. To enable the chair to make his explanation, I will renew the appeal.

The PRESIDENT. Although I have been a long time in a deliberative body, I have never presided over one before, and never studied the rules with that precision which induces an over-weening confidence in any decision that I may make. All the decisions that I have made, have been made to the best of my judgment at the time, and in all my future decisions, I shall act on the same principle. A motion to strike out and insert being divisible, the question can be taken on striking out, in order to save time; for, if words are struck out, there is no necessity to perfect them. Now, it is true the gentleman who offers an amendment has a right to perfect it, before his adversary's proposition is submitted. That I understand to be the parliamentary rule. When a proposition is made to divide a question with a view to save time, still the motion to insert is subject to amendment, and, as I understand it, individuals are not pledged to vote for the insertion because they voted to strike out. I may vote to strike out because I do not like the original provision, and then there will be a blank left. I can then very consistently refuse to insert—I can leave a blank—or I may afterwards move to insert something else. But while it is depending as a question of amendment, it is subject to amendment upon the motion of any individual in the body. If I am wrong, I should like to be put right, because the question will, in all probability, arise again.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I have no particular solicitude on the subject, as the mover has waived his appeal; but I agree with the chair that it is very desirable to settle the principle involved in this question in accordance with the laws of legislative bodies. Differing in some respects from the presiding officer, as well as the gentleman from Henderson, I will state my views in regard to it. When the question is made to strike out and insert, it is but one question. The difference between us is, that the presiding officer and the gentleman from Henderson, regard it as two. It is only one question; but to decide it the presiding officer has to tell the house twice, or if the yeas and nays be called the clerk calls twice, to enable the members to vote on the whole proposition, each branch separately. By way of testing the correctness of this principle, the gentleman from Simpson has proposed to amend by striking out and inserting. He induces me and others to vote with him to strike out because we dislike the original article; he has extracted my vote to strike out, and has accomplished his purpose, but can he then, without leave of the house, withdraw his amendment? I say he cannot, because the house has commenced voting upon it. Here is the rule laid down by Jefferson: "When it is moved to amend, by striking out certain words and inserting others, the manner of stating the question is, first to read the whole passage to be amended as it stands at present; then the words proposed to be struck out; next, those to be inserted; and lastly, the whole passage as it will be when amended. And the question, if desired, is then to be divided, and put first on striking out." It will be seen by the language used here, "the question," that it is a single question. What next? "If carried, it is next on inserting the words proposed. If that be lost, it may be moved to insert others." Now if they vote to reject the amendment, it will be in order to move to fill the blank with something else; but having obtained my vote to strike out, they cannot take up the amendment, and make it such as to deny me the privilege of voting to fill the blank with what is first proposed to be inserted. I will now withdraw the appeal.

The PRESIDENT. The question has not been decided. I will examine the rules that apply to this question with reference to future decisions.

Mr. DIXON. The rule which the gentleman has read does not apply to this house at all.

The secretary then read Mr. Garrard's substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Simpson.

"The presiding judge, or associate judges, of the county courts are elected, whose term of office shall be two years, but no sheriff, or deputy who qualified under him, shall be re-eligible for the succeeding term."

Mr. GHOLSON. I feel a desire to see even handed justice done here. I have but one vote, and that shall be cast with an eye single to that purpose, to treat all officers alike. If one officer is to be ineligible, I shall vote to make all so. When I am convinced that it is best to make fish of one and flesh of another, and that the people are not capable of self-government, I may go for invidious distinctions.

Mr. CLARKE. This amendment of the gentleman from Clay brings up the question of re-eligibility, broadly and flatly. The report of the committee makes the sheriff eligible for a second term. This, in my judgment, will be to turn him loose on the community without responsibility, with his sacrificial knife whetted to cut and carve in any direction for two years, and then he goes out of office. If it be true that the sheriff is in the habit of shaving and inflicting oppressions on the people, you place a curb on him by making him re-eligible; because conduct of that sort will not be tolerated by the people of Kentucky, and if he indulges in conduct of that kind, the result will be, the people will turn the backs of their hands upon him and he will be defeated.

A great deal has been said about conservatism, which seems to mean every thing and nothing. The best illustration of it, as some regard it, is in this proposition to curb the sheriff for one term by the hope of re-election for a second term, and for one term only. He is to be reined up the first term, and the second he is to be turned loose to oppress and shave every body he pleases. The whole question of re-eligibility turns on the decision of this, and the gentleman has very properly brought it up. It is said a sheriff shall not be re-eligible, but it is insisted that a clerk and judge shall be. Where will my friend from Nelson be found on this question of re-eligibility in his lengthy, able, and powerful speeches? Why, he will refer to the vote upon your record, and say that you have said a sheriff shall not be re-eligible, and then show the comparative importance of these two officers, and their relative power. He asks nothing better than a vote against my proposition. He will show that a judge has the life, property, liberty, and reputation of the citizens in his hands, and even the sheriff himself. He will then ask you with what consistency you can go for the re-eligibility of a judge, while you have acknowledged the danger of making a sheriff re-eligible on account of his power over the feelings of the people. I remarked to a friend this morning, that a judge had the lives of the people in his hands, in certain cases. He replied, that he thought the jurors had a greater influence, because they were, in criminal cases, judges of the law and the fact. I rejoined that the jurors were inclined to defer to the opinion of the judge. There is nothing more natural than that the opinion of a learned judge should have weight with a jury, and it does always have more or less effect. In the county of Barren, a negro was apprehended for a high crime, brought before a jury, who found him guilty, and the judge was about to pass sentence of death. The lawyer moved in arrest of judgment, and set up a claim, under an old statute, for benefit of clergy. Judge Buckner decided he was entitled to benefit of clergy, and although the offence of which he was found guilty was one of the highest crimes known to our laws, he was released. Not two months afterward, a slave was tried for arson in the county of Warren, and found guilty, and the counsel moved for the benefit of clergy. The judge, however, declared he was not entitled to it. Now, one or the other judge must have been wrong.

If you tell me that because a sheriff collects the county revenue, and especially because he has the influence of the ladies on his side, he will exercise a power dangerous to the public interests, I will tell you that even your clerks can wield a powerful influence, by virtue of the office which he holds. There is no proposition to make a clerk ineligible because he has held the office two or four years, yet he has a thousand fee bills in his hands, from fifty cents to one and two dollars in value. These fee bills have the virtue of an execution. Make him a candidate for re-election, and he will put them in the hands of the constable. When the constable makes his report, and tells him whom he is oppressing, the candidate will get on his horse, and ride around, and say to individuals against whom he has claims, "I am in a sort of a scrape—I can borrow money at ten per cent., however, and I must do it if I indulge you. But I cannot indulge you if I am defeated." Suppose a young man wishes to marry, and comes to the clerk for a license. He may say to him, "well, young man, I am about to be a candidate for clerk—I will make you a present of a license, and you must help me in my election." He goes home under the full impression that the clerk is the very cleverest officer in the world, and uses his influence among his friends for his re-election. I do not say that this will be the case, but I say there is as much probability of it, as that the sheriff, who collects the revenue, will use the influence which his office gives him, to secure a re-election.

I recollect reading in Esop's Fables, or some other book, of a goose which had under her charge a brood of goslings. A fox came up on a very cold night, and begged to be permitted to enter the little house occupied by the goose, but was refused. The fox then imploringly said, "Oh! let me enter, or my nose will freeze off." He obtained permission to put his nose in. After a little time, he declared that his head and shoulders were freezing off, and he got the consent of the goose to enter so far. Very soon afterwards, he said he was freezing all over, and then he got permission to enter the house. He then instantly set to work, and ate up the goose and goslings. This is an entering wedge to the destruction of re-eligibility. Just say that the sheriff shall not be re-eligible and you have let in the nose of the fox; after awhile the principle will be applied to the clerk, then the head and shoulders of the fox are in, and when it is applied to the judge the whole body will be in, and these officers will all be devoured together.

I repeat, that this substitute to my amendment brings up the whole question of re-eligibility. I am prepared to see the question settled now. I shall go for the re-eligibility of the judge though you defeat me in respect to the sheriff. There are many gentlemen, however, who will not do it. I shall violate my consistency, believing, as I do, that all should be re-eligible, if I go for the re-eligibility of a judge, and permit the sheriff to be turned away without the privilege of re-election. I shall go for the re-eligibility of the clerk, and if I get part, I shall be in part satisfied. If I lose all, then I shall be driven to the conclusion that there are those in this convention, who consider the people incompetent to determine whether a man is worthy to be elected or not.

Now I have been taught to believe that the longer an officer has performed his duties, the better he will be able to discharge them. But you say however honest, or well qualified, or though there be nine out of ten in favor of him, the people shall not elect him, and you drive them to what? To take up a new man of whom the people know nothing, in the place of one in whom they have the utmost confidence.

Mr. GARRARD. I propose to modify my amendment by striking out the word "two," so as to leave it with the convention to fill the blank as they shall think proper.

While up, I trust the house will pardon me for occupying a short portion of its time. The gentleman from Simpson, in the beginning of his remarks, pronounced my amendment—even before it was read—a fraud. Upon what principle it can be denominated a fraud, I am at a loss to understand. I am conscious of one thing, however, and that is, that the remark cannot apply to me. I have been constantly in favor of electing sheriffs for two years, and no longer. And it was for the purpose of carrying out that object that I moved my amendment; and not for the purpose of inflicting a fraud upon this house, or upon any member of it.

Mr. CLARKE. I apprehend that I used no such term in reference to the gentleman. I remember when I was discussing the question as to whether the amendment was in order, that I assumed—not that his amendment was a fraud—but that the entertainment of the amendment by the house, would be virtually practising a fraud—though perhaps that was too broad an expression—but the house will understand I mean a parliamentary fraud—upon those who had voted in favor of striking out. I hope my friend from the county of Clay, will not for a moment suppose, that I intended to impute to him, the offering of a proposition for the purpose of practising a fraud. There is no gentleman for whom I have a greater respect.

Mr. GARRARD. The explanation of the gentleman from Simpson is entirely satisfactory; and as he and myself have been good friends since we met, I will give to you and this convention an idea that has occurred to me, and if my friend from Simpson, should think proper to profit by it, I shall consider that I have at least done my state some service. The book that we are publishing, of the proceedings and debates of this convention, already contains some three hundred and fifty pages. The statesmen and sages who come after us will, in future years, read that book and put it in the hands of their children that they may learn how to make constitutions. But I tell my friend, that I think there will be many things in it that those wise and scrutinizing men will dislike to set before their children as an example for them to follow. You will recollect that some years since, there was a great noise in the country, growing out of a proposition introduced into the United States senate, by a distinguished senator from Missouri, in regard to expunging a resolution in relation to a celebrated individual. "Expunging" was a new word at that day. But when the sages I have alluded to, come to read this book, expunging will certainly be the order of the day. One word further. The gentleman from Simpson has alluded to a celebrated fox and goose, and her goslings; and, sir, although I do not understand myself, as being alluded to as the cunning fox, yet from the great care the gentleman has kindly manifested in regard to those who voted with him yesterday, I have no doubt he must have intended himself as the goose.

Mr. CLARKE. My friend from Clay—although I have attempted to appease him—seems still inclined to indulge in his witticisms. It may be very possible, and I doubt if it is not true, that there are those who may put into the book which records our debates, some things which they may not themselves like to read hereafter. I do not say that my friend from Clay, when he goes home to his constituents and tells them that he has recorded in the book of the proceedings of this house, that they should not have a right to vote a second time for the same candidate for sheriff, may not wish to withdraw that part of the record from posterity, and those even who now exist. It is true that in the fable that I related, the goose was deceived and her goslings destroyed; but I did not intend to be understood as saying that the gentleman from Clay was the fox, for I do not think he has cunning enough for that. The gentleman did not display cunning enough to entrap us. Though he introduced his nose within the covert of the goose, I do not intend he shall get his head and shoulders in. I prefer that he should stay there until he freezes.

Mr. CHAMBERS. The amendment proposes to make the deputies of sheriffs ineligible as well as the sheriff. Now, I am not at all certain that the sheriff should be made ineligible; but feel very certain that his deputies should not. I cannot consent that one man's holding an office should make another man ineligible. I profess to be a liberal conservative, and go for electing all the officers, and for tests of qualification where they will do good; but I cannot approve of making such evidences of qualification, however obtained, operate to make the officer ineligible, much less another man; but for some other reasons I shall vote to make the principal sheriff ineligible after a second term.

Mr. IRWIN. I am opposed to the re-eligibility of sheriffs; but I incline to the opinion that two years is too short a period, as the business of the second year will, (as a matter of necessity) have to be entrusted to his successor, and no gentleman will take the sheriffalty, under the circumstances. I shall move, if not done by some other member, to increase the sheriff's term to four years, and to be ineligible thereafter either as principal or deputy.

Mr. HARGIS. I was one of those who voted to strike out; and I did so because I did not like the proposition as it came from the committee, nor do I like the amendment. I am in favor of a sheriff holding his office for two years, or one term only. I do not consider the office of sheriff, like all the others that have been alluded to, and the reason given by the gentleman from Simpson, is the very best of reasons why he should not be re-elected. He says he will go on cutting and carving for the first two years. There is a good deal of truth in that, and it is a strong reason why he should be allowed but one term, and then be compelled to wind up his business. The sheriff under the present constitution holds his office only for two years, and I have never heard any complaint upon that ground.

Although I am for the re-eligibility of perhaps every other officer of government, this is an officer that I am opposed to making re-eligible, for the reason that the longer he is in office the more will he have it in his power, to influence the election. I have seen sheriffs turned out before the end of their first term, and have known men who have purchased the office; but I have never known a case in which the duties have been satisfactorily discharged after the first term. In order then to get clear of a sheriff who may be found remiss in his duty, and to give the people a fair chance, I will make him ineligible after the first term. I do not think that this will have any effect as an entering wedge, in opposition to the re-eligibility of other officers. It ought not to have such effect, for I do not believe that there is any other officer that ought not to be re-eligible.

Mr. GHOLSON asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. GARRARD'S substitute, and they were taken, and resulted thus:

NAYS.—Richard Apperson, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, Charles Chambers, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Thomas James, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spaulding, James W. Stone, Michael L. Stoner, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson—47.

So the substitute was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the proposition of the gentleman from Simpson.

Mr. GRAY. It seems to me that a majority of this convention are in favor at least of making these officers ineligible, after having served a certain number of years. I have a proposition to submit, in order to test the sense of the house on the subject, and it is that the sheriff, without regard to the deputies, shall be ineligible, after having served two terms, until after one term shall have elapsed—giving him the right to be elected two terms out of three. I propose to insert the words, "that associate judges of the county courts are elected, whose term of office shall be two years, and they shall be re-eligible for a second term, but no sheriff shall, after the expiration of the second term, be re-eligible for the succeeding term."

Mr. BROWN. I would enquire if that amendment is now in order. The same thing, in substance, has been once stricken out, by a vote of the convention. The parliamentary rule is, I believe, that the same matter that has once been stricken out shall not be again re-inserted.

Mr. GRAY. The gentleman misunderstands my motion. There is this difference between what has been stricken out and what I propose to insert, and it is, I think, a very material difference. My motion is in reference to the sheriff, and not the deputies.

The PRESIDENT. I am inclined to think the proposition is in order—the matter that is proposed to be inserted not being the same as was stricken out.

Mr. BRISTOW. I will merely remark upon this subject of re-eligibility, that my mind is made up, to the effect that all our officers had better be made re-eligible; but in deference to the opinion of others—in whom I have great confidence—I intend, when the proper time arrives, to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the provision regarding the re-eligibility of sheriffs was stricken out. After all I have heard on the subject, I am of the opinion that if these officers are not to be re-eligible, the provision that was stricken out is a better one than any which we can substitute for it. I will therefore move to reconsider that vote.

The PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider cannot be entertained, according to the rules, until to-morrow.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I voted myself for the re-eligibility of the sheriff; but I can see no objection if that vote is to be reconsidered, to reconsidering it to-day. I therefore move to dispense with the rule.

Mr. IRWIN. I see no good reason for reconsidering that vote. I could suggest a reason to my friend from Todd, why it should not be reconsidered.

Mr. MERIWETHER. If the gentleman does not desire a reconsideration, I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. IRWIN. There are several delegates absent.

Mr. BRISTOW. It is for that very reason that I wish a reconsideration. I will renew the motion to dispense with the rule.

The motion being put, it was, upon a division negatived. Ayes 51. Noes 26. Two-thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rule was not dispensed with.

Mr. BRISTOW. I now give notice that I will renew the motion for reconsideration to-morrow.

Mr. TURNER. As any thing that we may do in relation to this matter, will probably upon a reconsideration of the vote be reversed, I propose that we pass over this section, and proceed with the residue of the report.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. TURNER. I can see no objection to passing over this clause and taking up the residue of the report. It will save time eventually.

Mr. CLARKE. I hope the house will act upon this amendment. I would like to see some indication of the opinion of the convention upon it.

The PRESIDENT. It is certainly in the power of the house to pass over this section; but the difficulty is, it will appear very awkwardly upon the journals; perhaps the convention had better proceed with the section.

Mr. TURNER. I have no objection.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I understand the question to be now upon the substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Simpson. I voted in favor of striking out the clause that rendered the sheriff ineligible; and one of my reasons for doing so, was because it extended to them. I will therefore now vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Christian, in favor of rendering the high sheriff ineligible for the second term, and the deputies eligible.

Mr. APPERSON. I was very much like the gentleman from Jefferson, I thought we were going to exclude rather too many. It is necessary that there should be a great many deputies, especially as the elections are to be held in every district, it will be requisite to have special deputies in every district. I am disposed to support the principle contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Christian.

Mr. TURNER. I am willing to support that proposition—with one exception—the necessity for which I think will be obvious to all, that he shall not be called on to act as deputy for the succeeding term.

Mr. GRAY. I have no objection to that. I will accept it as a modification. The proposition was so modified.

Mr. DIXON. I shall vote for the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Christian; not because I prefer it to the one that was submitted by the gentleman from Clay; but because I think it is the best proposition now before the convention. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. NEWELL. I cannot vote for the substitute. It is in fact providing for what we have been contending against. It is carrying out the principle that we have been contending against—that these officers shall be ineligible.

Mr. MAYES. I shall certainly give this proposition my hearty support; because it is carrying out the very principle which I think of all others should be carried out, and that is that sheriffs ought not to be re-eligible, after the first term. I am in favor of the re-eligibility of judges, and I think it would be right that clerks should be made re-eligible; but we all know that the duties of a sheriff differ very materially from that of judges and clerks.

Mr. IRWIN asked for the yeas and nays on the substitute.

Mr. BRISTOW. I intend to vote affirmatively on this proposition, and I do it, not because I believe exactly in the correctness of the reasons given; but the great principle of rotation will come up, and I think that four years is a sufficient length of time for a man to hold the office of sheriff. It is an important office, and I am willing that the deputies shall contest the office for themselves.

The yeas and nays were then taken, with the following result, yeas 45, nays 38:

NAYS—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Luther Brawner, Thomas D. Brown, Beverley L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benj. F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, William Hendrix, James M. Lackey, Willis B. Machen, Geo. W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, William N. Marshall, Nathan McClure, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spaulding, Michael L. Stoner, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson—38.

So the substitute was adopted.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I have a small amendment to come in at the close of the section. It is as follows: "Nor shall the high sheriff be eligible for a second term, unless he shall have obtained a quibus for at least three months before his election."

Mr. PRESTON. I believe that provision is made in a part of the report of the legislative committee for this very subject.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I will then withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAY. I move to fill the blank with the words "two years."

The motion was agreed to.

The question then being taken upon the original section as amended, it was adopted.

The fifth section was then read by the secretary as follows:

"A constable shall be elected in every justice's district, who shall be chosen at the same time, in the same manner, and for the same term that justices of the peace are elected. He may execute the duties of his office in any part of the county in which he resides."

Mr. PRESTON. I will move to strike out the words "he may execute the duties of his office in any part of the county in which he resides." The effect of striking out these words will be to leave the jurisdiction of constables to be settled by the legislature instead of prescribing it by a constitutional provision. In looking over the old constitution I find that sheriffs, constables, coroners and surveyors all made constitutional officers; but there is no provision in that constitution, or in any other that I have seen, prescribing the jurisdiction of these officers. I suggest to the chairman of the committee, that this is not the appropriate place for regulating the jurisdiction of constables. It does not prevail in any other constitution, nor does it in our's. I am perfectly willing that the legislature shall have full power to regulate their jurisdiction. The objection I raise is, that it shall not be done by constitutional provision.

Mr. TURNER. I am opposed to striking out this provision. The eighth section provides that every officer shall reside within his district during his continuance in office; but there is a propriety, an absolute necessity, in fact, that an officer, of this description, shall do business in any part of the county. We cannot always obtain the services of a sheriff in the remote parts of the county, and it is necessary that a constable shall be permitted to execute process; but if he has to stop and deliver up his authority to another, the criminal may in the mean time escape. As far as respects the duties of the office, the gentleman from Louisville is mistaken, if he supposes there is any attempt to prescribe those duties here. That is left to the legislature altogether; but it is right and proper, according to the views of the committee, that the constitution should declare that he is a county officer and can do business in any part of the county—that his jurisdiction is co-extensive with the county. If you strike out this provision, the legislature may, if they think proper, confine him to a single district. I desire that he shall be a county officer. And if it is a proper principle, it is right to insert it here.

Mr. PRESTON. There are a great many things that are right and proper in themselves, that nevertheless ought not to be inserted in the constitution. We are to presume that every thing in the statute book is right and proper; but I would not put every thing that is in the statute book in the constitution. The old constitution simply declares, that the officers shall be constitutional officers, but it does not pretend to prescribe or limit their jurisdiction. It provides that coroners, justices of the peace, and surveyors shall be created, without prescribing their jurisdiction. There is not a constitution in any state in the union that prescribes the jurisdiction of a constable, and I do not believe that it should be done here. If such a provision be inserted, it will be beyond the power of the legislature to control the jurisdiction of a constable. I can see no propriety in encumbering the constitution with a provision of this kind.

Mr. MERIWETHER. The gentleman from Louisville says that if this clause should be retained, the legislature could not hereafter confine the jurisdiction of constables within narrower limits, if it should be deemed advisable to do so. Is it right that the legislature should have such power? They are to be elected by districts. Suppose a constable has an attachment against an individual, who is passing into another district; or suppose the case of process against the parties to a note, and the principal resides in one district, or in one ward of a city, and his security resides in another. Here there would be a necessity for having more than one officer to serve the process.

Mr. PRESTON. My argument was not based upon the assumption that the legislature would necessarily restrict the jurisdiction of this officer.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I am aware of that; but I think it would be improper to give them the power to do it.

Mr. MITCHELL. My opinion is, that the report, as made by the committee, is correct. I think that the power to make legislative restriction should be taken away; and one great reason is this: If you have a constable in each district, why, he will necessarily be regarded as the only officer entitled to execute the duties of the office within that district; but if you give him the privilege of exercising the duties of a constable throughout the county, you afford to the citizens of the county the opportunity of choosing among those officers, the one most prompt and diligent in discharging the duties of that office. It will have the effect of exciting emulation among them. For this reason, I believe they should have the range of the whole county, and that legislative restriction should be taken away in regard to curtailing their jurisdiction.

Mr. IRWIN. In the report of the committee on county courts, there is this provision: "The several counties in this state shall be laid off into districts, of convenient size, as the general assembly may, from time to time, direct. Two justices of the peace and one constable shall be elected in each district, by the qualified voters therein. The jurisdiction of said officers shall be co-extensive with the county." I think, sir, that we may as well strike out the whole provision on this subject in this place, and leave the section I have just read to be adopted when we come to consider the report of the committee on the county courts.

Mr. TURNER. I deny that the subject belongs to that committee, at all. They had no right to say a word upon the subject. This county court committee, with the two others that are associated with it, making a committee of thirty, seem to think that there can be nothing done in this convention, unless they do it. It appears to me, that the remaining seventy delegates have a right to do some part of the business. So far as I have seen of the business done by that committee, I think they are making a constitution that will be set aside by the people.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman will understand that it is not in order, to refer to the proceedings of any committee.

Mr. TURNER. I beg pardon sir, I was but following the example of the gentleman from Logan, who was arraigning myself and my little committee before their betters.

Mr. IRWIN. I am not a member of the committee of thirty, and I have no desire to deprive the gentleman of any honor, that he may obtain by regulating the office of constable.

Mr. TURNER. I take no pride—as I have said repeatedly—in having to do this business. In all probability there will be a motion to strike out the provision which the gentleman has read from the report of the county court committee. It is not satisfactory to all of us; but this is a small matter sir, and might be determined without any very lengthy debate.

Mr. GHOLSON. I think sir, with all deference to the opinions of other gentlemen, that we should be pardoned for attaching some little importance to this matter. Now if a constable be restricted to his particular district, the people are deprived, to a great extent, of his services. So far from being restricted to the district, he should not even be confined to the county; but should be permitted to go to the very extremity of the state, in pursuit of a fugitive from justice. If a constable be confined to his district, in case of sickness or other disability, his place cannot be supplied by another. There can be no harm at all events, in providing for contingencies of this sort. I will further remark, that from the very beginning of this report, every thing seems to have gone wrong end foremost. Here is a provision, in regard to the continuance of the office of constable. It is to be regulated by another office which is not yet provided for. "A constable shall be elected in every justice's district, who shall be chosen at the same time, in the same manner, and for the same term, that justices of the peace are elected." And we have not yet provided for justices of the peace.

Mr. HAMILTON. It does appear to me, that the regulation of this whole matter, in relation to the jurisdiction of a constable, properly belongs to the legislature. Under the present constitution, those who fill the office of constable, discharge the duties of that office in any part of the county, and that is precisely as it should be; but if any change should hereafter be desired, it can be made by the legislature. It should not be done by constitutional provision. While up, I may be permitted to say, that we are consuming much time with unnecessary speaking, and I think it would be well to have a committee of ten members appointed, to be termed the "speaking committee," and have the senate chamber, or some other apartment fitted up for their use, so that those gentlemen who wish to indulge in much speaking, may have an opportunity of doing so, without interfering with the business of the convention, and we shall then relieve gentlemen from the painful necessity of seeking to expunge a great deal of superfluous matter from the journal of our debates, and we shall be able to make much greater progress with the business for which we are assembled.

Mr. RUDD. I hope the motion to strike out will not prevail; for if there is any part of the state that will suffer more than another it is the city of Louisville. I want a constable when he has occasion to serve a process, to go into any part of the city, and not to be confined to a particular ward. I hope the gentleman from Louisville will withdraw the proposition, for there would be great disadvantage arising from it, if the legislature should pass a law confining the jurisdiction of a constable within a particular ward or district. I do not myself believe that they would pass such a law. I could not suppose for a moment, that a body of men, composed of one hundred, would be so inconsistent, so wanting in common sense, as to do it. But I hope the proposition will be withdrawn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would call the attention of the mover of this proposition to the effect it would have. The section provides that one constable shall be elected in each justice's district. If these words be stricken out, the inference will be that the jurisdiction of each of these constables is to be confined within his particular district. I do not suppose that it is the intention of the gentleman, that their jurisdiction shall be thus restricted.

Mr. PRESTON. The gentleman from Bourbon and my friend from Louisville, have both misapprehended me entirely. I think that when we trust the legislature with the power of branching the court of appeals, and of increasing the tribunals of the state, and of increasing the power and jurisdiction of the higher officers of the government, that it is carrying the matter rather too far now to fix the jurisdiction of a constable in the constitution. It is a matter that I am not anxious about; but I do insist that it is not proper to encumber the constitution with provisions of this description. I do not want to usurp every power that the legislature should hereafter exercise. All that I wish is that the constitution shall remain silent upon this subject.

Mr. TURNER. If you do not retain this provision the constructive effect will, in all probability, be that the constable will only have jurisdiction in the district in which he was elected. You make him a constitutional officer, and the legislature will have no power to enlarge his jurisdiction, if there be no intimation contained in the constitution, as to its intent and meaning in regard to the jurisdiction of these officers.

Mr. DIXON. I think the gentleman from Louisville is right in the motion which he has made to strike out. I do not agree with the gentleman from Madison, that because this section requires the officer to reside within the district, it is an inhibition upon the power of the legislature to authorize him to do business out of that district. I think the gentleman from Louisville is right for this reason. The part of the section proposed to be stricken out, confines the duties of the constable within the limits of the county. And it becomes a question whether it is best, by constitutional provision, to confine his duties within the limits of a county. It might be advisable, to give a constable the right, under certain circumstances, to follow a criminal beyond the limits of the county.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I think that the motion of the gentleman from Louisville ought not to prevail, but on the contrary it seems to me that the jurisdiction of a constable ought to be extended—and this debate has suggested to me a matter—not of very great importance certainly—but one which ought not to be overlooked. And I give notice now, that to-morrow, or at the proper time, I will offer a proposition to this effect, "Resolved, that the general assembly be instructed to provide by law, that whenever a criminal process shall come into the hands of a sheriff or constable, such officer shall have power and authority to follow and arrest the suspected criminal in any county within the state." I do not know any thing that can conduce more to the proper administration of justice than such a provision.

Mr. PRESTON. I will ask the secretary to insert these words in the section proposed to be amended, "and whose jurisdiction and duties shall be prescribed by law."

The question being taken upon the proposition of the gentleman from Louisville, it was rejected.

Mr. CHAMBERS then moved to amend by inserting in lieu of the 5th section, the following: "There shall be elected in every county in this commonwealth, one constable for every two justices of the peace; he shall hold his office two years, with such jurisdiction, duties, and responsibilities as shall be prescribed by law."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. IRWIN then offered the following, as an amendment; being a part of the report of the committee on county courts.

"The several counties in this state shall be laid off into districts of convenient size, as the general assembly may from time to time direct. Two justices of the peace, and one constable shall be elected in each district by the qualified voters therein. Justices of the peace shall be elected for the term of four years, and constables for the term of two years; they shall be citizens of the United States, twenty-one years of age, and shall have resided six months in the district in which they may be elected next preceeding their election."

Mr. TURNER. This is a proposition for the establishing of part of a court, and is therefore a matter over which this article has no jurisdiction. It was under the consideration of the united committee on the judiciary, to whom, at a proper time, I intend to move to refer this matter also, and to add the committee on ministerial offices to their number.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARFIELDE moved to amend the section by striking out the words in the second line, "and for the same time," and to insert the words "for the term of two years." He thought two years long enough for the term of a constable.

Mr. TURNER. As the committee will undoubtedly act together on this subject and make the several reports so as to blend together, I think the gentleman had better withdraw his proposition.

Mr. GARFIELDE. My only objection is, that to say now that the constables shall be elected for the same term as the magistrates, may restrict the action of the committee, who have this last class of officers in charge.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DESHA. I have an amendment to offer, and I beg leave to state to the house, I shall vote against myself. My desire is to test the sincerity of members as to this question of re-eligibility. I am one of those who contend that the people are capable of selecting their officers, not only for the first, but for the second and all other terms, and in the votes I have and shall give, I go in favor of re-eligibility in its fullest extent. The arguments made by gentlemen here who are in favor of the ineligibility of a sheriff, it does seem to me apply at least, in proportion to the magnitude of the office, to the constable. There is not to be one constable, but fifteen or twenty, and they have an amount of money in their hands greater than any other officer, and combined, they would wield an influence fully equal to that of any sheriff. It does seem to me, therefore, that the same principles will apply as strongly in the one case as in the other. I do not expect to make any extended remarks now, or to occupy the time of the convention at any time with long speeches, for I came here to act, and shall ever be found in my place to carry out the views of those who sent me here.

My amendment, which I shall vote against, is to add after the word "election," in the third line, the words, "and he shall be re-eligible for one term only."

Mr. NESBITT. I am in favor, as a general rule, of the re-eligibility of all officers, but I believe that the cases of the treasurer of the commonwealth, and the sheriffs of counties, ought to form an exception to the general rule. If we do make them thus form an exception, I believe that after years will prove its wisdom. I do not desire that those who have the custody of the public money, shall become candidates for office with that money in their pockets.—Whether this objection applies to the constable or not, I am not certain. I do not suppose he becomes a collector of the public revenue, and I hope he never will be allowed to become so. But if I thought that day would ever come under legislative provision, I would at once vote that he should serve for two years, and then go out and make a settlement, when, if they chose, and he proved worthy, the people might elect him again for another two years. I would let him go in for two years and stay out for two years, before he should be re-eligible. I think all those officers who handle the money of the people, should, by the people represented in this convention, be required at stated times to make a full and final settlement. I am not afraid of this cry of inconsistency. Some gentlemen have said, that if we vote that the sheriff shall be ineligible for a succeeding term, that then they will violate their own opinions in regard to the balance of the officers of the country, and vote down re-eligibility in every other officer just because we make an exception in the case of a commonwealth treasurer, or sheriff.

Mr. NEWELL called for the ayes and noes on the amendment.

Mr. TURNER moved to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT ruled the motion out of order.

Mr. WM. JOHNSON. I believe that this whole subject, about which we have been talking for some time, is an improper one for consideration here. I think that the legislature of the country can dispose of this matter of constable, and define how many each county shall have, and far better decide upon all those matters, from time to time, than could any fixed constitutional provision. They had this power under the old constitution, and I think they ought to be continued in its exercise. I should prefer some amendment declaring that the legislature may provide for the election of a suitable number of constables in each county in the state.

UK LAW LIBRARY

And I may deem it proper to introduce such an amendment at the proper time.

Mr. MAYES moved as a substitute for the amendment, the words "and he shall be re-eligible for a second term, but no constable shall, after the expiration of a second term be re-eligible for a succeeding term."

Mr. DESHA accepted the substitute in lieu of his own amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected; ayes 21; nays 58; as follows:

Mr. BOYD moved to strike out all of the section after the word "chosen" in the second line, and substitute in lieu thereof the words following: "For two years, at such time and place as may be provided for by law."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. TURNER. That amendment strikes out the provision in regard to the extension of jurisdiction. I therefore move to add at the end of the section, as amended, the words "whose jurisdiction shall be co-extensive with the county in which he resides."

The amendment was adopted.

The section, as amended, was then agreed to.

The sixth and seventh sections were then read, and agreed to.

The eighth section was then read.

Mr. GARRARD moved to strike it out, on the ground that the matter came more properly under the general provisions of the constitution, and was provided for by another report.

Mr. TURNER had no objection, and the section was stricken out.

The ninth section was then read.

Mr. NESBITT moved to strike it out.

Mr. TURNER. I hope it will not be stricken out, for there certainly ought to be some tribunal to try clerks. Under the old constitution, we have had them tried before the appellate court, and no tribunal could be more competent.

Mr. NESBITT. I desire that the clerk of the circuit court shall be removed upon indictment, the judge of that court being the judge of the law and the fact. I desire the clerks of the county court to be removed in the same way, the judge of that court also being the judge of the law and the facts. As for the clerk of the court of appeals, I am willing that he shall be removed as may be thought proper.

The motion to strike out the section was agreed to.

The tenth and eleventh sections were then read and agreed to.

The twelfth section was then read.

Mr. TURNER moved to insert before the word "appointment," the words "election or."

The amendment was adopted, and the twelfth section agreed to.

Mr. TURNER wished to offer an additional section, as an individual, and not in behalf of the committee.

The proposed new section was then read as follows:

"A county court assessor shall be elected in every county, at the same time, and in the same manner that the presiding judge of the county court is elected, who shall have power to appoint such assistant assessors as may be necessary and proper."

Mr. TURNER. It is suggested to me that we had better leave the term of service blank, and first adopt the principle contained in the amendment. I think there is no gentleman here but will see the propriety of having an officer of this kind. This duty of assessing the property of individuals and preparing a list of voters, is a very important one, and it has been very badly executed heretofore, as all must know. Some counties in the state pay twenty per cent. more revenue on the value of their property than do other counties, and some counties in the state have a full return made of the number of their voters while others do not. This is all owing to the present system of allowing the county courts to appoint the assessor, whereby, men lacking in the proper qualifications for the discharge of the duties get the office. There should be a regular officer, elected by the people, for the purpose, with a term, say of four years, and then if the people would select proper men, we would have this business done better than it has been heretofore. A long term would also induce competent individuals to accept the office. Some may object to the proposition to allow the assessor to appoint his deputies, but the proposition was thus framed for this reason. There are a great many of the smaller counties in the state, where one officer would be sufficient, while in others, such as Jefferson and Madison, three or four would be required. The assistants would be responsible to the assessor, and should be appointed by him. The relations between them should be similar to those between the sheriff and his deputies.

The thirteenth section was then agreed to.

Mr. NESBITT moved to amend the section so as to adopt the principle, that each county should be divided into assessor's districts, in each of which, the people should elect an assessor.

The PRESIDENT declared the amendment to be inconsistent with the section as adopted, and therefore out of order.

Mr. NESBITT. I move a reconsideration of the vote adopting the section. It might happen that a man elected the assessor of a county would appoint two or three of his sons as his deputies. These are responsible officers, and the people ought to choose them.

Mr. TURNER. I hope the motion to reconsider will not prevail. I think it far better to have one individual to take charge of, and be responsible for, the whole business.

Mr. GHOLSON. I suppose the sheriff will be as likely to appoint his sons deputies, as the assessor, and yet no objection has been urged against that. The assessor should be the responsible head of his office.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

Mr. TURNER proposed to submit an additional section, providing for the manner in which the commissions of the officers, provided for in this report, should be made out; but it being suggested that he, as chairman of the committee, should make a separate report on the subject, he withdrew it.

A verbal correction was then made in the 11th section, and the order of numbering the sections directed to be changed so as to conform to the amendment of the report.

The question was then announced to be on the adoption of the report.

Mr. CLARKE called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WOODSON, in order that the report might be fully examined before final action was had, moved to adjourn.

Mr. TURNER moved to refer the report to the committee of thirty on the judiciary.

The PRESIDENT declared the motion not to be in order, while a motion to adjourn was pending.

And then the convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

JURISDICTION OF CONSTABLES.

Mr. TRIPLETT offered the following resolution, and it was adopted.

Resolved, That the committee on miscellaneous provisions, be instructed to inquire into the propriety of authorizing the general assembly to provide by law, that when a sheriff, coroner, or constable, has a criminal process against any person who shall escape from his county, after the process comes to the hands of such sheriff, coroner, or constable, such sheriff, coroner, or constable may follow and arrest such fugitive from justice in any other county in this commonwealth.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS BY THE LEGISLATURE.

Mr. JACKSON offered the following, and on his motion it was referred to the committee on the revision of the constitution and slavery:

WHEREAS, our constitution is a solemn conventional agreement among freemen, and the three great departments of government created by it are bound to obey its provisions; and whereas, it is violative of the principles of republican governments, for any of the co-ordinate branches of such government to have any control, either directly or indirectly, over the organic law. Therefore,

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to give such power to the legislature as would enable it to propose amendments to the constitution, or as would invite it to embark in constitutional agitation.

POWERS OF THE GENERAL AND STATE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. GAITHER. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to report to this convention what powers have been delegated to the United States; also what powers have been prohibited by the constitution of the United States, to the states, with a view to enable this convention to act understandingly, in forming a constitution for the government of the state of Kentucky.

I have been waiting for some weeks past, with the hope that some gentleman would present, in some tangible form, a proposition of this kind to the convention. We were notified when we met here, that this convention was clothed with all power, save that delegated to the federal government, and of course the commonwealth covers the whole ground, with the exception of prohibited and delegated power. We are about to frame a constitution, and so far as I am concerned, and so far as the people of Kentucky are concerned, we desire to have the whole ground covered. Without having laid before the convention a view of that fact, we are surely thrown greatly in the dark. We know that since the foundation of our government, there has been a dispute as to the powers existing in the federal government, and those which belong to the states. These disputes have led to convulsions, which shook the integrity of the Union, and created doubts in those abroad, whether we should sustain the principles on which this government was organized. I think before we go further, we should understand the ground we occupy, and I desire to occupy the whole ground to which we are entitled, and not a solitary inch beyond it.

I have presented this resolution with a view of bringing this subject before the convention. I have witnessed with deep interest the discussions that have incidentally touched upon this subject. I know that the state and federal government have been divided on this matter, and we have had statesmen of talent, wisdom, and experience differing in their views in regard to it, and we want to know what ground we should occupy in forming a constitution for the state of Kentucky. We are apprised that under the doctrine as held by one school of statesmen, a large circle of the powers of the federal government are regarded as held by implication and construction. Another school believe that the perpetuity of the Union depends on the adherence to a strict construction of the doctrines as laid down in the constitution. It is important that the issue should be now made understandingly. It is true that we have now hanging over us on this subject, a question that has unhinged the hopes of the perpetuity of this government, the enlarged powers of the federal government, and the powers granted by implication, have laid the foundation of that broad platform which has been laid. But the government that has stood thus long under our present constitution seems to have solved the problem that the people are capable of self government. I have noticed that there were two altars in this convention at which the different parties seem to worship, the sovereignty of the people, and the independence and purity of the judiciary. Those gentlemen who had chosen to worship at these different altars, perhaps equally pure and patriotic, have come to conclusions at war with each other, yet they may be induced by compromise to unite. From long reflection I have come to the conclusion to worship at the altar of the sovereignty of the people, and while I do this I make no imputation on gentlemen who entertain different opinions. My conclusions have been drawn from long observation of the practical working of a free government. We have gone on prosperously, and I look on the problem of self government as solved. For a long time the purest and best of men doubted this fact. There was ground for these doubts. There had been failures in all efforts that had been made, and it was for the wisdom of the American people to solve his problem and show the evils that had caused all former efforts to prove abortive.

Three forms of government are all that have existed; monarchy, in which the sovereignty rests in one; aristocracy, in which it rests in a few wise and intelligent individuals; and democracy, in which it rests in the mass of the people. These three primitive forms of government constitute the basis of all forms that have been instituted. In the United States, equal rights, equal privileges, no monopoly, and no exclusive privileges, constitute the elementary principles of our government. In the carrying out of this machinery in the commonwealth of Kentucky, through the constitution we may devise, rests the practical effects which may be anticipated in the government.

I have witnessed, long and feelingly, the struggles that have presented themselves in the volcanic convulsions which our government has passed through, during the last thirty years, and even longer than that, and I have traced, without any intention of partizan purposes, the causes and the results of those convulsions, and if you will attend to them, and examine them impartially, you will find they all originated in the position maintained by one of the great schools to which I have referred, by exercising power by construction and implication under the federal government, and having never been able to carry out their doctrine for the useful purposes for which this government was constituted. We know, that at the early threshold of this government, Hamilton, who was the master spirit of these doctrines, and a more intelligent man never lived, nor more honest, pure and patriotic in motive, but from his early education, his talents and patriotism were perverted, and his views and notions of free government were, as I think, erroneous.

He, it is true, doubted the capacity of the people for free government, and even Washington, whose motives and purity of motive no man dare impugn, doubted, but he said that so far as he was concerned, or his power extended, when he was called to the executive station, they should have a fair trial. A period of seventy odd years has demonstrated the fact, and it seems to me, that there must be a blind devotion to the Hamilton school, to assume that ground still. I do not believe in the incorruptibility and infallibility of men. They possess many frailties, and are subject to many errors. I am well aware that we say the people can do no wrong, but thus far we are in error. They are subject to error, and for this reason. Social governments and political societies have agreed that they will establish fundamental principles, which may be their guide, so far as written constitutions are concerned. They have thus acknowledged their liability to error, and that though government is an evil, it is a necessary evil, and one to which all men will cheerfully submit.

So far as relates to the purpose of my resolution, I desire to present it to the consideration of this convention, whose duty it is as the representatives of an honest yeomanry, to make known to them what rights they have conceded to the federal government, and what we grant to them. Can we attempt to frame a constitution without having brought to our view the extent of these powers that we have retained untrammelled by delegation?

Enough upon the subject of our federal relations. We stand as one member of a confederacy, as one independent sovereign state claiming and knowing that Kentucky will maintain what properly belongs to her, against any power that may make inroads upon her rights. I want this so established in our constitution that our posterity may know when the conflict shall come—as come it will, what position Kentucky will occupy among the states of this confederacy. We know that the clouds hang heavily in that quarter where exists a jealousy of freedom, and Kentucky knows well how to appreciate her attitude, in the great struggle which threatens us. We shall show our sister states that we know what position belongs to us on the platform that covers the whole, and that we have the courage and bravery to keep the station which we now occupy. We occupy the position of the key-stone of the federal arch on this great question that has threatened the integrity and perpetuity of the Union.

I hope this convention, when they make their report, will notify the different portions of the confederacy what position we take, in such a way that they may be easy on this subject; that the north may know we are not to be moved from the position that we occupy in relation to the constitution of the United States, and that we may admonish our southern brethren they need be no longer jealous of the position we occupy. We know the importance of the Union and the benefits to be derived from it. We will have them understand that we will maintain our position, and they may have no fear that Kentucky will leave any room for jealousy on the subject which has so much excited them and upon which they have had a kind of monomania.

Much has been said upon the causes and the reasons which operated to produce this convention. My own reflections have been long and well matured on this subject. I shall not, however cavil with my colleagues as to who had the honor of first bringing about this convention. I have long had the honor to represent my state in a legislative capacity. The journals of 1817 will show that on examination of the elementary principles of my government I found, as I conceive, that we had outgrown the principles before adopted and then existing. I was then in favor of a convention, not on account of mal-administration of officers, but in consequence of the radical defects in the organic law, in reference to the rights of the people. What were the rights of the people under this constitution? Once in four years you had the privilege of voting for a governor, lieutenant governor, and senators, and once a year for representatives. On all the globe was there ever a government so despotic in some respects as ours? It is true that under the influence of public opinion the vessel of state moved on harmoniously. But it was not long before the statesmen of the time found the latitude of the ship of state. The life and good behaviour tenure of office had its effect on the people, and they determined to have a different constitution. It was not on account of mal-administration of office, and giving office to sons and sons-in-law, that convinced the people. Their conviction was drawn from more essential and important sources, and they look to us now for the exhibition of important principles on which we act, and if we shrink from fear of the cavils of individuals, they will hold us to a high responsibility. We shall deserve the reproach that must fall on us.

I have heard here, and elsewhere, that all free governments are founded on three pillars. This is a Blackstone doctrine, however. Our government is based on a single pillar, and that is the people. Those pillars that have been represented as sustaining the governmental dome, may properly belong to the government of Great Britain; but to apply it to our government, it will be necessary to turn it upside down, and then you will have a fair representation of it. Our government is based on one pillar, and that, the people. The executive, legislative, and judicial departments, are but different portions of the superstructure. We, then, as those on whom the superstructure is based, are bound to maintain purity and integrity in the sphere which properly belongs to us. We have heard with pain, for the past thirty years, of the attacks made upon the legislative character of our state. It was originally made by those who do not believe in popular governments, and whose cowardice made them afraid to attack the people themselves, but who did it as nearly as possible through their representatives. Your legislature has been held up as an unworthy, corrupt, log-rolling curse, and as exhibiting the worst passions of human nature. Now, is this right? We have heard it here, and is it right that we should quietly hear our agents, emanating directly from us, thus vilified, and not come to the rescue? I have had the honor, for some years, of sitting as an humble representative from my county, in a legislative capacity, and as I came out of doors I have often heard some insulting remark like this: "You have done no harm today, I hope." I passed such remarks by, and when I mingled with the representatives of the country, I always looked on them as having an atmosphere about them reflecting the dignity of the people. I say, then, if you wish to preserve the government pure, come to the rescue of the three great departments of it. Let the people know that they are the medium through which the government must be carried out, practically. Come to the rescue of the legislature, which may feel degraded by the insults thrown upon it—repel the insinuation that they are not to be trusted—maintain their position, and if the people have been unfortunate in selecting an unworthy man, let them turn him aside, but do not let the whole department suffer.

The executive department, too, has suffered. This is an important office, and although I have never had the honor to be an incumbent of it, I feel a pride in maintaining the dignity of this office; and those slurs and taunts that have been cast upon this branch, are calculated to bring into disrepute the duties of that office.

The next department is that of the judiciary, and a very important one it is, but I must confess that I have never been able to consider it more important than the other departments, all of which are essential in carrying out the principles of this government.

Much has been said about the importance of an independent judiciary. I like an independent representative, and an independent executive, and an intelligence and moral firmness in any officer that will lead him to do his duty regardless of what cabals and individuals may say, considering that the mass of the people require nothing but what is right, and when it is done, they will give their sanction to the act. Your judiciary is essential and important, but I have never been able to convince my mind that it was the most essential portion of the superstructure which the people have erected to carry out their will. Who are the judiciary? They are composed of men. What are their duties? They are prescribed by the statutory provisions of the country. They are, perhaps, as good men, but not better than the mass of the people that surround them. An independent judiciary, in the generally received import of the expression, means absolute. An independent judiciary, that is to be absolute and above the mass of the people on whom rests, as a basis, the superstructure, seems to me to be an absurdity too intolerable to be sanctioned for a moment. Now the subject of an independent judiciary as it relates to other counties has been frequently presented to you. What was the proposition of an independent judiciary in Great Britain? Was it not opposed to some separate and antagonistic interests on the part of others? Have we in this country separate and antagonistic interests to those of the people? We have not, and therefore the term independent judiciary is an anomaly, and does not belong to those notions we apply to government. Have we, in this government, any antagonistic interest to those of the people? If we have, let its advocates come out boldly and produce it. Shall it be found in the private corporations and privileged orders that you create in the shape of bank barons or knights of the spindle? I presume none are now at least ready to come forth and avow that doctrine. Then I know no ground upon which to claim for any functionary of government, that kind of independence. The idea is absurd, and does not belong to that school of political doctrine, which I have been taught to believe correct.

Upon the subject of the independence of the judiciary I have no fears, in bringing them upon the same ground, and requiring them to be inducted into office by the same propelling power that the balance of the functionaries of government are. I have no apprehension that their integrity, honesty, or independence, will be weakened or destroyed thereby. Can you make any rational man, whose prejudices are not absurd, and whose mind is not warped by the Mansfieldism of the fixed sources of Blackstonism, believe that the individual who receives judicial power from the golden pen of the executive, sanctioned by the senate, will certainly be an independent, honest man, when, if he receives his power directly from the ballot box, from the sovereign people of the country, he will be converted into a rascal at once? I have a better opinion of the lawyers of the country, the class from which we select our judges. I am not one of those advocates of the sovereignty of the people, who believe that they can commit no error, or are infallible; but I do believe the mass of them are capable of self-government, and that the vessel of state must sail upon that current. And he must be a sceptic indeed who does not subscribe to that doctrine. Although the manner in the management of the rudder of the ship of state may have run ashore, yet once in that current, the vessel of state is irresistibly forced on to the accomplishment of the great purposes of government. We have had convulsions, and trying times in the political history of this country, which, if they have not demonstrated to ourselves, they have to the old world at least, that our government is based on a solid foundation, and that the people are in reality capable of self-government. I have heard various projects suggested by which gentlemen desire to preserve the independence of the judiciary, and its sovereignty, from the contaminating touch of the mass of the people. It was but the other day that we heard it avowed, and declared, that they could not trust the people, nor even themselves. Now I take it for granted, that when a man gets into a position that he cannot trust himself, that his neighbors themselves ought not to trust him. And what was this project that was to preserve the independence of the judiciary? It was that the state should be laid off into districts, and that the legislature—the very branch of government that in the next breath was declared to be the most unworthy—should select the lawyers, and recommend them to the senate, and that body should nominate one of them to the governor, who should commission him as an officer.

The theory of our government is the separate and distinct divisions of its powers into three departments. The judicial, legislative and executive officers are co-ordinate, and should be kept separate and distinct; but there is, and ought to be, a responsibility some where, and where can it be more safely deposited than with the body of the people, who are solely interested in the correctness and faithfulness of their operations? It is argued, that when you elect a judge upon the great principle of the sovereignty of the people, that of course you must subject him to the influence of that sovereignty in giving his judicial decisions. This arises from a mistaken view and wrong conception of the purposes for which our government is instituted. We the people profess not to be skilled in the technicalities of law or statutory provisions, but we do claim, and it is due to us to acknowledge that our motives and purposes are, that justice and equity should be regarded by the functionaries of government. And we have sufficient of common sense to know when this is, or is not done, and when it is not, we have a right to arraign those functionaries for their failure in the performance of that duty.

It has been argued here with scarcely a dissenting voice that the judiciary is the great reservoir and safeguard of the liberties and rights of the people; but I myself have not come to that conclusion. I have witnessed the operations of the judicial arm of the government, and paid some attention to the judicial history, not only of our country, but of times past in other governments. And I find, that according to their number, there were as many blood-thirsty despots and tyrants, and infinitely more, among the judiciary, than ever disgraced the legislative halls of any country. Let any man read the history of the state trials in Great Britain, and he will learn that the best blood the world ever saw, has been sacrificed at the shrine of judicial tyranny. Mark the history of the United States, and what will you there discover in relation to the judiciary? Does it exhibit them in a light to be regarded as the depot and reservoir of our liberties, and the asylum to which we must carry ourselves for safety? In this country we have been taught a different doctrine, it may be however, of a school which certain portions of this community will not recognize or adopt. We are told, and every man who has regarded the practical operations of our judiciary, must concede it, that they are embarrassing and suppressing the liberties of the country, gradually, yet certainly, by their decisions, and by their operations on the political acts of government, depriving the sovereign people of many of their rights. They are the great high priests of political jesuitism, and passive obedience and non-resistance will be the inevitable consequence, if the people listen to the doctrines being inculcated by many of the judiciary. I am one of those who are not afraid of establishing the judiciary department of the government upon the basis of the sovereignty of the people, and of holding them to that accountability to them, that the balance of the functionaries of the government are held. I can see no necessity for any distinction. I have never seen a family where the parents foster and set up one of their children, as the favorite and champion of the rest, that there was not distrust and turmoil, and a kind of family feud arising that rendered them unhappy, and blasted their prospects hereafter. All human institutions partake of the inherent frailty of humanity, and from the time they are put in operation there is a constant tendency to dissolution, and the only way they are to be preserved or restored is, by bringing them back to primitive principles. And the only way to do this is through the ballot box. Therefore, if we are willing to do what our constituents expect of us, we must provide them with a constitution, in which the ballot box will be brought to bear on all officers, from the constable to the chief justice. Let them not be appointed for too long a time either, for frequent accountability secures the faithfulness of all agents. Then we shall have a guarantee that the purposes of this government will be accomplished, and we shall demonstrate to the world, that we, as a people en masse, are in reality capable of self-government. Your constituency—my constituency at least—expect that we shall give them the liberty of selecting their own agents, and that in the selection of those agents, they shall not be required to trust them too long. Experience and the practical operations of mankind have demonstrated to us, that to trust men too long is sometimes a little unsafe. We have seen men, in whose political integrity and honesty we have had the greatest confidence, change their position, and this admonishes us that we ought not to trust them too long. The notion I have long since adopted is, that this is a bad world, and the fewer we trust the better. Call your officials to account as soon and as often as possible, before their powers corrupt them, and if they have done well, reward them by re-election if they desire it. Now, your judiciary, as well as your representative branches of the government should be placed precisely in that condition. I make no distinction, for they are all functionaries of the government of the sovereign people, appointed as the agents to carry out some of the attributes of that sovereignty; and they should occasionally be brought in review before us the people. We have no motive to do wrong; we may and do commit errors, but as between errors committed by ourselves in mass, and those committed by individuals, I have no hesitation in making a choice, for if the people err it will not be wilfully.

And permit me to say there are doctrines contended for here upon this subject of the judiciary which involve imputations upon the integrity, sincerity, purpose, and motives of the people, that I cannot subscribe to. If I believed that in the selection of a judge, the mass of the people would take a man who never saw a law book or who had no knowledge of the science of law, I would not vest that power of selection in them. But it is an imputation, I repeat, upon the integrity, capacity, and motives of the people, that I am not willing for one moment to subscribe to. It is a doctrine which belongs to the past, when men doubted the capacity of the people, and not to the present or the future. In regard to sheriffs and constables, I must acknowledge, that if my feelings would permit me to sacrifice principle to policy or expediency, it would be to make those functionaries who handle the public money ineligible. But I think there is a surer and better remedy than this. If I understand the practical operation of the theory of those who contend for the ineligibility of the sheriff and constable, it amounts to this: You elect him and put him in office, and say this is your only chance, and so go on and be a great scoundrel. And like the small-pox, which must have its various stages, and its confluent and distinct character, so must be your progress in rascality in office, certain that we shall cast you off as soon as you are pitted and discovered. Then we will bring forward others to take the infection. I want a better remedy than that. If there are perquisites appertaining to their offices which induce such corruption, I desire that the legislature should curtail them, and enact statutes to punish that kind of land piracy. But to go on and put one man in office and tell him to go ahead in his career of rascality, and then after his term of rascality has expired to put him in another, would be, in the course of time, to establish a class of graduated villains, educated to swindle and rob the community. I can subscribe to no such doctrine.

I never like in my profession to apply a remedy when I am satisfied that it is so powerful in its character that it may engender a worse disease than the one it seeks to remove. I prefer to bear it patiently, in the hope that nature and the recuperative powers of the body will combat and overthrow the evil. I have faith in the efficacy of the practical operation of the ballot box. It was presented the other day most eloquently by the gentleman from Todd, (Mr. Bristow.) It will elevate the character of the elector, and induce an honest pride in the voters by making them satisfied that in reality they have some interest in the government. It will be practically demonstrating to them that they do possess that interest. Although I have never been a great electioneerer, nor ever approached a man to seek his vote in any form or shape, yet I have been mortified in times past, when in a canvass the question was incidentally brought up whether a man would vote for me, to hear him reply, I do not care much who is elected, it will do me no good as I have no interest in the government. I want now to convince the voters that they do have an interest in the government, and thus enlarge their views and elevate their pride. This will provide a corrective for the evils of which I have just spoken. They will review the action of the public officials when they come to decide upon their re-election, and will feel like freemen, and that their rights are equal and on a par with the most wealthy and influential man in the country. Our doctrine, if I understand it aright, and I say without intending to be offensive, the democratic doctrine, is equal rights and privileges against monopolies or class legislation in any shape or form. Now upon that doctrine, it is maintained by the opposite party, that we are not a free government unless we have universal intelligence. If that is correct, then it is like the cure for the toothache, once recommended here, two drops of yellow jackets honey. We never can procure it, and therefore good bye to free government. The doctrine of equal rights and privileges will do most to secure it, and in this way: you say to the people, as intelligent men, you have your rights, and you will know when they are invaded and when to defend them; and while you do that you will be defending the rights of men who may be ignorant of them, but who stand precisely as you do. And in that way all will have the benefits of equal rights and privileges. But take the opposite doctrine, and let us get a scale by which we will judge of the capacity of men when they come to the ballot box, and where will it lead you? There is no stopping place—none short of the throne. There is the only place to which any man who advances that doctrine can resort. These are the ideas which appear to actuate the minds of men who ask us if it is possible that we can submit the selection of a judicial officer to men who know nothing about law. There is a deep seated and intelligent appreciation of right and justice among the masses that will carry along with it all except this floating vote that has been referred to as existing under the present system where the people are allowed little freedom, which, when you enlarge that freedom, will give birth to an honest pride that will deprive those men of power who expect by their money to secure the destruction of an election.

I must acknowledge that I have been somewhat harrassed by the views and declarations made upon this floor. Your reporter there takes down these declarations, and they are to be handed down to posterity, and to go abroad, and what will be the impression created by reading them? Why, that we, the people of Kentucky, are perhaps the most corrupt, the most bribed and bribing set of people that ever existed on the face of the earth! It is an unfair representation, and I regret that those declarations have been made and spread upon our journals to go abroad. I believe the people of Kentucky have formed an opinion of the Yankee character, from the hosts of Yankee peddlers who swarm about the country, cheating and defrauding them; but it is a most unfair idea of the Yankee character. Nor should the instances of those who seek to obtain power and position upon the jesuitical principle, that the ends justify the means, be taken as indicative of the character of our politicians or our people. He who obtains a seat in the legislature, in congress, or upon the judicial bench, or any where else, by these vile and corrupting means, is unworthy of the trust, and a disgrace to the atmosphere he occupies. Do not then proclaim it to the world and to subsequent generations, that we are a set of bad and corrupt men in our elections. Sustain the representative character of the state, one of the most important and essential, as it is, of your functions of government. Give to the judiciary department the respect and dignity that is due it, but do not look upon it as a power we are not to approach, and which is not to be touched, without the hazard of incurring the penalties which, in olden times, were inflicted on the sacrilegious hands that touched the sacred ark. They are our agents and functionaries; and here is a great error men fall into in relation to our whole political machinery of government. The people are sovereign; all admit that. Some, however, believe that when you invest a judicial officer with power, that the judicial attribute of sovereignty is conferred on him; and so also in regard to your legislature and executive. They seem to believe that the people are the subjects and not the sovereigns. That is the great error, for the sovereignty is not departed from the people. These officers are only the functionaries clothed with the powers to carry into operation the will of the sovereign people, and a part of the superstructure only of that great fabric, the base of which is the sovereign people. In this view there can be no difficulty on the subject. If we entertain the other view, then the people are not the sovereigns but the subjects, and go to the ballot box only to designate and to transfer their rulers.

I must ask the convention to excuse me for the latitude I have taken in the discussion of this subject. I did, however, feel it due to myself and the convention, that this subject should be brought before us, while we are beginning to lay the foundation of the constitution. I desire not to trespass or to encroach upon the powers delegated to the federal government. I desire not to assume a solitary atom of that power which the state prohibits itself from assuming; but all powers not thus delegated are retained by the state and the people of Kentucky. And hereafter, when the subject shall again come up, I may indulge in an analysis of what are called state rights, and a fair, philological view of the machinery of our government, so that hereafter, when the struggle shall come, Kentuckians may feel what is the ground they have to defend. I will promise them to be the first to go to the rescue, and the last to leave the ground.

Mr. TRIPLETT called for the reading of the resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed to report to this convention what powers have been delegated to the United States; also, what powers have been prohibited by the constitution of the United States to the states, with a view to enable this convention to act understandingly in forming a constitution for the government of the State of Kentucky."

I have never heard so broad a speech built on so narrow a foundation. I suppose, sir, that the true object of the gentleman from Adair, in offering the resolution, was to prevent the powers of the general government and the powers of the several state governments, from becoming like the disease he spoke of, confluent—the one running into the other—such is its length, its breadth, and its scope; and if it had pleased the gentleman from Adair to stop at that point, I would have joined him in all sincerity, in the passage of the resolution. But upon this narrow foundation, he has chosen to spread a broad speech, in which he has avowed sentiments with which I cannot agree. Has it come to this, that we are to be told, that we cannot have an independent judiciary, at the same time that we acknowledge the existence of the great principle, that the people are competent to self-government? Are we to be told that he who worships at one shrine must turn his face to the east, while he who worships at the other, and a more immaculate shrine, must turn his face to the west. Of all the doctrines that we have heard promulgated in this house—and God knows some of them are bad enough—this is the most objectionable, that the people are capable of self-government, and he who believes this cannot subscribe to the universally admitted truism, that they can and ought to have an independent judiciary. So far from these two great principles being antagonistical, they are identically the same. That is, the principle of the capability of the people for self-government—and it is a principle as firmly fixed as a rock of adamant—and the principle that the judiciary must be independent, so far from being antagonistic to each other, cannot exist apart. You say that the people are not capable of self-government, when you declare that that department cannot be independent. I do not think that the people will applaud any advocate of their rights, who declares that they cannot exercise the power of self-government and at the same time have an independent judiciary. So far from this being true, I look upon the three great divisions of government, into separate and independent departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, as the very foundation of a free government; and the attack it has pleased the gentleman from Adair to make upon one of these departments, may, if not answered, not only shake it so as to make it totter, but to topple it from its broad foundation, and lay it prostrate in the dust.

Was it supposed necessary by the gentleman from Adair, that in order to protect the legislature, of which he has been a useful member, and I may say an ornament, that he should turn around and lay his blighting hand upon another and weaker, and I must say the weakest department of our government. Sir, potent as is the arm of this conversion, I hope it is not strong enough to destroy the influence of, or bring into contempt the judiciary department; even though they put upon it the identical maledictions which the gentleman bestowed upon it, as he rode through his district in the last canvass. It is to be hoped the judiciary will be able to defend itself and maintain that position in the respect and affections of the people so necessary to the efficient and proper discharge of its necessary duties; and the legislature will be able to defend itself and maintain and occupy its proper sphere of action, without infringing on, or interfering with the powers properly assigned to either the judiciary or the executive departments. But the voluntary defence of the legislature by the gentleman from Adair, shows that it is necessary, in his opinion, to defend in advance that department. And why this premature and volunteered defence, unless the gentleman anticipates encroachment by this, the strongest, on the judiciary the weakest department of the government?

The volunteered defence of the gentleman from Adair of the Legislature, when no man has attacked or wished to attack that department of government, was uncalled for, and I hope and believe unnecessary—this is one of the cases in which the blood of Douglas must defend itself. When the Legislature confines itself within its legitimate sphere of action, the passage of such constitutional and wholesome laws as the wants of the people have dictated, or expediency requires, they need no defence; and when they wander beyond that constitutional boundary, and venture into prohibited or improper ground, by passing laws not called for, or against the wishes of the people, even the talents of the gentleman from Adair cannot save them from condemnation.

But I arose principally to draw the attention of the house to the previous part of the remarks of the gentleman from Adair. I hope that we will not establish as one of the canons of this house the principle, that if we acknowledge that the people are capable of self-government—that the judiciary is not to be independent. I have heard the capability of the people for self-government reiterated until I am heartily tired of hearing of it. Every one who rises in this house proclaims this fact, as if it were not acknowledged on all hands. Is there a man to be found in this state who denies it? And yet each gentleman deems it necessary to pour forth a long tirade upon the capability of the people to govern themselves. Why, its frequent reiteration here would seem to imply that it is a questionable matter. Why keep eternally asserting that which nobody denies? Is it for the purpose of creating a little popularity at home; is it that a little political capital may be obtained? Is it not probable that we may do great injury to the high standing and republican character of Kentucky, by iterating and reiterating this acknowledged and common place maxim, that the people are capable of self-government, by causing it to be believed abroad that there are delegates on this floor who deny its truth? Is it necessary to reiterate that which has never been denied in Kentucky, much less in this chamber? It seems to me to be in extremely bad taste, to say the least of it. With the balance of the gentleman's speech I agree. He uttered a great many sentiments which no man disagrees with, and which I will assist him in sustaining.

But let us turn our attention for a moment, to the resolution itself. Great and herculean will be the task that the gentleman imposes upon the committee, in drawing the line of distinction, that exists between the powers of the general government on one side, and the powers of the state governments on the other. They lap so frequently, I hardly think this convention will go through the labour of drawing the line of demarcation between them; nor do I think it necessary. There are particular powers which remain with the states until used by the general government. There are numerous powers that remain with the states until the occasion arises for their exercise by the general government. And when exercised by the general government, the states have lost their power over them. There is a large class of powers of this description, without touching upon the principle of nullification, and God knows I would rather be in the midst of a hornet's nest, than bringing the nullifiers about my ears. A nullifier was never known to be convinced, by any argument, that he was wrong.

The resolution, in my opinion, cannot do much good. But if the gentleman from Adair wishes that the committee should be formed, and is willing to act as chairman—and I tell him beforehand, that he is hardly aware of the difficulty of the task he has undertaken—I for one, will sustain his proposition.

Mr. GAITHER. I regret that I should have drawn upon myself an attack from my friend from Daviess. I did not anticipate such an attack. I have been hitherto silent in this convention, but I have believed that the country and the convention, desired that this subject should be understandingly presented, before we proceed to act upon it. I can assure the gentleman, that on the subject of nullification, I am as averse to enter as he is. The honest's nest will never be brought about his head by me. I acknowledge, however, that I have as much aversion to the doctrine of passive obedience, and of non-resistance, as I have to nullification. If I had to die a political death, and had my choice, as to the manner, I would prefer to die by convulsion, rather than collapse. Sir, this term independence, as applied to the judiciary, is one which I think is not correctly understood. What does it mean? Does it mean absolute and unqualified independence? If I have understood the purpose of the people of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, it has been, that in the organization of the government, the judiciary should not be placed beyond the reach of the people; that they should not be made entirely independent of the people. If the gentleman will substitute the terms intelligence and firmness, for independence, we could comprehend the meaning of those terms, as applied to the judiciary. I am glad that the gentleman has coincided with me in some of my views on the subject, and so far as the herculean task of which he speaks is concerned, I have no great desire myself, to take a prominent part in it; but I desire that the subject shall be investigated by those who have complained, or have at least entertained a belief, that the states hold their powers by a kind of courtesy. I will not shrink from any duty that shall be imposed upon me, and yet I could desire that it should be committed to other hands than mine.

Mr. DIXON. I have no intention sir, to make a speech in relation to the resolution of the gentleman from Adair. I believe I shall vote for it, because it is a resolution that proposes an enquiry, and I have no doubt that a report upon the subject will be useful to the house. But I merely arose to enter my protest against some of the positions of the gentleman from Adair, in relation to the views and opinions that have been expressed by some of the members of this convention, upon certain great questions. The gentleman says that he is astonished, and he supposes that those who come after us will be astonished, when they read the journal of our debates, and find that the character of the people has been falsified, that they have been represented as being corrupt, as being the basest people on the face of the earth, and less capable of self-government than any other. I think the gentleman is mistaken, if he supposes that any delegate upon this floor has uttered such a sentiment. No such sentiment has been uttered; at least in my hearing. I would like to know of the gentleman, from what quarter such a declaration as that has proceeded.

Mr. GAITHER. I do not intend to particularize; but I have heard it proclaimed here, that the people have been purchased at the ballot-box, that their votes have been brought into the market, and every gentleman was appealed to, to say whether he did not know that such was the fact.

Mr. DIXON. That is a very different thing for the sweeping charge upon the people of Kentucky, that they are all corrupt. Gentlemen have asserted the fact, that there are such things in Kentucky, as corruption and bribery on the part of politicians, and that men have been purchased to vote contrary to their opinions. When it is asserted that politicians have attempted to bribe persons to vote for them, gentlemen assert only what is true, and what I presume the gentleman from Adair, will not deny. But the gentleman will not pretend to say, that any delegate upon this floor has declared that the people of the state are, as a whole, corrupt, or anything other than that some men might be bribed.

Mr. GAITHER. I can inform the gentleman that I have no personal knowledge on the subject.

Mr. DIXON. I like the gentleman's speech in some respects. It was broad and expansive, eloquent and beautiful. He certainly took a wide range. He reminded me very much of a philosopher, who once got upon the highest peak of the Alps, I believe, cast his eyes to the great Heavens, which threw in unmeasurable space, their broad, deep canopy around him, and then to earth, taking in at a single glance land and sea, islands, continents and worlds, and in the sublimity of his thoughts and the pride of his imagined power, exclaimed, "attention, the universe." "Islands! continents! and worlds! wheel into line! to the right about face—forward march." The universe is before us, and eternity the prize. The gentleman seems to think that to control every thing on the face of the earth he has but to give the command "fall into line, forward march." Sir, we do not march at all, when the gentleman attempts to drive us, by throwing up to us the charge that has been uttered here, that we are anxious to maintain the independence of the judiciary, because the whole people of Kentucky are corrupt. We make no such charge. I have taken the ground that the judges ought not to be re-eligible, especially the circuit court judges. But do I therefore assert that the people must be corrupt? I take this ground from the conviction that it is necessary that the judges should be preserved pure and immaculate and not subjected to temptation, and that the people should not be oppressed by corrupt judges.

I am not certain whether or not I understood the gentleman as insinuating that the thunders of nullification have been heard from delegates in this convention. I do not think there are any nullifiers upon this floor. I am satisfied there are none.

I cannot reply to the gentleman's remarks on this point, because I do not know precisely to what they lead. But as I remarked, I listened to his speech with much pleasure. There was a great deal in it which I fully concurred in. But I cannot consent that the statement shall go forth that any delegate in this body, has made the charge that the people of the whole state are corrupt.

Mr. GAITHER. I would inform the gentleman, that I intended no allusion to him or to any other delegate in particular. I apologised at the outset for the desultory manner in which I was about to address the convention as conforming somewhat to the indulgence that has been granted to others. I have not hitherto troubled the convention with any remarks of mine, and I desired the indulgence of the house, in order that I might take a range, similar to that which has been indulged in by other delegates.

The question was then taken upon the resolution and it was adopted, and the president appointed the committee as follows—Messrs. Gaither, Clarke, Dixon, Lisle and Mitchell.

QUALIFICATIONS OF CANDIDATES.

Mr. GHOLSON. I move that the committee of the whole be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution which I sometime since submitted in reference to the qualification of officers. It is as follows:

Resolved, That the good people of this commonwealth are fully competent to judge of, and decide upon the qualifications of all candidates for any office, whether the same be legislative, executive, judicial, or ministerial; wherefore, a certificate of election, according to law, is the only certificate of qualifications that shall ever be required to enable any citizen to enter upon the discharge of the duties of the office to which he may be elected."

The object I have in view in making the motion is this: It seems to be roundly asserted here this morning, on all hands, that the people are capable of self-government in the broadest and fullest sense of the term. This idea has been reiterated time and again on both sides of the house. Now, sir, I want to ascertain how many gentlemen there are who will affirm, that the people are competent to judge of and decide upon the election and qualification of all officers, and then deny to the people the right to make such decision. If gentlemen are not prepared to do this, then I want to know how many gentlemen there are who are not willing to meet this question fairly, and who will perhaps move to lay the resolution on the table, to amend it, or in some other way to avoid a direct vote upon this plain and unequivocal proposition, which has so often been asserted here. When I had the honor of introducing this resolution, the objection that was made was, that gentlemen did not want to be forced into a vote hastily. They have now had time to make up their minds, and ought to be prepared to vote upon the subject. I want this thing distinctly understood. My object in calling up this proposition now is, that my constituents may know that I have done all, that in my humble capacity, I was able to do, to prevent the infliction of so great a wrong upon them. They want to see how gentlemen will vote in regard to a proposition that has been so broadly asserted.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE. As I have given some votes lately, sir, that some of my friends in this house seem to think indicate a want of confidence or faith in the popular intelligence—in the capacity of the people to decide for themselves upon these matters—I should like to submit a few remarks in regard to the reasons which have influenced me in giving those votes.

With regard to the eligibility and re-eligibility of officers, gentlemen seem to think that when you vote against the eligibility of officers it indicates a want of confidence in popular intelligence. The delegate from Simpson, who seems to entertain this view, is the chairman of the committee on the legislative department of the government. That committee has made a report, and in their report they have incorporated a provision which exists in the present constitution: it is—"that 'no minister of the gospel shall be eligible to a seat in the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky.'" Now he is not simply prescribing the qualification for a candidate, but he is proscribing a large, intellectual and moral class of the community from any participation in the concerns of government. I ask the gentleman, with his views as he has promulgated them in this house, how he can defend and vindicate his position before his constituents? You undertake to prescribe the qualifications of a candidate, and the gentleman says that is inconsistent with the idea of the competency of the people for self-government; and yet, at the very same moment, you not only prescribe qualifications for a candidate for the legislature, but you actually proscribe men from any participation in legislation. I think it likely that I shall agree with the gentleman as far as the report of the committee is concerned, and I shall probably vote for it; but I cannot see how, with the peculiar doctrines which he promulgates, I could go before my constituents, and vindicate the propriety of that vote, if it be inconsistent with the popular intelligence, to prescribe the qualifications of candidates for office.

A gentleman asserted a few minutes since, that there was nobody who doubted the competency of the people for self government. Sir, it is doubted. It is doubted in Europe; there it is not admitted. I am a firm believer in the doctrine of the competency of the people for self government. But there are many men who doubt it in this country. I have heard many worthy and intelligent men express their doubts in regard to it; but I think those doubts are predicated upon a mistaken notion of government. Where did the doctrine originate, that the people are not competent to the purpose of self government? It came sir, from Rome; the people there were divided into two classes, the patricians and the plebeians. The patricians had all the political power in their own hands, although constituting a very small part of the body politic. The plebeians were a majority of the people. But it was declared by the patricians, that the plebeians were not competent to self government. There was a marked distinction between the two classes; the plebeians had not only no political rights in the commonwealth, but they had no civil rights. The two classes were not permitted to intermarry with each other. And it was not until the people went out to the sacred mount, and determined that they would not return until some rights were granted them, that they got even the privilege of assembling at the door of the capitol and saying "veto."

How is it in this country? We see here all the people, the learned and the unlearned, the rich and the poor, have always constituted the body politic; and will any man say that they are not competent to the purpose of self government? Any man who so declares, stultifies himself as a part of the community. The federal constitution says "we, the people." All constitute the people, and instead of any man sneering at the capability of the people for self government, he ought to endeavor to elevate the people, and place in their hands that power, and those rights, to which they are entitled.

Now, this is my idea as to what is the theory of our constitution, and I desire to restore to the people the power of selecting their own officers. David Hume, if my recollection is right, lays down the three cardinal principles upon which governments are based. He was a high tory, and a jacobite—not a jacobin—the very reverse of a jacobin. In characterizing the various forms of government, he assigns strength to a monarchy, wisdom to an aristocracy, and honesty to a republic. Now, whether he was right or not, in other respects, is not the question, but he was unquestionably right, so far as relates to the fact that honesty is the characteristic of a republic. When, therefore, I propose to restore these powers of government to the people, of which they have been to some extent deprived, I do so because I would place them where there is a disposition to do right; and a disposition to do right is half the battle.

I confess it would be difficult to convince me that a learned and accomplished judge, and an honest judge, could not determine upon the qualifications of a clerk better than the collected mass of the community; and it is no imputation on the intelligence of the people to say so. It is no imputation on your intelligence to say that you cannot determine whether a physician is well skilled in his profession. Why do we take it out of the hands of a judge and give it to the people? Because the judge may not do right. The disposition on the part of the people is to do right, and we believe in their capacity and intelligence to judge of these matters. Hence it is that we are going to restore this power into the hands of the people. We go for restoring it to a place where there is at least a disposition to do right, and some times that disposition does not exist on the part of a judge, or other appointing power.

But I rose merely for the purpose of showing that in the votes I have given, I have not been actuated by any distrust of the honesty or capacity of the people, and that it is not inconsistent with that idea to prescribe the qualifications of candidates for office. The federal constitution does it; and the same thing is done in every constitution. Hence it is that I have voted as I have, and not with the view of impeaching the general intelligence of the people.

Mr. CLARKE. Without any intention of making a speech upon the resolution—for I intend my course shall be indicated by the vote I give—I am unexpectedly constrained to ask the indulgence of the house for a few moments, in consequence of the reference that was made to me individually, by the gentleman from Fayette. I had not supposed that I would be drawn into this arena, without some manifestation of willingness on my part to become an humble soldier at least, in the contest. The principle by which I am governed in regard to the selection of officers is this. I have always believed the people competent to elect their own officers, and at the same time, to judge of their qualifications.—But sir, sometimes officers who are not qualified may be chosen. The people may be imposed on, and in many instances doubtless will be; but there is a motive operating with them that will correct the evil, which motive does not exist if you will let A, B and C make the appointments—if you confer the power of appointment upon one man, or a hundred. If you let the people appoint for themselves, what is the result? If they make a bad appointment, they are themselves injured, and they will be prompted to remove the individual, and thus repair the injury. This is one of the great reasons why I want the people to have the power of appointing and of removing, at limited periods of time their own officers. They have a motive for removing if the appointment has been a bad one, whereas, if you entrust the power of appointing to a few men, they will perhaps have no motive, except to continue the oppression. Now I have said repeatedly, that I am willing that a candidate for the clerkship shall be a citizen of the county, and of the state for a certain length of time, and that he shall be of a certain age. These, to some extent, are qualifications, but when you tell me that he shall have the certificate of a judge, I have remonstrated against it.

But I am arraigned by the gentleman from Fayette, because I have, as chairman of a committee, reported that no one who is a minister of the gospel shall be eligible to a seat in the legislature. Well, sir, there are interests perhaps higher than governmental interests. My own conviction is, that when a citizen of the state takes on himself to follow our meek and lowly Savior—when he takes on himself the care of governing and protecting his little flock—when he takes on himself to go forth and preach the doctrines of christianity, I do not care to what denomination he may belong, I believe that the purity and influence of such a man ought not to be impaired by allowing him to enter into the political arena. And there may be other potent reasons why he should not. There have been instances in which whole communities have been driven to the perpetration of acts, at which every feeling of humanity shudders, when religious fanaticism, growing out of sectarianism, has been allowed to mingle with politics. I want no man who is entrusted with the spiritual care of the people, to engage in political discussion, or to have any thing to do with legislation. I want no such man to have a seat in the legislative halls of the state. I want to proceed upon the same principle upon which our fathers proceeded, in forming the federal government. I want to keep religion and politics separate.—I want every one in the country to worship God according to the dictates of his own conscience; but if he has torn himself from the world, and dedicated his talents and labor to his God, in the promulgation of the eternal principles of christianity, I have thought, and still think and believe, that it would be doing religion itself injustice—it would be in violation of the great principle on which we set out, that religion and politics should be kept distinct, that he should not be permitted to engage in political strife; and

I, for one, will not subscribe to the doctrine, that a minister of the gospel shall be eligible to a seat in the legislative halls of the state.

You may search through all history, from the beginning of christianity down to the present time, and you will scarcely find an instance where the liberties of the people have been lost, where revolution and blood-shed have been the order of the day, unless it be where some religion has been established by law, and where the people, to enforce it or to get rid of it, have rebelled.

I will detain the convention no longer upon this subject. I have said, and repeat now, that I believe the people to be competent to self-government; and I believe that this exception was placed on the records of the constitution to detract, to some extent, from the competency and ability of the people to judge for themselves, and I believe that every page that bears the impress of such a sentiment, fixes upon the commonwealth a blighting, withering stain, so dark, deep, and damning, that neither time nor circumstances can obliterate it.

If I have the misfortune to differ with gentlemen, it must be my misfortune. I repeat, I am thoroughly satisfied and convinced, that no certificate of a judge should be required from a candidate for the office of clerk. I repeat, I am thoroughly satisfied and convinced, that if a sheriff has discharged the duties of his office with ability and fidelity, and to the satisfaction of those among whom he lives, the people should have the right to place him again in office; and I intend, as far as my vote will go, to carry out this principle. If, in endeavoring to carry it out, I shall be surrounded by conflicting elements in the two extremes, and overwhelmed by the force of the torrent, I will fall, if fall I must; but if, Phoenix-like, I can rise again, and defend the principle at some other time, I will again defend it.

MR. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I have no objection to take the vote upon discharging the committee, if it be the pleasure of the house to consider the resolution at this time. I rise, however, for the purpose of saying, that if this discussion is to progress, and we are to have the whole field of declamation and argument opened upon the subject of government, it had better be upon the resolution itself, than upon the motion to discharge the committee. In order to get rid of that discussion which is out of place upon a motion of this kind, I shall feel compelled to move to lay it on the table.

THE PRESIDENT. I shall hereafter hold it out of order to discuss the merits of a proposition upon the motion to discharge a committee, or to go into committee to consider it.

MR. JACKSON moved to lay the motion to discharge the committee of the whole from the further consideration of the subject on the table.

MR. BRAUNER called for the yeas and nays on that motion.

MR. GHOLSON asked the gentleman from Muhlenburg to withdraw his motion, so that the question could be taken directly on the motion to discharge the committee.

MR. JACKSON. I would be glad to accommodate my friend from Ballard, but so deeply impressed am I with the impolicy of the introduction here of these mere abstract propositions; and so well convinced am I that such discussions cannot be promotive of a good end, that I cannot consent to withdraw my motion.

The yeas and nays were then taken and they resulted thus—yeas 56, nays 25.

YEAS—Mr. President (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, Thomas D. Brown, William Chenault, James S. So the motion was laid on the table.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT OFFICERS.

MR. TURNER moved to take up the report of the committee on the executive and ministerial officers for counties and districts.

The motion was agreed to.

MR. TURNER. I submit the following as an additional section:

"All officers provided for in this article shall be commissioned by the governor, and continue in office until their successors are commissioned and qualified; their term of service shall commence one month from the day of their respective elections."

There was something said yesterday about allowing these officers to act without commissions, merely having the election and return recorded in the office of the county court. The committee, however, thought they had better be commissioned by the governor. According to the present prospects there will not be a great deal else for the governor to do. And it appeared to the committee advisable that there should be one uniform period at which they should enter upon the duties of their respective offices, and they have fixed that period at one month after the day of their election.

MR. HARDIN. To make the provision in this report harmonize with the report of the committee on circuit courts, I will suggest the propriety of making the term of office commence with the date of the commission.

UK LAW LIBRARY

Mr. TURNER. We had that matter under consideration, for I had noticed that the committee, of which the honorable gentleman is chairman, had made such a report; but it seems to me that this is preferable. According to his report, the same description of officers living here, could be commissioned a week sooner than those living in the distant counties.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I think it would be imposing rather too great a task upon the governor, to compel him to issue commissions for all these officers; and in regard to the commencement of the term of office, it had better be from and after the election, and continue until his successor is duly qualified.

Mr. TURNER. The difficulty in making the term commence from and after the election is, that officers will act before they are commissioned; before they have given bond, for a great portion of them are required to give bond, for the proper discharge of their duties.

Mr. APPERSON. Although constables are to be constitutional officers, much inconvenience may arise from requiring them to be commissioned by the governor. Cases frequently occur where it is necessary to set forth in the pleadings that an individual is a constable, and it would be highly inconvenient sometimes to send down to Frankfort for a copy of the commission that it might be used in evidence. A motion against a constable is made before a justice of the peace in a remote county, and the party would have to send to the seat of government for a copy of his commission. At present you have only to send to the county court and get a copy of the order making him a constable.

Mr. ROOT. I think if the governor is to be required to issue commissions for all these petty officers, he will be able to do but little else. We are loading the constitution with a great deal of unnecessary matter, making specific provisions in relation to many things that had better be left to the control of the legislature.

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to add at the end of the section, the words, "and where any city shall have a separate representation, in one or both houses of the general assembly, such city, and the county in which it is situated, may have separate municipal regulations and officers, such as may be provided for separate counties, all of which may be regulated by law. And until such legal regulation is made, the county of Jefferson shall elect separately from the city of Louisville, a county court, sheriff and county clerk."

Mr. PRESTON. I understand the amendment of my friend from Jefferson proposes the separation of the city of Louisville from the county of Jefferson. As it would be tantamount to dividing the county in two, and as I am a representative of that constituency, and not believing it is called for by them, I object to its being engrafted on the article now under consideration. I believe in the right of this convention, or of the legislature under it, if so authorized, to create any new county, or to invest the city of Louisville with any municipal privileges they may think proper, but that part of this amendment to which I particularly object is, where, after referring to what the legislature may do in the premises, it is declared—"and until such legislative regulation shall be made, the county of Jefferson shall elect, separately from the city of Louisville, a county court, sheriff and county clerk." This then is a proposition to declare, in this constitution, that the city of Louisville shall be separated, for all county purposes, from the county of Jefferson, and that a virtual partition of the county shall take place. Now, what motive my friend from Jefferson has, in making this motion, I cannot discover, unless, indeed, it be this: The county court clerk's and sheriff's offices are valuable ones in the city of Louisville, and extend in their jurisdiction to both city and county; the political divisions are such that there is a majority of whigs in Louisville of some five hundred, in a poll of five thousand votes; but in the county, parties are very nearly equally balanced, out of a poll of two thousand five hundred votes, there being scarcely ever a majority either way of more than fifty. The majority in the city of Louisville therefore, at present, controls the election of those officers.

A large sum of money has been expended in the erection of a very handsome court house and jail, to be used by the city and county in common. The sessions of the courts, and the clerk's offices are now held in the city. What confusion will be produced by such an act of this convention as the gentleman proposes—by commingling the jurisdiction of the courts and officers of the county and city. This convention assembled here for the purpose of framing an organic law, to govern the state at large, and not to produce the schism which will prevail in localities in regard to the partition of existing and the erection of new counties—not for the purpose of agitating little local interests, nor for the purpose of carrying out sectional views. These are not fitting subjects for the consideration of this convention. No such movement as the gentleman indicates was ever agitated in Jefferson county, as I understand, during the last canvass. Neither was it agitated in the city of Louisville.

Now, what is the proposition of the committee on the legislative department? They have provided in their report, that cities may, for the purpose of representation, be separated from the counties in which they are situated, whenever the public necessities may require it. Thus far I am willing to go. But I do object to bringing into this convention a proposition to create separate tribunals in Louisville, from Jefferson, and to provide for the election of different officers. The gentleman from Jefferson submitted this proposition to me, I say it in justice to him, and I told him that I did not believe that our constituency expected this move to be made—that so far as engrafting a general declaratory provision that the legislature may, from time to time, act in regard to the establishment of municipal courts and privileges, and the election of officers in cities and counties, I had no objection, but I did not want this last clause of the proposition carried before this convention. I wanted nothing more than a general declaratory clause, applicable not only to the city of Louisville, but to other cities. I dislike this special legislation, even in the legislature, but much less should it enter into the proceedings of this convention. And it was for this reason, I asked the attention of this convention to the subject. If they go on in this way, other counties may desire a division, or the creation of new counties in the state, and all the perplexing consequences resulting from the admission of such a principle, would flow into the convention, to disturb and embarrass its action. Why is the separate organization of these offices, referred to in the last clause of this gentleman's amendment, sought, unless it be to commence in advance, this movement of the democracy upon the whig ascendancy in the city and county? The county court decides the county levy, but those members of it who are appointed from the city do not exercise that right. If the gentleman however, apprehends that the county court system proposed by the committee on that subject, is to be carried into effect, and believes that the city of Louisville should not have the right to vote with the county of Jefferson, for these judges who are to decide the levy with the county, why I am willing that this matter shall be referred to the committee of thirty, for part of the subject matter falls within, as I consider, their jurisdiction, to report a fair mode; but I am unwilling to tack to the end of this report, when the house is rather tired, and anxious to get through with it, a proposition for a distinct and utter separation of the city and county.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I am aware that a portion of the matters embraced in this amendment belongs more properly to the other committee, but a portion of it also belongs to the report now under consideration, and therefore, it is offered as an amendment here. I apprehend that the joint committee of thirty, have about as much to get along with, without any addition to their labors, and therefore, I cannot accede to that portion of the gentleman's proposition. I regret extremely that the gentleman has thought it necessary to introduce the terms whig and democrat here; his motive is with himself. As for myself, I have come here prepared to vote and speak without reference to the whigs or democrats in any way whatever. But I will proceed to answer the objections of the gentleman. He seems to think I propose a separation of the city and county. You, Mr. President, know that I have stood here as a representative in the legislature, from Jefferson county, for many years in opposition to that separation, and the creation of a new county. But if you do not go as far as my amendment proposes, a separation will be effected, unless indeed, you adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Wickliffe) which provides that no new county shall be created, unless it contains a certain number of square miles, and which proposition under the circumstances, I cannot go for. And if you do adopt the proposition of the gentleman from Nelson, and do not adopt this, then we are tied up forever, as a portion of the county of Jefferson, and then if you adopt the proposition that has been reported, with reference to county courts, we never can obtain justice. What is our condition there now? The mayor and council of Louisville imposes the taxes on the city, and disburses them, but here you will give to Louisville, having five thousand voters, and Jefferson, having but two thousand five hundred, the right to vote in the election of the men who are to impose taxes on Jefferson, and disburse their revenues. Is that right? You give us no power in voting for mayor and council, who levy your taxes, and disburse your revenue—none; and we want none, but I do object to a population of five thousand being permitted to vote in the election of officers who are to levy our taxes, and disburse our revenues. Why, I have been taught to believe, that taxation and representation, should go hand in hand, in this government.

But the gentleman does not object to giving the power to the legislature. He says that our constituencies have not been consulted on the subject, and probably he wishes to consult his. Of course my rule of action should not govern him, but I have never thought it necessary to ask my constituents what I shall do. I do what I believe to be right, and trust to the decision of that constituency if the action be right or not. I introduced the term "any city" in my amendment, because other cities may occupy the same relation to their counties, as Louisville does to Jefferson, but I do not make it obligatory on them thus to act. As to the gentleman's objection to the county of Jefferson being allowed, by constitutional provision, to elect their officers, is he not aware that an election will take place before the legislature meets? A county court then will be elected for four years, with power to grind down Jefferson, and a majority of two thirds voting for their election, who have no interest in the matter. Besides, I wish to preserve the symmetry of the thing, if nothing else, and therefore, if it is proper that we shall have a separate county court, it is just as proper that we should have a clerk for it also. The gentleman says if this proposition is adopted, we may be flooded with propositions of a similar character. But there is not a city in the state, which is similarly situated, and whose population entitles it to a separate representation, and therefore, there is no apprehension to be entertained on that score. Believing as I do, that the good sense of this convention will at once see the propriety of this measure, I submit it to them.

Mr. BROWN. As this question involves in some degree, the interests of the President, I move that we go into committee of the whole, in order that he may have an opportunity of participating in the discussion.

The PRESIDENT. It is not necessary for me. I am not in favor of the amendment as offered, though I am willing that the legislature should give the cities separate representations when they are entitled to it. I have no desire to address the convention on the subject.

Mr. PRESTON. I am in favor of any proposition that will apply equally to all the cities of the state. The cities of Covington, of Newport, and Paducah, and probably under the the new railroad improvement, the city of Henderson, may desire this thing, and all may be effected by the legislature. As I before stated, I desire no special legislation in the constitution at all. If the gentleman will draft a general proposition, giving a general power to the legislature to establish courts with separate municipal rights and privileges, and with the power of electing separate local officers, it is my belief, that I shall go for it. But to attempt, in this manner, to divide Louisville from Jefferson county, I do most strenuously protest against. There has been no petition, no movement on the part of the people, no public desire manifested for such a separation; and the result would be, that the courts still being separate for all municipal purposes, would yet sit in the same place. The people of Jefferson would have to say to those of Louisville, we will not trust you with the election, but still we claim the right of sitting in town. In other words, there would be two counties in one—a sort of political monster, unknown in the country. And it would produce such a jumble, that for the present, at least, I find it impossible to see through it.

Now I admit, in some degree, the justice of my friend's remark, and confess I was hurried a little too far, a moment since, in using the words whig and democrat. I should be glad never to hear those terms used in this house, but still I only spoke the plain truth. All the county officers of Jefferson would be obliged to come to Louisville, where the court house was erected, to reside and do their business, and what a confusion would this create? I hope the gentleman will suffer his proposition to go to the committee of thirty, or that he will amend it as I have suggested.

Mr. RUDD. This is certainly a new matter to me, and one which I have never heard spoken of until I came to this convention. I can hardly see the object to be attained or the advantages to be derived from its adoption. I do not see that it will be either a benefit to the city of Louisville or the county of Jefferson. They have heretofore mutually acted together, so much so that it has really become a matter of difficulty to tell whether a man is a citizen of the county or of the city. And yet the gentleman generally understands pretty well what he is after, and is pretty keen in viewing things in advance, and there may be advantages to be derived from the separation that I have not yet discovered. I have, it is true, given no reflection to the subject, but yet it seems to me that Jefferson county will certainly be the loser by the separation. As to the magistracy of the county, the majority was on the side of Jefferson, and I have never yet heard the first man complain of the action of the magistracy of Louisville in regard to them. They generally acted cordially together. The public property, the court house, etc., is the common property of the city and the county, and it is located in the city of Louisville. My opinion is, that if you once provide for the election of a separate and distinct magistracy, sheriff and clerk for each, it will follow, as a matter of course, that there will be a separate jail and court, and thus finally two separate and distinct counties. And what benefit would result to either? It reminds me of some of the emancipationists who clamored so loudly for the freedom of the blacks, without pointing out one solitary mode by which it was to be done, or where the black or the white race was to be benefited, and yet they wanted at once to sacrifice $61,000,000 of property. The expense for new public buildings would be heavy on the people of Jefferson, and therein at least I think the gentleman would be doing his constituents a positive injury. As for the matter of political ascendancy in either the county or city, I think that in framing this constitution such considerations should be laid aside and forgotten. But who knows but what at the very next election that comes off the city of Louisville may not be thrown on the side of the democracy, or that the county which is now democratic may not become whig? This new constitution we are about to frame will certainly introduce a new order of things. Nor does any man know upon what side he may be thrown. I am a whig, as firm and staunch as any in the state, and yet if I saw that party adopting a wrong policy I would vote against them to-morrow. I am governed by principle and that alone. But in framing an organic law which is to govern not only the present generation but posterity, considerations of this kind should be disregarded and the general good alone kept in view.

I should really regret very much to see any collision grow up between the city and the county on this subject, and as for the gentleman himself, he has often stood up for Louisville manfully, and we of the city would dislike very much to loose his aid by a division. I hope therefore, we shall remain united, unless some palpable, tangible injury would be inflicted on Jefferson county thereby, which can be pointed out so plainly that no man can mistake it. For myself, I want neither legislative nor constitutional separation. Let us remain where we are. United, we form a large population and command respect throughout the state from our numbers; and I desire that we shall retain that position. The county derives great advantages from its connection with the city. It has increased in population thereby, and in the valuation of real estate, and the citizens of the county derive many other benefits in the way of the city magistracy and other conveniences. The city certainly has never thrown any obstacles in the way of the county, none at all; and has always permitted the county magistracy to levy their tax as they please. And as for taxes, we are taxed almost to death in Louisville. The taxes amount to about two-fifths of our whole income, and even the legislature of the state made us pay one half per cent. for improving the public lands where the state derived three or four per cent. of benefit. This is one of the most gross acts of injustice ever inflicted upon a community; and I hope another legislature will remedy it. But this is not the point of discussion.

I hope the convention will not interfere with this matter or attempt to partition this county as proposed in the gentleman's amendment. The people of the city and county are one and the same people almost. It is true I have no connection in this county, but my wife has, and I want that we shall hereafter, as heretofore, all keep together. I have no connection scarcely of my own, standing as I do, pretty much alone; and therefore, I want no divorcing in this matter. I hope the gentleman will therefore withdraw his proposition, and allow us to go on together as we have heretofore, hand in hand and heart in heart. We are improving in the city of Louisville, and our population and business is increasing. The dutch population too, was spreading over the county and doing much good, and teaching the would-be-fashionable young men how to earn an honest living, by the cultivation of the land. We are a mixed people—we have Italians, French, Germans and Dutch, and yet we are all united. They are spreading over the land of the county, turning the wilderness into productive gardens. All this was for the benefit of Jefferson county, as well as for the city of Louisville, and the county would therefore lose rather than gain by the separation. If the gentleman has any land he wants to sell, I can insure a half dozen Germans ready to purchase it for garden purposes. I hope the gentleman will conclude to withdraw his proposition, and let this matter rest.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I deprecate a separation as much as the gentleman. It is what I have been against for years, as all know. Why do they wish to make it appear that I am for a separation? Is it a separation that I propose? To some extent it is, but the gentleman last up has given the strongest reason for a separation. Did he not tell us that the city of Louisville was taxing her citizens to death? Will you give them the power to tax the whole county of Jefferson to death? But he says he wants all to go together. Would it not be as well for the gentleman to withdraw his opposition, and then we shall all be together. I would be perfectly content to leave it with the legislature except for the reason that one election must take place before the legislature can act. You take the proposition that there are to be three members of the county court; they must lay the tax and disburse the revenue. Will the county of Jefferson get more than one member of the county court? The city of Louisville has a relative population greater than all the rest of Jefferson county, and one member of the court will be as many as the county can expect. Then comes the process of taxing to death and the disbursement of that tax. Is that right? I am willing to leave it to the legislature, but I am not disposed to run the risk of being left in this position for four years. My colleague is absent on account of sickness in his family, but it is a point on which he and I have conversed and about which we are agreed.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I rise to correct the mistake into which the gentleman from Jefferson has fallen. He says there will be no legislature convened before an election will take place. No election can take place till the legislature has convened. As far as I can form an opinion it is the intention of the convention that an election shall take place in August 1850. The first officers elected under the new constitution will be the legislative and executive officers created by it. They will have to carry out the provisions of the constitution in reference to the election of officers, and I believe the committee has fixed in their own mind that the first election of the judicial and county officers shall be in April or May 1851. The legislature will be elected in August 1850 and the other officers cannot be elected till the following spring.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I cannot for the life of me see what is in contemplation in the minds of the committee or of the convention. If the constitution as now reported is adopted, it will not be as the gentleman has stated. I would be perfectly content to have it arranged in that way, if the election were not to take place as I supposed, but according to the report of the committee, such is not the fact. We are to vote on the constitution in April or May next. The election of officers under the constitution will take place in the summer or fall following. The present constitution provides for an election at another period and there will be an election unless these provisions are altered.

The question was then taken on the amendment, by ayes and noes on the call of Mr. PRESTON, and it resulted thus—yeas 24, noes 61.

Mr. MERIWETHER then moved to strike out all the latter portion of the section in relation to the election of officers.

Mr. PRESTON suggested that it would be better to postpone the further consideration of this subject for the present.

Mr. MERIWETHER assented, and the further consideration of the whole subject was postponed accordingly.

NEW COUNTIES.

On the motion of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, the convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. JAMES in the chair, on the report of the select committee in relation to the formation of new counties. The secretary read the article as follows:

UK
LIBRARY

ARTICLE —.

Sec. 1. No new county shall be formed with an area of less than three hundred and fifty square miles; nor shall such new county be formed, if by doing so it reduces any county out of which it shall be formed, in whole or in part, below an area of four hundred square miles; and in running the lines or boundary of such new county, no such line shall run nearer than ten miles of the county seat of any county.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I will offer, on my own responsibility, an amendment which I think will carry out the views of the select committee, though I have not had the opportunity to submit my amendment to them.

"Nor shall any new county be created, if the county or counties, out of which the same shall be formed, in whole or part, shall be reduced in the number of qualified voters below the ratio of representation for the time being."

I presume there is not a member present in this convention, who is not fully sensible of the evil of the multiplication of the number of counties in this commonwealth, and I think it is our duty to prescribe some limitation on future legislation, which will give stability to the counties as at present organized. The committee could base their action on no better criterion than the number of square miles, and in this article it is provided that no new county shall consist of less than three hundred and fifty square miles, and no old county shall be reduced below four hundred square miles. The amendment that I propose contemplates another condition, and that is, that no old county shall be reduced below the ratio of representation as established by law. With these guarantees fixed, I think we may look forward to something like peace in forming new counties, and none will be made, except the mass of the people require a separate county organization.

Mr. MACHEN. I regret that this question is brought up to-day. As an individual member of this house, I regret that it has come here at all. It does seem to me, that before we finish, we shall have placed sufficient clogs upon this constitution to weigh it down to death. In endeavoring to carry out the principles of conservatism, which seem to be so highly appreciated on this floor, I think this will be the result. I stand here the representative of a divided people on this question. It may be their misfortune to be divided, and mine to be their representative here, but when that principle is placed in the constitution, I think I cannot be mistaken in stating to this house, that more than half the county is against you, no matter how wholesome the balance of the constitution may be. I know that gentlemen who reside in old counties where every thing is settled to their satisfaction may contend that no further change shall be made in municipal regulations for the convenience of the country. But I hold that the people are competent to determine whether their convenience requires a change, and when you tie their hands and say they shall no longer exercise the power of free volition on these matters, as was said to Sampson under the pillars, that his hands should no longer be loosed, they will rise in their majesty and burst the cords by which they are bound, and they will show that they have rights although they are minorities.

I am no disorganizer. I advocate no disorganizing principles, but the rights of minorities. What is the condition of this state? Look at the map. Have counties been arranged with reference to territorial beauty or symmetry of form, or even with a view, in all cases, to convenience? I assert that no such principle has been carried out. Population has been concentrated in one portion, by certain surrounding circumstances, and the other portion of the county asks that they may have a separate organization. The weight of population for the time being determines where the county seat shall be, and as the more remote portions are settled, that county seat becomes inconvenient. Now, what are the people to do under these circumstances? Shall the convenience of those who originally organized and gave shape to the county be consulted, or the convenience of the majority within the limits of the county? It is for the aggrieved to come forward and show their grievances, and it is the duty of the legislative department to redress these grievances. I am told that it is a matter of economy. What is the purpose or government? It is that the greatest good may be secured to the greatest number of citizens. How is this to be accomplished? By having local accommodations, to bring the business of every man near to him. What was the doctrine respecting the branching the court of appeals? It was, that justice might be brought to every man's door. I take it that the same principle runs into the organization of counties. They are built up and circumscribed, for the purpose of bringing business convenient to the inhabitants, and for promoting the ends of justice. Who shall say that this shall be withheld from the people?

As I said before, those who are well situated may, perhaps, satisfy themselves that it is proper and right to tie the hands of others. For one, I will not do it. My health is not good to-day, and I trust the subject will not now be acted upon, as I desire to be heard in reference to it. It will prove a dead weight on the constitution, and shall we, for the purpose of carrying out our sectional views, or promoting our sectional convenience, place that in the constitution which will be the death of it? One tells us that a certain thing will be the death of it, and another says another thing will do it. Every man knows that this thing will carry a tremendous vote with it. Look at the position of Fayette county, and the other central counties. What is their size, compared with many other counties? They are not half the dimensions of some others, and yet they are satisfactorily arranged. They wish for no division, but shall they withhold the power of dividing from those which do wish it?

Let the voice of the people prevail in the legislative hall, and I know that although the legislature does frequently run wild, the voice of the people will be heard; and we have no other way of having it heard. There has been a disinclination, for years, to organizing new counties, and on this subject the legislature may be trusted. More than one-half the counties are satisfied with their present organization. They will not hastily, and without due reflection, establish a new county, and I think we may safely leave the whole matter to the legislature, without having their hands tied.

Mr. HARDIN. I had occasion to turn my attention to this subject when an effort was made to cut up the county in which I live, and I will venture to say this state has more counties than any other state in this Union, according to the number of square miles, unless it be Ohio. New York has a territory of about 48,000 square miles and 58 counties; Pennsylvania has a population of about 2,000,000; 48,000 square miles, and some 60 odd counties; Maryland has a population of 500,000, with more than half the territory of Kentucky, and 11 counties; and Virginia has 100 counties and 63,000 square miles. Ohio went off in the same kind of mistaken policy in reference to counties; but it is now provided in the constitution of that state that no new county shall be made having less than 400 square miles. In Mississippi, the smallest counties contain 375 square miles. I was very glad when my colleague presented this proposition. I inquired of him why he did not make 400 the lowest number. He replied that he wanted to make room for a few new counties, and that is the reason he fixed upon 350 square miles. Now, I think this will accommodate the gentleman from Caldwell. He has provided very judiciously that no county shall be encroached upon, and also that no county shall be reduced below 400 square miles. If there are grievances in relation to the size of counties, those grievances can be provided for by this resolution. But as I have before said, there is a place where we must stop. We cannot always grant all that is petitioned for. We know how this thing starts, and there is no end to it when it is started. A man wants to be a county clerk, and he will press it; and here is a man out of office, and he will press it; and then there are men who want the seat of justice nearer their town, and they will press it; and where there is a little miserable town at the cross roads, the people there will press it; so it is that a thousand little petty interests are brought to bear in the making of new counties. Now, I do not think that a man gets any advantage from living in one of these little chicken stealing towns. It may furnish a market for the neighboring country, but it brings in a squad of free negroes who steal. I hope something of this kind will prevail. I have never heard of a measure more demanded than this is in the part of the state from which I came.

Mr. BROWN. I regret that this matter has come up now. I think this provision would be imposing too much of a restriction upon the power of the legislature in forming new counties. My constituents are somewhat interested in this matter, and I would like myself to have the consideration of this subject postponed for the present. It may be that the provision of the report can be so shaped that it will not affect seriously the interests of my constituents. I hope it will be postponed till we are prepared to meet it as we desire.

Mr. TRIPLETT. There are three or four delegates on this floor in rather a delicate position in casting their votes on this subject. I am somewhat in the condition of the gentleman from Caldwell. I have no inclination to sit quietly, as Sampson did, in the lap of Delilah, and have my strength shorn away. There are counties where individuals are compelled to travel from twenty to twenty five miles to get to the county seat. There have been several propositions, as the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) well knows, to divide my county. My position in relation to that county is such that it may be supposed I am opposed to the division of the county. I do not know whether there is a sufficient number of square miles in that county to allow of its division according to the required plan. I think we had better let the subject lie over for the present. I am in favor of the general principle contained in the proposition of the chairman of the committee.

I am not one of those who believe that when we leave this hall, all the virtue, intelligence, and integrity, of the state will depart. Other gentlemen will come here having practical common sense and virtue enough to carry on the government. Unless they have, there will be no use for a constitution at all. I do not wish to leave any thing to the legislature that ought not to be left to them. Draw the line of demarcation between the constitution and laws according to general principles, and I think smaller matters may be left with safety to the legislature.

Mr. MAYES. I will take this occasion now to remark that there is nothing so extraordinarily new in the proposition of the select committee, as that gentlemen need be alarmed at it. There are eleven new states of the union, having new constitutions, and the framers of which thought proper to guard against disorganization in making new counties, by inserting a provision in their constitutions, that the counties hereafter to be made should not be larger, or reduced to a smaller size, than a certain number of square miles. I have no disposition to press the proposition upon the house, if gentlemen are not sufficiently informed on the subject to be able to discuss it at this time. It is an important subject, and one in which the people of Kentucky have felt, and do feel, a deep interest. I am satisfied the people of this state look to the convention, to put some restriction on the legislature, in regard to forming new counties. I entertain no doubt about it. At the proper time, I have some statistics on the subject, which I wish to present to the consideration of the convention; for I desire that they shall see the making of new counties costs the state a great deal of money. I am also solicitous to prove to them that one great source, out of which has grown a large expenditure of money, has been the erection of new counties. And I wish to show them that the private interests of private individuals have suffered from the practice of making new counties, for a particular purpose. All these facts will be substantiated, with a view to be reflected upon, and then we should calmly and deliberately determine whether this thing should be checked—not stopped, but checked, and a wholesome restriction put on the legislature. Kentucky contains forty thousand five hundred square miles, and one hundred counties; and there is but one state of the whole union, composed of thirty states, which has a greater number of counties, and that is Virginia, which has a population of one-third more than this state. Year after year, when the legislature meets, there are numerous applications made for new counties; not that justice may be brought to the door of the people, but to advance the interest of some one who wishes to be made a clerk, or something of that sort. I could show, if it were necessary, that there is no danger of the constitution losing strength if this feature should be incorporated in it. It will add to the strength of it. If it is not inserted, as I believe it ought to be, it being called for by the people, there will be much dissatisfaction manifested by them. I have discovered, during the sittings of this convention, that it is a very ready argument with some gentlemen, when they are opposed to a proposition, to say that it will greatly clog the constitution when it comes to be submitted to the people, and probably cause it to be rejected. If it be right and proper to incorporate this feature in the constitution, the people will approve it, and I have no idea it will be considered a weight on it. But I want gentlemen to have time, in order that they may avail themselves of all the necessary means of information, to enable them to give a vote in accordance with their wishes, and therefore, I move that the committee rise.

The committee rose accordingly, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

COMMITTEE OF ARRANGEMENT AND REVISION.

Mr. McHENRY offered the following resolution, which was agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of ten delegates be appointed, to be styled the committee of arrangements, whose duty it shall be take into consideration the several articles that have been agreed to by the convention, and that may be agreed to hereafter, and arrange, revise, and classify the same.

FEES OF CLERKS AND SHERIFFS.

Mr. HAMILTON offered the following resolution, and it was rejected:

Resolved, That the legislature, at the first session after the adoption of the new constitution, shall appoint three fit persons to examine into the propriety of reducing the fees of clerks and sheriffs, and to report the same, with a list of what the fees ought to be.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion of Mr. MAYES, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Chambers for a few days.

On motion of Mr. WOODSON, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Taylor, for five days.

COMMISSIONERS ON ACCOUNTS.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following resolution, and it was agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee on the public debt, be instructed to enquire into the expediency of establishing, by constitutional provision, a board of commissioners, to be appointed annually by the governor, or by the judges of the court of appeals, one from each appellate district, whose duty it shall be to make annual examinations and settlements of the accounts of the several receiving and disbursing officers of the state at large, and to report the same, when made, to the legislature.

COUNTY AND DISTRICT OFFICES.

The convention resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the executive and ministerial offices for counties and districts.

Mr. MERIWETHER withdrew the amendment which he offered yesterday, before the adjournment, and for that, he offered the following substitute:

"When any city or town shall have a separate representation, in either or both houses of the general assembly, the county in which such city or town may be situated, shall be invested with the privilege of having such separate municipal governments, courts, and offices, in the same manner as may be provided for separate counties; but such county may hold its courts, and have its public buildings and offices within, and jointly with, such city or town; and all public officers may reside therein."

Mr. PRESTON raised the question of order, that this amendment was not admissible, inasmuch as it was scarcely a modification of an amendment which the convention yesterday rejected.

The PRESIDENT overruled the point of order.

Mr. PRESTON then moved to refer the whole subject to the committee on county courts.

Mr. BULLITT. I prefer that the house should decide this question. It strikes me that we should do our own business, without the intervention of so many committees. I would prefer taking the sense of the convention upon it. It is a matter in which my county is deeply interested, and I wish to be able to record my vote upon it. If in order, I will now give my views upon this subject, and I will be very brief. I desire to do this now, because I have left a sick wife to come here, and may not be able to continue here.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman from Jefferson has the floor and will proceed.

Mr. BULLITT. The principle in this and all representative governments is, that representation and taxation shall go hand in hand. It was that principle which caused the separation of the U. States from Great Britain. It has been carried out in the U. States government, and in all our state governments. It is a subject so trite and so well understood, that I shall not detain the committee by giving my views upon it. The proposition of my colleague, in which I entirely concur, is intended to have a general bearing on all the counties in the state, which may have a city with a separate representation; but it applies particularly to the county of Jefferson, which has a large city in it, and both city and county have a separate representation on this floor. Why was there a separate representation to both city and county? It was to carry out the principle that taxation and representation should go hand in hand. The city having an entirely different set of interests, it was necessary that she should have a separate representation in the legislature.

We know that the interests of the city are peculiar. She has peculiar advantages derived from legislation, with her banks and various institutions, and she is bound to bear her peculiar burdens. Let her have her peculiar advantages and burdens. This is the reason why she has a separate representation, and why each people have a separate voice in laying the taxes which each must bear. Why has the city of Louisville a different organization from ours? We have our county court and a joint circuit court. Louisville has a chancery court, and a municipal court, which has a vast amount of business. The county organizations would not be sufficient for the city, and in carrying out that principle, for years back, if not from the first, the county, by law or by agreement, has her tax levied and disbursed by her own magistrates, while the city attends to her own taxes. We have got along in perfect harmony in this way, and if the present constitution and laws continue, I have no idea there will be any difficulty in the future. But what is now proposed, by entering into these details in the constitution, changes the relation between the city and county. The city having so large a majority, would control the whole in reference to number of judges and secure two, while the county would have but one. I desire to have our relations remain in statu quo, and the only way to do this, is to let the city have control and management of her own affairs, with which we have no wish to interfere. And there are good reasons why we should not. The people in each portion know their own business and what belongs to their own interests, and we ought to permit each to regulate its own affairs.

That is all we ask, because if a change is made, they having so large a majority, would place our interests in jeopardy. I have no idea it is the wish of the city of Louisville to oppress the county at all, but we have heretofore lived in the utmost harmony, and I desire that we may not be placed in the power of the city. Why should Jefferson county be in any manner under the control of the city which has a city chancellor, a mayor, and judge, and entire control of these matters with which we do not wish to interfere? I think the same principle applies in regard to county organization. This plan which we propose may be badly drawn, but what we desire is, that we may be placed in the same condition as other counties in the state. Why not separate, it may be asked? We do not wish to separate; and if we do, there is a difficulty in the way. We have public property to the amount of $100,000 in the city, which we do not want to give up. We simply ask that the present state of things may remain. The city has shown no disposition to meddle with our affairs, nor has the county any disposition to meddle with those of the city, but we want to stand on the footing of other counties as regards taxing, and as regards legislation and representation.

I know no other mode. We do not want to interfere with the circuit court. We do not want a jail. But why shall we not elect our judge, and our magistracy? And why not a sheriff as well as to take the deputy of the high sheriff? It is a county as large as many others. But I wish to call attention to the remarks of the gentlemen from Louisville (Mr. Preston.) He says: "Now what motive my friend from Jefferson, (Mr. Meriwether,) has in making this motion I cannot discover, unless indeed it be this: the county court clerks and sheriffs offices are valuable ones in the city of Louisville, and extend their jurisdiction both to city and county; the political divisions are such that there is a majority of whigs in the city of Louisville of some five hundred in a poll of five thousand votes, but in the county parties are nearly equally balanced out of a poll of two thousand five hundred votes, their being scarcely ever a majority either way of more than fifty. The majorities in the city of Louisville therefore at present controls the elections of those officers." Again he says: "Why is the separate organization of these offices referred to in the last clause of the gentleman's amendment sought, unless it be to commence in advance this movement of the democracy upon the whig ascendancy in the city and county." I regret to refer to this fact, and I do it with the utmost courtesy to the gentleman, for I mean nothing offensive to Louisville or its representative; he must pardon me, however, for differing from him on this subject. Supposing the facts to be as I have stated them, how do we stand? I stand here, commanded by the people of Jefferson, to know no distinction between whig and democrat on this floor, and at a large meeting in our county in which they solemnly determined to elect a whig and a democrat, they required the pledge that their delegates should know no parties here. I shall be found carrying out the spirit of this pledge, and I call on my democratic friends to note my vote in this particular. When we come to fix the ratio of representation I shall go for what I think right for the whole country. Whatever application this may have to my colleague, he can say for himself. We canvassed the county together, and a more honorable man I have never been with, and we stand pledged to know neither whig nor democrat. I have referred to this matter merely because I thought the remarks of my friend from Louisville bore the construction which I have given them.

Will any man here make a different constitution because it may have a whig or democratic bearing. I have always been a whig and expect ever to remain such. I voted for Gen. Harrison, Mr. Clay and Gen. Taylor for the Presidency; I never voted for a democrat except last summer. I would say for my county, that if she chooses to be democratic, she has as much right to be democratic as Louisville has to be whig. I do not want this thing held up in terrorem. I expect to be a whig, I want to stand or fall on principles; and if the county cannot support her whiggery, I do not wish to call on the city of Louisville for help. Shelby county has a whig majority of six or seven hundred. If the county of Jefferson is to be under whig rule, let us go to the county of Shelby. That being an agricultural county, the people know better what tax to lay on negroes, horses, and other stock. The people of Louisville have peculiar interests in the city of Louisville, which they have not in the county. But I must protest against the idea that there is any intention to effect this thing for the sake of whiggery or democracy. Have I not shown the strongest possible reason that we should stand in statu quo? Is there a man who can say that I ask any thing that is unreasonable, that the county shall have the sole right to elect the officers who shall lay and disburse the county revenue? It seems to me that if the matter is properly considered, gentlemen will agree with me.

Mr. KELLY. I think the committee on the county court is not the proper committee, and I move to refer the subject to the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. BULLITT. This applies to all the counties. The city of Louisville is not mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. KELLY. I think the committee on the legislative department is the proper one, as they can make a general provision by which all grievances of this kind can be met. This may be a private fight, however, and I will not interfere.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. This proposition seems to be one which I cannot well comprehend. It is to have two county court organizations in the same county, to have two sheriffs, and two clerks' offices for registering deeds and wills, whose jurisdiction shall be co-extensive with the bounds of the county. I admit there is weight in the ideas suggested by both the gentlemen from Jefferson upon the subject of the revenue and the county taxes. I do not know that the mode of organizing the county courts, as contemplated by the committee, will contain any constitutional inhibition which will prevent the legislature from meeting the difficulty in this case. The legislature will not be prohibited from giving to any county a tribunal for levying the revenue. They may make the magistracy a tribunal for this purpose, for the county levy is not imposed on the citizens of the city, nor can the levy of the city be imposed on the citizens of the county. The county court as now organized, sitting in Louisville, has heretofore, by some legislative enactment, exercised the power of taxation outside of the city. They now control this business by a kind of common consent. Now if the evil be as the gentleman has supposed, why may they not give to the county of Jefferson a board for taxing the citizens separate from the city of Louisville? There is no inhibition, and I think it will be a much more congruous arrangement than to have this double county court in the same county. I rose with a desire to preserve harmony in the provisions of the constitution, and I think they would be any thing but harmonious with double county courts sitting at the same time, or at different times, with two sheriffs, one running into the city of Louisville and the other in the county of Jefferson. These are evils which I think should not be engrafted in the constitution, and it would be much better to leave the legislature to act on the subject. Let the magistracy be organized into a board to impose taxes, or let them adopt any other system which may be deemed appropriate.

Mr. PRESTON. I do not desire to take up the time of the house on this matter. The reason that I resisted the proposition was not for the purpose of placing the county of Jefferson under the dominion of the city of Louisville, or that the city should have the power of exercising any political tyranny over the county. The gentleman from Jefferson who presented the resolution, moved in the first part of it, only those things which the legislature already have the right and power to do; but in the latter part, he urged a proposition, with that parliamentary dexterity for which he is remarkable, which would permit the county to be cut in two by a sort of proviso. It says, in effect, that the county and city shall be divided until further orders. That there shall be distinct sheriffs, clerks, and municipal tribunals and officers. The resolution containing that provision was voted down yesterday by a majority of about fifty eight to twenty four.

So far as I yesterday used the terms whig and democrat, I said, I could conceive no other reason, no other practical object in this measure but to produce a county contest for local officers. I, Mr. Chairman, have been indebted to my democratic friends as well as to my whig friends for my place on this floor, and I am happy to have received substantial testimonials of kindness from both parties in the only political canvass I ever made. For the remark I made I have no apology to offer; I said I saw no reason for dividing the city and county, but to have a county race for county officers, and I yet see none, as I have no knowledge of any existing grievances which demand such redress.

What would be the mode of levying the county revenue, if the resolution of the gentleman were to fail? It would be the very same which has prevailed for the last eight or ten years. The only difference would be, that instead of the appointment of a magistracy by the governor, on the recommendation of the county court, the people under the new constitution will elect them; yet the gentleman seems to think such a magistracy, so chosen, would impose intolerable burthens, by taxation, on the people of Jefferson before the legislature could convene.

That the general assembly have a right to provide for the appointment of a separate clerk of the court and sheriff in the city of Louisville, and to invest it with the separate rights of a county, there can be little doubt. But to claim that the county of Jefferson shall have separate elections, officers and courts, and yet come to the city to hold those courts, would be like demanding that new counties should be established, but yet should have the right to hold their courts at the county seat.

If the gentleman desires a general declaratory provision, I have no objection to it; but it is only acting in reference to that which the legislature will have a right to do, whether we act on it or not. I am willing to say that a board of county magistracy may lay the levy and disburse it; but I am opposed to a division of the county and city, with separate sheriffs and county officers, having a mixed jurisdiction. According to the resolution the legislature would be compelled to divide the city and county, for that is imperative. It declares that the county and city shall be divided. It says, "the city or town shall be invested," &c. I believe it is more advisable for this convention to refer this matter to the action of the legislature which shall convene under the new constitution, than to attempt to regulate it themselves.

I am not certain that the city of Louisville would not be willing that this arrangement should be hereafter made; but there has been, as yet, no petition from any quarter on this subject, no public movement on the part of the citizens before the election, and it would be unprecedented to consummate such an act under such circumstances. It seems inappropriate for this convention to enter upon such duties, and for these reasons I am opposed to it. I, therefore, to manifest the arrangement to which I would assent, offer this as a substitute.

"Cities or towns, entitled to separate representation, may be invested with the privilege of a separate municipal government, and of having separate courts and separate officers, in the same manner provided for separate counties, and on such terms and conditions as the general assembly may by law provide."

Mr. MERIWETHER. From indisposition, I have been unable to enter at length into this discussion, but I beg the indulgence of the house, while I give some reason for the adoption of my amendment. The gentleman from Louisville says it is now a separation if that amendment is adopted. I use the same language with reference to counties, that the gentlemen of the committee used with reference to cities. What is the language of the report of the committee on the legislative department?

"Provided, That when it shall appear to the legislature, that any city or town hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such city or town shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation, in both houses of the general assembly."

I use that language to meet the contingency, that a county may have the privilege of separate municipal government; and I ask why, when a city may claim a separate municipal government, you turn us over to the legislature? Is the proposition right? Then why not act on it here? Will not this proposition be met by the same resistance in the legislature, that it meets here? Why provide for every county, whether she wishes a separate representation or not, and turn us over to be taxed with the city of Louisville? The gentleman from Nelson says, this can all be regulated by law. Suppose it can. Does it follow that we should not act on it here? Is there any provision introduced into this constitution, that the legislature should not have provided for? Are we to leave all to the legislature? Surely not. Then why not let the constitution bear on this point?

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I did not say, if we passed the constitution as proposed, the legislature would have power to do what the gentleman desires to do. I said, the legislature had power to remove the only evil of which complaint was made, in the reason given for the adoption of this principle. I will read the act that relates to the regulation of the business of the county court of Jefferson, and other purposes.

"That from and after the passage of this act, the justices of the peace of Jefferson county, residing without the limits of Louisville, shall constitute the court for laying the levy of the county of Jefferson, and appropriating and disbursing the same; and the justices of the peace of said county, residing in Louisville, shall not preside in laying the levy in the county of Jefferson, or in appropriating or disbursing the same."

Now, if you pass the provision in reference to county courts, as proposed, all the evils in representation and taxation can be avoided.

Mr. MERIWETHER. It must be recollected that under the old constitution, the taxing power in the county was not elected by the county at large. The county court appointed resident magistrates, such as might be thought necessary throughout the county, and if the gentleman had looked a little further, he would have seen that the city of Louisville would not have more than seven magistrates. But it is now proposed that this county shall have three judges, to be elected by the voters of the city and county jointly; and I will ask you, if the city has five thousand votes, and the county two thousand five hundred, which will control in the election? Does it not properly belong to the county court to lay the levy, and disburse the taxes? Then, if the city join with the county, in the election of a county court judge, we shall never have a resident of the county a member of that court.

My honorable friend from the city of Louisville, remarked yesterday, that he could see no motive I could possibly have for making this proposition, unless it was to get up a party race in the county, that the democrats might stand a chance. The gentleman has done me injustice, and I humbly conceive he does himself injustice, when he submits a proposition of that kind. Had I as little charity as the gentleman, might I not charge that he wanted to confine the whig majority of the county to the city of Louisville? But I will not do this. I believe the gentleman is actuated by no such motive. Might I not also, if I had the same amount of charity for the frailties of others as he appears to have, charge that the gentleman was determined to confine the county of Jefferson to the city, and oppress her by taxation, till the county would be forced to petition for a new county, in order to get clear of the burden? And that would leave $100,000 in possession of the city, which the county had contributed toward the public buildings. But I am confident the gentleman is actuated by no such motive. But, says the gentleman, why should we claim to hold our courts in the city of Louisville, if we, in the county, have a separate organization? The reason is, because we have paid upwards of $80,000 toward the erection of public buildings, $75,000 of which was for the court house, and $16,000 toward a jail, and we claim the right of holding our courts there, because we have expended our money in the erection of these public buildings. Is it any inconvenience to the city? The court house is capacious enough for us all. It is no inconvenience. We now hold our separate courts there, on such days as to prevent any inconvenience. We have contributed $16,000 toward the jail, and we claim the right to confine in that building those who may violate the laws. On account of indisposition, I shall say no more at present. I shall leave this matter to the convention. Let them dispose of it as they may think proper, and I will bow in humble submission. I have discharged my duty to those who sent me here.

Mr. TURNER. There is a great principle involved in this case with respect to which it may be necessary to say a word. I think no people should be taxed unless by the vote of those who pay the tax. I think the proposition should come up in connection with the report of the committee on the legislative department. I think some provision should be made, so that the cities growing up on the Ohio shall not finally control the agricultural portion of the state. I want the agricultural interest to govern the legislation of the county. That question is involved in this case between the representatives of the city and the county. By legislating for the agricultural interest we may avoid being governed by the influence of our cities, as they are in the state of New York. The policy of states which are controlled by a few large cities, is as shifting as the wind. This is especially true with regard to the state of New York, of which it is said, as goes the city so goes the Empire state. I protest against basing representation exclusively on population, in order to avoid being influenced by large cities. I am willing to go with the gentleman from Jefferson as far as respects the principle of taxation outside of the city, that it should be exclusively within the power of those outside to levy and disburse the revenue. Otherwise you may select people in the city to tax those out of it with whom they have not a common sympathy. But, I am in hopes that this county court, as indicated, will not be organized, or if so, organized on different principles, and that we shall have one, or three judges, but I am in favor of one, and that the magistracy of the district may levy and disburse the money. This will be acting on the same principle as the legislature of the state. The legislature levies a tax on every part of the commonwealth. Suppose, that instead of having this done by the legislature, you authorize the governor, treasurer, and comptroller to do it, would the people be satisfied? It would be a levy made by a few individuals, and not by the representatives of the people. I would suggest to the gentleman to withdraw his proposition for the present, for I think this can be satisfactorily arranged when we come to that point. I do not think, nor do I suppose any gentleman believes that the county court of the city of Louisville ought to lay a tax for the balance of the county, although it may have the power to do so, because the great body of the voters will be in that portion of the county.

Mr. PRESTON. The gentleman from Madison has precisely apprehended what I think we should do. We do not desire to tax the county of Jefferson through any representative selected by us. If the gentleman from Jefferson will withdraw his resolution, and propose that a board of magistrates shall lay the county levy, and the magistrates of the city of Louisville have nothing to do with it, I am willing. I am opposed to having separate courts, separate clerks, and separate municipal organizations.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not know that I was understood by the gentleman from Louisville. I am decidedly opposed to separate organizations.

My opposition is based upon principle against giving the legislature power to create too distinct organizations in one county.

Mr. RUDD. Both the gentlemen seem to have a great desire to be heard on the subject of dividing the city of Louisville from the county of Jefferson, for the whole tenor and scope of the resolution, offered by the gentleman (Mr. Meriwether), and which is before the house is to that effect, and is susceptible of no other meaning. I am, perhaps, as well, if not better acquainted with the county of Jefferson as the gentleman who first spoke, but not the last, for he has been, I believe, in every house in the county, and I have not. I have large interests in the county of Jefferson outside of the city of Louisville, and I pay my taxes to it punctually, without having any voice in the direction of its affairs. I want the county to understand what was the character and force of the arguments of the gentleman representing Jefferson. The gentleman, (Mr. Bullitt,) in the course of his remarks adverted to the principle adopted in all representative governments, that representation and taxation should go hand in hand, and he did so in order to prove that the county of Jefferson has been taxed not according to its population and its own representation but the representation of the city of Louisville. Now an effort was made to impress the convention that this is a fact, but there is not a particle of truth in it, not that I mean to say the gentleman has made a wilful misrepresentation. Both the gentlemen well knew that a law was passed giving to the county of Jefferson, solely and entirely the power to have its own magistracy impose its own taxes, and collect and disburse its revenue. Neither the city of Louisville, nor any man in it, has had anything to do with the management of the affairs of that county. And yet they come forward and say that, according to the new judicial system, about to be adopted, Louisville will have a great ascendancy and advantage over the county of Jefferson, on account of its larger population. We do not desire any such thing, and do not ask it. We wish Jefferson to regulate its own affairs. We know it would not like to bear a portion of the taxation of Louisville—for that is more than double what its people have to pay. No they do not ask it nor do they want it.

The gentleman last up said (and I do not know where he obtained his information, which astonished me) that the county of Jefferson has disbursed for the erection of a court house and jail, the sum of eighty thousand dollars. I have been a member of the city council for many years, and I know that when the county of Jefferson has been called upon to pay up its proportion of money, on account of public improvements, it did not advance more than thirty thousand dollars. If it has given a larger sum, the fact has escaped my memory. If there be any thing to show that the county has done so, then I am very much mistaken. All the money went through the hands of the city council, and was paid out by them, to those who contracted for the erection of the buildings, and I being a member of it, had as good an opportunity of knowing all about the matter as any one in this house. The buildings were erected at the joint expense of the city of Louisville and the county of Jefferson, and the repairs are kept up by the citizens of Louisville. The city and county defray the expenses of maintaining the circuit and county courts, the jail, &c. Although there are five thousand voters in the city of Louisville, and but two thousand five hundred in the county of Jefferson, yet Louisville pays one half of these expenses. The bills have to pass the county court, and if it decides they are correct, they are paid by the city. Here you see the lesser power ruling the greater. The county has an equal share in our police court. It is always open to them. It is supported wholly at the expense of the city, which pays I think, two hundred dollars—I do not recollect exactly the sum—over and above what is appropriated by the legislature, in order to procure the services of a competent officer to preside over the court. Our chancery court is, likewise, thrown open to the citizens of the county as well as to those of the city. Louisville being centrally situated, almost every man comes there to transact his business. If the county were to be separated from the city, then the best position in which to place the county seat would be in the suburbs of Louisville.

Now, I think I can see what is the object and aim of this movement. It is, sir, to obtain a separate jurisdiction; to have courts, sheriffs, clerks, and a magistracy exclusively their own. They want a municipality or county court, just outside of Louisville, and then claim to have it in the city, because they know it would be unpopular in the county, for all its business is done in the city. Now is it to be supposed that where there are only three thousand seven hundred voters, that it is absolutely necessary to erect a separate and distinct court which cannot be as convenient as the present one. They cannot have the same advantages as they have at present, and yet they want a court merely for the sake of serving a few officers outside of the city. I do not know that the gentlemen have their eye upon any particular person, but the object is plain—to obtain a separate court, in order to accommodate a few men who are in want of office. The people of the county have complained of no grievance—pointed none out. The gentlemen seemed to suppose that the city of Louisville would overrule and control Jefferson county. We do not want to do any such thing. We never had but one high sheriff in Louisville. Perhaps I may be mistaken in saying so, but as far as my memory serves me, we never had but one. Now, where is the grievance? It seems to me that the gentlemen are asking for Jefferson, what the body of the people of that county do not ask for themselves. For my part, I believe they are opposed to this movement. I claim to know something about it, and that is my candid and deliberate opinion. This movement, I contend, is only calculated to produce strife and contention between the city and county. Louisville does not wish to have any thing to do with the general arrangement of the affairs of the county, but desires that it shall remain perfectly independent. The gentlemen say the county does not wish to interfere with the city. No doubt of that, for we all know they do not want to be taxed like the people of Louisville. Why separate the county from the city? Why not keep them united? To separate them is to bring about contention and strife. Leave them as they are; they ask no division. And I have no idea that the house will make a separation between them, particularly when no such request is made, either on the part of the county of Jefferson, or the city of Louisville.

Mr. JAMES. This is a question of a local character, and one in which I have no particular interest, except as I desire such information on the subject as will enable me to vote understandingly. It affects the city of Louisville and county of Jefferson, alone. I presume the president may have something to say on the subject, and some information to submit to the convention. And, in order that he may have an opportunity to do so, I move that the convention now resolve itself into committee of the whole upon this question.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. BROWN who had been presiding for the President, retained the chair as chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDENT. It seems to me there are some considerations involved in the proposition of the gentleman from Jefferson, that have not been brought to view in this convention. The proposition is this; that "when it shall appear to the legislature that any city or town hath a number of qualified voters, equal to the ratio then fixed, such city or town shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation in both houses of the general assembly, which shall be retained so long as such city or town shall contain a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio which may, from time to time, be fixed by law; and thereafter, elections for the county in which such city or town is situated, shall not be held therein."

Now, that is a proposition that in the county of Jefferson there shall be two county court clerks and two county sheriffs. What an inextricable confusion that will make. Which one of these county court clerks is to have possession of the records of the county of Jefferson, where the muniments and titles of both city and county are held? Which one of the two sheriffs will be required to attend the court? And when a writ is directed to the sheriff of Jefferson county, which is to have it? In truth and in fact, the proposition of the gentleman is, in substance, to make every city and town, having a separate representation, a separate county in effect, with a joint jurisdiction, with two county courts, two sheriffs, and two clerks. That is a matter, I conceive, we ought not to do, and which no legislature should do. The proposition involves a difficulty that in my mind I cannot get over. I do not want two county court clerks squabbling about who is to have the records of the court. Well, if you go on and concede that the county court of Jefferson shall be a new establishment, then every man will have to search the records of the old and new courts, before he can find the document which he wishes. If the county court of Jefferson takes them, the city of Louisville will then have the trouble of searching the records. The county will have the privilege of taking the court there, and will throw the burden and inconvenience upon the city. I do not think gentlemen have contemplated what this matter will lead to. I was in the legislature when Louisville was invested with a separate representation. Louisville, at that time, was whig, and the county of Jefferson was democratic, with a controlling majority over the whigs. And Louisville was invested with a separate representation against the will of the representatives of the county of Jefferson, and over their heads. I had the honor of representing her a first time. I think that was in 1831. In 1837 this act was passed, which the gentleman from Nelson read:

"That from and after the passage of this act, the justices of the peace of Jefferson county, residing without the limits of Louisville, shall constitute the court for laying the levy of the county of Jefferson, and appropriating and disbursing the same."

After the passage of that act, it was not possible for a justice residing in Louisville to impose taxes upon the people of Jefferson county, so that it was left to the magistrates outside of the city to lay that levy and disburse it. And, there was no question as to when the people should be taxed for their own support, for the people were as fairly represented in the county of Jefferson as any where in the state. The second article contains another provision:

"That the business of the citizens of Jefferson county, and others without the limits of the city of Louisville, shall, by order of the county court of Jefferson, be heard on the first week of each month, commencing on the first Monday, and continuing till all the business of the citizens of the county of Jefferson, and others residing without Louisville, shall be heard and disposed of, after which the business of the citizens of Louisville may be heard and disposed of; and the business of the citizens of Louisville shall, by order of the county court of Jefferson, be heard on the second week of each month, commencing on the second Monday, and continuing until all the business of the citizens of Louisville shall be heard and disposed of, after which, business of those residing out of Louisville may be heard and disposed of."

This regulated the business of the court, so that citizens residing in the county should not have their business interrupted by the citizens of Louisville taking up more time than was necessary. And so we have also provided for those expenses which should be borne mutually by each, from that time to the present; and in the third section this provision was made:

"That the county court of Jefferson, the justices of the peace residing without the city of Louisville presiding, may agree with the city authorities of Louisville to build a jail at the joint expense of the county and city, each contributing proportions as may be agreed on; they may also agree as to who shall appoint the jailer, and for the custody, management, and repair of the jail."

They had previously agreed upon building a court house, which has not yet been finished. The proprietors of the town of Louisville, when they laid it off, gave four lots for public buildings. Two lay east of sixth street and north of Jefferson, and two lay west of sixth street and north of Jefferson. The court house was first built in 1808, on a lot east of sixth street; afterwards a court house was built on the lot west of it. Subsequently the court house was pulled down and a jail built on the lot east, and a court house was built on a lot west, and when they came to build the present court house, the city of Louisville purchased the two lots adjoining, running to Fourth street, and agreed with the county of Jefferson to contribute a certain proportion, and take the two lots west of sixth street, and they would build a court house on four lots running from fifth to sixth street, north of Jefferson street. And the court house was there built, and the city of Louisville contributed her proportion. When they came to build a jail, it was erected on the lot north of Jefferson and most westward of sixth street, leaving the lot west of Sixth street not built upon, and the city contributed a certain sum, and also the county of Jefferson. According to my recollection, the sum contributed by the county of Jefferson, to both court house and jail, was $30,000. The amount of property which other gentlemen have claimed was made up by the increased value of these lots, which were given by the proprietors for the public buildings, and which never did exclusively belong to the county of Jefferson outside of Louisville. The county of Jefferson has contributed liberally and fairly to these public buildings, and the court house and jail belong to the county of Jefferson and the city of Louisville as public property, for their joint benefit, and there is no ground of complaint on that subject, in relation to the joint expense that each incurred to keep up these two establishments. And the only question now is, whether a city or town, under a provision of a law of the commonwealth, shall have a separate representation, a separate or joint county court, a joint sheriff, and if you will, a separate sheriff, and these two distinct operations going on at the same time. How is this property to be divided? Who is to have it? Is the county to build again for herself? On going out, is she to give up all this property to the city, and build again for herself? Is this a subject matter to be settled in the convention, and is it proper that it should come up here in the constitution? In effect, it is forcing a separation, and constituting the cities separate from the counties. The circuit court of Jefferson has jurisdiction in the limits of Louisville, and when organized under the new constitution, will still be for the whole county of Jefferson. The process runs, "to the sheriff of the county of Jefferson." Deeds are to be recorded in the county courts where the respective property lies, and you have two county courts within the county of Jefferson. It strikes me gentlemen have not contemplated the difficulties connected with this subject. I was willing that, whenever a city should be entitled to a separate representation, the legislature should have the right to provide that the municipal affairs of each should be uncontrolled by the other. I do not desire to have any thing to do with laying the levy in the county of Jefferson or paying their expenses, nor do I wish that the county should interfere with the affairs of the city of Louisville. But I think we cannot get on in the way indicated, and I shall be compelled to vote against both propositions as they are now presented. I did desire that the proposition should be referred to the committee on the legislative department. They did not adopt my suggestion, and they were not bound to do it. Indeed I was desirous that we should get together and endeavor to agree upon the subject. Under these considerations, and with these difficulties in the way, I cannot vote for either proposition, and if no gentleman wishes to speak I will now ask that the committee rise.

The committee rose and reported progress accordingly.

Mr. PRESTON then withdrew the amendment he had offered. He had merely offered it to show his willingness to meet his colleague on fair ground.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I should not have again troubled the convention, but for a discrepancy which appears to exist between the gentleman from Louisville and myself, in reference to the contributions made for these public buildings. The first suggestion made by the President was as to which court should have the custody of the present records. I apprehend no difficulty on this question, as it is a matter which the legislature can readily decide. But I spoke with reference to the contributions with a distinct recollection of the matter. When it was determined to remove the court house from one side of sixth street to the other, it was ascertained that there were two lots which were not necessary for the purposes of the county—the city and county each owning one half of the interest therein. It was arranged between a committee on the part of the Louisville city council and a part of the county court, that the city should buy out the interest of the county in those two lots, and a price was agreed upon. The county agreed to pay $75,000 towards the erection of the public building, and the city agreed to go on and complete it. The city agreed to take the interest which the county of Jefferson owned in these two lots at some $37,500, and the remainder of the $75,000 was paid in money, for I was one of the commissioners on the part of the county to pay it, and know the facts. Then the question came up as to the erection of the jail. The city now owned all the property on the west side of sixth street, and at that time the jail was on the east side. Then the county of Jefferson paid back to the city, I do not recollect what amount, to acquire a proportion of the title in the property upon which the new jail was to be erected, which was to be deducted from the $16,000 contributed for the erection of the jail. The city now owns the residue of the two lots on the west side of sixth street, not now occupied by the jail, and the deed of conveyance was made to take effect whenever the city of Louisville shall complete the court house according to contract. Therefore, the amount which has been contributed by the county is some $91,000.

But all seem to agree that we should have a separate tribunal of some sort or other for the levying and disbursement of taxes. Well, if there is not a separate clerk, who is to record the proceedings? Will you permit us merely to levy our taxes and then appoint for us an officer for their disbursement? What else is the proposition of gentlemen than that we shall be allowed a separate court to tax ourselves, but the executive officer of the court must be appointed by the city? Is this right? Why do you give to every county in the commonwealth the privilege of electing its clerk? It is because other counties should not interfere with them. Then I ask for the people of Jefferson the same privileges that are extended to other counties. Let us not only have the right to levy our own taxes, but also of appointing the officer who is to collect and disburse them, and the clerk who is to record the proceedings.

The gentleman from Louisville (Mr. Rudd,) insists that my colleague and myself are in favor of a total separation. Now, if it is not known to him, it is to others here, that I have stood up strenuously in the legislature, session after session, against any proposition to divide the city and county. I know that my colleague as a citizen of Jefferson county, has also opposed any such division. Then why will the gentleman persist in attributing motives to us that our past action, so far from justifying, directly contradicts? I am sure that my colleague and myself, and I doubt not the citizens of Jefferson county, will feel indebted to the gentleman for having taken us under his guardianship, and for having been good enough to inform us what the citizens of that county require. We acknowledge our inability to discharge our duties to them here, and tender to him our thanks for the kind interest he has seen proper to manifest in our welfare. But I profess to know something of the feelings of the people of Jefferson on this subject, and I beg leave to be governed by my own judgment, as to what their wishes are, in preference to yielding to his mere opinions on the subject. And the gentleman appears to think that my colleague and myself have some favorite individual whom we want inducted into office. This, as I remarked in reply to the other gentleman from Louisville, is a most uncharitable suggestion. Were I disposed to be as uncharitable as he is, might I not infer that he has some favorite in the city of Louisville upon whom he wishes to confer the joint offices. Why, independent of the business of Jefferson, that of the city of Louisville would afford an office that would be a fortune to any man who might get it. The business of Jefferson will be such as to induce some of the best citizens of the county to accept those offices; and yet the gentleman wants to have both devolved on the same individual. But the gentleman says further, that he has heard of no general complaint on this subject. I admit it and we only desire to protect ourselves from the probability of such a thing hereafter. Because there has been no grievance heretofore, will you deny us the right of protecting ourselves against such a contingency hereafter? The same gentleman also says that the police court of Louisville is open to the citizens of Jefferson. Now I beg leave to differ with him. It is true if one of our boys happens to stray in Louisville and kicks up a dust there, then the city police take hold of him; but in no other instance do they. The county has agreed that the boundaries of the city police jurisdiction for the suppression of riots shall extend half a mile around the city; and to that extent and for that purpose alone, do they have jurisdiction over the county of Jefferson. Well there is another objection made—that these officers of the county will reside in the city. Will that be any detriment to the city? Even should the county choose to elect a resident of the city for any of these offices, would it be any cause of complaint to the city? But the point most exclusively dwelt upon by all the gentlemen from Louisville, is that it is a virtual separation of the city and county. I beg leave to differ with them. To a certain extent, and for certain purposes there will be, and there ought to be a separation. But we shall be united for other and for all purposes, for which it is desirable we should be united. So far as I am concerned, I now leave this question to the disposition of the convention, conscious of having discharged my duty towards those who sent me here.

The amendment of Mr. MERIWETHER was rejected, the yeas and nays being ordered on the call of Mr. Rudd, yeas 21 and nays 55, as follows:

YEAS—Alfred Boyd, Luther Brawner, William C. Bullitt, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, Peter Lashbrooke, Martin P. Marshall, David Meriwether, James M. Nesbitt, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Larkin J. Proctor, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ignatius A. Spaulding, John D. Taylor—21.

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, Wm. Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Thos. J. Hood, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, William N. Marshall, Nathan McClure, David Meriwether, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spaulding, Michael L. Stoner, William R. Thompson, Charles A. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—40.

Mr. MERIWETHER then moved a reconsideration of the vote, adopting the section providing that sheriffs should be re-eligible for a second term.

The motion under the rule would lie over until to-morrow, but on the motion of Mr. TURNER, the rule was dispensed with.

Mr. GARRARD then moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. HARDIN suggested that as the house was thin the roll should be called.

The roll was accordingly called, and eighty-one members answered to their names.

The question then being taken on the motion to lay on the table, by yeas and nays, on the call of Mr. CLARKE, it prevailed—yeas 44 nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John L. Ballinger, William K. Bowling, Francis M. Bristow, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, James Dudley, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, Thomas N. Lindsey, Thomas W. Lisle, Martin P. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, John H. McHenry, William D. Mitchell, Thomas P. Rogers, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spaulding, Michael L. Stoner, William R. Thompson, Charles A. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—40.

The report of the committee on executive and ministerial offices as amended was then adopted.

LOUISVILLE CHANCERY COURT.

On the motion of Mr. HARDIN, the convention went into committee of the whole, Mr. BRADLEY in the chair, on the article reported by the committee on circuit courts, in relation to the Louisville chancery court, as follows:

"SEC. — The Louisville chancery court shall exist under this constitution, subject to repeal, and its jurisdiction to enlargement and modification by the legislature. The chancellor shall have the same qualification as a circuit court judge; and the clerk of said court as a clerk of a circuit court, and the marshal of said court as a sheriff; and the legislature shall provide for the election of the chancellor, clerk, and marshal, of said court, at the same time that the judge and clerk of the circuit court are elected for the county of Jefferson, and they shall hold their offices for the same time."

Mr. HARDIN. The committee on circuit courts reported this article, and it was drawn up by the presiding officer of this body, a gentleman who has long practiced in that court. The report was a unanimous one from the committee.

The PRESIDENT. I desire to give the convention the information I possess upon the subject of this court, and upon the necessity of its continuance. I inferred from the report of the committees on the court of appeals and the circuit court, that there would be doubt and difficulty as to whether the Louisville chancery court would exist under the proposed constitution, and in order to have the question settled, a resolution was referred to the committee on circuit courts, requiring them to take the subject under consideration. They have accordingly reported the provision under consideration. The Louisville chancery court went into existence on the 13th of April, 1835, and to that court was transferred many of the causes which were pending at the time in the Jefferson county circuit court. All, however, were not thus transferred, but some were retained in that court and decided there. There have been 6,600 and odd cases brought or removed into that court, of which 5,290 and odd were finally settled by decree or dismissal. And there were some three or four hundred more partially decided, leaving altogether about 1400 causes for the docket of that court. There are also some 900 or 1000 causes which have not been disposed of or decided in any way. Such is the present condition of the business in that court, and upon examination it will be found that each year during its existence there have been upwards of 400 causes finally decided and disposed of by it. The court has also the jurisdiction of settling the rights of guardians, administrators, and executors, within the city of Louisville, and of causes of this character some 290 and odd have been settled and disposed of, and others are in a course of final disposition. They are settled before a master in that court, and examined by the chancellor, and if approved, declared to stand as prima facie evidence. Including these causes, there has been upwards of 450 causes disposed of by the court annually since its establishment. Ordinarily the court sits two days in the week, on Tuesdays and Fridays, and gives opinions, hears motions, and transacts its business generally. Causes are submitted to the judge most generally upon briefs, and during the period he is out of court, he has the examination of records to make, and of the authorities referred to by counsel, and such as are necessary for his own information. Independent of these two courts a week, and the time he labors during the balance of the week in preparing his decrees, the judge grants injunctions, restraining orders, and ne exeat, and he is likely to be applied to every day, and is frequently applied to many times in the day, to examine the records and decide as to attachments. Independent of these duties also, many writs of habeas corpus, and nice and intricate questions of the custody of children and the power of parents and guardians over them, are brought before him. Then all collision cases are to be tried by jurors, and when he has prepared the venire he is to have a day fixed for it, and that is always some day that is not a regular court day. And we have been engaged in the trial of some of these collision cases for a week and some times ten days, on a single cause. So also in regard to contested wills, they are tried in that court, and some of them consume a considerable time. But the heaviest jurisdiction in relation to juries are in collision causes. It is in fact a mercantile court, for the transaction of nearly all of that description of business that connects itself with the mercantile affairs of the county, both as to shipping and attachments against foreign debtors, together with the usual amount of chancery business of liens upon buildings, and assignments, and settlement of estates, and winding up of partnerships, embracing all that variety of jurisdiction that under our system of laws devolve particularly upon the chancery part of the circuit courts.

It was from the great accumulation of business in the Jefferson circuit court, on the chancery side, and the fact that the common law and criminal business occupied its whole time, so that the chancery side of the docket was hardly ever reached, except by motion, that induced the legislature in 1835 to establish this court. The business of the community has been done in that court with great facility, and the chancery business kept down. A great many of these causes are tried in that court, in from fifty to sixty days from the time they are commenced, if they are plain cases. Where they are complicated, and where they require a greater time to prepare them, of course it takes a longer time, and occasionally a cause falls back, either from the neglect of the parties, or the difficulty of getting at the facts. But I have seen no court during the period of time I have practiced, that transacts its business with more promptness and certainty than it. And although amongst the mass of cases that come to the court of appeals there have been a fair number of reversals, yet there have been a large proportion in which the individuals have been fully satisfied, and which have never been brought to the appellate court. I am satisfied that the chancery business of the city of Louisville and the county of Jefferson, will require the whole labors of a judge, and that it cannot be done without it. A large portion of the business done in that court, is of persons who reside without its jurisdiction, and who were connected with Louisville by the commerce and trade of the city and county. It was the conviction of these facts that induced the legislature to establish the court in the first instance, and it is under the same impression and the belief that no arrangement can be made that will be more beneficial to the litigants or to the community at large, that we have been induced to ask that it shall be recognized by the constitution, and take its fate in the legislature of the country, as experience may dictate it best deserves. Either to have it repealed, or to have its jurisdiction enlarged or diminished, as the interests of the county may demand. I am satisfied that if the convention shall diminish the number of courts in the commonwealth, if they do not leave us the chancery court, that at least they will be compelled to establish an additional circuit. I do not believe, from the immense number of criminal cases falling to the lot of the Jefferson circuit court to try, that it will be possible for one judge to do the criminal business, the common law business, and the chancery business, that exists and has existed for the last three years in the city alone. The city is growing and increasing, and with it will increase the necessity of having a court of justice always open, and always ready to transact the business constantly arising in a place of increasing trade and commerce. We cannot safely dispense with such a court in the city of Louisville, and all I ask is, that it shall be permitted to exist. I see that in the draft of the bill, the marshal of the court is re-eligible to office. This I do not desire, and I move that the marshal of the court be ineligible for a succeeding term.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I concur in the opinions expressed by the President as to the necessity for the existence of the court, but I want to guard it against an evil that has some times happened, and may happen again. I therefore offer the following as an additional section:

"The jurisdiction of said court shall be restricted to suits where the property or estate, or some one or more of the defendants reside in Louisville."

My object is obvious on the face of the amendment itself. This court is now to be made a constitutional court, and I want to know the limit of its jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of all the circuit courts throughout the state is limited by law, and I now want to limit the jurisdiction of the chancery court of Louisville. So far as regards Louisville, and in causes where the defendants or one or more of them reside in that city, let the court have jurisdiction. Otherwise, every man who is in the habit of visiting Louisville, or who may do it occasionally, is liable, when caught in town to be sued there, and thus the court would exercise jurisdiction over a suit, the subject matter of which, and many of the defendants might pertain to a remote part of the state. Are you willing that your constituents shall be obliged either to stay out of Louisville altogether and thereby neglect their business, or if they go there be liable to have process served on them, and detained to attend to a long and sometimes complicated chancery suit? It is to guard against this that I have offered my amendment.

Mr. PRESTON. I do not see the force of the objection urged by the gentleman from Daviess. The Louisville chancery court has vested in it all the chancery jurisdiction which was formerly reposed in the Jefferson circuit court, and thus, if the separation had never taken place, the same persons under the same circumstances only, would have been subject to suits in the Louisville chancery, as on the chancery side of the Jefferson circuit court. And this is all the jurisdiction we have proposed to give this court in this report—a jurisdiction that is exercised by every circuit court on its chancery side in this commonwealth. There are two classes of action—those which relate to fixed property, which are local, and transitory actions, which it is right and proper should follow the person. The Louisville chancery court, therefore, received only that jurisdiction which the circuit court on its chancery side possessed anterior to its establishment, and it was thus established only because the business was so great under the advancing wealth and population of the county, that it was necessary to make the division in order to administer justice.

The gentleman certainly would not deprive the chancery court of Louisville of that general jurisdiction over subjects which every circuit court in the commonwealth possesses. If the man be in debt, and the remedy be in chancery, he may be served with process in Fayette, or Hickman, or Mason counties, and tried in the circuit courts of those counties under precisely similar circumstances as in the chancery court in Louisville. There was no difference in the proceeding, and yet the gentleman does not object to the jurisdiction of the circuit courts in such cases. Now the chancery court of Louisville exercises a jurisdiction, which, after the experience of ages, has been asserted and declared in the courts of England and in every state of the Union, over a certain class of action relating to matters which being transitory in their character, the remedy should be obtained wherever the person of the defendant is found. And this is the jurisdiction always exercised on the chancery side of the circuit court, and of which no complaint has been made. We only ask that that jurisdiction shall remain undiminished here, and leave it to the legislature to provide for its restriction or extension as necessity may dictate. If it should be found to work, as the gentleman apprehends, the legislature will have power to restrict it. This is not a constitutional court, over which the legislature is to have no control, as the gentleman seems to infer. The clause reads in this way, "The Louisville chancery court shall exist under this constitution subject to repeal, and its jurisdiction to enlargement and modification by the legislature." There is therefore no difficulty in reaching the subject of jurisdiction by legislation, if it should hereafter become necessary.

Mr. TRIPLETT. It is true that this court has heretofore existed by law, but the legislature when it created it did not do that justice to the balance of the citizens of the state which was due to them. Therefore now, when this convention is about to make the court a constitutional one, by requiring its continuance, I desire to do that which the legislature should have done at the time it first established the court. This proposition can be made so clear that no man can misunderstand it. I have drafted this amendment with some care, and the gentleman's objection to it does not lie. By my amendment, if the defendants or any one of them reside in Louisville, or if their property being transitory, is in Louisville, then the chancery court there would have jurisdiction over it. But I do not want to give that court jurisdiction over all the citizens of the state, wherever they are. Suppose my amendment does not pass, why the very evil now existing will continue to exist, and we know it. We all know that never, up to this day, have we had power sufficient in the legislature to prevent this very evil of which we now complain. I know from my own personal knowledge, as do other gentlemen in this convention, that the jurisdiction of suits has been transferred to the Louisville chancery court, when neither the subject matter in controversy nor one of the defendants has resided in that city. The case of Spotts was removed there, and the land involved lay in Henderson county, and every one of the defendants lived there except one by the name of Barbour. He was passing through Louisville, and was served with a subpoena, and he was only a nominal defendant. Are delegates willing then that their constituents shall be forever hereafter liable to be subjected to this inconvenience, provided the legislature does not correct it. And if the circuit court possessed the same jurisdiction, and had exercised it in this way, I ask if, according to the gentleman's own proposition, the legislature should not have deprived them of that power? Take an instance that might occur at the seat of government here. Suppose a man comes here on business which it is necessary for him to transact, and which cannot be transacted any where else,—ought the circuit court of this county to have jurisdiction over a tract of land in Hickman county, where all the witnesses are residing, merely because this man, as one of the parties in the suit, was caught here, in the transaction of his necessary business? I say no. It is wrong, and there is not a man here, who, if his constituents were placed in that condition, would not resent it. Then if it is wrong why should we not remedy the evil?

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I was a member of the legislature when the chancery court of Louisville was organized, and a larger jurisdiction was given to it than I thought it ought to have; but as it now exists, the jurisdiction of that court, in chancery matters, is no larger than the jurisdiction of the circuit court. If a man from Daviess county, against whom a claim exists, for which he might be sued in chancery in his own county, should go to Louisville, process might be issued against him there, by the circuit court. He could be held upon a writ of ne exeat, or I believe, as it is now called, a writ of “no go”—and the chancery court can do no more. If one of the defendants in a large suit should happen to be there, the circuit court can issue process against him, and the chancery court has no greater power. And it appears to me that if we transfer the jurisdiction in a certain class of cases, from the circuit court to the chancery court, the latter should have as plenary powers as the former. I should be unwilling to give to the court the power to bring persons from another county by process issued from that court; but I think they ought to have the same degree of jurisdiction that the other courts have. I do not understand the chancery court as possessing greater power, as regards jurisdiction, than the circuit court possesses, in chancery business; but be that as it may, I think we had better leave the regulation of the internal jurisdiction of the court, as well as its jurisdiction over transitory persons and property, to the legislature.

THE PRESIDENT. The jurisdiction of the chancery court of Louisville, is precisely what the jurisdiction of the Jefferson county circuit court was, in relation to chancery business, before the chancery court was established; not more and not less. It has the same jurisdiction that every circuit court in the commonwealth of Kentucky has, in relation to chancery matters. Now, if there is a grievance in relation to the jurisdiction of the chancery court, I would suggest to the gentleman, that this court ought not to be made an exception, and that he should make his amendment to prohibit the legislature from granting the same jurisdiction to the other courts in the commonwealth. I am very sorry, sir, that the gentleman has instanced, in support of his argument for curtailing the jurisdiction, that outrageous case of fraud in Spott's case. The children were infants, and there was a combination between the judgment creditors, and the administrator of the estate, who fully administered upon it, and then bought in a large and valuable tract of land for a nominal price, under the pretence outside, that it was bought in for the benefit of the heirs. The sheriff made the deed with a full knowledge of all the facts. It was one of the most outrageous frauds that was ever practiced upon infants. I have seen the record; it has been passed upon by the court of appeals. It is a case that shows how the rights of those who have no one interested in their behalf, and who cannot look after their interests themselves, may be trampled upon through the means of a court of justice. It is one of the strongest evidences showing the remedial power that exists in the breast of the chancellor. But that it should be made an argument to restrain the jurisdiction of the chancery court, is somewhat extraordinary. If it is the sense of the convention, that the jurisdiction of this court should be restrained, make the restriction applicable to the other courts; but do not restrain this, and let the jurisdiction of the balance of the courts remain as it is.

But the gentleman says that this court should not be permitted to issue process against a man who resides in another county. If a man goes into a neighboring county, and owes a debt therein, the sheriff can serve process on him, and he must answer to the demand in a court of law; and so it is in a court of chancery, unless it is a suit in relation to real estate, where the recovery is to be direct for the thing itself, and the action is termed local, and has to be brought in the circuit where the property lies. But where the chancery court issues process upon the ground of fraud, the party may be served with process, wherever he may be found. There are many cases in which this jurisdiction is very appropriate. A man comes into Louisville, and sells a negro, who proves to be unsound; the individual guilty of this kind of fraud, may be prosecuted where the fraud was transacted. A man buys a quantity of goods without any intention of paying for them, or obtains goods by false pretences, or false representations, as to his ability to pay; he is within your jurisdiction, and process may be served upon him, wherever he may be found. I insist that it is a subject that ought to be regulated by the legislature.

This report proposes to leave the existence of the court, and the extent of its jurisdiction, entirely with the legislature. Is not that sufficient? Are we going to legislate upon every minute point, in making a general law? If so, we are likely to be kept here forever. Now I submit the question, whether we ought to provide for the jurisdiction of the courts within this state, or whether we should leave it to be done by the legislature. If we undertake to make this court an exception, it will look very extraordinary. Are we to declare that all the courts in the commonwealth should have the same jurisdiction that now exists, except the chancery court of Louisville, and that shall have less than all the other courts in the state? That is the effect of the gentleman's proposition. If he wishes to limit the jurisdiction of all the courts, by a general provision, when the whole subject matter comes up, let him make his proposition; but I protest against its being added to this bill, and the jurisdiction of the chancellor, either more restricted, or more enlarged than it is elsewhere.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I was in hopes that some other person would reply to the argument of the gentleman on the other side. I have already attended to the remarks of the two gentlemen from Louisville, and to the reply made by the younger gentleman from Nelson, and I ask this house, calmly to reflect, what are the arguments made use of against my proposition? Has there been a solitary reason urged against it? I previously acknowledged the fact, for the purpose of saving time, that the circuit courts have got this jurisdiction, as the gentleman states. But I tell you candidly, that my object is to circumscribe the jurisdiction of the Louisville chancery court. In reference to Spott's case, it was a most outrageous fraud, and I had some part in exposing the fraud; but that is not the question. The question is as to the locus in quo, the place where the action ought to have been brought. Ought it not to have been brought in the county of Henderson, where the parties resided, and where all the witnesses, and all the records were? If any proper cause could be shown why it should not be tried there, it could have been remedied by a change of venue. Let us reflect for one moment on the proposition that I have submitted. I believe that in its true construction, it will include the cases put by the gentleman. Whenever a contract is made in Louisville, let the trial be had there; if a fraud be perpetrated there, goods obtained under false pretences, the amendment that I have proposed covers the case; if it does not, add to it the words, "where a contract expressed or implied is made in the city of Louisville." You will then cover the whole ground, and if any lawyer on this floor gives it as his opinion, that the amendment, as drafted, does not cover the ground, then I will move to add the words that I have suggested.

The mere question is, shall your constituents, because one of them happens to go to Louisville, be sued there, and all the balance of the defendants be brought there? If the owner of a tract of land lying in Hickman, or in Knox, or in any other of the border counties of the state, be sued, the courts there should have jurisdiction, not only over all the defendants in the case, but over the subject matter. What is the effect of giving jurisdiction to a court in a remote part of the state? Does any gentleman say it ought to be so? But the gentleman says, that I am drawing a distinction between the chancery court of Louisville, and the ordinary courts having jurisdiction in chancery cases. Be it so. Have they shown that my proposition is wrong? No sir, so far from it, they show that the provision ought to be extended to all the other courts. My maxim is to remedy the evil, where it occurs, and believing it to be my duty, as far as I am able, to provide that this evil shall exist no longer, I desire that this clause shall be inserted in the constitution.

Mr. PRESTON. I rise merely to answer one or two points in the remarks of my friend from Daviess. He says he has heard no reason yet advanced why his amendment should not be adopted; if he has heard none from the distinguished gentleman who preceded me, I am almost hopeless of convincing him. "The deaf adder heedeth not the voice of the charmer."

Mr. TRIPLETT. I did listen, but I did not hear.

Mr. PRESTON. I understand that the practical application which the gentleman from Daviess desires to make of his proposed amendment to the report, is to limit the jurisdiction of the Louisville chancery court, as he frankly admits, in a manner not known in any other chancery court in Kentucky; to curtail it of the rights enjoyed by every other circuit court on the chancery side; to deprive it of jurisdiction that has, from time immemorial, been exercised by such courts in this country and in England, from whence we have derived our system of jurisprudence. He has alluded to the case of Spotts' heirs and Barbour. I have not read that case, but it seems to me that the gentleman is not taking the proper course to cure the evil he complains of. He is endeavoring to do it by restricting the jurisdiction of the chancery court, when the injury he complains of arises from the decision of the appellate court.

Mr. TRIPLETT. The gentleman does not understand me; I do not object that the decision was wrong, I only cite the case as an instance, where the defendants, as well as the subject matter of the suit, were in another county.

Mr. PRESTON. The gentleman proposes that the Louisville chancery court shall take cognizance of nothing except those cases where the contract has arisen, either in Louisville or in Jefferson county. Do I understand him?

Mr. TRIPLETT. That is one class of cases.

Mr. PRESTON. Let us examine the effect of this proposition. Suppose one of our citizens, in London, borrows a thousand dollars of another to come home, and to recover the debt he needs the aid of a court of equity. In every court in the state, you may assert your right by bill of discovery, except in the chancery court of Louisville.

Mr. TRIPLETT. You cannot file a bill of discovery in any chancery court, unless there has been a suit at common law; so that the illustration of the gentleman is not applicable.

Mr. PRESTON. I will not make an argument on the illustration. The general principle is, that the debtor, in any personal contract, may be sued wherever he goes. A debt contracted in one county of the state may be asserted in another; all actions arising upon contracts, and personal actions of every description, may be commenced wherever the defendant may be found. The gentleman now proposes to curtail this jurisdiction, and make personal actions local, and I conceive this contrary to the whole current and policy of the law. What will be the effect of the gentleman's amendment? If I enter into a contract with him in Louisville, requiring for its enforcement the aid of the chancellor, and afterwards go down to Owensboro', he can sue me upon the contract there; but if I make a similar contract with him there, and he comes to Louisville, I cannot bring suit upon it. Does he call this equality? Is there any good reason why the chancery court of Louisville should be deprived of the rights that the circuit court of Daviess and every other circuit court in the state possesses? All that we ask is that its jurisdiction shall be the same as that of other courts; with this we would be contented; and I really think the convention will be satisfied that it would be highly improper to deprive this court of the power which the other courts possess.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I will amend my proposition by adding these words, "contracts which have arisen directly or indirectly in Louisville."

Mr. PRESIDENT. I am exceedingly sorry that the gentleman did not comprehend my objection. I did not intend to argue as to what was or was not the proper jurisdiction of the court. I only asserted that the jurisdiction of the Louisville chancery court was the same as the jurisdiction of all the circuit courts in the commonwealth; and that it was not proper that this convention should determine the limits of the jurisdiction of that court. That if it were necessary to limit the jurisdiction of all the courts, there would be a more proper time and place for it. If the legislature of the commonwealth cannot be entrusted with the regulation of the jurisdiction of this tribunal, and it is necessary that we should determine the limits of jurisdiction, then let us determine as to all the courts, and not select one single court, merely because the gentleman may suppose that he can array prejudices against the particular locality where the court is held, in order to lessen the jurisdiction of that court. The suit, which the gentleman alluded to, was brought by persons who did not reside in Louisville. They chose that tribunal; perhaps, sir, they may have had a preference for the lawyers there. When a man goes to law he is very apt to make choice of a lawyer in whom he has confidence. Well, the gentleman says, that the citizens of this commonwealth shall not have this privilege. I maintain that it is their privilege to bring their suits wherever they think proper.

I submit that this is not the proper place to determine the jurisdiction of the courts. It is a matter for legislative enactment, and should not be made a constitutional provision.

Mr. TRIPLETT. It is necessary to put myself right, for I do not wish to be misunderstood in regard to this matter. I did not start until I knew I was right, and I do not intend to be put wrong.

This is a special court established for a special purpose; therefore the gentleman's simile is not applicable because the others are general. I am the last man in the house, to appeal to prejudice that exists against Louisville, if any does exist, but it is rather extraordinary to hear gentlemen so frequently referring to a supposed prejudice, if none does exist.

The PRESIDENT. I did not say there was a prejudice, but that the gentleman might array prejudice against Louisville.

Mr. PRESTON. The gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that I asserted that any prejudice exists.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I am glad to hear it. So far from arraying prejudice against Louisville I would remove any prejudice if it were in my power. It is not on account of any prejudice against the place, but simply because it is a city to which a large majority of the citizens of the state are compelled to go on business. And the question is—and it is a plain and simple one—whether they shall be sued when they go there on business, and be compelled to carry their witnesses there, and in some cases there are fifty or a hundred witnesses. It is a subject in which every body is interested.

In answer to the younger gentleman from Louisville, I will say there is not a solitary case that was quoted by him, in which the common law courts have not jurisdiction. The gentleman supposes the case of a man who borrows a thousand dollars in London, and he thinks that the chancery court should be permitted to issue process against the debtor in such case. But the common law courts have equal jurisdiction over the matter, and when you get jurisdiction, then your bill of discovery follows of course; your writ of ne exeat regno—by the way, the word does not sound well in a republic. All writs in that court follow the writs of common law, and I tell the gentleman that there is not a case that was stated by him, that cannot be answered. I have no doubt it is our duty to adopt the amendment.

The question being put, it was upon a division, rejected, yeas 22 noes 28. So the amendment was rejected.

The committee rose and reported the amendment.

The question then being upon concurrence in the amendment reported by the committee.

It was concurred in.

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to amend the report by inserting an amendment to provide that the Louisville chancery court shall exist under the constitution like all other chancery courts in this commonwealth.

I am not quite satisfied with this part of the report. Every lawyer in this house knows very well that it has been the custom of the chancery courts in this country, as well as in every other, to encroach upon the business of the common law courts. It is for this reason that I move this amendment.

The PRESIDENT. There is no other chancery court in this commonwealth.

Mr. KELLY. There is a chancery side of every court.

Mr. TURNER. This constitution does not attempt to fix the jurisdiction of the court at all. It leaves it just as it is, subject to be increased or diminished by the legislature. And every other court in the commonwealth is just in that situation. It is just where it ought to be in my opinion. I think the committee have discharged their duty exceedingly well; they could not place it upon a better footing.

Mr. APPERSON. So far as the gentleman from Madison is concerned, it may be very explicit, and all very well suited to his taste. I am not prepared to say it is to mine. I do not understand it well enough. So far as I do understand it, I am not pleased with it; and I would prefer to understand it, because I should regret, exceedingly, to be obliged to make an assault upon it, as at present advised. Before its final passage, I shall ask to be heard upon its merits. I should be glad to have it passed over for the present.

The convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10th, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORRIS.

Mr. DIXON, at his request was discharged from further service on the special committee raised on Mr. Gaither's motion to consider and report on the powers of the general and state government.

COMMITTEE OF REVISION.

The PRESIDENT announced the following as the select committee of ten, appointed under the resolution offered yesterday, by Mr. McHenry, to arrange and revise the several articles of the constitution that may be adopted, viz: Messrs. McHenry, Moore, W. C. Marshall, Garrard, Machen, Bowling, Garfield, Williams, Lisle, and Stone.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

On motion, leave of absence was granted to Mr. Edwards, until Wednesday next, to Mr. Robinson, until Tuesday, to Mr. T. J. Hood, for a few days, and to Mr. Wheeler, for a few days.

REPORT FROM A COMMITTEE.

Mr. DIXON from the committee on the executive for the state at large, made the following report, which on his motion was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed.

ARTICLE —

Concerning the executive department.

SEC. 1. The supreme executive power of the commonwealth, shall be vested in a chief magistrate, who shall be styled the governor of the commonwealth of Kentucky.

SEC. 2. The governor shall be elected for the term of four years, by the citizens entitled to suffrage, at the time and places where they shall respectively vote for representatives. The person having the highest number of votes shall be governor; but if two or more shall be equal and highest in votes, the election shall be determined by lot, in such manner as the legislature may direct.

SEC. 3. The governor shall be ineligible for the succeeding four years after the expiration of the term for which he shall have been elected.

SEC. 4. He shall be at least thirty-five years of age, and a citizen of the United States, and have been an inhabitant of this state at least six years next preceding his election.

SEC. 5. He shall commence the execution of his office on the fourth Tuesday succeeding the day of the commencement of the general election on which he shall be chosen, and shall continue in the execution thereof until the end of four weeks next succeeding the election of his successor, and until his successor shall have taken the oaths, or affirmations, prescribed by this constitution.

SEC. 6. No member of congress, or person holding any office under the United States, nor minister of any religious society, shall be eligible to the office of governor.

SEC. 7. The governor shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the term for which he shall have been elected.

SEC. 8. He shall be commander-in-chief of the army and navy of this commonwealth, and of the militia, except when they shall be called into the service of the United States; but he shall not command personally in the field, unless he shall be advised so to do by a resolution of the general assembly.

SEC. 9. The governor shall have power to fill vacancies that may happen by death, resignation, or otherwise, by granting commissions, which shall expire when such vacancies have been filled according to the provisions of this constitution.

SEC. 10. He shall have power to remit fines and forfeitures, grant reprieves and pardons, except in cases of impeachment. In cases of treason, he shall have power to grant reprieves until the end of the next session of the general assembly, in which the power of pardoning shall be vested. That whenever the governor shall remit a fine or forfeiture, or grant a reprieve or pardon, he shall enter his reasons for doing so on the records of the secretary of state, in a separate book; and on the requisition of either house of the general assembly, the same shall be laid before them, and published if they deem proper.

SEC. 11. He may require information in writing, from the officers in the executive department, upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices.

SEC. 12. He shall, from time to time, give to the general assembly, information of the state of the commonwealth, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he may deem expedient.

SEC. 13. He may, on extraordinary occasions, convene the general assembly at the seat of government, or at a different place, if that should have become, since their last adjournment, dangerous from an enemy, or from contagious disorders; and in case of disagreement between the two houses, with respect to the time of adjournment, adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper, not exceeding four months.

SEC. 14. He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

SEC. 15. A lieutenant governor shall be chosen at every election for a governor, in the same manner, continue in office for the same time, and possess the same qualifications. In voting for governor and lieutenant governor, the electors shall distinguish whom they vote for as governor, or whom as lieutenant governor.

SEC. 16. He shall, by virtue of his office, be speaker of the senate, have a right when in committee of the whole, to debate and vote on all subjects, and when the senate are equally divided, to give the casting vote.

SEC. 17. Whenever the office of governor shall become vacant, the lieutenant governor shall discharge the duties of governor until his successor shall have been duly elected; but no new election shall take place to fill such vacancy, unless the same shall have occurred before the first two years of the time shall have expired for which the governor was elected; and if, during the time the lieutenant governor shall fill such vacancy, he shall be impeached, removed from office, refuse to qualify, resign, die, or be absent from the state, the speaker of the senate shall, in like manner, administer the government for the balance of the term.

SEC. 18. Whenever the government shall be administered by the lieutenant governor, or he shall be unable to attend as speaker of the senate, the senators shall elect one of their own members as speaker for the occasion.

SEC. 19. The lieutenant governor, while he acts as speaker of the senate, shall receive for his services, the same compensation which shall, for the same period, be allowed to the speaker of the house of representatives, and no more; and during the time he administers the government, as governor, shall receive the same compensation which the governor would have received, and been entitled to, had he been employed in the duties of his office.

SEC. 20. The speaker pro tempore of the senate, during the time he administers the government, shall receive, in like manner, the same compensation which the governor would have received had he been employed in the duties of his office.

SEC. 21. If the lieutenant governor shall be called upon to administer the government, and shall, while in such administration, resign, die, or be absent from the state during the recess of the general assembly, it shall be the duty of the secretary for the time being, to convene the senate for the purpose of choosing a speaker.

SEC. 22. The governor shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the senate, appoint a secretary of state, who shall be commissioned during the term for which the governor shall have been elected, if he shall so long behave himself well. He shall keep a fair register, and attest all the official acts of the governor, and shall, when required, lay the same, and all papers, minutes and vouchers relative thereto, before either house of the general assembly; and shall perform such other duties as may be enjoined on him by law.

SEC. 23. Every bill which shall have passed both houses shall be presented to the governor. If he approve, he shall sign it; but if not, he shall return it with his objections to the house in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large upon their journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If, after such reconsideration, a majority of all the members elected to that house shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent with the objections to the other house, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by a majority of all the members elected to that house, it shall be a law; but in such cases, the votes of both houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the members voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the journals of each house respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the governor, within ten days (Sundays excepted,) after it shall have been presented to him, it shall be a law, in like manner as if he had signed it, unless the general assembly, by their adjournment, prevent its return; in which case it shall be a law, unless sent back within three days after their next meeting.

SEC. 24. Every order, resolution, or vote, to which the concurrence of both houses may be necessary, except on a question of adjournment, shall be presented to the governor, and before it shall take effect, be approved by him; or being disapproved, shall be re-passed by a majority of all the members elected to both houses, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in case of a bill.

SEC. 25. Contested elections for governor and lieutenant governor shall be determined by both houses of the general assembly, according to such regulations as may be established by law.

SEC. 26. The legislature shall provide for a term not exceeding two years, for the appointment of treasurer, auditor of public accounts, register of the land office, and such other officers of a public nature as may become necessary, and shall prescribe their duties and responsibilities, and, until otherwise directed by law, such officers shall be elected by the qualified voters of this commonwealth.

SEC. 27. A board of commissioners shall be appointed every two years by the judges of the court of appeals, one from each appellate district, whose duty it shall be to make an examination every two years, of the accounts of the receiving and disbursing officers of the state at large, and report to the legislature.

COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, from the joint committees on the court of appeals, circuit courts, and county courts, to whom were re-committed the reports of the committees on the court of appeals, circuit courts, and county courts, reported the following amendment as a substitute for the whole of said reports, which, on his motion, was ordered to be printed, and the consideration thereof postponed to Tuesday next:

ARTICLE —.

Concerning the judicial department.

SEC. 1. The judicial power of this commonwealth, both as to matters of law and equity, shall be vested in one supreme court, (which shall be styled the court of appeals,) the courts established by this constitution, and in such inferior courts as the general assembly may, from time to time, erect and establish.

SEC. 2. The court of appeals shall have appellate jurisdiction only, which shall be co-extensive with the state, under such restrictions and regulations, not repugnant to this constitution, as may, from time to time, be prescribed by law.

SEC. 3. The judges of the court of appeals shall hold their offices for the term of eight years, from and after their election, and until their successors shall be duly qualified, subject to the conditions hereinafter prescribed; but for any reasonable cause, the governor shall remove any of them on the address of two thirds of each house of the general assembly: Provided, however, That the cause or causes for which such removal may be required, shall be stated at length in such address, and on the journal of each house. They shall, at stated times, receive for their services an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law, which shall not be diminished during the time for which they shall have been elected.

SEC. 4. The court of appeals shall consist of four judges, any three of whom may constitute a court for the transaction of business: Provided, That whenever a vacancy shall occur in said court, from any cause, the general assembly shall have the power to reduce the number of judges and districts, but in no event shall there be less than three judges and districts. In case a change in the number of the judges of the court of appeals shall be made, the term of office and number of districts shall be so changed as to preserve the principle of electing one judge every two years. The judges shall, by virtue of their offices, be conservators of the peace throughout the state. The style of all process shall be, "The Commonwealth of Kentucky." All prosecutions shall be carried on in the name and by the authority of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and conclude "against the peace and dignity of the same."

SEC. 5. The general assembly, at its first session after the adoption of this constitution, shall divide the state, by counties, into four districts, as nearly equal in voting population, and with as convenient limits as may be, in each of which the qualified voters shall elect one judge of the court of appeals.

SEC. 6. The judges first elected shall serve as follows, to-wit: one shall serve two; one four; one six, and one eight years. The judges, at the first term of the court succeeding their election, shall determine, by lot, the length of time which each one shall serve; and at the expiration of the service of each, an election in the proper district shall take place to fill the vacancy. The judge having the shortest time to serve shall be styled the Chief Justice of Kentucky.

SEC. 7. If a vacancy shall occur in said court, the governor shall issue a writ of election to fill such vacancy, for the residue of the term, and another judge shall be elected by that district, to serve until the expiration of the time for which the judge was elected, whose death, resignation, removal, or other cause, produced such vacancy.

SEC. 8. No person shall be eligible as judge of the court of appeals who is not a citizen of the United States, a resident of the district for which he may be a candidate, two years next preceding his election, at least thirty years of age, and who has not been a practicing lawyer eight years, or whose service upon the bench of any court of record, when added to the time he may have practiced law, shall be equal to eight years.

SEC. 9. The court of appeals shall hold its sessions at the seat of government, unless otherwise directed by law, but the general assembly may, from time to time, direct that said court shall hold sessions in any one or more of said districts.

SEC. 10. The first election of the judges of the court of appeals shall take place on the second Monday in May, 1851, and every two years thereafter, in the district in which a vacancy may occur, by expiration of the term of office; and the judges of the said court shall be commissioned by the governor.

SEC. 11. There shall be elected, by the qualified voters of this state, a clerk of the court of appeals, who shall hold his office for the term of eight years, from and after his election, and who may be removed by the court of appeals for good cause, upon information by the attorney general; and in case the general assembly shall provide for holding the court of appeals in any one or more of said districts, they shall also provide for the election of a clerk by the qualified voters of such district, who shall hold his office for eight years, possess the same qualifications, and be subject to removal in the same manner as the clerk of the court of appeals.

SEC. 12. No person shall be eligible to the office of clerk of the court of appeals unless he be a citizen of the United States, a resident of the state two years next preceding his election, of the age of twenty one years, and have a certificate from a judge of the court of appeals, or a judge of the circuit court, that he has been examined by their clerk, under the supervision of the court giving said certificate, and that he is qualified for the office for which he is a candidate.

SEC. 13. In case of a vacancy in the office of clerk of the court of appeals, the governor shall issue a writ of election, and the qualified voters of the State, or the district in which the vacancy may occur, shall elect a clerk of the court of appeals, to serve until the end of the term for which such clerk was elected: Provided, That when a vacancy may occur from any cause, or the clerk shall be under charges upon information, the judges of the court of appeals shall have power to appoint a clerk pro tem, to perform the duties of clerk until such vacancy shall be filled, or the clerk acquitted.

SEC. 14. The general assembly shall direct by law the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns, to the secretary of state, of all elections of the judges and clerk or clerks of the court of appeals, and of determining contested elections of any of these officers.

ARTICLE —.

Concerning Circuit Courts.

SEC. 1. There shall be established in each county now, or which may hereafter be erected in this commonwealth, a circuit court.

SEC. 2. The jurisdiction of said courts shall be, and remain as now established, hereby giving to the general assembly the power to change or alter it.

SEC. 3. The right to take an appeal, or sue out a writ of error to the court of appeals, is hereby given in the same manner, and to the same extent, as it now exists, giving to the general assembly the power to change, alter, or modify, said right.

SEC. 4. At the first session of the general assembly after this constitution shall go into effect, they shall divide the state into twelve judicial districts, having due regard to business, territory, and population: Provided, That no county shall be divided.

SEC. 5. The general assembly shall, at the same time that the judicial districts are laid off, direct elections to be held in each district, to elect a judge for said district, and shall prescribe how, and in what manner, the elections shall be held and conducted, and how the governor shall be notified of the result of the election, and who has been chosen: Provided, That such election shall be held at a different time from that at which elections are held for governor, lieutenant governor, and members of the general assembly.

SEC. 6. All persons qualified to vote for members of the general assembly, in each district, shall have the right to vote for judges.

SEC. 7. No person shall be eligible as judge of the circuit court who is not a citizen of the United States, a resident of the district for which he may be a candidate two years next preceeding his election, at least thirty years of age, and who has not been a practicing lawyer eight years, or whose service upon the bench of any court of record, when added to the time he may have practiced law, shall be equal to eight years.

SEC. 8. The term of office of the judges of the circuit court shall be six years from the day of the election. They shall be commissioned by the governor, and continue in office until their successors be qualified. The removal of a judge from his district shall vacate his office, and when a vacancy may happen from any cause, it shall be filled as hereinafter prescribed.

SEC. 9. The general assembly, if they deem it necessary, may establish one district every four years; but the judicial districts shall not exceed sixteen, until after the population of this state shall exceed one million five hundred thousand.

SEC. 10. The judges of the circuit courts shall, at stated times, receive for their services, an adequate compensation, to be fixed by law, which shall not be diminished during the time for which they shall have been elected.

SEC. 11. The judges of the circuit court shall be removed from office by a resolution of the general assembly, passed by two-thirds of each house. The cause or causes for such removal shall be entered at large on the journal of each house.

SEC. 12. The governor shall have no power to remit the fees of the clerk, sheriff, or commonwealth's attorney, in penal or criminal cases.

SEC. 13. If a vacancy shall occur in the office of judge of the circuit court, the governor shall issue a writ of election to fill such vacancy, for the residue of the term, and another judge shall be elected by that district, to serve until the expiration of the time for which the judge was elected, whose death or other cause produced such vacancy: Provided, That if the unexpired term be less than one year, the governor shall appoint a judge to fill such vacancy.

SEC. 14. The general assembly shall not change the venue in any criminal or penal prosecution; but they shall provide, by general laws, the mode and manner in which changes of venue in such cases may be had.

SEC. 15. In all trials for treason or felony, the commonwealth shall be entitled to peremptory challenges of jurors, equal to one fourth the number allowed the accused.

ARTICLE —.

Concerning County Courts.

SEC. 1. There shall be established in each county now, or which may hereafter be erected within this commonwealth, a county court, to consist of a presiding judge and two associate judges, any two of whom shall constitute a court for the transaction of business.

SEC. 2. The judges of the county court shall be elected by the qualified voters in each county, for the term of four years, and shall continue in office until their successors shall be duly qualified; and shall receive such compensation for their services as may be provided by law.

SEC. 3. At the first election after the adoption of this constitution, the three judges shall be elected at the same time, but the associate judge, es, first elected, shall hold their offices for only two years, so that, thereafter, the election of the presiding judge, and that of the associate judges, will not occur at the same time.

SEC. 4. No person shall be eligible to the office of presiding or associate judge of the county court unless he be a citizen of the United States, over twenty one years of age, and a resident of the county in which he shall be chosen, one year next preceeding the election.

SEC. 5. The jurisdiction of the county court shall be regulated by law; and, until changed, shall be the same now vested in the county courts of this state.

SEC. 6. The several counties in this state shall be laid off into districts of convenient size, as the general assembly may, from time to time, direct. Two justices of the peace shall be elected in each district, by the qualified voters therein, for the term of four years, each, whose jurisdiction shall be co-extensive with the county. No person shall be eligible as a justice of the peace, unless he be a citizen of the United States, twenty one years of age, and a resident of the district in which he may be a candidate six months next preceeding his election.

SEC. 7. Judges of the county court, and justices of the peace, shall be conservators of the peace. They shall be commissioned by the governor. County and district officers shall vacate their offices by removal from the district or county in which they shall be appointed. The legislature shall provide, by law, the mode and manner of conducting and making due returns of all elections of judges of the county court, and justices of the peace, and for determining contested elections, and provide the mode of filling vacancies in these offices.

SEC. 8. Judges of the county courts, and justices of the peace, shall be subject to indictment or presentment for malfeasance or misfeasance in office, in such mode as may be prescribed by law, subject to appeal to the court of appeals; and, upon conviction, their offices shall become vacant.

SEC. 9. The general assembly may provide by law that the justices of the peace in each county shall sit at the court of claims, and assist in laying the county levy and making appropriations only.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

On the motion of Mr. CLARKE the convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. MERIWETHER in the chair, and proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on the legislative department.

The report was read at length, and it was afterwards taken up by sections.

The first section was read and adopted without amendment, as follows:

SEC. 1. The legislative power shall be vested in a house of representatives and senate, which together shall be styled the general assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky.

The second section was read as follows:

SEC. 2. The members of the house of representatives shall continue in service for the term of two years from the day of the general election, and no longer.

Mr. BARLOW, to test the sense of the committee, moved to strike out the word "two," and insert "three," as the number of years during which the house of representatives shall continue in service.

The amendment was not agreed to, and the section was adopted without amendment.

The third section was read as follows:

SEC. 3. Representatives shall be chosen on the first Monday in August, in every second year; and the mode of holding the elections shall be regulated by law.

Mr. LISLE moved to strike out "Monday" and insert "Thursday."

Mr. ROOT. I hope the amendment will be adopted. I presume it is scarcely necessary to say more than a single word in favor of it; and that is that while elections are held on Monday it occasions the desecration of the Sabbath, which in a christian land we should endeavor to avoid.

Mr. TRIPLETT. The gentleman has, perhaps, overlooked the fact that the mode of conducting our elections is to undergo some change. His remarks may formerly have had some applicability, but it seems to have been determined that this convention will divide the counties into such districts that every man may, without inconvenience, go to the voting place in his precinct on Monday, and return to his home after exercising his franchise as a freeman.

Mr. ROOT. Every one knows that an election more or less agitates the public mind, and it is impossible to hold the election on Monday without occasioning the violation of the Sabbath. On that day there will be party arrangements made, caucus consultations held, and a marshaling of forces for the contest on the succeeding day. But hold the election in the middle of the week, and the desecration of the Sabbath may be avoided. I think it ought to be done, and that we, as a christian people, should make a constitutional provision that may have a tendency to avoid the desecration of the Sabbath, by preparations for a political contest.

Mr. CLARKE. Monday is the day on which elections have been held in this commonwealth for the last fifty years; and I do not remember to have heard one word during my canvass for a seat in this convention, in favor of a change. I heard no complaints that elections on Monday necessarily involve a violation of the Sabbath. I have had but little political experience, but I have had enough to satisfy me, that before an election there will be consultations, and a marshaling of forces, and whether the Sabbath occurs the day before, or three days before the election, candidates and their friends, if they think proper, will desecrate the Sabbath day. I do not see that much is to be gained by the change if the amendment should prevail. But sir, we should not forget that the people in this state have been accustomed to vote on Monday for the last fifty years. They have been reared to that custom, and I have heard no complaints of it, to call for a change. So far as I am concerned, however, I have no choice on the subject.

Mr. LISLE. I concur fully in the remarks of the gentleman from Campbell. I do not say that the day on which the elections should be held was made a subject matter of discussion in the late canvass; but, sir, I will say that the course which has been generally pursued on the day before an election is very much to be deprecated; and there will be great propriety in making a change. If any steps can be taken to avoid the desecration of the Sabbath at such times, I hope every gentleman will agree with me that it ought to be done. The counties may be divided into election districts, as has been suggested, but still the Sabbath will be desecrated; and I think there can be no serious objection to the change which I propose.

Mr. APPERSON. I am decidedly in favor of this amendment, and it is not the first time that I have reflected upon the subject and given expression to my opinions. It is not material what day you may fix, but as Thursday is in the middle of the week, it seems to be more likely to avoid a desecration of the sabbath. Now although I have no instructions on this subject, I know that in my county, and in the county of Simpson, there are very many good people who pray that it may be changed to some other day than Monday. In many of the states of this union other days are fixed. In Virginia and Tennessee I believe Thursday is the day fixed; in Ohio and Pennsylvania the elections are held on Tuesday. But I prefer Thursday to any other day.

Mr. TALBOTT. I am in favor of the amendment, sir, and I am somewhat surprised that any gentleman should object to it. It has been our custom to hold our elections for three days—on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday—but, sir, it is understood that for the future, the elections are to be limited to one day. Which of the three days may be determined upon can be a matter of but little importance, and therefore I presume that day will be fixed that will be the least objectionable. I have merely risen at this time to suggest to the mover of this amendment to select Wednesday instead of Thursday, Wednesday being one of the three days on which the elections have heretofore been held. There can be no doubt that the sabbath has been greatly desecrated, and as a christian people we should avoid it as much as possible.

Mr. HARDIN. It is not a matter of much importance whether it is Monday or Thursday. The only reason why I shall vote for Monday is, that we have always voted on Monday. Under the old constitution, we voted on the first Monday in May; now we vote on the first Monday in August. One day is just as good as another. All the difference on account of religious opinions is but of little consequence. I reckon the candidates are busy for several Sundays before the election. I will not say that they do not go to hear preaching, but they are generally on Sundays doing a little talking, and they will be busy on Sunday if we fix it on Thursday, or any other day.

So far as my experience goes, and it is considerable, the whole week before the election is devoted to arrangements. If one candidate forces on the other, public meetings, he must meet him; but from the Monday previous to the election they are making their arrangements, and generally they lie on their oars on Sunday. That has been my practice. I work uncommonly well during that week and then lie still on Sunday. I consider that I have done all that I can and then I leave the matter in the hands of the people and the Almighty. I would as soon have it on one day as another, except that we have always had it on Monday. We had it first in May, as I have said, and then after carrying it on seven or eight years, they fixed it on the first Monday in August. And I well recollect the reason why the elections were changed from May to August, as stated to me by Mr. Felix Grundy. It was, that the people who had to travel a great distance, as many did at that time, might be able to cross the streams when they were low, there being few bridges at that time.

Mr. TALBOTT. I understood the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin) to say, that he would not be governed by any sort of religious sentiment or consideration whatever in voting to fix the day for holding the elections hereafter. Sir, I did not expect to influence that gentleman's vote, or reach his feelings, by any considerations of that sort; he never has had, I believe, a very great fondness either for religious principles or religious people; but we all know that the sabbath has been greatly desecrated under our present mode of holding elections on Monday, and it is to avoid this difficulty, that I go for the amendment of the gentleman from Green—for Wednesday or Thursday, instead of Monday.

Mr. IRWIN. I am for having the election on one day, and I believe that day should be Thursday. The principle reason with me for favoring Thursday is, that on that day the election in Tennessee comes on, as well as in Virginia, and as they are adjoining states, I know there is frequently some interference. If, as is some times the case, they should happen to be opposed to a candidate it would go hard with him. I do not regard the question as of religious importance, for I never knew the sabbath desecrated for the purpose of canvassing for candidates.

Mr. HARDIN. I remarked that I did not care whether the day was changed or not, except for the reason that the people have always voted on Monday, and what they are accustomed to, is always agreeable to me, if it is not positively wrong. I said also, that whether the election was on Monday or Thursday, there would be as much sabbath breaking in one case as the other. I am sorry that the gentleman from Boyle made the personal remarks he did. I think he said it was a matter of indifference to me whether the Sabbath was kept or not.

Mr. TALBOTT. I understood the gentleman to remark that he would not be controlled by any sort of religious sentiment or consideration whatever in casting his vote on this subject. If I misunderstood him, I will not attribute to him that sentiment. I am not disposed to misrepresent any gentleman.

Mr. HARDIN. I made the remark, that the people would be about as much engaged in making arrangements for the election on Sunday, if the election is on one day as another. I acknowledge very candidly, and I acknowledge it with a degree of shame, that I am not a member of any church. I have encouraged my family, black and white, to go to church, and I have contributed toward the erection of meeting houses, perhaps as much as any man, and no man is more devoted to the great christian scheme than I am, even the gentleman from Boyle not excepted. I have never played the Pharisee, nor prayed and bellowed in the public streets, nor proclaimed my religion from the house tops; and the personal remarks of the gentleman from Boyle were entirely unnecessary, and as I think without provocation. Is it possible that the gentleman is offended at the remark which was attributed to me the other day? I was misrepresented in one remark which I made respecting him. Instead of saying the gentleman "broke down just this side of the flood," I said he "broke ground on this side of the flood."

Mr. TALBOTT. I have had no disposition to allude to the gentleman personally, to criminate or recriminate, to attack or be attacked by him in any way, either personally, socially, or politically. I came here with none other than the spirit of kindness, and I have malice against no man. But I understood the gentleman to have made the remark which I attributed to him, to be published to the world; but I withdraw my remarks, since he has explained what he said, and denies having made the statement.

Mr. HARDIN. I meant in what I said the other day, that the gentleman commenced his argument just about the time of the flood. I did not intend any personal remark to the gentleman from Boyle, nor have I had any but good feelings in any remarks I have made in reference to any gentleman. I bear good feelings to all, and I intend to keep on good terms, and if I attack a man, to break a lance with him, I will do it like a true knight, for I detest a man who will make an attack with a battle axe.

Mr. GHOLSON. I hope this debate on this unimportant matter may end. I will however say, that I agree with the gentleman from Nelson. If persons are disposed to violate the sabbath, they will do it whether the election comes on one day or another. If the election comes on Monday, they will lay aside canvassing on the Sunday generally. Monday is a time-honored day, but the question is of no sort of importance, and I hope the vote may now be taken.

Mr. GRAY. I prefer that the election should occur on Tuesday. It is one of the days on which we have been accustomed to vote, and one which will avoid the desecration of the sabbath. It is a day fixed for the election of the president of the United States, and I think there is a great propriety in having all elections on the same day of the week. The people expect us to fix on some day, and I think Tuesday will suit them as well as any other.

Mr. RUDD. I am in favor of continuing Monday as the day for holding the election, but in preferring that day, I am not governed by exactly the same reasons as those assigned by gentlemen who are disposed to be religious. I like that day for several reasons. It has been the custom of this state for the last fifty years, to commence its elections on a Monday, and there is no occasion to change the time. It is a very great day in Kentucky, when the people, in their majesty, are called upon to express at the polls, their opinions for or against the candidates in the field. The day, in short, is a great political sabbath, and one that should be well observed and regarded. I am glad to perceive the religious feeling which seems to animate the delegates in this house, and I would suggest to them, whether it would not be well for the people, in view of the election being held the day after the sabbath, to purify and prepare themselves for that event, by attending church, or remaining at home, taking rest, and calmly reflecting upon the important duties they will, as good citizens, be required to perform on Monday. By pursuing this course, they will be enabled to give a correct and honest vote, and also promote the religious interests of the country and its political welfare. Select any other day, and men would not go to the polls in quite as pure and serene a state of mind as on a Monday. I fully agree with the gentleman from Nelson in the remark, that all the canvassing is nearly over on the Saturday night preceding the election. The gentleman from Logan has said that Virginia and Tennessee hold their elections on Thursday, and therefore, he is in favor of that day for holding our elections, inasmuch as the voters in those states will not have an opportunity to interfere with us. Now, the game is perfectly fair for one political party as for the other. It is, as a gentleman remarked the other day, a fair fight, and there is no difficulty about it. Illinois and Indiana hold their elections on Tuesday, and Ohio on Monday, and the people of those states might cross the river and interfere in our elections; but we must keep a good look out, and prevent them. It has been said here, that the sabbath is violated on account of the election, by many persons and politicians. Well, I have nothing to do with their transgressions. I am not the conscience-keeper of any man or set of men. If men deport themselves in a moral and exemplary manner, and do not infringe on the civil and religious rights of their fellow citizens, I conceive we have nothing to do with their religious views and habits.

Mr. McHENRY. There is a reason which applies to the voters in my part of the state, which inclines me to prefer Monday to any other day. I think there will be more votes cast on that day, because there will be less inconvenience in being present on that day. There are, as we all know, many young men, who labor at a distance from home, and especially in the season when the election is to take place, who will desire to vote. Now if the precincts are small, these young men will find it very convenient to be at home with their families on the Sabbath, and to vote in their precincts on Monday, whereas it will be very inconvenient to leave their labor, at a distance of fifteen or twenty miles, and return to vote. Many of these men hire by the month and commence in the first part of the month and that is why I prefer the first Monday. I think also, we should not change old customs unless some good reason can be given; but I think gentlemen who are disposed to desecrate the Sabbath, will do it just as much if the election is on one day as another. These reasons have satisfied me that we ought to continue the day to which we have been accustomed.

Mr. MAYES. I think we are giving too much consequence to this proposition. The gentleman from Boyle has said, that he has heard no good reason why the day fixed by the committee should not be changed. The proposition is affirmative, and I suppose it should be the duty of the mover of the amendment to give reasons for the change. If I were satisfied that fixing the election on Wednesday or Thursday would prevent the desecration of the Sabbath, or tend to do it, I would certainly be disposed to vote for it, but I do not think it will change the matter in that respect. The people are generally satisfied with Monday for the day of election, and if it has been customary to violate the Sabbath in consequence of its being on that day, I have not hitherto known it. The practice has not existed in my part of the state; but if gentlemen can satisfy me that it will be better to have any other day than Monday, I shall vote for the change.

Mr. TALBOTT. This is the idea, I wish to convey in the remarks I have made. If the election should be held on Monday in place of Wednesday or Thursday, that persons would meet, on the Sunday immediately preceding the election, not merely for the purpose of violating or desecrating the day, but as this is the day on which all the churches of every denomination in the land meet for purposes of public worship, that those candidates and politicians who have no religious scruples, and who care not for the day; who wish to band their men and organize their parties would take advantage of these collections to get their men together and arrange for the next day. Although the candidates themselves might be at home, yet sir, here would be the inducement held out, and the facilities afforded for their friends to visit those worshipping assemblies, and by drinking and electioneering desecrate the day, disturb the congregations, and thus decoy off otherwise sober and sensible young men to some groggery or elsewhere, for political training and seduction; and by bribery and fraud to obtain their votes, and by drinking and otherwise, hold them together until the next day; an end, in my opinion, they could not possibly accomplish, if the election was held on Wednesday or Thursday. Every man would then be scattered throughout the land, engaged at his respective trade or occupation. It is sir, to avoid this difficulty and to attain this end that I go for the amendment of the gentleman from Green.

Mr. LISLE. I know it is with great difficulty that the house can resist the argument of my friend from Louisville, but still I differ from him as to the propriety of holding the election on Monday. If I believed what he stated to be true, I would be the last man to change the day of voting. If I believed that such a course was taken as to prepare men to give a better vote by the business in which they were engaged the day before, that they would in consequence give a better vote for the interests of their country, I would be the last man to change the day. But I believe it is not so, at least in many parts of the state, and I still insist that the interest of the country requires that the day should be changed. I make no pretensions to religion, but I believe that the highest and best interests of the country require that the religious institutions of this country should be maintained. I believe the destinies of the country depend on their preservation.

I have not been engaged in politics till this year, yet most of us have witnessed the scenes that have occurred on the day preceding the election, and I desire that they may be avoided on the Sabbath if possible. I think the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio are not perfectly correct. We have changed the day for holding the presidential election, and what was the consequence? The gentleman wishes to retain Monday because he thinks it will be more convenient. Is this a fact? Though the last presidential election was held on Tuesday there was as large a vote cast as was ever cast in the state. This shows that it was not inconvenient. If the Sabbath has been desecrated when but few officers were to be elected, how will it be when we elect all the officers that we propose to elect? I think the duty we owe to a large portion of our constituents—I speak with reference to my own—requires that a different day should be taken. It should be the object of this convention to give a fair opportunity that all classes may participate in the benefits which the constitution is to confer.

Mr. ROOT. Although it has been suggested that it is a small affair to waste the time of this convention upon, if gentlemen will reflect but one moment, they will find that much time has been wasted on more trivial subjects. Notwithstanding what gentlemen may say about being purified by going to church on the Sabbath before the election, those who have had experience in political life, know full well that instead of being purified by attending the house of God on the day before, they come to the election reeling, and covered over with sins and iniquities of the canvass. If Monday be fixed on as the day for election, and this constitution stand fifty years, all the wholesome influences of fifty Sabbaths will be obliterated and blotted out. It will do away with one whole year of Sabbaths given to the sons of Adam to fit themselves for a seat in a purer and more happy clime. They talk about electors that have been excited in a controversy waged in bitterness till Saturday night and then resting in quiet on the Sabbath. But I think it has not been thus nor will be in future, but the host of battle will continue their efforts, and hold on to victory or defeat. Look at the example of other states in this christian land, and you find that where they have recently revised their constitutions they have made their elections come on some other day than Monday; and cannot the representatives of Kentucky, a large, free, christian people, concede so small an amount to our holy religion by which our very liberties are to be preserved, as to fix an election a little removed from that day. Talk about the purity of election, the Sabbath day of election! To the shame of Kentucky, be it said, that our elections have been any thing else than pure. Directed by party rancor, and led on in many cases by the vilest demagogues, the public mind has been agitated, seething and boiling; and will you permit him who leads in this excitement to enter into the sanctuary of the Most High God, and there interrupt His worship?

It has been urged that the people have been accustomed to vote on Monday. This is not so. A great majority have voted on Tuesday and Wednesday; but even if it were so, does the gentleman, like those who, in the time of the revolution, had such a reverence for the old institutions of the mother country as to earn the title of Tories, entertain such a reverence for old customs, because they are old, as to insist on the continuance of this day.

This is an age of reforms, and among these reforms is the purification of society, intellectually and morally. We may make as good a constitution as man can form, yet without moral and intellectual culture, your laws are like ropes of sand. Let what influence this delegation has—solemn, sober and intelligent as they are—let their whole moral force be turned in favor of the christian sabbath. Gentlemen say that it will make no difference with regard to the observance of the sabbath, whether the elections are held on Monday, or any other day of the week; but it will make a difference, and it seems to me it is contrary to the common sense of every man in this house to say that it will not, for every one knows that the day before the election is the great day in which the party leaders are particularly engaged. If the election is in the latter part of the week, the sabbath will then be quiet.

Mr. NEWELL. I do not think there is much importance attached to the day in which we vote. I do not believe that forced prayer is good for the soul, under any circumstances. A man can commit as much crime on a Monday as on the sabbath. It strikes me that with some men, the day on which an act is committed makes a great difference. It makes no difference what a man does on other days, as they seem to think, if he draws on a long face, and goes to meeting on the sabbath.

Mr. WOODSON. I see by the eighth section of this report, that the voters of the commonwealth are required to vote in their own precincts, and no where else; or, at least, they must be residents in the precincts in which they vote, sixty days previous to the election. Most of the county courts come on Monday, and a great many persons in different counties have business at the different court houses on Monday. Some precincts are large, and if some of the voters must attend the court on Monday, they cannot go home and vote in their own precincts. I think Thursday a better day than Monday. I will offer another consideration which may strike the minds of some gentlemen. My experience is that the week of the election is lost by a large portion of the citizens of each county. They go to the election on Monday, stay Tuesday and Wednesday, and squander away the remainder of the week. It is a matter of economy and saving of time to have the election on Thursday. To say that we should vote on Monday merely because we have done so, is not a reason that would influence me. It is no argument to me to say that a thing should exist merely because it has existed.

Mr. RUDD. I am sorry that anything I have said has aroused the religious feelings of my friend from Campbell, for I thought I was rather advocating and aiding the views which he entertains. It seems, however, that I have not been so fortunate. The gentleman has spoken of the disreputable and disorderly manner in which the sabbath preceding the elections is spent in this state, and has intimated that the day is no better observed in Louisville. I beg the gentleman from Campbell not to judge my constituency by his own. To save the gentleman's feelings in reference to the alleged desecration of the sabbath, he says he would be in favor of Tuesday, Wednesday, or Thursday, or any other day than Monday. As to Thursday, that would be the very worst time that could be fixed upon, for men would gather together on the Sunday previous to the election day, for the purpose of consulting and arranging matters in relation to the ensuing election, as they could not break in upon the business of the week, and lose three days in canvassing immediately before the contest should begin. Monday, as I have already said, is the very best day that can be selected, and I have given many reasons why it is so. I will give another, there are a great many mountain boys and boys from the flats on Green river, who are not quite as particular about their dress and personal appearance as we of Louisville, and do not put on a clean shirt, and other apparel until Sunday. They are laboring men, and cannot do it. Well, these poor fellows on the sabbath before the election, put on their clean clothes, and perhaps go to church, and the following morning they attend the polls and give in their votes. Change the election to Thursday, and these men cannot appear on the election ground in as clean and comfortable condition—to say nothing about their having to abandon their labor in the middle of the week, causing an interruption to business and much inconvenience to their employers. As has been truly remarked by a gentleman on this floor—if a man sins on a Monday, it is the same as if he had done so on a Sunday. There is no difference. Murder is the same every day of the week, and so is drunkenness, or any other crime. I say the people are accustomed to vote on Monday; but the gentleman says they are not, and that they vote more on the Wednesday. I say they do not, and that more than one half the votes are given in on Monday. I shall now conclude with the expression of my hope that the convention will not change the day of election, for it is the best and most convenient one that we can select.

Mr. GRAY. I ask for a division of the question.

The question was divided accordingly, and taken first on striking out "Monday," which was not agreed to. The motion to insert consequently fell with it.

Mr. WOODSON. I desire to amend the section by inserting after the word August, the words "between the hours of nine o'clock A. M. and seven o'clock P. M."

If there is any thing on earth that we should preserve more free from contamination than any thing else in a free country, it is the right of suffrage. I have listened to eloquent speeches and discussions on this floor, on the subject of man's capacity for self government. It has been said that the people will not be influenced in such a manner as to affect the right of suffrage. Notwithstanding I think the people are capable of self government, I, in common with every other man, must admit that many improper influences are used throughout Kentucky. Indeed no one can doubt, who has had his eyes open to the history of the past in this commonwealth, but what money has had a powerful influence in all elections. Indeed, treating and bribing have been resorted to in some portions of the country, to a great extent. So much money has been required to carry on a canvass, that it has operated against the election of virtuous men, who happened to be poor. Now, in Kentucky, there has been an almost universal condemnation of three days elections. Why? Because, on Monday night the polls being closed in one part of the county, Tuesday and Wednesday were spent in carrying the news, and if it was a close contest every means was employed to procure the election of the respective candidates. If the provision in the present section is retained, my impression is, that improper influences will continue to be exerted. I admit, if we have but one day, we shall accomplish much against improper influences. But have we done all we can, and all we are required to do on the present occasion? I do not wish to see the constitution encumbered with any thing that ought not to be in it. I wish to see no more detail than is necessary, but I have heard gentlemen say that if this provision is permitted to remain, the legislature will have power to prescribe the hours in which the election shall be held. I think this will not be done. The constitution is the supreme law of the country, and it declares that elections shall be held on the first Monday in August. There I consider the phraseology as including the entire day. Suppose the legislature should enact that elections shall be held between nine and seven o'clock. There would be an act of the legislature; but on the other side, there would be the constitution. The judges of the election would, in nine cases out of ten, put a construction on the constitution by which they might keep the polls open the entire day. What would be the consequence? I have known the polls kept open till midnight under the present constitution. What is the language of the old constitution?

"Representatives shall be chosen on the first Monday in the month of August, in every year; but the presiding officers of the several elections shall continue the same for three days, at the request of any one of the candidates."

I have known them kept open till midnight. Why? Because they wished to get voters to come in who are often brought, even against their wishes, to elect a favorite candidate. The liberties of the people of this country depend on the free, unbought exercise of the right of suffrage. If the amendment I offer is adopted, it will accomplish this object, because they cannot know who is ahead among the different aspirants for office. But if the polls are kept open through the entire day, do we not know what will be the result? Efforts will be made to keep the polls open that the neighboring precincts may be heard from, and when heard from, great efforts will be made to carry the election of a favorite candidate. But, if this is adopted, when the hour of seven arrives, the polls will be closed, the people will have voted for their representative or member of congress, and there will have been an exercise of the free, untrammelled right of suffrage, upon which the liberties of this country, to a great extent, depend. In looking to the future I see nothing more alarming than the manner in which our elections are likely to be carried on, because merit is not regarded as it should be by the voters, and we know that voters are bought and sold in lots, of dozens and fifties. By this amendment you cut off the ability of individuals to practice these frauds on the right of suffrage, on the great mass of the people of Kentucky. I do not see what good reason can be offered against the amendment I propose. Shall I be told that the people cannot all come to the polls and vote within the hours I have pointed out. I have allotted ten hours for voting. If, in populous places, as in the county of Jefferson and Fayette, they have not time to come to the polls, it will be an easy matter for the legislature to make more precincts so that they can. When this is done, the bribery and corruption, which now exist, will cease.

Mr. HARDIN. I did not distinctly understand the reason that was assigned by the gentleman for fixing the hours of 9 o'clock in the morning and 7 in the evening as the limit for the continuance of the elections. The sun will rise, I believe, on the first Monday in August about 5 o'clock, and yet we are to wait four hours before the polls will be opened. I apprehend that some inconvenience may arise from deferring the hour of commencing. It will be better I think to fix an earlier hour. It is important to afford an opportunity to old men to give their votes before the crowd becomes too great. I am opposed to making any change in reference to the hours for opening and closing the polls unless some good reason be assigned why it should be done.

This government has been in operation about fifty seven years, and ever since it commenced, the plan that we have pursued in reference to this matter has been found to work very well. We have never seen any good reason for making a change.

Mr. WOODSON. As the gentleman is anxious to have an opportunity to get to the polls—as he is becoming an old man—I will move to insert “6” in place of “9.”

Mr. HARDIN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. PRESTON. As a member of the legislative committee, to whom this subject was referred, I will state, for the information of my honorable friend, that at one time the committee considered it would be proper to insert a provision regulating the hours at which the polls should be opened and closed; but upon consideration, the committee struck out that clause for the very reason that has been urged by the gentleman from Knox why it should be inserted. In the first place, we thought that as we were reducing the number of days on which the election should be held, from three to one, we ought not to declare that the time of election should be confined to the fraction of a day; we thought it would not be proper to restrict the time of election beyond a day. In the next place, we knew of no evil that had resulted either in this state or any other, from merely declaring the day on which the election shall be held without prescribing hours. We have been living some fifty odd years under the present constitution, as the gentleman from Nelson has observed, and no practical evil has resulted from the course that has been pursued; and in looking over the constitutions of other states, I do not find a single one where it has been found necessary to restrict the time of holding the election beyond one day. For this reason we thought it would be better to leave it unrestricted, by using the words “one day,” instead of defining the hours, as it was unprecedented to do so, and consequently we did not deem it necessary to introduce such restriction here.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I am obliged to the gentleman from Knox for offering this amendment, and I shall vote for it as now modified. Gentlemen say that no evil has resulted from the different constructions given to the word “day” in our present constitution. I think, sir, if I had George Knight here, from Shelbyville, I could prove the reverse. He was defeated once, when a candidate for congress, by means of the polls being kept open until 12 o'clock on Wednesday night. I can state for myself, that in the first essay I made for a seat in the congress of the United States in 1822, with the full knowledge that I was at the time three if not four hundred votes ahead, an effort was made at sundown to keep the polls open until 12 o'clock, on the ground that that hour was the termination of the day. All the officers of election were opposed to me; but one of the judges, believing that such a proceeding was not one that could be justified by a fair interpretation of the constitution, after candles were lighted, noted the state of the polls, and rose from his seat and said he would preside no longer at the election. His declaration had its effect, and the recollection of an election that had taken place not long before being fresh in the minds of an honest community, they cried out “no midnight election.” The candles were blown out, and the election was declared to be over. These are two instances that have occurred to my memory in which difficulty has arisen from the want of stated hours for the opening and closing of the polls. I suppose that it is understood and intended by this convention that no election shall be held after sundown, and to commence at 6 o'clock, I think is early enough. I shall vote therefore for the proposition of the gentleman from Knox.

Mr. APPERSON. I think it is very necessary that there should be a specific limitation as to the hour of opening and closing the polls. There are frequent instances of continuing the election until 12 o'clock at night. I can appeal to my friend from Lexington if this has not been the case in his county. But on the other hand, the polls are sometimes closed at an early hour. There is no uniformity, and this want of uniformity has been productive of much difficulty. In the county of Montgomery, in 1843, I wanted to introduce votes in the afternoon of the day of election, but I was told that they could not be received. My opponent got his certificate of election in consequence of the polls being closed at an early hour; but upon a proper representation being made, we run the election over again, and I obtained my seat to which I was entitled before. There is a great want of uniformity. In some counties, the election is held after night, in others it is terminated before the sun goes down. Let us fix the hours in the constitution and then there will be nothing to quibble about.

Mr. HARDIN. I am willing to agree to the resolution, if the hour of 6 be inserted, not on my own account, but for general convenience. We cannot make a provision in the constitution for extreme cases; it is utterly impossible.

Mr. CLARKE. I can add very little to the remarks of the gentleman from Louisville, in favor of this section as it is. The objection to the section is, that if it remains in its present shape, the polls in the different counties may be kept open until 12 o'clock at night. It was thought by the committee that the legislature of the state would have the power, if any evil should result from a practice of this sort, to change it. As was remarked by the gentleman from Louisville, we did once agree to insert in the section that the polls should be opened at a certain hour, and closed at a certain hour; but when the committee agreed to amend this portion of the section by this provision "and the mode of holding elections shall be regulated by law," they concluded that it would not answer to restrict the voting to a particular hour of the day, but that the legislature would have the power, if it should become necessary, hereafter to impose such restriction. It is also true that we examined the constitutions of all the different states, and according to my recollection, we found no constitution where there is any such restriction as that proposed by the gentleman from Knox.

Suppose the polls are held open in every county until midnight, and illegal votes are given, the party injured has his remedy. I have no recollection of an election in the part of the country where I reside, in which the polls were kept open after sun-set; but I am of the opinion, that if exception should be taken to voting after sun-set, or if it should be the sense of the people of the state, that a limit should be placed on the time of voting within one day, the legislature will have full and ample power to impose that restriction. I shall vote for the section as it stands and against the amendment.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was adopted.

The secretary then read the 4th section, which was adopted without amendment, as follows:

SEC. 4. No person shall be a representative, who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States, and hath not attained to the age of twenty four years, and resided in this state two years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof in the county, town, or city, for which he may be chosen.

The 5th section was then read by the secretary as follows:

SEC. 5. The general assembly shall divide the several counties of this commonwealth into equal and convenient precincts, or may delegate such power to such county authorities as they may by law provide; and elections for representatives for the several counties entitled to representation, shall be held at the places of holding their respective courts, and in the several election precincts into which the counties may be divided: Provided, That when it shall appear to the legislature that any city or town hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such city or town, shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation, in both houses of the general assembly, which shall be retained so long as such city or town shall contain a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio, which may, from time to time, be fixed by law; and thereafter, elections for the county, in which such city or town is situated, shall not be held therein; but such city or town shall not be entitled to a separate representation, unless such county, after the separation, shall also be entitled to one or more representatives.

Mr. IRWIN. I will move to strike out the three first lines of this section down to the word "and," and insert the following:

"The general assembly shall cause the several counties of this commonwealth to be divided into civil districts, each of which shall constitute an election precinct."

The object I have in view in proposing this amendment, is this. It will be recollected that the counties are to be laid off into districts, for the purpose of holding the elections for members of the legislature, and I suppose the elections in those districts will proceed in the same manner as they would in counties. The house will readily perceive the object of the amendment. As it has been considered necessary to make election precincts, for the members of the legislature, I think we ought to provide that such other officers as we may have to elect, shall be elected at the same places.

Mr. PRESTON. I will remark to the gentleman from Logan, that the house has not yet decided that these districts shall be established. It may probably do so; I suppose it will. But there is nothing in the first part of the section that precludes the legislature from doing precisely as they may desire in this matter. If it should hereafter be determined to establish these districts, it will be entirely in the power of the legislature to do so; but as yet such districts have not been provided for.

Mr. IRWIN. I take it for granted, the counties will be laid off into districts or precincts for the purposes of election, and my desire is that they shall harmonize.

Mr. McHENRY. Before the question is put I will move to strike out the words "equal and," in the second line. The word "convenient," I think will be sufficient. It will then read, "The general assembly shall divide the several counties of this commonwealth into convenient precincts."

Mr. PRESTON. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT. I have a difficulty in regard to the section as it stands, which I will suggest. The authority given to the legislature, to divide the counties into districts will occasion a great amount of local legislation, on the subject of these precincts, in the establishment of them and in the alteration of them from time to time; and it strikes me that the legislature never can act as well as the local authorities who are familiar with the position of the county, and although this section permits them to delegate the power to the local authorities of the several counties in the commonwealth to make these divisions, still the legislature will have a revisory power over them, and that revision will lead to an immense amount of local legislation, which I desire, if practicable, to avoid. That is the difficulty which presents itself to my mind, in relation to this part of the section.

I see it is intended that there shall be districts for electing justices of the peace.

Now it would be very inconvenient to have two sets of districts in the several counties, one for political elections and one for the election of justices of the peace and constables. I would like to see the districts that may be laid off for one purpose, subserve the purposes of both.

It strikes me that it had better be left to the local authorities of the county, with some such provision superadded, as that the number shall be but so many, so as to give to each county the necessary number of magistrates. I merely make this suggestion for the consideration of the gentleman from Logan.

Mr. IRWIN. I know that the counties along the state line in Tennessee, have been laid off as I propose here, into civil districts. I suppose the amendment that I have offered will answer the purpose which the gentleman from Louisville has just alluded to.

Mr. PRESTON. In regard to the clause to which the gentleman from Logan alludes, it was in the contemplation of the committee when the section was drafted; and I suppose it entered into the consideration of some of the gentlemen of the committee, as into mine, that there ought to be double power in regard to these precincts, by the legislature reserving to itself, in the case of its tyrannical exercise, the right to remedy any evil resulting from the misuse of this power by the local authorities, or in case they refuse to exercise it. That is an answer to the first objection. The second objection is already embraced in the reply which I made a few moments since, in regard to the amendment of the gentleman from Logan. We were not advised at the time this report was made, as to what would be the ultimate action of the committee, on the subject of the county courts, as to organizing justices districts within counties. I presume the committee will have no objection—I shall have none—that the members of the assembly shall be elected in the same precincts provided for the election of the justices of the peace. But the section may be incongruous, perhaps, with the various propositions that may be submitted. All that we intend to do here, is to declare that equal and convenient precincts shall be established, and when the committee of arrangement takes up the subject, they will make those various provisions harmonize, and probably these precincts for magistrates will be the very best for all other purposes.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If the gentleman will refrain from pressing his amendment, I think the committee and himself will agree in regard to this matter, and that his views may be carried out. My idea is, that we should provide for the county courts, and if the respective counties and districts amount to no more than one-half of the number of the justices of the peace allotted to the county, it may be so arranged. My idea is, that as the committee on county courts have agreed that two magistrates are to be allotted to each district, they may make the civil, as well as the election districts correspond.

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

Mr. HARDIN. I would invite the attention of the chairman of the committee to a part of the fifth section: "Provided, that when it shall appear to the legislature, that any city or town hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such city or town shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation in both houses of the general assembly."

I want to know if the committee intend that a city that has the number of inhabitants that is fixed as the ratio for representation in the senate, shall be entitled to elect a senator? I think the section needs some modification. Some delegates on this floor have directed my attention to this provision in the fifth section, and I have had occasion to examine it. There is another section in this bill, which refers to the apportionment of representation; and the term ratio, here, is used with reference as well to the representatives to the lower branch of the general assembly as to senators. This section may, perhaps, be obnoxious to the charge of being a little ambiguous; but my own opinion is, that no construction will be regarded as a fair one, that does not permit a city or town, where there is the requisite number of qualified voters, to send a senator. My own impression is, that this will be the fair construction, although if it be considered ambiguous, I have no objection that the section shall be amended, so that this intention may be more clearly expressed.

Mr. LINDSEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "in both houses of the general assembly;" believing we go far enough in separating a town or city from her county, for representation in the lower branch of the legislature. These words stricken out, the report of the committee will read as the present constitution does, and that has been construed to withhold from cities and towns separate representation in the senate.

Counties are made for the convenience of citizens, to enable them to carry on their affairs where the agency of the government is necessary, and representation has to be apportioned in reference to them, as well as to population.

The county of Jefferson, for example, has her courts, and offices for the transaction of county business in the city of Louisville. The interests of city and county are blended, and all legislation for county purposes applies to both. It appears to me, the general rule that keeps the people of counties together in the selection of their representation, is far enough departed from, in giving separate members in the house of representatives to a city or town.

Mr. HARDIN. I only rose originally, and do so now, to say that I certainly do not intend to deny that a city should be entitled to senatorial representation when they have a sufficient number of voters, and if a better substitute is not provided, I will prepare one.

Mr. PRESTON. I will ask leave to make two verbal amendments by striking out the word "legislature," and inserting "general assembly," in the seventh line, and inserting the words "either or" in the tenth line of this section.

The amendments were agreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Franklin, to strike out from the tenth line, the words "in either or both houses of the general assembly."

OK LAW LIBRARY

THE PRESIDENT. Under the present constitution, and under, I believe, as gross a construction as was ever put upon such an instrument—after the city of Louisville became entitled to a separate representation in the lower branch of the general assembly, and it was fore-ordained upon her, and after she had the ratio that entitled her to a senator, it was denied to her; and she has never had a senator, though she has had, at two periods when elections were held, a sufficient number of qualified voters to entitle her to one. And the phraseology of the provision that has been reported here, was intended to place on the correct ground her rights, and the rights of all other cities that shall in time grow up in the commonwealth of Kentucky. The city of Louisville, and the county of Jefferson, though having voters enough to give two senators, have but one; and the consequence is, that the city of Louisville has the power completely to control and swallow up the county of Jefferson, by force of her superior numbers, and the disproportion will continue to increase, and the effect will be, that the voice of the county of Jefferson, will be entirely suppressed in the senate of Kentucky, for all time to come; unless she may control the vote, by taking the choice of two individuals, whom Louisville may present; and though she may have a sufficient number of qualified voters, exclusive of Louisville, to entitle her to representation in the senate, she never can have it under the restrictions that will be put into the present constitution, and the city of Louisville never will have it.

The present constitution was intended to make representation as equal and uniform as it could be, and that the voice of freemen, whether in the city or upon the mountain, should be the same in making the laws that are to govern them and their posterity. The considerations, and the reasons that operated to prevent the city of Louisville from having representation in the senate, appear to have been of a selfish character. In order that other sections of the state might enjoy that representation to which they were not entitled by numbers, a senator was refused to Louisville, although she was entitled to one according to the construction put upon the constitution. Under the constitution that we are about to make, we expect that equal rights and equal justice in regard to representation will be meted out to all portions of the state. I do not desire to lessen the voice of any section of the state in the legislature. I desire that we shall come, as near as we can, to an equal representation in the legislature, and I hope and trust that gentlemen will not consider themselves at liberty to deny to us, in Louisville, or in the county of Jefferson, the same right of representation which they claim for themselves. And here is the ground where we shall be able to test the devotion of gentlemen to the principle of equality of rights, about which they have declaimed so much.

The amount of political authority that they take from the freemen in the city of Louisville, and from the freemen of the county of Jefferson, they appropriate to themselves; and so far as they appropriate it to themselves, and stifle the voice of a number of freemen, equal to the ratio that will give a senator, to that same extent do they deny that they are in favor of giving equal rights, and equal privileges, and equal political power to all the people of the commonwealth.

I could not, however much I might debate the subject, put the convention more fully in possession of the ideas I have upon this subject, and of the feeling of injury that will visit the bosom of every individual who has his rights thus trampled upon.

MR. CLARKE. When the committee approached this question, there were various plans suggested, or rather there were three principles suggested on which representation might be based. The one, however, that we considered the proper principle, was, that it should be based on population. I am aware, sir, that the provision contained in the section, which was regarded as ambiguous, and perhaps to some extent may have been so, was inserted for the purpose of enabling towns and cities in the state to be fully and fairly represented. Every member of the committee who assisted in its insertion in this bill, did so for that purpose, and none other. I was unable to discover why the citizens of a town should not be represented, where the citizens of the country were represented; and I thought if we established population as the basis of representation, that it was but fair and right that the population of a city, wherever it might be, should be fully and fairly represented. I apprehend that there is no gentleman here, who will say, that if there are four thousand legal voters within the limits of the corporation of the town of Frankfort, and four thousand voters be the ratio fixed by law for a senator, those four thousand voters should not be represented in the senate of the state. While I make this statement, I know that perhaps after the lapse of fifty years, these cities may grow to be so large that in sending their concentrated influence into both branches of the legislature, they may, perhaps, to some extent, overshadow the balance of the state; but we have laid down the great principle, that representation shall be based upon population, and we cannot—unless we depart from that principle, and I believe it meets with the sanction of every gentleman in this house—withhold from a city the right to be represented in both houses of the general assembly, and at the same time extend the right to the citizens of counties.

I think the amendment made by the gentleman from Louisville, destroys all that want of distinctness that was thought to exist by other gentlemen. After having inserted the words proposed by him to be inserted, there can be no doubt as to the interpretation, and a city or town having fifteen hundred qualified voters, and fifteen hundred being the ratio of representation in the lower house, the city or town would be entitled to a representation in the lower branch of the general assembly; and if she have four thousand, and that be the ratio for senator, she will be entitled to a senator in the legislature of the state. That is all right sir, and it is, as I now remember, nothing more nor less than the sense of the whole committee that made this report, or authorized it to be made.

Mr. LINDSEY. I made the motion to strike out in all fairness, not intending to point at Louisville, or any other place in particular. I did it to preserve the old constitutional provision, and not extend separate city representation to both branches of the general assembly, as proposed by the report of the committee. I think, as was remarked when the motion was made, there is propriety in adhering to the constitutional rule now in being, and of not extending it.

The honorable chairman of the committee on the legislative department contends, we must look to population alone as the basis of representation. The general principle is right, but it has to be applied to other matters than population. We have to apply it to population arranged now into counties, cities, and towns, an organization and arrangement we would not derange or break up for twice the inconveniences that may result from slight inequality in representation.

This far, political and civil regulations and property must necessarily affect the principle that representation shall be based on population.

I need no better argument and proof of what I have just stated, than is furnished by the whole section reported by the committee. Take their rule of apportionment, and apply it to any ratio you choose to assume, and see whether there will not be inequality. Counties having two-thirds the ratio are to have one representative—giving here a violation of the rule. Counties having the ratio fixed and two-thirds more, violate it again; and so in placing residuums in any form you can assume. Indeed sir, it is obvious, you cannot take population alone, as the basis, without disregarding the established internal organization of the state, and producing more difficulty than slight inequality will cause. And were you to make new lines and new internal arrangements geographically, they would be ever varying and changing as population increased or diminished.

To my mind, inequality in a greater or less degree must ever exist until we have a more permanent and fixed population, and better and more equal county organization—matters I do not expect to see.

We are sir, then to take population not in the aggregate as we may find it at any apportionment, but we must take it as we find it fixed and circumscribed by county lines, and the best rule is that which will leave the smallest numbers unrepresented, and at the same time give to each county some weight and voice in the administration of state affairs.

Where taxation and fair representation go together, as they do in the governments on this continent, though the representation may not be based wholly on population, but as nearly so as is convenient to existing county arrangements, and having in view the balance of power among the counties, there is no danger, as the honorable president of the convention has argued, of liberty and equality being trampled in the dust.

I put it to honorable delegates, when they give to the city of Louisville, for example, her separate city representation, backed too by the force and power of the representation from Jefferson county, having county interests in common with the city, and swallowing up, perhaps, and adding to her representation the force and power, to some extent, of a neighboring county, by her residuums so easily made at any period, do we not give enough without increasing her political influence and strength, by adding city senators. It appears to me we do all that is right, and as much as should be asked. And we do not do that violence which honorable gentlemen suppose, to the rule, that population shall constitute the basis of representation.

Counties having cities and towns ought not to influence us to break up county organizations for them, because they may not have city as well as county influence in both branches. Although we may slightly deviate from the rule, that population is to be the basis of representation, no more than those of us of smaller counties having no cities or towns, should expect to see county organizations abandoned, because when they are regarded, inequality of representation may result in numbers above or below the ratio or in residuums. It will be found, when cyphered out by any rule, the old constitutional plan is as fair and as equal as we can make it.

But sir, government is to look to other matters than equality of representation. The weak are to be protected from the more powerful; the poor from the overshadowing influences of the rich. We may not be able to effect these desirable ends by any constitutional rules to be applied to individuals; but sir, we may, in looking to counties, preserve, to some extent, a fair division of power and influence, and keep the stronger from swallowing up, in the legislation of the county, the interest of weaker counties.

Some of the arguments of my Louisville and Jefferson county friends on the proposition to separate the county and city, and give them separate municipal organization for county purposes, might be applied here, but I only make reference to them.

You know, Mr. Chairman, that this principle of preventing large interests from destroying smaller ones, is always provided for in your acts of the general assembly, creating corporations for any purpose. The voting or representation goes by shares until you arrive at a certain number, and then decrease rapidly in the hands of the holders of large numbers so as to prevent large interests from wholly overpowering small ones. I will not proceed, sir, to state the rule by which they calculate influence in this way. The reason of it is obvious enough. It is a fair one, sir, to apply to representation to cities where there must, in the nature of things, be a concentration of strength from numbers, wealth and talent, and a union of interests that will always give force and effect to the wishes or wants of a people thus situated. These things are not to be found in the diversified interests of a people scattered over a large territory and following pursuits of various kinds, not dependent one on another as in cities. And when, sir, with these powers staring us in the face, we depart from this county arrangement, in order to give city representation, and we place no restriction on the increase of a city's popular representation in that house of the general assembly which governs the taxing power, the representation from cities here ought not to complain if we refuse to depart from county organization as to senatorial representation.

There is another view of the matter not to be wholly disregarded. The several representatives from the smaller counties seeing the superior advantages which concentration of wealth, largeness of population, and union of interest, found in cities, will have over their people scattered in large territories, especially when they are giving to the cities representation, where taxation can alone originate, have the right, on the principles of self-preservation, to check that superior influence, in some degree, by holding, themselves, more weight in the senatorial branch, which branch of the government we know is not designed or intended to represent single interests, or the immediate popular will, as in the house of representatives.

For myself, I would as soon give a city an increased number of representatives over what she might be entitled to by the apportionment, as to give her a separate senator. He will represent a single interest as much so as if he were a representative in the lower branch, while other senators throughout the state will represent several interests, as distinct as separate county organizations can make them—or the limited number of senators allowed, must necessarily require several counties, not having cities, to be united to form a senatorial district.

Sir, as a city grows in population and wealth, and her concentrated power expands thereby, so will her overpowering political influence widen. For when she gets two or even three senators, there will be but one common interest to represent—the one city's glory to promote. None of her senators will be like those who represent several counties, who have always to compromise between the several county requirements and wants and regard all alike. They will strike always, ever and alone, for their city's promotion and power, and nothing else.

We are not taking from a city any right or privilege she has heretofore enjoyed. The report of the committee is extending her power and influence in the legislative department. We are asked to give it; shall we do it? We are not bound, as I have tried to show, on the principle contended for by the chairman of the committee, as he has assumed as the basis of representation. We ought not, for the other reasons I have hinted at; and I do believe when you look to proper equality and balance of power in the senate, you will concur with me and cause the motion to prevail. I am too unwell to enlarge further, and should not have made the motion in the first place, or spoken now, had other delegates indicated a purpose to do so.

Mr. TURNER. I did not expect that we would reach this subject to-day, and therefore I am not prepared to express my views upon it as its importance requires. But I will submit some suggestions. I have no desire to do injustice either to the people of Jefferson or Louisville, or of any other portion of the state, but it does seem to me, that by the adoption of the principle contained in this section, a great injustice will be inflicted upon the general interests of this commonwealth. I concede that representation ought generally to be based on population, but I believe also that there are just and proper exceptions to that rule, the reasons for which, at a future day, may strongly develop themselves in Kentucky. The southern and interior portions of the state are and ever will be agricultural. An agricultural population is never so dense as a manufacturing and commercial one. Now take the people along the Ohio from one extreme of the state to the other, including the cities and a strip of territory of ten miles in width along that line, and their pursuits will ultimately be commercial and manufacturing, and are so now to a considerable extent. What is the great and predominating interest that should be secured by our policy here? It is the agricultural—the rights of those who have invested their capital in agriculture. But unless we adopt some proper safeguards, the time will come when that interest will be entirely subservient to the commercial and manufacturing interests of the state. Take that region of country along the Ohio to which I have referred, and the prospect is that the time will come, and probably within fifty years, that it will include a majority of the population of the state. The cities and manufacturing establishments that are rapidly growing up all along that river, give ample promise that this will be so, and I am not opposed to their growth or pursuits. Shall we, in fixing upon a basis of representation, put the great agricultural interests of the whole state entirely within the power of that strip of territory along the Ohio? By what kind of population is that territory to be filled up? There is a very clever population there now, or a large part of it is such, and I doubt not a great portion of it will continue to be so; but there will be a great portion who will have no kindred feeling with the great agricultural interests of Kentucky at all. It will be manufacturing and commercial in its characteristics, and will comprise many, nay I apprehend a majority, who prefer different institutions from what exist in Kentucky; those institutions I mean which created the excitement last summer. No man can doubt that those influences are growing up in a manner which will shake to its foundation the great institution we have come here to protect, unless we guard it in fixing the basis of representation. Mark how this institution is crumbling away all along the Ohio, and how unsafe this description of property is becoming on that margin of the state. Mark who are taking the place of the black population, and observe the feelings of the great portion of the people who are filling up these manufacturing towns and cities all along the river. They are generally hostile to the institution of slavery, and disposed to go hand in hand with its enemies that live across the river. Then it behooves us to look to this state of things, and to guard against its effects. If we are not willing that our property should be placed within the reach of those coming over and settling on our borders, and who do not possess a kindred feeling on the subject with the residue of us, we must provide a barrier to their political power and action in the constitution we are about to make.

As the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Lindsey) has said, representation is not in the United States, or in any part of the world, based entirely on population. There may be and there are reasons in the organization of every government why it should not be exclusively based on this principle. I am utterly opposed to basing representation on property; it should be based on population where it is stable and fixed in its residence, but not where it is floating and unsettled.

It is not right where the interests of a community would be insecure under its allowance. Why is it not adopted in the constitution of the United States? It was seen that the large states would swallow up and control the small ones, so that their influence would be as nothing in the affairs of the federal government, unless the same power was given them in one branch of congress as was given to the larger states. And the compromise was, that in the house of representatives, white population should be mainly the basis of representation, but that in the senate each state should be on an equal footing, the small with the large states. Little Delaware has as great a voice in the United States senate as the empire state of New York. Again, white population is not the sole basis of representation in the house of representatives in congress—nor is representation in a majority of the states of the Union, based without exception on numbers.

My honorable colleague and myself represent a pretty large county, but if you adopt the proposition now pending, the little and the interior and second sized counties will be greatly wronged.

A large county will be allowed on that ratio one senator, or one-thirty-eighth of the power of government, while several small counties would not have that power, though their population should come within ten votes of the ratio. The result would be, that a certain number of voters in a town or city would give the county and town a senator, when if the same number was distributed between two counties they would have none. The principles embodied in this report would therefore destroy the influence of the small and second sized counties in the state in its senatorial representation. Half a dozen of them would be huddled together to get a representative in the senate, and the cities and towns, constantly increasing, would soon gain the entire control of the legislation of the state. Adopt the report, and the strip of country on the Ohio river to which I have referred, in less than fifty years, will govern the state. What then will be the result? Wherever commerce and manufactures prevail all know that the people are generally disposed to more extravagance in the public expenditures. Great wealth is accumulated in a few hands by these pursuits. This is not the case among an agricultural people, most of whom after supplying their families with the necessities of life find it difficult enough to pay their taxes, let them be as low as they may. Their net profits are small. The result would be, that these commercial and manufacturing people, disposed as they are to go on a more extravagant figure, would tax the agricultural interest to a burthensome extent, and would shape the policy of the state to subserve their interests and not the interests of agriculturists.

But what is more important, increasing in the way I have described, they will, as soon as they attain a majority here, attempt to decide whether we shall keep a certain portion of our property or not. Now, I have not changed my opinion as expressed some weeks since, that it is better not to bring more of this property here, for this was one of the objections I have long entertained to investing more capital in slave property. I believe it is against our interest to increase that property, because I have apprehended the danger I have alluded to, and because I believe that if we do not adopt some basis of representation that will secure the power of the commonwealth to the great agricultural interest, the institution will go down. I still adhere to all I said on the subject of slavery early in the session.

What has been the increase in these Ohio river counties? When I came here in 1823 as a member of the legislature, Campbell county was scarcely populous enough to secure it one representative. Since then it has been divided, and Kenton made from it, and now Kenton and Campbell, according to the ratio proposed here, would have three or four representatives and nearly two senators. And there are other points all along the banks of the river growing up in the same way. What has been the growth of the other parts of the state? But little comparatively, except at the mouth of the Tennessee river, which send two or three more representatives—and every apportionment exhibits the fact that the power is stealing away from the great agricultural interests of the state towards the Ohio river, and going over to the commercial and manufacturing interests. And its tendency thus to withdraw from the southern and interior parts of the state, is strongly exhibited under the basis of representation proposed in this report. Those river counties now send here men who agree with us in sentiment mainly, but there is a feeling coming across the Ohio that may send here men who will speak a different language and sentiment from what these gentlemen do. They were this year very near carrying Louisville, or at any rate, were strong enough to do a great deal of mischief. And I believe that in Campbell they were very near doing the same.

Mr. ROOT. Not at all.

Mr. TURNER. Does any one believe that this representation from along the banks of that river, in fifty years to come, from present indications, is likely to be in favor of that institution we have been assembled here, in part, to protect? Can any one believe it, when they see the change that is going on in the character of the population? The tendency of this incoming population is to accumulate in cities and in manufacturing establishments, and their sympathies are not with us. I think that one-thirty-eighth part of the power of this commonwealth is as much as Jefferson and Louisville, or as any county should ask; and I believe that the residue of the state ought to have the other thirty-seven parts. I do not blame the gentlemen from Louisville for attempting to secure all the power they can, because their constituents would be displeased with them if they did not; but still, they must be aware that it is not safe to the balance of the state, and that it is the duty of those representing the agricultural interests to oppose it. There has been something said in regard to the foreign vote—I mean the vote of those who come in from other states, and foreign countries. Go to the manufacturing establishments along the river, and you will find one-third, if not one-half of the population there to be those who are not Kentuckians by birth. Well, suppose the whole country along the river settled in the same way, are we disposed, when they become a majority of the population of the state, to let the whole agricultural interests of the state, including the mass of the native population of the country, be governed and ruled by these immigrants? I see a state of things which I believe will eventually result in giving the majority and full control, to the hands of people not favorable to the institutions of Kentucky; and I am for checking it before it is too powerful to control. Let us begin at once. I mean no disrespect to any of the river counties, for it is a state of things which I have no idea those residing there desire to produce; but that it will result in the way I have pointed out, I think is most manifest. Go now to the towns and cities on the Ohio river, and contrast the condition and appearance of things to what they were some years ago. Who compose the waiters at the taverns, and the servants and laborers of the towns and cities? Who do you find filling these stations? Not the blacks that we once saw there; but another description of people who are continually coming in, and who are ready to act in concert with others out of the state, against the institution of slavery, and who will break down our institutions after a while, if not checked by our action. I understand this to be particularly true of Louisville. This part of the population is constantly migratory—is unstable, and feels very little community of interest with native Kentuckians. It is here to-day and gone to-morrow. I mean a large part of it. They never have, and never will settle in the interior, to any great extent, while the institution of slavery exists. Their natural inclination is to the banks of the Ohio river, the vicinity of different institutions from ours. Well, it seems to me that no county in the state ought to have more than one senator, especially when a large proportion of the population to uphold it is such as I have described. And I see no reason why this matter of senators for Louisville is brought up in this section, relating to representatives. Why, if it is not intended to make an invidious distinction, is it not placed in those sections where the residue of the senate is provided for, and which we have not yet reached? It does not belong where it is. Is it to secure Louisville first, and to let the balance of the state struggle for the residue of the senators? Shall we put no limitation on the number of senators or representatives a city shall have? Shall we allow one city, if it grows large enough, to govern the whole state? I have thrown out these suggestions on this subject, somewhat crudely, as the question has come up when no one expected it would, and ask for them the consideration they may be entitled to. The provision of the old constitution, that no county shall have more than one senator, is far preferable to the report of the committee, in my estimation. Let the representation in the lower house be mainly on the basis of population, if you choose—not, however, without some limitation as to cities—but when you come to the senators, let no county have, in any event, more than one senator, if she does embrace a city within her boundary. One-thirty-eighth part of the whole legislative power of this commonwealth is as much as any county ought to ask, and as much as the convention ought to grant.

Mr. DIXON. I do not understand that this question is confined to the cities of Louisville, Covington, or any other cities in the commonwealth. The gentleman who has preceded me, I understand in the remarks which he has thrown out, to assume this position—that it is not right that the people living upon the banks of the Ohio river, embracing a district of country ten miles wide along the extent of that river, and the people living in the cities there, or the cities in any part of the state, should be placed on an equal footing, so far as representation is concerned, with the balance of the state.

Mr. TURNER. I did not take that position. I said that I was willing cities should have separate representation from the counties.

Mr. DIXON. I am certainly not deceived in the effect, at least, of the gentleman's argument. What was that argument? Was it not that the whole of the country lying on the banks of the Ohio river, from its upper to its lower extremity, was to be inhabited by foreigners, paupers, emancipationists, and men without property, who, in all probability, were to control the elections in this country in time to come, and who also would be adverse to the best interests of the people of the state? Did I not, then, understand the gentleman's argument aright? The disfranchisement of a large number of the freemen of Kentucky, and for what purpose? Because, first—a vast multitude of foreigners, emancipationists, and men without property, collect together in cities; and from the exposure of the borders of the state on the Ohio river to the free states, the same kind of population will inhabit the whole country, commencing at the lower and running up to the upper line of the state, and including a distance of ten miles from the river. These people, says the gentleman, will have no common interest with the agricultural community; that if permitted to exercise the right of suffrage, the time will not be distant, when they will control the elections of the state, and emancipate all the slaves. Although a pro-slavery man myself, in the fullest extent of the term, I am not for disfranchising any citizen, and depriving him of the right of suffrage, lest, at some future period, he vote at the polls that slavery shall no longer exist in Kentucky. To disfranchise the non-slave holders of Kentucky from the apprehension that they may, at some future period, vote against the institution of slavery, is to arouse the whole of that class of the population against the institution, and to insure its final overthrow.

But I will here say to the gentleman, that in the legislature, if the question of slavery is guarded in the new constitution, as I apprehend it will be, that body can never have or exercise any legislative power over the subject. We will never give to the legislature the right to free the slaves, unless with the limitation that the owners shall be fairly compensated for them. I have no fears, then, of letting all the freemen of Kentucky be fairly represented in the legislative department of the government. All who are subjected to the burthens of government should be justly and equally represented in the body that makes the laws by which these burthens are imposed. To deny this, would be to tax the people without their consent—to subject them to evils better suited to the abject condition of the serfs of Russia, than to the proud spirit of the freemen of Kentucky.

Representation in this state is not to be equal; it is to be made unequal on the borders of the state,—it is to be confined to a particular class of people, and distinctions are to be made between the freemen of this commonwealth! This I understand to be the principle asserted by the gentleman from Madison, and by way of carrying out this new policy, and of counteracting the effect of allowing all these people to vote, he insists that the basis of representation in the towns and cities should not be the same that it is in other parts of the state, or, in other words—numbers being established as the basis—a larger number of voters should be required to elect a senator or representative in the towns and cities, and the country bordering on the Ohio river, than should be required in other parts of the state. This, certainly sir, was the gentleman's argument, or it was nothing at all. It is not merely to defend the free citizens of the cities of Louisville, Covington, or the citizens of any other city, who fall under this proscriptive system of the gentleman; for those cities have champions here upon this floor, able and competent at all times, to defend their interests and their people against whatever assaults may be made upon them; but it is to defend my own constituents from this unjust assault, that I protest against the gentleman's doctrines.

The people on the borders of the river and in the towns, and the people of the state who own no property, are to be adverse to the interests of the balance of the people of Kentucky, and especially to the interest of the slaveholders. This I do not believe will ever be the case; but of one thing I am certain, that the way to prevent it is not to disfranchise, under the provisions of the constitution, that portion of the citizens who may happen not to be slaveholders. I am for protecting slavery, but not for departing from, or striking out of the constitution of the state, the great principle which secures the equality of suffrage.

The principle which is asserted in all free governments is, that numbers, and not property, shall form the basis of representation. This is the principle asserted in the report of the committee, and which I am not disposed, unless for better reasons than have been given by the gentleman from Madison, to depart from. I will make no distinctions between the citizens of Kentucky, in the right to exercise the elective franchise, nor will I make the basis upon which that right exists, broad as applicable to one class of the people, and narrow when applied to another; equal rights to all, and exclusive privileges to none, at least so far as the right of voting is concerned, should be the motto of every republican.

The gentleman from Madison, by way of illustrating his theory, has attempted to show that he interests of the people who inhabit towns and cities are antagonistical to those who live in the country. I deny the correctness of this position, and maintain that their interests and pursuits, if not identical, are nevertheless mutual and dependent on each other.

It is the division of labor which preserves and stimulates all the various industrial pursuits of the land; for if all men were to engage in the same business, it is clear that the world would be flooded with the surplus of whatever might be the products of their labor, and which would waste and rot for the want of a market. It is from the fact that the people of the world are engaged in a thousand different pursuits, that a market is afforded to each for the surplus product of his labor. The manufacturer, the mechanic, the man of commerce, and the farmer, are all dependent on each other; and that system of policy which weakens the one destroys the interest of the other. The mechanic builds a house for the manufacturer and receives in return for his labor money or the fabric which is manufactured. He affords to the manufacturer a market for a portion of his goods. He builds for the farmer a house and he receives in pay his breadstuffs and other articles raised on his farm, and thus becomes a market for the farmer. The manufacturer, with his thousand operatives, whilst he buys from the agriculturalist the raw material which he works into the beautiful fabric, buys from the farmer and is dependent on him for all the articles of food which are necessary to the subsistence of his hands. His manufacturing establishment is a great home market for the farmer. The law which protects him, therefore, protects the farmer. I have said that but for this division of labor and diversity of employments we would have no market, and the people engaged in all the different industrial pursuits are dependent on each other. The sugar planter of the south, whilst he sells to the farmer of the west the sugar which he every day consumes in his family, receives in return the mules and horses and breadstuffs which are necessary in carrying on the operations of his plantation. They afford mutual markets for the surplus products of the labor of each other. If all were mechanics, all manufacturers, all sugar planters, or all of any other pursuit, ruin and blight would fall on their entire business; do not force then too many people to engage in agriculture, lest you break down the market for his surplus products and destroy where you afford protection.

Build up your cities and your towns then in the midst of agricultural communities, let them increase to their tens of thousands and their hundreds of thousands, and the vast multitude of merchants and mechanics, and manufacturers and professional men, and every description, must look to the farmer for all the means of subsistence. Is it not to the advantage of the farmer then that these towns and cities should grow up in his midst? He finds in them a market for his beef, his pork, his poultry, his eggs, his vegetables, his flour, his meal, his corn, nay, for every article that he raises on his farm, and of which he has a surplus. Is it not manifest then to all, that where you establish such a great market in the midst of an agricultural country, you, so far from breaking down the interest of the agricultural community, are giving to it its very life and strength.

Where is the farmer who lives in the neighborhood of Louisville, or any other large city, that does not feel the advantage he derives from bringing his property to that great market? All must see and feel the value of it. All the great manufacturing establishments of the country are in this way advantageous to the agricultural community at large. Does not every one see that when you establish a great manufactory with its hundreds of working men, that you have thus employed that number of persons who otherwise would be engaged in the agricultural pursuits of the country? Is not a market at once opened to the farmer, which is of great advantage and benefit to him? All must see and feel it. Look at the iron region, and we find there a thousand men engaged in the manufacturing of iron. They have also in use hundreds of horses, mules, and cattle. Where do all these animals—these horses, mules, and cattle, and the corn and forage required for them, come from? Was it not from the farming community at large? And does not the gentleman see at once the necessity that this great division of labor should exist, with a view that all shall be employed and a market opened for all? Break up all your cities, and let their populations go to raising beef, and pork, and cattle, and tobacco, and hemp—away with trade, manufactures, and commerce. Throw all into the agricultural interest, and then you will see the farmer, instead of reaping that return for his labor which he now does, crushed by this blighting system, and deprived of every market for his produce. It is wrong on principle to assert on this floor that there is any difference existing between the people of any portion of the state, or that there is any antagonism in these interests. This great principle of the division of labor is one for which I have contended all my life, and it is right in itself. I am for building cities and villages, and manufacturing establishments wherever it is possible and profitable. And I am not for giving either to the people there, or to those elsewhere in the state, exclusive advantages or privileges, but for putting them all on an equality. This great system of the division of labor is the very protection of all the great interests of the country, and whenever that principle is departed from those interests must suffer. Then I will not go with the gentleman from Madison. I will go for drawing no such invidious distinctions between the people in the exercise of the right of suffrage. I will not go with him to revive the old English, rotten, borough system, which, springing out of the division of all the lands of England by William the conqueror amongst his great followers, limited representation to property or territory, and crushed, beneath the iron heel of a dark despotism and a splendid aristocracy, which followed in its train, the hopes and freedom of a great people for centuries. We have flung from our constitutions and our statutes the English doctrine of entails, and primogeniture, and property qualification, as the basis of representation, and I cannot go with the gentleman when he attempts, in effect, to revive them in carrying out the principle he has here today asserted.

The gentleman seems to think that the time is rapidly approaching, when we shall be overrun by a foreign population, and because a foreign population may settle along the banks of the Ohio, or in the city of Louisville, or some other city, that the great principle of equal representation should be denied them. Does not the gentleman know that if he excludes the foreigner according to his basis of representation, that he will also exclude with him the native born American citizen from the benefits of that principle? When he strikes at the foreigner of the cities, and along the banks of the river, he strikes also, him who is born within the limits of the state, and destroys all at a single blow. I protest against this doctrine of the gentleman from Madison. It is unjust to the people of that portion of the state to which he alludes, and destructive to a great fundamental principle. The true basis of representation is population, and nothing else, and I protest against any other principle being introduced into the constitution we are about to form. I am not for giving a man the right of suffrage merely because he is rich or has property. The poor man, ever ready to protect and defend the interests of his country, merely because he is poor, I would never exclude from the right of suffrage. The gentleman's doctrine is to establish a new basis of representation, perhaps of property, or at least something other than population, and I will not go with him in sustaining it. Let every freeman in Kentucky, unless he has been guilty of some crime which should disfranchise him, exercise the glorious privilege of the elective franchise. When the country calls to arms, and her enemies are on her borders, do you then stop to enquire whether the soldier is a property holder or not? Who is it that is the first to listen to the tap of the drum? Whose spirit is it that is first aroused by the ear piercing life, and who is it that is the first ready to march to the rescue, when the country is invaded, or its flag is in danger? The rich man is confined to his home by interests that he is loth to sacrifice. It is the men without property, but who are ready to yield up what is far dearer to them than property, their lives, when the country demands the sacrifice. They are the men we all look to, when the country wants soldiers for her defence. Let it not then be proclaimed as the doctrine of the people of Kentucky, that the basis of representation is to be established here, other than that of population. Any thing else would be unjust, and I never will subscribe to it. I will not here stop to inquire whether foreigners should have the right to vote. I know not whether that question is to be discussed, but one thing is certain, that foreign citizens ought to be permitted to exercise all the privileges that appertain to citizens. If you make him a citizen let him exercise the privileges of a citizen. Do not give him the shadow, while you deprive him of the substance. Do not mock him with the idea that he is a citizen, while at the same time you deprive him of all the privileges of citizenship. For my part, I can never go with the gentleman. His doctrines are wrong in every particular. They are wrong to the people where I live, they are wrong to the people where he lives, and they strike at the very foundation of the liberties of all intelligent people. They are wrong to the people of this state, they are wrong to the people of the United States, and they are wrong to the whole world. The whole world is looking anxiously to the great progress of free principles, and the establishment of free governments not only in the United States, but in all Europe. A mighty struggle is going on in the popular feeling in the old world, which is crumbling the thrones of despots to ruins. The old corruptions and ancient abuses are passing away, and the spirit of liberty is struggling with an energy that will be irresistible wherever its votaries are united in defence of its sacred cause. That spirit is onward, and it is marching to triumph. It is dear to the heart of every American, and rather than to yield or abandon it, he would tear that heart from his bosom, and throw it, a bleeding sacrifice, at the feet of his country. For one, I would do it.

Mr. PRESTON. As it is rather late, I would not now attempt to detain the committee but for the singular ground taken by the gentleman from Madison. It is a position so different from what he has heretofore occupied on this floor, and the arguments he used are so unfounded, so unjust, that I feel, though the youngest representative from Louisville, bound, on this floor, to point out the errors which have characterized them, to denounce them as unfit to be entertained by this convention, and as contrary to every true principle of liberty, and to every right which should belong to the citizen. What is the proposition in the report of the committee? Is it iniquitous, is it unjust, does it speak to a section, does it apply only to Louisville, or is it in its operation as wide spread as the state of Kentucky, and as fair as the character of the bold race that live upon its soil. This proposition does give Louisville a representation in both houses of the general assembly, which technicalities in former times deprived us of. And the legal acumen which mark many in the house has been exerted in order to inflict a vital stab on the true principle of representation. What is that principle? Representation rests on three grounds. It can be based on territorial extent, it can be on property, and it can be upon the free hearts and bold arms of our countrymen, upon numbers, upon population, and it must be upon one of these, or upon combinations of them.

Kentucky was the first state in this confederacy that asserted the proud doctrine that the principle of representation was based on territorial extent, or upon property, but upon the number of her brave citizens. That it was the free bodies and the free minds of Kentucky, and not the hoards of an Astor's wealth, or the extent of a Van Rensselaer's possession that was to be represented. In England, they adopted, as my eloquent friend from Henderson has stated, the principle of territorial extent, and what was the creature of that infamous principle, for all infamous principles will breed monsters in the progress of time. It was the borough system. It caused old Sarum to be represented when the town of Birmingham was unrepresented, when old Sarum with two members had not a citizen within her borough, and when Birmingham contained forty thousand free, white, adult males. It was this that called for the reform bill. The principle of the representation of property has been exploded, and we now have a single point to rest the right of suffrage, and the extent of representation upon. And that is the number of free white male citizens.

Mr. R. N. WICKLIFFE. If the gentleman from Louisville will give way, I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. PRESTON assented.

Mr. TURNER. I desire to make an explanation at this time, that it may go out with the gentleman's speech, with the permission of the gentleman from Louisville. So far as I recollect the argument of the gentleman from Henderson, it was, that I wished to raise up an aristocracy in the country. Now my argument was directly the contrary. Commerce and manufactures produce ten times the amount of aristocracy that the agricultural interests of the country do.—The poor farmers who live scattered about all over the country, and barely raising surplus enough to pay their taxes, have not the means to engender or to gratify aristocratic taste or habits. I am against raising up a great city aristocracy to govern the country, and I was objecting to those who are here to-day and away to-morrow, coming in and voting in our cities and controlling the interests of the state. In the large cities you would find one third of the population of this class, and of those who never settle there permanently.

The committee then rose and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again, and

The convention adjourned.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. BRUSH.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MERIWETHER submitted the following:

"Resolved, That the convention will proceed in the following order to dispose of the reports of the several committees:

- 1st. The report of the committee on the legislative department.
2. The report of the committee on the judicial department.
3. The report of the committee on the executive department.
4. The report of the committee on the militia.
5. The report of the committee on slavery.
6. The report of the committee on education.
7. The report of the committee on miscellaneous provisions.
8. The report to be made on the mode of revising the constitution.

And that said reports be taken up and disposed of in the foregoing order."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not myself fairly comprehend the derangement, or arrangement of business at this hour, which that resolution proposes. I see not why we should depart from the ordinary course. The report on the legislative department will, I suppose, come up to-day, that having the priority; and I think the convention should take up that which is most convenient. I make the suggestion, because to-morrow, at least it was so announced, the report of the committee on the judicial department, and the circuit and county courts, will come up as the special order.

Mr. MERIWETHER. If the gentleman from Nelson will reflect, he will see that if the present order of business be maintained we cannot get at the report he alludes to under the rule, without a vote of two-thirds. It is true, the report to which the gentleman refers has been made the special order of the day for to-morrow, but he cannot have forgotten that there are other special orders that have precedence. My object in presenting this resolution is, that each gentleman may know when the report, in which he is most interested, is to be acted upon. Without such a resolution, I apprehend the report of the legislative committee, which was under consideration on Saturday, will have precedence over all others, until it is disposed of. It is not with a view of giving precedence to any particular report that I offer this resolution; but I thought the legislative, judicial, and executive branches should be considered in succession, so as not to distract the mind of the convention from these great leading objects. That was my sole reason; and gentlemen will perceive that, so far from giving precedence to the report of the committee of which I am chairman, that report is placed nearly last.

Mr. CLARKE. I do not very well understand why this proposition is offered this morning. It comes in at a very singular time, and I do not well comprehend it. There has been an order of business adopted, which has been acted upon from the commencement of the session to the present time. That order has not required the legislative committee to report first, and the judicial committee next, and so forth; and I do not well comprehend the propriety of this resolution this morning, unless it is designed that the reports of one committee, where they have thought proper to report what belongs to another, shall have precedence. Now, if this arrangement of business is to obtain in this house, and it is to accommodate those interested in a particular report, what will be the result? Why, it will be that when a report is before the convention, in which they are not interested, they will not be here, and you will not have a quorum to do business. I understood from the honorable mover of that proposition, that there might be a particular report in which gentlemen are interested, and that these certain gentlemen ought to know when it will come up. Sir, there should be no report in which gentlemen are not interested. Gentlemen should feel an interest in every report; and I am not inclined to change the order of business here to accommodate gentlemen, so that they may be absent when the reports, in which they have no particular interest, are before us. Sir, I want our business to proceed on a well settled principle. And I again repeat, that I am at a loss to know why this resolution comes in this morning. I shall vote against it till I see more of the effect, point, and object to be accomplished, than I now see.

Mr. MERIWETHER. If the gentleman is dull of comprehension, it is not my fault. He says he cannot understand it. Sir, that is not my fault. I am not responsible for that at all. I alluded, in speaking of the reports in which gentlemen might be interested, to the fact that there are certain gentlemen who are chairmen of committees, who, if they expected their reports to come up on a particular day, would bring their papers with them when they leave their rooms and be prepared to act upon the subjects of them. The gentleman says it will change the order of the business here. Why, what order have we had? The reports of committees have nearly all been made, and they have been referred to the committee of the whole, in the order in which they came; and they will have precedence, as they have had, without any connection with each other at all. The gentleman must be very suspicious, if he would attribute any motive to me. It is to take up those branches first that relate to each other; and that is all the motive I have. The gentleman will see that the report of the committee of which he is chairman, will be the first to be disposed of, then the report on the executive department, and next the report on the judicial department, and after which will come up the other subdivisions, and those subjects belonging especially to no particular department.

Mr. CLARKE. I know, sir, we have been in the habit when in the committee of the whole, for reasons which seemed to be perfectly satisfactory to the committee, of laying aside a report for the time being and taking up another, and that practice has been adopted for the convenience of the house, and for facility in the transaction of business. Now the gentleman from Jefferson has been pleased to say, that if I was in want of comprehension, it was not perhaps his duty to furnish me.

Mr. MERIWETHER (in his seat.) No sir.

Mr. CLARKE. Sir, I understand the remark, and I beg leave to say if I were in want, I should not come to him. I should be poor indeed if I should come to that gentleman under such circumstances, nor would I leave him so destitute, as I should do by taking away from him the small stock that he now possesses. Sir, I did not pretend to impugn the motives of that gentleman in offering the resolution. I have stated, and repeat, that I have seen no reason for this departure from the order of business in this house, since this has been a convention. It will be borne in mind, and I appeal to members of different committees, if there are not reports from one committee embracing the same subject matter that has been reported upon by another committee. Now if there is no object in this, what will be accomplished? Though the report of the legislative committee, as the gentleman puts it first, encroach, per possibility, on the legitimate business of another committee, still you make that encroachment the first matter for action; because you cannot take up the other till you have acted on this one. We have been in the habit of laying over the reports for the convenience of the house, and if convenience still require it, I do not want any iron rule laid on me, or this house to prevent it.

Mr. MERIWETHER. I am sorry that the gentleman from Simpson, (Mr. Clarke), has thought it necessary to pervert my remarks for the purpose of making a personal attack. I did not say that if he was dull of comprehension I was bound to furnish him with it. No, it requires a gentleman of more presumption than I am possessed of to make an assertion of that kind. I said if the gentleman could not comprehend the resolution, and if he was dull of comprehension, I was not responsible for it. And, as to the gentleman's iron rule, I ask, if this resolution is not adopted, if there is not already an iron rule on the house. Does not the rule require that we shall take up the reports as they have been made, unless made the order for a particular day? And then if there are several, has not the first special order the precedence? The gentleman says that for the convenience of the house, we have dispensed with this rule. Well sir, adopt the rule I propose, and we can also dispense with it, when the convenience of the house shall require it. I again appeal to the house whether it is not expedient that we should consider the reports on the legislative, executive, and judicial departments as nearly together as we can.

Mr. HARDIN. I understand the reports of the committees are almost all in, and I understand this resolution is nothing more than making out a docket as to how we shall proceed. This is generally done by a committee, and the order is laid out so that each may know how we are to proceed. Now, we have a committee to classify and arrange our business, so that it may assume the shape of a constitution, giving it symmetry and form. The order we proceed in is of very little importance, but it seems to be proper to take up the legislative branch first, the executive next, and the judiciary next. If we do not, what will be the result? Why, we shall jump from subject to subject, and sit here till the first day of March. Are we to sit here till the last day of December? Why, then, I suppose, there will be a writ of forcible entry and detainer to compel us to give up the house to the legislature. I want to finish in four weeks. I think we can finish the reports of the legislative and executive branches this week, and when we get to the judicial department, as it has been so often discussed, I do not believe we shall be detained with the three courts more than two or three days. There is scarcely a controverted point in all the three reports, for we have made so many compromises and concessions all round, that I think there will be little difference of views in the discussion of these reports. I hope we shall go on with the legislative branch till we finish it, and then take up the executive and judicial, for I am as anxious as any man to have it finished, and I do not think there will be any controversy about it. I have no predilections. I was asked yesterday as to the best way to get on with the business. I had no conversation with the gentleman from Jefferson, but he has seemed to strike on the same plan which was suggested by some gentlemen yesterday. It seems important that we should finish. Public sentiment says we have stayed too long, and if we stay here more than four weeks longer, public sentiment will say we have not done our duty. I hope that after this day, this convention will take a recess from one o'clock till three o'clock, and then sit till five. We all know what we have to do.

Mr. MACHEN. It seems to me sir, according to the suggestion of the gentleman last up, that it will be proper to change the order of business from that which we have pursued. We have discussed the bill in relation to the court of appeals; the county court bill has also undergone discussion, and by this time they are pretty well understood. The gentleman says these bills can be gone through with in one or two days. For one, I should like to see a commencement of business, that we may have something completed; and if our minds are made up in regard to the judiciary bill, let us take it up, for I am satisfied that our minds are not made up as to what we shall do with the legislative bill. It has not been so well considered; but while we go through with the judiciary bill, the attention of the delegates can be turned to the legislative bill, and be ready to act at a future time. I think this is a reason against taking up the order of business, as proposed by the gentleman from Jefferson. I do not profess to be more diligent than others; but I am a long way from home, and cannot go to see my family and return, as members can who live at a less distance. But I think every delegate should have a deep interest in every proposition, and if this resolution is to give a privilege to certain men to be absent, I am against it for that very reason. I want the concurrence of all in the adoption of every article of the constitution that we may mature. If the court of appeals bill, and others relating to the judiciary, can be disposed of this week, I think we had better take them up and dispose of them, and in the mean time we may agree on those points about which we now differ in reference to the legislative department. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

The question being taken, there were ayes 33, noes 40. So the resolution was not laid on the table.

The resolution was then adopted.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. MERIWETHER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the legislative department.

The pending question was on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Lindsey) on Saturday.

Mr. CLARKE offered the following as a substitute, viz: to strike out all after the word "the," in the first line, and insert the following:

Sec. 5. The "general assembly shall divide the several counties of this commonwealth into convenient precincts, or may delegate the power to do so to such county authorities as they may, by law, provide. And elections for representatives for the several counties, shall be held at the places of holding their respective courts, and at the several election precincts into which the counties may be divided: Provided, That when it shall appear to the general assembly that any city or town hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such city or town shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation, in either or both houses of the general assembly; which shall be retained so long as such city or town shall contain a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio which may be fixed by law: Provided, That no city or town, together with the county in which such city or town may be situate, shall, at any time, be entitled to more than two senators; and thereafter, elections for the county in which such city or town is situated, shall not be held therein; but such city or town shall not be entitled to a separate representation, unless such county, after the separation, shall be entitled to one or more representatives: Provided, further, That the general assembly shall have no power to pass laws prohibiting the citizens of this commonwealth from importing slaves for their own use; but may pass laws requiring the importer of slaves to take an oath, that such slave or slaves, so imported, are for their own use, and not as merchandise; and that he, she, or they, will not sell said slave or slaves within this commonwealth, within two years after such slave or slaves are imported, under such penalties as may, from time to time, be provided by law."

Mr. TRIPLETT said he also had an amendment which, at the proper time, he desired to submit, but which, with the consent of the gentleman from Louisville, he would now read, that that gentleman might know, before he commenced his remarks, that such a proposition would be offered, and be able to apply his observations to it, if he should deem it necessary.

The secretary read the amendment as follows, for the information of the convention:

"Provided, That the cities unincorporated, or which may hereafter be incorporated, in this commonwealth, and to which a senator or senators may be allotted, shall not together, under any future apportionment, be entitled to more than one-fourth of the whole number of senators; and whenever, under any future apportionment, the whole number of senators to which said cities would be entitled, shall exceed one-fourth of the whole number of senators for the whole state, the legislature shall apportion the one-fourth of the whole number of senators among the cities entitled, according to some just and equitable mode of apportionment: And, provided, That no city shall ever be entitled to more than two senators."

Mr. PRESTON. I had not anticipated sir, fully, the debate which has sprung up on this question.

At a late hour on Saturday last, when the discussion closed, I had made some few remarks in regard to what I conceived to be the true principle upon which representation was founded. I had imagined up to the time when the gentleman from Madison made his speech, that there would be but little resistance in this convention, to affording to Louisville, or to any other city, the same representative rights that are accorded to every other portion of the state. In as much as it was at a late hour that I made those remarks, and as they are the basis upon which I intend to place the principle of representation, I shall find it necessary briefly to recur to them. The amendments that have been offered this morning, are to me, matter of some surprise. I see before me a gentleman who sometimes is a little mischievous with his young friends, and who although he seemed to accord with me fully on Saturday, now tells me, that in relation to the rights of cities to be represented —to use his own language—"he feels smartly bothered." The amendment that was proposed by the gentleman from Simpson, is also singular. He seems desirous to create a division or make a partnership between the gentleman from Madison and myself, in regard to the importation of slaves into this state. I frankly admit that I am afraid of such an alliance. I am fearful it will be what the civilians call "societas leonina," a lion's partnership, in which the gentleman from Madison would get the lion's share. Out of regard therefore to me, I hope he will not press it. The amendment violates also a part of the legislative report—a report which I suppose will receive the gentleman's able assistance and support, inasmuch as he is the chairman of the committee. He introduces a feature here, declaring in the thirty fourth section, "that no law enacted by the general assembly, shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be embraced in the title."

It is a principle in legislation that receives my assent, but he has transgressed it in bringing up the "importation act" of negroes, in other words the act of 1833, in the final part of his proposition. I will ask him therefore to reflect for a moment, upon the propriety of withdrawing his amendment, and allowing us to consider, unperplexed, the section in the report; as I think we ought not to set so bad an example to subsequent legislatures, as to infringe the rule established by ourselves. I merely mention these facts as preliminary to the observations I mean to make in reference to the subject generally.

The amendment of the gentleman from Daviess does not propose that any city in the state shall never have the right of sending more than one fourth of the representation, but that all the cities of the state, collectively, shall not.

Mr. TRIPLETT. That is exactly what I mean.

Mr. PRESTON. I do not know that I can occupy that ground. I came here only claiming that the people of the cities shall not be ostracised, and claiming equal and just privileges with our rural brethren. I ask therefore, that no stigma shall be placed on our brow, that no act of disfranchisement in any shape, shall be exercised by this convention towards us, while no such restriction is decreed in reference to the population of other portions of the state. There is the same moral obligation to act towards us upon the true principles of justice, and there is no reason why we should be placed in a position different from that which the free population of the counties occupy. I ask this house, before they cripple us by imposing unjust conditions and qualifications upon our right of representation, to listen calmly, and decide justly.

The territory of Kentucky is one-fourth as great as that of France. Under the blessings of free institutions, we, in common with our common country, are advancing with unparalleled progress, in wealth and population. We have peculiar institutions. In some parts of the country white labor, in other parts slavery. But the whole great confederacy, moves onward with uninterrupted prosperity,

"—Like the Pontic Sea,
Whose icy current and compulsive course
Ne'er feels retiring ebb, but flows right on To the Propontic, and the Hellespont."

Every day we develop and demonstrate new principles in the theory of government to make us what we are, the model republic of the world. The country towards which the eyes of freemen from every part of the globe—from Hungary, from Ireland, from France, from all nations that are oppressed—are turned to obtain an example for their study and their imitation. We know that France is studded with populous cities and villages. So in time, cities and villages will spring up in this country, to become the abode of its home manufactures, and to supply the surrounding country with the necessary fabrics; while they receive in return, the products of agriculture. It was with surprise that I heard an invidious comparison between the agricultural and manufacturing classes, attempted to be instituted by the gentleman from Madison. In it there was an attempt to array interest against interest, in a manner I could not have expected from such a quarter.

Such then sir, is the attitude of Kentucky. Now, let us look at her past history. To what should we attribute this progress? There is but one solution, and that is comprised in a single word—liberty. To what should we attribute that liberty? To the great and immutable principles that were founded in the revolution, and still further carried out in 1799 in this very state.

Sir, there are but three principles to regulate representation, that have been practically acted upon by men—three principles upon which a representative government is ever based. What are they? The first is geographical extent, the second is property, the third is population. A fourth has been recommended by some, at the head of whom stands Jeremy Bentham. This last, is education, or popular intelligence. I mention this because there are no other principles, that I am aware of, upon which representation proceeds. Sir, up to 1799, the principle prevailed, that property, or territory, should constitute the basis of representation. Kentucky was the first to assert that it should rest purely on population. From the time when the tents of the plebeians whitened the sacred hill, until that auspicious day, the principle had been the continued subject of contest between the people and their rulers. In England, we find that the Norman barons who conquered that country, claimed that representation should be based upon extent of territory, because they possessed the soil. This gave rise to the borough system, and to a contest that lasted from the time of the Norman conquest, down to the year 1838.

In 1838—I think it was—the celebrated "reform bill," of Lord Grey, was introduced in the British parliament, mainly to get rid of that infamous borough system, which had grown up and increased in the progress of time, until Birmingham and Manchester, with a population of two or three hundred thousand souls, had but a single representative, while the Chiltern-Hundreds were under ministerial control, and old Sarum sent two members to parliament. But gentlemen may say that our country is entirely too wise to follow such a system. By no means.

It is now in existence in this country. I recollect a gentleman of Carolina told me that a member of the Carolina legislature had invited every one of his constituents to a dinner-party. In Virginia, the people have struggled in vain to extirpate this cancer from the body politic, and they have almost succeeded in eradicating it. In Maryland, the same principle is now in partial operation, and this doctrine, to a greater or less extent, pervades the constitutions of many states, particularly on the Atlantic border.

In some states, where the principle of numbers was forced upon their consideration, in preference to free-hold qualification, they acquiesced on the condition that paupers should be excluded, and that some other restrictions should remain. At this hour in Massachusetts, a property qualification is virtually required, by excluding paupers from voting. Let us turn to the constitution of Massachusetts.

"There shall be annually elected by the freeholders," &c. This, the original feature, under the popular demand, was altered in 1821, so that "every free male citizen, excepting paupers," &c. were admitted to the right of suffrage.

New York, under her new constitution, has done what? She has declared the broad principle that numbers shall be the basis of representation. She has adopted fully the Kentucky doctrine; this was not the case when our common confederacy was formed.

In regard to Kentucky, the last of the old thirteen states—if you may so call her—the eldest born child of the new thirty—if you so choose to style her—what principle does she set out upon? Let me read, for it is the first time certainly that this great truth ever emanated from a constitutional body. The sixth section of the constitution declares, that representation shall be equal and uniform, in this commonwealth. It runs thus:

"Representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth; and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified electors therein."

To her eternal honor, be it said, she was the first to promulge it.

This is the principle that Kentucky has established. This is the ground she occupies, and I want those who seek to curtail the rights of suffrage in this state, to come up fairly, and point out the necessity for making an exception.

I have alluded to the evils of the borough system. There is no doubt, at this time, in the hearts of the people of many of the states, as wealth increases, a growing inclination to return to the system of property qualification. You see them attempting to effect this in many of the states, although we have always repudiated the principle here. In the state of Virginia, Massachusetts, and others, under their present constitutions, a property qualification still exists. No man, until he shall have paid his taxes, or possesses some freehold qualification, is allowed to vote. I want to occupy a broad and tenable ground, and it is, that there shall be no qualification required of a man here, except that he shall be a free white male citizen of the state of Kentucky.

Now, sir, gentlemen tell us that it is necessary to put this restriction upon senatorial representation, and they compare the counties of Kentucky to the states of this confederacy, and say that Delaware has two senators in congress, while New York has no more. He must be confident of a credulous audience who would urge, with any degree of gravity, this as a reason.

Why has Delaware two senators, and New York but two? It was because the states were sovereign that came into the compact, and the senators are the representatives of those sovereignties. The larger states had the same rights of sovereignty as the smaller; the smaller as the larger. But do gentlemen say that the counties in the state stand upon the same footing as a sovereign power. I would ask the gentleman from Madison if he would assent that counties irrespective of population shall be represented in the senate. Does the constitution of Kentucky regard counties as sovereign. In the twelfth section it says, "and where two or more counties compose a district, they shall be adjoining."

That is, it orders the joining of two or more counties together, for the purpose of representation, when circumstances require, and it seems the framers of the constitution of 1799, at least, had no idea of regarding the counties as being separate and independent sovereignties. The thing is absurd in itself. There is no parallel, or at least the parallel has no force in it.

I have claimed only, that this fifth section shall give a representative right to the cities in this state, according to population; such as has been accorded to cities in other states. The city of Cincinnati, opposite to us, was at one time the special object of the gentleman's laudation, at another of his execrations. In the remarkable speech that he delivered here, in the early part of the session of this convention, and which will be found in the record of its debates, the gentleman seems to have entertained as violent an admiration of Cincinnati, forty days ago, as he has a horror of Louisville, and the other cities of Kentucky, at this hour. Let us look at the constitution of Ohio.

"The number of senators shall, at the several periods of making the enumeration before mentioned, be fixed by the legislature, and apportioned among the several counties, or districts to be established by law, according to the number of white male inhabitants of the age of twenty one years in each, and shall never be less than one third, nor more than one half of the number of representatives."

Do you find there a regulation that Cincinnati shall not have a senator, or is there any such provision, as that all the cities of the state shall not have more than one fourth part of the representation? Ohio has been depreciated and condemned on this floor, for its illiberality on a certain question. Ohio at least has not proscribed her cities, nor her citizens.

Let us go to the state of Massachusetts, another state that has large and populous cities in her borders. Boston has in the senate a full representation. We come next to the state of New York, which contains the most populous city of the union. What does the constitution of the state of New York say?

"That each senate district shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants," etc.

The city of New York is not proscribed, nor deprived by rural jealousy, of her fair representation, according to population, both in the senate and house of representatives. New York therefore gives the same right—she does not proscribe her cities. Ohio does not—Massachusetts does not.

Now sir, in the state of Louisiana, the same influence exists that the gentleman has appealed to, in the hope of procuring the strength of numbers in this house, and of overruling a right, by appealing to the passions and feelings of classes and interests. Louisiana is similarly situated; she has the city of New Orleans, containing above one hundred thousand inhabitants, and a population of three hundred and fifty thousand in the state and city conjoined. The city contains one-half the white population of the state. But Louisville, in population, does not form more than the twentieth, or the twenty-fifth part of Kentucky. Yet, we are to have these imaginary dangers which are to flow from allowing to Louisville a fair representation, pressed upon us, in order to perpetrate an act of gross injustice and wrong. We would, if our demands were allowed, now have a representation of but one-thirty-third in the lower house, and one-thirty-eighth in the upper. How will that affect the state? The fear is idle.

In Louisiana the planters have become the basis of a splendid aristocracy. The best villages that you can see, from Point Coupee to New Orleans, on the river, are the white cottages of the negroes, clustered together on the plantations of their owners. You will find a village of five hundred souls, all belonging to a single Louisiana planter. The merchant and the lawyer there form the second class. All the important offices, state and federal, are filled by the planters. They find themselves in a position to be able to prescribe terms, by which they retain the aristocratic features of a representation based somewhat on territory. There, then, is the cause of the exception to the rule. Yet New Orleans is allowed one-eighth of the senate, and one-tenth of the house. In Kentucky, all the privilege we can obtain for the population of a city, such as Louisville, is that she shall have one senator out of thirty-eight, and three representatives out of one hundred. Are we to fall below the cities of Ohio, which are represented in the senate according to the number of people they contain? Are we to fall below the cities of Massachusetts, New York, Maryland, and Virginia? Or, are we to go far beyond Louisiana, in that aristocratic feature, and cripple our cities in their representation, in the edict that is to go forth from this convention? I put it plainly, and denounce it here, as a violation of the right of suffrage. We have no terms to make—we claim the right. If it be denied, or if it be qualified, it shall be denied or qualified against our remonstrance; and I demand at your hands, delegates, the rights which justice should accord.

We have not only been menaced with an outrage of our rights, but we have been insulted, in common with our sister counties of the northern border on the Ohio river. If our rights are denied to us, let it be so. If they are qualified, let it be so. It is against the best defence that I could interpose, and notwithstanding my feeble opposition. If you are determined that the agricultural classes shall tyrannize over the manufacturing classes—if you thrust them to the earth, be it so. But never say it was done without remonstrance against the injustice, against the wrong.

The gentleman from Madison says, that this iniquitous movement is necessary to protect the agricultural, to the exclusion of the manufacturing interests. I now ask this house, if they will solemnly assert, that the manufacturing interests of Kentucky are to be proscribed? Have Covington, Newport, Louisville, Paducah, have those cities and counties along the river, so wronged and degraded and impoverished the state, that they are to be the subjects of political proscription? The gentleman seems to feel a holy horror in looking at the wretched condition—as he calls it—of the northern frontier of the state. In one sweeping charge he declared we are all teeming with abolitionism. He denounces the city of Louisville in particular, as if he did not entertain many of the sentiments, which are esteemed characteristic of that party, to which he alludes. He has eloquently advocated the law of 1833 and those sentiments upon this floor; but he has changed his position, so rapidly that you would now think him the most earnest against the abolition movement in this state. I must call the attention of the gentleman to his own remarks, recorded in the debates, and commend the chalice to his own lips.

After considering what is the curse our slaves impose on us, after proving to us by a specious calculation that slaves were worth less than three per cent. per annum, he goes on to say:

"Is there any individual here who will say that a grown working negro does not cost his master, leaving out of the question what he steals from him and sells at the nearest town, is there any one that will say, that an average expense of twenty dollars for this class of slaves is too small an estimate. This then will make a million of dollars; and there will be only a profit of two millions left."

The gentleman now, with singular consistency, deplors the loss of this wretched population. He said in substance in his speech of Saturday. "Where are those handsome, flat nosed negroes that were once to be found in Covington? They are all gone. They have been expelled by a wretched race, which has come in and taken their position, and now occupy the place they once did, that race that intends hereafter to destroy the institutions of our state." The gentleman has done more in that argument to destroy the value of slave property in Kentucky, than every emancipationist that ever lived in Covington or Louisville. Let me go on a little further.

"That white labor is cheaper I have no doubt. I have never entertained a doubt on that point. I have never entertained a doubt that it is the interest of the great slaveholding community of the state to sell their slaves."

Now, sir, in the argument of Saturday, he takes exactly the opposite ground. He occupies now a position wholly irreconcilable with that he maintained then—his logic is like McFingal's gun,

"Which when well aimed at duck or plover Bore wide and kicked the holder over."

I will take the trouble to show to those who think that taxation and representation should go hand in hand, the public burdens borne by Louisville. It is a principle not to be rashly admitted, though it was asserted in the period of the revolutionary war. The true principle is maintained in the constitution of Kentucky, that representation is based on population.

Now, I have taken the population, taxable property, and taxes paid by the city of Louisville to compare them with other portions of the state. The counties of Hickman, Ballard, and Graves—counties lying at the extreme end of the state—compose the 1st senatorial district. Their gross taxable property amounts to $2,581,600—about two millions and a half—paying $4,018 30 per annum revenue, with a population of two thousand nine hundred and fifty eight white males. The counties of Madison and Garrard, composing the 23d senatorial district, contain taxable property valued at $11,704,942, yielding a revenue of $18,076, and with a population of four thousand one hundred and twelve white males. The counties of Carter, Greenup, Lawrence, and Johnson, composing the 34th senatorial district, contain taxable property to the amount of $2,927,262, yielding a revenue of $4,600, and a population of four thousand and fourteen. And now let us look at the Madison district, a rich central district. In Madison and Garrard combined, they have $11,000,000 of taxable property, being four times as rich as the 1st, or 34th districts, yielding $18,000 yearly revenue, and with a population of four thousand one hundred and twelve white males. How does the county of Jefferson compare with that district? It has $26,697,663 worth of taxable property, and pays upwards of $43,000 per annum taxes, and has nine thousand two hundred and eighty three white males; a population nearly equal to the whole of these three districts. Her wealth is nearly twice as great as all three of them, and while they pay $26,000 a year taxes, she pays $43,000, or nearly twice as much as the three combined. And yet it is asserted upon this floor, that a district paying nearly twice as much as three average districts—in point of wealth and population—of the state, is to have but one representative in the senate, while those other districts have three. Why, if property and taxation was the basis of representation, according to the principle asserted at the period of the revolution, and to which some seem to wish to return, Louisville and Jefferson would be entitled to six senators. And if population be the basis, they should have three. Is this justice? Is it right? We have in Louisville and Jefferson one-tenth of all the taxable property in the state, and we pay one-tenth of all the taxes that are paid. Have we one-tenth of the representation of the state? No! we have a thirty-third in the lower house, and a thirty-eighth in the senate. The reason why we have something like a fair proportion in the lower house is because we are not ostracised in our representation there.

The citizens of Louisville have always been as ready to give their services to the state, as the citizens of any other portion of the commonwealth. They have ever been among the foremost in the field. The drum has never beat a call to arms! that was not promptly responded to by them. The gentleman talks of our adopted citizens as if they were the out-casts of the earth. One fourth of the gallant army, that won for us imperishable glory on the northern line, and on the route from Vera Cruz to the capital of Mexico, were naturalized citizens. Those adopted children of the union took up arms for us; and with musket in hand, in a series of battles, that will ever remain memorable in history, asserted the character of their adopted country, in common with their native born comrades. Their acts have shed renown and fadeless lustre on the American arms. Louisville, with one twenty fifth of the population, furnished one fifth of the troops of the state; and in twenty three days from the time the letter of requisition arrived, stating that General Taylor was in danger at Palo Alto, a regiment, the Louisville Legion, reported themselves to General Taylor at Brazos, two thousand five hundred miles from their city. This exhibited a rapidity of organization and rapidity of movement, unparalleled in the country. But enough of this.

All the arguments of the gentleman from Madison are tinged with nativism. He thinks it necessary to put restrictions on the right of suffrage, in order to shield us against the evils of immigration; but what has been the effect of this influx of foreign population in our border counties on the Ohio river? It has brought to us the knowledge of new arts, new modes of agriculture, and is developing new means of increasing our national wealth. It would be interesting to enquire what effect this concentration of the various arts of Europe, by immigration, has produced upon American industry, in stimulating American labor and exciting American ingenuity. It has produced an extraordinary state of prosperity. Near Cincinnati the culture of the grape, heretofore unknown in our country, has been introduced. Did the vine-dressers come from the county of Madison? I do not say this in disparagement of Madison. I love and respect the people of my native state, but I deem it necessary and right to make these remarks, in justice to our naturalized fellow citizens.

Vine-dressers have come from France, from the banks of the Rhine, and the Moselle, and from the tributaries of that great river until it enters the gorges of the mountains of the Tyroll, and have taught us the mode of cultivating the grape in the valley of the Ohio. They have come from the banks of the Loire and the Garonne, and from the department of the Gironde, until we have found new branches of industry springing up all around us.

We find by the Patent office report of last year, that from only three hundred acres, devoted to the culture of the vine, in the vicinity of Cincinnati, there was a return of sixty thousand gallons, yielding to the producer a profit of some $200 to the acre.

At Louisville, that class of population of which the gentleman contemptuously speaks, has manifested the same desire for agricultural improvement. A gentleman of my acquaintance, upon ten acres of ground, raised, this year, grapes enough to make from one thousand five hundred to one thousand seven hundred gallons of wine, which are already contracted for at $1 25 per gallon. Yet he would never have done this, had not this culture been introduced by foreigners. Would it be just to withhold from that class of our citizens an equal participation in the right of suffrage? It would be equally unwise and unjust. The temper of the people will not bear it.

The gentleman seems to think that the institution of slavery is to rest upon the exclusion of foreigners. He says if we allow foreigners to vote, it will have the effect of destroying that institution. I tell him that that is not the way to remedy the evil, if evil exists. Let him declare that foreigners shall not vote, and he will produce perpetual agitation and eternal dissatisfaction. Will you impose burdens on them, and yet refuse them the right of suffrage? I can tell him, if he thinks by this sort of legislation to promote the great interest of the state, he is mistaken. Such a policy has always proved fatal in every age and country. Tell these men that you will not trust them to vote, and there will be a combined effort to overturn the constitution. You will produce an agitation that will be disastrous to the interests of the state. Proscribe them, and you enlist the generous and magnanimous spirit of the people among whom they live in their behalf, and there will be one united voice in favor of setting aside the constitution you have made.

Sir, it is not expedient, in my opinion, that you should so arrange matters as to create two white classes in this state with different privileges. It is important that all should be free, or if slavery is planted here by necessity, that none but slaves should be disfranchised. Create no white class that shall be deprived of the privilege of freemen—make no pariahs of society. God forefend that such a class should ever exist in Kentucky. I for one hope never to live to see the day. I do not believe the people will ever tolerate it.

I have shown what taxation is imposed on the river counties. The city of Covington already has a population of 12,000—Newport a population of 7,000. The city of Maysville, if the contemplated railroad be constructed, will rapidly advance in population. Foreign population will naturally be attracted to these points, and I do not believe there is any reason why this convention should proscribe them from the enjoyment of the right of suffrage and equal representation. If it is insisted that it is necessary to protect the state on this ground, the argument is not tenable. The gentleman alleges that there is a peculiar similarity between the counties of a state and the states of this confederacy. The resemblance does not hold, for the counties are not sovereign, and you propose to unite them for the purposes of representation.

I have shown that we pay one-tenth part of all the public revenue of the state, and that we have only a thirty-eighth part of the representation. I believe that a full consideration on the part of this house, will induce them to accord to us the right which, by a technical construction of the constitution, has heretofore been denied. If, however, the construction was right, I claim that upon every principle of right and justice, it ought to be reversed in this constitution.

Sir, there are aristocracies different from municipal aristocracies—there is an aristocracy of wealth, as well in the county represented by the gentleman, as in the city which I have the honor to represent. There are fewer men of capital in Louisville in proportion than in the county of Fayette. There is less aggregated money capital than there is in Madison.

We are about to form a constitution, and we are about to form it, as I believe, upon broad and just principles; but I tell you, as I tell this house, that if they do us this toul, this inexplicable wrong—a wrong that we have not the strength to remedy—the people of this state will not, when appealed to on this subject, sanction the injustice. I know them, and I trust them implicitly. If we go to them with such a constitution in our hands, they will exclaim, in the language of Macbeth, deluded by the hollow promises of the we'ird woman of the heath:

"And be the e juggling fiends no more believed,
That palter with us in a double sense,
And keep the word of promise to the ear,
But break it to the hope."

We shall have the word of promise broken to the hope, if Louisville is to be proscribed and stigmatized, and refused her just share of representation in the senate of the state.

I have thrown out these remarks for the consideration of the house. I do not believe this convention will be unjust—I will never believe it until it occurs. I know well the people of Kentucky are brave, generous, and magnanimous, and that the delegate on this floor, who attempts to deny us equal justice, when he presents himself again before his constituents, is sure to fall.

Mr. ROOT. I have but few remarks to submit, and I should not have risen at all, in my present state of health, had it not been that on Saturday my particular section of country was pointed out and proscribed by the remarks of the gentleman from Madison. I was led to suppose, on a former occasion, that the gentleman from Madison intended to pursue a more magnanimous course. Upon the subject of the law of 1833 I stood by him to a certain extent, as far as I could go, but he a little out Heroded Herod upon that subject. And I had supposed from the position he then took, that his darling institution of slavery was not to be brought up here by himself, at all events, as the great turning point upon which he expected to proscribe the free white citizens of this commonwealth. He on that occasion denounced the institution of slavery as one upon which lay the finger of God, and whom God had condemned, would certainly wither and perish away. But he seems to have slept and dreamed upon the subject, and after having then made one of the most denunciatory speeches ever heard in any hall against that institution, and picturing it as a blasting blight on this commonwealth, he is now prepared to cast an eye about, and because he sees the growing importance of certain towns and cities in this commonwealth, to violate the great principles of our former constitution, to violate that principle which was acted on in 1798, that principle which Kentucky is celebrated for establishing, the principle of representation in proportion to population. He is prepared in this nineteenth century, in the year 1849, after all the lights of science, after all the experience in government, and after every thing that has been developed to elevate the human intellect, the learned and erudite gentleman from Madison is prepared to maintain the doctrine that representation ought not to be based on the population, but that the state ought to be marked out with an eye of wisdom in relation to a single institution. Here is the principle, and the gentleman in his seeming desire to avoid the consequences of his speech on a former occasion, is now willing to take the other extreme horn of the dilemma, and become the very prince of the pro-slavery men in this house. Sir, I do not understand the consistency of the gentleman from Madison, and I hope he will take some occasion to show it to this house. He proposes to apply the principle of representation on population to every part of the state except that along the Ohio river. The Ohio river, the overflowing population of Louisville, and the increasing population of Kenton and Campbell, and the growing wealth and prosperity along the northern frontier seem to haunt his imagination, and he is willing to make himself popular by yielding to the prejudices, the low prejudices, if any such exist in the interior, among the farming interest. He is willing to array the farming interest against those of the cities, when he knows very well that those interests are so closely connected that if you sever them and destroy one, it will produce a lasting injury to the other. But as a great argument why this proscriptive policy should be pursued in relation to those counties along the Ohio, he instances the growth of the counties of Campbell and Kenton. Look, says he, at Campbell and Kenton; in a very few years they will be entitled to four or six representatives, and with senators too in proportion to their population. What other basis of representation does he propose? Does he propose to strike at the representation of Madison or Fayette, or any other of the interior or mountain counties? No, he is prepared only to strike at Campbell and Kenton. He is prepared to make capital all over the state, by doing great injustice to one or another portion of the commonwealth. Sir, let it go forth from the halls of this house that you have made flesh of one and fish of another part of the commonwealth—let it go forth to Louisville that she is not to be represented in proportion to her population—let it go to Campbell, where the first battle was fought and the first movement was made for this convention, and where the people were unanimous for it—not upon the subject of slavery, but other subjects connected with the county courts and the miserable rotten system of the judiciary and of life estates in office—I say let it go there that they are to be proscribed and only to be represented in the house of representatives of the state—that they are to be taxed by the member from Madison and other parts of the state without a share of the representation of the senate, and every man of them is against you. And so they justly should be. I had thought that one of the principles that kindled up the fires of the American revolution was that men should be fully represented in the bodies that dared to lay taxes upon them. It was the principle that threw the teas overboard in Boston harbor—that fired the first gun at Lexington—that produced the terrible struggle at Bunker Hill, and that wound up the contest in a flood of glory at the last great struggle at Yorktown. All this was in defence of these principles of universal representation wherever the rights of taxation extended. And, sir, if this darling institution that haunts the imagination of the gentleman from Madison cannot be sustained short of denying a just and full representation to every part of the commonwealth, and without disfranchising a part of the citizens and voting population of the state of Kentucky, I say let it perish. If the whites are indeed at last to become the very slaves in protection of the gentleman's darling institution, I say let it perish. Sir, yield but the point that to defend this institution it is necessary to cut off representation entirely from those counties in the one house, and they will then ask to deprive them of representation in the other, and at last to disfranchise them altogether—and still retain the right to tax and govern them—they will reduce them to the mere serfs and slaves of the balance of the commonwealth. And all this is asked in defence of the gentleman's darling institution, that but forty days ago he said God's finger was weighing heavily upon. And if God's finger is upon it, in the name of God will it not perish? Will the puny or the powerful arm of the gentleman from Madison be able to sustain an institution that God has declared shall wither and perish away. Sir, he proposes to make Campbell and Kenton and Louisville the scape goat for all his sins. He proposes to expiate upon that section of country the sins he may have committed by saying that the finger of God is upon his darling institution.

But they are to be punished for another reason. Aliens and foreigners are coming into those cities. Yes sir, and the yankees are coming from New England there, and he says that all know that the feelings and sympathies of northern men are opposed to his darling institution. And in this—the year 1849—he is willing to proscribe northern men and to drive out those from the state who might be willing to immigrate here to proscribe and disfranchise northern men, the descendants of those brave fathers, who were at the very head and front of the whole offending during the revolutionary war—they who were magna pars fuit in striking out this glorious system of American liberty—and all for what? Because forsooth, the time will come, he thinks, when he will be unable to sustain his darling institution, and when a majority of the voters in the commonwealth will be opposed to it. Sir, although I am not an immediate emancipationist, or an abolitionist, and although my county stands unanimously with me upon all these subjects, I for one, look forward to the hour, and I hope in God that the hour will come, when the slaveholder and every other citizen throughout this broad commonwealth, may say to the sons of Africa, we are now prepared to transplant you to your native soil. Sir, the finger of God is on the institution. Although I believe that the negroes of this commonwealth, and most of the states will finally be driven quietly and prudently out—yet, I believe that the hour is coming in some part of the world, either here or elsewhere, when Ethiopia shall indeed stretch forth her hands to God—when the arm of the oppressor shall be broken, and the oppressed shall go free. And the gentleman with all his proscription of the white population and his denying them the right of representation, cannot stay that hour one solitary moment. I have been denounced in some quarters as the representative of an abolition district. Sir, we have not half the abolitionism and emancipationism in my county, that there is in the gentleman's and in Fayette, and most of the interior counties of the state. So little did my constituents think of it, that probably not fifty in the whole county agitated it in the slightest degree. And yet as prudent men, as men with some little forecast, they apprehend that every institution of man—and slavery is an institution of man—must waste and perish and wither away. I was somewhat amused at my learned friend from Boyle, (Mr. Talbott,) the other day, when he undertook to prove from the Old Testament writing, that slavery was indeed a divine institution, blessed from on High—that it deserved the warmest protection of all good people everywhere—and that it was a blessing both to the master and the slave. And his display of his knowledge of scripture reminded me something of a man who was once talking volubly on the same subject to another a little more ignorant on the subject, and I was almost induced to look up and say to the gentleman from Boyle in the words of the ignorant man's reply—"did you write the scriptures." From what I have read of the Old Testament, I certainly understand that in the very passages the gentleman from Boyle quoted, slavery is there denounced as a curse. "Cursed be Canaan, a servant of servants shall he be." It was denounced as a curse upon the African race generally, and if the gentleman will take the pains to read the Old Testament scriptures, he will find that wherever a curse is pronounced on a people or a nation, the very hand that carries out the curse of high Heaven is itself accursed. Look when the children of Israel were carried into Babylon in captivity, and were held there in servitude and slavery. It was the decree of God himself, and in his own good time Darius the Mede came thundering at the Babylonish gates, and in one night the king and all his lordly courtiers perished. This was their punishment for having done injustice to the children of Israel, and making them captives, and violating the holy sanctuary of God. In all the Old Testament writings it will be found that the very hand which carries out the curse is itself accursed. Slavery, so far as the bible is concerned is neither a blessing to the slave nor the master. It is a curse, directly a curse, and the bible authorises every man to say it. If the bible held a different doctrine, I should be almost prepared to say with a learned doctor with whom I was acquainted years ago, that I would tear the leaf out. I should almost be prepared to disbelieve the whole bible if it inculcates such monstrous injustice. I am not prepared to say that God is the author of the institution of slavery. It is peculiarly a municipal institution; it is a matter of policy, and exists now only from policy and necessity, and not by the authority or the command of Heaven. It exists because we cannot get out of it, and from policy. That is the basis upon which to place it, and when gentlemen place it on any other, they make it their darling institution, and place it among the holy sacraments. Why it offends the common sense of all mankind, and we become justly a laughing stock to the better and more intellectual portion of the world.

But we are now asked by the gentleman from Madison to yield to this jesuitical policy of sacrificing principle to expediency—that is, that you may do any deed to secure a supposed good end. The great principle that the people shall be represented in proportion to the population of the state, must now be stricken down, because, as the gentleman says, who can look forward and not see that the hour is soon coming when the strip of territory, bordering on the Ohio for ten miles in width, will contain the majority of that population? For that reason he will sacrifice that principle to policy, to Madison county, and the peculiar interests with which he is identified. I am for doing justice to every part of the commonwealth. I wish the farming interest to be fully, fairly, and ably represented. The farming interest of the state is its great interest, nor do I believe that there is the slightest danger that any other interest will ever trample over it. I believe that if the whole strength of the commonwealth was now in the hands of the citizens of Louisville, and they had now a majority on this floor, that the farming interest would have little or nothing to fear from their action. Since this state has been in existence, the farmers of this commonwealth have almost entirely been represented by the lawyer interest of the commonwealth, and yet I am bold and proud to affirm that the farming interest has been just as well represented as though the farmers came here personally themselves. It was not therefore that particular interests shall be represented, it is that men of sense, of experience, of enlightened views, and of sound policy, shall be sent here, and if they all come from one corner of the state, I apprehend no man would ever prove so recreant to his own interest, as to violate any of the great principles that operate to secure the best interests of the farmer.

But I rise only to express my views, and I have nearly done. I am happy, to say I feel proud of my town, which is Newport, in Campbell county. It well may haunt the gentleman from Madison's imagination. Notwithstanding his phillipics against my particular section of country, and his envy of our growth, our wealth, our prosperity, and our supposed future importance, I apprehend that the sound sense of the delegates here assembled, the combined wisdom of the state, will not permit them to do a thing that may be thrown upon their children hereafter, and to the disgrace of their own memory. I believe that they will not now for the first time, proscribe any portion of the commonwealth, because they apprehend that the time may come when they will have a pretty strong delegation on the floor of the legislature.

We are acting here, as some men tell us, for posterity, for our own reputation, that in future times the people may take up the book which records our proceedings and read the sentiments of the various gentlemen who have participated in our action, and say of this or that man he was at least fifty years ahead of the generation in which he lived. A proud bequest is it to the sons of those worthy sires, when the children feel proud of the sentiments uttered by their fathers on this floor. But will the descendants of the man thus feel, who says on this floor he is willing to proscribe a city or section of country because we have the power to do it—that he is willing to exercise the power because we have that power, without regard to the principle of the thing, and who is willing to violate principle and make it yield to policy? Sir, I have done.

Mr. BALLINGER. I have been, throughout the whole session of this convention, a silent listener to the protracted debates, on every subject, that have here taken place. I have, it is true, felt a deep interest in all those subjects, and whilst silent, paid that attention to them that will enable me at all times to vote understandingly upon them; but a question has now come up here, in which the immediate interests of my constituents are perhaps more intimately involved, than in any other question that could come up. That at any rate is the understanding which I have of the interest which they have in the question now under discussion. Sir, I have listened to the last two speeches that have been delivered with a great deal of interest, and I have been delighted with the eloquence of gentlemen; and it seems to me, that the last gentleman (Mr. Root) especially has exercised the greatest ingenuity possible, in withdrawing the minds of those who listened to him from the subject under debate. Sir, if he touched it in one point, I am at a loss to know what point it was. He has followed the usual course of able advocates, in advocating any cause not strong in itself, in withdrawing the minds of those who are to act, from the subject under debate, by casting a delusive and illusive veil over the whole, which will withdraw them from the consideration of that upon which they have to determine. I have listened also with delight to the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston,) and when he has confined himself to the facts which operate upon this subject, when he has not drawn upon his fancy and gone off to other subjects that have no connection with it, I have also been delighted. But when he has brought arguments and statistics to bear on the subject, instead of strengthening his cause, they are calculated to produce alarm, and to show the dangers that are to be apprehended from its success. The gentleman from Louisville shows conclusively that they are building up in his section of the state, an overweening power that is to exercise a great influence upon the state. He shows that there is a population pouring in and increasing there now, in an unparalleled degree, over all the other portions of the state. He shows that there is a power increasing there, which in connection with the increasing power of the surrounding districts, will be sufficient to carry almost any proposition that Louisville may desire to have carried, in order to promote her own interests. What is the subject under debate here? It is not one that is to call forth loud denunciations, as if it was an atrocious position that the gentleman from Madison has assumed. Why, sir, if any one were to come in here, and not know what was the subject under debate, he would at once deem that he had been advocating a proposition here that was sufficient to draw upon his head the denunciation of all good and just men. Is there any thing atrocious in the principle he has been contending for? If there is, those who engrafted it upon our present constitution, under which we have been living for the last fifty years, are entitled to a portion of that denunciation.—Those pure and enlightened patriots, who, acting for posterity, and they did so act when they gave us a constitution under which we have lived and prospered, and whose memory we now almost idolize,—those men, I say, if the gentleman from Madison, who was the first to speak on this subject, is entitled to any denunciation, are at least entitled to their share of the abuse. It is the principle we find engrafted on the present constitution, and what is it? Every department of government is to be a check upon and protection against the other. The executive, legislative, and judiciary departments, have separate and distinct duties, and separate and distinct powers—the one is not a branch of the other. The legislative department then is divided into a senate and house of representatives. What is the use of this senate? Why not go upon the present organization of the French government, and have a single legislative assembly based upon that foundation? What is the use and necessity of the senate, if it is not to operate as a balance wheel, and is not to constitute a check upon the house of representatives? Why, that is its whole object, otherwise it would be wholly unnecessary. We find the people to be represented more immediately in the house of representatives. They come fresh and direct from the people, and represent them more immediately in all their monetary concerns. The senate is designed then, when the representatives are disposed to go into unnecessary extravagance, on account of its experience and the more mature age of its members, to step forward and check them. If it is so atrocious a principle, the gentlemen themselves are acting under it, and I imagine they would be the last to abolish it. If it is good in one association, it is good in another; if it is good in one relation, it is good in another.

Examine your federal representation, and you will find the senate there, is not based on popular numbers. Why is it not? Because it is for the purpose of protecting the great interests of society—and that minorities may be protected as well as majorities. Strike out this principle, and you at once come upon a state of things where minorities may be crushed. The gentleman himself, the young soldier who girded on his sword, and went forth to avenge his country, and vindicate her honor, would be one of the first to step forward and resist the abrogation of that principle. It is founded on a different principle from what he has assumed it to be. It is not that one sovereign shall be protected against another, but that the rights of the minority may be protected against the encroachment of the majority. Look at the southern states, and see the helpless position they now occupy in relation to the rest of the Union. Sir, this institution we have come here to protect, and that we are seeking to perpetuate to posterity, would be swept off as with a besom of destruction from every part of this continent, if this was so. And still the gentleman will come forward and tell us that this representation exclusively on population is the only proper and right mode of action, when he himself would be the first to resist the encroachments of the majority upon the minority. If that was the only true principle, the south would now be crouching and submissive to the north, or be obliged to throw herself into a rebellious, or revolutionary attitude against the balance of the Union, and scenes of riot and bloodshed, and universal massacre ensue. And yet the gentleman will come forward and tell us that when applied to our own state, this principle is an atrocious one. Carry out his argument, and it will not bear investigation. What has he ever been contending for but that the senate is the saviour of the Union? He, like all others has been contending for the extension of the area of slavery to keep up the balance of power, and let the great balance wheel of this government roll on without a jostle. Well, how does it apply to us. We find that within a few years, our voting population has sprung from 133,000, to 155,000 voters. Where does this immense increase come from? It is not in the interior, or on the southern borders, or in the mountain country. Where is it? Why the great increase is here, upon the northern frontier, bordering upon the free states, and into which this foreign population is now pouring. It is not a native increase, it is an extensive foreign increase, which is pouring upon us, and against which we should guard. Not by excluding them from the rights which they may legitimately enjoy, but to provide against it, by keeping this balance wheel as we found it. I rejoice in the growth of the city of Louisville, and in her prosperity. Our great agricultural region is immediately connected with her. She is the market into which we throw our wealth; and the growth of every year. I wish her therefore to continue to grow and prosper, but I do not wish her to attain a position, nor the counties of the gentlemen from Kenton and Campbell and others, by their rapid increase, to attain a position to control and govern the commonwealth. What is the present population of Louisville? About 50,000. She is moving on with giant strides. She is establishing manufactures, and is drawing a population to her, and every year her thousands are increasing. Well now, the gentleman is just placing us in the attitude that he has been warning us against. He says Kentucky constitutes about one fourth of the area of France. Well suppose it does. If then, a single city can govern a country of 30,000,000 of people, cannot a single city, by her wealth and power, influence the legislation of Kentucky? Look at Paris. Why, whenever a revolution breaks out, whenever a single movement is made there, it vibrates from the centre to the extremity of France, just like an electric shock. It is always the same case. Why, the single city of Paris governs the whole of France. She overthrows a monarchy and establishes a republic, and then she requires a standing army to keep her from again crowning some royal head with the diadem. Does the gentleman want to build up a great city with such an influence? Not that I believe the people of Louisville would ever wish to exercise it for such a purpose. But look at her condition now. She is increasing in commerce and manufactures, and exhibits a greater concentration of wealth than any other portion of Kentucky. The gentleman has referred to Boston. Well sir, look at Boston; has she not now the whole state of Massachusetts tributary to her, encircling as she has that broad commonwealth, with her iron arms. What is Louisville doing. She is building her rail roads to keep up her prosperity, to extend her influence, and to support her people. She is seeking to spread her influence all through the state. Here is a rail road extending to Lexington, and others are perhaps in contemplation, and she is indeed extending forth her arms for the purpose of grasping the whole state. Sir, that is the influence the gentleman is here attempting to bring upon the state of Kentucky. Well, to a certain extent, I want to see it, for these public improvements are a benefit to other portions of the state. But I do not wish to see her influence extended thereby, so as to control the state. I am for her legitimate influence on the floor of the house of representatives, and if that body chooses to run riot and go into wild excesses on the subject of internal improvements, as they have heretofore done, I want to have a check upon them, through the senate.

Well, how is this population made up? It seems strange, but you can get a voting population there for almost any purpose. Look at the statistics, as presented here in the second auditor's report, and we find that in 1847, when perhaps a particular object was in view, there was a voting population in Louisville alone, of near 7,000. Well, in 1848, we find that it was 5,000 and something over. It is a fluctuating population, and can be increased at will, for almost any purpose. It is here to-day, and gone to-morrow. Suppose you want to make out an apportionment bill; if the people are so disposed, you can bring in this amount of population and swell it up to any amount that may be necessary to give them a powerful representation in the senate. What is the state of the interior of Kentucky? The people there are stationary. Their pursuits are agricultural; and wealth and population, and every thing else there, is more equally distributed and divided than in the cities. You do not find those enormous fortunes, and that extreme and abject poverty there that you do in cities; but you find property more generally diffused among the people. He says that Ohio and Massachusetts and New York do not proscribe their cities. What is their situation? In Ohio they have gone to the extreme in every thing, and are trying now to get back to the position they formerly occupied. Ohio sees the evils of her position, and is trying to get back on the old conservative ground she once occupied. So will it be with the state of Kentucky, if she adopts this principle of giving to these overgrown cities as much representation in the senate and lower house as their population would entitle them to. The voting population of Jefferson county and Louisville now amounts to some 9 or 10,000 voters. You may take four of the most populous counties in the interior of the state—Lincoln, Boyle, Garrard, and Jessamine—and they have a voting population of 5,450, and an agricultural wealth of something less than $17,000,000. The county of Jefferson and Louisville combined, present a voting population of almost twice that amount, and Jefferson and Louisville have a monied capital of near $3,000,000; and there is where they get a great deal more of power than the interior. We have there land, and slaves, and stock, but little monied capital. The gentleman tells us that Louisville pays $43,000 revenue, or almost one tenth part of the revenue of the state. Sir, it is true, and that is another evidence that we should guard against this thing. Why, although he tells us of the amount of revenue drawn from that county, yet he does not tell us that some $10,000 or $15,000 of it are drawn out of the treasury for her expenses. She does not, perhaps, pay a much larger revenue than the county of Fayette, and Fayette has but two representatives on this floor, and it is probable, from the nature of her population, that she never will have more.

Now, I go for the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Lindsey.) I think it right. It leaves this matter just as we find it in the senate, and gives the cities a full representation in the lower house. Let population be the basis there. Let the people be represented there fully. On all monetary affairs, let them have a full voice. Then let not one be subject to the influence of the other.

Now, you may take the interior portion of the state, and you will see the difference. Take the counties of Rockcastle, Laurel, Whitley, Knox, Harlan, and Clay, with a voting population not approaching that of the city of Louisville and the county Jefferson, and yet constituting a territory of upwards of one million of square acres. That whole region is to have perhaps but one voice upon the floor of the senate, while the city of Louisville and the county of Jefferson would have, under the present arrangement, looking to the increase of population that is going on there, representation to an unlimited extent. As the gentleman from Madison well observes, take a region of some ten or twelve miles on the Ohio, that would be intimately connected and interested in common, and you will find that they constitute nearly one third, if not one half, of the voting population of the state. Give to Louisville, with a population of 100,000, as she will probably attain in a few years—give to Covington, opposite Cincinnati, which has now some 12,000, and which has broke on us like a meteor, and give her a population of 50,000—give to the city of Newport an equal number, and to Maysville her increase, and to other places theirs, and you at once give them the power to control the destinies of this state. Now, is this agricultural interest to be sacrificed—to be placed like the south, dependent on the north? It seems to me there should be some balance preserved, and engrafted upon the constitution. I shall then be for the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Lindsey,) which leaves the representation in the senate as it is in the present constitution, and if I cannot get that, then I will go for the amendment of the gentleman from Daviess, (Mr. Triplett,) with a slight modification, and that is, to insert one instead of two senators. That seems to me to be the just basis of representation. Now, with these few remarks to the convention, such as they are, and which I believed it to be my duty to submit, so far as I am concerned, I submit the question.

Mr. McHENRY. This question is, perhaps, one of the most important that has or will come before this convention. It embraces the whole subject of the apportionment of the representation of the state, and for my self, I frankly confess, I have had more difficulty in satisfying my own mind as to what is the right of the question, than as to any other subject on which my mind has been brought to bear. I know that the true basis of our representation is population—or as we have it in this state, the voting population. When we come to see, that in carrying it out, some inequalities exist which it is impossible for us to remedy, we should turn our minds to the matter and see how we can best arrange it so as to present as few inequalities as possible, and afford as fair a representation as is in our power. Our present constitution declares that representation shall be based entirely on numbers, and lays down as a rule, that it shall be arranged so as to present a perfect equality as near as may be, and it has been an entire failure. In some instances counties are represented where the voting population is not a thousand, and other counties who have double that number have but a single representative. Let us examine the present bill and see if it is any better, and whether inequalities do not exist in the mode we are asked to adopt, equal at least to those in the present constitution. And when we find that it is impossible to carry out perfect equality, should we not then impose some limitation to the representation of particular interests, which may otherwise become over-powerful. I have turned my attention somewhat, to the examination of what would be the operations of the plan before us. I find three rules laid down: First, every county that has the full ratio shall be entitled to a representation; if it has that ratio and two thirds over, then it shall be entitled to an additional representation; and every county that has two thirds of the ratio, shall have a representative, and those who have not two thirds shall be thrown together, and if they are not situated so as to be attached to any county not having two thirds, then they shall be attached to the nearest county adjoining, having the least number of voters. According to this mode of apportionment six counties having an aggregate of 23,974 voters, are entitled to sixteen representatives at a ratio of 1498, while six other counties having only 13,911 voters are entitled to twelve representatives, at a ratio of 1159. And twenty eight other counties having 51,987 voters have only twenty eight representatives at a ratio of 1856, thus showing in those twenty eight counties a loss of 9371 votes or six representatives and over. There are thirty three counties with thirty three representatives, at a ratio of 1233 voters, and the other twenty seven counties will have fourteen representatives, and they will have to be thrown together as best they may to get them, but it cannot be done at all upon perfect terms of equality. This estimate is made with reference to the number of one hundred representatives, for which the ratio at present is 1522. But if we should fix the number of representatives at seventy five, the inequality would be still greater, if possible. Two counties, Jefferson and Kenton, will then have six representatives with 12,689 voters, while sixteen counties with 35,947 voters will have but sixteen representatives. They will thus lose 4525 votes, or over two representatives. There will then be twenty four representatives to be divided among the remaining fifty two counties of the state, a division which it will be impossible to make, on any thing like a perfectly equal arrangement. This proves to my mind that we cannot make representation exactly equal, according to the principle we all acknowledge to be the correct one. Was it doing then any injustice to those who were more favorably situated, because their population was more contracted, and occupied a smaller territory, to fix some limit upon the representation they should have in the house or the senate?

I shall go for the amendment giving to the city that may be entitled to a representative in the senate, a separate representative, but I would have the number limited. No city or county in the state should ever have more than one senator or five representatives. This would be giving to them one twentieth part of the representation of the state, and that ought to content them. I am willing to give them a fair representation, and this would be a fair mode of doing it. We see that owing to the great number of counties, and the manner in which they are situated, and the difference in their population, that it is impossible to do equal justice upon what we all concede to be the true basis of representation. When this cannot be done, should we not fix a limit, as has been suggested. This limit had better be applied to the cities where the people are concentrated, act together, and can bring their influence to bear more directly on a subject, than it is possible for an agricultural people, scattered all over the state. It is true that the interests of the cities are identified to some extent, with the interests of the balance of the state, but it is true also that there is a great deal of foreign capital invested in the business of the cities which has identity with the interests of the rest of the state. We know that it is for the interest of the state to keep up these great manufacturing interests among us: yet we must know also that there are combinations in those cities, foreign to the rest of the state. I know that this is not so with a majority, yet men are apt to go for their own interests, and for the interests of those more nearly connected with them in monetary concerns, than the balance of the state. This may be a broad assertion, but if we look at human nature, and see to what a great extent the idea of making money operates upon all of us, we shall be compelled to acknowledge its justice. Louisville is now, I believe, entitled to three representatives, and I am willing that she should have a senator. But I am not willing to give her more than one twentieth part of whatever shall be decided upon as the legislative representation of the state. I prefer that we should fix it at one hundred, rather than seventy-five, as the last number would increase the ratio, and make the representation more unequal, and the proportion of influence would be greater in favor of the large cities, than it is now. While therefore I desire to see the increasing growth of these cities among us, and desire to do them no wrong, I must acknowledge that I desire to prevent their exercising an undue control in the affairs of government, by having a majority of the representation. As we can never, by any system secure a perfect equality of representation, I am for putting a limit to them, as they never can lose more votes than the other portions of the state. They will even under the plan proposed have more weight than many of the counties in the state. Take the county of Logan; under the proposed plan, she would have but one representative, and yet she has a voting population of 2151. She therefore would lose 628, almost one third of the entire voters of her county. By fixing a limitation then, can we ever do more injustice to any city that may grow up among us than is done here to Logan county? Many other counties would lose ten and twenty per cent, and some twenty two or twenty three per cent, while by fixing a limit on the cities, they would never lose so great a percentage. I am willing therefore to limit the cities to one senator and five representatives, and unwilling to go beyond that.

On the subject of slavery, I shall not remark, though I think the amendment will fail to accomplish its object and hope therefore it will not be adopted. At some other time I may give my views on the subject of slavery, but I do not think it has any connection with the present subject. Having got through with my remarks on this point, and notwithstanding that in so doing I may be considered out of order I will add no more.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not rise to participate in this discussion, but after the gentleman from Campbell (Mr. Root) has undertaken to speak for the county of Kenton, the constituency I represent, in the manner which he has, I should be recreant—

Mr. ROOT. I spoke of Kenton in connection with Campbell, and only so far as others had connected them.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am glad to hear the explanation of the gentleman, but he certainly said that Kenton and Campbell were to be made the scape-goats, and he gave an expression of feeling in a manner which every member on this floor must have understood as intended to indicate the feeling of the northern section of the state. I do not rise to take part in this discussion now, although I may do so before the subject closes, but to say that I should be recreant to my constituents and bastard to the very title of Kentuckian, if I should hear such sentiments uttered on this floor, without, in my place, denouncing them as vile aspersions upon the character of my constituency. They may live on the border, and within the very fetid atmosphere of an anti-slavery state, but the sights they have there witnessed, and the atmosphere that is blown over to them by every breeze, has made them but the firmer in their adherence to the principles upon which Kentucky stands. I come here yielding to no man in a firm advocacy, and sincere feeling for pro-slavery principles, and I made the race against a gentleman, to whom, in point of high talent and superior age and experience, I bow with humble obedience; I came here as the representative, of an overwhelming majority of what Kentucky has been, and what I hope she ever will be—sound in principle, ready to defend her rights from whatever quarter the attack may come, whether from the fanaticism of abolitionism or any other, and ready to give her help to those who sympathize with her, when the cry for help shall come. As to our claim for representation on a fair and equal footing, why we would be whistled down the winds, if the sentiments of the gentleman from Campbell are to be regarded as the true current of public sentiment in our quarter. As a distinguished friend remarked to me while the gentleman was speaking, "if he had any doubt how he should vote, if the gentleman from Campbell was representing correctly his constituents, he would at once go against the proposition." We meet here to settle great and high principles, and with a common confidence in the generosity and common justice of our fellow members of this body, come from whatever section they may, and when I come, if I shall take part in this discussion, to place the claims of Covington on proper grounds, I shall point to my seat on this floor as a complete refutation of the assertion that though my constituents live on the border of the state, they will ever prove untrue to the interests of Kentucky. I am pained to hear the sentiments expressed by my friend from Campbell. I undertake to interfere between no man and his constituents, but we live in sight of each other, and I know I may say emphatically from my own experience, that he does not speak the sentiments of a large portion of Campbell, when he says that slavery is a sin, and that he would rip out the leaf of his Bible if it dared to uphold it. There are slaveholders and pro-slavery men in Kenton, who will compare with any in this convention, and I think the gentleman casts an aspersion upon them, when he attributes to them the sentiments he has indicated here this morning. I was pained for another reason, and that is the record of our proceedings. The gentleman's speech will be taken as a text by the abolitionists. When the South is fighting for her rights in a national point of view, and when gentlemen rise in the national halls and say that while they leave the poor boon to the southern states, of controlling slavery within their limits, they are forever to stand still, and never go into a territory belonging to the Union, and won by their joint valor. The text of one of the members of the Kentucky Convention will be the text from which they will preach their homilies of abolition. I felt proud of my own native state, when, at a public dinner the other day, I saw among the set toasts, "Kentucky; no enemy to southern rights will hold a seat within her Convention walls." I felt pained, that when the gentleman's speech shall be reported, we shall be obliged to make an exception to that fact in his person.

UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN LIBRARY

I repeat, I had not intended to participate in this discussion, but as the gentleman may be supposed by some to speak the sentiments of northern Kentucky, I felt that I should be recreant to those whom I represent on this floor, if I let the sentiment pass without an instant denial or refutation. I hope to have an opportunity to break a lance with my friend on the subject of slavery, when the resolution of the distinguished gentleman from Henderson, (Mr. Dixon,) shall come up; and at least I think I shall be willing to go before the people of both counties, and appeal to them which has most correctly represented them on the subject.

Mr. HARDIN. I have an amendment that I propose to offer at a proper time, which I will read. It is to be inserted after the word "in," in the 10th line, and 5th section.

"The house of representatives, and whenever any city or town shall have qualified voters equal to the ratio required to entitle it to one senator, such city or town shall elect a senator: Provided, That in no event shall such city or town ever have more than five representatives and one senator."

I know the basis of representation is population and not property. That is the basis to a great extent in the government of the United States. But there are two conservative principles in the constitution of the United States; one is, that the slaveholding states get a representation for three fifths of their slaves. To be sure they get a privilege, but they are liable to a direct tax in proportion to their representation in the house of representatives. Direct taxes, however, have never been levied but twice, and perhaps they will not be again. It is a very expensive tax to collect; it cost $14 74 for every hundred dollars to collect it and cover defalcations.

There is another conservative principle, and that is, that the smaller states are represented in the senate as sovereignties, and Delaware and Rhode Island have the same weight as Pennsylvania and New York. The senate is a congress of sovereignties. Now, each of these features is a departure from the principle of representation according to population. It is a conservative feature which does not apply to counties. There will be no danger for twenty years to come, that these cities will have enough population for two senators. I am unwilling that any city shall send more than one twentieth part of the representatives to the house of representatives, or more than one thirty eighth part of the members to the senate. Give them five representatives and one senator, and stop them at that.

I did not rise for the purpose of making any remarks, but as I am up, I will make a single remark in answer to the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston,) who has spoken so exceedingly well, and in such very fine taste and style. He said Louisville had a large portion of wealth; that Louisville is wealthy, and that Jefferson county is so also. It is true. It is fortunately situated in the state of Kentucky. It is the garden spot of America. But much of that is owing to its position and locality; it seems to me though, that it ought not to be Aaron's rod and swallow up the rods of the other magicians.

The gentleman said that Louisville furnished a large proportion of the men that went out in the last war with Mexico. In furnishing that proportion however, it excluded a very large proportion of the balance of the state. There was no draught in Kentucky, thank God, the only draughting was, who should be draughted out and not who should be draughted in. Five thousand of the best men in Kentucky, were tendered shortly after the regiment was filled. It was considered a peculiar favor to Louisville that she got her regiment in, while four or five thousand more were rushing forward and offering their services. I consider it a favor to Louisville, and in that regard she stood forth in place of the balance of the young men in Kentucky. She behaved very handsomely, and she has had one-fourth of the officers that went from the state of Kentucky, when the balance of the state was in no wise behind Louisville. But sir, when you come to the actual fighting part, the Louisville regiment was not brought into battle. Three days Monterey was besieged and there were three days of fighting from day break to dark, and yet they did not get in. I have no doubt they were as ready as any men in Kentucky, but why General Taylor did not bring them into action, I do not know, nor will I attempt to guess, for I might guess improperly. One thing I do know, that at the battle of Buena Vista the second regiment from the state of Kentucky was there, and how pretty they came in. Yes sir, and they bled too, and caused blood to flow from the enemy, and were called, and will be for an hundred years to come, "the bloody regiment of Kentucky." And if you go on the hill here to the burial place of the Kentucky soldiers in the cemetery, you will see some indications of it. I have examined that place, and I did not see the grave of one soldier from the Louisville legion there. I examined it yesterday with a young man from Bardstown who was under Taylor, and I did not see one from the Louisville legion. Do not understand me to say that they would not be just as ready as any men in Kentucky, but I protest against Louisville's being put up here, between Kentucky and danger, as if she stood for the balance of the state. Kentucky was ready, and to her honor and glory, her sons had to be draughted out instead of draughted in. But in relation to the regular army, I must say I regret to see it filled up with this foreign population. I consider it the high road to the loss of our liberties in less than one hundred years. It was the downfall of the ancient republics of Carthage and of Rome, and sooner or later it will be the downfall of every republic the world ever saw, that shall put into its armies foreign mercenaries. I regret very much any invidious comparison should be drawn, but I repeat what I said before, although I pity the poor Irish, the oppressed English, the Scotch, the French, the Italians, the Austrians and the Hungarians, yet is it very politic to invite many more of them here? We have to take care of ourselves. Sir, I have before spoken on this subject, and on a subsequent occasion that may present itself, I expect to speak a little more fully on this subject. I will say however, I wish to God we had some stronger naturalization laws than we have, for no one can help seeing that the paupers who are coming here from Europe in such numbers, or wealthy men, if you will have it so, will make a population to press on the means for the support of the rest. What are we to do with the sixty millions there will be in this country in forty years, if this is not stopped in some way.

There is a great deal of force in what the gentleman from Henderson said on Saturday. Like Absalom's fair speeches, he ran off with my heart; but I have thought of it since Saturday night, and I do not believe I am as badly bothered as the gentleman from Louisville thought I was. We know there is, on the river border, a population pouring in, whose business and pursuits are on the other side of the river. What is it that is swelling the population of Newport and Covington? Why, I am told it is the population of Cincinnati that is pouring in, not to make it a business place, but a home for their families, while their business is in Cincinnati. They have no feelings in common with us. It only shows that my fears are well founded when one of the ablest men in Kentucky had to take the stump, or his antagonist, who was for emancipation, might have carried the whole country. It was fortunate that gentleman was there, and fortunate he had some good old Virginia feeling. I, too, have some of that feeling. I am no Yankee, no anti-slavery man. I would not give one good, stout, hearty Kentucky man for a dozen Cape Cod, or Passamaquaddy men; nor would I give a dozen Kentuckians for ten thousand east of the Rhine. I pity them, but my feelings are for Kentucky, and for the slave population. I see they are to be swallowed up. I see it, that with the Wilmot proviso, the slave-holding states will be swallowed up in forty years. But, thank God, I shall be gone before that time. I may, on some future occasion, speak further on this subject. My feelings are much like those of the gentleman from Bourbon. I pity these foreigners from my heart, but I love Kentucky and the slave-holding population; and I repeat what I said the other day, that if the whole of Europe were to unite to crush the United States, the last gun for liberty would be fired in the slave-holding states. The people of the slave-holding states regard liberty as a high personal privilege, which they would die for rather than give up; and where slavery does not exist, they regard it as a political right.

The PRESIDENT. I am exceedingly sorry that the elder gentleman from Nelson has seen fit to cast a base and infamous stigma upon the gallantry of the soldiers of Louisville and Jefferson county. He says he sees on that hill no name of any citizen of Louisville. If he had waited till the monument which is to be erected there was completed, he would have seen the name of the gallant CLAY, who fell fighting in the foremost ranks; and he would have learned that he was a citizen of Louisville—not born there, it is true—but a citizen by adoption, and by choice, as many other of her citizens are, and he would have forborne the stigma on the city of Louisville, a stigma insinuated, and for that reason more damnable than if it was charged direct.

I was not born in Louisville, sir, but it is the city of my adoption, and I can tell the gentleman that the spirit of freedom burns as pure and as independently in the bosoms of the citizens of Louisville, as it does in the bosoms of the citizens of any portion of Kentucky. It is true sir, the Louisville Legion shed no blood at the battle of Monterey, and it is true that battle continued two days. But where was the Louisville Legion? They were placed, by the order of General Taylor, to guard the battery that shielded those who made the charge, and for twelve hours they endured the fire of the enemy without action, unflinchingly. Why they were placed there is in the breast of that man, but upon that battery and its safety depended the safety of the army, and he confided it to those, who he believed were sufficient to defend it.

Surely, in carrying out an act of political importance, it is not necessary to slander the citizens, who with bravery and gallantry, rushed en masse, to the rescue of their country. The proposition is a proposition to demolish our fair portion of political rights in the commonwealth of Kentucky. It is a proposition now directed solely and exclusively against the city of Louisville, that she shall not have an equal voice in making the laws that are to govern a free people. It is an act of political injustice, and though the gentleman may have had to sleep upon it, in order to bring himself up to it, it shows that that sleep has enabled him to bring himself to perpetrate this act of political injustice, which he had some grudging about in the first instance.

The principle upon which our government is established is universal suffrage. We proclaimed it in the old constitution, and we are about to proclaim it in the new. But it will have to be struck out, if this act of political injustice is perpetrated; because it will be false, utterly, totally, unconditionally, irremediably false to the people of Kentucky, and to the world. If a free people are equal and entitled to equal rights, that is a principle, and no man who acknowledges the principle, if he acts consistently, but must carry it out in all its consequences, or he denies the principle, and says that we are not entitled to equal political rights. Well, if we are not entitled to them, and you deny that principle, where is it to end? Where is the limit to the inroads you will make on the political rights of a portion of your citizens? It will be in the will of a majority, based on no principle but that of expediency. And that majority will have a will not anchored by principle, but expediency, and it will lead to the very same degree of despotism that rules through the Autocrat of Russia, that tramples upon the rights and liberties of the continent of Europe, and has hitherto had no footing on the shores of America, or if a footing, the march and extension of free principles have been, since the days of the revolution, constantly in advance.

What is the reason endorsed by the gentleman from Madison for obliterating these principles? He says that the slave population will not be safe to their masters, if this principle is carried out. Three fourths of the votes that were cast for the delegation on this floor from the city of Louisville, were cast by men who held no slaves —by men who did not worship at that shrine—and they cast their votes on principle. They believed that our fathers when they framed this constitution, laid its foundations in justice, and they determined that they would stand upon the platform, that private property was not to be taken without just compensation—that it was the great privilege of a free people to lay it on that foundation, and keep it on that foundation. And as the law had authorized this property, and individuals had invested in it, if it was the public impulse that this species of property should be excluded, they thought they should compensate those who had acquired it; and soberly appealing to that principle of innate right, based on the foundation of the constitution, we appealed to men to stand by the rights to property as they would stand by the rights to liberty, equality, and equal rights, and we did not appeal in vain.

We stand here representing that people and that great principle, and it is thrown in our teeth that it is necessary to violate that principle, in order to secure our negroes. I would want no other reason and argument to give me double power and double force in agitating upon the subject of emancipation, than to tell a free people, free white men, that their rights have been violated and trampled in the dust, and their equal political privileges in this government have been silenced in the legislative halls of the country in order to save that property. How do gentlemen expect to send back the delegates from the city of Louisville to their constituents? What answer do they expect them to make in relation to this question? They will say, you told us the foundations of this government were laid in justice, and that you would lay the foundations of the one you are framing the same, and would give equal laws and equal rights to all. We should say the balance of the state has deprived us of the voice of freedom, has trampled our rights in the dust. And, for what avowed reason? Because they feared the day would come when emancipation would have a head in the city of Louisville and upon the bordering counties. Thank God, emancipation has not drenched the fields of Louisville, or the bordering counties, with blood. The principles involved in this, and the reasons for carrying it out, are fraught with more evil to this institution than any other act this convention could possibly do. I tell these gentlemen who are in favor of the institution of slavery, that if it can abide at all, it can only abide on the sentiments of justice and right to the holders of slaves. Slaveholders are not a majority in Kentucky. They never will be, and whenever you destroy that principle of right which deprives a man of the power of defending private property—when you trample upon the political rights of men in order to shield it, you have unloosed a force and power which will overturn this principle. If we are to be sacrificed, if our political principles are to be crushed, and our voice is no more to be heard in the country, for God's sake let it be for some other reason, and do not sanctify and make holy that abominable reason that will work against you most fearfully and awfully. There is a jealousy against the cities. Has Kentucky ever had any reason—any just reason—to be jealous of any of the cities in the state, large or small? And is she likely ever to have? Are they less public spirited—less desirous of enlightening the public mind, and sustaining free institutions? The city of Louisville established the first public schools where all went and received an education without charge, except from the public purse. Louisville now lays a tax on the property of her citizens of twelve and a half cents per annum to sustain the public schools in order to enlighten the rising generation, and make them acquainted with their rights. She is in advance—she took the first step and is now in advance—of the balance of the state in reference to education.

Upon the subject of internal improvements, which some men delight to denounce, but which have in their effect more than doubled, or nearly doubled, the value of the whole of the real estate in the country, where did Louisville stand? She was in favor of them, and with her voice and her aid and assistance enabled them to be carried on. And it is obvious to any one acquainted, or who will look at the records of the legislation of that time, if she had withdrawn her assistance there would have been no turnpike roads through the state, and no slackwater navigation, and she is now furnishing an example of enterprise to the balance of the cities, in the railroad she is building from the city of Louisville to this capital, and thence to the city of Lexington, and from thence through the northern portion of the state to join the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and thus open the markets of the east. This is a thing that may and will be accomplished if we are wise, and it is the enterprise of Louisville that points to this work.

Will the citizens of Kentucky derive no advantage from this enterprise? What do they fear? Why, say they, she gets all our produce. Yes, all that you choose to bring, and she pays for it. I hope the trade of Louisville is a mutual advantage to both city and country; and it is obvious to every one who has remarked it, that within the borders of the city there is a home market, beneficial to the citizens of Kentucky. Six thousand hogsheads of tobacco inspected and sold at a home market, where the planter can receive his money, is an evidence that Louisville is growing and producing a market beneficial to the state. Is it that market that causes gentlemen to look with suspicion upon her? It is a market where you get supplies. It is more, it is a market for the enterprise of the state. All that are in Louisville were not born there. All that have trusted and confided in that city were not born there. The merchant, the man of genius and enterprise, goes there as to a market for his genius and talents which the country does not afford.

She has her medical hall and four hundred students, and I hope and trust she yields to those who come there an equivalent, and in the intelligence that she imparts she does no harm to the cause of liberty and equal rights. She educates young men in other departments, and to them the same remark is equally true. What is there that Louisville does to cause the jealousy of different portions of the state? When danger calls her citizens fly to the rescue as soon as those of any other portion of the state. I do not say more quickly, for I do not believe it, but on a proper occasion, and in a proper field, I believe they will meet the contingencies of battle as boldly as any other citizens, and I claim no more for them.

When it comes to the matter of education, Louisville stands ready to show by her acts what she is willing to do to enlighten the public mind and sustain the pillars which sustain our government. When we consider the principles which advance a people in wealth and prosperity, the enterprise and the zeal in which she engages in them, shows that there is a patriotism in it. Is it to this that you object?

Mr. Chairman, I know the balance of the counties of this state have it within their power to put such provisions in this constitution as they may choose, and they may deny to Louisville, or any other city in the commonwealth, any representation at all—any voice in it. They have got the power. Is it expedient they should exercise it? They may exercise it by violating the great principle of equal rights. The gentlemen do not propose, I understand, to go the whole, but half way only. They will take from the present generation nothing they are entitled to, but they will disfranchise the generation to come, or lessen one-half, or three-fourths, or four-fifths of the political power in the commonwealth of Kentucky. Is there any thing to be more safe? Are the political rights of the people to be more safe? It is a violation of principle that shows a man is not at heart willing to allow to the balance of the community that freedom which he enjoys himself. If you do these things in the small, let the temptation be equal to it, and you will do it in the great. I have no more confidence in those men that have made up their minds to invade the rights of their fellow citizens, and stifle the voice of the people of Kentucky, than I have in the voice of the autocrat of Russia, who thinks and acts for the whole. If you do it in one thing, let the temptation be great enough, and you will do it in another. I know gentlemen have been contemplating this project. One gentleman fixes it upon the necessity of securing their negroes. Another wants to supply that population, which they have driven to other states, in the extension of their farms, and give to them votes for the men they have lost, and which they have replaced in bullocks. I understand it, sir. And it would be just as sensible, and no greater outrage, in my view of the subject, if they should say their bullocks should be represented in the legislature of Kentucky, to make up for the voices of the freemen congregated in the cities, if there were any way of casting the votes. I beg gentlemen to consider this principle. I know the balance of the state have the power; and I know many men claiming to be democrats, and many men claiming to be whigs, who are contemplating this proceeding, and who are sworn upon the principle of equal rights and equal justice to all; and yet, because they think they can do this act with impunity, they are preparing themselves to carry their purpose into effect. I know it; I have seen it.

Well, every gentleman can reconcile it to himself in his own way. That is with him. His constituents, because they receive the benefits and advantages of it, may look over it, but if they shall be chary in trusting him again, when they see he can trample on their rights, as he has trampled on the rights of others, their distrust will be manifested, and the consequences will be visited on his own head, and not on mine.

I can sign no constitution that denies to my constituents those equal and political rights that other freemen have. I can sign nothing which degrades and stigmatizes my constituents as unworthy to be partners with the freemen of Kentucky in a government of freemen. I cannot ask them to take this constitution. I cannot tell them it is just. I shall be bound in my conscience, and before God, to tell them it is unjust—that the liberties and equal rights of freemen have been trampled upon. And why and wherefore? It has been avowed. There is just as much danger to this government if it is ruled by acres, by millions of acres, where there are no men, or but few, as there would be if it were ruled by the voice of freemen who buy those acres. I have always understood it was intelligence and virtue embodied in just, upright and correct laws, which constituted the basis of good government and not acres of land. Still we pay one tenth of the taxes of this commonwealth, and we have one-thirty-eighth part of political power in the senate, and one-twentieth in the house. Has that political power ever been found injurious to the state of Kentucky? Has the city of Louisville, or the county of Jefferson ever failed in aught which leads to the prosperity of the state, to its glory, to equal laws and equal rights? Where a stigma is placed on our representation in the halls of legislation, or in the halls here, we may be ardent in our support of our rights, and we may speak out as freemen should speak out when they feel there is a principle asserted which leads to the stifling of the voice of freemen. But they will teach us some other language, and it will be a long reign of servitude and oppression, which will stifle our voice, or induce us to lessen our opposition to oppression, wrong, and injustice when we see it, or when we apprehend it. There is no danger in giving the city of Louisville, and every city that shall arise in the Commonwealth of Kentucky, whether they arise on the borders of the Ohio, or like the great manufacturing cities that have grown up in England, shall rise in the interior, there is no danger in giving them equal rights and equal privileges.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If the gentleman will give way I will move that the convention take a recess till half past two o'clock.

The motion was modified so as to read "three o'clock," and it was agreed to.

EVENING SESSION.

The PRESIDENT. When I rose I was excited at what I considered an infamous insinuation upon the living and upon the dead, and forgot to name another gallant citizen of Louisville, who fell on the bloody field of Buena Vista. Young Dozier lies on yonder hill. The gentleman might have read his name, and spared his sneer. Dozier was the gallant son of my first and best teacher—the man who taught me to think, the son of James I. Dozier, of Louisville. Louisville lost other citizens in Mexico; but enough of this.

I have endeavored to place my views upon the question we are now considering, fairly before the convention. The principle, as laid down in the old constitution, is that representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth. The principle of extending the right of suffrage to all citizens of the commonwealth, who have attained the mature age of twenty-one years, is there laid down. That was the great platform on which our ancestors based the government—that the right of suffrage, and of representation based on the right of suffrage, should be equal and uniform. It is true, the rule thus prescribed, when carried out, does not arrive at mathematical certainty. When divided into counties for convenience in regard to local government—for convenience in holding courts, and the dispensing of justice, those divisions must necessarily be unequal in extent of territory, unequal in point of fertility, and of course some of the divisions naturally become populated faster than others. Different counties never have been, and never will be, precisely equal in point of numbers, so that that equal and exact justice, in accordance with this principle, can never be obtained—that is, mathematical equality in regard to numbers. But the principle is recognized in the old constitution, and the legislature was directed to carry out these principles as nearly as practicable.

I believe that I was in the legislature when three apportionments were made, and have had occasion to look back to two that have been subsequently made. None of them arrive at certainty, and I found both political parties desirous, in the distribution of representatives among the counties, to get it as favorable as they thought they were warranted in doing, in accordance with the principle laid down in the constitution. And I sometimes thought that the constitution was stretched a little, for the purpose of arriving at such conclusions; particularly when Louisville was denied a senator. And I could name other instances, but I will forbear. The clause directing the legislature to apportion the representation, either did not in itself contain the correct principle, or it was so perverted that justice was not obtained, equality of representation was not obtained, nor was it brought as near to equality as it might have been. For instance, I recollect that in one apportionment the county of Bourbon, with a less number of inhabitants than the county of Scott, was allowed to have two representatives, while Scott had but one. This was done on the principle of arranging residuums; beginning at the north-eastern part of the state, by which they were consumed before coming to Scott county; for in which ever quarter you begin to divide your residuums, you arrive at a different conclusion; commence at different points, and you always have different results. There were inextricable difficulties in the way of arriving at that equality which the constitution contemplated, or at least there were very great difficulties, and it so turned out that a large proportion of the delegation allotted to a county, differed in their political sentiments from a majority of the people of such county, and the gap continued to widen. I believe the last apportionment was about the most unequal that ever was made, and since it has got a proclivity in that way, there is no telling where it will stop.

I was anxious that in this constitution, after acknowledging the principle of universal suffrage, on the part of all male citizens over twenty-one years of age; and the principle that representation should be distributed to every county and town in proportion to numbers, as nearly as might be, some certain rule should be adopted that would give the representation to the largest masses; and thus arrive as near to certainty as possible, and take from the legislature, as far as practicable, the discretion they possess in regard to controlling residuums. If I shall feel any interest in what shall be done in the forming of this constitution, when I come to that section I will endeavor to aid in fixing upon a certain criterion, and one which will take away legislative discretion, as far as practicable, so that the greatest number shall have the representation. I know that divided into cities, towns, and counties, as we are, an exact mathematical equality of representation according to numbers, is impossible to be obtained.

The gentleman from the county of Ohio says, that mathematical certainty could not be obtained, and that there would necessarily be inequalities of representation, if such divisions are carried out, and that it would be no departure from the principle to cut off the cities, and limit them, so that they can never have more than a certain number of representatives. Now, sir, that is a direct violation of the principle; and it is not a violation arising from the difficulty of coming to a direct conclusion, but it is a wilful violation, made before hand, purposely and intentionally; and therefore, sir, in the view I take of it, wholly and altogether inexcusable, not arising from necessity, but from an intention to violate the great principle of equal representation. It is either a principle, or it is not; it is one that we should follow as nearly as practicable, or that we should abandon altogether. If we abandon it altogether, I should prefer giving to each of the one hundred counties in this commonwealth one member. If we abandon it altogether, I would prefer that we divide out the thirty-eight senators, among the several counties, cities and towns, and give that representation to them absolutely, and let it go on in perpetuity. If the system proposed by the gentleman be carried out, it would resemble the borough system of unequal and unjust representation, as it has existed in England, and which has been for a long period of time, the subject of great contention in parliament, between the "ins" and the "outs;" for it is manifest that the cities will increase with more rapidity than the population of the country.

The gentleman from Madison says that the belt of counties, or that range lying along the Ohio river, will increase in population more rapidly than the whole balance of the state; and that that increase of population will be dangerous to the political ascendancy of the balance of the state, in reference to a particular description of property; and therefore it must be guarded against in this constitution. That is his argument.

The honorable chairman of the committee, by the amendment he offers, proposes to limit the cities to a certain representation—provided—now the proviso has nothing to do with the subject matter, nor does it grow out of it—provided every body in this commonwealth shall have the right to go out of the commonwealth and bring in negroes for his own use. The gentleman is not contented with apportioning the representation as indicated in his amendment, and abandoning the principle of equal and uniform representation; but he wants us to engraft upon it a provision permitting free trade in negroes. Well, sir, if there are any portions of the people in this commonwealth, particularly those in the border counties of the state—as the gentleman from Madison maintains—that are opposed, or likely to be opposed, to the existence of the institution of slavery, it will fall with a ten-fold force of revulsion upon those who shall not only be deprived of the right of suffrage, but shall also have this privilege endorsed upon it, as a sweetening of the dose, to make it go down.

The gentleman from Davies thinks that there is not only a necessity for restraining Louisville, but all other cities that may ever grow up in the commonwealth of Kentucky, so that they shall have—no matter what their population may be—no matter what their situation may be—no more than a certain proportion of representation in the two houses of the general assembly. It is very likely there may grow up a great city at Maysville. Maysville is increasing rapidly in population, manufactures and commerce. The county in which Maysville is situated, has increased very greatly within the last eight years. It is very likely that Newport and Covington will grow to be important cities, and that the counties in which they are situated, will grow to forty, fifty, sixty, nay, a hundred thousand within a very short period; and that Louisville, from her fifty thousand may grow to one hundred and fifty or two hundred thousand; that Henderson, if the contemplated railroad should be made, may likewise grow up to be a great city; that Paducah, which has already a flourishing commerce, may grow to be a great city; and if the railroad from the Mobile to the mouth of the Ohio should ever be completed, and Louisville be connected with the southern tier of counties, a great city must grow up at some point. And Lexington will become a great interior manufacturing city when she has railroads running to the river, that will give her the benefit of cheap fuel. And, sir, it is no idle expectation, when we look at the immense manufacturing cities that have grown up in England. And there will be other portions of Kentucky in which great cities will grow up. There are now in the little island of Great Britain, more than twenty cities that exceed fifty thousand inhabitants, and which would have, under our system of laws, eight or ten thousand voters each. Well, if we were to have but ten cities in Kentucky in the course of the next fifty years, that shall have eight or ten thousand voters, why the ratio that the gentleman allows to them would not give a representative to each. The gentleman must see that this is carrying the thing to extremes.

Thirty years ago next March, I went to Louisville, and at that time there was scarcely four thousand inhabitants in Louisville, and now there is more than fifty thousand. Thirty years had not rolled around, when from four thousand, the population became over fifty thousand. Maysville has grown within a less period of time with an equal rapidity, from the time she took the impulse. Covington and Newport, though stigmatised as the suburbs of Cincinnati, and the outpouring of her filth, are growing with equal rapidity, and a great many of the most useful manufactures are carried on this side of the river. And if gentlemen will reflect on the increase of population that has taken place, and that will take place in all human probability, if this government remains united, if the foundation on which all the states have based it, remains undisturbed, if the security of property, the security of life, the security of the fruits of industry, and the equal enjoyment of political rights continue, we must increase for the next thirty years, with a rapidity greatly beyond that with which we have increased within the last thirty years. The gentleman may say that is an argument against us. It shows that you who live on the margin of the Ohio river will have the power, and that we must guard against the increase of that power, and we will guard against it now.

Gentlemen should recollect that the foundation of a government that is not laid in justice, that is not laid in equal rights and privileges to all, is laid in sand. It will be as unstable before the intelligence, before the unbending spirit of liberty in this land, as the waters of the ocean; as unstable as the government that has been erected in France; as unstable as I believe destiny has designed all tyrannical governments to be. Lay the foundation of this government in justice, lay them in equal rights and equal privileges, and you may defy every thing that is calculated to overthrow government; because the basis is firm, the principle is right, and there will arise from among the people advocates to sustain it, firm in purpose, with strong arms, as they require who make themselves the champions of liberty.

Ours is a peculiar government; its pillars rise from the masses. It is the intelligence, it is the virtue of the masses that sustain it. We owe not the strength of this government to aristocracy, either of fortune, birth, or talents. We have done away with the aristocracy of birth; only a remnant exists in the practice of individuals. The aristocracy of wealth melts down—either the indulgence or the vices of the sons of aristocracy reduce them to the level of the masses; whilst the industry, energies, and ability of the masses are constantly elevating them, as the pillars to sustain a free and equal government. Nature gave no aristocracy of talents, unless she gave it to those who are inured to hardship and difficulty, enduing them with a knowledge of their rights, and the spirit to maintain them.

Sir, if we would make this government perpetual, we must base its principles in justice—we must give to all citizens equal rights, and equal privileges. They who wish to lay a cancer at the root of liberty, at the foundation of government, commence by trenching upon the rights of freemen, curtailing their privileges, arming them with feelings of oppression, and a denial of right. There is no other principle on which you can base a free government, there is no other principle on which you can expect its existence; there is no other principle upon which it will draw the love, the admiration of all men. Shall we put it upon property? The idea is exploded. Shall we put it upon talent? Who is to select the talent? Shall we put it upon virtue, reputation? Nobody will put it upon talent, virtue, or reputation, but upon the people, in the selection of their officers. Kings have not opposed it, neither have their ministers, nor has the aristocracy by whom the throne is surrounded. A curious circumstance, sir, in the history of some of the governments of Europe, occurs upon the introduction of the feudal tenures. The Kings divided out all the lands among their feudal lords, and they among their dependents. The feudal lords were the brilliants that surrounded the throne, and stood between the monarch and his subjects. They lived among their tenants, and they became the more attached to them on that account, and claimed the sturdy independence which talents and power always claim; and the monarch granted liberty to cities, in order to create a counter balance to the power of the feudal lords, to hold them in check, they having obtained too much strength. And this freedom that disenthralled them from the iron grasp of despotism in the old world, took its first birth in cities, and it has been cherished in cities from that day to this, as much as it has been any where. The gentleman is mistaken if he supposes that the love of liberty is not as warm, and as great sacrifices would not be made for it in cities as elsewhere.

I think that five years ago the ratio was about seven or eight hundred. If the apportionment were made to day it would be 1522—it would be doubled. But we have been told we may have, or they will grant us as a favor—as if among equals any thing is granted—as if freemen owed any thing for freemen's rights—a certain extent of representation. They say they will grant us an equal representation in the lower branch of the legislature. Gentlemen liken the counties to the states of this Union. There is no similarity at all. The thirteen colonies that broke the iron rule of despotism, and declared the freedom of the United States were all equally sovereign, and when the constitution of the United States was formed, the Senate was constituted a representative body of sovereigns, and the principle of equality was fully and fairly acknowledged among sovereigns. That is placing the matter upon a right basis. The sovereign states would never have formed the Union, had it not been upon an acknowledgment of equal rights in the Senate of the United States, and it was acknowledged. We are all sovereign here, each free citizen of the age of twenty one years is equally so, as the thirteen old states were equally sovereign, when the constitution of the United States was formed. We are asked to go into this government upon terms of inequality. We are told that we who occupy cities, are less than freemen, are less than sovereign citizens of the commonwealth of Kentucky; that we are not entitled to equal rights. Do we not breathe the same air that gentlemen of the mountains breathe? Were we not born under the same stars and stripes? Have not we the arm of freedom? Have not we the consciousness of our rights? Are we not as intelligent and virtuous? Is it not so declared by the constitution that our fathers made? Was it not one of the objects that led to the calling of this convention, that some of the citizens of the commonwealth, were deprived of their equal rights? This thing has been avowed, at least it is one of the doctrines that were preached, by all that portion of the one hundred delegates here, outside of the city of Louisville. Had it not been so we would never have cast our votes for a convention. We would never have let go the charter that made us equal.

One gentleman says that this thing of equality of rights, and equal representation according to number, is an abstraction. It is at least a very practicable abstraction. Here are the counties of Nelson and Larue, having 3048 voters, with a senator in the general assembly. The counties of Hardin and Meade with 3633 voters have a senator, and Spencer and Bullitt with 2248, have a senator.

These three districts have less than Jefferson and the city, and have three senators, whilst Louisville and Jefferson county has but one.

And yet gentlemen tell us it is an abstraction, to claim equality of representation. Now sir, votes go by majorities, but when we enter upon doubles and trebles, it is a palpable outrage upon the principle of equality. It is true, we submitted to it because we believed it was a misconception, and we expected, if ever we came before the people on the subject, they would do us justice. The people of this commonwealth will never violate the great principle, equality of rights, and equality of representation. But we are told this principle is not acknowledged, even in the representation of the house of representatives of the United States. That three fifths of the black population go into the account in distributing the representation, and that makes it unequal. It is true that three fifths of the black population are thrown in, in favor of the slave states, but otherwise the representation is just exactly according to the principle of equality, of political rights to all the free citizens of the nation. And whenever it comes to direct taxation, the slave states pay in dollars for that political advantage. It was a subject matter of compromise. Do the gentlemen propose any compromise with the cities? What equivalent are we to have, for having the voice of our constituents, the free citizens of cities, stifled in the legislative halls of the state? We pay one tenth of the taxes for the support of the government of the state, over and above what supports our municipal government. Each county and town supports a municipal government, and we support ours. But in the general charge and expenditure which falls alike on the whole state, we pay one-tenth, and we have but one-thirty eighth of the representation in the senate, and but one-twentieth of the representation in the house. We are content to pay according to our privileges; but as we increase in population, and in wealth, the disproportion of our privileges will be also increased. And thus we shall be taxed for the benefit and support of the balance of the state, and we will not have a fair and equal voice in the legislation of the country, nor in the distribution of the money that is expended by the government. Do gentlemen think that we will esteem this a just government, that imposes upon us the contribution of taxes for the support of the state, without affording us an equal voice in the representation, so that we shall be less able to resist encroachments, that are made upon us.

I recollect being told by a senator from Clarke, that he knew a number of farms in that county, upon which were living twenty eight independent farmers, with their one hundred and fifty, and two hundred acres, furnishing twenty eight voters, and that it was afterwards reduced into one farm, the dwellings of the former tenants pulled down, the orchards cut down, and there was but one voter in the place of the twenty eight, who formerly occupied the same land. I am not very familiar with that part of the country, but I am told it is the case, that the farms continue to be enlarged, and combined in the hands of individuals, that the small farmers are purchased out, and that they go to the free states, and that oxen take the place of men. Well sir, as the population escapes, the political power escapes. I consider this a movement to retain the political power, after they have lost the population, after they have driven out the independent voters and replaced them with oxen. Let the gentleman mark the day, when there shall be on the northern border, within ten miles range from the Ohio river, twenty cities, with their 50, and 100,000 inhabitants and they shall outnumber the qualified voters, in the balance of this pastoral state; think you, they will not wrest from you the political rights you propose to take from them now. They will not be worthy the name of freemen, if they do not. The spirit that burned in the bosoms of the fathers of the revolution, that made them cast their all upon the die of the battles that won our liberty, that has been fostered in our fourth of July orations, and at our elections, that has been whispered by mothers to their infants, has not perished, and will not perish, in the land. The spirit of freedom and equal rights will rise above all oppression, and it will avenge itself—that is the word sir—where it is down-trodden in this land, it will rise up and avenge itself; may it not have cause to avenge itself in blood.

I have no doubt that I have detained this committee longer than I ought. No doubt this reflection has suggested itself to many members here; but they perhaps have not presented themselves so immediately and directly to the minds of gentlemen, as they present themselves to my mind. Perhaps they have not thought under the same pressure of circumstances, as I have. The man that does wrong or contemplates doing wrong to others, never feels the iron like him who suffers the wrong, or who is threatened with the wrong.

The city of Louisville is the only city now assailed, although there will be others in the same category, and I am very sorry I did not understand from the gentleman from Kenton whether he is with us, or against us, in this contest. I regret that the gentleman did not define his position; for I am prepared on this subject to declare that he who is not with us is against us. He that does not battle for the principle of equal privileges and equal rights, has given up the ghost; is prepared to see the principle sacrificed. He that does not raise his voice against it, showing that he stands by the eternal principles on which liberty and equal rights are established, is prepared to yield them up.

I do not know that I can say anything further on this subject that will lead individuals to think and reflect upon what they are going to do. I know that the five or six thousand voters that are in the city of Louisville are not much regarded in this contest, and when you go before the people of Kentucky with your constitution, the balance of the state can afford to dispense with those votes. But reflect, that there are individuals who are hostile to the constitution that we are about making, and who desire and wish it shall fail, and reflect that in departing from the great principle of the equality of political rights, you will array numbers of enemies who will sympathise with us; that the very first inroads upon liberty are to be resisted, as the first inroads upon a man's honor; to be resisted at all hazards. If you submit to wrong in one instance, you must submit to it in all others; and those who practice wrong in one instance, if they practice it with impunity, will be encouraged to practice it again and again, until your rights are lost. Every one who resists oppression, in whatever shape or form it presents itself, resists it for the whole community. Every man who fights a battle against despotism fights it for all who love liberty, and who love equal rights; and if we fall, gentlemen may feel well assured we will not fall by our act; we will not seal the deed that deprives us of our equal rights. In this land of Kentucky we boast of our independence, our equality of rights; let them be asserted in your constitution, and before the world.

Mr. HARDIN. I am somewhat unfortunate in getting into difficulties. I little expected when I rose this morning to get into this one. I said, when I addressed the convention this morning, that when I listened to my friend from Henderson on Saturday, and had listened to my young friend from Louisville, partly on Saturday and partly to-day, I was very much struck with the force of his argument, and on Saturday I was a good deal carried away with it; and I kept thinking the matter over, until I came to the conclusion that a reasonable check ought to be put upon cities that might become overgrown.

When Sheridan concluded his speech against Warren Hastings, the ministers moved an adjournment, because they said it was impossible for the house to vote until the force of that speech had subsided. Even Pitt, while listening to that speech, was not master of himself. Well, sometimes the impassioned eloquence of the gentleman from Henderson carries one off in the same way. But I kept thinking about it, and thinking about it, and I concluded at last that some check should be put upon overgrown cities, and I framed a proposition on the subject, which was just about this: that the county of Jefferson should continue her representation according to her number—and I did not include Louisville—but that the county should retain the number to which she was entitled. If she was entitled to two members she should have two. If by being united to some other county she was entitled to a senator, she should have a senator; and that Louisville alone should have a senator; but that neither Louisville, nor any other city, should ever have more than one senator, nor more than five members in the lower house. Now suppose the county of Jefferson has two members in the house of representatives, when this constitution goes into effect. And suppose that Louisville grows to such a size, as to entitle her to five. And suppose the city and the county together have two senators. Well then sir, Louisville alone will have one twentieth part of the representation in the lower house, and Louisville and Jefferson county will have one nineteenth of the representation in the senate. And yet the gentleman says—in his own fine classical language—this is “ter-in-icle.” (Laughter.) I had thought it was called “tyrannical,” but we have been taught some new things lately.

Now here is the city of Louisville, having one twentieth part of the representation in the house of representatives, and the city together with the county of Jefferson, having one nineteenth part of the representation in the senate. Is there to be no check? And that is the amount of my proposition. I have not offered it yet, but I have intimated that I would do so at some future day. I do not know when it will come to my turn, but when it does I will offer it. And I was glad to find from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, that it agreed with his ideas that there must be some check. I will ask, is not the constitution of the United States a compromise? Is the apportionment of representation in both houses according to the population? No sir—not at all. The slaveholding states get a representation for three fifths of their negroes; and sir, the smaller states get an equal representation with the greater in the senate. These are the two conservative principles that have been adopted in the constitution of the United States; and when we follow the action and ideas of such men as made that constitution—Madison, and Washington, and their associates—we certainly will not be acting very “ter-in-icle.” When we can follow in Washington’s footsteps, I may say, as Lord Nelson said to his captains when going into the battle of the Nile, “if in the darkness of the night you should not be able to follow my orders, you will not be much wrong, if you fight with all your might wherever you can find an opportunity.” If we follow such men I think we shall not be far wrong.

I do say we should engraft into the constitution something like conservative principles. We know the gentleman from Madison spoke the truth, when he said the great body of the population that is collecting along the Ohio river, within the distance of ten or twenty miles from it, is opposed to the institution of slavery. It is a very worthy population it is true, but it is a population that has little or nothing in common with the mass of the great agricultural population in Kentucky, and a large portion of that population I know is hostile to the institution of slavery; and as a self-preservative principle, we ought at least to put some wholesome and salutary check upon that population. I know the argument that representation must be according to numbers, is a strong one. I know it is a great republican principle, but there is a still greater republican principle than that sir. If you and I were upon the Ohio river upon a single plank, and only one of us could escape, you have the right to shove me off, or I have the right to shove you off; and this self-preservation principle, it seems to me, requires that we should adopt this conservative principle and reject this population principle of representation as to cities. Our fathers who made the constitution of the United States, told us this; the leading features of that constitution declare it, and I am not ashamed to follow their guidance.

Sir, the gentleman from Louisville, who spoke partly on Saturday and partly to-day—because it takes gentlemen from Louisville—particularly while on this subject—two days to make a speech—has led me into difficulty, which I seem to have labored under. He said—if I understood him correctly—that Louisville had furnished a regiment of men, in the war against Mexico. Well she did. I believe she got the principal part of the men in Louisville; some perhaps, in Oldham, and the surrounding counties; it was called the “Louisville legion.” But the gentleman intimated that Louisville had to do a great deal of fighting. I replied that we had to draft men to stay at home. It was no accommodation to Kentucky for Louisville to furnish a legion for the war. Thousands of the best men in Kentucky had to be rejected; though they were pressing forward day and night, asking to be admitted. Instead of being a matter to be thrown up to us, that Louisville had to do our fighting; she has been treated with partiality by the government, in having her regiment admitted into the service. She got the patronage of the government; the furnishing of the regiment—the colonel, lieutenant colonel, major, and all the other officers. Now all I intended to say was—for I said it over and over again—that the Louisville legion was as brave as any other; but at all events, they had done no fighting. I spoke in reference to that legion; and all I intended to add was, that as a part of the battalion marched to take possession of the “Black Fort” on the evening of the first day, they remained there that night, and next day marched back to the Walnut Springs, and remained two or three days. Taylor himself went back to the Walnut Springs the first night of the battle, and all the men, except those guarding the “Black Fort.” Now I did not attempt to say, nor did I intend to say, that Taylor distrusted the bravery of the officers, or of the men of the Louisville legion; but on the contrary, I said that the men were as gallant as any in the service; and I said at the same time, that the second Kentucky regiment—a regiment that was raised from the body of the state—had covered itself with glory. They did sir. They received, and justly received, the name of the “bloody regiment” on account of pouring out in torrents their own blood, as well as the blood of the enemy. A gentleman told me that he counted the dead bodies of eighty three of the enemy on about three acres of ground where the Kentucky regiment fought, besides the wounded. I know the soldiers composing the Kentucky regiment did distinguish themselves. I know that Clay had a son killed; and I know that Dozier, an intimate friend and schoolmate of mine, had a son killed. But I did not say the Louisville legion had not the courage to fight; I only said they were not in the battle. Now the gentleman has been pleased to designate this as a piece of calumny or something of the kind. What I said on the subject no man could misunderstand; I made no insinuation or imputation of cowardice; but on the contrary, I declared that nothing of the kind was intended, yet the gentleman has been pleased to designate it as a base insinuation. All I can say is, that the man who can make such a remark would go at least as far as that imputed to me, if not further, in making base insinuations. There was nothing that fell from me, that merited or deserved such a remark. Louisville had the privilege of raising a regiment, and officering it, and the lieutenant colonel of the second regiment was taken from Louisville. And after she had this privilege granted to her, to the exclusion of other brave, magnanimous, gallant, daring young men of the country, what did she do next?

When Hardin, Bullitt and Nelson raised three companies, the preference as to which should go, had to be determined by lot; but Louisville had one given her without drawing. And what is more, the lieutenant colonel was taken from Louisville for the second regiment, a very deserving man it is true, a better choice could not have been made perhaps in Kentucky. But I mention these things to show that Louisville was favored. We know that there was animosity excited against Louisville on that account, throughout the whole state, from the mouth of Big Sandy to Mills' Point, and from Louisville to Cumberland Gap. There was a struggle as to who should go. All were anxious; and it is a feeling of which we have reason to be proud. And I do say that Louisville had more than her share. But, sir, I never imputed cowardice to any man or set of men, that was out in the last war; and I always contended that when the Indiana regiment fled, they only fell back to get a better position, and they had not discipline enough to rally. So that the gentleman's remarks of a personal kind were entirely uncalled for, and entirely unexpected by me. I was perfectly astonished when the gentleman broke out in a thundering tone of voice against me on account of what I had said. I recollect about thirty years ago, there was one Phil. Thompson who was practicing in the courts of Breckinridge county, and on one occasion when he commenced a speech in the court house, the first word he uttered was in a perfect scream, like the gentleman from Louisville. The crowd had been accustomed to witnessing fights, and they all rushed to the spot thinking there was a fight going on. When they found out it was Phil. Thompson speaking, "well I declare," said one, "I didn't expect to see him get crabbed so quick. He got mad too soon." So I may say of the gentleman, he got mad too soon.

The gentleman says that Louisville has done a great deal towards supporting free schools. I suppose she has. I have no objection. Louisville draws $1490 60 for common schools, and Louisville and Jefferson county together pay about $43,000 revenue. The county of Nelson pays from $8,000 to $10,000 per year in taxes, and she has never had a free school, and what is more, she loves to educate her youth as much as Louisville. Yes, sir, I will venture to say that the catholic establishments in the county of Nelson have not, at this day, less than fifty free scholars, because they will teach any child whose parents are not able to pay for its tuition. I picked up a little Mexican boy, who had been brought to this country, and carried him to one of those establishments, and they are teaching him without any remuneration. I will venture to say that there are as good schools in the interior of Kentucky as in any city, Louisville not excepted. Though they have no free schools in my county, and I venture to say they never will have, our county is full of schools that are established by private enterprise.

The gentleman says Louisville has done a great deal for turnpike roads. I suppose she has, particularly if they come to Louisville, where they concentrate like a fan. Louisville once made ten miles of a road towards Bardstown, and she graded it at five degrees, and the company incorporated afterwards to make the road, completed some fifty miles more at a grade of two and a half degrees; but the old company finding that the first ten miles paid so much better than the remainder of the road could be expected to do, they did not permit the balance of the stockholders to come in, in the dividends arising from the profits of the first ten miles, and thus make it a joint company. Why it was, the gentleman, who is a large stockholder, can answer. To be sure, he does a great many disinterested acts according to his own boasting. But Louisville is helping to make a great railroad from here to Lexington, which is in future to be continued to Louisville. And why is she doing it? Because it will contribute to her aggrandizement. She does not do it from disinterested motives. The road when it gets to Lexington is to connect itself with a great road somewhere—the gentleman does not know exactly where—I suppose it is the road from Baltimore to Cumberland. Well I do not know much about the geography of that part of the country, but I supposed there were mountains in the way, like that which the gentleman from Henderson described the soldier as getting on top of the other day. I know it is proposed to extend that road to the Ohio river—I do not know exactly where it will strike, sometimes they talk of Pittsburg as the point to which it will be extended, but how it is to get to Lexington I have yet to learn. The gentleman's knowledge can point out.

I do not know that I shall trouble the committee with any more remarks, at least I will not add more than one or two. I rose merely for the purpose of disabusing myself from the charge, that I had insinuated cowardice against the Louisville legion. I never made such an insinuation against any man that ever went to Mexico. For, be it said, that I have been in favor both of the administration in conducting the war, and those who fought the battles. I did remark, that the Louisville legion did not go into battle. I did remark that the 2d Kentucky regiment—I don't care where they came from—fought like heroes, and covered themselves with renown.

The gentleman says he is attached to Louisville. I suppose he is. He has every reason to be so. I have read somewhere, in Josephus I believe, if it is not there it ought to be, that Goliath was born in Askelon, and was not born in Gath—he went there, and then gave out in speeches there, he belonged to the race Anak. The gentleman was born in the county of Nelson, he was educated in Bardstown—and a good education it was—and he practiced law there, and got a good practice, and run for the legislature. But we all know—and we have the testimony of holy writ to the same effect—that “a prophet is not without honor, save in his own country.” He removed to Louisville, and he is now the Goliath of Gath. Are we to be dictated to, as were the Romans by Cæsar?

“Why, man, he doth bestride the narrow world
Like a colossus; and we petty men
Walk under his huge legs, and peep about,
To find ourselves dishonorable graves.”

Is he to play the part of the great Colossus of Rhodes? Or, is he to play the part of the angel, who is to come down upon the last day, placing one foot upon the ocean, and one upon the land, and swearing that time shall be no more?—Is he to represent the arch-angel, who shall proclaim the end of all things, to the living and the dead, and at the sound of whose trumpet the ocean shall give up its contents, and the grave its tenants?

Sir, you speak about representation. Do you represent your constituents? Louisville is a whig city. Did you not contrive, by whig votes, to get here, and then against the sentiments of your own constituents and your colleagues, to get into that chair? And that is what you call a fair representation, I suppose. Sir, I never regretted any thing more than I did, when I saw it stated in a communication of a letter writer, at the commencement of the session, that I had spoken ill of the gentleman. I have always entertained the best feelings for him, and never uttered such sentiments as that letter writer imputed to me. I have thought that the gentleman has been bearing down on me ever since—from what motive, God in his mercy only knows—and there was nothing that I ever did to warrant the manner in which he has attacked me. The gentleman ought to recollect that other people have rights in this house, as well as he; and if it has happened that he got here, and then that it happened he got into that chair, he ought to be satisfied. He got here from a whig constituency, and he got there, (pointing to the chair,) by a democratic caucus, of which he was chairman, though we know the state of Kentucky is whig by 10,000 majority; and with these two lucky happenings, I think he ought to be satisfied, without thundering through this house, with the voice and manner of Ajax, the giant hero of the Trojan war. Every time he gets up, he reminds me of Homer's description of Diomedes,

“Die was the clang, and dreadful from afar,
Of armed Tydides rushing to the war.”

I say again, that if there had come a clap of thunder to-day, as loud and rolling as ever did come, I could not have been more astonished than I was at the opening of the gentleman's speech—for God knows I never intended to say that the men who went into the service from Louisville were deficient in courage. I said that Louisville had received favors to the exclusion of other people of this state, who had stepped forward and volunteered for the service. I am aware that Louisville is very necessary to the region of the country where I live; but we have contributed to make Louisville what she is. Is there any thing about Louisville that is calculated to produce men of extraordinary talent? It is true they have to take two days to make a speech. It is the people of Kentucky that have made Louisville what she is—buying her imports, and selling to her the products of the state for exportation. Louisville depends upon the country, more than the country depends upon her. They can find an outlet for their products in many other places, though perhaps not so convenient.

As I said before, I only rose for the purpose of disabusing myself from the imputation of having spoken disparagingly of Louisville, or her citizens; of disabusing myself of the furious charge which the gentleman made upon me, and I would to the Lord God, that the gentleman up yonder, who reports our debates, could just take down the looks of men, when they speak, like old Hogarth, and not the looks only, but the manner and the tone of voice, and send them down to posterity. It would afford me a great deal of satisfaction, if I could come back and see how the gentleman looks when he is making one of his thundergustical speeches.

If I have ever uttered a word, that was disrespectful towards the gentleman, from the time I first saw him, when he was a boy, I hope I may die the death of a sinner.

Sir, I voted to keep the county of Jefferson and Louisville together, but I begin to sympathise a little with my friends from Jefferson county. I discover that they have a hard task-master. I intend at some future day, if I have time, to take a view of this negro question, for I see now, if ever we become a non-slaveholding state, and destroy the balance of power in congress, and give to the non-slaveholding states a majority of four in the senate, this union will be dissolved; and it is indispensably necessary that we should never place ourselves in danger of becoming a non-slaveholding state; because where are we to trade when that is done? Our trade, as remarked by the gentleman from Henderson, is with the tobacco growers, cotton planters, and the planters and manufacturers of sugar. I do say it is our interest and our bounden duty to take care of ourselves now, and then sir, the interests of the generation to come, and the generations that will succeed them, those who have feelings that bind them to the slaveholding states, will be secured. At some future day sir, perhaps I will advert to some sentiments that my friend from Bourbon has advanced. I desire to see some wholesome amendment to our naturalization laws; but for the present I will refrain from troubling the committee longer.

The PRESIDENT. I stand corrected by the school master of the age, in regard to my pronouncement. I am very much indebted to him—and I have no doubt the whole state will be—it is a matter of so much importance.

My manner I know is ardent and I do not know whether I look as pleasant as the gentleman does at all times. I was not educated sir, in the same school of politeness that he was, I had not the same advantages, and he should look over my failings in that particular. I have some knowledge, however, of a sneer, and what a sneer is intended for. The gentleman says he did not intend to impeach, or impugn the valor of the soldiers, or the people of Louisville. He said with a sneer, that no citizen of Louisville was in the battle. I yield to him the palm in sneering; he is the peer of all the peers in this land. I have no rankling feeling against the gentleman, because he declared when I was elected president of the convention, that it would be fatal to the constitution we were about to make.

Mr. HARDIN. I never said it sir.

The PRESIDENT. Then the gentleman is belied, and I suppose that it is not the first time. It is true, I was born in the county of Nelson, and that I engaged in the practice of law there. It is true, that I ran twice for the legislature, and it is equally true, I was beaten on both these occasions, and by popular men. I am proud to say sir, that even in the county of Nelson, among the people whom he represents, they have as much confidence in my integrity as they have in his. As to my misrepresenting the people of Louisville; I intend to account to them. I have never yet found a difficulty. Five times have I been elected, when they differed with me in political sentiments; and they have never yet found fault with the manner in which I have represented them. On this occasion I appealed to them to stand by the balance of the state, in relation to the institution of slavery, and not to separate from it. When it was ascertained that there was a majority of democrats elected to this convention, whigs and democrats came to me, and insisted that I should be a candidate for president of this body. And before my God and my country, I solicited no man for his vote; but when the chair was tendered to me, I accepted it, in obedience to the wishes of those who voted for me, and because they insisted that I should do so. I never had an ambition to preside over any deliberative body; and I have rode down no man, but when a man sneers at my constituents, I resent it as I would a personal injury.

I acknowledge, I am not so polite as the gentleman, I have not the capacity of getting along as well; and although it takes the delegates from Louisville two days to make a speech, I believe that I have not troubled this house as much as the gentleman from Nelson has. I have but defended my constituents. I do not know that I have encroached upon the province of the gentleman. I never intended to insult him, and if God keeps my heart and mind in the right place, I trust I never shall.

Mr. HARDIN. I was satisfied from the first that it was the statement contained in the communication of the letter-writer that had offended him. I sent him word by two or three individuals that I had never uttered such a sentiment against him. The gentleman says he did not become president of this convention by accident, but that he was elected by the unsolicited votes of the delegates. I ask him if he did not attend an organization meeting on the Sunday night before the convention organized, and if he did not preside at that meeting.

The PRESIDENT. No sir, I did not preside, and there was no organization for the election of officers, and there was nothing said about it. The gentleman denies making the remark imputed to him by the letter-writer. I was informed by several creditable gentlemen that he did make the remark.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

And then the convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Geo. W. BRUSH.

REPRESENTATION OF TOWNS AND CITIES.

Mr. MORRIS. Mr. President, I have a resolution which I desire to offer. It is as follows:

Resolved, That whenever a city or town shall be entitled to a separate representation in either house of the general assembly, and by her numbers shall be entitled to more than one representative, such city, or town, shall be divided by wards, which are contiguous, into representative districts, as nearly equal as may be, equal to the number of representatives to which such city, or town, may be entitled, and one representative shall be elected from each district. In like manner shall said city, or town, be divided into senatorial districts, when, by the apportionment, more than one senator shall be allotted to such city, or town, and a senator shall be elected from each senatorial district; but no ward or municipal division shall be divided by such division of senatorial or representative district.

I do not know whether this proposition comes properly before the house in this form and at this time; nor do I exactly know how I can legitimately reach the object which I have in view. The discussion which has arisen upon the amendments proposed by gentlemen on yesterday, has assumed a wide range. Proposition upon proposition has been presented, and such is the attitude of the question before the house, that I am wholly uncertain how I shall be able to introduce this compromise resolution. I thought the best way would be to offer it, this morning, in the shape of a resolution, and ask that it be printed and placed upon the table of each member, so that they may all consider it and understand the object which I have in view. I have been grieved to the heart to see the spirit of rancor and animosity which has sprung up between distinguished gentlemen during the discussion of this question—a spirit but little calculated to promote the great ends for which we have assembled, and very far from reflecting credit upon a body so august as this should be. I should not have been surprised to see the immediate representatives of the city of Louisville—at which place the amendments and the arguments of gentlemen seem directly to strike—alarmed and agitated by a proposition which would seem to be aimed so directly at the interests of themselves and those whom they represent. I should not have been surprised to see those gentlemen representing counties bordering on the Ohio river, restless and excited at the amendment offered by the gentleman from this county, when backed and sustained by the peculiar arguments of the gentleman from Madison; but while I looked to see great interest and deep feeling manifested in regard to this, to them, vital question, I still hoped there would be no departure from those rules of etiquette and that sober deliberation which are so necessary to a just appreciation of every subject which we have to consider. It is as a mediator that I now step forward to pour oil upon the troubled waters, to entreat gentlemen to come back to sober reason and adopt a compromise, which, while it avoids the great dangers resulting from the overshadowing growth of an urban population, at the same time respects and preserves the great principle of equal representation.

Never before, sir, in my whole life, have I found it so difficult to come to a correct conclusion upon any subject which has presented itself. When I reflected upon the rapid growth of many of the large cities of this union—when I considered the irresistible influence which might possibly be exerted by a city population, concentrated upon a small space, absolutely a unit in interests, and reflected upon the pernicious influences which this mighty population and undivided interest might exert in all our affairs, and upon the rural population which is separated from them partially in interest—I must acknowledge that I was strongly urged to restrict their representation. But, sir, when I reflect, that in endeavoring to secure this rural interest against an assault which has not yet been made, we shall be compelled to violate the great fundamental principle that population shall be the basis of representation—when by this act we virtually disfranchise a large number of free white male citizens of this commonwealth, who participate equally with ourselves in all the burdens of government—when we trample under foot and destroy what has always been considered heretofore one of the first privileges of an American citizen—I am strongly, nay, irresistibly impelled to assert this broad principle of right.

The great danger to be apprehended from a city population, arises from the probability that its whole representative force will be concentrated for its own benefit, even should it destroy the interest of others; that there will be a unity of interest and action among the representatives of a population covering so small a space.

The amendment which I now offer, proposes to divide this interest and place it upon the same footing with that of the rural population, to divide the city against itself, as the country is constantly divided against itself. It proposes that when a city shall be entitled to more than one representative or senator, it shall be divided into wards or districts, corresponding with the number of representatives to which it may be entitled, and that each separate ward or district shall select its own representative. This plan has been pursued by the State of New York and the State of Louisiana—probably by Maryland—though in regard to the last mentioned state I am not sure that I am correct. And, perhaps, we will find the country representation of no section of these states more completely divided against itself than the representatives of the two great cities, New York and New Orleans. In cities, like the country, you will find in certain districts certain principles will prevail, while in others, immediately adjoining, principles and sentiments entirely antagonistic, exactly the reverse of their nearest neighbors, will be cherished and entertained. Such has been the experience of all those cities which have adopted this plan. If we look to the two great cities which I have cited as examples, you will find that in times of high party excitement, in the terrible rencounters between the whigs and democrats, no portion of the country where the representation is more equally divided—none where the interests would appear so adverse as in these same cities. Such, sir, I verily believe, would be the case in the cities of Kentucky, were they now entitled to a separate representation, and were those representatives elected by wards instead of the general ticket. Such would be the condition of representation from the city of Louisville, which seems to be the great bug-bear in the eyes of some gentlemen. I believe, sir, it can be demonstrated by any gentleman acquainted with the people of Louisville, and the peculiar views entertained in the different divisions of that city, that were it now in the situation in which I now seek to place it—were it divided into wards and districts, and each ward entitled to a representative of its own—say that it were entitled to four representatives—that there would be two whigs and two democrats, in all probability, elected from that city, though there is a large preponderance of whigs in the corporate limits. Such, too, strange as it may seem, is the case with respect to questions of a local character. Such, I am told, would probably be the result of an election were the great question of emancipation—that question which, during the past summer, shook this state to its very centre—the test question in an election. Such, sir, is the inevitable consequence springing from the very nature of man.

It would seem, then, that by the plan I propose, we would be relieved of the great danger to be apprehended from a concentration of the city representatives. We know that in all questions of a general character, it is almost impossible that this concentration should exist; but fears seem to be entertained, that upon local questions—questions of internal improvement for example—a unity of interest might render the city representation a unit. But if this were the case, we should incur no risk—be run into no danger. You will find, by examining the twenty second and twenty third sections of the report of the legislative committee, that it is proposed to place a constitutional limitation upon the power of the legislature to contract debts. So that there can never be a state debt contracted unless it be first submitted to a direct vote of the people. There, then, can be no fears entertained upon this score, if those sections be adopted, as I believe they will be.

I regret sir, that the subject of emancipation—a question which seems to draw into its mighty vortex, and like a great maelstrom, swallow up every thing which presents itself to the consideration of this convention, has been tacked on to this proposition. The two questions are entirely distinct, and cannot be legitimately connected. I regret that gentlemen, in order to promote certain objects, should find it necessary, constantly to excite the prejudices of members of this house, upon almost every subject which is presented, by raising the cry of emancipation. This constant recurrence to a question so exciting, is calculated to do great mischief in the deliberations of this house, and to exercise a most pernicious influence upon the minds of the people. Sir, if emancipation can be in any way connected with this question, it seems to me that the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from this city, would tend greatly to promote the objects of that party, and operate most seriously upon the interests of those, who, like me, are in favor of slavery. A proposition is sought to be engrafted into our constitution, which will cut off a large number of citizens of this commonwealth, from equal privileges with another portion. It is sought by this amendment, offered by the gentleman from Franklin, virtually to disfranchise a large number of our people, to break through that great principle for which our fathers contended, that representation shall be based upon population and taxation. You say to a large population, inhabiting the cities, that you shall be subject to military duty, you shall pay taxes, you shall contribute your equal share in all the burdens of the government, but you shall not enjoy the rights of representation in proportion to the taxes you pay, the burdens you bear, and the amount of your population—and for what is this great privilege denied? To better secure the slaveholding interest in this state. Sir, I am a slaveholder. I feel a deep interest in the security of this property, but I most solemnly protest against such a security as this act would furnish. What would be the consequence of such a proceeding? Would we not array at once this large party of freemen, whose rights have been trampled upon, in order to secure this property, directly against us? Would they not at once attach themselves to the emancipation party, which stands united, and ready to seize upon every opportunity to promote their philanthropic ends, as they term them? This certainly would be the consequence. Gentlemen seem to think it probable that this urban population will overshadow the balance of the state in our legislative halls. If their apprehensions be well founded, what will become of the slave interest when this population is arrayed against it. They tell us that by restricting their representation no injurious acts of our legislature can be brought to bear against this class of property. True. But they should consider what a miserable barrier is here furnished against an overwhelming and angry people. They may not reach it through this legislature—but they will rise above the legislature itself; they will strike at the constitution, through which they have been deprived of their rights. The report of the committee to which was submitted the amending clause of the constitution, is now upon our tables—and that report provides, that a convention may hereafter be called to amend this constitution by a majority of the people. That report, I am inclined to believe will be adopted—and we thus see how necessary it is to the preservation of this property, that as little prejudice as may be, be arrayed against it. The slaveholding population in this country is a very small minority, and this property is held and secured by the high sense of justice and right, which I hope will always animate the bosoms of Kentuckians. When the question was discussed before these people, during the past summer—I allude to the non-slaveholding majority—they said, it is not just, it is not right, that we should deprive you of your property, and a pro-slavery delegation now fills these halls in accordance with that sentiment. Would it be right in us, after we have been treated with such magnanimity, to seek to infringe upon the rights of this generous people. We heard on yesterday, the remarks of the gentleman from Campbell; they fell grating on my ear. If we perpetrate this act of injustice, such will be the sentiments proclaimed all over this country—they will not be confined to the cities, they will be echoed through the hills and the hollows, until slavery will find no place in Kentucky upon which to rest its foot. Let us be just. Rely upon it, no institution ever prospered which had to be sustained by acts of injustice.

Mr. President, I did not rise to make a speech, I rose simply to offer this resolution. It is one which I hope will tend to quiet the angry feelings of this house—one upon which we can all safely compromise.

Mr. DIXON. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of my friend from Christian, and fully endorse all that he has said. I like the resolution he has offered, because in this contingency it will soothe and quiet the stormy feelings in this body. I was not astonished that there should be excitement upon this question. I was not astonished that you, Mr. President, were excited upon this question. It was a question well calculated to excite the mind, for it was nothing more nor less than an attempt to disfranchise a large portion of your constituency. You were right; I honor you from my heart; it was just to those whom you represent. I should have been excited. I was excited; and I confess I am not perfectly calm even now; for I never can be calm when I see citizens, even the most abject citizens disfranchised who have not been guilty of crime. I will never give my sanction to such a principle. I will call the attention of this convention to a single point, for I discover we have lost sight of it in our extraordinary excitement. It is the main question which the gentleman has sprung, to-wit, the influence which the city of Louisville or any other city is to exert on the legislation of the state. Has any gentleman made the inquiry as to what will be the strength of Louisville upon the basis of the strength of population which they may agree upon? Can Louisville exercise the influence which is attributed to her? Can she place herself, by giving her a fair and equal representation in the legislature of the state upon the basis of numbers, can she by any probable population over and above the population of the balance of the state, exercise the influence which gentlemen seem to attribute to her, and seem to be alarmed that she may exercise? Have gentlemen inquired what will be the strength of Louisville when she comes on the legislative arena, and places herself here with others? What will be her strength in the senate, and what will be the strength of the rest of Kentucky? For I understand that the city of Louisville is to make war on the balance of the state, and the balance of the state is to stand up against Louisville. This was the argument of my friend from Madison, and of others, that the city of Louisville was to combine and turn her power against the balance of the people of Kentucky. This is the proposition which I understand the gentleman from Madison to have used, and others who have followed have also asserted the same thing. What will be the strength of Louisville on a basis of numbers? I have made a little calculation to which I desire to call the attention of this convention, to show that there is no reality at all in this strength of the city of Louisville. If it does not now exist it can never exist. She comes here as a criminal with a prejudice against her as against one not entitled to a fair trial, and towards whom public opinion has sent forth its fiat to deprive her of the great rights which the balance of the people of Kentucky enjoy. She stands as a criminal, arraigned, and the voice of judgment has gone forth against her, and it is to strike from her the right which belongs to even the meanest citizen of Kentucky. She wages a most unequal warfare with the balance of the state, as appears from the feeling arrayed against her. She has no feeling against the balance of the state, but they have united to crush her. I say this because I am a citizen of Kentucky, and because I feel that a blow aimed against the meanest citizen is aimed at the state.

It was well said, when the question was put to an ancient philosopher, as to what was the best form of government, that it was "that government which felt an insult offered to the poorest citizen as an outrage offered to the state," and I feel that an outrage upon the meanest citizen of Kentucky is an insult offered to the state. These are my feelings in relation to questions of this sort, and therefore, I speak in defence of the people of Louisville, and those all along the border of the Ohio, and the people of the whole state who are to be down trodden by this strange and extraordinary principle, which has been thus asserted. But I ask again, what will be the power of Louisville? If I understand, the whole of this principle is based on the idea that she will be so powerful, as to control the balance of the state. That is the argument. We are to disfranchise her now, because she may be strong enough to control the balance of the state. Not that she has done any thing to expose her to our displeasure or excite our ire, but she will some time or other control the legislation of the country. This is the whole sum and substance of the proposition. Let us see to what it leads, and whether it is true or not. I am not in favor of having any one section control the balance of the state. I am for the rights of all, and for having no portion of the state control the rights of the balance.

As I remarked on Saturday, those who have no right to vote may turn against the slaveholder, when you have proscribed them, when you have disfranchised this people who have acted most forbearingly, and stood by and aided and sustained you against those who would have taken your rights from you. They will be against you for it would be treating them cruelly, unkindly, and most unjustly.

But what is this power? It is understood that the senate will consist of thirty-eight members, I believe. Now, on that supposition, take the population of Louisville at fifty thousand, which is the number the honorable president stated yesterday as existing there, and estimate the population of the state at one million. Here then will be fifty thousand against a million, or the reverse, and that fifty thousand is to rise up and exercise an influence that is to be destructive to the rights of the million. Is not that the way in which the question presents itself here? Fifty thousand are to overawe nine hundred and fifty thousand. It is nonsense to talk about it. Let us go a little further. Suppose the population of the state to be a million, and that of Louisville to be fifty thousand, and that there are to be thirty-eight senators. If you give Louisville her fair proportion, what number of representatives is she entitled to, and what number is the state, independent of her, entitled to? Here is the question, and let us see how it results. The state would have thirty-six and one tenth senators, and Louisville would have one senator and nine tenths. The position then in the senate is as one and nine tenths to thirty-six and one tenth. Does any gentleman feel alarmed at this? Are thirty-six and one tenth to be swallowed up by one and nine tenths? Do Kentuckians talk about being alarmed at one against thirty-six? Let us go a little further, for I have looked into this matter a little closely. My estimate may not be exactly right, but this is the basis, and it will result pretty much as I have made it. Increase the population of the state to twelve hundred thousand, and that of Louisville to seventy-five thousand, and then see how it will stand. If Louisville should rise up, she would have to rise against what? Eleven hundred and twenty-five thousand. That is the mighty influence which she is to exert. Let us go a little further. What will be the comparative number of senators to which the state and the city will be entitled? The state will have thirty-five senators and nine twelfths, and Louisville two and three twelfths. Here is the odds against the state. Are gentlemen alarmed at that? What a mighty influence! Two against thirty-five. Surely the people of Kentucky are in great danger; surely they should be alarmed. I am astonished that gentlemen are not more alarmed.

Let us go a little further. Suppose the population of the state to be increased to fifteen hundred thousand, and that of Louisville to one hundred thousand. Here will be one against fourteen. Is there any thing to be alarmed at in that? Go on, and see what will be the number of senators which Louisville will have, compared with the balance of the state. The city will be entitled to two and five-tenths out of thirty-eight. Surely gentlemen cannot be in earnest when they argue this question in this way.

I put it in another point of view. Increase the state to two millions, and the population of Louisville to two hundred thousand—a number which she will not have within the next hundred years, perhaps, though I wish she might, for I glory in the prosperity of our cities—but supposeshe does, then how does it stand? There will be two hundred thousand against eighteen hundred thousand in the state, and in the senate, three and eight-tenths against thirty-four and two-tenths. That is the sum and substance of the mighty array which the city is to make against the whole force of Kentucky, which amounts to nothing in the world—a mere man of straw, which men have conjured up in their imaginations, by which they may destroy the great fundamental rights of the balance of the state.

I rose to make a statement of these facts, and to say that I think gentlemen have indulged a mistaken idea. As to the combination of those cities, it is impossible that they will combine. Louisville will not combine with Covington or Newport. If Louisville wants a road for her special benefit, the other would be against her rather than combine with her, and Louisville would be opposed to them, in the same circumstances. Then, I hold that this war upon the urban population is wrong; it ought not to have been indulged—and I declare in my place, that if the right of suffrage is to be violated and invaded, if the great principle in the constitution which I delight to sustain is to be stricken down, I only regret that I might not have the glorious privilege of standing on this floor, alone, and of recording my vote against it. I hope the resolution will be adopted. I think it should be thrown into some form of an amendment, and brought before the committee in that form, and I hope this excitement will be at once quieted and settled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not arrive in time to hear the resolution read, but from the remarks of the gentleman in its support, I learn it contains a proposition for which I am prepared to give my vote. I do not believe there is any antagonistic principle between the interests of the manufacturer, the merchant, and the agriculturist. I believe that so far as these interests, in this state, can be affected by the measures of the government, or so far as they can affect those measures, they go hand in hand; and I have no such apprehensions in reference to undue influences that may be brought to bear, by the manufacturing and commercial interests, on the agricultural, as to be willing, when a proper basis of representation is established by this convention, to say that any portion of the citizens of the state shall be deprived of a representation in the legislative halls, because they happen to be engaged in the pursuits of commerce, or the business of manufactures. A strong reason must be presented to my mind—a proper basis of representation being established—for making an exception against a particular portion of the community, whether in a city or out of it. Has such a reason been assigned on the present occasion? So far as I have observed the progress of the discussion on the question involved in the motion before the convention, all admit, it seems to me, that there is no danger for the present; and the effort, on the part of gentlemen who advocate the proposition that cities ought to be restricted in the number of their representatives, is to meet an apprehended danger, that may arise hereafter. Is there a just ground for such apprehension? For myself, I feel sure that the growth of our cities and the agricultural portions of the state, will be pari passu; the population of both, the strength and power of both, will increase with equal pace. The one cannot go beyond the other. Their interests are so fully identified, that the prosperity and advancement of the one always secures the prosperity and advancement of the other. In time to come, where, then, is the danger? No fears should be felt on this subject, and I feel none; and until reasons are assigned not based upon a mere apprehension, I cannot vote to sustain such a restriction upon cities as gentlemen propose.

But it seems to me there has been a confounding of principles in the discussion of the whole question. Have we agreed what shall be the basis of representation? The report of the committee adopts qualified voters as the basis. I do not understand the convention as yet to have adopted that principle. Let the basis be however what it may, qualified voters or not, gentlemen should have an eye to that, in debating this question, and not to the right of suffrage. The basis of representation and the right of suffrage are distinct principles, and in fixing the number of representatives so as to approximate, as near as possible, to equal representation, we must look to the basis of representation alone, and should not confound it with the principles involved in the right of suffrage. Now, I believe the true basis of representation is population; population in its true sense. All should be represented who have rights to be protected. New York has adopted this basis in her new constitution. She has not taken as her basis, that which the report of the committee proposes to take, and which to all appearances, is to be received here by common consent. The whole of her inhabitants form the basis of her representation, free negroes and aliens excepted. I would myself prefer this to that of the report; but in allotting the number of representatives, or in apportioning them among the cities and counties, I am for adhering to the basis when adopted, be it what it may, and I will look to it to guide me in the apportionment, and not to the right of suffrage. The right of suffrage and the basis of representation, I repeat, are two distinct matters, and the one ought not to be confounded with the other, and cannot properly be in any just measure of apportionment.

As to the right of suffrage, of which we have heard so much, whilst I would make population the basis of representation, giving to every member of the community, the man and the woman, and the boy twelve years old, and the youth of eighteen, who is old enough to fight the battles of his country; to all, except our slaves and free negroes—and I except these because they are a different race from us, and in government have no identity of interest with us—the right to be represented. I would be governed by very different principles in determining who shall have the right to select the representative, or, in other words, upon whom the right of suffrage shall be conferred. I would restrict the right of suffrage as our present constitution has restricted it. I would not give it to the female because she does not want it, and would not exercise it. I would not give it to the boy nor the youth who is not of mature years. He is presumed to be, by non-age, not of maturity of intellect sufficient to qualify him for the exercise of the high functions of a voter. I would not give it to the criminal, the felon, because by the perpetration of crime he has shown that his hand is against the government, and should have no part in the direction of its affairs. He is morally disqualified. I would not give it to the idiot nor the lunatic, because he is intellectually disqualified. These are restrictions I would make upon the right of suffrage. They are moral and intellectual in their nature, and have reference to the mental and moral qualifications of men to choose their representatives. Upon none but upon those thus qualified ought the right to be conferred, and I would no sooner confer it upon those not thus qualified, than I would confer the same right upon a bullock raised in the county of Bourbon or Clarke.—Representation ought to be based upon the entire population, upon all who have rights to protect. The right to vote is a franchise, and should be given to none but those who are qualified by virtue and intelligence. Property has nothing to do with either, and under the light of our institutions, can never form an element of either.

But to return. I will support the principle of this resolution when presented by the delegate from Christian, as an amendment to the report of the committee. I will do it because the interest of the merchant, manufacturer and agriculturist are so far identical, as that they can never be separated in this community; and cities cannot, and will never exercise an undue or improper influence upon the legislation of the country except when the state is divided into great parties, and party influences and partisan feelings become predominant, and this power to do evil will be wholly neutralized by the adoption of the district system which I understand to be proposed by the resolution now under consideration. In other states this has been done; and the power of party in large cities is broken down by the district system. It is so in the cities of New York, Philadelphia and New Orleans. Adopt it here and the same results will follow.

Mr. GARFIELD. I was pleased to hear the resolution and remarks of the gentleman from Christian. I have, with many others on this floor, felt that this question involves a great and fundamental principle, and that it was my duty as a freeman to enter my solemn protest, with others, against sectional restriction of the elective franchise, or in other words, limiting the representation of certain districts.

I am from the country, and the local interests of my constituents might be advanced by restricting the cities. But the question involves a great principle, one which lies at the very base of self-government, and upon which the fair temple of human liberty rests. But the doctrine here advocated, if once engrafted upon the fundamental law of the state, is without limit. I ask gentlemen, where is the limit to this course of procedure? If the convention assembled here have a right to restrict a city population in its representation, have they not, at the same time, and for the same reasons, a right to limit the representation of any other section of the state?

Again, we have been taught in this convention that one great object of human government was to protect the minority against the encroachments of the majority. Learned politicians on this floor, whose heads are sprinkled over with the frosts of many winters, and who have grown old in their country's service, have taught us that the minority have rights which the majority ought to protect. For this purpose government was instituted. Yet upon this floor, in the face of these noble and magnanimous sentiments, we hear gentlemen say it is our right and privilege to restrict and trample upon the rights of the minority. Being a young politician, and unacquainted with the subtleties of political abstractions, I hoped to see those two antagonistic principles harmonized, if possible. But my teaching has been very different. Numerous gentlemen in this body have manifested their sympathy for the inhabitants of the New England States, who are suffering so much misery from tyranny and degradation. But sir, the first lesson I learned upon the bleak and frost bound hills of New England was, equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none. I was there taught that representation and taxation go hand in hand, that no man should be called upon to support a government which he had no hand in making. I was there taught that the proud privilege of bearing the name of American citizen, gave him the right to be heard, by himself or representative, in the legislative hall.

But a thought or two in regard to the sentiments that have been advanced upon this floor. Why are we called upon to restrict the cities in their representation? Why are we called upon to do violence to the first principle of a popular government? To what shrine must we bow, and upon what altar must we burn incense to entitle us to orthodoxy? We are told by one gentleman that certain sentiments are being instilled into the minds of the people on the northern borders of Kentucky which are exceedingly deleterious to the state, and unless those people are restricted in their votes upon a question of great importance, the interests of the slaveholder will be jeopardized. Reduce that principle to its original essence, trace it out in its various bearings, and in what will it result? Simply this: that the elective franchise, in this state, is based upon a set of opinions entertained by the majority, the opposite of which being entertained by an individual, amounts to disqualification.

Thus would you stifle the free voice of Kentucky's noble sons by the tyranny of opinionism. Thus would you base the rights and liberties of the people upon the caprice of a vacillating majority.

Again: what is the other idea which has been presented here? It is that locality shall determine a man's rights to representation. That this right shall be held inviolate so long as he resides in one section of the state, but removal to the interdicted locality shall operate as a disability. Sir, I ask who delegated the power to this convention to restrict me or any one else as to my place of habitation? Who has the right to say that persons congregating at a given point shall be restricted in their representation? I trust that this question will be answered to the satisfaction of this house.

The secret springs of action on this question were developed on Saturday last. It is the morbid sensibility of members on the slave question, which has driven them to this issue. Sir, what is the history of this convention since it assembled here? We ask for the incorporation of the principle of the law of 1833 into the constitution. We are told that it conflicts with the interest of the slaveholder—that it is the first step towards emancipation, that therefore it must be sacrificed. The ballot system of voting is called for. Again, we are informed that it will prove injurious to the slave interest. The specific mode of amending the constitution, which the spirit of the nineteenth century evidently calls for, is suggested. Still the cry is that slave property is endangered by it. Driven in at all points, we ask that representation shall be equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth. Even at this point they meet us and say that we must yield. They tell us that the dearest right of a Kentucky freeman must yield to the slave, that the time has arrived when one section of the state must be deprived of representation, must be disfranchised, to protect the interests of another. Where is this matter to stop? How far shall the ideal interests of one section of the state control the absolute rights of the other? Are 110,000 non-slaveholding voters to be disfranchised for fear they will emancipate the slaves.

I stand here the warm advocate of the rights of the people. The property of individuals, of whatever kind should be inviolate, and I will go as far as any other man for the rights of the property. No man or set of men have the right to take from me the property which I held by a law of nature, anterior to the organization of society. But there is a right to preserve, for which I would sacrifice my property. That right is involved in the question before us. Rather than see this inalienable right trampled upon, I am willing for those rights, based upon municipal law, to be abolished. In a word, if the slavery of the black is to be based upon the degradation and slavery of the white, then sir, I am prepared to see the institution abolished. No institution is consistent with the genius of our form of government, which requires the best rights and dearest interests of the people to be trampled upon in order to its protection, and the doctrine advocated here is, that we must disfranchise a portion of the people of the state for the purpose of protecting the interests of the slaveholder. Sir, such principles are antagonistic to human liberty.

But I conceive gentlemen have taken an incorrect view of this subject. The people of northern Kentucky are as conservative upon the question of slavery as any other section of the state. Look at the northern counties and cities and tell me what indications of radicalism the late elections have shown. How many immediate or gradual emancipationists are returned here. Not one so far as my knowledge extends. I came not from the region of the shuttle and spindle on the one hand, nor do I represent the blue grass country on the other, but I come as the representative of the free constituency of Fleming, and I feel called upon by that constituency to maintain the rights of the people at large. In the discharge of that duty I am satisfied that I shall receive the countenance and support of those who sent me here. I stand then, sir, in framing this constitution, not as the advocate of local interests, but of great and fundamental principles.

I therefore felt it my duty to enter this my solemn protest against the violation of this great principle of a free government.

Mr. CLARKE. This resolution came up rather unexpectedly to me this morning. In a few remarks which I had the honor to submit on the introduction of this section, which is under consideration, in committee of the whole, I stated that population was the true basis of representation. I still entertain that opinion, my mind has undergone no change in that particular.—The gentleman from Fleming, just up, states that the principle that representation and taxation should go hand in hand, was the first political lesson he was taught; and yet he says he is in favor of population as the basis of representation. I should like to have him make the two positions harmonize; I cannot do it. I understand them as two distinct principles.—Taxation as a basis was considered by our committee. Taxation is making property the basis; population is taking the people for the basis; and yet that gentleman tells the convention and the country that he is in favor of both principles. It is for him to reconcile the two, not me, I think they are antagonistical.

Before I proceed, I beg leave in a most respectful manner, to reply to some remarks of the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston,) in his speech of yesterday, which was a courteous, polite, and exceedingly sensible speech, and one, with the sentiments of which, I in the main agree. But in that speech he took occasion to say there was a wild reckless spirit pervading the democracy of the country.

Mr. PRESTON. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. CLARKE. Particularly to you.

Mr. PRESTON. Then you are particularly mistaken. I observed that the spirit manifested by the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Turner,) in arraying class against class, and interest against interest, was worse than the worst demagogue spirit which I had seen manifested even when the democracy opposed the home manufactures of the country. I think that was the idea I intended to convey. I represent here whigs and democrats, and certainly can assure the gentleman, and I know he would not intentionally misrepresent me, I never can be, on this floor, so ungrateful for past favors from the democratic party, as to cast upon it any reflection.

Mr. CLARKE. I am very glad to hear the explanation of the gentleman, and I supposed at the time that he would make no remark disrespectful to any party in the state, unless he was carried away by the excitement about us. I thought it was the result of the excitement of the moment. His explanation is entirely satisfactory. I stand here representing whigs and democrats myself. I obtained in my county a large number of whig votes at the polls. I told them, and I repeat it here, that I did not think a constitution to be formed to exist for fifty years should be made on party grounds or party principles, and that if I came here I would not represent a party, but the people. And I take occasion to return to those whigs who gave me their votes my sincere thanks, and to say that their kindness shall not be forgotten on this floor.

But there was one thing that my friend from Louisville did say. He said that I offered an amendment here which proposed that Louisville should have two senators, and that the citizens of the state should have the right to import slaves under certain restrictions. He said that I offered it as a sort of compromise, and if it prevailed my portion would be the lion's share and his would be the lamb's.

Mr. PRESTON. That remark was not made with reference to you, but in reply to the gentleman from Madison. I said it would force me into a partnership with that gentleman which I was unwilling to go into.

Mr. CLARKE. I want to say that I have proposed no partnership. I have brought my proposition in here and offered it without any partnership. I intend to show that if it does contain the elements of compromise, I shall not be obnoxious to the charge of having done wrong in offering it, and thus following in the footsteps of illustrious individuals who have gone before me, who not only in this house and in the legislative halls of this state, but in the halls of congress, have offered compromises, and have received the blessings of the Union for having done.

I say I am willing to yield something, if gentlemen will yield something; but if they think proper to spurn the proposition, they must bear the consequences. I only speak for myself. The gentleman from Louisville supposes he has convicted me of inconsistency. He stated that my amendment was in violation of the thirty-fourth section of the report which I had the honor to submit, under the instructions of the committee on the legislative department. How is it in violation of that section? What does the report say in the thirty-fourth section?

"No law, enacted by the general assembly, shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be expressed in the title."

Very well, does not the report say there are other things which the legislature shall not do? In the next section we find,

"No law shall be revised, or amended by reference to its title; but, in such case, the act revised, or section amended, shall be re-enacted and published at length."

In section thirty-third we find that,

"No act of the general assembly shall authorize any debt to be contracted on behalf of the commonwealth, except for the purposes mentioned in the thirty-second section of this article."

There are various inhibitions upon legislative action contained in that report. There are but few things which this convention may not do—many things which the legislature will be restrained in doing. I am not guilty of inconsistency, then, when I propose, as I do in my amendment, that citizens may import slaves under certain restrictions and restraints.

I repeat, that I believe the principle of representation based on population, is the true principle. What sort of a principle is that, and where does it originate? It has its origin in the construction of municipal rules and regulations, without which there is no power that does authorize the exercise of the right of suffrage. It is the creature of municipal organization and regulations, but it is a right, and it lies at the foundation of republican institutions. But are there not other rights, and rights which are superior to those existing only by municipal regulations? There are rights that existed before any municipal regulations ever did exist. And what are they? The right to enjoy life, liberty, and I say, a natural right is the right to accumulate and enjoy property.

I am aware that some elementary writers differ as to whether property and the enjoyment of it, is a natural right. I think it is a natural right. Go upon the frozen summit of your rocky mountains, and find the savage who knows nothing of civilization, and who, but for the buffalo robe which covers him, would be exposed to the peltings of the pitiless storm. This robe is property, and I ask if his very existence does not depend upon its retention and enjoyment. When we take into consideration the constitution of man and his condition, he cannot exist without the enjoyment of property. When the starving savage stretches forth his hand and takes from the vine a cluster of grapes, it is property, without which he could not subsist. It is a natural right. This is the same natural right that I would have, if you and I were cast away upon the ocean upon a plank which could not sustain us both. I have the right in this case, to preserve myself and throw you overboard, as my friend from Nelson illustrated it the other day. So with respect to property. If you attempt to take it from me, I have the natural right to slay before I permit you to do it.

Then while it is insisted there are rights which must be sacred to the citizens under this constitution, and while I concede it is a right which ought not to be violated, and allow representation to be based and predicated on population, I maintain there are other rights. I maintain we have the right to import slaves into this state, they being property, and we have the right to purchase where we can the cheapest, and sell where we can get the highest price. If we can buy slaves cheaper in Virginia, and the demand for labor will justify the purchase, I want this right secured in the constitution to the citizens of the state. It is a right to enjoy property, and I want that right secured to me now.

I intend to come to the point. I am asked to do what? I am requested to assist in making such a change in the present constitution of the State as will secure to Louisville and other cities in the State, additional representation in the Senate. If the right of the citizen to import slaves for his own use is not secured at the same time that the increase, (in behalf of cities,) of senators is secured, what guarantee, I ask, will I have, that this right will be allowed to exist? It is a part of the history of Louisville, that her representation in the State legislature, for the last nineteen or twenty years, have upheld and supported the act of 1833, prohibiting the importation of slaves; yet I am asked to increase her power by a change in the present constitution, to leave unprotected the right for which my constituents contend, and thus strengthen the power in her hands which is to be wielded to our destruction! Suppose, Mr. President, by this change in the constitution we do increase the city strength in the senate, and suppose the right to import slaves is to be left to legislative discretion. If the honorable President of this convention, and the honorable gentleman from Madison, (though occupying extremes on the question now before the convention,) if they should be returned to the Senate, they would strike hands as brothers in reinstating upon your statute books the odious act of 1833. When I return to my constituents—those to whom I look for all I shall ever seek to be, what can I say to them? What will be the sad and alarming story that I must relate? First, that we have made a change in the constitution never demanded by or discussed before the people, which change increases an influence in the legislature directly hostile to their slave interest which is left unprotected by any constitutional provision; may they not well say that the relation which exists between master and slave is not so well secured by the new as the old constitution? Will they not say to me, sir, you went into that convention and by your vote you have changed the old constitution and increased a power dangerous to our rights; by constitutional provision you have strengthened the arm of those opposed to us, and left us unprotected. May they not well say all this, yea, more?

It was said by the honorable president of this convention, if this principle of representation, based upon population, did not prevail he would not sign this constitution. I will not go so far as that. I despise the term conservative in the manner in which it is used; but I am more conservative than that. Might I not put a question in respect to the president like the one asked by Daniel Webster, when about to be read out of the whig church—"In the name of God where shall I go?" Now, if you should not succeed in this matter, where will you go? Will you be bettered by going back to the old constitution, for that is the very thing of which you complain.

Now, I take this ground: if we shall confer upon or restore the power to the people to come to the polls and vote for all their officers, from a governor down to a constable,—if we shall secure that right in this constitution,—if we shall secure to the people of this state the right to be exempt from an improper contracting of debts and expenditure of money, and if we secure the limitation of the terms of the legislature to two years, I shall think we have gained much, though we do not gain the favorite project which we have in view. I have understood that all those were favorite projects of the president. Now, suppose we do not carry this question, will the spirit of conservatism lead to taking the old constitution? Because you fail in one instance merely, will you throw away all the rest? I trust when the president made his speech he was laboring under excitement, and I hope we may all come together, and though we may be disappointed in one thing, there may be other redeeming qualities in the constitution which will bring the president to us, and that he will go for it. If we cannot make the new constitution as perfect as many of us may desire, yet if we improve upon the old one let us agree upon the new. I trust we may all ultimately agree here.

But when I go back to my people, and talk to them about the changes we have made, my course will be to tell them what I approve and what I disapprove. I intend to vote for the constitution. If you will only let the people elect their officers, I have little fear, if, at the same time, you restrain the legislature in its action. But I am prepared to say, that unless this great natural right of the people in my portion of the state is secured, I never will strengthen the arm raised to strike that right down. Never. I should be recreant to the trust they have confided to me. I should sacrifice my right to their confidence, if I were to stand on this floor and strengthen the legislative department of this government by a constitutional provision, when I left my own people exposed to that strengthened arm.

I only speak for myself; but I would dislike very much to strengthen the power of those counties along the Ohio river, by a constitutional provision, while they are opposed to the further importation of slaves, and go back to my people, and in the very next session of the legislature, see my friend from Louisville and my friend from Madison, in one or the other branch, shaking hands and uniting in renewing the act of 1833. I could not stand at home were I to do this, nor will I do it. Both are great principles, and if one must be yielded in part, the other must be yielded in part. I came here with a determination to labor for the principle that my people might import slaves for their own use, and in saying they shall be for their own use, I have compromised something to accommodate the views and feelings of persons here. Whilst I do that, and whilst others would place a restriction on the growth of city population, I have said they should be entitled to two senators.

Reference has been made to the constitution of New York, and it is said that the great principle which is contended for here, is not violated in that constitution. If I recollect the provisions of that constitution, and I have it here, there will be found in article third, section third, these words:

"The state shall be divided into thirty-two districts, to be called senate districts, each of which shall choose one senator. The districts shall be numbered from one to thirty-two inclusive.

"District number one (1) shall consist of the counties of Suffolk, Richmond, and Queens.

"District number two (2) shall consist of the county of Kings.

"Districts number three, (3,) number four, (4,) number five, (5,) and number six, (6,) shall consist of the city and county of New York."

Only four senators in the great city of New York. If I recollect aright, by the constitution of Maryland, Baltimore is entitled to but one senator. Baltimore, when compared with Maryland, has a larger population than Louisville will have in one hundred years compared with the population of Kentucky. The framers of our own constitution restricted the number of senators to not more than one in a county. I will read from the present constitution of the state of Kentucky, in the twelfth section, article second:

"The same number of senatorial districts shall, from time to time, be established by the legislature, as there may then be senators allotted to the state; which shall be so formed as to contain, as near as may be, an equal number of free male inhabitants in each, above the age of twenty-one years, and so that no county shall be divided, or form more than one district; and where two or more counties compose a district, they shall be adjoining."

That section of our constitution has been settled by legislative enactments, from time to time, and in the apportionment of representation Louisville was entitled to no representative, apart from the county of Jefferson. That has been the course of our ancestors, and they may have been influenced by the same reasons which operated in forming the constitution of New York or Maryland. There are other constitutions to which I might refer, but I will not at present. Then, if there be a violation of a principle here, we have the example of New York and Maryland, and of our own state, for this violation, and I apprehend there were reasons for it. Still, I repeat, I believe it is a violation of a great principle. But when you attempt to establish a great principle, which is to be fraught with disastrous consequences to another great principle and right; in the name of heaven do secure in that constitution this principle and right, so that you cannot press us down. That is all we ask. Many of the best lawyers in the state, (and with them I concurred,) believed that the act of 1833 was in direct and flagrant violation of the constitution. The power conferred upon the legislature, was to pass laws to prevent the importation of slaves as merchandize. Under this power they passed the act of 1833, and in this, in my judgment, violated the spirit of the constitution and the intentions of those who framed it. Fail to secure the right inviolate to import slaves, in the constitution you are now making, and at whose mercy are we placed; we shall get the lamb's share, and my friend from Louisville, who spoke yesterday, will get the lion's share. I took occasion the other day to say that I was in favor of perpetual slavery. I made that statement with a full knowledge of its length and breadth, and height and depth. The institution of slavery has existed in this union for more than two hundred years.

Slaves were brought here from Africa, not as kidnaped freemen, torn from a land of liberty and sold in bondage—they were found the slaves of barbarian petty kings, enduring all the cruelty of savagism of which humanity is capable. And in this condition they were purchased and brought to America—to this land of civilization and plenty. All except one I believe of the original thirteen states, were slave states, and wherever slave labor is profitable, they retain the institution. The number of slaves in the present slave states, since the first importation, has increased to about four millions. I have seen no plan of emancipation or colonization by which this immense population with its perpetual increase, can be colonized, as freemen in Africa or elsewhere. Mr. President, I do not believe, if you could command every dollar in the universal world, together with the British debt, all, all, would be adequate to the accomplishment of such an undertaking, consistent with the constitution and laws of this nation. Its impracticability and impossibility, I think, susceptible of mathematical demonstration.

We, sir, are united to the slave states of this union by the strongest and most indissoluble ties which can bind sovereign states together—unity of feeling, unity of sentiment, unity of interest, and a deep and abiding sense of the necessity of such an union of the slave states to enable each one to expect and receive the support of the whole in defending its peculiar institutions against the invasions of the foul and damning spirit of abolitionism. All plead that we should remain as one. Sir, I love the slave states of this union—a glorious old slave state gave me birth—and I still look to that old Dominion, from whence most of us sprang, as the home of virtue, patriotism, genius and chivalry. I still remember, and look back upon the haunts of my boyhood, her hills, her valleys, her chrysal streams, with pride and pleasure; and I trust that Kentucky will never depart from the lofty example of that glorious old mother, in her devotion to the safety of the slave states.—Our markets for most of the surplus produce of the country is to be found in our sister slave states. They reward our labors with money.—We hand our money over to the spinning jennies of the north, whose owners perpetually complain of slavery and slave owners, because, I suppose, that the labor of these slaves fill their coffers with the precious metals. This must be the cause of complaint, for I am sure we never disturb the institutions of the north.

Emancipation has been the continual cry. It has been said by some of the wisest men in the union, (and I think with much truth,) that emancipation and colonization would depopulate many of the slave states; for such is the climate in many, that the white man could not make agricultural pursuits sufficiently profitable by his own labor to induce him to remain there. No one among us, I apprehend, would be in favor of turning them loose among us as freemen; for of all abominations that ever cursed a country, a free negro population is the very worst. Hence, Mr. President, if we had the means to buy and colonize them, it would be wretched policy, in my judgment, to do so. You make the condition of the African infinitely worse by the removal of the influences and restraints of a superior race from around him, by which he has been civilized, and in many instances christianized, and allow him to degenerate into that state of savage barbarism which attended all emancipation projects both in France and England; and you depopulate the fair fields of some of the fairest and brightest sisters of this union.

It would be bad policy to free them among us. None I hope can desire that. Therefore, I regard the perpetuation of slavery in some or most of the present slave states, as a fact, fixed and certain; and if any state shall falter and forget her obligation and her duty to her sisters, I trust in God Kentucky will never be that State.

I am thoroughly convinced and satisfied that the institution of slavery, as it exists in Kentucky, elevates the morals and the chivalry of the white race, and enhances the happiness of both races. The great disproportion in the free states over crime in the slave states, attests the first, and the blood of an hundred battle fields will vouchsafe the latter. The gentleman from Campbell has been pleased to say that the institution of slavery was a curse and in violation of the laws of God and the laws of man. I have no answer to make to that argument, save one. I will just ask him to go to the hundred court houses in this state, and listen to the echoes from the voices of one hundred and forty thousand freemen at the polls in August last. Yes sir, freemen blessed with cultivated morals and intelligence, and imbued with the highest and holiest principles of patriotism. They, sir, have replied to his argument. They have answered the question whether they or the gentleman with the few thousand with whom he acted, shall erect the standard of morals in this commonwealth. It is strange that that gentleman, and those with whom he acts, should think themselves the only persons in the state competent to determine what is morals, what is christian, what is humane, what is patriotic.

If you increase your power by voting as you and as other gentlemen desire, what is to be the result? Why, the very next session you will plant down upon us the infamous act of 1833; you will have said to the southern part of the state, where slave labor is in demand, you must come to the middle or northern portion of the state to procure your slaves. You shall not be allowed to go to other states where perhaps you might buy better slaves for a less price, but you shall buy your slaves from us at such prices as we in the enjoyment of this monopoly in slave dealing shall think proper to ask, or you may go without. I desire to show this house and the country what would be the result of such a course. What will the southern members of the legislature, who come here as your tributaries, say and do? What ought they to do? Make speeches continually against your act of 1833, force you to defend it and thus preach abolitionism; this would stimulate Ohio abolitionists and others to make incursions into your part of the state, endanger the tenure by which you hold your slaves, and reduce them in value. The southern part of the state is secure in the enjoyment of their slave property, and hence they could with perfect impunity retaliate upon you for the injustice of the act of 1833, by which you attempt to monopolize the whole slave traffic of the state, and they ought to do it and doubtless will do it, if they be true to themselves. Is it not better then to secure to us our rights by constitutional provision, when we are willing to secure yours to you? Is it not just, I ask, that it should be done? Acquire the power you now seek and leave us exposed; place the principles of the law of 1833 upon your statute books, as you doubtless will do in the exercise of your increased power, and my judgment for it, it can never remain there in peace if the south of the state shall remain true to herself. They will wipe it from the statute book, or keep up an agitation of abolitionism that will bring down the prices of your slaves as low as they could be obtained from other states.

There is another view of this subject. The five great cities of the north and east are now connected with the town of Cumberland, at the foot of the Alleghany mountains on the east. There is now a railroad being constructed, which will extend to Wheeling, or Pittsburg. There is a railroad from Lexington to your own city, that will be extended, in less than ten years, to Nashville, Tennessee, and there intersect the Chatahoochee railroad. From this great line, branches will spring out in every direction. The future power and wealth of the state in part will be found in the mountains when the bosoms of those mountains shall be opened up by the energies of the people of Kentucky, and their immense wealth shall be thrown into the lap of the north, the east, the west, and the south.—There will then be the means of bringing into market these sources of wealth, and there will be an increased demand for labor. If the act of 1833 is fastened upon us, when we come to require one hundred and fifty, two hundred, or three hundred thousand additional laborers to bring out the hidden treasures of your state, where will you get them? You will get them from abolition Ohio—in part abolition—and from other free states; and what description of people will you bring in here to supply that demand for labor which we would supply with blacks? The very worst that can be found in the cities and towns of those states; and they will not fail to come imbued with the spirit of fanaticism and abolitionism, and with the conviction that slavery is against the laws of God and man. And in less than ten years after this increased demand for labor shall arise, if our rights are not secured as here proposed, this population will come to the polls and separate the slaves from their owners. My object is, that the people of this state shall be permitted when they want laborers to go to the other states and buy and bring them in here. They are better laborers, more reliable, and I would rather have them than the great portion of those who will come into the state if the demand for labor shall increase.

Mr. President, I am not alarmed from my propriety or purpose by the cry that I am favoring native americanism. I am doing no such thing. I yield to no man in my opposition to that other fanaticism. I have no fears of the brave and patriotic Irish, Dutch, Poles and Hungarians who have fled from a land of tyranny and oppression to this land of liberty; my fears are in another quarter. I fear native-born citizens of the United States, who have been raised in the cradle of dislike for and hostility to our institutions, and who would immigrate here, (not as the foreigner,) to support them, but to make war upon and destroy them.

Sir, why not allow the citizens of the state, when they are competent to elect their judges, and all their officers, from the highest to the lowest, and when we have acknowledged their competency fully and fairly to transact their own business—in the name of God why not in this constitution secure to them also the right to exercise their own judgment upon the question, whether they want more laborers, and whether they should buy them or not!

The act of 1833, though passed seventeen years ago, was at the time a concession to the very spirit against which we have been warring throughout the last summer, and for the past two years. Yes sir, that act has been claimed as a concession to the spirit of abolitionism and emancipationism. And I never want to see it re-enacted again. Go to the halls of congress and see what it has done there. A Giddings, a Slade, a Root, a Hudson, or a Hale, never stood up in his place there and attacked the institution of slavery, that he did not declare that even Kentucky herself, one of the first slave states in the Union, was tired of it, and believed it to be an injury. When the gentlemen from the south call for their authority for this assertion, what was their reply! Look to the Kentucky act of 1833! Yes sir, when southern men there were standing in one solid phalanx, battling for southern rights, against the encroachments of the abolitionists of the north, that act of 1833, that Kentucky act, was hurled in their teeth by these abolitionists. The passage of that act was a concession to the northern abolitionists, and one step towards the embrace of northern fanaticism. To leave it open so that it may be passed again would be another concession to that detestable spirit, that intends, if it can, to override the whole of the people of the south. Yes sir, encourage them, and at the darkest hour of midnight, when the husband is slumbering in the embraces of his family, the torch will be placed in the one hand and the tomahawk in the other, of the slave population, and if any of the whites are permitted to escape it will be by the light of the conflagration of their own homes. It was a concession sir, to this fell spirit.

There are those on this floor, who, when this mighty and dangerous and exciting question has agitated the councils of the Union, have seen the thirty bright stars that constitute our glorious political constellation, tremble in their orbits, ready at a moment madly and wildly to shoot from their spheres. They have stood upon broad platform of the constitution, sir, and almost felt that this glorious fabric of human liberty, consecrated by the best blood of our fathers, and dedicated to the eternal principles of freedom, was reeling, tottering and tumbling to the dust. And why was all this? The power of the abolitionists had been strengthened or rather encouraged, and flattered by this concession of the act of 1833. The strongest argument against southern men I ever heard from the lips of an abolitionist was based upon that act. Go to the halls of congress and you will see the whigs from the slave states with very few exceptions, and the democrats, when this great question comes up, shake hands as a band of brothers, and there standing in undivided ranks battling for southern rights. Place in this constitution a power under which the legislature can re-enact the law of 1833, and by which the citizen shall be deprived of the liberty and privilege of importing slaves for his own use, and you concede to them, and allow the increasing demand for laborers to be supplied, not with blacks, but with whites, and the state after a while will become abolitionized and emancipationized. And when that spirit takes possession of the ballot box, I ask you then in whose hands will you fall. You go into the kind embraces of that region of country that has been making war upon you from the foundation of our government to the present time.

I for one have no higher earthly hope than that proud, chivalrous old Kentucky will now and forever strengthen the cords that bind the slave states of this union in one glorious sisterhood.

Mr. President, I know that my remarks have been desultory. I arose to address the house under the impulse of the moment, and have spoken longer than I intended. I will make but a few more remarks and I have done.

Abolitionism in its present sense was scarcely known in this country until about the year 1790. A sect called Quakers brought the subject to the attention of Congress, by petition. The dark cloud of fanaticism presented but a speck upon our then bright political horizon. This spirit gradually increased until some twenty years or more since, a combination between the spirits of abolitionism in France and England, brought about the insurrection and massacre in the island of St. Domingo. This was followed up by the emancipation of the slaves in the West India Islands by Great Britain, and immediately upon the heel of these acts of a false and sickly philanthropy, our act of 1833 made its appearance upon our statute book. That little speck, sir, that was seen in the far off distance in 1790, has grown into a black and angry cloud, sending forth its thunders from the whole northern hemisphere. Sir, it threatens to deluge one half of this union in blood and tears. I ask, in the name of our common interests, I ask in the name of our sister states of the south, I ask in the name of those who are to come, and who, (if we are faithful,) will be entitled to all the privileges that we now enjoy, I ask in the name of all these high and pressing considerations, if it be not our duty, as the sworn representatives of the sovereignty of the state, to withhold, by constitutional provision, from the legislature, all means by which this threatening storm of the north shall be invited to the desolation of this now free and happy country. I trust in my God that such will be the result of our labors.

In conclusion, I beg leave to say, that if I shall have no guarantee that the legislature will be restricted by constitutional provision from an interference with our rights, by the passage of prohibitory laws, I cannot, consistently with the duty I owe to those I represent, increase the power of those who are in favor of the act of 1833, and I will not do it by my vote.

Mr. DAVIS. In relation to the leading feature of the resolution, and so far as that feature is common to both houses of the legislature—which proposes to establish single districts for the choice of both senators and representatives—I am in favor of it. But the latter branch of the proposition seems to forbid the principle that there is to be any restriction of the right of cities to representation in the senate according to numbers. I cannot give my assent to it. In relation to districting cities, I think it is in perfect conformity to the great principle of equal representation. If it were possible that the State of Kentucky could be laid out into a hundred geographical districts, each containing no more nor less than the ratio of representation, if the number of one hundred is to constitute the house of representatives, and would best secure the representation of the whole people, it would certainly be desirable. Well, sir, any regulation which approximates, in any degree, to that great popular principle which would be so desirable, and which would conduce so much to the general safety of the country, in my judgment, ought to receive the serious consideration and the approval of the convention. I will illustrate the position by this supposed case. Kentucky is divided, we will say, into two equal districts, so far as population is involved, and one half of the state is allowed to elect their representatives by general ticket, and the other is required to elect by single districts. Which half would rule? Every gentleman will have but one answer ready to the question. We saw it illustrated a few years ago, in the election of president of the United States, not exactly to that extent, but still to a degree that was controlling in its practical result. The great State of New York had thirty-eight electors, all elected by general ticket; the consequence was, her whole strength was thrown to one candidate, which controlled and decided the election. The same mode of electing her representatives to congress would give her so much power as that she would generally hold the balance in that branch and decide all great questions. To prevent our cities from engrossing and concentrating by the same principle, a dangerous amount of power, I am in favor of districting them for the election of representatives.

It seems to me that gentlemen here have proceeded on a fallacy—my friend from Henderson among others—in computing the ratio of increase between the cities and the country. I think there will be a great disproportionate increase between the two in favor of the cities, and especially the cities located upon the Ohio river. Not only that, but the counties also located on that river from the convenience of navigation and other advantages which their position gives them, will necessarily experience an accelerated impulse in the increase of the population, greater than a natural increase would give them, and a disproportionate one over the rest of the state.

Mr. DIXON. The proposition I assumed was, that the cities would increase in the ratio of four hundred per cent. and the counties in the ratio of fifty per cent.

Mr. DAVIS. I beg pardon, then, for I had misunderstood the gentleman. I have a table of the increase of the population of Louisville at various periods, when this population was enumerated under the law of congress. Louisville in 1810 had a population of 1,357; in 1820, of 4,012; in 1830, of 10,352; in 1840, of 21,125; and now, after the lapse of nine years of time, gentlemen say she has upwards 50,000 inhabitants. According to that rate of progress, in 1860, Louisville will have between 100 and 140 thousand people. Look at Covington, which is admitted to be the second city in size in the state. Independent of an intrinsic and peculiarly local principle of growth which Covington has, there is a cause at work much more potent in its operation in the proximate position of Cincinnati with her.

The great and continuous growth of the Queen of the West, in numbers, business and wealth, will necessarily build up Covington rapidly into a considerable city. In 1840, Covington had a population of 2,046, and now she has upwards of 10,000. What the city of New York has been to Brooklyn, will Cincinnati be to Covington. If, in 1860, Louisville numbers 125,000 people, Covington will probably have 75,000. The aggregate population of the two cities will be at least 200,000, and I have no doubt, at that time, one-fifth of the entire population of the state of Kentucky. Now the question is, are you going to give these cities an equal representation according to numbers, with the rest of the state, in both houses of your legislature, senate as well as the house of representatives? I deny that, as a practical question, equality is ever exactly, or to a mathematical certainty, obtained in government, or the division and adjustment of political power among the people. We lay down the principle that there shall be equality both of right and power in our system—it is a general principle, but no man dreams, or if he does he is a dreamer indeed, that we ever can exactly attain to it. All that we do in practice is to approximate to it, and in that attempt he is an unwise man who endeavors to make that approximation so near as to destroy, or seriously to jeopardize the safety of the community at large. Self protection and self preservation is a greater and paramount principle to be considered in connection with it. Sir, this principle of an equal distribution of political power does not exist in any system, general or subordinate, in the United States, because practically it is unattainable, and if it were otherwise, it would be greatly inconvenient and unsafe, if it were practicable to put into operation in its universal and complete perfection. It does not exist in the general government, or in a single state government in the United States.

What is the declaration of independence—what is this utopian principle that is so beautiful in theory, but when you attempt to put it exactly in practice always eludes your grasp?—That all persons are by nature equal, and that in the business of government all persons have a perfect right to an equal share of the power. Why sir, woman is excluded in every system that prevails in the civilized world—and the youth under twenty-one years of age are excluded in all the American systems. Not only these, but numerous classes of male adults are excluded, not only from office, but from the right to vote itself. You make qualifications of citizenship, of residence, of periods of residence, and of age, all proper in themselves, and you apply all these restrictions upon the natural right and the beautiful theoretical principle that all persons are equal, and all share equally the power of government. Well, what are these restrictions, but to modify and to restrict, in some degree, the operation of the general principle of equality? And when you apply this principle to those who are candidates for office, why, you make a further extension of these restrictions, and you further impinge upon this natural right of equality. Your governor, under the present constitution, is to be forty years of age; under the proposition the committee on the executive department has reported, he is to be thirty-five; but it is not material which you require, as to him there is a qualification of age, an interdict of all under it from the office, and that beyond middle life. You subject senators to a qualification of age, and representatives also. You throw qualifications around every office of government, by which are excluded, from some, at least four-fifths of the aggregate population—from some, fully one-half of the adult male population, and from all, a very large amount of this adult male population. What a departure from, what a sacrifice of, this great principle of natural equality, in its application in the business and science of government! And why do you do this? Simply, because the good, the security, the self-preservation of the larger number requires it. The paramount principle, of the right and duty of the mass of the men of a country to protect themselves intervenes and modifies the other and subordinate right. You laid down the general principle of equality of power and right, as a great leading landmark, to blaze in beauty and splendor ahead of you, and it is your guide that directs you in fixing the barque of state in its course; but it is not the haven to which you are sailing. That port, the great end of all human government, is the security and the happiness of the greatest number; and so far as a safe anchorage on its deep and peaceful bosom requires the wise political mariner to depart from, and pass the guiding and cheering light house, "equality to all," he does it; and because this beacon light is not the port in which he is to rest, does not impair the truth or value of the great light by which alone he has been enabled to reach it.

In the formation of the constitution of the United States, there have been numerous and great departures from this principle of universal and perfect equality, and I suppose that instrument is as wisely and justly adapted to its ends, as any which this convention, or any other convention of this day could form. We have thirty states in this Union, and there is a perfect equality of representation in proportion to federal numbers, in all of these states, in the house of representatives; and there is an absolute equality of them as states, without regard to popular numbers, in the senate. And upon what principle, and for what reason, has this positive and absolute equality, without regard to numbers, been secured to each in the senate? It is because, in all governments, there are two great principles of action—the one of action, or aggression if you please, and the other of resistance, of self-defence. And neither of these principles is to be lost sight of, by any wise body, in framing the fundamental law. Both these two principles are recognized, and operate in the organization of the house of representatives in congress, elected as it is upon the principle of numbers, but by states; for whilst numerical representation gives the full capacity for progress, action, and aggression, this representation, not of a body, one and indivisible, a totality and a unit, but of separate states, produces an antagonism and conflict of interest, by which representation in the house also performs the function of protection and self-defence. But this constitution is a mixed and complicated structure. It was formed in the house for the people of the United States, acting by states; whilst in the senate the state sovereignties and governments are represented, and provision made for their security. There were large states and small—Virginia and Delaware—New York and Rhode Island. The small states never would have signed the bond of this political partnership, unless it had, as it does, secured to them a power to protect themselves against the large states; and the latter knew this was the alone condition upon which the association could be formed. Delaware and Rhode Island have each two senators, and in that body as much power as the colossal New York and Virginia. What a vast departure from the principle of representation in proportion to numbers. It is said in this debate, that the case of the states and of the United States government are in no degree analogous to the counties and the cities of Kentucky. The subjects to which the principle is to be applied are different, but the principle is the same, and is equally applicable to both, and as necessary for its application in our constitution as well as in that of the United States. This principle is, that the safety and proper protection of the community at large is the paramount, predominating principle of our system, and all others must yield to it. That for the purposes of protection, defence, and self-preservation, the large states must surrender in the senate, to the small states, a large portion of their power; and the cities, for the same ends, in our senate, must surrender to the counties and the rural population of the state a portion of their power. Such is the nature of all human government—for all involve a surrender of right, concession, and compromise. Nor is this required, in either case, for action or aggression, but only for security and defence. If the smaller states of the union should combine in the senate, and pass bills through that body, destructive of the rights and interests of the large states, their capacity for self-defence in the house, by a representation there, based upon numbers, would be complete, and guard them from all wrong; whilst the same protection is assured to the small states, against the overwhelming strength, and all combinations of the great states, in the house, by their equality of power in the senate. Without this ability to protect and preserve themselves, in the senate, the small states would long since have been devoured by the larger ones, as the smaller creatures of the deep are by its great leviathans. The small states had wise men to represent them in the convention, who were deeply read in the history, character, and nature of man. They knew that the possession of power, and particularly irresponsible power, corrupted his heart; and that he would be guilty of wrong and oppression, particularly when acting with a multitude; and these great men took measures timely and effective to protect their states, with a judgment and wisdom which stand vindicated by all subsequent experience. Will we profit by their example?

The same principle of defence of the weak and disunited against the strong, the united and the compact, has been adopted to some extent in many of the States in the formation of their constitutions.

Pennsylvania, in her last constitution, gave the city of Philadelphia, for the time, two senators, and limited the number permanently to four, and the maximum was even then less than numbers would have entitled her to claim. The city of Baltimore is restricted to one senator, although her population is about one fourth of the whole of Maryland. But there is in that state a much more extensive infraction of this principle of equality in her house of representatives, they being distributed among all her counties without regard to numbers, and the city of Baltimore being limited to two. Virginia, by her constitution is divided into two great senatorial districts, separated by the Blue Ridge. To the eastern is given nineteen members, and to the western but thirteen, and yet the western district contains the largest amount of voting population. In South Carolina there is also a like restriction—Charleston and the parishes of St. Philip and St. Michael having but two of thirty seven senators, whilst they have fifteen of seventy six representatives. Her voting population would give her about one fifth of the representation in both houses, and whilst she is allowed that proportion in the house of representatives she has less than an eighteenth of the senate. A similar provision exists in the constitution of Louisiana for New Orleans, except that it is applicable to both houses, though in a smaller degree to the house of representatives. She has thirty two senators, a maximum of one hundred and a minimum of seventy representatives. With more than one fifth of the aggregate population of the state, and this proportion growing rapidly from year to year, she is limited by the constitution to four senators and nine representatives.

In the adjustment of political power by all these, and also by other states, they have proceeded upon a truth of universal and permanent application, that the same numbers in a city, from concentrative intelligence and wealth, compactness of residence and rapid interchange of opinions, from the monopoly and power of the newspaper press, from the ramification and extent of business and social intercourse, from a superior facility in raising large sums of money and forming and executing party organization, from a greater unity and energy of interests, will, and personal exertions, are greatly more effective and powerful in all political movements than the same amount of rural population. They knew that, scattered, holding but little intercommunion with each other, unacquainted with partizan tactics, without money or organization for elections, divided by various interests, and forming opinions and acting without concert and union, their safety, the good, the safety and the preservation of the whole community, required that for the mere purpose of self-defence, they should have in the senate at least a larger representation than the cities. That the constitution should give power of self-defence, commensurate with and equal to protect them against the irregular power of aggression which the cities always have had and always will have over the country. So that the proposition to restrict the cities in their representation in the senate is neither new, monstrous, or tyrannical. It is true that it infringes the captivating abstraction of the universal and perfect equality of all mankind in practical life; and the unalterable destiny, the various, but changeless, exigencies of human society requires this, and will exact it forever.

Some of the existing considerations which call upon the delegates from the interior to guard it against the growing power of the cities have been adverted to by other gentlemen, and have a great and increasing strength.

Kentucky has upwards of 200,000 slaves, worth $80,000,000, or about one fourth of her aggregate wealth. What is it that most threatens this vast amount of property and has most disturbed the owners in its legal and peaceable enjoyment? During years by-gone, before the opposite margin of the Ohio was inhabited, the slaves of Kentucky, in the enjoyment of all the comforts of a laboring population, kindly treated by their owners, mutually attached and trusting, the slave was contented and happy, and the master was unannoyed and secure in the possession of services of this property. But the abolitionist came and seated himself in our neighborhood, and opened an intercourse with our slaves. He instilled in them discontent, dissatisfaction and insubordination; and in all the border counties, the slaves now know no contentment, and the master has no assurance of his property in him. For many years, the great cause of the disturbance between the slave and the owner, in north Kentucky, has been the neighborhood of the free states beyond the Ohio; but the enemy has invaded our own shore, and is now in our midst. I speak not of emancipationists, but of abolitionists; those who abhor slavery and desire to see it terminated by almost any means whatever. These people are amongst us, and they have increased, are increasing, and ought to be diminished. But who make up the emancipation party, that party which seeks to abolish slavery without making compensation to the owner? What portion of them in the whole state are native Kentuckians? Probably three fourths were born in other lands, in the free states of the Union, or of Europe. I have conversed with many natives of the free states, both in and out of Kentucky on this subject, and I never met with one that was not deep and immovable in his feelings against slavery. I do not condemn them for the sentiment, I only state the fact; and it is possible if I had been raised and educated where they were, I might have shared it with them. All the foreigners whose opinions on this subject I have learned, are equally hostile to slavery and its continuance.

These classes of immigrants to Kentucky locate themselves principally on the Ohio and Mississippi rivers, in the cities, or within the narrow strip of country bordering on them, indicated by my friend from Madison (Mr. Turner.) A large proportion of the greatly increasing population of these cities and counties are those immigrants. They are the uncompromising enemies of the rights of the slave interest, and now whilst he has the power and may, will not that master protect himself, by restricting the power of those who are making incessant war upon him by restricting their representation in the senate? The foreign immigrants particularly crowd the cities. In New York, they and their immediate descendants are about half of the whole population; they are a full moiety in Cincinnati, and preponderate considerably in St. Louis. In Louisville, Covington, and Maysville, they are rapidly and greatly increasing. These people, reared in the midst of ignorance and despotism, unacquainted with our institutions and the principles upon which they are founded, opposed to one of our great property interests and the most of them speaking other languages, and having imbibed some wild notions of a superstitious religion, which is revolting to a large majority of our people, they ought not to share equally with the native born citizen political power. It is the poor of Europe generally who immigrate to America, and their vocation mostly is to labor. They are coming in such and vastly increasing numbers, as every year greatly to disturb the existing proportion between the demand and the supply of labor. They become formidable competitors of the native mechanic and laborer in the United States: and when they get into Kentucky, they find negroes to be their most numerous competitors. A slaveholder who has slaves enough for his service will not employ the German or the Irishman; but deprive him of his slaves and he is forced to employ them. The foreigner soon learns this, and consequently in addition to the repugnance of a strange race, and a kind of slavery with which in his own country he had no acquaintance, he acquires the stronger motive of self-interest to prompt him to become an emancipationist—an abolitionist. He generally is such, and in my section of the state he is so known, and is claimed and relied upon by the emancipation party. This position is the natural and inevitable one for him.

Now, I am not as great a friend of the institution of slavery as the gentleman from Simpson, and cannot vote for the amendment which he has indicated. But I am for giving to the owner of a slave an equal, and precisely the same guaranty, for that property, which he has for his land or his cattle. My position is, he ought to have it both by legal and constitutional provisions. The principle that property is not to be taken by the state from its owner, without full compensation, is, I think, just as applicable to slaves as any other description of property. It does not belong to us to pass upon or deprive the owner of slaves of his property, upon any notions or convictions of justice or policy, without a full equivalent; for he has exactly the same title to his slave that he has to any other property which belongs to him.

But time and its fruitful womb, will bring up many other points and occasions of conflict between the cities and the great agricultural districts. There will be competing interests, diversity of object and purpose, adversary opinions and principles. The cities will be the first to become degenerate and corrupt, and to propose to change or to assault popular constitutional institutions. The opponents of this proposition say the people of the cities are now, and ever will be, greatly in the minority, and cannot therefore, wrong or oppress the greater number of the people. Every section of the state is more or less always divided and distracted in itself. When it becomes the interest or passion of the cities to foment and increase these divisions, they could, successfully do it, by the facility with which they could make combinations, and form coalitions with contending factions. They would soon constitute, not only the balance, but, by unity of will, energy of purpose, vigor of action, resources of money and intelligence, there would be great danger of their becoming the positive and controlling power. To prevent this state of things at all, and on all occasions—to postpone it, if not effectually and forever to prevent—it is proposed to limit the representation of the cities in the senate, and to divide it by requiring elections to the house for them, to be made in single districts. We contemplate to make upon them no war, no aggression whatever. We ask no sword to be placed in our hands, to cleave down them or any of their interests; but we only ask a shield to protect us against them, whenever interest, or passion, or fanaticism, shall impel them to assault us. If they should never have such purposes, there will be no harm done; because their power of defence against us will be just as effective by their being fully represented, according to numbers, in the house, as if they were likewise so represented in the senate; and we will have the security and the tranquility of knowing, or at least believing, ourselves to be safe.

The PRESIDENT announced the arrival of the hour for taking up the special order.

Mr. STEVENSON moved that the order of the day—being the consideration, in committee of the whole, of the report of the committee on the legislative department—be dispensed with; and it was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I have said about as much, and indeed more, than I intended to say; and I will not, therefore, detain the convention longer.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have been very much surprised in the progress of this debate, at the very many subjects altogether, as I conceive, unconnected with the question at issue, that are being made to play a prominent part in the discussion. It presents a panorama in which almost all the elements of active and passive being have been strangely and grotesquely grouped together. The debate has gone on accumulating in its progress like a rolling snowball. First, the fat cattle of the grass region are driven into the arena; then comes the marching legions of our valiant volunteers who went to Mexico; then we are delighted with the refreshing prospect of blue grass pastures. The scene shifts; luxuriant tobacco fields present themselves to our view, and

We are asked to regard the institution of slavery in this connection; and last sir, comes upon the stage, the dusty pilgrim from a foreign land, who is seeking to worship at the shrine of our liberty. I confess, I was astonished at the range which this debate has taken. The question, when it first presented itself, was to me, simply, one involving a principle which I had supposed was acknowledged throughout the length and breadth of this country. It was acknowledged at least by Kentucky, when she took the lead on the great question of extending the elective franchise, and placing it upon its true basis. And in what that true basis consists, is at last the only question now legitimately under consideration. I agree in the views of the gentleman from Simpson, that the agitation of the slave question should be prohibited, that some constitutional bulwark should be thrown around this description of property. I think it is right that legislative discretion upon this subject should be restricted, but I am not prepared to say that these two subjects are to be disposed of in connection. Whenever that question shall come up I shall be found voting, I have no doubt, with the gentleman from Simpson. I do not regard the two questions as so connected that you cannot look at the one without looking at the other. In the opening of this debate, I admired the stealthy and cat-like pace with which the gentleman from Franklin, who offered the amendment, traced his devious way through the difficulties which presented themselves to his mind, conceding as he did, numbers to be the true basis of representation, until he arrived at the point, and came to the conclusion, that because equality could not in every instance be attained, therefore convenience was to control. No gentleman who has addressed the convention upon this subject, has denied population to be the true basis of representation. The gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. McHenry,) exhibited a statistical table, by which he showed, and perhaps correctly, that in the political division of the state, it was impossible to produce perfect equality, and he argued that because that equality could not be produced, therefore we were authorized to depart from the principle, on which representation is based, as far as convenience might require. We cannot be moving forward to the accomplishment of our object, keeping that principle in view, if we permit convenience to control us. If we cannot attain it precisely, if we cannot arrive at mathematical equality, may we not approximate to it, and is it not our duty, so long as we acknowledge that the principle should obtain to approximate our action to it, as near as may be. If the principle be right in itself, are we pursuing that principle unless we do thus approximate to it.

A distinction has been attempted to be drawn between the senate and house of representatives. According to the existing constitution, according to the report of the committee, and according as I conceive to the principles of propriety, the members of the senate are just as much the representatives of the people as are the members of the lower house. What is the difference. One branch is elected for a longer period of time, and has a larger constituency, but both of them are elected by the people. They are both then the representatives of the people, and I do not perceive how any distinction can be made upon this point. The senators are of greater age, and they hold their office for a longer period of time. If it was intended that the senate should act as a check upon the other branch of the legislature, that check is to be found in their more advanced age, in the greater length of their official term, and in the larger constituency whom they represent. Gentlemen have attempted to assimilate the senate of Kentucky to the senate of the United States, and have drawn an argument from the constitution of that body, justifying a departure from the great principle for which those who advocate the report, have contended. Why the United States government is a great confederation of states. The United States senators do not represent the people, but the states in their sovereign character. The house of representatives is the popular branch of the national legislature. Hence then, the little state of Rhode Island is entitled to as large a representation in the senate of the United States, as the great state of New York; because as sovereign states, they stand on a perfect equality. It will not be pretended, that the counties of this state sustain a similar relation to one another. How then can any argument be drawn from the constitution of the senate of the United States, to influence our action here? If population is not to be the basis of representation why something else must be. Is it to be wealth? If it is to be wealth, why those who possess that wealth, should have the exclusive privilege of wielding the political power which it bestows, and you create a political inequality altogether foreign to our institutions. Is it to be territory? If it is, why then the state should be divided into equal sections, without regard to population. If it is to be neither wealth, nor territory, nor a mixture of wealth, territory and population, what is it to be then? Will you place it upon the loose basis of convenience? Will you say that without regard to numbers, to wealth, or to territory, this body assuming that a certain arbitrary mode of action is convenient, may here lay down a rule for the government, not only of the generation in which we live, but of posterity? Why, no matter how disregarding of individual right the rules may have been which have heretofore governed in instances of this kind, these rules have been extended to the whole country. Individuals and classes have been disfranchised, but it yet remains for an American constitution to disfranchise regions. Where it has been determined that wealth should rule—why, wealth from one end to the other of the country is the great principle upon which representation is predicated. If it has been determined that population should govern—why then, from one end of the country to the other, has population been the basis. But is that the position assumed here? No; one rule is made to apply to one section of the country, and a different rule is made to apply to another.

It has been said here that there were certain restrictions placed on individuals by all governments, and an argument has been attempted to be adduced from this in favor of the restriction under consideration. For example, that twenty one years had been determined as the period of discretion, and that no one should exercise the elective franchise, until that period of life had been attained. It is true, sir, but when the rule is once established it is made to apply to all the citizens of the country. Here is a rule designed to be framed which is partial in its application, or rather which has a double application. One for the country and one for the town—a rule for a population existing at one point, and another and a different rule for a population existing at another point. You might as well—if you say that he who lives in the city shall not have the same right as he who lives in the country—declare that the man who lives in a cottage shall not have the same rights as the man who lives in a palace. Perhaps convenience might require such a rule as that, but principle can never sanction it. What does it all result in, and from what does this movement originate? Would it not appear to be an effort on the part of those now in a majority, who labor under an apprehension that they may, at some future time, become the minority, to fasten down upon the country a rule which shall give them when they do become that minority, a power to control the majority? I cannot imagine that gentlemen will get up here, and gravely say that this region of country which lies along the Ohio river, could ever attain the ascendancy in the councils of the country, until it had attained a superiority in point of population. Would it not be to stultify the residue of the state? How is it until this majority is attained to control the councils of the country? It has been said that Paris controls France, that because its population is compressed together in a small space it acts with more unanimity and promptitude. Paris does, perhaps, control France, not from any peculiar privileges which have been given to it, but from the existence and exercise of a moral force, independent of legislation—the intelligence of the city and the ignorance of the country contribute much to this result. This is scarcely true of Kentucky. And if it be true that the denizens of cities from their intellect and their energy have the power to overrule those who dwell in the rural districts, it will be equally true, whether you give or withhold political power. If such be the fact, they will compass by the force of mind what your sense of justice does not vouchsafe to them. But I am not one of those who apprehend that such a state of things can ever come about. Intelligence is too generally diffused throughout the country. Besides Louisville is an inland town, situated, it is true, on a large and navigable stream, but what is the scope of its trade, what the limit of its commercial destiny? It is cut off by St. Louis, by Chicago, and by Cincinnati. It is, perhaps to some extent cut off by some of the southern cities; for aught I know by Nashville. With this scope only and with so many rivals continually springing up, has Louisville the prospect of ever attaining one fifth the size of Paris or London? Whilst I wish her all success, I am not prepared to believe that she is to become an overgrown monster, that shall swallow up the residue of the state. Besides there are evidences now that Louisville is not to be the only city of Kentucky. Covington is fast treading upon her heels, and she has now a population as great as had Louisville when I first knew it, and it is increasing in a ratio greater it is said than the increase of Louisville. It is reasonable to suppose from its proximity to Cincinnati, from its situation on the Ohio river, and from its having almost equal advantages with Louisville as it respects back country, that it will at an early day very nearly approximate to Louisville in point of size. The interest of these cities that are springing up on the Ohio, will not be identical, nor will the population be homogenous. How then is this city interest to array itself against the whole of the rest of the state? Each will have its own interest, and there will be, perhaps, as much antagonism among these cities as the diversity of interests in various parts of the state may present. These very antagonistical interests would defeat any effort to compass political power, and should overcome the apprehension which exists in the minds of gentlemen who would be led to depart from a great principle for the purpose of accomplishing what they regard as necessary for self defence. Suppose that the northern part of the country looking to the increasing population of the southern region, and to the fact that there is a vast area of territory there which is yet to be populated—and the period is approaching when the population of that region of country will be greater than that of the northern part of the state—I say, suppose that the northern part of Kentucky having the predominance in political power were to look to that region of country, and say we regard it as necessary to our interests, as in fact necessary for our self defence, that the power which as a majority we now have, should be secured to us when we become a minority, by putting restrictions on the southern region, which may overpower us, when the time rolls around and population has accumulated at that point? I ask you if it is not as inevitable as any thing in the course of human events, that such a result will occur, that the predominance of population will be in the south—that the pastoral must yield to the grain and tobacco growing region? And would it not be equally as just on the part of northern Kentucky to place restrictions around southern Kentucky, as for us to attempt now to restrict the citizens of Kentucky who reside in towns which have grown or may grow into importance? Is there any thing in the present constitution that warrants this thing, apart from the distortions that construction has produced in it? Was there in the cry for reform that went up throughout the length and breadth of this state one syllable uttered, declaring that Louisville was likely to attain such an influential magnitude as to overshadow the rest of the state, and that therefore the convention about to be called should devise some plan even if principle had to be sacrificed, to check the onward march of this city to overshadowing political influence. There was not a word, so far as I heard, on this subject—not a single cry from the stump, not a warning from the press. And when she comes up here and demands to be represented according to her numbers, upon principles of justice, and asks no more than is conceded to other portions of the state, because her population happens to dwell within smaller limits, and is compressed in a smaller space, forsooth we are told that an overshadowing influence is to rise up there which will control the councils of the country? Now if numbers is the true basis of representation, if population congregates at that point, so as to create numerical ascendancy, it is but just and right that she should have a corresponding influence. If you say that it is not just and right, then you say that the few should rule the many, and that political power should be wielded by the minority. I have heard no argument to show that until the cities and towns did attain the majority or acquire a numerical superiority, they could control the councils of the country. Is there any delegate who comes from a rural district, on this floor, who is willing so far to stultify his constituents as to say that although inferiority of numbers may exist, they are to acquire by their superior intelligence, power that does not belong to their numbers.

From my position, and the position of my constituency, I have no individual, no personal interest, nor have they in this question. I have come here for the purpose of doing justice, as I conceive, and for the purpose of aiding in forming a constitution that shall proclaim correct principles. My constituents, although they border on the Ohio river, have none of the elements of that overshadowing power which has excited the apprehensions of gentlemen here. Nor does the county which I have the honor to represent, cherish in her bosom those elements of discord which it was supposed at some time or other would fearfully agitate this state, and be the means of wresting from the rural districts their rights—of overturning the institution of slavery, and of depriving the citizen of his property. I represent a county where more than three fourths of the people are pro-slavery, ultra pro-slavery men. They stop not where many gentlemen here stops—they bide not with the gentleman from Madison, who is disposed to fasten down the law of 1833 on the county, but they go for giving the fullest and the most unrestrained power compatible with humanity to the citizen on this subject. They go for constitutional provision against legislative discretion. They go for creating the strongest and highest constitutional bulwarks to protect this description of property, and they have sent me here to advocate these measures and principles, and I have in my poor and feeble way endeavored to do it. I look along the Ohio river and I do not see those who dwell on its banks, who are within that ten miles of territory, that has here been denounced as entertaining views and principles dangerous to the residue of the state. I say, that in casting my eye over that territory, I do not perceive the evidences of the existence of a spirit among its inhabitants which threatens the institution of slavery. I do not see that generally along the banks of the Ohio the citizens are less favorable to the preservation of this institution than are those who dwell in the interior. The returns to this convention show no such state of case.

And while I recollect, I will say to the convention that I felt gratified when the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) explained his remarks in regard to the Louisville legion, and by that explanation removed all imputation which had seemed to be cast upon the prowess of those brave men who went out from Louisville.

There was a company in that legion who were from my own county, and a braver one never marched to the battle field. There was not a man in that company, of whom the Spartan mother, who gave the shield to her son when he went forth to battle and said to him, "return with it or upon it," might not have been proud.

I have, in a very desultory way, and indeed without intending to make a speech on this subject, given my views. I believed it necessary that I should do so from my proximity to Louisville, and from the position I occupy in regard to the slave question. I believed it proper that I should protest against the connection attempted to be established between emancipation and the advocacy of the correct principle of representation. Having done thus much in the remarks submitted by me, I have accomplished, by defining my own position and that of my constituency, all that I proposed to myself.

On motion of Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE, the convention took a recess until 3 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The PRESIDENT stated the question to be on the motion of the gentleman from Christian, to refer his resolution to the committee of the whole, and that it be printed.

Mr. GARRARD was satisfied that a majority of the convention were ready to vote on that motion, and therefore he moved the previous question.

The PRESIDENT said as no gentleman appeared desirous to discuss the subject further, if there were no objection he would put the question on the motion to refer.

The motion to print and refer was agreed to.

THE LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention then resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. MERIWETHER in the chair, on the report of the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE expressed his approval of the resolution offered this morning by the gentleman from Christian, and suggested that it would be gratifying to him to have it offered as an amendment to the section under consideration, if such a motion were now in order.

Mr. CLARKE claimed that an amendment which he submitted yesterday was pending as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, and hence that a further amendment was not in order.

A long conversation ensued on the question of priority.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin had precedence, on the ground that the amendment of the gentleman from Simpson being to strike out the friends of the portion proposed to be stricken out had a right to perfect it before the vote could be taken upon striking out.

Mr. LINDSEY. Mr. Chairman: As remarked heretofore the proposition made by myself to strike out the words as now amended, "in either house of the general assembly," was not made for the purpose of levelling any feeling entertained by me against Louisville, for I have none but the best towards her. In her prosperity and advancement I feel as much pride and as lively an interest as I can entertain for the town in which I reside. Towards Covington and Newport, and their growing strength and greatness, I look with pride, as they are situated in what constituted the old county of Campbell, within whose borders I was born and reared. With these feelings, that make me wish not only that Louisville shall be great, but that she may yet even outstrip her rival, the "Great Queen of the West," I could but regret to hear imputations such as the presiding officer has cast upon my proposition, its mover, and those who advocate it. He was pleased to say that if the committee adopt my proposition it would be taking from the city of Louisville a right, and be violating a principle that would prompt him to withhold his signature from any constitution we may adopt. This would certainly produce on my part much regret; such regret as can only be consoled by the fact that there will be enough of us left to give force and effect to our labors without his aid.

It was going far, very far, to say, as he did, that any one who would vote to strike out would misrepresent his own sentiments, violate a sacred principle, and need but the opportunity to violate any other high principle, if the temptation were presented in suitable form. To this I will make no other reply than must silently be given by every member to such an imputation. I will not again allude to such remarks. Re-erimination will not prove me right, and I am sure, whether right or wrong, nothing is to be attained by mere empty declamation or wild denunciation.

Sir, I ask, if my proposition prevails, does it take from Louisville, (the only example we can use, as no other city or town has separate representation,) any privilege, right, or power she now enjoys? It does not, as it will leave the section precisely as it is in the present constitution. She will have full representation, based on population and numbers, in the lower branch of the legislature, and representation in the senate, as she has heretofore had, with the balance of Jefferson county. It is not then taking from her that which she has and now enjoys, but the effect is to be to withhold additional representative power in the senate, which her delegates demand for her as matter of right, as well as for all other cities and towns that may hereafter attain sufficient numerical strength in population.

Let us examine for a moment this demand of right—this command of our presiding officer, which we must obey at such heavy perils. I beg pardon sir, I did not mean again to allude to what has passed. This right is based on the proposition—the abstract proposition—that voting population alone shall constitute the basis of representation in both houses of the general assembly. This principle, like all elementary principles, reads beautifully to the ear. It is like its kindred one that all men are equal, and entitled to equal rights, personal, social, civil, and political—principles that are violated, if that is the word to be used, at every step we have advanced in framing this constitution.

Sir, one of the first lessons I learned in the science of government—a science which I do not pretend to know much about—was, that government itself is a concession of rights that men possess in a state of nature, when they form themselves into political condition, to be governed and ruled. It is a mere compact or agreement into which we enter, in which every one that comes has equal voice and equal rights. This concession is made for the common weal.

It is true sir that there are principles to be applied that ought not to be lost sight of at every step we take, but they must have their arrangement in reference to other principles equally as potent and necessary to be preserved.

When we say, as we have said, that no citizen shall be judge of certain courts until he has first served an apprenticeship as a practicing lawyer, we entrench upon the principle that all shall have equal rights. When we make tests of qualification, as we have done, that exclude the largest numbers from receiving the office of clerk at the election of the people, we show again an exception to the rule—a violation of the principle of equality, if you please. When you provide that it shall require two thirds of your legislature to pass or repeal certain acts, you depart from the general principle that majorities shall govern. The speech of the honorable delegate from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis,) was replete with the exceptions that imperious necessity compels us to make on general principles at every step we take in making a constitution for the state. But I will not pursue the ground which he has so well and so ably occupied.

These departures sir, arise from the imperfections in all human affairs. They apply to governments as well as to individuals, and the great desideratum is not whether this or that is a departure from principle, general, abstract principle, but what is best under the given state of the case, to be provided for, and what will give the greatest equality, all interests weighed and considered, and do the least harm to general principle, admitted to be right, and the greatest amount of good to the greatest number.

Sir, in this view we are to apply the principle of representation, not to population or numbers only, but to population with reference to territory, as demarked and bounded by internal existing state arrangements into counties, cities and towns. The general municipal arrangement is into counties, on which the machinery of internal regulation is made to depend. Courts for the dispensing of justice, and for the punishment of wrongs are arranged with a view to this general rule. The separation of cities and towns into separate organizations or courts and police purposes is a departure from the general plan. It is right enough in itself, but it certainly gives to the people thus thrown together in large numbers within a small space, advantages which are not possessed by those distributed over counties. For example, the Louisville chancery court, established, or continued if you will, by the constitution we are making, will illustrate my idea. By that court an advantage is given to the citizens of Louisville, and all those who sue there, whether resident in the city or not, in the opportunities which it affords of obtaining decrees to establish their rights—decrees attainable in perhaps sixty days that could no where else, on the chancery side of any circuit court for a county, be accomplished in eighteen months or two years. Of this I make no complaint. It is right. It is necessary; and consequently the exception works no wrong; at least not such a wrong as would subject it to the imputation of violating principle. So sir, in relation to the incorporation of monied institutions and companies for all other purposes. These exceptions sir, are made in giving exclusive privileges and in exemptions that are not sustainable except on the ground of convenience and necessity.

But sir, let us examine the proposition, that representation shall be based on population alone. Do gentlemen expect or intend to break up county, city, and town organizations, and make new divisions solely that representation may be varied as population shall diminish or increase? If so, they have but to convince me that they will not produce greater inconvenience to the people by increased expense and additional government machinery than any inequality of representation, when territorial arrangement is taken into account, and I am with them heart and soul; for I can see that equality can be obtained by this new way more perfectly than any other.

Would the delegates from Louisville and Jefferson county agree to risk the being divided for voting purposes, for representation with portions of people living in contiguous counties? I put it to honorable delegates, whether their people would take the inconvenience and expense of this new plan to attain equality in representation, or not rather do as I contend we should all do here and elsewhere, yield even much more than we desire to do.

I cannot conceive any other mode than that which I have just suggested by which the much lauded principle is to be preserved inviolate.

Mr. Chairman, it is too obvious to require further remark, that as much as we all desire equality in representation, and representation by population, we cannot, in reference to existing arrangements, attain that end. We must look to territorial arrangement as well as to population; and when we do this, we are also to look to the interests of the classes, agricultural, commercial, and manufacturing, and to counties large and small. All must be represented and fairly represented, if we can so have it; and we must look to the proper exercise of county influence in legislation, so as to preserve, as near as may be, the voice of these several municipalities, if I may so call them, and let not one, or a few, overshadow the rest. The regulation of these matters is perplexing, I admit; but yet, we must attempt, and should approach it with no view to perpetrate wrong on any point, looking only to the high object of fairness and equality, both as to numbers, and as to political power and influence.

I have taken upon myself, sir, to present, in tabular form, the effect of representation on the several larger counties in the state, after the rules reported in the next section of the report of the committee.

40 counties, -	-	45 82,115

It will be seen that 40 counties will have a representation of 45 members in the lower branch of the legislature, with a voting population of 82,115 in the aggregate. Arranging them under the rule given, so that counties sending six representatives may show their aggregate voting strength, it will be seen the loss the counties having no city representation will sustain. The difference may be easily tested by subtracting the number of voters in Jefferson from the number in counties arranged to have the same representation Jefferson would get on any assumed ratio.

To illustrate it, assume the auditor's report of white males as the voters, and 1500 as the ratio. All counties having this number, and less than two thirds more, will get one representative. All having the ratio and two thirds over, will have two representatives. All the counties having two thirds the ratio, to have one representative, &c.

Now, the counties in the table first named, for six representatives have an aggregate voting population of	9,796
Jefferson county would have six representatives on an aggregate voting population of	9,283

The counties, five in number, lose 513 votes, while Jefferson only loses 283. The other counties can be examined in the same way and by the same rule, and it will be found that 40 counties, and those of the largest out of the 100 in the state, are compelled to yield up a large voting influence in order to yield to the counties having less than the ratio, something like a fair amount of influence and power in legislation. The use of residuums to consume representatives not apportioned, will make a slight change in the aggregate votes lost by the large counties, but still will leave great inequality. On these tables every one of the 45 members, represent 1824 voters, instead of 1500, the ratio assumed, and still leave a fraction, while the members from Jefferson would represent each 1531 voters. By an examination of the auditor's report, it will be seen, on the basis I have assumed, that there will be 33 counties having two thirds the ratio, and 26 less than two thirds. Suppose the 45 larger counties should say to the smaller ones, the principle of representation according to population, is the rule. Why then, should you ask us to let you into the legislature? Is it our fault you lack the number of voters? But, sir, these counties must be represented, and to effect it we must bend the rule. Is it not right and proper? Indeed, is it not approximating equality of representation in its true sense, when applied to population, territorial arrangement, and county organization, that it should be so? Yet, sir, while the delegates from all these counties are thus willing to yield, to some extent, their popular strength to give equality in legislation amongst the smaller counties, and the delegates from Louisville will stand by and vote it fair and right, when she is asked to abate a little the high claims she demands, and that too, not in the popular branch of the legislature, but the senate. The only reply is, in us there must be no yielding, for the pure, and only principle of representation, that of numbers, which we can apply to our people, works beautifully to our advantage and political strength, and will so work to the advantage of other cities and towns as they grow up. They know, sir, on any ratio of representation, while they vote together in their city in any aggregate number, they can have but small loss, and never, on the committee's rule of apportioning, more than a fraction less than two thirds the ratio. She may, as given in the example, in her population of 9,283, lose but 283 excess over the exact ratio, while my county of Franklin, for example, must lose 524; some other counties more, some others less. These losses, as I have remarked, in force of numbers, have to be made in order to approximate towards fairness amongst the smaller counties, and give them something like proper influence.

Cannot Louisville spare something from her force of numbers in arranging representation as an equivalent for the advantages she possesses in separate city organization. The extra courts given her, and the command of the great monied influences of the state, and the small loss she can ever sustain in the popular branch. Is there injustice in neutralizing the power her representative will have over the same number, coming from different counties covering large territories, with scattered population, they coming under the control and influence of one will, and armed, as they must be, by the power that numbers give, having but one end to attain.

The honorable delegate from Louisville (Mr. Preston,) referred to the constitutions of Massachusetts, New York and Louisiana, to show that those states allowed to their cities senatorial representation, and proceeded on the principle that population alone should be the basis of representation.

By turning to the constitution of the first state named, we find the following article under the head of house of representatives.

"ARTICLE 1. There shall be in the legislature of this commonwealth, a representation of the people annually elected and founded on the principle of equality."

Here you see Mr. Chairman, the principle is equality. But let us see what that equality is.

"ARTICLE 2. And in order to provide for a representation of the citizens of this commonwealth, founded on the principles of equality, every corporate town containing one hundred and fifty rateable polls may elect one representative; every corporate town containing three hundred and seventy five rateable polls, may elect two representatives. Every corporate town containing six hundred rateable polls may elect three representatives, and proceeding in that manner, making two hundred and twenty five rateable polls the mean increasing number for every additional representative."

You see sir, what is regarded in Massachusetts as equality in representation. They provide against the power that large places possess over small ones by requiring for every additional representative, an increased number of polls over the basis fixed for one. It will be seen that the same constitution in providing for senators, directs that senatorial districts shall be arranged with reference to the proportion of public taxes paid by the district, "and no district shall be so large as to entitle it to more than six senators." This you see sir is another mode of attaining equality in representation not by numbers solely but in reference to a "due proportion of public taxes," and a limit to senatorial influence. Turn to the latest constitution of New York, and you there find that senatorial arrangement is not made exclusively on population. But the language is, the districts are to contain as near as may be an equal number of inhabitants, but this is to have reference to "convenient and contiguous territory" and "no assembly district is to be divided in the formation of a senate district."

And in arranging for assembly districts, the constitution is as follows:

"Each assembly district shall contain as near as may be an equal number of inhabitants excluding aliens and persons of color not taxed, and shall consist of convenient and contiguous territory; but no town shall be divided in the formation of assembly districts."

As a matter of course; if no town is to be divided in forming assembly districts, and no assembly district is to be divided in the formation of senatorial districts, the argument drawn from the example of New York is wholly destroyed. It only proves that in giving the city of New York senators, they have made an exception to their rule as applicable to their towns. But my point established by these examples is that territory and municipal organization are regarded, and necessary to be regarded, in representation as well as population.

But sir, the delegate from my old county, (Campbell,) has been pleased to refer to the breaking out of the revolution, and places the whole action of our fathers in causing a separation from the mother country, on the ground that they were taxed without being represented.— This, he says, caused the Bostonians to "heave the tea overboard in their harbor." Well I hope because I have had the rashness to advocate restriction to some extent on senatorial representation by cities and towns, that my old mother Newport, now represented by the gentleman, will not "heave" me overboard, for I can assure her as well as my friend, that I am not for taxation without representation. The effect of my motion, if carried, will not be to put any restriction on the taxing representation of Louisville, for let her population be what it may, the effect of my motion will not, in the least, lessen her representation in the lower branch of the general assembly; and consequently, as taxation originates in the house of representatives alone, taxation and representation go together in the fullest extent. There is, in my judgment, nothing in the argument of the gentleman from Campbell, nor any violation of the principle that taxation and representation should go together.

Mr. Chairman: For what purpose, let me ask, did the framers of our old constitution divide the law-making power into two departments? Was the senatorial branch framed with reference to taxation or immediate popular representation? My understanding is, no such design was intended. On the contrary, it was to be a check upon the popular branch. The very fact that counties were not to be divided for senatorial representation, shows they regarded the principle for which I contend, as necessary in the due regulation of the checks and balances of power in the government. The illustration of the principle and its operations upon the powers of the government of the United States, and the protection given the states by the regulation of the senate and house of representatives in congress, so graphically given by the gentleman from Bourbon, I commend to the calm consideration of delegates.

Mr. Chairman: The old constitution in providing for senatorial representation wisely looked to the fact that every senator representing several counties, or a city and county, would almost, in the very nature of things, represent divided or opposite interests so far as local matters were concerned, and would necessarily be less under the direct action of the popular will of one place having but one interest to subserve; and consequently every senator having the opposing interests to reconcile and protect would necessarily be less liable to go beyond the proper point in legislation. I look to the senate sir, as the great balance power of the state, as the check upon the hasty action of the more popular branch of the general assembly, and our fathers so regarded it in its creation.

What, sir, would be the condition of a senator from a city or town? He would represent but a single interest, and have the same impulses and feelings in common with the representatives from his city or town in the lower branch of the legislature. He, sir, would have no opposite interests to be reconciled—no imposing powers to impel him to a middle and safe ground on any proposition his immediate constituents might demand. For all practical purposes, he might as well be in the house of representatives as in the senate.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Do I understand the gentleman to state that senatorial representation ought not to be on numbers, but on territory?

Mr. LINDSEY. I am asked by the honorable delegate from Nelson, if I would regulate senatorial districts exclusively by territory. My response is, I would not. But, sir, I ask him the question, if he would regulate it exclusively by population? Will he disregard territorial or county arrangement, either in fixing senatorial representation, or representation in the lower branch of the legislature? No one has advanced the proposition, sir, that county arrangement is to be abandoned. Then, sir, the principle is, in apportioning for representation in the lower branch, we are to look to population as it is in county arrangements, and concessions are to be made and given, arising out of the inequality of voters in the several counties, that all may have a share in general legislation, and sufficient local protection. In senatorial arrangement, I am for districting with reference to county arrangement, so that the people of no county shall be divided in voting for senators. These districts are required by the present constitution, to contain as near as may be, an equal voting population, but that no county shall be divided even to attain that equality. Sir, is there any more injustice that a city or town shall yield to the policy of the division suggested, because she has, from locality and pursuits, the means of commanding larger population, and may have to yield a little more in numbers to a safe rule, than some of the counties? The large counties, as I have endeavored to show, yield to cities and towns, by giving separate representation in the popular branch to its fullest extent, and with the loss of less in popular numbers than they lose in any rule of apportionment. I am for protecting the counties against the advantage thus had by cities and towns. But a much higher and more important principle is attained, of making senators what they should be and what they must be, to preserve the proper checks and balances in the legislative department of government.

Allusion has been made to the population now filling up our borders, and the power they will in time exert upon the existing domestic institutions of the state. This fact is not and cannot be overlooked; but I have not sir, in the views I have presented, looked to this interest alone. There are others, high and important, to be guarded. I am, sir, for guarding all the interests of our people, and by the regulation of representative power and influence, so to provide that the concentration of intelligence, of wealth, of commercial and manufacturing influence in cities and towns, shall not have an undue control over the interests of the counties and their agricultur-ral interests,—that all our people, let their pursuits be what they may, and all their interests, may be duly guarded and preserved. In other words, that the several interests shall yield to each other in the distribution of power in the state, that no one of them shall have the strength, if they should ever have the will, to overpower or do violence to the others.

If I am wrong in my views, let me beg delegates to do me the justice to believe, that no jealousies against Louisville, Covington, or Newport, have prompted me to my course. All the interests of relationship and property I have, or nearly all, are in the first and the last place, and in the county I represent.

Mr. GARRARD. The gentleman from Franklin has thought proper to make out tables of statistics to be used here in debate, and I think it is my duty to correct some of the statements he has made. He first says the county of Jefferson has 9,231 voters, and has six representatives. The gentleman has made the number of voters less than they are in fact, by about 513. His second table denies the county of Christian a second member to which she is entitled, and which would give seven members instead of six, as the gentleman has it, with an average of 1,711 voters to one member. The third table denies to Fleming the second member, to which she is entitled by the sixth section of the report of the legislative committee, with an average of 1,538 voters to one member. The fourth table gives Hardin but one member, when she is entitled to two, with an average of 1,616 to a member. The fifth table is the only one in which there is a loss to the counties worthy of notice. The sixth table has fifty two voters less than the county of Jefferson, and is not therefore liable to the objection made by the gentleman. The seventh table has 12,011 voters. The gentleman from Franklin allows six members, when this list of counties is entitled to eight members, which makes an average of 1,501 voters to a member. The counties of Shelby and Pulaski have each one member in this table, while they are entitled to two each. I hope the gentleman will take this and work it out by the rule of three; for if he is as much wrong in his other statements as he is in these statistics, what he has said in reference to apportionment is entitled to little confidence.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman has taken an extreme case. Where they have a small fraction, more than enough for one representative, that is contributed to the smaller counties, and however large the fraction may be, they will be entitled to but one until they have the full number to entitle them to two. That is not enough, says the gentleman. I will take into consideration the declaration that I made, and I beg every gentleman to take into consideration that if his county is deprived of a fair and equal representation, with what face can he meet the people of his county when he goes back?

The CHAIRMAN proceeded to put the question on the amendment.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said it would be well that the amendment should be properly understood; those therefore who were against giving senators to cities would vote to strike out, and those who were in favor of senatorial representation of cities would vote against the amendment.

Mr. MACHEN did not so understand it; but that they might have time for reflection, he moved that the committee rise and report progress.

The committee accordingly rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 14, 1849.

SENATORIAL DISTRICTS.

Mr. WOODSON. I beg, sir, to offer the following resolution, and I move that it be referred to the committee of the whole and printed:

Resolved, That there shall never be more than thirty-seven senators in Kentucky, and that the legislature shall only regard counties in the apportionment of senatorial representation. That the counties shall all lie contiguous, out of which a senatorial district is formed; and that, as near as may be, each district shall consist of an equal number of counties.

Mr. President: In presenting the resolution just read, I am actuated by a high sense of duty towards those immediately represented by me in this convention—as well as by a thorough conviction on my part that the mountain counties, in the midst of which I have the honor to live, are all to be strengthened in the councils of the state by its adoption—and notwithstanding the arguments that I may offer in its support, to some extent, may be characterized by selfishness, yet, in this peculiarly selfish age, I hope that I shall be pardoned by all who have used now, or at other times, or upon other occasions, equally culpable arguments; and if so, perhaps I shall not be punished for the want of guiltless agents to enforce the sentence.

I had thought, Mr. President, until the present discussion commenced, that representation in Kentucky, under all circumstances, according to numbers, would be conceded by all—that no one would be willing to make invidious distinctions in the political rights of the freemen of this commonwealth living in different portions of the state—I frankly confess that I was wholly mistaken; and I feel sure, sir, that numbers ought to have little, if any thing at all, to do with senatorial representation at least—how far interest and the ingenious arguments of gentlemen have had a tendency to bring my mind to this conclusion, I will not pretend to say, knowing,

"That if self the wavering balance shake,
Its rarely right adjusted."

One thing I do know, though, and that is, if numbers do not control us in allotting representation, that territory must. And I know equally well that my region of country is to have its political importance greatly enhanced by the adoption of the latter principle—to what extent the advantage we may thus acquire is to be at the expense of justice, and to the injury of numbers, I leave to others to determine. It is not meet that I should present the solution of the problem. I will have the candor to avow, however, that if the principles asserted in the resolution prevail, several of the senatorial districts of the state will not reach over two thousand voters, and will not contain exceeding two millions of property, whilst others will reach ten or twelve thousand voters and possess within them from thirty to fifty millions of taxable property. But I submit it to you, Mr. President, to the delegates upon this floor, and to the world, if the apparent injustice inflicted upon numbers and property, is not amply atoned for by the injustice that a different principle would inflict upon territory?

Do not understand me, though, sir, as intimating the bare idea that there would be the slightest justice in taking property into consideration in apportioning representation among freemen. Such a thought, so diametrically opposed to the spirit of equal liberty, and so little in keeping with the theory and genius of our institutions, has no favor with me. And I would be one of the last men who would willingly see the great principle of numbers disregarded in the distribution of political rights among the people. Yet, if this great, and, as I had hoped, sacred principle is to be invaded, (and I regard the proposition of the delegate from Franklin (Mr. Lindsey) as a direct invasion of it,) I desire to insure to those I represent all the good I can therefrom.

With this view, I have offered the resolution just read; and I shall not permit myself to doubt but that every delegate upon this floor, who disregards the standard of numbers, will give it a cordial support.

Gentlemen tell us that counties should be confederated in apportioning senatorial representation, in imitation of the constitution of the national government in the formation of the federal senate. We are told that the little state of Delaware has as much power in the senate of the United States as New York—and so she has. Upon the same principle let me ask, why shall not Harlan county, with her seven hundred free white citizens, have equal power in the senate of Kentucky with Jefferson, with her nine thousand citizens?

I desire gentlemen to look at these things in their true light; and if, upon due reflection, it shall be thought advisable to give one man in either county I represent as much political power as a dozen in Louisville, I shall be truly grateful, and shall return my most unfeigned thanks to the convention for so signal a favor. I move you, sir, as I do not wish to discuss the principles involved in the resolution, that it be printed and referred to the committee of the whole.

The motion to refer and print was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention resolved itself into committee of the whole. Mr. MERIWETHER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the legislative department.

The CHAIRMAN announced that the gentleman from Caldwell was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MACHEN. Sir, when I made the motion yesterday that the committee rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again, it was not with the intention of addressing the house on the question as it has been presented to us. I do not design doing so now. I then thought it better that we should adjourn and take time for reflection, and I now think that the house is as well prepared to vote on this question as it will be, if we discuss it to the end of the week. I shall, however, take occasion to present my views on the main proposition, at what I shall consider a suitable time.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I ask a few moments of the committee, while I consider some of the arguments which have been presented by the advocates of the present motion, and which at first, I must confess, had upon my mind, considerable influence, until I examined, and traced them to their ultimate consequences. I am now free to acknowledge, that I came to this hall strongly impressed with the necessity, or rather the policy, if it could be done consistently with the preservation of the great principles upon which our government is based, of throwing around, what has been termed in this debate, the urban or city representation, something of security against the dangers of its concentrated and united action. I do not look upon such a necessity, arising from the institution of slavery in this country. I have regarded it as more necessary, in reference to some of our other domestic measures of legislation, unconnected with that interest. But sir, I have not brought my own mind to the conclusion, that I could adopt a practical plan, by which the evil, which has been contemplated, or imagined in argument, may be remedied without doing violence, as I have remarked, to the great principle upon which this government must stand, and must be maintained, that is, equality of representation, according to population or numbers! I have listened with intense anxiety, and I have read with care, the arguments so far as published upon this question, to see whether there did, or could, exist in our commonwealth, the necessity for exercising this restrictive power, under the plea of self preservation or self protection, against the possible danger of city representation. I confess that the proposition of the gentleman from Christian has furnished, to my mind, the only legitimate antidote for any supposed evil growing out of a consolidated representation of cities or masses, that is, election by districts, in both houses of the general assembly, according to numbers. This regulation of the right of equal representation, according to population, does no violence to the principle, and whilst it secures the enjoyment of the inestimable privilege of equality to all in the law making power, gives security to the commonwealth against the possible dangers of congregated communities. It is by the adoption of the conservative principle of the amendment of my friend from Christian, (Mr. Morris,) that our sister states have preserved the principle of equal representation to their cities, and, at the same time, protected the commonwealth against all possible danger of consolidated representation. I shall give that amendment my support, and extend to all portions of our commonwealth the same equality of political right.

What is the argument for the amendment by which cities are to be deprived of a separate and equal representation in the senate? It is an apprehension, that we shall have built up in our border counties, on the banks of the Ohio river, large, populous, and powerful cities, filled with a population, whose interests and feelings will be hostile to the general interests and prosperity of the commonwealth. Sir, I am one of those who have never given to the only city (Louisville,) at which this amendment is aimed, in my imagination, that future magnitude, power and population, which some have assigned to her. She is destined to be limited by the population and business of our own state. She is surrounded by too many rival, commercial and manufacturing cities at present, to threaten by her numbers, any thing of danger to the interests of the commonwealth. Her increase in the last twenty years has been rapid, I admit. But the springing up of other towns around her, the establishment of other commercial points in her neighborhood, have as certainly fixed her limits of numbers and power within the control of all future legislative assemblies that may be convened under the new constitution, as any thing can be fixed, in reference to population, commerce and trade. I rose, Mr. Chairman, more for the purpose of considering some of the arguments which have been urged upon us, why we should adopt this measure, than to present arguments, in support of the principle of equal representation. The argument to prove that the amendment is in violation of one of the great principles upon which this government is based, has been fully exhausted, by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate. Let us see if there is any thing in the reason assigned by gentlemen, who admit the justice of the principle, why we should depart from it in the formation of our constitution. I listened to my friend from Madison, and those who succeeded him on that side, and I think he has presented the whole argument in one single sentence, though it has been amplified by others. The argument sir, is in these words:

"But what is more important, increasing in the way I have described, they will, as soon as they attain a majority here, attempt to decide whether we shall keep a certain portion of our property or not. Now, I have not changed my opinion, as expressed some weeks since, that it is better not to bring more of this property here, for this was one of the objections I have long entertained to investing more capital in slave property. I believe it is against our interest to increase that property, because I have apprehended the danger I have alluded to, and because I believe that if we do not adopt some basis of representation that will secure the power of the commonwealth to the great agricultural interest, the institution will go down."

The argument is, that unless we do something by way of restraining a certain portion of the qualified voters of this commonwealth—a certain portion of the freemen of this state—a majority may be returned to the halls of legislation, tainted with the sentiments that are denounced here, and will endanger the security of the property of the citizens of the commonwealth; and hence, that we should guard against it, while we are forming our present organic law.

That argument might be worth more than I think it is, if it be the design of this convention to leave that description of property at the will and mercy, and whim, of a legislative majority in the general assembly. But I presume it is the intention of the gentleman—as it is mine—that in the constitution about to be made, we shall give security to the property in slaves; that we shall so guard and protect that interest, and all other property, that no legislative majority of this country, shall have power or authority to touch, handle, or disturb it. The argument that there is danger to that description of property, when guarded by constitutional guaranty, presupposes or assumes that some future legislature, in disregard of constitutional restraints, and all right, will usurp power and take by violence the estate and property from our citizens. This would be revolution, against which all constitutions are but paper blockades.

The advocates of the amendment under consideration imagine they see danger to our slave property, if you do not deprive our fellow citizens who reside in cities and towns of their perfect equality with the rest of their fellow citizens who own that description of property and reside in the country. For myself, Mr. Chairman, I know there will be danger not only to that, but to any species of property, whenever you undertake to secure it by the proscription and disregard of the principle of equality in all political rights of the citizen, and especially in the law giving power of our government.

Mr. Chairman: If the object of the mover of the amendment, and its advocates, be as they avow, to give security to our slave property, by denying to the population of the cities, and border counties upon the Ohio river, equal participation in the law making department of our government, because of their peculiar hostile opinions to the existence of the right to that description of property, they do not go far enough—they stop short of the point to which it is necessary for them to advance. They but half do the business they design. They only propose to lessen the power of the emancipationists, located in a particular region, in the halls of legislation. Why not extend your reducing power to all portions of the state where these men now or may reside? If it be dangerous to our domestic institutions to permit the emancipationists of the cities, or of the Ohio river counties, to have their full voice and power heard and felt, and therefore they should be deprived of a modicum of their political strength, why not apply this stringent constitutional process alike to all emancipationists, as well those who reside in Madison and Franklin as those who reside in the cities of Louisville and Covington?

Gentlemen tell us they do not desire to deprive these men of the right of suffrage; they allow them to vote; but the vote of a citizen on the bank of the Ohio shall not be equal to the vote of a citizen who is blessed with a residence in the county of Franklin or of Scott. The object avowed is not total disfranchisement of the freeman. Power is more likely to effect its purpose of wrong when its approaches are gradual. Open wrong awakes the sense of danger, and the power of resistance is instantly invoked.

Of what value, Mr. Chairman, is the equal right of suffrage when you deny the citizen equal representation? You but mock him, and insult his pride by the offer of such a right.

Sir, whenever you proclaim by your organic law, to that class of men against whom you and your amendment is aimed, I care not where they live, whether along the Ohio, or on the southern border of the state, upon the mountain or in the vale, whether they come from the north or the east, or whether they be native or of foreign birth, that their voice is not as fully and fairly and equally heard, as the voice of their neighbors and fellow citizens, you implant in the constitution an element of destruction and not of security. Freemen must be equal in our government.

A fundamental law, in order to be sustained, must be founded in principles of justice and equality. You cannot expect the people of any country to maintain a constitution, unless they love and cherish the principles upon which that constitution is based. They must see it characterized by equality and justice, and when these two principles are secured, and all political powers and privileges made equal, you may then rely upon the affections of the people for the support of that constitution. But if they see engrafted in it a feature or principle which their sense of justice does not approve, you may as well call on an honest man to do a dishonest deed, as to expect of a liberty-loving citizen that he will sustain a constitution that he does not approve.

But my honorable friend does not go far enough, if he desires to engraft this principle in the constitution for the purpose of securing this right of property in slaves. He imagines that all the danger lies in the border counties on the Ohio river, and in order to make certain, and to secure the right of property of which he speaks, he proposes that in all future apportionment of representation, there shall not be perfect equality, as far as is practicable under our government, so far as cities and towns are concerned. Sir, allow me to suggest to him a much more certain remedy for the evil he dreads, and one which will more certainly attain his object, if his object be to keep out of the halls of legislation the power of representative numbers that the emancipation population is enabled to give—one, sir, that would work much more equitably throughout the commonwealth—one which would operate equal and impartial justice, not only to every section of this commonwealth, but to every county of every section. It is this, sir—and we will see whether my friend will be willing to adopt it—that in all future enumerations, which are to be the basis of representation in the two houses of the general assembly, direct that no man who voted the emancipation ticket in any county in this commonwealth, or shall be in favor of emancipation, shall be considered a qualified voter, or constitute a portion of the population on which that apportionment shall be made. My friend does not go far enough, sir, to meet the evil which he apprehends. How many voters would be stricken from the list of this basis of representation in the county of Madison, represented by the gentleman. I do not know. I believe sir, there are one or two counties in which it would be necessary under this rule to strike off near one half of the voting population, for I believe the county of Fayette was nearly equally divided, so far as there was a test furnished at the last August election. My friend from Franklin elaborated this argument a little on yesterday. He alluded particularly, he said, to this objection; but he said there were other great interests in the commonwealth besides this, connected with general legislation, that might be affected, if we did not guard and protect the people of the state against the influence of our cities, towns, and river population. He did not tell us what those interests were. My imagination at this time presents one, that I supposed crossed the mind of the honorable delegate at the time. Now let us test the principle the gentleman is contending for. True, it is a local question—a question that has long agitated the state of Kentucky in its legislation. It is the location of the seat of government permanently at this point. It has been, in times past, often agitated in the halls of the general assembly of this commonwealth. I know not how it has been within the past ten or fifteen years; but the large majority of voters that have been favorable to a change of location, have come from that section of the country which lies south of Green river. There is a majority of the representatives from that portion of the state who are favorable to a change of a location of the seat of government. That section of the state is most rapidly filling up and increasing, and the time may come, unless there is some check given to popular representation, when, perhaps, the question might receive consideration, and the result be different from what it has been in times past. The sentiment for a change or removal of the seat of government is rapidly increasing, as also the southern population.

Suppose the gentleman was to propose by way of securing the state against so great a calamity as the removal of the seat of government, the representation hereafter allotted to the counties south of Green river, shall not exceed the number to which they now are entitled, and no more. Thirty is all they are entitled to now, and all they shall have, no matter what may be the number of population. In the language of the gentleman, we could say, we take nothing from you, we withhold from you nothing that the present constitution gives you; but to secure this great state interest of ours, the permanent location of the seat of government at Frankfort, we will engraft in this constitution, that in all future apportionments this section of state shall have but thirty members, no matter what the population may be.

It appears to me, sir, that the representatives in this hall, from that section of the country, will not consider this a fair and equitable principle to be engrafted in the constitution. Yet it is precisely the same principle that you propose to adopt, only transferred from the cities now existing, or which may hereafter exist, to another region of country. The argument is, we take nothing from you, we give you the number of representatives to which you are at present entitled, and that number shall not be hereafter increased; we have got you now in our power, and we will maintain that ascendancy over you, in order that we may secure certain great local interests; and you have no right to complain. What is the difference between that proposition and the one now before the convention? The city of Louisville is the only city or town that is entitled to a separate representation, and according to the gentleman's argument, she is only entitled now to representation in the lower branch. Says another gentleman, she is entitled to three members on this floor now—and we certainly do not do her injustice when we say that hereafter she shall be entitled to one senator and five representatives, and we say this because the population that we intend to restrict, resides in a mass, within the confines of a corporate city. Now sir, I ask, what principle of justice is there in this? They say to the freemen, if you reside within the limits of a city, you shall be shorn of a portion of your political rights in this commonwealth. Whether a freeman shall reside on the mountain or in the valley; whether he shall reside on a farm or within the confines of a city, he is equally a freeman of the commonwealth, and entitled to all the political rights and privileges of a freeman, so long as we continue to preserve the principles that were engrafted in our constitution of 1792 and 1798.

The equal political rights of our citizens, Mr. Chairman, cannot, must not depend upon what portion of the soil of this commonwealth they may reside.

It will never do to say to the citizen of our towns, you are taxed for the support of your government in proportion to your estate, as high as your fellow citizen who is separated from you by the corporate line between town and county, but you are not equal to him in political rights; your urban residence has deprived you of a portion of your equal share in your common government. All the burthens of citizenship shall be imposed upon you, but we will deny you a full voice in the councils of your state.

But sir, this provision is a direct attack upon a portion of country where there is a large voting population who are not themselves the owners of slaves. There is a tier of counties in the southeastern part of the commonwealth in which, I suppose, there are at least ten free white males to one slave. May it not be dangerous to the interests of the slaveholder, if we permit these counties, in the organization of the senate and house of representatives, to have their full and equal representation in the general assembly? May not some evil disposed persons hereafter, do what they have not been able to do heretofore? May they not excite that population by addressing its prejudices—by eloquent appeals from the stump convince them that the existence of this institution of slavery is oppressive—call on them to unite as one man against the slaveholder, for the purpose of destroying the tenure by which that property is held? Sir, lest they might have this influence hereafter, and avail themselves of it, in these border counties, it might be well, while the gentleman is guarding this property against the north west that he guard it also against the south east; and he should provide against any possible danger that might arise from this non-slaveholding population. You cannot have a perfect paper security until you limit the basis of representation to the slaveholders themselves. You must come to that, if you intend to secure this property, and you must do it by having only a representation of the slave holding interests.

Sir, we were admonished by the gentleman, and by others on this floor, that it was necessary to apply this principle only to the border counties on the Ohio river, because independently of the population that comes from other states, hostile to the institution of slavery—independently of native born-citizens—there is a description of foreign population that we must guard against, and to whom we must deny the privilege, not only of fair representation in the two houses of the general assembly; but some go further and deny to them the right of suffrage. One word sir, on that subject—for perhaps it is the only opportunity I shall have to express my opinions upon this Native American question. Some go so far in this crusade of political fanaticism as to declare that if they had the power now, they would stop European immigration into the United States; others would permit them to come in, but deny to them the privilege of citizenship until after a period of some fifteen or twenty years. In regard to the native american party, as it may be termed, in other portions of the United States, I have watched its progress, its commencement, its rise and its present elevation; and I believe its embodiment now, so far as the national councils are concerned, is in a single member from some district in a portion of the city or county of Philadelphia. It is a party that has sprung up of the mushroom tribe, and like all other parties which are based on injustice, in reference to principle, it can only exist temporarily. It cannot form the basis of a great national party or a great state party; it may serve sir, to change temporarily the representation of a district in congress or the police of a city, but it never can, until the spirit of justice shall be extirpated from the American bosom, become an American party; because according to my humble conception, it is founded on injustice to human rights, and human liberty. By our laws, by our constitution, by the sympathies of our people the oppressed and liberty loving of all nations have been and still are invited to our shores. They are tendered the blessings of a free government and citizenship.

The patriots and sages who formed the federal constitution, did not, thank God, even leave to the federal agents under that constitution, the power to close the door against immigration. They have a right to come. If they choose, there is no power left, either in the state government or in the federal government, to prohibit their immigration in to the United States; and if the increase of foreign immigration is an evil, if it is calculated to overturn or to endanger our own civil or political institutions, I tell gentlemen who are the advocates of native Americanism, here and elsewhere, if they wish to reach the evil they imagine, they should apply to a higher power than this convention—a power competent to change the constitution of the United States, and laws of congress upon the subject. European population have come, and come they will; and the question that presents itself to my mind is, when they are permitted to come, whether from Ireland, France, Germany, or Hungary, what is the sound policy of American statesmen in regard to the treatment they shall receive. The sooner, within a reasonable period, they shall be required to satisfy the public authorities that they are men of orderly habits, and of good deportment—who indeed claim to be citizens of the United States—the sooner you can impress them with the high and noble idea that they are citizens of the United States, the greater security you have for their good conduct and devotion to the institutions of the country. A man who is treated in this way will feel that he possesses the rights and privileges of a freeman in his adopted country, and he will exercise these privileges in such a manner as to promote the interests of the country. He loves the country that has made him free and invested him with the immunities of citizenship, and he will fight for that country. Apply the principle which some gentlemen wish to adopt as part of the constitution and laws; what will be the result? Why, sir, they will become almost what the gentleman says they are now. If you require a foreigner to remain here half a life time before he shall feel that he has an interest in the government, you tax him to maintain before he has part or lot in the political affairs of the country of his adoption, he will become the very offscouring of the state, and will be always prepared at the instance of the leaders of mobs, to commit disturbances and offences of all sorts against the peace of society. The freeman who owes no allegiance to government, who feels that he is not equal in political rights, is ever ready to lend his physical energies to those who seek to disturb the order of society, and the steady operations of the laws. Vest the same man with the privileges of citizenship, and he at once becomes the advocate of the principles of that government to whom he has sworn allegiance; that government which, in return therefor, has thrown around him and infused into him the panoply and spirit of a free and equal citizen.

But sir, there is a still greater objection to the principle advanced, and particularly to the insertion of it in our constitution. The constitution and laws of the United States permit foreigners to land on your shores; and as a matter of choice or necessity, they become citizens or inhabitants of some one of the states. They are met here by a constitutional provision, and told, that if you come to Kentucky, and locate yourselves, you have to remain for a period of fifteen or twenty years, before you shall be permitted to exercise the political rights of freemen or citizens. What would be the effect of such state policy, sir, must be obvious to every reflecting, well-balanced mind. All the wealth and enterprise of future foreign immigration, much of which we now have and enjoy, in all the departments of science and labor, would stop short of the borders of your state. These men will avoid your state as a man would a pestilence, and we shall have none but those who care nothing for your institutions, who value not the rights of citizenship, and who are ready, at all times, to commit all sorts of crimes, and to practice every scheme of fraud and villainy, that can be devised. The true American policy is, so long as you permit them to come within the confines of the state, to make them citizens, and impress them, by that very act, with the importance of the new character they have acquired.

Sir, I appeal to the personal knowledge of any member of this delegation. Look about among your own constituents, and tell me what sort of citizens these naturalized foreigners are. Sir, I will not say they make better citizens than our own, but I have seen them in the hour of danger and difficulty, and I have always found them on the side of liberty and free institutions. It was but the other day, in the very city to which this amendment looks so invidiously, that a regiment, or legion, alluded to the other day in debate, was formed in a single day, at the call of our common country. Two whole companies, constituting part of that legion, were formed, exclusively, from this foreign population. I never shall forget an incident going to illustrate the character of this foreign naturalized population, which occurred in 1812, in my own presence. A company was formed in the town where I resided, composed of one hundred men. One of them was an Irishman, the oldest man in the company—well known, no doubt, to my colleague. He was a naturalized citizen. At the margin of Lake Erie, we were ordered to dismount, and some were required to remain and take charge of the horses. None would volunteer to remain, and a draft was ordered, and among others, the Irishman was drafted to remain. When we were about to embark, the first man I saw jump into the boat was the Irishman, with his knapsack and rifle. He was ordered by the captain to go ashore, and attend to the duty for which he had been drafted. In his own peculiar, emphatic manner and language, he said to the captain: "Sir, I will not disobey any order you give me, but I did not volunteer under you, sir, to take care of horses, but to fight the British. I am now in your boat, and if I am to go out, you must take me out a dead man." Hethen threw himself down in the boat, and was suffered to remain. This was one of those despised foreigners, and it is but one evidence, among many, as far as my experience goes, of the attachment and devotion to the cause of their adopted country, that this description of our population always has furnished me. I ask gentlemen if they would, provided they had the power, under the federal constitution at this time, close the door against the immigration of a class of population of this description, who are seeking an asylum from oppression in every portion of the globe? Sir, would to God I had the power this day to speak and to say—and to execute the purpose—to Kossuth and his five thousand Hungarians—compelled, to avoid death upon an ignominious scaffold, to seek the protection of the Musselman, at the sacrifice of the faith of their fathers—I would welcome them to our shores. Nay, I would assure them of a welcome in the hearts of the people of Kentucky; and when they give evidence of their devotion to our institutions, of their moral character and deportment, according to the law as it now stands, I would clothe them with citizenship, and thereby make them better citizens, better men, attaching them more closely to the institutions they had sworn to support. I cannot, therefore, vote for this proposition, because of the additional element thrown into the argument that it is intended and designed to operate oppressively upon a portion of our citizens, both native and naturalized.

I rose merely for the purpose of shewing, at least, that the arguments which have been thrown out by the mover of the proposition, have not presented to my mind a sufficient reason for the adoption of his amendment. The proposition, if I understand it is, as appears from the gentleman's argument, and from that of the gentleman from Madison also, a denial to the citizens of our cities incorporated and entitled to separate representation, senatorial representation according to numbers.

Mr. LINDSEY. If the gentleman will permit me. I have not contended for any proposition that would exclude Louisville entirely from a senatorial representation. I am for giving her, in conjunction with the county of Jefferson, a senatorial representation.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I certainly understood the gentleman correctly; his proposition is, that Louisville and Jefferson county shall constitute one senatorial district. I was therefore correct, when I said that he was opposed to giving Louisville a separate senatorial representation according to her numbers.

I know sir, that the house is impatient to take the vote upon this question. I have perhaps occupied more time than I ought, in stating my objections to this amendment. I think that the evil which the gentleman apprehends, may be rendered entirely harmless, if he will apply the principle of election by districts. Take the city of New York. She is entitled to eighteen representatives in the general assembly of that state; by her constitution she is entitled to an equal senatorial representation according to her numbers, as compared with the balance of the state, and whenever an enumeration takes place she is to have her equal proportion. But how does the state guard against the consolidated mass of that city? It is by engrafting into the constitution such a provision as the gentleman from Christian proposes, that senators and representatives shall be elected by districts. A city divided against itself, weakens its own strength. And they will be likely to be divided in relation to all manner of internal policy. So it will be in this commonwealth.

The gentleman has referred to the state of Massachusetts. Look at her constitution; it had its existence in the year 1780, before the close of the revolutionary war. The gentleman seems to think that the term, incorporated town, in that constitution, is synonymous with incorporated city, and entitled in the same manner to representation. Towns is the name of political or representative divisions in that state, and the rule he read applies to all equally. One other argument that was presented by the gentleman, and by my friend from Ohio, with some force; it is an attempt to shew that by giving to a city this equal representation, or rather by denying to a city this equal representation, you only compensate counties and sections for the losses which they may sustain in the apportionment of representation among themselves. Is this true? It would be to some extent true, if the numbers included in fractions were unrepresented, but they are represented in power, because they aid some other county in the neighborhood to obtain a member. Not so in an incorporated city, for by the present constitution and the clause under consideration, fractions in cities are not transferred to counties. If there was always to be found in a city the precise number necessary to give a certain number of representatives, so far immediate local representation would be preserved. But suppose that 1500 be the ratio, and that Louisville should have a sufficient number of qualified voters to give her three representatives, and 999 over; that 999 would not be represented, as it would be if the residuum was transferred to a county. Many counties have at every apportionment a residuum, it cannot be avoided, but where there is a residuum it must be contributed to a neighboring county, and then it is represented. There is nothing in this argument of either of the gentlemen, which justifies the proposed departure from the great, essential and just principle of equal representation based upon numbers.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. Mr. Chairman: It was my intention and wish to remain a silent but interested, deeply interested, listener to this debate. But we have a journal which is to record the votes given in the convention; and we have another record which is to send out to the country and to the world the reasons for those votes. Gentlemen advocating the proposition by which Louisville is to be restricted in the legislative councils of the state, have thus already sent their reasons abroad. The most imposing of which, and that chiefly relied on is, that to give Louisville, and the other cities which may hereafter spring up in the state, representation in the senate, according to the common basis, to be established in the constitution for the state at large, is giving "aid and comfort" to the emancipationist. This I understand to be the position of perhaps all those in favor of the restriction. The constituency I have the honor to represent is pro-slavery. I claim to be a pro-slavery man, and on that subject as well as every other intend to represent that constituency truly, faithfully, and according to the best of my humble ability. And knowing that upon the subject of slavery especially they justly feel deep interest, I am apt—nay, sir, feel it my duty, to scan closely the ground I may occupy in any vote I shall give touching that subject. If I shall vote against that restriction, the speeches on the other side represent me as doing the work which will either presently or remotely contribute to the cause of emancipation. I hence desire briefly to inquire whether such will be the result. But before proceeding, I take occasion to remark that I am free from that local feeling which of necessity must influence some members of the convention. Representing as I do an agricultural county in the very centre of the state, and therefore can act on this subject as a citizen of the state without any peculiar or local interest whatever. The present constitution prescribes the qualifications necessary to entitle a citizen to the right of suffrage. It further proceeds to make the number of citizens thus qualified the basis of representation. The report of the committee now before the convention is based upon the same principle precisely, and recognizes it as the only basis of representation. The state, however, is cut up into counties of almost every size, shape, and population. Taking these counties as we find them, it is positively and absolutely impossible to devise any mode which will, with mathematical certainty, give on this basis equal representation. Being unable to arrive at this perfection, the committee have gone into details and regulations, the sole and only object of which were to approximate as nearly as possible to the general rule they had assumed as the true and proper basis. This all admit on both sides. The difficulties of carrying out the general principle, in many cases absolutely insuperable, all vanish when you approach the city of Louisville. This is too obvious to require elaboration. But strange to tell, at the very point where your principle is of easy and practical application, you abandon it. I here pause a moment to appeal to the convention if this is not so. There sir, is no denying.—Abandoning the principle which all admit to be the true and sound one, some give one reason, some another; each however, reconciling the thing in his own way.

The gentleman from Franklin, for example, exhibits his tables of representation taken from the report of the committee to illustrate the inequalities that will exist in other parts of the state. Why did he not tell the convention that the committee had exerted all their ability to arrive at equality, and that they had approximated it as nearly as the nature of the case would admit. But no. He traverses the state and parades these imperfections which admit of no remedy, to show that when you come to a city where no barrier exists, you may wantonly violate it and disfranchise a part of the free citizens of Kentucky—native born as well as foreign—no distinction is made, for you strike at the city itself. If your blow is effectual the whole will feel the shock. The whole thing when simplified is this, that because our county organizations are such that some inequality from the necessity of the case must be borne in some sections—when you get to the city of Louisville, where no such necessity exists, you abandon your principle for no other reason than to make her feel inconvenience, because it was the misfortune of some other county in the state to experience for a time the impracticability of carrying out your system in complete perfection.

“Aid and comfort” to the emancipationist is the cry. That is to carry every point. It is to overslaugh everything in the convention. It has become familiar to the ear. I for one can hear it without trepidation. You are suspicious of a part of our population. They are non-slaveholders. Gentlemen talk as if the slaveholder held the power in Kentucky, and as if they represented them alone. I would remind them that it is by the voice of the non-slaveholder alone, that the institution exists for a single day. It was in the power of the non-slaveholders to have returned a convention more unanimously anti-slavery than this body is pro-slavery, for they are as six to one in the state.

In the canvass last summer the pro-slavery men had no time for special pleading. The guarantees thrown around slavery by the laws and constitution had all been torn away, and the institution lay at the feet and mercy of the non-slaveholder. To them we appealed as we were bound to do on the great principles of justice and truth. They decided in our favor. We therefore now know that nothing is to be feared from the present non-slaveholding population of the state.

The object is to strike at the foreign population of the state. How the cool dispassionate deliberation which characterized our citizens last summer in their decision of the question of slavery! Have we any great interest which would be unsafe in their hands? If so, you have the power to disfranchise them. And you begin by lopping off a small branch only. You give them all the high privileges of citizens. You arm them with all the powers which you yourselves have on this question of slavery. And then goad and provoke them to topple the institution into the dust, by proclaiming your suspicions to the world, and that they are unworthy the high trusts you have reposed in them. If verily, and in truth they are not to be trusted lay the axe to the root of the tree and at once embrace the native American resolution of the gentleman from Bourbon, and place its principles in the constitution. I see no medium ground.

Mr. Chairman, it is in vain to talk or think of sustaining or strengthening slavery by some of the means which have so often been recommended. Such, for example, as silencing discussion and preventing agitation. Fix your constitution as you will, the people will still discuss and agitate according to their own good pleasure. You cannot prevent them by legal enactment; you may by fair argument. In that way the emancipationist was met last summer, and after full and fair trial during the whole canvass, he lost at least half his numbers. If you wish to keep the ascendancy, you have only so to meet him at all points and in all time.

But though you excite this population against you by the amendment, still nothing is gained by it. To suppose so, is a flimsy fallacy. Few words will prove it. Under the constitution, as you intend framing it, no power in the state can touch our slave property till another convention is called. But this foreign population is to have a voice in calling that convention and in electing its delegates. Where then will be the constitution by which you have violated a great principle to sustain slavery? At the mercy of the very people whom you have wronged in the violation of that principle.

Instead of strengthening the institution of slavery by the amendment, you are weakening it. You afford the emancipationist the argument that you are afraid to meet him in fair fight before the whole people, but that you are compelled to resort to unjust restrictions to keep him down. I am against his having this undue advantage. To show that no county in the state should have more than one senator, whatever its population might be, honorable delegates have, by analogy, referred to that provision in the constitution of the United States by which each state, whether great or small, is entitled to two senators, and two only. Nothing, however, is gained by this position. The little state of Delaware has as much sovereignty as the largest state in the union. Her senators represent that sovereignty. This entitles her to an equal number with New York or any other state in the union. Besides, the federal government was formed by the transfer of a part of the power and sovereignty of the people of the several states to that organization. The powers not delegated were retained by the states. A line, therefore, had to be drawn between federal and state jurisdiction. Many interesting questions in the history of our country have arisen as to the true position of this line, and a conflict of powers between the federal and state governments. These conflicts were foreseen by the framers of the federal compact, and by the conventions of the several states called to ratify that instrument. When the rights of the states are encroached upon, or about to be encroached upon, the smaller states have as much at stake as the larger ones, and that without regard to numbers or population. Hence, an equal representation in the senate of the United States. If representation were given in both branches of the congress according to population, a combination of four or five of the larger states might easily overwhelm and swallow up the smaller ones. For that reason, among others, this negative power was given in one branch of congress to the smaller states, as a means of self preservation. There is, then, in point of fact, no analogy in the two cases. If there is, the smallest county in the state is as much entitled to a senator as the largest, and I should insist that the principle be carried out, and that my county is as much entitled to a senator as any other, and would claim it at the hands of the convention.

After this analogy has been so strenuously urged, I am not surprised that the resolution now on your table should have been offered, proposing to apportion our senators according to the number of counties without regard to population. If the analogy is well founded, the principles of the resolution ought to carry.

We are also told that slave labor is yielding to free labor, and must yield to it; that this fact is now seen in the Ohio border counties of the state. In proof of the general proposition, the free states formerly holding slaves is cited in illustration. Why, sir, the free states of the Union, all taken together, never, at any time, contained more than 40,000 slaves—a mere handful. Nothing is proven then by showing that this handful has disappeared in the north.

Taking the southern states in a body, the slave population has been steadily increasing. True, on the eastern shore of Maryland, and in the state of Delaware, a section geographically separated from the main body of the slave territory of the Union, the number of slaves has diminished. In no other section of the slave territory has this been the case.

The slave population of Virginia and North Carolina is perhaps not quite so great as at one time. They, however, furnished the new states with slaves which slightly diminished their numbers only, and is no evidence that slavery is disappearing.

Another position is, that Louisville, owing to her numerous population and its rapid increase, may, if allowed full representation, ultimately control the state.

Within the last decennial period, her population has more than doubled. I am glad that this is so. It is evidence that capital, industry, and enterprise are there. And a market is also there for all the agricultural productions of every part of the state commercially connected with that city. My section of the state finds a market there for all her agricultural staples. Remove Louisville and we have no market. Cripple her growth and prosperity and you affect all that part of the state from which I have the honor to come. She is now going foremost in building a railroad from that place to this; I am glad of it. I wish she had the ability to build one from Cumberland Gap, running through my section of the state and intersecting the other road at some convenient point. We would then have a market at our very doors. I profess to know something experimentally of the interests of the farmers in my county, because I am one of them. I am not contending that by this restriction on Louisville, you will cripple her energies in a commercial point of view, but make these remarks to show that the interests of the rural and city districts are not antagonistical, as gentlemen have contended, but are one and the same, or rather that they support and sustain each other.

And that instead of entertaining feelings of jealousy towards that city, that it is the interest of every section of the state connected with her commercially, to cheer her onward in her progress of enterprise and prosperity.

I see no danger in her numbers. The cities of Cincinnati, Philadelphia, and New York, have equal representation in both branches of the legislatures of their respective states. No danger seems to have been apprehended there.

If the city of New York, having a population of four hundred thousand, does not override the rest of the state, and can be trusted with equal rights, I can apprehend no fears from Louisville.

The only fear I have, is that the predictions of gentlemen, of the great and rapid growth of Louisville, and the other towns on the Ohio, will not be realized. I would be gratified to see them multiply and increase fully up to the predictions of the most sanguine; and instead of discouraging and checking, I would encourage and cheer them on in their progress; and would be proud to see them, as places of my native state, going forward in strides more rapid than is now expected. I feel so, because I am sure it is the interest of the agricultural part of the country that it should be so. If, however, they have a population which cannot be trusted with all the high privileges of citizens—which I do not believe—come at once up to the Native American principle, and lay the axe at the root of the tree. To that, however, I am utterly opposed, and will vote against it in all its stages.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I have probably delayed too long already bringing to the notice of this house, the proposition that I intimated some day or two ago, that I should advocate. Evil has probably arisen from that delay, because I find in listening to the arguments of the different gentlemen who have spoken on this subject, that there appears to be rapidly growing up in this convention an opinion, in which I do not agree, that whenever a delegate votes for a gentleman's proposition, he necessarily adopts all the arguments and reasons the mover may think necessary to give for introducing it. I shall vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Franklin because it goes too far. And I do not concur in the reasons given for its support by my friend from Madison, because the ground he occupies is too broad. Turn your eye to the map of Kentucky hanging on the wall behind you, Mr. Chairman, and commencing at one end of the state and running to the other, along the margin of the Ohio river, and you have some twenty four counties, and a river belt of some six hundred miles. Take ten miles upon that belt and you have six thousand miles of territory. Now the influences arising from the expected increase of the spirit of emancipation, against which he desires to guard, are not only not inherent in the rural population in that district, but they are not more liable to exist there than in the rural population of the state elsewhere. Let it be where it may, the proposition which I gave notice I intended to introduce, and in advocating which, I shall undoubtedly come in conflict with some of the gentlemen who have preceded me, I will now read to the convention to show its length and breadth:

“Provided, That the cities unincorporated, or which may hereafter be incorporated, in this commonwealth, and to which a senator or senators may be allotted, shall not together, under any future apportionment, be entitled to more than one fourth of the whole number of senators; and whenever, under any future apportionment, the whole number of senators to which said cities would be entitled, shall exceed one fourth of the whole number of senators for the whole state, the legislature shall apportion the one fourth of the whole number of senators among the cities entitled, according to some just and equitable mode of apportionment.”

And now, sir, comes the point to which so many have objected. “And provided, That no city shall ever be entitled to more than two senators.” Now what has been laid down in this house as the great fundamental principle, and I will call upon the gentleman who has just sat down, and not only him, but on every other who has taken the opposite side of the question, to answer. Point me to the man in this house, or in the State of Kentucky, who denies, as a general proposition, the great fundamental principle that representation must be according to numbers. I acknowledge its truth in its full length and breadth, and no man here denies it. But upon the other hand, where is the man in this house, or elsewhere, who will deny that there is another principle, paramount to all others, in its operation upon states and governments, as well as upon individuals—the great principle of self preservation. Precisely where one of these principles ceases, and the other commences—or rather to speak more accurately, the point where they so come in contact that one must give way to the other—it is not very easy to ascertain. But we can strike tolerably near that point, and it is not necessary therefore for gentlemen to run to extremes on either proposition. Fundamental as is the first, the other is omnipotent. It is that by which individuals are authorized to take the life of a fellow creature, and states to go to extremes, when self preservation, and the existence of the state itself, or of some great institution, or some great essential principle is endangered. There is not a thinking man in this house but must see that the time may come when these two principles will come in contact. It is inevitable, and it will take the cool deliberation, and sound, clear-headed judgment of a patriot and statesman to strike precisely the true ground we should occupy. It is with that view I offer this proposition, and I call on the elder and more experienced gentlemen here to assist in perfecting it, for it is not amidst the buzz and confusion (come from what quarter it may) that this calm reflection can be attained. Yet, gentlemen tell me that this proposition is intended to shackle Louisville. Is that a fair argument? I appeal to the few who have attacked this proposition with the threat that I or any man who voted with me, shall be denounced throughout this commonwealth—that we are endeavoring to shackle Louisville, and shall bring down upon us the denunciations of the press to stay their hand and think before they strike. Tell me not that we are to be frightened from our propriety by any arguments of that sort, or any anticipations of such an event. I am sensible, as is probably every man here, that it is not representation alone that gives power, and strength, and influence to cities. No, sir, there are other and almost as powerful causes operating upon us. What are they? Is not the power of the press of Louisville nearly equal to that of the three delegates on this floor? Their delegates act upon the opinions and influence the votes of other delegates by their arguments and impassioned eloquence; and they have few equals on this floor. The press speaks with language equally as strong, and goes not only to this hall, but throughout the state. Its power, too, operates strongly on the gentlemen here, and few there are who are not alive to its praise and sensitive to its attack. The spray from the pen of some of its correspondents has reached to the hem of my garments, and I am not sure it may not have disturbed my equanimity. The power of ridicule, strongly as some gentlemen possess it here, and which has already frightened from their propriety, I fear some of the members of this house, who originally favored my proposition, is not as strong as that power of ridicule possessed by some of the press of our cities, and which, too, operates as far as the English language is read. And is not this element of power possessed by the cities to be taken into consideration? I speak of it so far as it influences public opinion. And who would deny that legislation was influenced by public opinion? Every member comes up here imbued with the public sentiment prevailing in this country; and how was that sentiment formed? Previous to the meeting of the legislature; was it not as much by the newspaper press as any thing else?

This thing narrows itself down to a nutshell, at last; for although we may not be able to strike exactly the proper point itself, it is not so difficult a proposition to comprehend as some gentlemen seem to imagine. Our ancestors in 1799, who have been praised to the very skies by gentlemen on the other side, have incorporated in our constitution a principle, that up to this day no man denies. What is it?

“Representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall forever be reg-alated and ascertained by the number of qualified voters therein."

Now turn to the opposite page, written by the same patriotic, wise, and noble men who made this constitution, and what do we find there? In apportioning the senators, that same constitution says, "that no county shall be divided, or form more than one district."

What becomes, now, of all your patriotic fervor, of all your admiration of your ancestors of 1799, when they incorporated this clause also, in the same constitution? If they are shackles upon you, as you say, I propose to strike them from your limbs, and let this young giant of Kentucky walk forth in all its full proportions and strength. I propose to go even farther. I am willing to say that Louisville, as she is now, and as she will be with her future increase of natural, or rather native born population, shall be represented to the very fullest extent you dare ask. What, then, is the converse of this proposition? It is plainly this. That you may take Louisville, as she is, or as she will be fifty years hence, provided she goes on increasing, alone by the natural increase of her present population, whether that population is native or foreign; and supposing she increases in population twice as fast as the rural parts of the state, and sir, fifty years hence, you enjoy all the strength in both houses of the legislature that you would be entitled to, if my amendment was not adopted. But the increase of population against whose influence we intend to guard, is that which is the result of immigration from abroad, whether from foreign states, or from foreign lands exterior to the United States. Then the question comes up, whether we have a right to do so. Has brave and good old Kentucky, as she is now, the right to provide that in all future time, she shall bear at least some faint resemblance to what she is now—to the land in which we now live, and love so much, because she is just what she is? Or shall we now place her in a position in which Kentucky, as she now is, shall be ruled and governed by what Kentucky may become, when this flood of immigration from abroad shall pour in upon her, and become, in her cities, a majority of the population? I provide for that contingency also. It is not applicable to Louisville alone, but to every city that may grow up, either on the Ohio or elsewhere in the state. You are to have two senators each of you, but the representation in that branch of the legislature, from all of you combined, shall only be one-fourth of that of the whole state. Is this a wise provision? Bear in mind that I offered this proposition three days ago, and before this debate had sprung up and gone to the extent which it has. It was suggested on mature reflection, looking at, and with a view to, occupy and cover the whole ground. And does it not do so? Cities are to spring up, not only in the border counties, but in the interior—manufacturing cities. There is the length and breadth of the whole matter. Commerce, of itself, will never make a city large enough to become dangerous to the country, in any point of view whatever. Commerce is too transitory. It is the manufacturing establishments, the laborers which are here to-day and stay so long as they get wages, and who, when they can get them no longer, go elsewhere. Or if they become rich in Kentucky, we know that in Kentucky they do not settle. When wages have made them so independent as to buy land, where do your manufacturers go? Do they buy land in Kentucky? No sir. Their hearts, their previously formed opinions, and sometimes their conscientious opinions on a peculiar subject, carry them out of Kentucky into a non-slaveholding state. Count them up—those whom you know to live by manufacturing—and answer me this simple question: Of all the operatives in the manufacturing establishments, who are now, or may be entitled to vote, is there more than one in five who is not at heart and in conscience an emancipationist? Such, at all events, has been my experience. Raised and educated where they were—nine out of ten of them—it is not at all astonishing that they should entertain opinions hostile to this institution. They do not know the relative position between master and slave in this state, and opinions have been ground into them on a false statement of facts, which make them conscientiously antagonistic, and, to some extent, imbued with strong antipathies to the slaveholders throughout the state. Am I right in these facts? Will the increased votes in these factories, as they grow up, continue to be of the same character? I believe they will, and so believing, I have done—what? I have only provided for the future protection of the interest of Kentucky, in her slaves.

It was a daring deed in the man who first introduced this question here, because he must have known then, that he would bring down upon himself not only the powers of ridicule and the sneers of those who stand opposed to him, but also of a very powerful opposition at home. He who has and does risk all this, at least deserves some credit for sincerity of opinion, because he may be loser, and can be by no possibility a gainer thereby. In mere popularity seeking, and in making votes for himself, he cannot be a gainer, and he must be a loser. Is the question of sufficient magnitude to make it a duty to assume this risk? That is a question for every man to ask of himself. Here, on the one hand is the strong fundamental principle, that not only now, but in all future time, representation shall be based on population; on the other hand is the present increase and the probable continued increase of those numbers, of a character that may become dangerous—and before it becomes so, I wish to arrest it. Just here let me ask, if gentlemen are correct in their positions, why they do not vote for my amendment? You say that there is not the slightest danger that all the cities combined ever will have more than one quarter of the senators of the state. Then vote for the proposition. Their influence will not become dangerous until it does amount to something like one quarter of that of the state, and right there I want to stop it. But it is said that we shall then come in contact with another principle equally as strong and powerful as this: that representation should be in proportion to taxation, or in still plainer terms, that men should not be taxed where they are not represented. Turn over to the last article of the constitution, and you will there find that all bills laying taxation must originate in the lower house.

Now I do not propose to limit the representation in the lower house, of any city throughout the state; and why? In order that we may not come in contact with more principles than are necessary. Whenever a man is taxed, he ought and must have the power of representation, and furthermore, his voice ought to be heard in the other branch in order that when the bill goes there it may be fairly debated and understood. And for this purpose, I give these cities a representation in the upper branch, and at the same time allow them their full ratio in the lower house. There is, therefore, full representation where taxation only can be originated—in the lower house, and therefore my amendment is not in violation of that great principle. Cast your eye rapidly over the map of the state, and look at the number of cities now approximating to the right of separate senatorial representation. Louisville is entitled to one, and nearly to two; Covington, Maysville, Lexington, and Newport, each nearly one. Well, the senate is to consist of thirty-eight members, and if we give to these cities to be divided among, nine, or at furthest, beyond which I will not consent to go, ten senators, out of that number, ought that not to satisfy them for the next fifty years at least?

We were told in loud and stentorian tones, that fell upon the ear like peals of thunder, by the President of this convention, that whenever the institution of slavery was in such a predicament, that a majority of the people of Kentucky were opposed to it, it would not be worth defending. That is the very thing against which I wish to provide. I do not fear that slavery ever will be driven to that position in Kentucky by Kentuckians, or the descendants of Kentuckians, as she now exists, but the time may come when the population that now pours into the factories of the state, will become a majority. I am the last man in the house to prevent the building up, or the increase, and the rapid increase, of factories in this state. I go for a manufacturing state. No man in this place favors more than I do, the increase of our cities. God send that Louisville may have a population of 500,000, and I could speak by the hour of the advantages which would result therefrom to the rural population of the state. But because I entertain these sentiments, is it less my duty to provide for the future protection, if not salvation of the rest of the state? Louisville is held up here as if she was attacked by this proposition. So far from that, I go for taking off the shackles now placed on her by the present constitution. You tell me that the young lion is caged, and I am willing to strike off the bars. But I want also, to place a chain around him so that when he attains the plenitude of his strength and power, the balance of the state may be protected against injury from its exercise. What is the reply? Why that this young lion will never attain that strength and power that will enable him to work this injury to the balance of the state, and that therefore, there is no need of this chain of safety. If that be true, then no evil can result from putting the chain upon him, as he never will feel it until his strength does become thus dangerous.

The influence of Louisville may never become dangerous, until its increase of numbers is such as to outvote the rest of the state. And as this is at least possible, then it becomes the duty of the present race of native born Kentuckians, or of those now here to protect their native born children, and their children's children, against its results in the future. And when I say native born I mean all now in Kentucky. And in regard to the foreigners now resident in the state, whether naturalized or not, I declare that so far as I am acquainted with their opinions there is not one who does not agree with me in the opinion that the time may come when the large cities in this state, like those of Europe, will rule and govern, and sometimes with an iron rod, the rural districts around them. That is what I am looking forward to. I want now while we have the power to throw the necessary protection around our slave property, for unless this protection is provided now, in twenty or thirty years from this time, we may not be able to provide it.

I to some extent agree with the sentiment of the President. Whenever a majority of our population turns against slavery, it is in some danger, but whenever a majority of the votes in both halls of the legislature turns against it, it is gone. Put in your constitution whatever safeguards you may choose, and I will show you how they will be evaded. They need not violate the constitution, but they can drive every slave out of the state by a rule as inevitable in its effects as that two and two make four. You have not yet provided against special taxation, and whenever you do attempt it, you will find arrayed against you a most powerful interest. I will show you at once by what a simple process, if they had now a majority in the legislature, the emancipationists could drive out every negro in the state, and at the same time not interfere with the principles of the constitution. Let them tax every negro in the state fifty dollars as a specific tax. Why even now my spectacles are taxed fifty cents a year, and God knows I would not wear them if I could help it. Tax the negroes fifty dollars a head, and the slave owner would at once begin to calculate whether they were sufficiently profitable to him to allow him to keep them and to pay this tax. How many would keep them? But suppose they all did, and that some ten years afterwards the emancipationists found they had not driven the slaves out, they could at once double the tax and increase it to one hundred dollars a head. All know that this is a tax which the slave owner could not exist under. Now my amendment provides for this contingency to this extent: that while the city and manufacturing population will be fully represented in the lower house, and able to protect themselves, I want this other interest to be strong enough to protect itself in the upper house. I want one house still left to stand firm for Kentucky as Kentucky is now and as I want her descendants to be hereafter. Let that day come when the emancipationists shall triumph, and what will become of nine-tenths of the gentlemen in this hall. We will be in some foreign, some southern state perhaps, and when asked from whence we came, like the Swiss exile, we will say,

"We came from Kentucky, for she was Kentucky of yore, But degraded spot of earth, thou art Kentucky no more."

and we left her. This would be the fate of one half if not two thirds of the representatives in this house, and their descendants. Like begets like, and the noble and free spirits here now have a right to expect that their children will possess the same spirit. You have a right to suppose that the high and chivalrous feelings of the slaveholding people will go down to our children, and that when this institution shall have been expelled through the means I have spoken of, they will depart from their beloved Kentucky. And I would therefore provide against the occurrence of such a contingency. "Coming events cast their shadows before."

Look at the speech of the gentleman from Kenton—I ask pardon of the gentleman from Kenton, (Mr. Stevenson,) I meant the gentleman from Campbell, (Mr. Root,)—for the centre of heaven is not further from the crater of the infernal world than the gentlemen are from each other on the subject of slavery—and you will see that this feeling is already becoming manifest. I allude to the gentleman whose speech in the house will be the Root of ten thousand evils. What will be the effect of his speech in and out of this state, declaring that slavery is a curse—a curse to the white man and a curse to the black? What also will be the effect of his declaration that if he believed the bible sanctioned slavery he would agree to tear the leaf from its place, and deny the authenticity of its high character! And this for the purpose of carrying a fanatical opinion into operation! The Christian religion is to be desecrated and made to fall before this immense fanaticism. There is a sample of the extent to which fanaticism drives even a mind tolerably well regulated. And when we see it in these halls, having that effect on a mind tolerably well regulated, what may we anticipate from future events. And I for one am determined to prepare for these coming events.

Look also to the gentleman from Fleming, (Mr. Garfield), and the arguments he has made use of here. When we first met here, we were as a band of brothers, I thought, harmonious on this one subject; but the very moment a question is started bringing out a man's innermost thoughts, we find difficulties springing into existence. We now perceive that there are at least two members on this floor who look upon slavery as a great moral, religious, and political evil. How many more there may be, we do not know. Now the gentleman from Fleming, when he uttered this opinion, told us that he was raised in the pure mountain air of the state of New Hampshire. I am glad he was raised there, at least I rejoice he was not born or raised in Kentucky. Where are your manufacturers and operatives to come from? Are they not also to come from the pure mountain air of New Hampshire, or from the non-slaveholding states of this Union, or from Europe, where the emancipation feelings are as deeply ground into them as in the non-slaveholding states. Nine out of ten are immigrants from the non-slaveholding states. I have no question about it, and I ask gentlemen therefore, to review their opinions. I am the last man to shackle Louisville, or any of the cities, and I only ask now that we may provide for a contingency, that it is evident to all must happen if they continue to increase in the manner they have. I ask them then to review their opinions and see if they are doing strict justice to their present constituency? Who are those constituents? Are gentlemen who are now in your counties, voting for or against you, your constituents, or are your constituents those who may immigrate to this state fifteen or twenty years hence? Here are your constituents and the men to whose interests you ought now to look. Look to the interests of your constituents as they are now, and defend those interests as they are now, against those who may hereafter attempt to interfere with and destroy them. I am not done, but I must stop, because my voice and my strength are exhausted. If I find it necessary I will resume this subject, and finish it hereafter.

Mr. STEVENSON. The eloquence, the ability, and the violence of this debate, attest, in my humble judgment, the importance of the question, which is involved in it. I represent a portion of the state, which if the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin prevails, is to come under the ban of proscription; but while I am vitally interested as an individual, and still more as a representative of those whose rights are to be ostracised, I shall not discuss the question in any local or sectional view. I have been surprised at the amendment, and still more surprised at the arguments which have been adduced in support of it. I understand that the object of all government is to produce the greatest happiness to the greatest number, and that that government is best, which nearest approximates to this result. I have understood, and I had not supposed that there was a delegate on this floor, who denied what my eloquent friend from Daviess, (Mr. Triplett) has just announced, that population was to be the true and only basis of representation. He asked us in very eloquent and earnest terms, is there a man on this floor, who would dare to deny that proposition? I reply to him, there sits my friend from Franklin, who distinctly announced last night, that he denied it, and who boldly asserted that numbers alone ought not to be the basis of representation, but that it should rest on numbers and territory combined. He was asked the question, and he defined his position. I leave then the answer of the gentleman from Franklin as a full and complete one, to the gentleman from Daviess, both of them acting side by side, not it is true, on this particular amendment, but on a principle which is embraced in both these amendments. Sir, we have made poor progress in this mighty age of improvement, if after fifty odd years, we are to retrograde and by our action in this body practically deny the great principle, that population is the true and only proper basis of representation. I propose briefly to reply to my friend from Daviess, and attempt an answer to the several arguments of gentlemen who have preceded him. I shall attempt to show that while the friends of this amendment may, and honestly too, (for I impugn neither the motives, integrity, honor or honesty of any gentleman on this floor,) spurn the imputation of disregarding this great principle, yet that their action and profession are in direct conflict; and if I establish the fact that the adoption of this contradicts their professions, I shall ask and expect them to retrace their steps and come back with us to fundamental principles. It is a fundamental principle, sir, that population is the only true basis of representation—a principle, the greatness of which all profess to admire, and to abide by too. The violent, the able and the ingenious attacks that have been made upon it, only show its impregnability to attack, in despite of the eloquence and ability of the distinguished gentleman from Bourbon—in despite of the subtle reasoning of the gentleman from Franklin—notwithstanding the gigantic efforts of my venerable friend from Nelson—the burning and fervid eloquence of my friend from Daviess—and the cool, dispassionate remarks of the gentleman from Lincoln—in despite of all this combined mass of talent, that mighty principle, untouched and uninjured, still rears its truthful head above the conflict, Teneriffe like, as quiet as the sky, but as mighty as the sea. Sir, it is a principle dear to freemen and only to be feared by tyrants. That principle is now sought to be overthrown.

I always listen with pleasure and interest to the distinguished gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis,) but he will pardon me for saying his argument was more specious than solid. He told us that there was no equality in government, and that though the declaration of American Independence, and all our state constitutions by their bill of rights, recognized men as free and equal, that there was no such thing as perfect equality. I admit it; but while there is no such thing as perfect equality, we certainly can approximate to it. If it is a principle worthy of being acquired, let us, in this age of progress, if we cannot attain it, approximate as near to the promised goal as we can. Do not let us go back; do not let us retrograde in this mighty march of science and intellect. If we cannot reach perfection, and there is nothing human perfect, do not let us stop and give up the contest, but press with vigor on. Why sir, the highest hopes of man, not only here, but hereafter, would be cut off, if such a rule should prevail. He cannot reach perfection but by reliance on a higher power; he can through the mercy and mediation of his saviour, with fervent and unshrinking faith in him, become a holier and better man. Does the exception proposed by the gentleman contradict the propriety of approximating to this equality? He asks why are not women represented? Their very nature forbids their participation in government. They become exceptions to the rule; the very exception proves it. And here I would ask, what rule is there to which exceptions are not to be found? Women are not the only exception to this rule of equality. It applies to lunatics, and to infants. They are founded still upon reason, upon justice, and upon the high principles which tend to the perfection of government. These lunatics and infants have not that maturity of intellect, necessary to attain and to take their part in the formation of the government provided for the liberty of man, and the protection of his property. I think then, that there is nothing in this exception, but that the exception itself only proves the rule. We were next referred to the federal government, both by the gentleman from Nelson, and the gentleman from Bourbon. We were emphatically asked to look at the organization of the U. States senate for a contradiction of this rule of equality. I ask both of these distinguished gentlemen, if the distinction between the federal and the state government is not self-evident? I ask if their whole operation, their whole object and their whole character is not entirely distinct. If their structure does not, for obvious reasons, so far as representation is concerned, rest on a different basis? Some of these distinctions were ably and eloquently pointed out by my friend from Anderson, but he did not run out the parallel of dissimilarity? The federal government is not a perfect and plenary government for all purposes. It is a limited government with limited powers. It does not partake of the sovereignty or the characteristics of the state government. It was designed for specific purposes. All power not delegated to it was retained in the hands of the people. The federal government has not a right to interfere with the municipal regulations of the states. The gentleman from Nelson, spoke of this balance in the senate. Sir, the federal government is a union of sovereignties, whereas the government of Kentucky is a collection of individuals, each of whom is regarded as a sovereign. In the federal government we have a diversity of interests. It is charged with our foreign relations. It is clothed with power to settle differences between the states, as members of a common confederacy. It is composed of thirty distinct sovereignties—co-equal and independent; but in each of these states, exist jarring and local interests, diametrically opposed, and the framers of that mighty instrument, the constitution of the United States foresaw this, and therefore provided for it. How? By checks and balances. By giving to each of the several states equality of representation in the senate, and carrying out the principles of numbers in the lower house. This was necessary to reconcile opposite interests. But is there any such cause existing in Kentucky? We are an association of brothers, bound together for a common purpose—and that purpose is the formation of a government. This government has no jarring elements of discord—no opposing antagonistical interests. The people of this revered old commonwealth have no cause for any jealousy towards each other, whether in the north or south, the east or the west, but feeling ourselves Kentuckians in heart and feeling, and bound together by the cords of common interests and kindred affection, we have only to act for the general good. Is there, when you look then at the character of the two governments, any thing to be drawn in favor of the argument that proposes to violate the great principle of representation in the state government, on the basis of numbers, because in the senate of the United States, as one of the checks and balances that entered into the composition of the federal government, this principle was disregarded? Can the same reasons which led to the formation of the United States senate apply to the state of Kentucky? Unquestionably not.

My friend from Nelson knows that under the federal government the judges are appointed, and yet one of the objects for which he came to this house, as repeatedly announced to us by himself, was to secure the popular election of the judges. Why sir, the very fact that he came here announcing that object, takes away the force of his argument, destroys his attempted analogy between the two governments, and shows that the state of Kentucky rests in its government upon wholly and totally different foundations from that of the federal government. My friend from Daviess concedes this principle, that numbers and numbers alone is the true basis of representation; and yet his amendment proposes to violate it. He attempts to justify himself, however, by another principle, which he says is equally sacred and undeniable, and that is the principle of self-preservation. He says that "these two principles must go together, pari passu." He is satisfied that self-preservation will justify a violation here of the principle of numbers. And he likens it to the case of two drowning men on a plank, where, for self-preservation, one has the right to throw the other off. Now let me ask my friend that if he was to avow that principle, and to justify himself by it in a court of law, whether the onus would not be on him to show that the necessity existed? Can he show that the necessity exists? Surely he would not contend that the variety of physical and mental formations among men, and the uncertain tests of their poor judgment, should alone decide upon so dire a necessity. For example, if he and I were in a skiff crossing the Ohio river, and the skiff should commence rocking, and I, a poor cowardly miserable creature, with weak nerves, should become alarmed at the first jostle, would I have the right to throw him out and drown him, and then come forward and justify myself on the ground that I thought myself in danger and self-preservation required it? Is the cowardly, the constitutionally timid man, when he sees danger rather in his imagination than in fact, and fears that he shall be attacked when there is no possible ground for such fear, is he to draw a weapon and kill an unoffending man, and then be allowed to justify himself on this principle, that he thought himself in danger? Is this the principle of self-preservation that the gentleman from Daviess speaks of? No, my friend is too good a lawyer to argue or contend for such a position. The man who commits murder and justifies under a plea of self-defence, must show the absolute existence of such necessity. So I say the onus is upon him to show that the citizens of the cities of this commonwealth, Kentuckians as they are, and looking as they do upon all the citizens of this broad commonwealth as brothers in interest and feeling, are so inimical as to wish to destroy the country before he will be justified in the violation of a principle which he admits to be right. Before his plea is a good one, he is bound not to assume, but clearly to show this convention the necessity for self-preservation that requires him or them to commit this outrage. I say it cannot be done; and I say further to my friend from Daviess, as well as to every other gentleman opposed to me, if he or they can show even an approximation to the result of utterly destroying this commonwealth, by carrying out this just, correct and equal principle, of representation, (that principle to the correctness of which he himself subscribes,) I would go with them. Sir, my friend from Henderson, yesterday morning made this matter as clear as light. He conclusively showed by figures, which gentlemen have not even attempted to answer, that this supposed danger was a chimera of the imagination; and bold and true as he always is to principle, he was not to be frightened from the path of duty by any supposed evil or danger, but is found fighting gallantly by our side. What are the facts presented by him? We will suppose the population of Kentucky to be one million at this time, and that of Louisville fifty thousand, which is rather more than she has, but I want to give gentlemen the full advantage of figures, and I hope my friends from Franklin or Daviess, if they can answer these figures, will do so. Taking the constitution of the senate to be thirty eight members, and allowing the increase of Louisville to be four times greater than that which the state would have attained in the same time, and supposing, while the whole aggregate of the state had increased with her million only two hundred thousand, Louisville with her fifty thousand had increased to seventy five thousand, what would then be the ratio, and the proportion, if we act upon this equal principle of representation, according to numbers? Why the state itself would have thirty six and one tenth, whereas Louisville, with all her increase, would have but one and nine tenths. Go on with that calculation, and allow the state to increase from one million two hundred thousand to one million five hundred thousand, and the same relative ratio of four to one in favor of Louisville being observed, Louisville from seventy five thousand to one hundred thousand, what would then be the proportion of representation? Why the state at large would have thirty five and seven fifteenths. So go on still further, until you bring the aggregate population of the state to two millions and Louisville to two hundred thousand—and I suppose no gentleman here supposes that Louisville will ever exceed two hundred thousand—what would then be the proportion of representation? Why the state at large would have thirty four and four twentieths, while Louisville with her two hundred thousand would have thirty six and sixteen twentieths.

But I want to deal with this argument fairly. It is one which if wrong can be cyphered out, and if there is any error in it, let gentlemen point it out. I wish to make the strongest case against the cities that can be made out. Suppose Covington goes on in the same ratio, and that she herself, born but yesterday, and now proudly taking her strides onward among the cities of the state—God speed her—suppose, sir, she doubles her population, or quadruples it, if you please, and goes up from 10,000 to 50 or 100,000; if she reaches 100,000 she would have but two senators and a fraction. Add her two senators, if you please, to the three from Louisville with her 200,000, and you have but five senators. Let Maysville come in, and spring up from 3 or 4,000 to 50,000, and she has one senator and a fraction. Go down to Henderson and Paducah, and let them spring up through their railroads, that are to be extended there, to 50,000 each, and you give them one senator and a fraction each. But give them three senators between them, and one to Maysville, making four, and adding the number to which Louisville and Covington ton would be entitled, and you would still be within the proposition of the gentleman from Daviess.

Mr. TRIPLETT. Add Lexington.

Mr. STEVENSON. Add Lexington, if you please, and I think perhaps the number would reach ten. Now, this is a most extravagant calculation for our cities; but what harm could ten senators do against twenty eight? The idea is idle and absurd. But I am to suppose gentlemen will deal with this argument fairly, and is it to be expected that Louisville and Covington are not to have antagonistic interests to Henderson and Paducah? If the sectional border-feeling is such as has been spoken of and portrayed here, and the north is to become antagonistic to the southern portion of Kentucky—and such has been declared by the advocates of the amendment—will not Henderson and Paducah go against that section of country in which Louisville, Covington, and Maysville, are located? Will they not have interests so wholly inimical as to become rival cities? Could they unite against the counties in which they are located? Could any combination be formed among them dangerous to the country? Would the cities in the south join their circumadjacent counties against the northern cities? Would not the cities be checks upon one another? Would not the rivalry of Louisville and Covington keep off any combination? But supposing every city to unite, how timid are certain gentlemen to suppose ten senators could have any influence against twenty eight! There is not the slightest fear of combinations—and there is no hope of any such increase in our cities as is here, for the sake of the argument, supposed! The argument utterly fails when we come to the figures. No danger is to be apprehended from any sectional feeling, and I have no fears of going before the country upon the exhibit and calculation made by the gentleman from Henderson, and to whose liberality I am indebted for this calculation! Gentlemen are contradicted by figures which are perfectly unanswerable. Their fears have run away with their judgments. The principle of self-preservation, that my friend from Daviess so eloquently argued, and on which he relied, will not suffer us or him to trample under foot the fundamental principle of all free government, that population is the true and only basis of representation! It is the foundation stone of our constitutional edifice. Let us never deface or impair it—no, never.

But my friend from Daviess says, that he thinks there is an inconsistency between the two clauses of the present constitution of Kentucky. He read the clause from 6th section, 2d article constitution of Kentucky:

"Representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified electors therein."

He thought, sir, that the principle of representation upon numbers, so broadly and clearly set forth in the present constitution, was contradicted by this clause, if I understood him:

"SECTION 12. The same number of senatorial districts shall, from time to time, be established by the legislature, as there may then be senators allotted to the state; which shall be so formed as to contain, as near as may be, an equal number of free male inhabitants in each, above the age of twenty one years, and so that no county shall be divided, or form more than one district; and where two or more counties compose a district, they shall be adjoining."

Now, if my friend had read another clause, I think he would have been perfectly satisfied that there was no apparent contradiction between those two clauses. It is the 5th section, 2d article of constitution, as follows:

"SECTION 5. Elections for representatives for the several counties entitled to representation, shall be held at the places of holding their respective courts, or in the several election precincts into which the legislature may think proper, from time to time, to divide any or all of those counties: Provided, That when it shall appear to the legislature that any town hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such town shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation; which shall be retained so long as such town shall contain a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio which may, from time to time, be fixed by law; and thereafter, elections for the county in which such town is situated, shall not be held therein."

Now, where is the contradiction? Separate representation allowed to a city—that representation based upon numbers, and no inhibition or prohibition upon cities, if they possessed the number of qualified voters required by ratio of representation. Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for me to detect any contradiction in these clauses, and taken in unison, they seem entirely to harmonize.

Mr. TRIPLETT. If the gentleman will allow me, the President of this convention, I imagine, will bear testimony that under the construction given to this clause by the legislature, the city of Louisville and the county of Jefferson have never been entitled to a separate representation in the senate. He contends that it is unjust, but be it so or not, it has been so decided by the legislature from the foundation of the constitution to the present time.

Mr. STEVENSON. I only desire to say to my friend, on that subject, that if errors and doubts of construction have prevailed formerly, it is our duty to leave no ground for doubt here. Let us act on principle, and fix the matter so plain that there can be no doubt about it. Do not let us act wrong, because doubts may have been entertained in the construction of the old constitution. There is nothing to justify a departure from the great principle, that numbers are the true basis of representation, and that it must be equal and uniform, in the old constitution. There is nothing to be drawn from it, from the idea that self-preservation requires it. This fallacy has been exposed. No analogy can either be drawn from the federal government, as has been attempted to be shown, to justify its violation. Gentlemen, then, must, like the delegate from Franklin, deny that numbers is the true basis; or, they must seek to justify this flagrant violation of a mighty principle, which they profess to admire and subscribe to, on the ground of a timid fear, and from an unworthy mistrust of the population upon the bank of yonder beautiful river, that divides us from the state of Ohio. That division line seems as a little silver thread, scarcely perceptible, but however small and diminutive, when you cross it, you will find a people upon this side wholly and totally different from the other. It is, sir, a difference in heart, a difference in sentiment, a difference in feeling, a difference running through a long line of progeny, descended from a different people. And though they may live upon the bank of that river, in the vicinity of a people to whom they are opposed in sentiment, let me tell gentle men, who seem, upon this floor, to mistrust them, that they, by such distrust, do a fine and gallant people wrong,—ay, sir, a people as noble as they are generous, and generous as they are brave; and should that day ever come, (which God in his mercy avert,) when the sun of liberty is destined ever to set and go down in this happy and far-favored land of ours, the people of that border will be found at that sad and dreary hour, keeping their holy vigils around the altar of patriotism, watching with anguish and dismay, the last flickering ray that shall be emitted from that luminary.

I do not say this in simple compliment to the people upon the border line. I only speak the truth as I know it to exist. It has been said, that the people of that border are to be governed and to act solely by self-interest. Yet, if you look along that entire border, from the county of Greenup to the city of Louisville, where this slave population has been decreasing,—if you look to Campbell and to Kenton, where you find comparatively few if any slaves, and where comparatively they can have no great personal interest in this slave question, you will find that when the tocsin of emancipation gave alarm to the slaveholders of the interior and southern portions of Kentucky, that border shouldered their muskets and stood firm to their brethren, to their principles, and to the best interests of Kentucky. They have ever, on this question, stood true to themselves and true to their state; and I ask every delegate on this floor to pause and consider, before they ostracise and disgrace the defenders of their rights! I beseech and implore them to ponder well, before they strike so fratricidal a blow! How can it be justified? How will it be borne? How can we, who are pro-slavery men, go home to our people and explain this outrage upon their rights? Sir, this question was agitated upon the Ohio river, from the Virginia line to Louisville, and emancipation banners were flying, and a call from the pro-slavery party was made to their border friends. How was that call answered? By a return of pro-slavery delegates! And shall now a pro-slavery convention undertake to say to those gallant defenders of their rights, that, although you have given us the best practical proof of your fidelity, and the most convincing evidences of your patriotism, yet we cannot trust you,—you stood by us, it is true, fighting our battles, yet still we want faith in you! When I go back to my people, and they learn from me the history of this outrage, do you not know that the emancipationists and anti-convention men, would make it the trumpet-note of attack against the result of our labors? I ask gentlemen to consider in what position they will place delegates who represent that border. I entreat this convention not to make the bulwark of our defence, a sword of assault in the hands of our foes.

And who, Mr. Chairman, are the people that it is supposed here by the advocates of this amendment, are to make this assault upon the rights and property of the citizens of their native state? Is it those foreign citizens, who by their industry, their frugality, and their scientific skill, are aiding in building up these cities within our borders? Is it, I ask, our own citizens who, by their energy, and their associated wealth, are opening railroads and turnpikes, and who, while building up the cities, are yet giving increased and accelerated impetus to the population of the country; and who by their enterprise are making the desert wastes of the hunter upon the Licking and the Kentucky rivers to yield to the axe of the emigrant, causing the rose to blossom, and flowers and fruits to spring up where now nothing is visible but an uninhabited forest? Are the enterprising and industrious men who are coming into Kentucky, and by their capital and labour are building up these cities; are they the men who are to make war upon your rights? If they are the mercenary, lawless fanatics that the fears of some of the gentlemen would indicate, may they not attempt higher usurpation, and attack our liberties? If they are dead to honesty and integrity of purpose—aliens to high and ennobling feelings—enemies to the spirit and genius of our government—what may they not dare attempt? Do gentlemen suppose that parchment barriers would check or stop such ruthless plunderers? But allow me, in the kindest spirit, to assure this convention, that gentlemen are led off by distempered fancies, and excited fears? They know nothing of our border, or the people who inhabit it, if they would detract from their patriotism, their talent, their enterprise, their integrity, or their worth! It is true, that within both the cities and counties of that border, we have foreigners; and it is equally true, that they are worthy and industrious citizens.

When this Mexican war broke out, and the first tap of the drum called to arms, and when the rallying cry for recruits resounded throughout this commonwealth, the city of Covington, small as she is, raised three volunteer companies, two of whom went from that city; troops too, as fearless and as gallant as ever trod a battle field or faced a foe! If there is a sceptic here who is disposed to doubt, let him but go to yonder cemetery hill, and when that monument shall be reared, with the melancholy list of noble young heroes, for whose early fall Kentucky has been called upon to mourn, and in memory of whose gallantry that towering memorial is to rise, he will find the names of a Powell, a Morgan, an Oliver, with a host of others who are now quietly sleeping in a foreign land! Sir, among the bravest who went from that city, was a young foreigner, profitably engaged in the selling of dry goods and laces in Covington, and with a mother and sister dependent in part on his exertions for a support. He enlisted, and was deaf to all persuasions which would have detained him at home. He said he owed allegiance to his adopted state, and that he desired an opportunity of repaying it. And when the mighty shock of Buena Vista caused the stoutest heart to quail, they besought him to return, but he told them he had never seen an enemy before, and he could not turn his back on the first foe that he encountered. He fell, and however humble, no nobler, braver, and more patriotic name will adorn that monument than the name of Gilbert.

What is there in Kentucky to divide us? Have we not every incentive to harmony? Does it not, at this terrible moment, when the entire south are required to assert their rights against the unholy crusade of northern fanaticism, to nerve our arms and be ready for any emergency? Are we not every day, as my friend from Simpson said, taunted in the halls of our national legislature with the cry that we are retrograding, and that we are striking examples of the blighting influence of slave institutions? Shall it be in this constitution declared, that we do not desire to repel this slander, and are not anxious that our state should increase her power in the national councils? Are we not alive to the momentous issue which is now being carried on? And how can we expect to increase our population—develop our resources—or build up cities—if we say in our fundamental law to our own people and those disposed to immigrate here—live in the country, and you shall have the right of suffrage and equal and uniform representation according to numbers, however great—but settle in the town, and no matter how devoted you may be, or how ready to defend the best interests of Kentucky, no matter how enterprising or industrious, you shall never, no never, go beyond a certain limit! I want myself to see these cities built up, and I am one of those who believe that such an intimate and vital connection exists between the country and the town, that whatever operates to the prosperity of the one is indissolubly connected with the prosperity of the other. It is the impetus of cities that populate the country. I want to see railroads and canals stretched throughout this commonwealth; common schools built up, and the whole state peopled. Then I desire to see banished from among us that jealous, unworthy spirit of distrust towards each other, which shall kindle any illiberal sectional differences between our cities and the country. Let us be one in sentiment and action; let common sympathies, interest and confidence bind us together, and when we meet, at home or abroad, nothing should prevent us from embracing each other, in that fraternal spirit of state pride and social intercourse, that would make us proud that we were citizens of the same state. I want the chords of love and affection to be bound indissolubly around this entire state. I want Kentucky to stand as she stood in the days when that man (pointing to the portrait of Boone) first trod these plains. I would open the door to immigration—I would gladly welcome the honest and industrious foreigner to our growing state—I would hold out inducements to him to aid us in the development of the resources of the state. I have no fear of our adopted citizens. I feel that it is their love of liberty and admiration for our institutions that attracts them to us. That they are prompted by the same kindred feeling which prompted that liberty-loving foreigner whose portrait hangs over yonder mantle piece, that patriotic Frenchman, (Lafayette,) who, though an ocean divided him from this continent, yet felt the glowing spark of liberty in his bosom, and in our darkest hour of need, hurried to our relief—that foreigner whose blood and treasure was poured out for our freedom—gallantly aiding the matchless efforts of that venerable man, (pointing to the portrait of Washington) who is emphatically the father of his country. Mr. Chairman, away with this illiberal restrictive policy! It is unworthy the model republic in this nineteenth century! I say let foreigners come. I say we have nothing to fear. Are we afraid to trust the building of our cities, or to trust our property or our rights to any portion of our brethren of this commonwealth? Mr. Chairman, we are making a constitution to guard and protect the property and the rights of the entire commonwealth. In the discharge of this holy and responsible trust, let us keep the chart and compass of freemen before us. In God's name, let not principle be trodden under foot by expediency. That expediency which looks to narrow, selfish and temporary interests—that expediency which is one thing to day and changes to-morrow—that expediency which would dethrone reason and allow sophistry to take its place—that expediency, sir, which, when principle is dethroned, may, through jealousy and distrust, lead us, before we are aware of it, upon the shores of ruin and self-destruction. I have myself the utmost confidence in this assembly, and I believe they will treat us and the cities we represent, as equals and co-equals. I have the utmost confidence that they will not ostracise us from an equal and just participation with them in all the affairs of government. They cannot cut us off, with that evidence of our devotion to the best interests of the state which the last August elections called forth, when as is made manifest in the presence here of the distinguished president of the convention and other delegates along the border, party and every thing else was disregarded, to prevent any interference with slave property. To do so would be to humiliate us, to degrade and stigmatize, and the pro-slavery victory of last summer would turn to ashes on our lips! I ask the convention to pause and consider, and act for us as they would act for themselves. I implore them not to yield to any groundless prejudices or chimerical fears, but to stand boldly upon the broad platform of right and equality! Do so, and all will be safe! Let us mete out even handed, exact justice. Let us never make invidious distinctions, and we shall leave here, having made a constitution, which, with prayers on our lips of esto perpetua, we shall submit to the people for their approval, and return, individually, to the bosoms of our families, with the conscientious rectitude of having discharged our entire duty to our God, ourselves, and the entire state.

Mr. NUTTALL. I do not intend to vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Franklin, nor by giving that pledge do I wish to be understood as binding myself to support the views of gentlemen on the other side of the question. But I think that a constitutional limit ought to be introduced in the fundamental law, so as to prevent the large cities from drawing into their vortex the general legislation of the country. I shall vote to give Louisville a senator in order to disconnect her in that respect from the county of Jefferson. I intend to act in relation to the apportionment bill according to the dictates of my own judgment. There has been but one proposition submitted to the house, which strikes me as being correct, and that is the one presented by the gentleman from Knox and Harlan. When the proper time shall arrive, I purpose to make a further amendment, which, connected together, I think will be more conducive to the ends of justice, and throw into every region of the state a proper political weight. I subscribe to the fullest extent to the cardinal principle that numbers should be the basis of representation. But when was ever representation under the old constitution according to numbers? I recollect having a seat on this floor, when the county of Hardin—and like causes will produce like effects throughout all time—was entitled to two representatives, and the county of Meade to one. Yet, from party considerations operating most powerfully in the house of representatives, the county of Hardin was not permitted to have two representatives, nor the county of Meade one; but Hardin and Meade together had three.

Now, if you do not provide against this sort of political manoeuvring, it will be practiced in all time to come. And what remedy do I propose? It is to give each county a separate representation, and then you cannot gerrymander, manoeuvre and contrive so as to gerrymander one party in and another out. One good senator is enough for the city of Louisville; one man who has capacity is sufficient to represent any county and city in Kentucky. This will give a further guaranty to the people of the county that when you choose but one man, that man will be selected who is best qualified to represent, and who is best acquainted with the wishes and interests of the people.

The county of Bourbon which has some 16,000 or 17,000 voters, has two representatives here, and in the house of representatives, and mine has only one. Look at the county of Nelson, with perhaps not so many voters, yet having two representatives, while my county has but one. Look at the county of Kenton with 21,000 voters, and only one representative. Daviess has only one where there are 22,000 voters, and in Warren with about the same number; they each have but one representative. You talk about equality of representation! Why, so long as there are parties in this country, and you give them the power contemplated in this constitution, they will gerrymander as certain as you have a seat on this floor.

My plan gives to all the counties except nine or ten, just exactly the political weight which they now have, and they can have no more; and it exalts the smaller counties and gives to them their own representatives on the floor who understand their interests, and who live and move among them. It is much better for the country to have it in this way. I do not oppose the plan of the gentleman from Franklin because foreigners might have too much or too little influence in the country. I am too dull of comprehension, and my vision is too obtuse to see as far into a millstone as these gentlemen who have been pecking at it for the last three days. I am willing that large commercial cities shall grow up in this commonwealth, but I am not willing that six or eight cities shall combine and control, and crush the agricultural interests of the state. Sir, they control the commerce, the banks, and the capital of the country, and when they want prices high, they can effect it by combination. I do not say they will do it, but I would guard the rights and interest of the people. I do not appeal to selfishness, though I think there is a little on both sides. I may be operated upon by selfish considerations, but my county will gain nothing. It now has 1,800 or 1,900 voters; there they stand and there they live, and I have nothing to lose nor gain. But I address myself to gentlemen from small counties, whose political weight is not brought into consideration here; and I ask them to stand up for representation of each county in the state.

It is the boast of many of the representatives in South Carolina, that they can dine well all their constituents in a single day, and they boast also that their constituents are the best informed in the country. I know it is impossible—they can be as densely populated in the mountain regions as in the other parts of the state, but they have a pure atmosphere, and I am desirous that they shall be equally and justly represented.

My friend from Kenton says that numbers is, and ought to be the basis of representation. I say so too. I look at that basis just as a man contending for a great principle. I acknowledge it is as firm as the earth, as fixed as the heavens, and as immovable as the rock of Gibraltar. Nevertheless, when an exception to a rule arises, I shall go for it when it is on the basis of expediency and justice. Now if these cities have grown to so great an extent, I am glad of it, and I hope there may be five hundred more struggling for fame, but I am unwilling that when they shall have ten senators out of thirty eight, they shall be able to combine and draw the whole of the legislation of the state into the vortex of city legislation. Now if you give to each county in the state a representative, you cannot make an unfair apportionment law. You cannot unite Hardin and Meade in any future operations in politics, nor in any future convulsions of party, can leading whigs or democrats unite together two counties, and send three representatives, when being separate, one is entitled to two, and the other to one.

These rolling residiums, are mere foot-balls in the hands of skillful political tacticians, to roll and tumble about to suit particular occasions. I shall vote against the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, and when the gentleman from Knox brings forward his proposition to divide this state into an equal number of senatorial districts, I shall go for it; and then I shall, if I can gather strength enough in this house, obtain a representative for each county in the state. And by that time, as I have not had an opportunity—or if I have had I have not embraced it—I will examine the relative political strength of each county of the state. As gentlemen are in the habit, and take pleasure in arguing in figures, and sometimes in tropes, I shall, I repeat, take occasion to exhibit the relative political strength of the counties in the state, and shall show the perfect justice which this apportionment will give to each county.

I rose merely to indicate the course I shall pursue, as on former occasions I concurred with very few on this side of the question. Of one thing gentlemen may rest assured: let the result be what it may, I am not going to lose my temper. If you choose to vote down my proposition, I nevertheless shall go shoulder to shoulder with you in trying to make a good constitution.

Mr. CHRISMAN. I move that the committee rise, and I propose making a few remarks before the vote is taken on the question. I have been sitting here forty-five days, I believe, and we have made but little progress. Sir, I am tired of hearing these questions discussed. I came prepared to cast my vote on all subjects, and I am not so fickle as these speaking gentlemen would suppose. I cannot be changed by every speech made on this floor. I have my mind made up, and I suppose every gentleman has his mind made up on these questions. Now, my object is to get out of the committee of the whole. I do not believe we can get on in this way. We have tried it forty-five days, and what have we done? We have adopted the preamble and the first and second sections of the old constitution. I can make this motion without drawing down upon myself the charge of being a demagogue. My votes will demonstrate that I am not of that stripe. I am ready to do my duty, and I now call upon the non-speaking gentlemen to come to the rescue. Already public sentiment is rising against the instrument which we are forming, and unless we bring our labors speedily to a close, I doubt whether the result of our labors will be approved and adopted by the people of Kentucky. When we get out of committee of the whole, we can perfect the business of the convention. I do not want to gag any delegate. All I desire is, that we may place ourselves in such a position that we can proceed to business; but I see no way in which we can accomplish it, if we continue our present course. We have now a book of debates of some four or five hundred pages. If we continue this latitudinous debate, when can we ever get through? I hope we may go into convention, and then if bored to death with speeches, we can call the previous question. I am not afraid of the censure that delegates may be disposed to cast upon me for any step in this matter which my duty to the people may constrain me to take. Self-preservation will induce me to do it, for I have been bored forty-five days, and I do not feel disposed to be bored any longer. I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the house.

Mr. DAVIS. Is that motion in order, until we have voted on the pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. It has been the practice of the convention on previous occasions, and therefore I presume it is in order.

Mr. DAVIS. I never heard, sir, in any deliberative body, of a committee rising without first taking the question on every pending amendment. What, sir, will become of the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin?

It is clearly out of order to entertain such a motion, for the committee has first to dispose of the amendments pending, and then the amendments that may be offered, before the bill can be reported to the convention.

The CHAIRMAN. I will barely remark that this course has been pursued by the convention, and the present chairman does not feel at liberty to reverse what has been done before, although he thinks it is a practice of questionable propriety.

Mr. DAVIS. Sir, I never heard of such a practice in any deliberative body, and I again ask, what will become of the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendments adopted will be reported to the convention with the bill.

Mr. McHENRY. In the case to which the chairman refers, the committee rose, reported progress, and asked leave to sit again, and leave was refused.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I ask the gentleman to change his proposition. If he now makes the usual motion to rise and report progress, he can in convention, offer a resolution of instruction to the committee to proceed without debate to act upon amendments. But if we get the bill into the house without even reading many of its sections, we shall have great difficulty in the application of the previous question.

Mr. CHRISMAN. I will then simply make a motion to rise, and call upon all the non-speaking members of this convention, and upon those who want to do the business for which we have been sent here, to come up to the good work, and silence this eternal talking. I am tired of it.

Mr. TRIPLETT. If the committee now rise and we go into the convention on this bill, there are some amendments for which gentlemen are desirous to vote who wish to terminate debate, which there will not be an opportunity to offer. I could never offer my amendment which has been read here, if the gentleman adheres to his proposition, and it should be sustained by the house. I think the gentleman can attain his object by moving that the committee rise, and in convention offering a resolution to limit debate, and at a given time to report the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion which the gentleman has made is, that the committee rise, and report progress.

The question was taken on the motion and it was agreed to.

The committee then rose and by its chairman reported progress, and asked leave to sit again.

The PRESIDENT. The question is on granting leave to sit again.

Mr. MACHEN. Before that question is taken I should like to make an inquiry, as I am not very familiar with the rules of parliamentary bodies. I wish to know whether, in convention, we can offer and take the yeas and nays upon propositions which have not been submitted in committee of the whole. An intimation has been given here, that we cannot, and I wish to be informed on that point.

The PRESIDENT. Any amendment, in the opinion of the chair can be offered in convention whether it has been offered in committee of the whole or not.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The chair is perfectly correct, when the previous question is not called. I would again suggest that the usual course should be pursued, and in convention a resolution may be offered, instructing the committee of the whole to commence voting at such hour as may be deemed proper. Thus the debate may be ended. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Wayne, for any time I may have consumed in the debate.

The PRESIDENT. If the convention refuse leave to sit again, the bill will be taken up in convention, section by section, and if the previous question should be moved and sustained, it will bring the convention to a vote on the amendments that may be pending, and then on the main question, which will be the particular section under consideration. The convention will then proceed with the succeeding sections in their order, and they will each be debateable, unless the convention should exercise its power of enforcing the previous question. Such is the course of proceeding under the rule which we have for our government.

Mr. TRIPLETT. The object of the gentleman who moved that the committee rise is to cut off debate, but by his course he would cut off amendments also, and that I believe he does not desire.

Mr. CHRISMAN. I am not a good parliamentarian. This is the first time I have been in a deliberative body. I do not wish to cut off liberal discussion, but sir, here I have sat for forty-five days, listening to debates, from the continuance of which I can see no possible good that can result. Sir, I will stand it no longer, if there is any relief for me. I am desirous to vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Daviess. I shall also vote to restrict Louisville; but I want to stop this unceasing talking.

The question was then taken on granting leave to sit again, and it was agreed to.

Mr. TURNER. I have sat here all day and now I desire to move an adjournment—a motion which I am not much accustomed to make, nor was I, as a member of the legislature. But before I do it I wish to say a few words. There has been frequent allusion made to a speech which I delivered here some short time since, which I think a proper self-respect and a due regard for my constituents, will not permit me to pass over, without attempting to make some reply. I do not intend to say anything ill-natured. I am an old man, and I shall say nothing inconsistent with my own self-respect, but I intend to reply let what will come. I now move an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to, and the convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. STEUART ROBINSON.

INSTRUCTIONS TO CLOSE DEBATE.

Mr. CHRISMAN. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That all debate in committee of the whole, on the report of the committee on the legislative department, shall cease on the 16th instant, at 12 o'clock, M., and the committee shall then proceed to vote upon such amendments as are then pending, or may be thereafter offered: Provided, That the mover of any amendment may be allowed ten minutes, and any other delegate who may desire it, five minutes to explain or oppose the amendment, but in such limited debate, the speaker shall confine his remarks to the amendment under consideration.

My object in the proposition I made yesterday was to get to work. As I then stated, there was no delegate on this floor more willing to listen to a reasonable amount of discussion than myself, but forty-five days have been consumed in this body, and the non-speaking gentlemen have sat like a parcel of hawks when it was raining, and the harder it rained the more patient they sat. I regret that the junior gentleman from Nelson is not in his seat, but I desire to pay my respects to him this morning. Yesterday, he remarked that he begged the pardon of the gentleman from Wayne, for having consumed so much time in debate. I can say to the gentleman, that in one event I am willing to pardon him, and that is, if he will resume his position on the side of the question originally occupied by him. I understood him originally to be one of the warmest advocates for restricting this particular region of country on the Ohio river in her representation. I have trespassed upon the time of this house very little, but I have given considerable attention to the gentleman's speeches delivered on this floor; and when the gentleman on yesterday evening sneeringly asked my pardon for having occupied so much time, I did take it as unkind. I have noticed a disposition on the part of some delegates here to cut down every young man who attempts to bring forward any proposition. I recollect when the proposition of the gentleman from Lewis was offered the other day, the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) rose in his place and rebuked him for it. Now, I intend to reply to such rebukes when directed to me, come from what quarter they may. I did not move the resolution with a view of making any capital at home. As I remarked yesterday, forty-five days have been consumed in debate. We have gotten out the material for a new constitution, and it lies on the ground, and all that is necessary is, for the non-speaking members to come right up to the good work and erect the building: if we sit here, with our fingers in our mouths, this speaking will continue to the first of next June. For one, when we have had debate to a reasonable extent, I am disposed to cut it off, and march up to the vote. If I am mistaken in the charge I have made against the gentleman from Nelson, or to his having occupied a position on both sides of this question, I am not mistaken when I say he has occupied each side of every leading question that has agitated this union for half a century. The first election I have any recollection of, the gentleman led the whig party as a candidate for the office of lieutenant governor. He stood forth as the standard bearer of the whig party. Shortly after that time, I believe he was found in the ranks of the democratic party. Again, in 1840, he was found in the ranks of the whig party fighting under the banner of Tippecanoe and Tyler too. Following the gentleman through his political life, I find that when John Tyler was kicked out and stood between the two great parties, the gentleman came to his relief, and he was found fighting under the banner of that recreant. Again, a year or two since, when the race for an election of member of congress came off in his district, I find him with the democratic banner unfurled, fighting in advocacy of the claims of the democratic party. Sir, when gentlemen throw out such intimations, and when they endeavor to prejudice me at home, and sneer at what I say on this floor, I will expose their political aberrations to the country. Now I want the gentleman's constituents and this house to know that, on this particular question, he was foremost in declaring his hostility against that portion of the country from which you, Mr. President, come, and that now he is found battling on the side of Louisville.

The PRESIDENT. I will take this occasion to remark, if we are to confine our attention to the points in issue at present, we shall have an opportunity to attend to these remarks. I hope we shall confine ourselves to the matter in issue.

Mr. HARGIS. I shall feel compelled to oppose the gentleman's motion to stop all discussion on the 16th of this month, because I know several gentlemen on this floor who desire to express their sentiments on this subject, and whose constituents are anxious to learn them. While other delegates have spoken on this floor, I have said nothing, although the discussion has continued for nearly a week. I beg the indulgence of the house therefore for a few minutes, and I shall not trouble it again till the vote is taken.

I belong to a party that holds the opinion that representation should always be based on population. In that principle I was educated; I know no other; and I hope never to advocate any other. But is there nothing else to be considered in apportioning and giving equality and justice to this mode of representation? I have always believed that a system of legislation has existed as well under the United States government as the governments of the states, having for its object the protection of the few and the weak from the power of the great, and the mighty, and the strong. The framers of the constitution of the United States adopted that as its principle of action. Gentlemen here say that the organization of the government of the United States has no analogy to that of the states, and that the states are sovereignties. It is true they are sovereign, and that a part of their sovereignty is represented in the senate of the United States, each state having an equal voice and participation in the proceedings of that body. There Rhode Island and Delaware have an equal voice with New York. And for what reason? That the interests and welfare of the smaller states may be protected against the influence of the greater, more populous, and powerful states. When that arrangement was made in the convention which framed the constitution of the United States, it was also agreed that the general government should guarantee to each state a republican form of government. I maintain then that that arrangement, notwithstanding the assertions of some gentlemen to the contrary, does bear an analogy to the government of the States.

Mr. BROWN. I rise to a question of order. I am not for restricting legitimate debate, but it is impossible for us to make any progress with the business before us, unless the debate be confined within reasonable limits to the question properly under consideration. The gentleman is now discussing the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, which is pending in committee of the whole, when the question before the house is on the resolution of the gentleman from Wayne.

Mr. HARGIS. I know what is before the convention. And I see that a disposition, as has been truly said, exists here on the part of some gentlemen to bear down on certain delegates, whom they do not wish to hear speak. I have seen it. The convention has seen it. It seems to me we cannot say anything without being declared out of order. The oldest gentlemen present differ as to what is or what is not in order, and for myself, I confess I do not understand the rules, and what is in order I cannot tell.

Mr. BROWN. The gentleman has mistaken my purpose. I wish to bring the house to the consideration of the resolution of the gentleman from Wayne, which is properly before it. I have no disposition to restrict debate, when it is in order, but the gentleman is discussing the amendment of the gentleman from Franklin, when, in fact, the resolution offered by the gentleman from Wayne is the legitimate subject before us.

Mr. HARGIS. What amendment do you mean? I do not understand.

The PRESIDENT. I feel great reluctance to call any gentleman to order, and require a strict adherence to the matter under debate. Sometime since I was overruled by the house when I called the gentleman now in possession of the floor to order, and leave was given him to proceed. I thought that was an admonition to the chair that each gentleman could proceed as he thought proper, and that if delegates choose to let him run riot, it was not a matter for the interference of the chair. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. HARGIS. It is extremely embarrassing that many gentlemen get in this way in this house. It appears we cannot get along in harmony and proceed with our business as we should do. I have contended that there is a difference in representation where there is a vastly crowded population in the cities and large towns, than where it is scattered in the country. I believe the states generally have acted upon that principle, in the organization of their representation. The state of Maryland amended her constitution in 1838, and gave the city of Baltimore one senator. She has twenty-one counties, and each of them is represented by a senator. The large state of Pennsylvania gives her city of Philadelphia, as all other cities should have, four senators only. New Orleans, in the state of Louisiana, with a population of one hundred and fifty thousand souls—one-third of the population of the state, is entitled, under her new constitution, made in 1845, to four senators, and she is never to have more. Richmond, in the state of Virginia, has one senator and three representatives. Now, in all the older states that have, of late years, amended their constitutions—as for instance, Maryland, Louisiana, Pennsylvania, and Virginia—they have inserted a provision, limiting their cities to a certain number of senators.

The great city of New York can never overbalance the state in the legislature; hence the reason why the framers of the constitution inserted no restriction in it on the subject. Ohio is a very large state, and no apprehension need be entertained that her cities will obtain an advantage over the remainder of the state. There would be some danger in not putting a restriction upon the cities of Baltimore and New Orleans, in reference to the number of senators to which they are entitled, because in those cities the population is rapidly increasing, and there is a possibility that the rest of Maryland and Louisiana may be put entirely in the power of these large cities. When large bodies of people are thrown into cities, the presumption is they can be better represented by a small delegation than a large district can. A man living in a city knows all the wants of the community, and he can, consequently, better represent five thousand souls, than he could a population of two thousand living in any other portion of the state. Louisville has about fifty thousand people, and fifty years hence she may have two hundred thousand, and if so, she will have the power to control the legislative department of the state. Therefore the necessity of our imposing a check, and restricting her to a certain number of senators. My plan, however, of doing so, is different from any other yet proposed. I would give that city four senators. Whatever the supposition may be, I do not think gentlemen here have any unkind feelings towards Louisville. The cities of Newport, Covington, and Lexington, also will become great cities, and have large populations, and they must, at some future day, be limited to a certain number of senators, or they may control the legislation of this state.

I think that the question of slavery has nothing to do with this subject. I do not know that it would make any great difference whether the proposed representation is given to Louisville, or not, so far as slavery is concerned. I am willing to give my opinion about it, let me belong to what party I may. I wish that my opinion may go forth, and that is, that when cities become very large, there should be a check imposed on their power of legislation.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFE. Mr. President: I was not in my seat at the commencement of the discussion upon this resolution, and I am indebted to the information of gentlemen, for my knowledge of the manner in which my name has been introduced by the delegate from Wayne, into this morning's discussion. I know not under what pretext that assault was made upon me, especially as that gentleman was a stranger to me personally, previous to the time that I first met him in this hall. So far as I know my own feelings, they have been any thing else than unkind towards him, and I have avoided in matter, manner, and intention, any thing which might give him the slightest cause of complaint.

Nothing could have surprised me more than the language applied to me. Had I said any thing in matter or manner, or had I done any thing which he considered a cause of complaint on yesterday, and had he, either then or in private, asked an explanation, or suggested that I had done him injustice, or wounded his feelings, or his just pride on this floor, no man would have been more anxious and ready than myself, to have made that atonement which is due from one gentleman to another, when he supposes he has been injured.

I must, therefore, suppose that this has been somewhat a matter of premeditation, of nightly concoction; perhaps not entirely prompted by the gentleman's own sense of offended feelings. I must be permitted to say, on this occasion, and I think I may appeal to my fellow delegates on this floor, whether my habit, either in the house or out of it, has been that of discourtesy to my equals and associates in debate.

It is true, sir, that I have conceived myself, occasionally, somewhat the object of attack upon points not exactly connected with the subject of immediate consideration; and the propriety of repelling that attack, the time and mode, was a subject matter of my own consideration.

Little did I expect sir, that we were to have new recruits enlisted in this crusade, in reference to the political consistency of the humble individual before you. It is true, that I partake of the frailty of my fellow men. I pretend not to be infallible either in politics, in opinion, or in judgment, and he who asserts his claims to confidence, because of his own supposed infallibility and undeviating consistency, may sometimes learn a lesson by a review of his own life, to see how far his pretensions are sustained by a reference to his own history and political biography. If he shall feel incompetent to the task I would advise him to call to his aid some kind friend.

Mr. President, I have spent, by the kindness of my fellow citizens, with whom I was born and brought up, almost half a century in public life. I have seen parties rise and fall, and political dynasties pass almost into oblivion in this commonwealth, as well as in this Union. I have had in an humble degree, a portion and part in some of these exciting scenes, which have past.

I have had occasion, sir, to review my own actions and my own opinions. I have seen on my pathway errors, that experience and a more matured judgment have pointed out in my political course, and the part I have been called on to take in the party contests which have passed, yet I have had the consolation, which to me is worth more than the opinion of the man, of to day, to know that in no political act of my life, when called upon to discharge the duties of public agent, have I ever been governed by any other principle than a desire to promote the great interests of the commonwealth, as I understood and believed them to be at the time. No personal, no political advancement has ever swayed or governed that little quantum of judgment which my God gave me, when called upon to act with reference to the great interests entrusted to me by kind and confiding fellow citizens.

I understand the delegate was pleased to say that I had been on both sides of the present question before the house. I thought I announced yesterday—and if the gentleman had done me the honor to listen to me, he would have understood it, the first opinions entertained by me on this question. I said I had come here, I had entered this hall and before I had heard the debate, impressed with the opinion that something should be done in reference to consolidated constituencies, represented by consolidated numbers in the legislative department of the government, but that the debate which had taken place, had satisfied me that the mode proposed by ostracising and proscribing a portion of the freemen from a participation in the councils of the state, was not a just and correct mode of doing it. I said if it could not be done in some other mode, I had made up my mind to risk the possible evil with the country. I am willing to trust to that judgment and patriotism of my fellow citizens, which under the guidance of a kind providence had conducted them in safety through all former dangers, and I hope that the same spirit would guide us through the anticipated evils of such a state of things as this amendment presupposes.

But sir, the delegate from Wayne is not the first gentleman who has been pleased, within the halls of this house, to allude to what they have called my political inconsistencies. Possibly sir, in the opinion of that gentleman and those who think with him, and whose purposes he may be serving, I have in some respects greatly politically sinned. But sir, I would remind gentlemen “who live in glass houses, not to throw stones,” and he who has not changed his opinions, if he ever had any, upon some of the great leading questions of state or national policy and expediency, which have arisen within the last thirty years, may be authorised to sit in judgment upon me; but I deny that right to either of the gentlemen who have assumed to be my accusers. But those who have, like myself, upon conviction of the error of opinion, changed that opinion, should at least remember to exercise judgment in charity upon a fellow sinner. I know not whether the delegate from Wayne is obnoxious to the charge of ever having changed any political opinion which he may have entertained; for to me his course is unknown and uncared for. Upon our introduction at the commencement of the session, he made a favorable impression, and I regret he has given me cause to change the opinion I then formed.

Mr. President: I cannot so well meet this charge of political inconsistency, so improperly for a second time introduced into this hall, first by my colleague, and now by the delegate from Wayne, without a reference to some few of the prominent questions upon which I have been called to act. In doing so, I hope I shall be pardoned by this house for any thing of seeming egotism. It is necessary that I should speak of myself to do myself justice.

I was elected a member of congress from what was called the Louisville district, amidst the conflict for the presidency of the United States, then waged between those distinguished individuals, Clay, Crawford, Jackson, Adams, and Calhoun. In that contest, so long as the statesman from Kentucky was in the field, I was for him, as was at that time nine-tenths of the state of Kentucky, and I have no doubt the gentleman, if old enough to take part and cast his vote, voted for him in that contest. This election for the office of president, as neither candidate received a majority, devolved on the house of representatives, of which I was an humble member, one of the twelve delegates from this state. As such I was called upon to cast the sovereign voice of Kentucky, between Gen. Jackson and Mr. Adams. At that point, perhaps, commenced, in the estimation of some who never change, my political sins. Independent of my own judgment as to what was the voice of Kentucky, and particularly those who had sent me to proclaim their voice, I was furnished with official light by legislative resolution. The citizens of Kentucky were undivided in sentiment. The popular voice everywhere proclaimed that, as between Jackson and Adams, it was the duty, ay, the bounden duty of the delegates from Kentucky, to cast her vote against Adams and in favor of Jackson.

We were not left to conjecture this opinion and decide upon our duty by our own judgment; but your legislature was then in session, and I have the resolution they passed and the speeches made by the statesmen of that time, instructing me, and calling upon me as one of the delegates charged with that high trust, by considerations that it is not necessary for me to state, to cast the vote as I did give it. It was in accordance with my own judgment, and I gave it with pleasure, but that has cost me trouble—though no regret—not tears. When I returned home to my constituency to give an account of my stewardship in thus carrying out their will and the orders of the legislature, I found the very men—yes sir, men who charged me with political inconsistency—who had been instrumental in procuring this legislative mandate—whose speeches in the legislature I hold in my hand—upon the stump in my county and district, attempting to destroy the prospects of a young politician—to undermine the confidence of his constituency in him because he had acted honestly, and obeyed the dictates of the legislature, and the still higher commands of public sentiment upon him.

My constituency continued to return me to congress for ten years, and as you know, Mr. President, and you can do me the justice to say, longer than I desired to remain. There sprung up in my pathway, during a portion of my political pilgrimage in the national councils questions, about which at one time there seemed to be no division among the politicians or the population of this state. I allude to the necessity of the United States Bank. I looked upon the power of congress to charter an institution of that kind as a question which had received the settled opinions of the people, or as lawyers term it, it was res adjudicata. It was only then a question of public policy and necessity. I voted to re-charter that bank, because I labored under the belief of its necessity, inculcated by events which took place in the war of 1812, and the consequent evils growing out of it—a deranged and prostrated paper currency. I had looked to that institution as a great purifier and regulator of the state paper currency. I thought Gen. Jackson committed an error when he vetoed the bill to re-charter that bank. Was I alone in Kentucky in this opinion among those who had voted with me, and who with me contributed to the elevation to the presidency of that great man? I thought him wrong in some measures that succeeded the veto of the act to re-charter that institution, and this difference upon a question of policy respecting the currency, separated me from what was then called the Jackson party in Kentucky. And during the excitement of subsequent elections and contests in the commonwealth of Kentucky, this difference of opinion necessarily called down upon me the denunciation of the partizan presses of the day. I defended myself, and in this defence I have no doubt I dealt blows as hard as those I received, and probably as often undeserved.

Mr. President: Sixty winters have made the impress of their frosts upon my head, and men of but to-day, and others whose years have not improved their habits, or softened their feelings, take pleasure in perpetuating their names by connecting them with political sins imputed to me. Among their charges sir, I understand the delegate has referred to the fact that I joined the administration of Mr. John Tyler.

It is true sir, that without any knowledge on my part, and without the slightest expectation, with no personal desire or political ambition to gratify, sufficiently powerful to induce me to tear myself from the retirement of a quiet and happy home, upon the disruption of the cabinet of Mr. Tyler, with the particulars of which I have nothing to do—and I would scorn to introduce them into this house, and harrow up the feelings or perpetrate an outrage on the humblest individual in the community—unexpectedly, I received the appointment of Post Master General, accompanied by a private letter from that gentleman, with whom I had lived and been associated at Washington for many years upon terms of the utmost personal kindness, and which I suppose begat in his bosom a confidence in my integrity and capacity for the duties of one of the most laborious departments belonging to the federal government. He placed my acceptance of that commission on the ground of private friendship to him, and without reference to political considerations. At the sacrifice of much of individual comfort, and individual convenience; I had the temerity, without consulting the delegate from Wayne, or the other gentleman in this house who thinks with him, to accept that office, and to discharge the duties to the best of my humble capacity. What the judgment of public sentiment may be on my official acts, and official duties, I will leave to be decided by my country, whose province it is, content to meet its decision.

It is not my purpose, nor is it necessary that I should speak of the measures of that administration. When the member from Wayne himself shall pass from this stage of existence; when perhaps there will be left scarcely a grave stone to tell the passer by who lies beneath the sod of the valley which covers his remains; the results of that administration, the consequences which flow from its measures, guided by no selfish or sectional policy, looking alone to the great interest of our great and common country—an administration standing amid the crash and rush of both great political parties for a time, each seeking who could be most powerful to crush it, disgrace its head, and his humble associates—I say, when he shall have passed from the memory of man, and the historian shall come to record some of the events which have stamped and given it character—aye sir, and I might almost say a new and independent destiny to our common country, and opened up to the world, broad and wide, her shores, her enterprise, and liberty to the oppressed of all the world—justice will be done to those whom it is the pleasure of others now seeking distinction, to denounce and condemn.

Sir, during my association with that administration, the question of the annexation of Texas was presented. I saw, or at least I thought I saw, that unless the United States acted, and acted promptly, and with united public sentiment and political energy, our western limits would be circumscribed by the little stream of the Sabine—that we should have an empire hostile to our institutions spreading along the most defenceless portion of our southern frontier, the southern slave-holding states. I thought I saw in the annexation of that country an almost absolute necessity, if we desired to preserve and promote the prosperity, and give quiet to the planter and cotton grower of that portion of the union. I did not act alone. I acted, it is true, in accordance with my own judgment, but I always like to have that judgment aided by the counsels of older heads. I consulted some of these from my own state. Their advice to me was, by all means, accomplish the annexation of Texas, we must have it, and we ought to have it. And I was told that now was the time to take it. I need not say who they were; there is one, at least, present will bear witness. Sir, my surprise was great I confess, when I looked across the mountains and saw the political conflict of the presidential race of 1844, to find the very men who had advised me to the measure of annexation, on the stump denouncing it as a measure wicked, unholy and unworthy of our people. Some of these men now arraign me by a charge of a change in my political sentiments. It was during my administration of the post office department, I became satisfied that the opinions I had entertained of the necessity of a bank of the United States as a government agent, were founded in error. In that department alone, I found myself able to collect, by dimes and half dimes, a revenue of between four and six millions of dollars, and safely to keep and disburse it without a United States bank. And the records of our country will not show in that department the loss of a single dollar by defalcation while I had the honor of managing its finances, save in the case of one postmaster, in the region of country near the locality of the gentleman from Wayne, I know not exactly where, whom I detected in having altered his post bills, and thus causing the loss of about forty dollars a year, for some years.

Mr. President: It will be remembered that during the years 1841 and 1842-3, the bank of the United States, which had originally charmed a large portion of my native state into its support—the supposed necessity of whose existence had led me to believe that a great error had been committed by Gen. Jackson, in the exercise of the veto power—exploded, when the stockholders entered its vaults and opened its books, examined its papers and exposed its financial operations for a series of fifteen or twenty years; there was an exposure of political corruption and fraud, in the financial operations of that bank, which stunk in the nostrils of the nation; transactions which had been concealed from a committee of congress, sent to make an investigation into the condition of the bank; at the head of which was McDuffie and Col. Johnson, of our state. Yes, Mr. President, so concealed as to induce that committee to report that all which had been charged against the bank was untrue and false. I believed it. But when the books were opened to the stockholders, they found their pockets robbed, the country cheated, and themselves bankrupt. Yes sir, there were children, of a citizen of my own county, whose whole property was invested in that institution, some thirty or forty thousand dollars, robbed of every dollar of their estate. But that was only as a drop in the bucket, compared with other cases of loss. I became satisfied on looking into the transactions of the bank thus exposed, and on a review of my former opinions on that subject, and the opinions of that man, whose judgment was more matured, and different from mine, and stronger of course, and better informed, that he was governed by the highest sense of justice in vetoing the bill; that he was right and I was wrong. And I had the boldness, the temerity, folly perhaps, in the opinion of some, the feeling thus, not only to act upon a sense of right, but to acknowledge it. Who among us now advocates the charter of a United States Bank?

I am not governed nor influenced by the course of policy, which has governed and influenced others. Whenever I am satisfied that I am wrong on a political question, a question of policy, or one involving a principle, I take the consequences of acknowledging that error. It is more magnanimous, more consoling to my conscience than to persevere in error. And when the annexation of Texas was made the great leading question upon which the contest for the presidency of 1844 was made to turn, I had no choice but the choice which my judgment dictated, and that was, that the annexation of that country to the United States was demanded by the highest political and self-preserving principles in reference to our future destiny; and if my venerated father, then reposing in his grave, had been living, and a candidate for the presidency, and had opposed the annexation of Texas, I would have cast my little might in the scale against him. This contest brought me again into political union with the democratic party. My principles of government ever have been democratic, and I hope ever will be. They have not, nor will not be made to depend upon expediency, or the choice of a president. The charge of inconsistency, come from what quarter it may, will not change the honest purpose of my soul—a desire ever to do right. Mr. President, I am in one respect like king Lear in the play. "Tray Blanche and Sweetheart, all bark at me." Bark on I say, I shall not calm you by whistling.

I beg pardon of this convention for thus throwing too much of my own affairs and political history before it. I could not do less. I hope I shall have no occasion again to do it, and I can assure the delegate who has been the immediate cause of thus compelling me to do what I most sincerely regret the necessity of doing, that I had no intention, purpose, nor design of casting censure upon him, or wounding his feelings. My own self-respect and a regard for the decorum of this body, forbid that I should, without cause, violate its sense of propriety.

Mr. CHRISMAN. The gentleman says he does not know under what circumstances I introduced his name. When I made the motion yesterday evening, I said I was anxious to get along with the business of the convention; that we were making very little progress, and that already from the hills and hollows of Kentucky there was arising a complaint against this body. Action was demanded. I heard it from every member that left this floor to visit his constituents on his return, that complaints were being made in the country, and that the people demanded that this body should move forward in the great work they were sent here to perform. The gentleman from Nelson yesterday, after I had indicated a disposition to proceed with our labors, arose and very sneeringly remarked that he begged pardon of the gentlemen from Wayne, for the time he had consumed in his speeches upon this floor. I understood that sneer and observation sir. It was a sort of left-handed "lick" at me. It was intended to show me up rather badly to the people I have the honor to represent on this floor.

Any proposition coming from me, the gentleman could sneeringly strike out of the way, disposing of me as he attempted to dispose of the honorable gentleman from Lewis, the other morning, when he offered his resolution to hold evening sessions. He says I was not prompted by a sense of offended feeling, intimating that some other gentleman had prompted me to make the attack upon him, as I understand it. Now sir, no gentleman prompted me. I was prompted by his own conduct. His sneer of yesterday prompted me to say what I did. I know what I said, and I knew he would obtain the information when he came into the house. I am sorry he was not here, but I felt certain the facts would be related to him, and sure enough the moment he arrived he was taken out of the hall, and every thing was communicated to him that I did say. I did charge that the gentleman had taken both sides of this question, and I repeat it here; but I was not aware that he confessed it yesterday. I am prepared to show that he has occupied two sides of this question. There are several gentlemen on this floor by whom I can prove that the gentleman was urging that Louisville and the district bordering on the Ohio river should be restricted in representation; but yesterday he rose in his place and joined the ranks of those who resisted the restriction, and made an able speech against the opinions he had thrown out for several days to some members of this body. I did say that if the rumor I had heard was incorrect, he at least had occupied both sides of every great question that had agitated the country. This morning he comes forward and acknowledges the corn; acknowledges that he has been every man's man; that he has occupied every side of this great question. He alludes to my political course. Well, sir, it is true, I was caught in the coon skin frolick of 1840. I supported "Tippecanoe" and your own beloved "Tyler too." But when Tyler turned traitor and deserted his friends; when he showed himself a Judas, I followed not John Tyler; and he is the last man that walks the soil of this proud confederacy I would follow. The gentleman says he has no doubt that in the contest between Jackson and Crawford, and Clay, I was found voting for Clay. I was a very small boy at that time, and was not entitled to a vote. He thinks I am piqued because he detected a speculating postmaster in my town, who had swindled the government out of $40. The postmaster in my town was my political and personal enemy, and in all the races I have run in my county he has been against me. He has exerted all the influence he could bring to bear not only to defeat me for the state legislature, but also for this convention.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I did not allude to the post-master of Wayne. He is not the gentleman I referred to.

Mr. CHRISMAN. There is not a more high-minded and respectable gentleman in Kentucky than the post-master he removed, whilst he was the Post-master general of John Tyler. In justice to him I say it, notwithstanding he is my personal and political enemy. I would ask the gentleman, how it is he occupies a seat on this floor from the county of Nelson, where there is a whig majority of six or seven hundred?

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I will answer the question. The citizens of that county are honest, well thinking, generous people. They happened to think me an honest man, and trustworthy, although they differed with me on some questions of national policy, and that is the way I got my appointment.

Mr. CHRISMAN. Well, I did not know but there had been another political revolution. I am not posted up as he seems to intimate. I have not pestered myself about his political history, but I did suppose another political revolution had taken place, for I knew there was a whig majority in Nelson of some six or seven hundred, and I supposed he had to make some concessions to get here. But he says they wanted an honest, clever man, and hence they selected him.

When I came here, I had the kindest feelings for the gentleman from Nelson, and was prepared to vote for him cheerfully to preside over this body; but the left handed blow he gave me yesterday did not sit well upon me. The motion I made was not for the purpose of making political capital at home, nor any where else. I knew that I should be attacked from every quarter in this house, and that it would be said that it was done for effect.

Sir, I came here prepared to vote on all occasions, and I consider questions as they arise, and having duly weighed them, I make up my mind, and I am not as fickle as a woman of sixty, changing and undergoing revolutions every twenty four hours. If I were as fickle as the gentleman has shown himself to be, I would stand here and elamor for debate till the first of next January. I would call upon the house to give me light that I might be enabled to vote correctly upon all questions. I do not make up my mind very hastily, and when it is made up, I do not very frequently have occasion to change it.

Mr. President, I have thought it proper, in justification of myself to submit these remarks, and I shall now leave them with the convention, which will doubtless give them all the consideration, to which they may be entitled. I now move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BOYD. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the sixteenth and inserting the nineteenth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL moved the previous question, which was sustained.

And the question being taken on the resolution it was adopted.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. BOYD offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified electors therein. The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation as aforesaid, the state shall be districted into twelve districts:

DISTRICT No. 1. To consist of the counties of Fulton, Hickman, Graves, Ballard, McCracken, Calloway, Marshall, and Livingston.

DISTRICT No. 2. To consist of the counties of Trigg, Christian, Caldwell, Crittenden, Union, Henderson, and Hopkins.

DISTRICT No. 3. To consist of the counties of Todd, Muhlenburg, Logan, Simpson, Allen, Warren, Butler, and Edmonson.

DISTRICT No. 4. To consist of the counties of Daviess, Ohio, Hancock, Breckinridge, Grayson, Hart, Larue, Hardin, and Meade.

DISTRICT No. 5. To consist of the counties of Monroe, Barren, Cumberland, Clinton, Adair, Green, Taylor, Wayne, and Russell.

DISTRICT No. 6. To consist of the counties of Jefferson, Bullitt, Nelson, Shelby, Spencer, Washington, and Marion.

DISTRICT No. 7. To consist of the counties of Oldham, Trimble, Henry, Franklin, Owen, Carroll, Gallatin, Grant, and Boone.

DISTRICT No. 8. To consist of the counties of Scott, Harrison, Pendleton, Kenton, Campbell, Nicholas, Mason, and Bracken.

DISTRICT No. 9. To consist of the counties of Fayette, Woodford, Bourbon, Clarke, Jessamine, Anderson, Mercer, Boyle, and Garrard.

DISTRICT No. 10. To consist of the counties of Lewis, Fleming, Bath, Montgomery, Morgan, Greenup, Carter, Lawrence, and Johnson.

DISTRICT No. 11. To consist of the counties of Estill, Owsley, Breathitt, Floyd, Pike, Perry, Letcher, Clay, and Harlan.

DISTRICT No. 12. To consist of the counties of Madison, Rockcastle, Lincoln, Laurel, Casey, Pulaski, Whitley, and Knox.

In the year and every fourth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the qualified electors of the state shall be made in such manner as shall be directed by law.

In the several years of making such enumeration, each district shall be entitled to representatives equal to the number of times the ratio is contained in the whole number of qualified electors in said districts: Provided, That the remaining representatives, after making such apportionment, shall be given to those districts having the largest unrepresented fractions.

Representatives to which each district may be entitled, shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, and towns, of the district, as near as may be, in proportion to the number of qualified electors; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of qualified electors to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjacent county or counties, within the district, may not have a residuum or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representation, it shall then be in the power of the legislature to join two or more together, for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining, and in the same district, which have residuums over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio, in that case, one representative shall be added to the county having the largest residuum.

Mr. BOYD. I move to refer that resolution to the committee of the whole, and that it be printed. My object in submitting this resolution is to have it brought to the knowledge of the convention, as I shall offer it as a substitute for the sixth section of the report of the committee on the legislative department, when the proper time comes.

The motion to print and refer was agreed to.

The convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the report of the committee on the legislative department, Mr. MERIWETHER in the chair.

Mr. THOMPSON. The question before the committee is one of great interest, but was it one of those questions that were discussed before the people? What were the questions discussed, and what were the reforms demanded by the people when the delegates to this convention were elected? Was the disfranchisement of a portion of the free citizens of this commonwealth one of them? If it were, it was not heard of in my section of the country. The questions which were discussed in my county were a curtailment of the sessions of the legislature, so that the sessions shall be held every second or third year, instead of annually—the placing of the appointing power in the hands of the people, instead of in the hands of the executive—the limiting of the elections of officers of the commonwealth to one day—and the restricting of the power of the legislature in the passage of local acts, and in contracting state debts. On the question of slavery, too, my constituents have their views: they believe that that subject should remain as it is in the present constitution, and as it was in the constitution of 1792; or if change is necessary, that that change shall be as little as possible. I have heard no complaints that the present constitution does not protect the rights of slave-holders; no such reason was given for calling this convention. The prominent reason was, that the people might take into their own hands the election of their own officers; and the question now before the committee is one in which my constituents have no immediate interest; they certainly did not expect that any portion of the freemen of this commonwealth were to be deprived of the right of equal suffrage in electing their representatives and of equal representation in the councils of the state. Was that question discussed before the constituents of any gentleman on this floor? If it was, it never reached my ears. And what is the reason given for such an infringement of the rights of a portion of the people of this commonwealth? Sir, I have heard no other reason alleged than that I understood to be given by the gentleman from Madison (Mr. Turner,) for restricting the representation in cities, that it is necessary for the protection of the institution of slavery.

And, sir, a portion of this commonwealth, extending from Greenup county to Hickman, ten miles out from the river, is to be denounced and disfranchised, I suppose, in order to protect the institution of slavery. Why, sir, you cannot place in the hands of the emancipationists a more powerful weapon, than by adopting this principle of proscribing a portion of our state. I would advise gentlemen to look a little at home before they travel so far. What was the poll of the emancipation vote in Madison county? It was six hundred and eighty eight votes. What was the emancipation vote taken in your county, Mr. Chairman? It was five hundred and fifteen. The party, headed by that man of distinguished talents, character and worth—the great Ajax of the emancipation party of this commonwealth. What was the ground taken by the delegates from Louisville? I can testify to their gallant bearing throughout the struggle, to secure the rights and the property of those very gentlemen who are now endeavoring to disfranchise them. How is it in the county of Kenton, one of the border counties on the Ohio? What pledge does Kenton send here, that she is fit to participate in the rights of representation? Her representative has told you, in a manner that does him honor as a man, and as a delegate. Proscribe the citizens of Louisville, send their delegates back, place them without the pale of the constitution, but by doing so, you secure to the emancipation party a more glorious triumph than if they had beaten you and the delegation from Louisville in the contest, and had elected the whole of their ticket. Gentlemen say that the population of Louisville will increase so wonderfully, that there is danger they will become—if I may use the term—a mammoth population. Do gentlemen suppose that the country is to stand still meanwhile? Most certainly not. The population of the country will increase pari passu with the population of the towns. Whom do we disfranchise by placing this restriction upon the cities? Are not the sons of all the different counties in the state, in the city of Louisville? Go there, and you will find the sons of old Nelson, the mother of counties south of Salt river. Do you not find there the sons of Bullitt, and of Shelby, and of Spencer, who have made that city the home of their adoption? Are you willing to deprive them of the rights that the people of other parts of the state enjoy, and that they would enjoy, if they lived in another part of the state? It is a very strange doctrine, that a man may be a freeman in Frankfort, but if he thinks proper to remove to Louisville or Covington, his right of suffrage is to be abrogated. It is, I say, strange doctrine to me, to be preached in a free country.

It is an important question sir. Suppose gentlemen were to introduce a resolution here, confiscating the property of any freeman in this commonwealth, I have no doubt every delegate would be horror-stricken at the idea. Are not the political rights which freemen enjoy in this commonwealth dearer to them than the right of property? Nay, are they not dearer to them than the very air they breathe? Are you willing then, to deprive them of those inestimable political rights, the right of suffrage, and the right of representation? Why, sir, this it is that constitutes a freeman; this it is that constitutes the difference between the freemen of this glorious confederacy, and the subjects of the monarchies of Europe. A man may own property in Turkey or in Russia, but to be a freeman there is a vain and idle thought. I would be the last man on earth to violate vested rights, or to deprive the citizen of his property; and equally adverse would I be to deprive any freeman of this commonwealth of those high political privileges that all freemen value so highly.

It seems to be admitted by almost every gentleman, that the true basis of representation is population. But, say they, it becomes a matter of self-defence, to impose certain restrictions. As was justly remarked by the gentleman from Kenton yesterday, upon gentlemen who make this assertion rests the onus probandi. Ei incumbit probatio, qui dicit non qui negat. And I call upon those gentlemen who lay down this proposition for the proof. What proof have you that it is necessary to disfranchise these citizens, in order to secure your own safety? Have not the people of Louisville, and of Kenton county—who are now menaced with the loss of their political privileges—sent to this convention living evidences that they are true to their state? that they are prepared to protect all the great interests of the state? They have sir. But how have other states regulated this matter? Have they proposed to disfranchise any of their citizens? No sir. I refer you to their constitutions for the truth of my assertion. The fourth article, third section, of the constitution of Wisconsin, is as follows:

"The legislature shall provide, by law, for an enumeration of the inhabitants of the state, in the year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-five, and at the end of every ten years thereafter, and at the end of their first session after such enumeration, and also after each enumeration made by the authority of the United States, the legislature shall apportion and district anew the members of the senate and assembly, according to the number of inhabitants, excluding Indians not taxed, and soldiers and officers of the United States army and navy."

In the fourth article, thirty-first section, of the constitution of Iowa, I find this provision:

"The number of senators and representatives shall, at the first regular session of the general assembly after such enumeration, be fixed by law, and apportioned among the several counties according to the number of white inhabitants in each, &c.

In the constitution of Texas, the basis of representation is qualified electors.

In Arkansas, representation is regulated according to the number of free white male inhabitants.

In Michigan, the basis of representation is fixed according to the number of white inhabitants.

In Florida, the senatorial representation is based on population.

In Missouri, representation is apportioned according to the number of free white male inhabitants.

In Alabama, representation is regulated by the number of white inhabitants.

In Illinois, representation is based on the number of white inhabitants.

In Mississippi, it is placed upon the number of free white inhabitants.

In Indiana, representation is based on the number of white male inhabitants of the age of twenty-one years.

In Ohio, it is the same as in Indiana.

In Tennessee, representation is based on the number of qualified electors, giving to any county having two-thirds of the ratio, a representative.

In New York, representation is based on the number of inhabitants, excluding aliens and persons of color, not taxed. There the great city of New York has her full representation, and is under no invidious restriction.

As I conceive, the foregoing states of this union place the basis of representation upon population, or upon numbers of qualified electors, without any such restrictions as are sought to be placed in this constitution. It is true, there is restriction in Louisiana, Pennsylvania, and probably in Maryland; but if you look at the constitutions of the states adjacent to Kentucky, you will find the basis of representation is placed either on numbers of qualified electors or on population; and in fact I scarcely know of a gentleman who gainsays the proposition, that population should be the basis of representation. But, say they, it is necessary for our self-defence, that the right of suffrage, or of representation, should be denied to a portion of our fellow citizens. As I remarked before, where is the proof that any such necessity exists? I affirm sir, that it exists only in the imaginations of gentlemen.

Sir, there is no truer people, there are none that are more devoted to the institutions of this country than the population of the border counties along the Ohio river, from Greenup to Hickman. None sir, stood up more manfully in the great fight that took place in August last, for I was an eye-witness to the struggle between the emancipationists and their opponents. What does your bill of rights say? Has a single delegate declared that he is in favor of changing any of those great principles that were laid down in the bill of rights in the constitution of 1792, and re-adopted in the constitution of 1799, and proposed by your committee to be re-adopted in the constitution we are about to make? "that all freemen are equal, and that no man shall be entitled to exclusive privileges, or to emolu-

'ments, except in consideration of public service rendered.' No gentleman is in favor of changing this great paramount principle. If then, all are equal, preserve that equality, do not proscribe a man because he happens to be in a particular locality. Let him be as free in Jefferson county as in any county on the border of the Ohio, as in Madison or Franklin counties. Then you will preserve this great principle; without this, it is a dead letter, and ought to be stricken from the constitution.

It has been said by other gentlemen, that this restriction is necessary in order to keep down foreign population. Sir, I hear sentiments uttered—but thank God they come from but few persons—which are in direct contradiction of one of the many grounds, alleged in the declaration of independence as reasons for making that declaration, and for throwing off the yoke of Great Britain. What were the reasons assigned by Thomas Jefferson, when he penned that memorable declaration? In the list of grievances alleged in that document against King George, the third is this:

"He has endeavored to prevent the population of these states; for that purpose obstructing the laws for naturalization of foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new appropriations of lands."

This is one of the reasons, that they had for declaring their independence, and sir, the declarations and acts of some gentlemen at this day, coincide almost exactly with the acts of King George III at that day. They would deny to foreigners the right of suffrage for a period of twenty-one years. Was that the Jeffersonian doctrine? Was that the doctrine promulgated by Hancock, Jefferson, and others who signed the declaration? We have millions of acres of public land now uninhabited; our country extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans. I say to foreigners, come on gentlemen, come on; our laws are strong enough to protect our citizens. Sir, what is your naturalization law? It is that no man shall become a citizen, unless he has behaved himself like a worthy man for five years. In the act of congress of 1802, passed in the administration of the great apostle of liberty, Thomas Jefferson, section first, third paragraph, reads as follows:

"That the court admitting such alien shall be satisfied that he has resided within the United States five years at least, and within the state or territory where such court is, at the time, held, one year at least; and it shall further appear to their satisfaction, that during that time he has behaved as a man of a good moral character, attached to the principles of the constitution of the United States, and well disposed to the good order and happiness of the same: Provided, that the oath of the applicant shall, in no case, be allowed to prove his residence."

If men who are unworthy are admitted to the privileges of citizenship, it is not the fault of the law, but it is the fault of the administrators of the law. Sir, suppose that Kossuth, Bem, and their co-patriots, that now find protection even in the land of Turkey, from the tyrant now seeking their blood, should come to this country; where is the man in America who would require them to remain here twenty-one years before they should be permitted to become citizens? Those men who have staked their lives, who have staked their all for the freedom of their country. I would to God they would come to this land of freedom, and then let the Emperor of Russia or Austria demand them from this government. A shout would go up from Maine to Mexico against it that would nerve the arm of old Zack for any crisis. Sir, who builds your railroads? Who makes your canals? Who constructs your turnpikes? It is the poor laborers, the foreigners, who seek an asylum on your shores, from the hand of oppression. I sir, you know, am a native born Kentuckian: I hail from old Nelson, but old Bullitt is my beloved, my adopted home, and sir, I know there are men whose land of adoption Kentucky is, that feel as much for her welfare and interests as I do.

What was another ground set out in the declaration of independence, for separation from Great Britain? In the specification of the usurpations of King George, we find the following:

"He has forbidden his governors to pass laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation, till his assents should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them. He has refused to pass other laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of representation in the legislature—a right inestimable to them, and formidable to tyrants only."

We here see, Mr. Chairman, how the right of representation was held by such men as Hancock, Jefferson, and others, the signers of the declaration of independence.

Probably I have detained this committee longer than I should have done. There are certain great reforms that the people of Kentucky have sent us here to make—to limit the sessions of the legislature, to place the appointing power of every officer in the hands of the people, and I believe there are hardly three men on this floor who are opposed to these reforms. Let the subject of slavery remain as it is, with little or no alteration; because there was no complaint from slaveholders that their rights were not protected. Limit the time of holding your elections to one day. When we do this, I think we shall have done all the people sent us here to do. As for myself, I know that my people never sent me here to abridge the right of suffrage or of representation, and I should dislike very much that my name should go down to posterity upon the record as having voted to abridge the right of suffrage, or the right of representation, of any freeman of this commonwealth. The people will judge our judgment, and their judgment will be that of ages. They will judge of the actions of every delegate on this floor. Every gentleman knows the instructions he has received from his constituents; let him act according to those instructions. For myself, I was not instructed to abridge the right of suffrage of any man, or to deny to any freeman in this commonwealth the right of representation.

Mr. PROCTOR. As I shall vote to restrict, to some extent, the city of Louisville and all other cities which may grow up in this commonwealth, in the senatorial department of the government,

I claim the attention of the committee while I make a brief explanation of the reasons which will influence my vote. Representing, as I do, a county bordering on the Ohio river, I will take occasion to remark that I cannot believe the question of emancipation has anything to do with the question under consideration. Sir, I repudiate the remarks of the gentleman from Madison, (Mr. Turner,) so far as they may have been intended to apply to my constituents, for they are as much devoted to the institutions of the state as any portion of the people of the commonwealth. They have been and ever will be true and devoted friends of the south. But what has slavery and emancipation to do with the question under consideration? Here we have a plain and simple question in itself, which has no connection whatever with that of slavery; and they ought not here to be united.

Sir, a reason has been asked by the gentleman last up, why cities should hereafter be restricted in the Senate. I will endeavor to furnish him with one.

I represent a county, it is true, which pays but a small revenue into the treasury. The net revenue paid by my county, after paying her portion of the general expenses of the government, is but some seven or eight hundred dollars per annum. Owing to our geographical position we are removed from the benefits arising from the works of internal improvement, which have been carried on and completed at the expense of the people of the state at large. In addition to the large appropriations for these purposes which have heretofore been made by our legislature, our state is also now indebted some four millions of dollars. This debt must be paid; the faith, the honor, the credit of the state require it. The entire population of Kentucky, without regard to location, or benefit to be derived from these works, must and will be taxed to pay these debts; and sir, my constituents and the constituents of other gentlemen upon the floor of this convention, who have derived no practical benefit from these works, will have to bear their portion of these burdens. In this sir, we have carried out in practice what gentlemen so much condemn in theory—taxation without representation.

But, Mr. Chairman, we have been told by gentlemen during this discussion, that he who would do a wrong in a small matter, would perpetrate a greater wrong if you would but give him the power; and, sir, it is to guard against this improper exercise of power that I will vote for the restrictions that I have indicated. We have seen what power members of the legislature have exercised in making appropriations of the public money for works of internal improvement, which have been local and partial in their beneficial influence; and as we have been warned that those who once perpetrate a wrong will repeat it, whenever an opportunity offers—acting upon the principle that "self-preservation is the first law of nature," and that self-interest is the great lever that unfortunately too much controls public and private action, I shall, in defence of those whom I represent, cast my vote to restrict the overwhelming influence of any local or sectional interest in this commonwealth. The question has been asked why restrict the rights of any portion of the freemen of this commonwealth? Sir, we have heard beautiful theories advanced upon this floor; but when you come to carry them into practical operation, you find that they will not work. If, sir, our government is to be based upon popular representation alone, without any checks and balances, why I ask do we have a senate at all? The great object is, that the senate is to operate as a check upon the hasty legislation of the country, and to act as a conservative barrier between popular legislative excitement and the rights of the people. Look, sir, at the formation of your federal constitution, and the relative position of the states of this Union. Take for example, sir, the great states of New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio—three powerful states—now having an aggregate representation of eighty one members upon the floor of congress. Give to those states a representation in the senate as potent as that in the lower branch of congress, and what measure could they not carry, and what influence could they not exert? Hence, sir, the wisdom of our fathers was signally displayed in forming that charter of our liberties, whose conservative influence is thrown around the different departments of the government, especially in giving to the senate a check upon the hasty legislation of the lower branch of congress. This is done by giving to the smallest state in the Union an equal influence with the largest. And, sir, I would ask gentlemen, when they vociferate so loudly in praise of the "dear people," and their right of suffrage, why it is that they would have a senate at all? Why not give to the popular branch of the legislature all power to pass laws? The very fact, sir, that you have a senate, is a restriction upon the rights of the people. And, sir, when we come to apportion representation in the senate, some regard, in my humble judgment, should be paid to the great interest of different portions of the state, without regard alone to numbers.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I will vote to restrict the local influence of the large cities, which may hereafter grow up in this commonwealth. And, sir, as this question of slavery and emancipation has been so frequently lugged into the discussions of various propositions brought before the convention, I will take this occasion again to remark that I cannot conceive that the question of emancipation has any thing to do with the subject matter before us. I thought, Mr. Chairman, when I first came to this convention, that we should have no discussions and have no divisions upon this all exciting question; but in this I have been sadly disappointed. I have deeply regretted to see a discussion growing up here upon the abstract question of slavery that can lead to no practical results, but which will tend to distract our deliberations. But, sir, as gentlemen have thought proper to allude to the institution of slavery, in a local and sectional point of view, I feel it due to those whom I represent here in my place, to rise and repel the charge that has been made against them, in common with the other river counties in the state, for, sir, they are as true and unflinching in their devotion to the slave interest in this country, as are they of any other section of the state. It is true, sir, that we have only about two hundred or two hundred and fifty slaves in my county, and that we are a border county, and have but little interest in the matter so far as the value of our slaves is concerned, still, sir, we have an interest in common with our common country. The non-slaveholders of the county of Lewis will be the last to desert the institution, and they will be among the first to repel an invasion or an assault made upon it, let it emanate from whatever source it may.

Mr. Chairman, though a large majority of my constituents are non-slaveholders—it was no difficult task on my part to convince them that they were as deeply interested in protecting and defending this institution, as is the slaveholder himself. I contend that it is the poor man, the native born laborer of Kentucky, who is most deeply interested in the perpetuity and preservation of the institution of slavery—for sir, once emancipate your slaves—permit the starving hordes of Europe to pour in upon us, as they unquestionably would—and the consequence would be, as was contended by the slaveholding emancipationist throughout the state of Kentucky—that the wages of labor would be reduced, while the value of land would be enhanced—consequently the native born Kentuckian, would either be compelled to drag out an existence of poverty and dependence, or to seek a home in the far west. Sir, in such an event the price of lands would advance, and the wages of labor would decrease—the poor man therefore, never could acquire the means that would enable him to purchase a home for himself and family—and a system of landlord and tenancy would grow up in Kentucky, (where there are already very extensive land holders), that would be dangerous to the liberties and rights of the poor, and God save my country from a system of this kind. I repeat, sir, I do hold that the poor man in Kentucky is more deeply interested in sustaining this institution than any other portion of the community; but if the argument is to prevail here that the slaveholder is alone to be consulted; if that doctrine is to be maintained by those professing to be pro-slavery men—then truly, is this property held by a slender thread; but I trust no such sentiment prevails here.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen have thought proper during this discussion to allude to this question in a moral point of view, and they have told us that they believed that the finger of God was upon the institution. Sir, while I believe that divine providence is employed now as in the days of the "Jewish Theocracy," when the children of Israel were led by the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night, in moulding and impressing the character and institutions of my country—I also believe as firmly as I believe in holy writ, that that same providence has destined the African race to slavery in these United States. But sir, be that as it may, it is an institution of our country—we must take it as it is. No plan has been or can be devised by which they can be sent from the borders of our land; and to talk about it is only to talk about an abstraction, which may lead to the most fatal results. Sir, if we once permit our feelings to become excited upon this great question, and if our common country should unfortunately give way to the madness of some factitious hour, to the phrenzy of some fanatic spirit—if upon some great question like this, they should in an evil hour permit our glorious union to sink, overwhelmed in some horrible struggle, of brother with brother, they will never gain their liberties until the sun shall slumber in the cloud, forgetful of the voice of the morning. Sir, let us then upon a question so momentous, and fraught with such mighty consequences, pause and reflect well, before we rashly act. I do hope that in the future discussion of the various propositions that may be presented to the consideration of this convention it will not be thought necessary to introduce the subject of slavery in the arena of debate. Sir, though I come from a county included in the remark of the gentleman from Madison, I stand here as firm and unflinching an advocate of the slave institutions of the state as any gentleman upon this floor. And if that great day should ever come when a dissolution of this Union shall take place, which I hope and trust in high heaven will never be, we upon the Ohio river, are to occupy the front of the battle ground, and let me tell you, sir, if come it must, we will prove ourselves true to the institutions of Kentucky.

But Mr. Chairman, in framing a constitution, that is to protect all the great interests in this state, I shall not be influenced by empty declamation upon this subject, let it emanate from whatever source it may; and sir, as I consider that this question of emancipation has nothing to do with the settlement of the question now under consideration, I shall disregard, so far as I am concerned, all that argument of gentlemen who have such an object in view. But sir, as we have the example of our federal constitution, and a number of the states, and as we have the still more potent example in the acts of our legislature, in the partial and corrupt manner in which they have appropriated and managed the funds of the state; and sir, as I look at the senate, as a conservative check upon the hasty and improvident legislation of the country, I shall vote against giving to local and sectional interests an undue influence in the senate of the state. Sir, we know the pernicious influence which this sectional legislation has had upon the country in days past; and as this power has been exercised to the detriment and injury of my constituents, I intend to exercise the power which I have, upon the floor of this convention, in protecting them, as far as I can, from its exercise in future. And sir, whenever gentlemen will come up and vote for a clause in the constitution, that the legislature never shall have the power to make an appropriation for any work of internal improvement, for which my constituents shall be taxed, without their consent, I will go with them for their proposition. My constituents have been taxed without their consent, they will be taxed to assist in paying the present state debt, which was created for the purposes of building your railroads and turnpikes, from which my constituents have derived no immediate advantage. And sir, this, to say the least about it, is nothing more nor less than taxation without representation. As our legislators, who come from those sections that are to be benefitted by these works, have done a "little wrong, in small things," I fear that they will carry it out in big ones, if they have the opportunity. I shall therefore, in self-defence, vote for some restriction upon this senatorial representation of large cities which may in time grow up in our state.

Mr. BULLITT. I shall record my vote in favor of the principle for which I contended, in the remarks which I addressed to the convention a few days ago, that is a perfect equality of rights as regards city and country. I contend that the very first principle in this government, the basis upon which its whole superstructure rests, is perfect equality. What these words imply is, equality in regard to the exercise of sovereignty in the protection of civil rights, and in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property. While I would be wholly unwilling to entrust to cities any advantage, I would have them enjoy that equality, which the proposition of the gentleman from Christian would give them. If you suffer a city to send an undivided vote to the legislature, it will give her a decided advantage over an adjoining county.

My position is, that there is no constitutional power in this convention to impose a restriction, or to make any distinction between those living in town or country, upon rich or poor land, or wherever they may be. There are but two forms of government that can exist. One is a government of force, and the other is a government which rests upon affection. Now sir, if you will bring an intelligent Russian here, seeing everything moving on smoothly, the first inquiry that will suggest itself to his mind, is, where is the power of this government. He does not see an armed soldiery, which he considers to be absolutely necessary? Is it necessary only when the people are interested in the destruction of the government. Here every one is a sovereign. A violation of the laws of this land, is a violation of my rights. I have a portion of the sovereign power; every man around me has a portion of the sovereign power, therefore every man comes to the aid of the law; and the sovereign power existing in the people of a republic, is the only reason why we can carry on the government without a standing military force. The first clause of the constitution under which we are now acting provides:

"We, the representatives of the people of Kentucky, in convention assembled, to secure to all the citizens thereof, the enjoyment of the right of life, liberty and property, and of pursuing happiness, do ordain and establish this constitution for its government."

The word citizen is of Roman derivation. We get it from the civic law. The Roman citizen exercised a portion of the sovereignty of the state. When he went to one of the provinces he carried with him this sovereign power, or in other words the rights it secured to him. Cicero speaks of it as the most heinous crime that could be committed, to subject a Roman citizen to the torture. In the dark ages that succeeded the downfall of the Roman empire, when political power was divided between the Princes and the Barons, there was almost perpetual war kept up between them. The Princes found it necessary, in order to cripple the Barons, to rear up a middle class, and these consisted of the artisans residing in the towns and villages. To these were given certain rights and privileges. They became freemen, having before been denominated villians or slaves. The word freeman or citizen was applied to them, denoting that they were inhabitants of a city, and not only denoting that they were inhabitants of a city, but that they were sovereigns of the city. When our constitution was formed, the same principle was adopted. Constrain the term in that sense, how do I apply it? We are sent here by the people of Kentucky to secure to all the citizens thereof the enjoyment of the right of life, liberty, and property. Now, sir, I will ask, would it not be a perfect absurdity to say that we are sent here to secure to all the sovereign people of this commonwealth the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property, and that we have the power to destroy the sovereignty upon which all this rests? Sir, when you destroy their sovereignty, can you secure to the sovereign people the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property? Certainly not. The basis of this government, as I remarked before, is equality—in all those rights which belongs to the citizen, perfect equality, as far as regards the sovereign power, an equality of right in the enjoyment of their property, and I carry it out and apply it to property of every description.

Now, sir, we are told by Blackstone, that the power of parliament is omnipotent. Is it to be contended here in our government that this convention is omnipotent? I am perfectly willing to contest the question wholly upon this ground; I say we are limited in our power—we have no right of destruction. If I appoint an agent to attend to my estate, does it imply that he has a right to destroy the estate? Certainly it does not. We have not the power of destruction. The whole object of government would be lost—the whole object of civil society would be lost, if this convention possessed such power. We are not the people, but the agents of the people, sent here to make an organic law, for the protection of life, liberty, and property. Now let us test this thing. Have we the right so far to destroy the sovereignty of this nation as to decree that we will hereafter live under an aristocracy, or to declare that one man shall be emperor of king or Kentucky? Every one will at once acknowledge that there would be absurdity in the proposition. Then, if you have not the right to destroy sovereignty entirely as it exists in the citizens of this commonwealth, have you the right to take away sovereignty from a single county or individual? Surely not. Carry the principle out. We are sent here to guarantee the rights of property. This convention has no right to take away one atom of property which I possess, and to apply it to the public use, without compensation. They have no power to decree any distinction in the enjoyment of property between slaves, horses, lands, and any other description of property. Because, sir, any action of this convention, which goes to the destruction of any of those rights to which I have alluded, is opposed to the object for which we are assembled. I deny the right of the people themselves, in their sovereign capacity, to do any act that would amount to the destruction of their sovereignty—much less does that right belong to this convention. If then, sir, they have no right to take away my property without compensation—if this convention have no right to say that I shall not worship the Deity as I please—if it has no right to destroy the form of our government, they certainly have no right to destroy the sovereignty of any one in it. And the consequence is, they have no right to draw a distinction between the people residing in a city and those residing in the country. I am for an equality of rights on the part of city and country. To carry out this principle a little further. This convention have no right, if they have the power, to draw this distinction which I see the legislative report does on the subject of the apportionment of representation. We have all the right of representation, whether rich or poor, whether living in the country or a city, whether they are numerous or otherwise. How does it operate? Suppose the ratio to be 1,500, it gives to a county having but two thirds of the ratio, in many instances, a representative. If my county happened to have the full ratio of 1,500, and 999 over, it would have but one representative. And the residuum added to the qualified voters of a smaller adjoining county would give to that county two representatives.

Upon this principle of perfect equality, in our rights of property, and in our political rights, the same reason will apply in regard to the act of 1833, which has been modified, but which will be attempted to be engrafted in this constitution. There is a violation of right. Every man in this community having an equal right to purchase property and bring it from whatever place he pleases. Whilst I would leave that law as it now stands, I am utterly opposed to engrafting it in the constitution. I would leave it as it stands, because dire necessity may require that it exist. How far necessity may justify a departure from this general rule of equality, is a question that would be somewhat difficult to settle. If Louisville had sent the emancipation representatives here, and they had shown a disposition to carry out that law, I will not say what might have been my course. Because I should consider that an attempt at destruction. But as the present representatives come here representing fully and fairly the slave interests of the country, it has no application whatever, and therefore, I will not go into that question.

Mr. MACHEN. I will ask the indulgence of this committee for a few moments, for I am unwilling to give a silent vote upon this question. When in the committee that presented this report, I was of the impression that there ought to be restrictions placed upon the senatorial representation of those points that might become exceedingly populous. I felt too, that there were great principles at stake, but I had not sufficiently matured the subject. I had not investigated the ground on which my action would be based sufficiently according to my own judgment, to sustain myself in the position in which I would be placed. I therefore sir, when listening to the colloquial eloquence of the gentleman from Louisville, who was my coadjutor on the committee, was charmed away from my first view of the subject. I was led to adopt the arguments he presented, and to feel that there was a force and power in those arguments, which would be irresistible in this house, and in the state of Kentucky. But the spell by which I was bound in the colloquial intercourse which I had with the gentleman, is now broken. I think I see light in a different direction, and I come back to my first love, and stand here now as the advocate—to use a hackneyed term—of some conservative restriction, not only upon the city of Louisville, but every other portion of the state that may, by this excess of numbers, be liable to do damage to the general interests of the state. I know sir, that if I were not the representative of a free and independent people, I should not have been enabled to stand up, after such denunciations as have fallen upon gentlemen who shall act as I do upon this floor. But sir, I thank God, I thank those that reared me up from childhood to maturity, that the spirit of independence was infused into me in infancy, as fully as in any man here or elsewhere; and that what my judgment dictates to me should be done, I have a determination to dare attempt to do. I care not what the power may be that resists the position I occupy, unless my judgment is convinced, I stand by that judgment.

I have been a good deal astonished since this discussion commenced, I must confess. I was astonished at my friend from Christian, when he came in with that glorious compromise of his. I was surprised to find that a change had come over the spirit of his dreams. What has been his position heretofore? I was sir, more firmly based in the position I occupy, by the eloquent language of the gentleman himself, only the day before he presented that compromise. He declared it was the last battle for our country's rights, that was to be fought. He seemed to doubt the firmness of my nerves, and endeavored to strengthen me in my position, so that no power in the house or out of it might shake me. But sir, the guardian angel watching over the gentleman, perhaps, whispered a lesson of wisdom in his ear, of which he had never before learned; and he came to this house on the following morning with a proposition which he blandly calls a compromise—compromise of what sir? Was it a compromise of the principle for which he contended, or was it a compromise of opinions, which he held the day before? Ah! sir, it was the dictum of an entire change of policy. A compromise by giving to those on one side of the question, all that they asked for, and leaving those who think that a different course should be pursued, without having a single crumb fall to them from their master's table. I stand by no such compromises. If I compromise at all, it is on terms of liberality; on such terms as will extend to me, a portion at least of that for which I fight; but I presumed the gentleman's reasons were satisfactory. They have not however convinced me. They have had no influence on my judgment so far; and though the gentleman has departed from me, I stand in the firm position where he left me. Though he may think proper to take shelter under the banner of the leaders of the opposite side, yet sir, I fight under the star spangled banner under which I started.

There has been sir, a great deal of extraneous matter introduced in this discussion. We are told that on the Ohio's broad and beautiful shores the spirit of patriotism and valor dwells in rich abundance, and that whenever the bugle note is sounded, and the first tap of the martial drum is heard, all her sons are found rushing to defend their country's glory. Sir, when the first note was sounded, my constituents were rushing in their majesty, to the rescue of their country. Yes sir, my own county raised a company at the first intimation of the proclamation of war with Mexico: but so far from the centre of attraction was she, that the company was entirely too late. As soon as we heard that there was a call to arms, our people came gallantly up—I do not include myself, I was not a volunteer—but the people of my county ranged themselves under the star spangled banner and asked of the government to be permitted to take a share in the toil and danger, the strife and hazard that were impending over the country. This was denied them at that time. Afterwards when the 4th regiment Kentucky volunteers was organized, she did send forth a gallant company; but they sir were too late to join in the conflict before the city of Mexico, and yet they revelled in her halls, and some of them sir now lie beneath her soil.

The subject of emancipation has been drawn also into this discussion. I sir most solemnly aver that until this discussion began upon this floor it never entered my head that slavery had any thing to do with the subject under consideration.

The gentleman from Bullitt talks most eloquently upon this proposition to disfranchise a portion of the people of Kentucky. Sir I am not sent here for the purpose of disfranchising a single man, woman or child, or to take away a single privilege from any man; but sir I am for preventing a combination of force from bringing destruction on the country by such combination. We give to every portion of Kentucky a full representation in the lower house, according to its numbers. I sir am not to be deterred from expressing the sentiments I entertain, by being told that the Autocrat of Russia is not less to be trusted than those who act as I intend to act. No sir, and I dare assert, that the source whence the denunciation emanated, has no more of the love of country burning on the altar of his heart, than I have; nor of correct principles either.

Now sir, it is contended, that if we limit the representation of cities in the senate, we are destroying the right of suffrage in Kentucky. What is the object of government? It is that the greatest amount of good may be disseminated to the greatest extent. Why is the senate created at all? Is it for the same purpose that the lower branch of the legislature exists? No sir, I take on myself to aver, that it has a different purpose in view. Representation should exist wherever taxation is exercised; and it is fully carried out in the lower house of our general assembly. It is so in the house of representatives of the United States, and it is right that it should be so; but is it so in the senate of Kentucky, or is it so in the senate of the United States? No sir, it is not so. How is the Senate of the United States organized? I need not answer this question, for it would be an insult to the intelligence of this house, if I should attempt to answer it. Why was it that every little state that was organized in this union required, at the hands of the general government, that it should have an equal amount of representation in the United States Senate? It was sir, upon the same principle upon which I now intend to act. It was upon the principle of self-preservation. It was, that in the senate, there might be a wholesome check against the evil influences, if they should ever be directed to evil, which might be exercised in the lower house. Was it right or was it wrong? The history of this country, in past days, attests the wisdom of the policy. Had it not been for that principle, our government would have reeled and tottered like a drunken man, and prostrate might have lain. It is this inequality that secures this government of ours, as far as the two senatorial votes of each state have power.

The little State of Delaware having but three counties, and a population of about one hundred thousand, has an equal voice in the senate with the largest state of the union. Why is it so? It is that the community may be protected against combinations of large masses. But gentlemen say it is a departure from principle, that we are about to make here; no sir, it is no departure from principle. I ask you what city or town in the Commonwealth of Kentucky had the right to separate representation in the senate at the time this convention was called? The same mode of representation is acted on in every portion of the union. Virginia is divided into two grand senatorial districts; one east, the other west of the blue ridge; one represented by thirteen, and the other by nineteen senators; and these divisions are kept up irrespective of population; and it takes two thirds of the legislature of that state to change this constitutional provision once in ten years. I come next to Maryland, where the same doctrine, for which I contend, is carried out. The elder gentleman from Nelson, stated the other day, that there were but eleven counties in Maryland. I believe he is mistaken. I think there are twenty. How is their senatorial representation apportioned? It is divided into twenty one districts; each county sends one senator, and the city of Baltimore one, which completes her senate. I ask you how it is that Baltimore sends but one, when each county is entitled to one? It is on the principle of self-preservation.

The gentleman from Fleming (Mr. Garfield,) a few days since delivered an eloquent discourse on the sources from which his first principles of republican equality were gathered. He crossed the Alleghany mountains and sought in New England those lessons. He learned very strange lessons, or he learned those lessons very badly. What does the history of that country teach us? In Rhode Island they have one senator for each county and one for each city in the state. Connecticut has adopted a principle which I hope never to see engrafted in the constitution of Kentucky. She has no districting, but elects by the state at large, twelve senators. Did the gentleman gather lessons of wisdom from her course of policy, or from that of the State of Rhode Island? He certainly did not from the latter, for he is not carrying them out. How is it in

New Jersey? One senator from each county. How is it in Delaware? Three counties sending three representatives each, the seat of government being embraced in one of them. Is that not the doctrine of equality of representation according to numbers? Where is Pennsylvania. She elects by districts, and no city is entitled to elect more than four senators.—Where in the United States is there more of the spirit of republicanism than in the Keystone state? No where, sir, though I claim an equal amount for old Kentucky. And I would rather have been born in Kentucky, than in any other part of the union. But to pass on to North and South Carolina. North Carolina bases her senatorial representation, exclusively on property. South Carolina upon population and property. I am opposed to the first scheme entirely, and I do not like the other. It shows there is a departure in both these states, from the principle which was adopted in those others to which I adverted and from the general principle laid down here, that population shall be the basis of representation? How is it in Vermont? a state from which the gentleman from Fleming the other day drew his wisdom. She elects her representatives on the principle of taxation; and Massachusetts regards taxation as the basis of representation. I do not quote New England as authority for my course of policy. I am willing to stop on this side of that silver cord so eloquently described by the gentleman from Kenton yesterday. How is it in Tennessee? She is districted. Her constitution is similar to that of Kentucky, and it was made in an enlightened period; it does not date further back, I believe, than 1835. She bases her representation almost entirely on population; but in order to prevent city influence from towering above other influences, her constitution provides that no county shall be divided in order to give senatorial representation. She has cities growing up. She has the beautiful city of Rocks on the Cumberland, and her great emporium of the west on the Mississippi. She expects that the time will come, when those cities will add dignity, power and wealth, to that state; yet her constitution provides that no division shall take place for the purpose of senatorial representation. How is it in Louisiana. The very principle we contend for is engrafted in her constitution. She has thirty two senators, and no parish is allowed to have more than one eighth of the senatorial representation. At the time her constitution was adopted, the city of New Orleans, according to her population, was entitled to four senators, and she is prohibited from ever having more.

Now, I ask if it is not a fact, that these conflicting interests do exist? I harbor no animosity against cities; much less do I envy Louisville, or wish to deprive her of any rights which she ought to enjoy. I have had favors from the people of that city, in the time of pecuniary difficulty, which have given me a warm attachment to this city, and my feelings of gratitude are still warm for her. As an evidence, when I was called upon to cast my vote for some one to fill the honorable station of president of this convention, my eye and voice fell upon one of her distinguished delegates. But I feel that there are greater interests in this country, than those that are circumscribed by the limits of any city. The battle of liberty has to be fought throughout this land yet, and if we give to any portion an overwhelming power, we at once enable them to tie our hands, and dictate to us the pathway which we shall pursue in future. I, for one, am not willing to be placed in that position. Mississippi districts for the election of senators. Her constitution contains the same provisions that are contained in the present constitution of Kentucky. She has the cities of Vicksburg and Jackson, and she looks forward, probably, to the time when those cities shall be filled with an industrious population, which will perhaps amount to one-half of the population of the state. Alabama districts for senatorial representation. I look to the lessons of wisdom that are taught me by these three last mentioned states. I believe they are based upon the immutable principle of wisdom and self-protection. Missouri has the same provision. Each one of them district, but allow no division of counties in their constitutions. Arkansas districts, but forbids the division of any county in forming senatorial districts. It is contended here, that city and country influences always work harmoniously together for the good of the whole. I ask you to cast your eye to the magnificent city of New York, and what lesson do you learn? Whenever there is an election for chief magistrate of this union approaching, what is the note that is sounded from one end of this union to the other? As goes the city of New York, so goes the state. It is a doctrine preached from hill to vale; and as goes the great state of New York, so goes the union. If the city governs the state, and the state governs the union, I ask is there not an influence at work, that ought to be arrested in its progress? Senatorial representation is apportioned for the purpose of preserving a proper balance in the legislature. It is based upon the principle, that representatives coming from sections, might be disposed to combine, and by combined influence run into unhealthy legislation. Why do you want a senate at all, having a representation already on the principle of equality, in the lower house? Because, coming from the larger districts of a state, it is presumed that experience and wisdom will be the characteristics of that body; and that sectional feelings and interests will be destroyed. But sir, give to the cities the demanded increase of senatorial representation, and what do you do? You place in the hall opposite to us, a half dozen men from one point, who come there with an identity of interest for a particular purpose—it may be for weal, it may be for woe. I know that city influence has operated heretofore, in some respects, at least, to the detriment of the commonwealth. In what manner it has operated, let your beautiful railroads, slackwater navigation, and turnpike roads, all concentrating in one city, as a focal point attest.

This policy has resulted in an enormous debt, from which the people will not be relieved for these many years to come. The people have been led, by this syren song of Louisville and the middle districts, into a mesh from which it is not easy to escape.

I ask if two senators cannot represent a city or town as effectually as half a dozen? There are but two great interests in the city; they are those of the rich and the poor, and the elder gentleman from Louisville, who has argued this question, furnishes us an evidence of the influence that may be exerted upon the latter class. District the cities, and when their population justifies, give them two senators, and each interest will be represented. I go with the gentleman's beautiful compromise that far; but I will stop short of the point to which he tends. I go for equal rights and privileges, and to secure them I would put a check upon this power, which may become so overwhelming in this commonwealth as to destroy the balance, and swallow up all other interests. Tell me not that the concentration of heavy capital is not liable to produce injurious consequences. Yes sir, it does, it will do it. Combine numbers with wealth, and add talent also—of which the gentleman from Louisville justly boasts—and then you will see that the lines in legislation will begin to open, the roads will begin to diverge, the interests of the poor will be lost sight of. You need not tell me that city influence will always be exerted for the good of the people of the country.

If, as some gentlemen say, city influence is political purity itself, why is it that we find, upon examination of our penitentiary register, that about nine out of every ten convicts are from the cities. Sir, degradation and crime delight to revel in the city full. Have their votaries any just appreciation of the principles of free government? Compare city and country morality, according to the calends above referred to, and then tell me to which you would entrust your country's dearest treasure? Cities always have been, and still will be, infested with these thieving rascals. They have the rights of suffrage, without the feelings of Kentuckians. We cannot deny them the right of suffrage, but we can place such restriction on their representation as to render them harmless. Give to each city two senators, and they will have no reason to complain. Has Louisville a senator now? No, sir. Why? Because our forefathers deemed it right to protect the country against city influences. The gentleman says, that he was sent here to preserve an equality of legislative power to every portion of the state. Was he sent here to mete out to Louisville what she never heretofore had? As for myself, I had no instruction in regard to this matter. It was not expected that it would be brought forward. I am here to act as my judgment dictates, and I will take the responsibility of acting for myself; and I do not fear that I shall not be able to satisfy my constituents. I do not fear that I shall not receive from them, their approval of my course on this subject.

I want no distinction in this country, but I see abundant indications of a disposition to introduce invidious distinctions. And when these overtowering influences, of the agents of your cities are concentrated in your legislative halls, the weakness and divisions of the country will not be able to resist these influences. We shall be led like sheep to the shearer, and not be permitted to open our mouths. I want to guard against such influences, come from what quarter they may.

I have given some of the reasons that will operate with me, in giving my vote upon this question, but I want to refer for a moment, to some of the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Henderson. He says we are casting an insult upon Louisville. What insult do we cast upon her? We propose to give to her citizens full representation in the lower branch, and two senators as soon as she has population to demand them. We propose to give her as much as she can claim for her population in the way of representation. Is it casting an insult upon her, to say, at a certain point thy proud step shall be stayed? How do we insult her? I deny that my action leads to any such result. He says we bring her here as a criminal—to be sacrificed, I suppose, upon the altar of our folly. I arraign her not as a criminal. She is filled up now with native born citizens, to a great extent. I know her action will be judicious, at least as far as her own interest is concerned. Where is the increase of her population to come from? From across that silvery cord, of which the gentleman from Kenton talked so eloquently yesterday. Yes sir, what is its object? It is to virtually destroy that bright and brilliant silvery cord, by which the great antagonistic interests of the country are now separated. Yes sir, for the purpose of placing the power of the south at the feet of the north, and those principles for which our fathers fought, bled, and died, are to be forever extinguished. Tell me not that we should introduce men from beyond the Ohio, to teach us lessons of government. Look at your national councils. Where is the spirit of conservatism, of which men delight to boast so much in this house? It is to be found only in the delegations from southern states, while in the north, the spirit of give us all power is practised upon. We are asked to surrender our dearest rights; and for what? That this very doctrine of equality of right may be carried out. Sir, surrender our dearest interests into their hands! I am not for doing it. I would leave the north to follow its own policy; but God defend me from that portion of her population that will come here. Why? if a northern man is a good citizen there, as a general rule, he comes not here. There is no inducement for him to come here, whilst the vast plains of the west remain unsettled. If the doctrine of the gentleman is carried out, what will it result in? It does not require the forecast of a prophet to tell that vast numbers of the more inferior portion of northern population will, as they thicken there, and are pressed out, find a home along the banks of the great dividing line between the north and the south. And sir, are the renegades from justice, the outpourings of northern jails and penitentiaries, and the vile abolitionists, to come in upon us, and demand an equal share in the law making power of our state, and above all sir, are we to be frightened into compliance with their demands before they come? Are we sir, to open wide the door and send out our messengers to bid them welcome in. Sir, let us provide for ourselves and we shall have done all that our constituents expect at our hands.

The gentleman from Henderson enters into a mathematical calculation to show that a dangerous preponderance is not likely to exist in our cities on account of their growing population. He says, sir, that when the state has 1,200,000, Louisville will have 75,000. How does he arrive at it? In 1820 Louisville had 4,000 population, and the state about 400,000. In 1840 Louisville had 20,000, and the state 700,000. In 1849 Louisville has 50,000, and the state perhaps as much as 850,000 outside of Louisville. What has been the relative increase? Whilst Louisville has twelve and a half times the number she had in 1820, the state has a little over doubled her population. If we take the increase of the last nine years as an indication of her future advancement, the disproportion against the state will be much greater than even shown as above.

But the gentleman shows that a great period must elapse before Louisville can become potential in the councils of the state, through her senatorial representation. I dare believe, sir, that his mathematical skill is much at fault in this matter. She is now entitled to one senator, and perhaps by the time representation is apportioned, under the new constitution, she will have the numbers to give her two. Double her population in ten years more, and she will have three, and a large fraction upon which to ask a fourth. Go ten years further on, and she will have five senators at least, and about fifteen representatives in the lower house. One eighth of the power in the senate at least, and one seventh in the other branch. Bring twenty men from one point, with one common object in view, and I ask you, if it is not a power that will give tone and direction to our statute laws. If her interests coincide with the balance of the state, all will be well; but sir, if they should differ, it will be then too late to look back in regrets at the principle by which we are now governed in this matter. There are other great interests in this state that demand our vigilant watchfulness besides those of Louisville.

There is a tendency in all our institutions to centralization. When a young man far removed from the capital is ambitious of distinction, can he expect to find it there? No sir, he breaks up, and as true as the needle to the north, steers his way to the capital. 'Tis sir, because this has become the fountain from whence all honors flow. How, sir, are they dispensed? Not to the extremes, but to those who fawn at the foot of power. There is a central influence which is dangerous to the body politic. There is, so to speak, a hypertrophy of the heart of state. There is a power to draw in, but not to throw out to the extremities. It is fitly illustrated in my own person. Whilst the chest is overburdened, the extremities are without the necessary circulation to keep up a comfortable degree of warmth and vitality. The seeds of dissolution are sown in this frame; let us beware how we sow them by our action in this particular, in the body politic.

There is a concentration of the wealth of the state within the cities, and its tendency is to accumulate, and to produce a preponderating power and influence. I am for diffusing this influence, by securing to the country a suitable representation. I am for securing to the citizens of the country their just rights, and when this is done, the rights of all will be maintained. They have no interest in departing from correct principles in legislation; but it is not so with cities; they are ever watchful and anxious to increase their own power, and to do this they lay the hard fisted yeomanry under contributions. They are called upon to bear the expense of all those improvements that are calculated to benefit the large cities. I am for sustaining the interests of every part of the state. I want no influence in the country that can destroy the city, and none in the city that can destroy the interests of the country. Let us go arm in arm, and hand in hand, consulting together for our mutual advantage, and we shall reach the pinnacle of that temple which the gentleman's imaginations have created. I deny that we are attempting to take away from any portion of the inhabitants of this state, the elective franchise, or any other privilege to which they are entitled. We are endeavoring only so to diffuse the powers of government, that they may act in a healthy manner upon the body politic. I have now Mr. Chairman exhausted my strength, and occupied more of the time of the house than ought to have been done. But sir I did not feel willing, after the aspersions that had been thrown out by gentlemen in the opposition, to cast my vote without saying as much as I have. My purposes sir are as pure as those of any gentleman upon this floor, and all insinuations to the contrary I hurl back upon those from whom they come, irrespective of position or distinction. I thank you sir and this house for the patience with which my remarks have been received.

Mr. NEWELL. I confess that my mind has been on the stretch for four or five days past in regard to the amendments that have been offered to the report of the committee. The subject of slavery, nativism, internal improvements, and I don't know many other subjects, have been discussed, all of which I thought entirely foreign to the subject, that this house was endeavoring to arrive at. It seems to me the whole ground could be covered by one of these inkstands. The matter before the house, as I understand it, is about this: shall representation be based upon the voting population. I think, sir, as far as I have been able to understand gentlemen, who have expressed their views, they all unanimously agree upon this point. There has not been a dissenting voice, I believe, except that of the gentleman over the way, who thought that the liberty of voting ought to be based upon a certain degree of intelligence. Now it appears to me this would be a difficult matter to determine, without a committee of investigation. The whole matter is, is this city representation of so great importance that we should deviate from a rule that we all say is just and right. That is the question. Sir, I would despair of our government, I would despair of Kentucky continuing what she has been, if we have to deviate from that rule. For what? For the purposes which gentlemen have urged from every corner of this house. It is a yielding up of the fundamental principle upon which republican government is based. What have gentlemen told you about city population? They have not said they were fearful of such a population at present, but the day will come when a population will assemble along that "silvery cord," as it is termed, that will be dangerous to the interests of the state. According to the argument of gentlemen, every farming community is honest, but whenever you get into the city you find a population of rogues and rascals. Are we to denounce a portion of our countrymen by such epithets as these? They say that the population along the banks of the Ohio, become contaminated by intercourse with foreigners. Tell me not, that an enlightened delegation, like this convention, can be imposed upon by such statements as these. If it be right to curtail the representation of a city, it is equally right to curtail the representation of a county. I ask gentlemen where they will stop? Sir, there is but one course to pursue, and that is to grant equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none, and if this principle be not carried out, I, for one, shall despair of our republican government.

The question was then taken on Mr. Lindsey's amendment, and it was rejected.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

And then the convention adjourned.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 16, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. STUART ROBINSON.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. IRWIN offered the following resolution: Resolved, That no county, town, or city, now entitled to separate representation in the lower house shall ever be entitled to more than one senator.

Mr. President: I offer the resolution which I have just sent to the clerk's table, with a firm belief that it will be adopted by the house; and my object is, to have a direct vote upon it, that the house may know whether or not there is to be any restrictions on counties and towns that may be entitled to a separate senator.

The object of the Article presented by the legislative committee, and those who, for several days, have addressed the committee in favor of no restriction as to senators in the cities, has been, to prove that it would be unjust, and unequal—that it disfranchised one part of the state for the benefit of the other, and destroyed the equality which should exist in a free government, where all are acknowledged as equal—where numbers are acknowledged as the true basis of representation.

I undertake to demonstrate, in a few words, without the fear of successful opposition, "that without this restriction," you never can, after this first apportionment, increase the senatorial representation in Louisville, or any other city, without bringing that city into direct antagonism to the whole state.

The Article sets out by agreeing that there are to be one hundred representatives in the lower house, and thirty eight senators. This is the maximum, and no effort can reduce it. If, therefore, Louisville gets one senator, the whole balance of the state can get but thirty seven. Suppose, for the sake of argument, that the whole state shall increase in ten years fifty thousand voters, and Louisville ten thousand voters (assuming the number of voters now to be in the state at one hundred and forty thousand,) the ratio would then be about five thousand seven hundred and ninety two. Accordingly, Louisville, would be entitled to two more senators, and the state at large reduced to thirty five. The state, then, in no contingency, could increase a single senator, but must lose, at each returning ratio, throughout all time to come. As long as one city, or two cities, could increase at the ratio I have just mentioned, they would increase, if time were long enough, until the state could not have a single senator, and every senator would be from the city. I do not say that a city ever can maintain a population sufficient to produce this result; indeed I know it cannot; but such would be the tendency of the principle. This brings us, by my first proposition, to one thousand eight hundred and sixty. If the assumption for my first increase in the first ten years be correct, in 1870 the voting population in the commonwealth will be two hundred and eighty five thousand nine hundred and fourteen. The ratio then would be seven thousand five hundred and twenty four, and the increase in the voting population of Louisville will have gained precisely seventeen thousand votes, which will again entitle her to two additional senators, and a surplus of one thousand eight hundred and fifty two voters; thereby reducing the state representation to thirty two. This process is bound to continue, no extraordinary circumstance intervening. If our happy country continues to progress, (as I most devoutly hope it will,) I ask gentlemen if they are prepared to incorporate a principle so disastrous to the representative principle, so absorbing in its character, and so destructive in its consequences? Again, you must see that this principle operates oppressively upon the whole state, because, although the whole state increases five times as fast as the city, yet the only consequence is, that it diminishes the senatorial representation in the state, because it is frittered away by thirty seven districts. Yet when it operates in a single concentrated point, it must, of necessity, absorb the whole. In other words, adopt any other principle than that contained in my resolution, and you immediately set up Louisville against the whole state, for she is compelled to gain, and the balance of the state must lose.

Some of those who address the house upon this subject, seem to think that this principle of self-preservation, on the part of the balance of the state, is a wanton infringement upon the equal rights of the free citizens of a particular part of the state. But I ask, ought a principle to be adopted that must, of necessity, disfranchise the balance of the state? No, sir. I must, from my understanding of the question, be for restricting the counties, cities and towns that may be now entitled to a separate representation in the lower house to one senator.

Sir, I am proud of the city of Louisville. I am proud of her commerce and her manufactures, yet when she asks me to incorporate a principle which is eventually to absorb the whole senatorial representation, she asks of me too much. Sir, I have no disposition to restrict Louisville, more than any other county, town, or city. I associate with her talented members on this floor with great pleasure, and I feel, if I know my own heart, I wish to do her no injustice.

I will, sir, take one other position on this subject. Suppose to-morrow the state could increase one hundred and twenty thousand voters, and Louisville should have only ten thousand of those voters, she would have the benefit of this great increase, and the state must lose one senator; because, so long as the Louisville district shall keep ahead in population, she must, of necessity, have the senator, and the state must lose.

The honorable president has remarked, that if any principle or restriction should be incorporated in this constitution, he would not sign it; and if I did not think that it would be in bad taste, I might follow his example, and the consequences might be fatal.

Some gentlemen argue this question as to its bearing on the slave property of the country, but I do not feel at liberty to suppose that we ought to apprehend that any danger is to accrue to the interior from the increase of population on our Ohio border.

It is true, that the population on the Ohio river is perhaps alien to this interest. But relying for the perpetuity of the institution of slavery upon the public justice of the good citizens of the state, I know that no constitutional guaranty for this property that does not receive the sanction of the people, as just and right, can long remain as the organic law of the land.

It will be recollected, that upon this subject of slavery, a few days ago, I was anxious to incorporate the law of thirty three, but, sir, I shall not insist upon it, because I know then, as well as now, that the most that could, or perhaps all that ought to be done, was to leave this question to the legislature; and I shall be perfectly satisfied thus to leave it.

The legislature emanating directly from the people, representing their interest, and knowing their wants, can more appropriately carry out the details and the policy of the state on this subject.

I am anxious that a direct vote may be had on my resolution that we may know whether or not any principle of restriction is to be incorporated.

It is known that the debate on this subject must cease on Monday the 19th instant, and previous to that time we should examine the sixth section, which apportions the representation in the state; it is the most important section in the article, and should be particularly and critically examined.

I am done sir. I wished to make the demonstration which I have presented to the house. I think it is clear, conclusive, and just, and I submit the proposition to the house.

Mr. TURNER. I wish to offer an amendment as a substitute for the resolution of the gentleman from Logan as follows:

1. Resolved, That as a general rule, representation should be based on numbers, but this like most general rules is liable to exceptions, and when the general welfare and public safety would be jeopardized by the full allowance of this principle, it should be departed from.

2. Resolved, That each county and city in the state, should, in the apportionment of representation, be allowed its full share, according to its present number of voters, but that we are under no obligation to grant an equality of political power, where the public safety forbids it, to those who may hereafter migrate to Kentucky.

3. Resolved, That no county or city should ever be entitled to more than one senator, but should have a full representation according to numbers in the house of representatives.

I desire to make some remarks sir, on my proposition. It will be seen that in principle it is the same as the resolution of the gentleman from Logan. But before I proceed with my remarks on the pending question, I desire to make some observations on what has been said here in relation to myself, and to a speech which I delivered some days ago. Sir, I think I may say with great confidence that I have never uttered one word or given expression to one sentiment of unkindness towards any gentleman on this floor. I have attempted to discuss principles—not so ably and so forcibly as some other gentlemen—but I have done it courteously, and I claim for myself the same courtesy and the same respect that I extend to others. I do not say that gentlemen have been intentionally discourteous, and that they have wilfully misrepresented me, but I have witnessed a practice growing up in the convention of imputing positions to gentlemen which they have never taken.

Sir, the younger gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston) has charged me with having traduced the citizens of Louisville. He has erroneously done so. There is not a gentleman here who has kinder feelings for the citizens of Louisville than I have. Take the course I have pursued as an indication of my feelings towards Louisville. One of the first acts I did here was one of kindness towards Louisville and her citizens. In the discussion and controversy between the delegates from the city of Louisville and the county of Jefferson, I took part with the city of Louisville, because I thought what was asked by the county of Jefferson would lead to mischievous results, and I believed her grievances could be properly redressed in another manner.

Again, when the subject of the Louisville chancery court came up, I believed that it was right that there should be such a court at Louisville. She is a great commercial mart, and it is right that she should have a court of that character, and I rose in my place and said so.

With regard to Covington I entertain no unkind feelings. If I were disposed to cherish such feelings, she has a representative on this floor whose gentlemanly demeanor, propriety of conduct, and commanding talent, would at once disarm me. I certainly did allude to the fact that there are persons in Louisville and Covington who are in favor of emancipation. That is a fact that is well known; but I have not intimated, nor do I believe that the great body of their citizens are disposed to take away the rights of others. I believe they are in the main friendly to our institutions, but on one point I believe a part of them are mistaken. They have been misled sir, and though I differ from them in sentiment on that question, I would not wound their feelings, or offer to them an insult. In the county from which I came sir, nine tenths of the emancipationists are my particular friends, though they voted against me at the polls. They exercised the right which the constitution guarantees to them, and I have no desire to deprive them of that right.

With respect to the senatorial representation of Louisville, I have thought that one senator was sufficient for that city; but I am willing to meet them half way. I am willing to give Louisville and the county of Jefferson, outside of the city, representation according to the ratio. I am willing to go the same extent in relation to Covington, Lexington, and other cities of the state, but I am unwilling to give any city more than one senator.

I know, sir, that some excitement has grown up here, and I might have passed over some things which have been said, if it were not that a remark of the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston,) in relation to myself, was repeated by the gentleman in reply to an inquiry by the gentleman from Simpson (Mr. Clarke.) The remark to which I allude was to the effect that the gentleman from Madison had exhibited the spirit of a demagogue. This, sir, is language which I regretted to hear, and I hope it will not be repeated. Although we may occasionally get involved in excitement, we should not lose sight of a proper self-respect, and I throw it back at the feet of the gentleman. If I am justly chargeable with any thing more particularly, it is with being too conservative to suit the times. Instead of striking too low, I may have struck too high to suit the sentiments of this honorable body, and the leveling spirit abroad in the country; and if I should be charged with being too conservative, I would offer no vindication of myself from such an imputation. My conservatism, sir, will not prove injurious to the commonwealth of Kentucky. I fear, sir, that we are doing and are about to do more than this great commonwealth expects us to do, in pulling down and subverting the constitution of 1798.

There was another remark of the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston,) which I cannot pass unnoticed. It was, that I have made an attack (in a speech delivered some weeks ago) on the institution of slavery. Sir, that was an extravagant statement. The gentleman's position now, I do consider dangerous to that institution. I shall not enter upon a defence of myself against the charge. It is sufficient for me to say, that my constituents are satisfied. I know their wishes and desires, and with my conduct they have expressed no dissatisfaction. But I take this occasion—not for my defence (I need none)—to say that gentlemen shall not, without a refutation, impute to me sentiments which I have never entertained or uttered. So far as regards the institution of slavery as it now exists, no gentleman in this convention will go further than I will according to the lights I possess. But I am against the importation of more slaves into the state. I think the importation of slaves will tend to render the property here of that kind more insecure. I believe to permit the importation of slaves will ultimately cause the destruction of that institution in Kentucky.

I believe that capital can be more profitably vested than in importing slaves; besides it is a traffic that is against the lights and feelings of the age in which we live.

That I may not be charged with having uttered that which I have not said, permit me to read a few extracts from my speech, delivered on the 10th October, to which gentlemen have so often referred:

"It will be perceived that in this resolution, a portion of the old constitution—the clause which gives the power to emancipate by making just and previous provision to the owners—is omitted. I am opposed to taking the property of an individual, which he has acquired under the sanction of the law and the constitution, at all, unless with his free will and consent. I do not believe that it is consistent with the principles of our government to do so. The very first principle of the government of the United States, and of the state of Kentucky, and, indeed, one of the grounds assigned in the declaration of independence, as a cause of separation from the mother country, was, that private property should be secured against the exactions of government."

Again sir: "I therefore have regarded this principle of the right of property, as asserted in the declaration of independence, in the constitution of the United States, and in that of Kentucky, and I look to it as lying at the very foundation of our government, and as a moral principle which ought not to be violated under any circumstances, or in any way or shape."

Again sir: "I believe that the slaves in Kentucky are in better condition now, than any in which you could place them—that they are in a better condition than the laboring population of any part of the globe—and I do not believe it will benefit them to send them to a foreign country, or to sell them to the south or any where else. But if you would benefit them, the question is, whether you would enslave the white men for the purpose—for you might as well do so as to impose upon them a tax of $4,200,000 a year, in addition to the taxation now necessary to carry on the government and pay the interest on the public debt."

Again sir: "I wish to make the prohibition against free negroes as stringent and extended in its operation as is possible. I wish in this matter to go to the verge of our power under the federal constitution. I believe that if there is a curse alike to the white and the black race, it is in having free negroes where there are vicious white men."

Again sir: "It is the working portion of this commonwealth, those who have to work their way up from small beginnings in order to gain a position for themselves and their families, it is this class of the community who are interested in retaining the institution of slavery in this state; because the slaves keep out a pauper population; the emptying of the jails and the poor houses of Europe, the renegades from all parts of the earth, who come here and compete with the whole population in point of labor."

And again sir: "We all know that the institution of slavery is the best in the world for keeping society from becoming fixed and settled. Look at those who were originally overseers in Virginia and Kentucky, at their first settlement. They have many of them become the proprietors of the very estates upon which they were at first employed as overseers. And their descendants now fill the halls of legislation and the courts of judicature of the country, whilst the descendants of the original proprietors have descended to a different level in the scale of society. Such revolutions in the condition of individuals do not take place half so often, where the institution of slavery does not exist, where it is not recognized. Go to New York and to Massachusetts, and you will find many estates that have descended in the same families while the poor laborer is the poor laborer still. It is true, there are exceptions, but not the same number of exceptions as under our institutions. So you will see, though I am against extending this institution or increasing it, it has a wholesome effect in some respects, while it has in other respects a highly injurious effect. I believe that they, who are raised up where the institution of slavery exists, with some exceptions, have been uniformly distinguished. Who has ever seen such a constellation of great men as the southern states have produced, since we have achieved our liberties? Look at the great men of Virginia, South Carolina, and of Kentucky, and where are the men who are worthy to be compared with them, in the free states of the north. We have had, it is true, an Adams or two, a Webster and a Wright, but they are few and far between. But you will find them in the great south. And sir, there is a nobleness of spirit, a feeling above littleness, a greatness of soul that grows up where the institution of slavery exists, that is scarcely to be found in any other country."

Mr. President, in these extracts is there anything found inconsistent with what I said on last Saturday? Is not every word of these extracts consistent with the resolution which I have offered this morning? What ground then is there for the imputations which have been made against me? Sir, either I do not understand what is requisite to secure the institution of slavery, or the gentleman does not understand it. If slavery is to be sustained, there must be no more slaves brought into Kentucky, nor many more of the renegade description of foreigners or yankees. I do not desire to exclude those from settling among us who are upright, honest, industrious, care taking-citizens. How, sir, did we procure the suffrages of the non-slaveholders, last summer. By convincing them that if the further importation of slaves was stopped, and the migration of foreign paupers was checked, the reward of labor of those who are dependent on their own industry, would be increased; and that if we inundated Kentucky with more slaves and the renegades from Europe, the price of labor would be reduced, and the native population would consequently be injured. The foreigners to whom I allude, when they come here, can live cheaper and work for less than the native Kentuckian can; and if their introduction be continued, and more slaves are brought in, the native laboring white men will have no chance to get along and improve their condition. The consequence will be, as the price of labor falls, the laboring white man will see that slaves are an obstacle to his getting employment, and he will turn against the institution. Sir, this is no new doctrine with me. I have long thought it would be better not to bring in any more slaves. It was the policy of Kentucky seventeen or eighteen years ago. It was certainly overturned last winter, but it was done without being demanded by the people, or previously discussed in the canvass, or in the public press, and without being asked for or desired by a majority. In many instances numbers voted for the modification of the law of 1833, against the wishes of their constituents. Why, sir, in 1830, the Hon. James Love, who afterwards represented the district in which I reside in congress, introduced a bill into the state legislature, providing that every slave thereafter brought into Kentucky by purchase, should be free as soon as he came in; and you, Mr. President, and I, sir, voted for it.

The PRESIDENT. The gentleman is mistaken. I never gave such a vote with such an avowal.

Mr. TURNER. Sir, I know nothing about the avowal. But I will turn to the journal of that session, pages 236-7, and see who is right. Here is the bill and the vote on it, with your vote side by side with mine.

"A bill more effectually to prevent the importation of slaves into this state, as merchandise, was read, as amended, as follows, viz:

"SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That none shall be slaves, except such as shall be slaves within this commonwealth, on the first day of June next, and the descendants of the females of them and such slaves as shall thereafter be lawfully imported into this commonwealth, and the descendants of the females of them.

"SEC. 2. Be it further enacted, That from and after the said first day of June, it shall not be lawful for any person or persons, to import into this commonwealth, any slave or slaves, except emigrants to the state, bringing their slaves with them, for their own use, and not for merchandise, and citizens of this state, claiming slaves in another state, by devise, descent, or marriage; in all which cases, it shall be lawful for any such persons, to import such slaves for their own use, and not as merchandise.

"SEC. 3. All laws now in force prohibiting the importation of slaves into this commonwealth, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed, from and after the said first day of June: Provided, That the provisions of this bill shall not apply to persons transiently passing through the commonwealth, with slaves, on their way to any other state or country: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as to prevent persons emigrating to this state, and settling permanently in it, from selling their slaves.

"The question was then taken on engrossing the said bill, for a third reading, which was decided in the negative, and so the said bill was rejected.

"The yeas and nays being required thereon, by Messrs. Love and Chambers, were as follows:

"YEAS—Mr. Speaker, Messrs. C. Allan, B. Allen, Barrett, Brown, Butler, Burns, Cassidy, Colglazer, Cratchfield, Curd, Fields, Fowler, Gaines, Grundy, Guthrie, Hayes, Henderson, Hobbs, Hunton, Jackson, A. Johnson, E. L. Johnson, Love, McAfee, J. T. Morehead, Murray, Patrick, Phelps, Rodes, Rudd, Russell, Shanks, Smith, Speedsmith, Strother, Thomas, Tomlinson, Tompkins, Turner, A. S. White, D. White, Wortham and Yantis—44.

"NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Baker, Barlow, Beall, Calhoun, Chambers, Chiles, Churchill, Colyer, Copelin, Dawson, Dickson, Dyer, Ewing, Gass, Girton, Grigsby, Hall, Hardy, Harris, Haynes, Heady, Helm, Hickman, James, Lackey, Lewis, McNary, J. K. Marshall, Mize, P. Morehead, New, Norvell, Patterson, Pierce, Preston, Ray, Robb, Roberts, Sisk, Sprigg, Stewart, Stotts, Stout, True, Vallandigham, Ward, Whittington, G. W. Williams, S. Williams, W. J. Williams and Wilson—52."

Mr. TRIPLETT. Will the gentleman excuse me; I think it better, for obvious reasons, that we should go into committee of the whole on the report of the committee on the legislative department, where this discussion may be continued.

Mr. TURNER. If it will be the understanding that when we are in committee of the whole, I shall have the floor to continue my speech I have no objection. [Agreed, agreed.]

Mr. GRAY. I beg to suggest to the gentleman from Daviess, that a difficulty presents itself. The convention has now before it for its action a resolution and an amendment thereto, which will not be before the committee of the whole. I submit therefore whether it will not be necessary to dispose of this resolution in convention.

Mr. TRIPLETT. To obviate that objection I will move that the pending resolution and amendment be referred to the committee of the whole having charge of the report from the committee on the legislative department, and that the convention now resolve itself into committee of the whole thereon.

The motion was agreed to, and the convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, accordingly, Mr. MERIWETHER in the chair.

Mr. TURNER. I simply refer to the facts, and so far as respects the vote of the representatives from Jefferson and Louisville, I think, I cannot be mistaken. And if there has been any difference of opinion on the part of the honorable President or the Chairman, (Mr. Meriwether) and myself, till the present time, I did not know it. I bring this matter forward simply to show that gentlemen who have gone the same way with me, in relation to slavery for nineteen years, now come here and throw it in my face, that I occupy a portion of the ground which the emancipationists do, as the honorable President, and you Mr. Chairman, did some weeks since. When I take ground I will maintain it, and I am not to be scared by an old shirt hung up in a field as if I were a crow. In my canvass for a seat in the house of representatives the year that this vote was taken, I went to a meeting at a Baptist church, and was there on Saturday. There came up a question at that meeting, whether they should have what they called a decorum or constitution of the church. Some were for taking the bible as a whole for their sole guide, and others wanted the decorum or constitution, to aid in matters of church discipline. A large majority were in favor of the decorum or constitution, but before a final vote was taken an old man who was a member went out from the meeting, and returned soon with a very wise look, and said he to the congregation, "I have just the information that will surprise and astound you. I have ascertained that the very decorum we are about adopting, was written by a pope of Rome three hundred years ago." The consequence of this information was that the decorum was rejected by a vote of four out of five, because the Pope of Rome had written it originally, not because one word of it was wrong in principle.

Now, because the emancipationists take the ground that you and I, Mr. Chairman, and the honorable president, have occupied for twenty years, must we run and leave it, and cry popery, popery—as our only reason for so doing?—The emancipationists in my part of the state are generally in favor of electing all the officers of government. Should we run from that ground because they believe it right? I have assumed it; if you, Mr. Chairman, and the honorable president are made of such materials, I am not, and my constituents are not.

There are some little matters of which I wish to speak, before I go on with the main debate. There were a few things said the other day by the honorable president of this convention, which I now wish to pay some attention to. In speaking of my position, he uses this language. My attention was called off at the time, and if I had not been afterwards informed of what had been said, I should not probably have read the speech. But there is this sentiment, and if there is one heart in this house, or in this great commonwealth, that responds to it, besides the honorable president's, I am deceived. Replying to what I had said in debate, the president said: "Thank God, emancipation has not drenched the fields of Louisville with blood."

I understand that the honorable president when he uttered that sentiment, thrust out his huge head at me, as if he wanted to send increased pangs to my heart. I have nothing more to say about that. If it was intended for me I envy not the heart that conceived, or the tongue that uttered it. It is true sir, it is true that misfortune happened in my county in the canvass and blood was shed—yes, blood dear to me—and it is likewise true that if you go to the great and glorious battle field of Buena Vista, you will find there was kindred blood poured out there, and in both instances to sustain and maintain the institutions of my country, and there is more of it still that will be offered up when there is a requisition for it in such a cause.

Here is another sentiment which I will read. The honorable president in the same speech said in speaking of the proposed restriction on city representation: "I have no more confidence in those men that have made up their minds to invade the rights of their fellow citizens, and stifle the voice of the people of Kentucky, than I have in the voice of the Autocrat of Russia, who thinks and acts for the whole."

Now this is quite courteous—is it not? It is true that it is rather stronger than I allow my overseer to use towards my slaves, unless the offence is great. I came not here to stifle the voice of any of the people of Kentucky, and I deny that that remark will embrace me. But this was manifestly uttered here for some purpose or other. Was it to deter us from free debate and free action? I dislike to think that after being honored with a high seat in this convention, he would make such a declaration for that purpose. But the honorable president did not stop at this remark. He said we would go as far as the Autocrat of Russia, and would go further if the temptation were sufficient. We must be a wretched set of scamps if this be true—and it goes very far to show that those who sent us here are not very highly qualified for self-government. The president further declared: "I can sign no constitution which denies to my constituents those equal and political rights that other freemen have."

I do not think we shall put on them any restrictions which other freemen have not. This was spoken with reference to a future state of things. I regret he should say this. It might make an impression on the people, that if he did not sign the new constitution, they could not have the benefit of it. This would be terrible—awful! It is painful to separate from the gentleman on ordinary occasions, but when he talks about not signing the constitution, as Jack Downing would say, "it is almost too painful for human nature to bear." If he does not sign the constitution, the residue of the convention can, and if a majority of the people agree upon it, it will be valid without his name. But he has, to add to his cruelty, avowed that he will go before his constituents and oppose its adoption. Merciful Heavens! save us, and the fruits of our labor, from such overpowering opposition.

I will say a word or two about the general apportionment bill, as I understand we are to take a vote on it in one or two days. I have made out a list of twenty-six counties, which contain a voting population of twelve thousand three hundred and ten over and above the number of members they will be entitled to, under the report of the committee. These counties run through the heart of the state. In many cases, the residuums of these counties are taken off and applied at a distance of one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles, to counties with pursuits differing from those whence they are taken. I think the old constitution, in this respect, is the best. It gives the residuums to the adjacent counties. There is a great difference of interests in the agricultural portions of the state. Some of the residuums from a corn growing or grazing county are taken to a tobacco raising county. The counties in the south are mainly interested in raising pork and in distilling, or in growing tobacco, while those of the blue grass region raise stock—horses, mules, and cattle. Now, whenever a residuum is taken from any county, it should be taken to one having the same general interests. The old constitution attempts to guaranty this common identity of interests and sympathies. I know that in practice, there has been some injustice committed under its provisions; but so far as we can put a check on this we ought to do it. I do not want it in the power of any political party to proscribe another; but it is in the power of one or two great interests to proscribe a third interest, under the report of the committee.

Now, so far as respects the senatorial representation, you will see by the resolutions, which are referred to the committee of the whole, that they assume the position that every senatorial district shall have a representation according to the present number of its population.—Those resolutions are offered in a spirit of concession and compromise. You will see they accord to every county in the state a full representation in the house of representatives according to numbers, now and hereafter. The senatorial restriction on the future power in relation to cities, is to apply also to the counties—for there are some counties that grow up very fast, particularly those in which there are railroads, or in which iron ore is found, as, for instance, in the county of Estill, where there is iron ore enough to last the United States for a thousand years. The mountains where this mineral is found in superabundance, are two or three hundred feet in height, and twenty miles in length. There is a large coal region near them. It is probable that the iron and coal interests in that county, and the adjacent counties, will be the means of introducing a large population. My proposition, it will be observed is, that no county or city shall have more than one senator each. There are other counties, besides the one I have named, where the population would rapidly increase. New England is now looking to the water power of Kentucky. It is exciting the attention of the capitalists of Lowell and Boston. This water power is found not only on the margin of Ohio, the Kentucky and Green rivers, but in other portions of the state. There will be individuals brought there to work as operators in the various branches of manufactures—iron, cotton, wool, &c. We are making a constitution for posterity, and not for ourselves alone. We are charged with a desire to proscribe some portion of the citizens of Kentucky. We have no such object in view. All we ask is, that the great law of nature, self-preservation, shall be observed, and that our institutions shall be preserved in the constitution which we shall make. Are we making a constitution for the outpourings of the jails, penitentiaries, and alms houses of Europe, and of our large cities in other states, or is the instrument for the great body of the yeomanry of Kentucky? It has been argued here as if we were going to proscribe a part of our own people. I deny it, but I say it is our duty to protect those who are here, and their posterity, in their lives, liberty, and property, and to see that our institutions are kept sacred from the contaminating touch of the tens of thousands of foreign paupers and immoral immigrants who are daily landing on our shores, and migrating to Kentucky from the large cities in other states.

I intend to allude to one or two of the arguments of the younger gentleman from Nelson, who, in the early part of the session, in remarking upon a speech I had made, said, if I understood him aright, that my arguments were made to suit the other side of Mason and Dixon's line. That, however, is a matter of opinion. Now, I thought when he made his speech a day or two ago, that he went further beyond this line, than I had ever done. How far did the gentleman go? Why, he went all the way to Europe, and like Macbeth, collected around him, and seemed about to introduce into Kentucky all sorts of people or spirits—black, and white, and red—green, spotted and striped, grey and grisly, and blue. But when he marched on his motly crew to the confines of the state, apprehending that we would not receive them, he went back and brought in Kossuth and his band of proscribed patriots to march at their head, and in their high names to render his renegades welcome to Kentucky. I would divorce that illustrious patriot and his companions from such a crew, as that he was bringing to Kentucky. Those brave Hungarians who have fallen on the field, fell in behalf of the last rights of man; as noble patriots, they have poured out their blood for the liberties of their country. If Kossuth and his com-patriots were to come to Kentucky, I would open my heart, and say, "welcome." As God Almighty is my judge, I would, if they come to Kentucky, and I will divide with them the last dime, and the last crumb of bread I have. I will treat them as brethren. But I do protest against these gallant people being classed with and spoken of, in connection with the rogues and cut-throats of other countries, and against their migrating to Kentucky in any such company. I protest against it in the name of high heaven, and the character and great interests of the commonwealth of Kentucky. Sir, ten years ago I had a seat in the house of representatives, and at that time the gentleman from Nelson was the governor of this state. He had his excellent lady and his charming family residing here, and he and they went hand in hand with me against the importation of more slaves into this commonwealth. His lovely daughters came to the house day after day, and cheered us on, and finally, from being in a minority, we got a majority of five, and prevented the repeal of the law of 1833. I should have thought, looking to the fact of our having pursued the same course together, that he would not have talked of my arguments being made to suit the other side of Mason and Dixon's line.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I regret very much that the gentleman has thought proper to introduce the name of my family.

Mr. TURNER. I did it in all kindness, sir.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I have no doubt of that. My remark with reference to the subject of the gentleman's speech, was made respecting that portion of it in which he alluded to the treatment of slaves in the slave states, and gave such a graphic description of it as I have often seen in the newspapers of the day. It was not with reference to the principles of the law of '33. That law, as now modified, meets my approbation, as I understand it. When a member of the legislature I believe I voted against its repeal. It was not that he advocated the principle of the law of 1833, but it was that graphic description in which he portrayed to our imaginations, and in which he called on us to know how we would like to see our wives and daughters chained and dragged from our bosoms and our firesides.

Mr. TURNER. In 1831 I used the same argument, because I thought it necessary to reach a man's feelings, as well as his judgment—not that slaves are chained in Kentucky, or treated amiss in the south—a sentiment I never uttered—but I objected to their being chained and brought here. I supposed it was not a sight desirable to any. If it is to the gentleman he can say so, I will give way. As the gentleman is silent, I take it we agree. I do not believe there is a country where slaves are as well treated as in Kentucky. I think they are in a better condition in Kentucky than the poorer laboring class of any state of the Union. When remarks are thrown out about my position, I will try to throw them back, perhaps not as gently as the gentleman from Mason says the lover strikes his mistress with a boquet.

I think we ought to make a constitution for the people of Kentucky; for those who are here now and their descendants, to protect them in their rights. If we had been asked last summer, will you make a constitution to sustain the people of Kentucky against the great and overwhelming tide of pauper emigration, or for those paupers, what would we have said? We would have said we will make a constitution for you—we will look to you first, and if we can give these other people as much political rights with safety as you have, we will do it. If we cannot, we will not do it.

Did you ever look into this matter of an organized city with its government? It is a government within a government. Is there not something that requires that such a population as fill up cities, should not have as much political legislative power as those who live in the country? We have nothing of a mayor or other officers of that sort; we have no city courts, no government within a government. Under the old constitution, you granted out the whole legislative power of the government to the cities over their citizens, and then the cities make laws for themselves, if not inconsistent with the constitution or statutes of the state government. The city has its mayor, aldermen, marshals, &c., and after having ninety-nine hundredths of the power which the legislature possesses, they have equal power in the legislature itself. Is this right? Suppose the gentleman from Fleming comes and asks that a little portion of his county shall have power to enact laws for itself, and after this is granted, should ask for equal power in the legislative government with the residue of the state. Would it be right and proper she should have it? Are they to be made so great, and then come back and have equal power in general legislation with all the agricultural portion of the state? We first give them power to legislate for themselves, and then they ask for full power to come and legislate for us. I think this is not right. It is asking too much.

It has been objected that we brought in here the constitution of the United States, and of other states, and we were then asked if we would adopt their provisions in our constitution. We brought these in, to show that numbers was not practically the basis of representation in the federal or state governments. Look at the District of Columbia. She has no representation in congress. I suppose those who framed the constitution of the United States understood the rights of man as well as we do. Why is it that the great states of Maryland, Georgia, and Louisiana have said their cities shall not have more than half the legislative power to which their numbers would entitle them. It is because they have delegated to them a large portion of the legislative power of the country for their benefit, and they ought not to govern other people. But we accord to them full representation in the house, and one senator to every county and city to protect their local rights.

Instead of our wishing to proscribe cities, they wish to proscribe us. They first ask us to give them full power, without our having any partnership in their local governments, and then they come back and kindly ask us, as you have given us this, why not in your great generosity let us govern you also?

I have the same opinion in regard to this that my friend Mr. Mize from Estill had on a different occasion. When he and I were members of the legislature, he was a democrat and I a whig; he professed a great regard for me, and said, as he called on me almost every morning, I like you better than any man I ever saw. I said to him, there is a United States senator to be made now, and your vote will elect me. Said he, "Turner that is carrying the joke a little too far." It is carrying my love for the cities a little too far to ask me to give them power to govern themselves and then have a general partnership power to govern me besides.

What are we to ask ourselves when we go back to our constituents, or what will our constituents ask us? They will ask, did you make a constitution for us, or for the paupers of Europe. Will you say you thought numbers was the basis of representation? Again, they will ask what numbers, Kentuckians, or Germans, or the renegades from New York or Boston? I thought the states of New York and Massachusetts made laws for their people, and the countries of Europe for theirs. Why we are carrying this further than they did in France in 1792, when they proclaimed universal liberty, equality, and fraternity to all the world. It is saying come one come all you outcasts of Europe and of the great cities, and as you are so much better skilled in government than we are, we will give up the government of Kentucky to you, and let you control.

Why, we see what has been done in Ohio. I am not for making a constitution for whigs or democrats. Here is a foreign interest in the state—Wilnot proviso politicians, free soilers—and they elect a few representatives to your legislature. The two great political parties of the state are pretty equally divided, and these few individuals who belong to neither one nor the other party, can, if they choose, give one of them the ascendancy. Well, this free soil power throws itself between the two great political parties of the commonwealth, and offers a carte blanche to be filled up by the one who will give them the most in power or station. Now, I will ask, if we came here to make a constitution to have such a state of things? Did we come here to sell our rights? No. In the resolutions which I have offered, I said nothing about Louisville, Covington, Lexington, or any particular city or county. It is to carry out the general principle of protecting the rights, interests, and institutions of Kentucky, that freemen of this commonwealth are to hold the power of governing. We are not willing to invite men here to destroy our institutions and drive us out of the country. Can any man doubt that if these foreigners are invited to our country without stint they will take possession of your shores first and afterwards find their way into the heart of the country, and finally they will, if not restricted, have the balance of power in the state, and the institution of slavery will be abolished? These men will be opposed to it because they do not understand it. And yet they have lived in slavery and starvation under a government of their own in Europe. Our negroes are a fine, hearty set of fellows. It would do your heart good to see them on a Sunday, neatly clad, returning from church, talking and laughing with their wives and children, and all appearing as happy as possible. Now, I wish to keep them in that happy condition, and I do not want those ignorant and degraded foreigners to come in amongst us and disturb our peace and quiet, and drive the poor negroes out of the state. I have sympathy for those poor creatures, many of whom have nursed us when we were young, and our children since. I desire to see them well treated and taken care of. There was a gentleman of my acquaintance in Madison county, who last summer, having attended a political meeting, on returning home, found that his negroes had been told they would all be free in August. They were in a hurly burly way in consequence, and very unsettled. The gentleman called them all before him, and told them that by the next Sunday morning week they must have their clothes fixed up, as he was going to send them to Liberia. They were much astonished and alarmed, and the negroe who was at the head of them, stepped forward when the period came, and imploringly exclaimed, "for God's sake, master, let me stay—don't send us to Hellberia;" and all of them promised to be the most obedient servants in the world if permitted to remain. The fact is, we do not want foreigners in such crowds in Kentucky—we want plenty of elbow room. We do not wish that character of population that there is in the city of New York. There are many men there worth half a million of dollars, whilst there are 100,000 persons who have neither bread to eat nor clothes to wear.

I will illustrate my views between our own people and foreigners, by telling you a little anecdote. My friend, Jesse Jones, who was known to some gentlemen here, was courting a young woman named Sally Newland, a member of the Baptist church, and he wanted to join that church. But before he could be admitted, it was required that he should possess the proper religious qualifications, and subscribe to the rules of the church, one of which was, that he must declare he loved all the brethren and sisters. When this question was put to him, "do you love all the brethren and sisters?" he promptly replied, "yes! I love them all, and sister Sally Newland in particular!" Now, sir, I have a kind heart for all the citizens of our sister states and of other nations, and I like them all; but I like the citizens of Kentucky, in particular. I came here to protect her citizens and her institutions against all foreign immigration that may come in here.

Now, I am only bringing forward a proposition to protect the state at large, what, in principle, one of the honorable delegates from Louisville (Mr. Rudd,) has brought forward to protect the property-holding citizens of Louisville. They want to protect themselves against themselves in Louisville, but are not willing to protect those who live out of the city. He brought in a resolution to have a constitutional provision, that in voting a tax on the city, none but tax payers should have the right of suffrage. Now, it is obvious that this is aimed at the ignorant, pauper population that is flooding Louisville. The same delegate, and his colleagues, are using their influence here to secure to these ignorant, degraded paupers—these people who may not vote to tax their neighbors—may come in and vote so as to control and tax the farmers, who have but little profit left, after they have paid the expense of maintaining their families. He has objected to these men voting in Louisville, but when we object to their drawing the traces too tight in our part of the state, and to their coming in here and voting upon our rights, they say, you are accustomed to a rough course of life—you are hardy and tough, and you can bear it; but we are tender people in the cities, and must be protected against our own operatives. God save us from such one-sided institutions. Well, it is for us to vote whether this shall be the case or not.

Now, these very men are brought in here to vote upon our rights and interests, but not in accordance with the policy of the gentleman from Louisville to vote on their rights and their interests. I think we should provide for ourselves—for our own protection and safety. The first law of nature is self-preservation.

I have detained the committee longer than I ought to have done. I have no feelings to gratify. I wished to put myself properly before the country. I brought here the slave bill of 1830, and the ayes and noes on it, to show the gentleman from Louisville that he should not have reproved me for occupying, in part, the same ground which he and I have occupied together in reference to the question of slavery for nineteen years. I told my constituents that I did not expect to get any thing more embodied in the new constitution than the power to re-enact the statute of 1833. I highly regard the gentleman from Simpson and others—they no doubt represent the feelings of their constituents, and I claim to represent nothing more than the feelings of my own constituents, and with a majority of whom I agree in every respect.

Mr. APPERSON. But for the resolution which was adopted yesterday, that the debate on the legislative report should close on Monday next, I should not, upon the fifth section of the report, have submitted any views of my own whatever. But inasmuch as I have some views to submit to the convention upon apportionment of representation, and inasmuch as I may not have an opportunity hereafter, or at any rate as only ten minutes will be allowed to each delegate after twelve o'clock on Monday, to give his views on the report, I have risen for the purpose of making known mine. The discussion has taken a very wide range, some of which I have not considered as legitimate. But I understand that the resolutions of the gentleman from Madison, on his motion, are now brought before the committee along with the report of the committee on the legislative department. Then it becomes legitimate to make allusion to slavery. I did not so consider it in the discussion of the fifth section of the report now under consideration. We have heard very much on the subject of slavery, much more than I anticipated when I came here. I presumed there was little difficulty in the convention as to the mode in which that question should be settled. Although we had a great excitement last summer, and it was a question which swallowed up all others, I have for the first time to learn that there has been one emancipationist elected to the convention. So far as I had formed any opinion of public sentiment on that question, not only at home, but abroad, I had supposed that the provision as it stood in the old constitution, would be exactly the provision that would stand in the new. I was apprised that there were delegates elected, who were in favor of incorporating the act of 1833 into the constitution; but so far as my knowledge extended, and so far as the newspapers gave me information, that number I knew was small.

The act of 1833 always had my support, and most probably always would have had it, as a legislative enactment, but I am utterly opposed to incorporating it into the constitution. That law is a matter of expediency, and I conceive that the people, through the law making power, had the necessary power to pass such an act, and at a subsequent period to repeal it. The section of country from which I came have been almost unanimous in favor of the law of 1833. Since 1833, the county of Montgomery has had a representation in both branches of the legislature, with few exceptions, in favor of that law, and the surrounding counties with perhaps the exception of Clarke, have also been in favor of it. I do not, however, think the repeal of that law has had so dreadful an effect as was anticipated. But few slaves have been introduced into Kentucky since its repeal; in northern Kentucky none. Although some were disposed to embark in the purchase of them, yet when they went abroad and ascertained their cost, they returned without them. I have thought that law could have but little effect; because I have known negro traders to visit the county in which I reside and there to buy slaves to take south. I was satisfied if they could buy slaves cheaper in other states they would not come to Kentucky. Hence I came to the conclusion that slaves were perhaps as high abroad as at home, and consequently but few would be imported into the state. However, were I a representative now, I should vote for the law of 1833 as a legislative enactment. But I do not believe a majority of the people of Kentucky are in favor of incorporating that act into the constitution. So far as the people whom I represent are concerned, I know they do not desire it. I have thought it was very unnecessary that there should have been so protracted a discussion on this subject, and I will therefore dismiss it.

We have heard this morning that there are two sorts of voters in Louisville. I would ask, if the voters in Louisville who voted for members of this convention, or who have the right to vote for members of the general assembly, have greater privileges than other voters of Kentucky? Is there a portion of the citizens who have a right to vote in Jefferson who would not have a right to vote in Fayette? Does not the same class of citizens vote in one as the other county? I take it, it is so. The qualifications are the same, and all must have them, or they are not entitled to vote.

We have been told, that in consequence of the immense growth of the cities, particularly Louisville and Covington, they would in a short time exercise a power and a very unhappy influence on the legislation of the state. We have been told that there has been a greater increase in Louisville than in the country, and that it will continue to surpass the increase in the counties generally, till it controls the legislation of the state.

Let us examine as to the truth of the charge. I deny it, so far as a portion of the counties is concerned. Suppose we consider one of the rural districts to consist of the counties of Greenup, Carter, Lawrence, Johnson, Floyd, Morgan, and Lewis, which lie contiguous, it will be seen that the voting population was as follows:

Greenup, - - -	1047	1597
Carter, - - -	592	908
Lawrence, - - -	740	956
Johnson, - - -		570
Floyd, - - -	946	961
Morgan, - - -	695	1225
Lewis, - - -	949	1409
Total, - - -	4969	7626

Or take another district, to be composed of the following counties:

	1839	1848
Pike, - - -	537	807
Letcher, - - -		365
Perry, - - -	423	463
Breathitt, - - -	359	590
Clay, - - -	707	750
Owsley, - - -		566
Estill, - - -	1017	1011
Total, - - -	3043	4652

Let us turn our attention to these mountain counties, and see how it is. Let us examine these sparsely populated portions, and make a comparison between them and the county of Jefferson, including the great city of Louisville, which in 1839 had a voting population of 4770, and in 1848 of 6774; thus showing that in nine years, the increase in Jefferson county and the city of Louisville is a fraction less than forty-two per cent. Taking the apportionment of 1839 and 1848, how do we find it? I take 1848, because I wish to confine myself to the voters of 1848 and not of 1849, because we all know there is a manifest difference. There is a large male population who are not entitled to vote, as aliens and others in Louisville and scattered through the county of Jefferson. In 1849 there was no list taken—in 1848 there was. Making the comparison on these data, I ascertain that the county of Jefferson increased in those years a little less than forty-two per cent.

The counties of Greenup, Carter, Lewis, Lawrence, Johnson, Floyd, Pike, Letcher, Perry, Breathitt, Clay, Owsley, Estill, and Morgan, as exhibited in the two tables, have increased in voters within a small fraction of fifty per cent., in the nine years past. Is not that a rural population? And when we are told that the city is to overshadow and overbalance the rest of the state—that our rural districts are to be swallowed up, we should make the inquiry, is it true? When we look at the figures we can tell, and I deny that it is true. I have no doubt you may take counties in other parts of the state, and you will find it pretty much the same. But go into the rich blue grass districts, and some of the counties have not passed twelve per cent. within nine years, while some of the mountain counties have passed fifty-five per cent.

Bourbon, Harrison, Scott, Fayette, Jessamine, Clarke, and Woodford, lying contiguous, and amongst the richest counties in the state, had a voting population as follows:

Bourbon, - - -	1601	1773
Harrison, - - -	1696	2060
Scott, - - -	1518	1839
Fayette, - - -	2571	2584
Woodford, - - -	1153	1255
Jessamine, - - -	1198	1325
Clarke, - - -	1461	1719
Total, - - -	11,198	12,555

These counties have gone a little over twelve per cent., taken collectively, but Fayette has not reached one-fourth of one per cent.

I have made my calculations from the auditor's reports for 1839 and 1848, as to the number of voters, not deeming it necessary to go further back than 1839; and in 1848 the last list of voters was taken by the commissioners throughout the state. The printed table which we have shows the number of white males in each county in the present year; but as there are many who are aliens, and for other causes, are not legal voters, in all my calculations I adopt the list of voters of 1848, the last which has been taken. To show the fairness of my calculations, and that the counties were not selected for their great increase of population, and without regard to locality, it will be seen, they are in one block, reaching from Big Sandy to the rich counties, and lying between the Ohio and Kentucky rivers. It was necessary I should include the county of Clay, which lies south of the Kentucky, because a portion of the county of Owsley was taken from Clay, and without including the county of Clay it was impossible to compare the increase. If we look at Harlan, I think it will show an increase of more than fifty-five per cent., and it is most probable that Knox, Whitley, and other mountain counties have increased in the same ratio. Mason is one of the richest counties in the state, with a thriving city lying on the Ohio river, and yet she has only increased, in nine years, a little over seventeen per cent.

We see then, that the county of Jefferson, including the city of Louisville, is not likely to overbalance the rest of the state. The county, including the city, has not increased very rapidly in voting population, though there are many foreigners, not naturalized, in the vicinity of the city.

In the rich limestone regions of the state, sometimes termed the blue grass country—because of the extensive grazing—the rich are increasing rapidly in wealth; they extend their possessions, although at high prices, and the smaller farmers are constantly leaving those fine lands. This is the reason that there is so inconsiderable an increase of voters. And we may expect the same cause and the same result will continue.

The gentleman from Madison spoke of the farmers—in which class he seemed to include himself—as if they were hardly able to pay their taxes, and that this inability was produced by some controlling power exercised by the cities in the state. Now, if we will examine the auditor's report, we shall find that the county of Madison has more wealth, in proportion to population, than the county of Jefferson, including Louisville. If that be the situation of the population which he represents, then they appear to be richer than the city population. But let all these matters be as they may, I suppose that when we declare that "representation shall be equal and uniform," we mean what we say; we do not mean to insinuate that the representation shall be as our interests happen to be; that if we represent a city and its interests, that they shall have a preponderance of power, irrespective of population; or, if we represent a rural population, that they shall have privileges which the city population are not entitled to. I know that the people whom I represent are mainly agriculturalists, and of course belong to the rural class, and I have no doubt that I but fairly represent them in my feeble advocacy of the principle, that all voters, rich or poor, residing in the country or in the city, should stand on the same footing, and be heard in the legislative halls in proportion to their numbers.

I think the gentleman from Franklin made a mistake when he spoke of the apportionment, as reported in the sixth section of the report now under consideration; the forty counties instead of being entitled to forty-five, will, I understand, be entitled to fifty representatives. I examined his tables and the sixth section a little this morning, and when I come to make the calculation on the principles of that section, I find if we fix the ratio at 1416, (and I do this because this would be the ratio according to the number of voters in 1848,) and if that ratio be taken, the county of Jefferson will be entitled to five or six representatives, and the balance of the state is entitled to be represented in exactly the same ratio, and must have it; all residuums whether in Jefferson county, the city of Louisville or elsewhere, must be applied some where else. In doing this, we have been in the habit, sometimes, of passing by many counties, and taking residuums to those more distant, and in this manner the state has been laid off, or apportioned for representation, and which has caused on some occasions dissatisfaction on the part of the minority in the legislature.

I believe I can satisfy this convention, that in the disposition of the representation of the different counties of the state, it has been done fairly; at least so far as the last apportionment was concerned.

I find Bourbon, Logan, Nelson, Christian, Fleming, Madison, Fayette, and Hardin, under the last apportionment, have each two representatives; without drawing residuums they were only entitled to one each, that is, after giving them one member, the surplus of voters in each county is not equal to the ratio, and hence, to get a second member, each of these counties must draw a residuum. The following counties, under the last apportionment, had one member each, yet neither of them have the full ratio, to wit: Jessamine, Whitley, Boyle, Woodford, Casey, Russell, Meade, Grayson, Todd, and Livingston. They draw residuums from other portions of the state, and all of these counties are looked upon, and counted on as being on the whig side in politics. How is it on the other side? Let us see if it is not about equal. The county of Harrison has two representatives, but not enough voters for more than one, without drawing a residuum from other counties; and the following counties have each one representative, though the number of qualified voters in each is under the ratio, to-wit: Pendleton, Trimble, Oldham, Grant, Anderson, Spencer, Bullitt, Monroe, Hart, Larue, Taylor, Green, Union, Simpson, Trigg, and Crittenden, and the counties of Fulton and Hickman united, have a representative, but are under the ratio.

Here are eighteen representatives on the opposite side in politics, representing constituencies which are below the ratio; thus it seems the number on each side is exactly equal. This being the case, it seems to me there is no cause of complaint. I have a table now before me, which was not laid off with a view to representation, but since there have been propositions submitted for fixing a principle for the apportionment of representation, I have concluded to submit that table now, so that when the sixth section shall come up for consideration, gentlemen may understand it, and I flatter myself that if gentlemen will examine this table they will see that it is as fair in the division of the state, and in the apportionment of representation as can very well be made.

I know it is impossible to make representation exactly equal and uniform, and having exactly the same number of voters in each electoral district. But we must approximate as nearly to equality and uniformity as may be, and that is evidently the design of all of us.

The gentleman from Trigg has submitted a proposition to lay off the state into twelve representative districts. I can hardly see why the state should be thus laid off, particularly when we look at the inequality. The gentleman's proposition makes the first district to consist of eight counties, embracing Fulton, Hickman, Graves, Calloway, Ballard, McCracken, Marshall, and Livingston, with a voting population of 7171, according to the returns of 1848. Now look at the sixth district, embracing the counties of Jefferson, Bullitt, Nelson, Washington, Marion, Shelby, and Spencer, and in these counties we find we have a voting population of 17,184, being a little more than ten thousand difference. Is that all? Let us examine the ninth district. There are nine counties, embracing Fayette, Woodford, Bourbon, Clarke, Jessamine, Anderson, Mercer, Boyle, and Garrard, which have 14,566 voters. What is the object of this? If we are to lay off the state into districts, let them be as equal as may be, and let us not look this way or that, with regard to political preferences.

Look again at district number one. It may be exactly right that these counties should stand in representation as they are placed. For instance, Fulton and Hickman will have one representative, Graves one, Calloway one, Ballard and McCracken one, and Marshall and Livingston together one; but this is not the way they now stand, for Calloway and Marshall now vote together, and Livingston has a member to herself. I admit it may be right so to place the counties, but why make such a district? It looks amazingly strange as though it was designed for some purpose not apparent on its face. The formation of some of the other districts looks equally strange. Why not, instead of thus laying off the districts, lay them off as nearly equal as may be, and in as convenient form, having proper regard in every instance, to territory, form, population, association, and intercourse? I have now before me a table which very nearly divides the state into four equal parts, at least in population and form, and having a due consideration for the intercourse and association of the people. In laying off these counties, as I have done, into four districts, I have undertaken to do it impartially and fairly; and whatever may be the errors, an opportunity will be afforded to have them pointed out.

The first district is as follows, to wit:

Counties.	Voters.	Members.
Pike, - - -	807
Floyd, - - -	961	1,768
Johnson, - - -	570
Lawrence, - - -	956	1,526

Owsley, - - -	566
Breathitt, - - -	590	1,156
Perry, - - -	463
Letcher, - - -	365
Harlan, - - -	661	1,489
Knox, - - -		1,091
Whitley, - - -		1,021
	36,451	26

This district has more counties than either of the others, but I aimed to make the population of each district nearly equal. The reason why I embraced Whitley in this district, is that she has always been connected with Knox, Harlan, Laurel, &c., in the same judicial district, and the intercourse and associations of her population is with the others named, and she will most probably, hereafter be placed in the same circuit court district, and it is the most convenient for the whole of one circuit to be in the same appellate district, and if the court of appeals should be required to sit in each district, the circuit should all be in the same district. The voting population in this district is 36,451, and the number of counties is twenty-nine, and number of members twenty-six.

The following table comprises the second district:

Counties.	Voters.	Members.
Pendleton, - - -	1,210	1

This district has a population of 34,837; has twenty seven counties, and will be entitled to twenty four representatives.

Now I will enquire if gentlemen can lay off the state more equally for representation, having regard to the court of appeals and circuit court districts as they will most likely be, at the same time, and keeping the circuit district as near as may be in the same appellate district? Perhaps the circuit court district may have to be divided sometimes, as it is hardly to be expected it can remain undivided in every instance; but generally it can be done.

Gentlemen will see that though I carry residuums on some occasions, yet they are carried fairly, and never taken from a county in one district and carried to a county in another.

If Pike and Johnson join, then they will compose one representative district, and Floyd will have a member herself. If, however, Pike and Johnson do not join, then Pike and Floyd must compose one district, Johnson and Lawrence another, and Carter will get the member. Now whether Floyd or Carter shall have a member, politically speaking, the result is the same, as the political majority in each county is on the same side. It will be seen that Lawrence in 1848 had forty eight voters more than Carter, and five less than Floyd. Why then not let her have the member? The answer is, because of her locality. If a member be given to her then what county will Johnson be attached to, if Pike be not contiguous? There is none but Morgan, which has two or three hundred more than Lawrence. Politically it would suit me for Lawrence to have the member, but viewing the whole ground aright she is not entitled to it. And why is it that Morgan, which lies broadside of Carter, should get a member? Because, although Carter needs to draw residuums of over 500, yet Morgan is the largest of the small counties in the same neighborhood, and north of Kentucky river, and can draw residuums from the counties near. Estill can do the same. So also the counties of Owsley and Breathitt, and thus the principle will go on. Let these several counties draw residuums from other counties, neighboring counties in the same district; for instance from Harrison, Nicholas, Bath, Bourbon, Clarke, &c., which will have considerable residuums to spare, and which Morgan, Carter, Estill, &c., are entitled to take. My object is to cast all residuums throughout the whole district, and thus to equalize the representation as near as I can, and always keeping the same principle in view. Having thus disposed of all the counties in one district, I go to another, carrying out the same principle throughout the whole state.

Further to illustrate my principle, I will take the counties of Calloway, Marshall and Livingston—the two former counties once composed one county, and since the division, have been united in sending a representative, whilst Livingston, which is separated from Marshall by the Tennessee river has heretofore had a member alone, but as she has a smaller number of votes than Calloway, I give the latter county a member and unite Marshall and Livingston for another. The same principle I have applied in giving a separate member to Rockcastle, which has but a little over eight hundred votes. She is larger than Laurel or Clay, and hence the latter two are united for one member, and Rockcastle alone for another. Crittenden, although having a small number of votes more than Livingston is given a separate member. The county of Hancock has always presented difficulties in apportioning representation, and in consequence of her contiguity to Daviess and Breckinridge, which have large residuums and the other adjacent counties not requiring those residuums, they are thrown together and given to Hancock.

In making out this table I had special reference to the circuit court districts and appellate districts as they will most likely be formed, and if the judicial or representative districts can be laid off more fairly, impartially, equally and uniformly than I have presented, then I hope to see it done.

In this way the whole people will be fairly represented, and almost to a positive certainty, the very same party that has a majority in one county which has a residuum will have that resi-duum carried over to a county of the same politics, and thus all these residuums will be represented.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the gentleman please state how many counties under his arrangement, having less than the ratio, will be represented; and how many counties having less, will be divided between the two parties.

Mr. APPERSON. I do not know exactly, but all will be able to see it from the tables, which I flatter myself is made out most impartially. By a hasty glance, however, I find that the whigs will have members most likely without a full ratio, as follows: Fleming, Estill, Madison, Rockcastle, Whitley, Knox, Fayette, Jessamine, Boyle, Shelby, Woodford, Hardin, Meade, Grayson, Todd, Hancock and Montgomery—one in each, making eighteen representatives.

The democrats will have most probably one in each of the following counties, which are under the ratio, viz: Carter, Morgan, Breathitt, Pendleton, Campbell, Trimble, Oldham, Grant, Anderson, Spencer, Pulaski, Bullitt, Monroe, Hart, Green, Union, Allen, Simpson, Trigg, Calloway, Crittenden and Fulton, &c., making twenty two members.

If gentlemen will examine my tables, I think they will say that they could not have laid off these districts more compactly than they are laid off. In politics the first district would gain two to the party differing with me, and perhaps three. In my list I have stated what each one should have, and I think those who differ with me in politics will say that I have given to each what they are equitably entitled to. Larue has a member, though she lacks nearly five hundred of the full number. Boyle has one and lacks nearly three hundred. Grant lacks nearly four hundred and yet will have one. Fayette will lack about two hundred and fifty, Oldham will lack nearly four hundred, Trimble will lack more than four hundred and Pendleton a little less than two hundred, and they all get one.

Now I think there have been some matters brought in in regard to the election of senators, that should not be taken as arguments, so far as senators in the general assembly are concerned. I hear it said that every state has two senators in the senate of the United States; but it should be remembered that every state is a sovereignty, and the senators in congress represent sovereignties. It is not so with our counties, they are not sovereignties, but are parts of the one sovereignty. We have heard something said about the apportionment in Virginia, and it is said they have nineteen districts east and thirteen west of the Blue Ridge. That is but a poor criterion to govern us, for I understand that Virginia was originally represented, not by voters but by territory, each county large or small in territory or in population being entitled to two representatives, and each borough one. That plan of representation was borrowed from England. But when they formed their new constitution, did they give up this notion? Not entirely, but they adopt a mixed system. If you will ascertain the number of voters east and west of the Blue Ridge in Virginia, you will find that they were nearly equally divided; but there was a numerous and valuable negro population in the east, which the convention determined should be represented. So far as Virginia is concerned, I do not think that her example should have the least influence on our action. The gentleman from Franklin the other day said that representation should be a mixed question with us, that we should look at the population and the territory, in apportioning representation.

I learn from the history of Kentucky that the late George Nicholas, one of the wisest and best of men, in a speech in the convention which formed the first constitution for Kentucky, in 1791, denounced the doctrine of representation of territory, and insisted that population exclusively be the basis of representation. We have heard the amusing story relating to the subject of a property qualification, as told by Doctor Franklin. A certain man living in a state where a given amount of property was required to entitle one to vote, owned a donkey of the prescribed value to entitle him to exercise the right of suffrage. It happened that the donkey died, and the man was disfranchised thereby. The Doctor enquired whether it was the man or the donkey that had previously voted.

I understand that it is not property nor territory, but white population on which representation should be based. If territory should be considered, then why not property, and thus the indigent and virtuous laborer might be cut off. I want representation to be governed by voting population as near as it can be done—it is true it cannot be done exactly, because the counties have not exactly the same amount of population.

If we start off with a determination to do even handed justice to all, if we intend that this representation shall be as near equal and uniform as we can make it, let us not say to a man residing in a city and engaged in commerce or manufactures you shall not have the same voice as the agriculturalist. The people represented by me are an agricultural people, who demand every privilege to which they are entitled. Does the agriculturalist require at our hands that in consequence of his calling he should have greater rights than others? I believe not. I thought the creed of the party with whom I act, maintain that we should foster manufactures and sustain them with agriculture, whilst the other party have most especially advocated commerce. I have been under the impression that we had all agreed there should be no difference between the merchant, the manufacturer, and the agriculturalist, so far as political rights are concerned. They are all equally necessary in every community. Let me inquire how it is when you approach any large commercial town that the land of the agriculturalist is greatly enhanced in value? Is it not because he has a market near his door? If you remove that market from him, will his land be as valuable? Is he not benefitted as well as the merchant and manufacturer? It seems to me he is; and how we can, consistently with justice and fairness, make any distinction between the agriculturalist, the man of commerce, and the manufacturer, in permitting one class to vote and another not, I cannot see.

Now, I have heard it said that the city of Louisville, in consequence of the representation which she has had, and must have in the legislature, will hereafter control the action of the legislature to a very great extent. I am not sure she has not controlled it to some extent. But if you look at the lists of ayes and noes of the members from the northern counties, or from the Green river counties, you will find them about as united as those from Louisville. I know there are individuals in the cities and large towns who do undertake to interfere with legislation. I saw it last winter on the part of gentlemen connected with banks, who were here doing all they could to prevent those additional banking facilities from being afforded, which had been asked for. One gentleman in high office in bank, wrote to a member of the legislature, if you shall charter another bank, I will have the circulation in the bank with which I am connected curtailed to the extent of the capital of the new bank—such threats should be treated with merited contempt. Although this great bank influence was brought to bear upon the representatives from Louisville last winter, yet they believed that additional banking facilities were needed, disregarded all such threats and acted in accordance with their own judgments of propriety. I do not see how it is we can consistently make a distinction between voters in different sections; and if Jefferson county is entitled to five or six representatives, let her have them. And if there be a residuum, let it go somewhere else.

With regard to the proposition of the gentleman from Christian, it may be right, or not. I have thought but little about it; but with a view to make representation equal, it seems to me there is but one road to travel. At a proper time, I propose to offer the tables which I have read, as a substitute for the sixth section of the report now under consideration.

Mr. BOYD. I am not a talking man, and I do not therefore know whether it will be in my power to make clear to every gentleman's understanding the object I have in view in presenting this proposition. The great complaint I have heard against the present mode of apportioning the state, has been that residuums have been rolled out from the section of country where they occurred and settled down on some other. My object in presenting the plan which I did, was to prevent that, and I believe that under it every section, every twelfth of the state would have secured to it its share of representation. And if the gentleman would take the map of the state, he would find that the two first districts, the location of which he has complained, was on congenial grounds, run very near across the state, from the state line to the Ohio river. I am not wedded to my plan, and shall be willing to go for the one which is most convenient, just and proper. I had nothing more in view; and I declare to this committee that I did not examine as to the political bearing of a single county, when I undertook to lay off these districts. My object was to make them as compact as possible, and so that each particular section of the state would have its full weight in the legislature. I will not be so uncharitable to my friend from Montgomery as he was to me. In his plan for apportioning the appellate districts, if I recollect right, it seems to me he places Mt. Sterling just about the centre of a district. I will not be so uncharitable as to charge the gentleman with figuring this out to suit himself, for I presume it is all right; but I desire to repel the charge he made that my plan was proposed with a view of affecting the strength of the political parties in this state. That was not my object at all. I have no objection to sustaining any plan that the gentleman or any other may offer, if he shall convince me that it is the better plan.

The PRESIDENT. I have not designed, and could not in my present state of health, if so disposed, make a speech. The gentleman from Madison has spoken of the act of '33, and my vote of a previous period. I was in the legislature when the act of '33 passed, as well as the preceding year. The question as to the importation of slaves had been agitated in the senate for several years, and in 1832 I believe was the first time they passed a law on the subject, and sent it to the house of representatives. It was there referred to the committee on the courts of justice, of which I then had the honor to be chairman. If I recollect right, this act to which he refers was reported to that committee in lieu of the senate's bill, and it failed in that house. It is to this effect:

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That none shall be slaves, except such as shall be slaves within this commonwealth on the first day of June next, and the descendants of the females of them, and such slaves as shall thereafter be lawfully imported into this commonwealth, and the descendants of the females of them.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That from and after the said first day of June, it shall not be lawful for any person, or persons, to import into this commonwealth any slave or slaves, except emigrants to the state bringing their slaves with them, for their own use, and not for merchandise; and citizens of this state claiming slaves in another state, by devise, descent, or marriage; in all which cases it shall be lawful for any such persons to import such slaves for their own use, and not as merchandise.

"Sec. 3. All laws now in force, prohibiting the importation of slaves into this commonwealth, shall be and the same are hereby repealed, from and after the said first day of June: Provided, That the provisions of this bill shall not apply to persons transiently passing through the commonwealth with slaves, on their way to any other state or country: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to prevent persons emigrating to this state, and settling permanently in it, from selling their slaves."

There was prior to that time a good deal of agitation, with the object of putting an end to the slave trade from other states to this. Whether rightfully or wrongfully, I was in favor of a prohibition of that trade—the prejudices against which those who were in favor of destroying the institution itself, were using as a lever by which to agitate the public mind on that subject; and intending to vote for a law which would have the effect of executing itself, I voted for that act. It was, however, as the vote will show, rejected. The next year, the act of 1833 as it is called was passed, and under the same feelings which had induced me to vote for the other bill, I voted for this act. The other act was rejected, on the suggestion that as the effect would be to set free all negroes who came into this state, it would be an inducement for those in other states, who desired to get rid of vicious and aged negroes, to bring them into this state, where, by the operation of our laws they would at once become free, and we obliged to provide for them. I, with others, yielded to that view, and the result was the passage of the law of 1833. For seven or eight years, after the passage of that act, the agitation of the subject was quieted, and we were at peace. Then commenced an agitation on the part of those who desired to introduce slaves, and that agitation, in my judgment, had quite as deleterious an effect on the interests of the slaveholder, as did the agitation which the law of 1833 had quieted. Now, I believe that no law should exist on the statute book that does not give peace and quiet to the community. A bare majority should not hold on the statute book a law that dissatisfies and renders discontented a large and highly respectable minority; and it is better for the peace of community that it should be withdrawn. I have said on a former occasion, that I am for leaving the present constitution on the subject of slavery, with a single exception, where we found it. I will not go over that ground or into this argument again. I came here, if pledged at all on any subject to my constituents, pledged to the course I have indicated on this slavery question.

The position of Louisville on this subject of representation is rather an unfortunate one. The gentleman from Madison, who is for putting the act of 1833 in the constitution, or rather the proposed act of 1832 in the constitution, votes to restrict Louisville because we are likely to go for emancipation. The gentleman from Simpson, and some others, will not vote to give Louisville her fair representation, because we stand upon the old constitution, and do not enter into his peculiar notions of the citizen's right of buying these negroes at will and pleasure. We are still more unfortunate. Louisville, more than any other point in Kentucky, aggregates a large proportion of those who flee from oppression in the old world, and seek an asylum and liberty in this; and the gentleman from Bourbon would restrict our representation, because they found it to be their interest to locate there, to a greater extent, than any other portion of the state, and he deeming them unworthy to have a voice in this government. Now, between those in favor of the act of 1833, and those in favor of a full and free trade in negroes for their own use, and those who desire to deny to these foreigners who are naturalized here under the laws of the United States the rights of citizenship—and all these interests we have but a—I will not say, fair chance. But we appeal to that sense of justice and right, which I trust characterizes this convention, not to deny us our legitimate and equal voice in the representation of the state. We have not the liberty the old thirteen states had when the federal compact was formed. It is not given to us to accept or reject this constitution. We cannot keep out of this commonwealth because we shall be denied equal rights and privileges. We are bound to be a part of the commonwealth of Kentucky, and if we do not come in on equal terms we shall be obliged to come in on unequal terms.

The gentleman says we have our local governments. So has every town in this commonwealth, and so has every county, for it is the beauty of our system that we govern ourselves in our towns, cities and counties by the voice of a free people, equally represented in the legislative halls of the country. The same laws, the same provisions, are given to towns and counties as their situation demands; and the further additional legislation, if you will, to cities where a greater number of individuals congregate, and where it requires more vigilance in the officers, and more stringent rules to maintain the administration of the laws predominant, by applying them correctly, certainly, and efficiently, to those who offend. But it all flows from the policy, the justice, and the wisdom of the representatives of the people, in applying a set of laws to each section, county, town, or city, that its necessities require.

Gentlemen apprehend danger that the voice of the cities will control the voice of the country. I will not go into the arguments which gentlemen have offered; they have been met by others and met fully. I maintain that under our system of laws and government, the country has as little to fear from the freemen of the city controlling in the legislature, as the cities have to fear from the voice of the people of the country controlling in the legislature. If the cities are in a majority, and by their numbers are entitled to it—why if it was a government of force they would have it. If the country is in a majority and this was a government of force, they would have it. If it is a government of equal rights and equal laws, blessed with equal and fair representation, why the control will be with the majority wherever it is, and no where else can it be vested. When I was up on a former occasion, I examined this subject with care, and some think with boldness, and that I pushed my arguments further than I should have done. I will not go back upon it. If no man can apply conscientiously, anything I said, to his own bosom and heart in relation to this thing, then I will not apply it to him. It is true I thanked God that emancipation had shed no blood in Louisville or in the river counties, and I still thank God that was the case. It does not follow however, that I thanked God it shed blood elsewhere. That is as far from my feelings as any man in this convention, and if any man here felt more for the gentleman from Madison than I felt on that occasion, I do not know him. But when he is seeking here on account of emancipation to stifle the voice of my constituents, I thought he should look at home, and I used the bold language calculated to bring him to reflect on the subject. If any protection of the country from the emancipation feeling is desired, let gentlemen march up to it, and put a test article in the constitution, and allow no man to vote who is in favor of emancipation. That will secure the slaveholders, beyond the possibility of a doubt, from all that are here now in our state, and all who shall come hereafter, whether fleeing from oppression in a foreign land, or from Yankeedom, or from wherever it may choose them to come. It is a restriction, and gentlemen will not and they ought not put it into the constitution. Yet the effect of the proposition here is to deny the city and country are equals, and in truth to put such a proposition in the constitution. I ask the gentleman from Madison, why not put this test in the constitution and apply it to his constituents. There are, according to the best estimate, I have been able to make, some three thousand naturalized citizens in the commonwealth of Kentucky, who are entitled to vote. I have lived now near thirty years in Louisville, where more of these naturalized citizens are congregated than any where else, and during all of that time, we have never had one of them in the legislature of the state to my knowledge. Nor do I recollect that one has ever come from the country. They are sensible, industrious, frugal, economical people, and they do, more generally than any other people in this commonwealth, attend to the eleventh commandment—that is, to mind their own business and not interfere with that of others. There are occasionally among that class bad men, as there will be in all classes; and therefore if you apply a rule that is to exclude bad men, apply it to all classes. If congress was to repeal the naturalization laws, we are content, for we do not want anybody to vote who is not a citizen of the United States, and who has not resided the proper time among us. For myself, I am not willing that any man shall be a citizen of this commonwealth, and not be entitled to all of the privileges of citizenship. I do not want to see a class here who shall be less than citizens to raise up citizens and poison their minds against the government under which they live, for denying them the rights which they give to others. I do not desire to look forward to a period in this government when there shall be a large class of citizens who feel no interest in the operations of the institutions of the country. Let them, after they have remained a sufficient length of time, become citizens and take their places as such, and feel that they are freemen as we are. Gentlemen may entertain their own views on this subject, but surely we are not going to change the constitution of Kentucky because we have three thousand naturalized citizens among us. Surely they are not going to adopt a principle that is to deny to free born American citizens, and the descendants of those who bled in the battles that won our liberties, equality of representation with his fellow citizens. And yet in seeking to exclude the foreigner from this privilege, they will inevitably exclude also the native citizen. But I am admonished by the soreness of my breast to bring my remarks to a close.

The amendment proposed by Mr. CLARKE was then read.

Mr. TAYLOR. I desire to separate the white from the black in this matter, and I move to strike out so much of the proposition as refers to the importation of slaves.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. I should be very much gratified if the gentleman, instead of moving to strike out, had asked for a division of the question, so that the house might vote directly on each of the propositions of the gentleman from Simpson. I make the suggestion because I am convinced that the votes of some gentlemen upon the latter part of the proposition will be governed, in some measure, by the decision of the convention upon the first branch.

Mr. CLARKE. It is my object, as well as that of others on this floor, to have a vote taken on this proposition by ayes and nays. I therefore request the gentleman who moved to strike out to withdraw his motion, until I make another. This is, that the committee rise and report the bill to the house, where I can call the ayes and nays. There he can renew the motion he has made, and I thank him for it, as I desire to have this question tested.

Mr. TAYLOR assented to the withdrawal of his motion to strike out.

Mr. TRIPLETT. Does the chair consider my proposition before the house, in such a shape as to get a vote upon it.

The CHAIR did not consider it as having been formally offered at all, but said that it was in order for the gentleman to do so now.

Mr. TRIPLETT. Then I offer it now.

There was some conversation as to whether the course suggested by Mr. Clarke would be strictly parliamentary, when

Mr. CLARKE withdrew his motion that the committee rise and report.

Mr. TAYLOR then renewed his motion to strike out the last clause of the proposition, as before indicated by him.

The question being then taken, the motion to strike out was rejected, a count being had, ayes 34, nays 35.

The question was then on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL asked for a division of the question.

The CHAIR stated the question to be on striking out the section as reported by the committee, and inserting in lieu thereof the amendment of Mr. Clarke. A division being asked, the question would be first taken on striking out.

Mr. DAVIS. The original section is then open for any amendment that may be offered.

The CHAIR. Yes sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I then offer to amend the section as follows: "Provided further, That no county or city shall ever be entitled to more than one senator."

There was some conversation as to which question was prior in order, whether on the amendment of Mr. Triplett or that of Mr. Davis, when the latter gentleman withdrew his amendment.

The question was then on the amendment offered by Mr. Triplett.

Mr. LINDSEY suggested that the numbers should be left blank.

Mr. TRIPLETT assented to that suggestion, and his proposition was so amended.

It was then rejected, a count being had, ayes 34, nays 39.

Mr. MORRIS then renewed his amendment, to strike out all after the word "provided" in the seventh section, and to insert the following:

tative, such city, or town, shall be divided by wards, which are contiguous, into representative districts, as nearly equal as may be, equal to the number of representatives to which such city, or town, may be entitled, and one representative shall be elected from each district. In like manner shall said city, or town, be divided into senatorial districts, when, by apportionment, more than one senator shall be allotted to such city, or town, and a senator shall be elected from each senatorial district; but no ward or municipal division, shall be divided by such division of senatorial or representative district."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I rise to suggest to the mover of that proposition, a modification of it, and I do so, I must confess, with some degree of solicitude that he will assent to it. I do so to obviate an objection which has not been suggested in debate, but in conversation, striking at what, I know from the honorable mover of that proposition, was not one of the purposes he had in view to attain. And certainly, in expressing my determination to vote for it when first presented, I had no object or view such as has been understood. It is a fact well known to this house, that the city of Louisville now, so far as questions of national policy are concerned, stands whig with a majority of some six or seven hundred votes. The majority of this house is upon the side of the democratic division in the nation, and it has been urged that this proposition, if it succeeds, in applying to the city of Louisville, under its present numerical representation, or under that of the next census, will have the effect to destroy the political strength of that city, as it has been divided upon the questions to which I have alluded. It is said that if we divide the city into some three or four districts, the result may be the choice, in some of them, of representatives differing from what would be the sentiment of a majority of the city. I do not wish, favorable as I am to this amendment, and acting with that majority to which I have referred in this house, to be subjected to the charge, while I am endeavoring to support a proposition to modify the section that will prevent these difficulties we have been discussing, that I am governed or influenced by a desire to strike down the political majority in that city. That is not the position I occupy. I ask the mover of the proposition so to modify it, that when the representation of the city in the lower branch shall be four, it shall be divided into two election districts, giving to the people, as in Nelson county and elsewhere, the right to vote for two representatives. And when the number shall exceed four, then apply the principle of establishing another district. Again, as is well known, in the election of delegates from that city, national politics were not brought into the question, or at least the sentiment of the delegates returned here stand two to one, and it may be supposed, unless the proposition is amended as I suggest, that it was offered in furtherance of the desire of one of those delegates. So far as I am able to speak on the subject, I take it for granted that that gentleman was taken as much by surprise by that amendment, as any gentleman in this house.

The PRESIDENT. It is true that I knew nothing of the proposed amendment now offered. My desire is, so far as I am concerned, that the representation of Louisville should stand precisely as it did before. I do not wish or desire myself, to make any change. I will state that according to the present division of the wards in Louisville, there would have to be three districts in order to give the democratic party a representative, if the people vote according to their present political sentiments. If the city should be entitled to two senators, their location in two districts would not change the political sentiments of the delegation. The wards now, are divided at fourth street, four above and four below, with a population in both, very nearly equal. If the population should increase in each in the same proportion, and each would probably preserve its present political sentiments. The two upper wards are democratic, and the two next whig, but stronger in proportion than the others. I am certainly willing that gentlemen should take any measure that they may deem safe for the interests of the state, as regards the arrangement of the representation of the city, but I should be placed in an awkward situation if this proposition was to pass. I did not come here from either party, and I wish not to lie under imputation of being actuated by any party motives. I had retired from politics because I would no longer struggle to represent those with whom I differed. I only consented to make this race, and stand here as a delegate, at the request of those who desired that Louisville should stand right on a question that was agitating the state.

Mr. MORRIS. It certainly could not be more foreign to the disposition of any gentleman on this floor, to introduce in the house a proposition which would array against each other, the two parties in this house, or in the state, than to myself. I occupy a peculiar position, one quite as peculiar as the gentleman who represents Louisville. I mean the democratic gentleman. I, like him, represent a whig constituency, and when I introduced that compromise amendment, for so I intended it, I had not the remotest idea that it would strike this house as a party move, nor even the slightest intimation of the fact that it did so, until yesterday, when I saw a short letter in the Louisville Journal, intimating that it would secure the election of a democratic member in that city. I did state, in the remarks I submitted on offering the proposition, that in all probability the city of Louisville would stand divided, and I stated that in order that the position which I assumed might be strengthened before this house, I thought if I could prove to this house, that if these great interests of Louisville, which were to overshadow the whole country, could be divided on great questions against itself, that it would strengthen the proposition I made. Certainly I never have been placed in a more embarrassing situation. If we were here to be driven to a strict party vote on any question, I really do not know on which side I should vote. I came here to represent neither of the great parties. I came here like some other gentlemen, to advocate certain propositions which I believe right, independent of all parties. As to the amendment of my friend from Nelson, I think it would be defeating the proposition itself, and be throwing embarrassments in the way of its passage. If my proposition was to secure the election of three whigs instead of one democrat, I should have made it here. I think we stand here above all party. I made the proposition for the purpose of breaking that vast influence of Louisville that some gentlemen seem to fear. Perhaps after further deliberation, I may agree to accept the proposition of my friend from Nelson, but as I now feel some disinclination so to do, and should like to consult with my friends on the subject, I now move that the committee rise, and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. IRWIN moved a recess, this was not concurred in, and then the committee rose and reported progress and had leave to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17th, 1849.

Prayer by Rev. STUART ROBERTSON.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. BARLOW offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That on Monday next, and every day thereafter, the convention will take a recess and hold an evening session, to commence at 3 o'clock.

After a brief conversation on its propriety, the yeas and nays were called, and on being taken, were—yeas 57, nays 17.

So the resolution was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE REPRESENTATION.

Mr. GARFIELDE offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the house of representatives shall, at all times, consist of as many members as there may be counties in the state, and each county shall be entitled to a separate representative. The state shall be divided into senatorial districts, in each of which, one senator shall be elected by the qualified voters thereof: Provided, That each representative and each senator shall be entitled to one vote for every one hundred electors in his county or district.

As I am a young member in this body, I feel a delicacy in offering a resolution which runs counter to the report of any of its committees, but upon reading the report of the committee on the legislative department, I found that, like all the works of man, it was defective. I think it will be conceded that the resolution which I have offered, has at least three merits. First, that it deprives the legislature of the power of taking any action upon the question of apportioning the representatives. In the second place, it metes out justice to every county and citizen of the commonwealth; and lastly, it gives to every municipality its own separate and independent representative.

Wherein has the difficulty existed heretofore in apportioning the representation of this state? It has been in the fact that you were compelled to give the legislature a power which might be used for party purposes. This is a serious and crying evil. Here is a county with two thousand qualified voters—five hundred more than is sufficient to entitle it to a representative. This surplus is transferred to a county, perhaps fifty miles distant, to supply its deficiency; to one also whose political sentiments and local interests may be directly opposite to the sentiments and interests of the residuum thus transferred.

Under such circumstances, are these five hundred voters represented at all? Do they exert any influence in the legislature, politically or otherwise? I apprehend not. So far as their power, influence or interests are concerned, they might as well be disfranchised.

This resolution, and this alone, lays down a basis by which the political sentiments, local interests, and wishes of every county in the state, and of every voter in the county may, and will be, fully represented. Where is the county which, unless it has its share, or more than its share of representation, is not complaining continually of the injustice done to it? Is there not a feeling of universal discontent throughout the body politic in relation to this question of apportionment? There is sir. The resolution which I have submitted, proposes a plan which will operate justly and equally upon all in this respect.

It proposes that each county shall send its own representative, who shall be entitled to one vote for every one hundred qualified electors in his county. Thus, if a county has two thousand voters, its representative in the legislature shall cast twenty votes for or against any bill which may come up for decision. If a county has two thousand five hundred voters, its representative shall cast twenty five votes. If it has one thousand, then ten will be his number of votes, and so on for any possible number which the county may contain. Does not this mete out equal justice to the whole community? Does it not do so more fully and perfectly than any system which has been presented to this convention? I think it does, sir. The entire body of the people will thus be fairly represented. It gives to every freeman a voice in the councils of the state. It does not make property or territory the basis of representation, but men, thinking, reasoning, intelligent men. And it gives every such man who is a citizen of the state the means of being heard, and the power of acting through his representative in the legislature. I ask gentlemen to point out wherein a system of this character can possibly work injustice to any portion of the community.

But, sir, let us notice the plan of apportionment now in operation. The county of Bourbon, with some nineteen hundred voters, sends two representatives to the legislature, while the county of Campbell, with two thousand four hundred, sends but one. The county of Casey, with about one thousand voters, sends one member; while the county of Hardin, with two thousand four hundred, sends two. Cases of this kind might be multiplied, but it is unnecessary. Where is the reason or justice of an apportionment of this kind?

But it is argued that the report of the legislative committee obviates this great difficulty by taking the power from the legislature to work these great political enormities. Let us notice, for a moment, the workings of the system proposed in that report. The county of Larue, with one thousand voters, being two thirds of the ratio, gets one representative, while the county of Harrison, with two thousand two hundred voters, not having one ratio and two thirds, gets but one. Here, by a course of political reasoning, wholly unintelligible to me, it is supposed that the seven hundred surplus in Harrison, is taken to Larue to supply the deficiency there, and that by this means this seven hundred surplus is fairly represented by the member from Larue. To my mind, sir, this is nothing more nor less than a political sophism, based upon the supposed necessity of the case. This seven hundred surplus is not, in reality, represented at all, or if represented, it is by a member in the selection of whom they had no voice, and who feels no identity of interest with them.

Again, the report provides that a county having two thirds of the ratio shall be entitled to one representative, and that the ratio and two thirds over shall be required to give two. How will this work?

Thirteen counties can be selected which will have about 13,800 voters, and they will be entitled to thirteen representatives, while thirteen other counties with 26,500 voters will be entitled to but thirteen. Now sir, where shall the first thirteen counties supply their deficiency of 6,000 voters, and what shall the last thirteen do with their 7,000 surplus? Sir, in truth you create 6,000 imaginary men for the benefit of the small counties and you politically kill 7,000 in the large counties. You never can give to each county its exact representation in your legislative halls by this method of apportionment.

But there is another consideration in favor of the plan contained in my resolution. It gives to each county its independent representation. Each county sends its member whether it has its 500 or 2,500 voters, whether 750 or 3,000. Each county, to a certain extent, constitutes a separate and independent municipality. Take any two adjoining counties and notice what difference of feeling, what prejudices, likes and dislikes exist. There is an imaginary line dividing two counties. On one side the people congregate at one point to transact their business, to attend their courts, &c., on the other side of this line they go to another point for the same purposes. Each county has an identity of interest peculiar to itself, and desires to have its own representation in the councils of the state.

According to the report of the committee we shall, in many cases, have to throw two or three counties together in order to entitle them to a representative. By this act their identity is destroyed; besides the larger counties overrule and trample upon the rights of the smaller ones. The feelings, wishes, and interests of the county in which the member lives are attended to, to the neglect of the others attached to it. If a question arises wherein the interests of the two counties are antagonistic, the member's own county receives the preference. These things engender jealousy, ill-will, and hatred.

Again, other counties in the state will be entitled to two or more representatives. It frequently happens, where two are elected from the same county, that a person is elected who is the choice of neither party, by voters throwing one of their votes for him. Thus the interests and wishes of the people are represented by a man who is not their choice by the occurrence of this circumstance, which is known to happen frequently. All these difficulties are obviated by the plan proposed in my resolution. The largest county in the state will have but one representative, whose power will be equal to the number of electors in his county, and the smallest county will have one member also.

There may be some objections urged against my proposition which it may be well to anticipate. It may be said that it will be difficult to carry this plan into operation in the legislature; that there may be a difficulty in taking the votes where members have an unequal number. There is, however, in reality no difficulty at all. I have consulted the secretary of this convention, who has discharged the duties of clerk of the house of representatives with great credit for several years, and find that his views of this matter coincide with mine. He assured me that the vote can be taken almost as speedily as it can be under the present plan. But suppose it should take five minutes longer, should that weigh in the scale against the rights of the people which are so much more equally secured? Under the present plan it takes about three weeks every four years for the legislature to apportion the state. This time being saved would amply compensate for the extra time consumed in voting.

The question may be asked, how will you decide a vote when the yeas and nays are not called? The answer is simple. In every such case each member has an equal vote. This works no injustice, for if any member is dissatisfied with the result, he can call for the yeas and nays. It may be suggested that this plan throws too much power into the hands of an individual where he represents the interests of twenty five hundred constituents, and consequently has twenty five votes in his hands. It gives him but his just proportion. There is no danger here unless we admit that representatives are susceptible of being easily corrupted; that they may be swayed from the path of duty by bribery and corruption. If this doctrine be affirmed, then we had better increase our representation largely, as the extra cost would not weigh in the scale against general security.

Again it may be argued that new counties will be formed, and by this means the legislature may be increased to too large a size. This plan of apportionment will act as a check upon the legislature to prevent them from forming new counties. No representative will dare to curtail the power of his county by cutting off a part of it except upon the most pressing necessity. Thus it will act as a cement to bind the various parts of a county together.

The present plan of apportionment has been a prolific source of evil in this respect. A county having two thousand voters could send but one member although it had five hundred spare voters. This made the people willing to have this five hundred stricken off and attached to other fractions to form a new county. The division of the county has not affected its political power.

Give this county a representative empowered to cast a vote for every one hundred voters in his county and the difficulty is obviated. That county will not suffer itself to be divided. An adhesive principle is at once applied which will bind all the parts of the county together.

With these hasty remarks and imperfect views, I desire the resolution printed and referred to the committee of the whole, believing that committee will give it whatever consideration its merits deserve.

It was referred to the committee of the whole and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARGIS offered the following resolution: Provided, That no city or town shall ever be entitled to more than two senators, until her population increase to 300,000, after which such city may have three senators, and no more: Provided, That in the house of representatives, representation shall always be in proportion to the number of qualified voters in such city or town.

In relation to the important question of representation, he believed it should be based on population, but still he contended that there is a difference between population, when crowded into cities, and when diffused over the country. The states which have amended their constitutions within the last eight or ten years, have nearly all restricted their cities. It may not have been done in the state of New York, as gentlemen have suggested, inasmuch as there is less danger of the undue influence of cities in large states, than in those which are smaller. But the state of Maryland has given the city of Baltimore no greater representation than each of the counties of the state. Virginia, and Pennsylvania have adopted the principle of restriction. The city of Philadelphia is limited to four senators, and the number is not to be increased. The state of Louisiana has limited the representation of the city of New Orleans to four, although according to her present population, she would be entitled to six. In short, if there is a rule well established in the United States, it is that cities should be restricted, and why should it not be enforced in Kentucky? Louisville, and the county of Jefferson have now here, five delegates, and if that city continues to increase, as she has increased, in fifty years she would be entitled to five or six senators. It has been contended that in this there is no danger to be apprehended, but that, if the restriction should be enforced, whenever the cities on the Ohio river become sufficiently powerful, they will arise and avenge their wrongs. Read the history of the oriental nations, and what do we learn? That cities grow up and become proud of their numbers, and that the more they have, the more they want. For himself, he had no objection if these cities should grow up and rival in population and power the ancient cities of Ninevah and Babylon, and that each city should be able to send out of her hundred gates, ten thousand fighting men in arms, but he would take care to impose such a restriction on this power and greatness as would prevent any disadvantage therefrom to the other portion of the state.

What had Louisville already received? She has a chancery court, with a salary for her chancellor of $2,000. Her circuit judge receives more than the circuit judges in other portions of the state, and she receives a larger share of the school fund. He thought there was great danger to be apprehended from the influence she might exercise arising from the consolidation of wealth and numbers; and the completion of railroads to terminate there, would serve to increase it.

Much had been said upon the question of slavery. The gentlemen who were here voting against any restriction on the city of Louisville were those who were in favor of the introduction of the law of 1833. To that law he stood as an opponent. He believed that slavery was sanctioned by the bible; but he did not believe that the question of slavery and the restriction of cities had any necessary connection.

He repeated the remark that the population of a city can be represented by a smaller number of representatives than the county whose inhabitants are spread over a larger surface. He then returned to the law of 1833, and said he believed it would never have been passed if there had been a fair vote taken on the subject throughout the state. He reiterated the statement, that the restrictions of cities and the question of slavery had no necessary connection, but he added, he would not say that the question in regard to foreigners had nothing to do with it, for they were coming over here in thousands, dropping amongst us like black birds or wild geese, who were here to day and gone to-morrow. He regretted to hear the Mexican war mentioned in this convention. Kentucky did her duty in that war, and it should have no influence here in promoting the interest of Louisville alone. He came here with no other view than to make a good constitution. He believed that every man here had a desire to promote the best interests of his country, but it was unreasonable to expect that they could all agree upon any one proposition. Our government was originally based on mutual concessions and compromise, and we must concede also. He expected to yield much of his opinions and prejudices, and he could in the end say that what had been done by the majority was right.

He had before said that large cities when they have much, want more. Louisville and Jefferson county have five delegates here, at this time, and he was willing to deal liberally with her; but some restriction on large cities where population is increased by immigration from foreign countries may be found to be necessary. He desired a representation based on a permanent and not on a floating population.

The restriction of cities might not be of much importance now, but one hundred years hence it might be of great importance. He expressed a great desire that his opinions should be published to the world, and he contemplated with great satisfaction, a harmonious termination of the labors of this convention. He spoke at very great length and very earnestly.

The PRESIDENT rose and asked whether the gentleman thought it necessary to consume the time of the convention by repeating his proposition and arguments twenty times over.

Mr. HARGIS said, he had expected to be called to order, and as he had nearly done he would sit down.

The resolution was rejected.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, on the report of the committee on the legislative department, Mr. MERIWETHER in the chair.

The pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from Christian, (Mr. Morris.)

Mr. DIXON offered the following as a substitute for the pending amendment:

"And provided, that whenever any town or city shall become entitled to two or more representatives in either branch of the legislature, the legislature shall have power to divide such town or city into as many election districts as there may be members to elect, in each of which districts an election shall be held, for the election of the number to which such district may be entitled."

Mr. DIXON. When my honorable friend from Christian submitted his resolution, I announced to the committee that I endorsed the principles contained in it. I still endorse the principle, as applicable to the state of the case which I understand the resolution was intended to meet. Nor is it my intention, in offering the amendment to the amendment proposed by my friend from Christian, to depart from the principle contained in his amendment, to which I have given my sanction. The principle of unity of representation in counties seems to have been recognized in the old constitution, and in the report of the committee, which is now under discussion. The principle is this—that a county entitled to two or more representatives, according to the population, should have the privilege of electing its representatives by the whole people of the county, and not by dividing the county, and giving to each portion, so divided, the right of electing a separate representative.

This principle, I apprehend, was founded in wisdom. It was intended to secure harmony among all of the free voters of the country. The state of Kentucky, for great and wise purposes, has been laid off, under the constitution of 1799, into counties and senatorial districts. It was laid off into counties for the purpose of convenience to all the people of the state. It was laid off into senatorial districts with the same object, and for the same purpose. The two great bodies composing the legislature were intended to act, to some extent, as checks upon each other; and population, so far as regarded each branch, was recognized by the framers of the constitution as the basis of representation in both. This basis, to-wit, of population, has been carried out by the report of the committee, and I think correctly. The state, as I before said, has been laid off into counties and districts, for the convenience of the people of the state, and at the same time, with a view to produce harmony and concentrate action among the people of each particular county, the wisdom and advantage of which will at once be perceived and acknowledged by all.

That unity of action, on the part of a county, was thought by the committee to be important, and so far as senatorial representation is concerned, it was thought to be equally important, and in each case population is adopted as the basis of representation. The gentlemen of the opposite side of the question thought that there would be an advantage in adopting a restrictive policy, in regard to cities, where population is concentrated; because, otherwise their action might have an injurious tendency upon the interests of the people in the balance of the state. Sir, if the population of a city is to act against the balance of the state, and if, by so acting, any injury is to result to the great body of the farming community, I, for one, would place myself in opposition to it. Those who have maintained that this power would be exercised against the balance of the people, have not maintained that the power which now exists in cities can be exerted to the prejudice of any portion of the people of Kentucky. They do not assert, nor do they seem to believe, that the power of any city now in the commonwealth, though it may be concentrated, can operate to the prejudice of the balance of the people of Kentucky; not taking the position that the population of cities, as it now stands, can be dangerous, but assuming the fact to be—as it is within the range of possibility—that the time may come, when that power can grow to such strength and force that it may be used to the prejudice of other portions of Kentucky. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the question have proposed to lay restrictions upon the people of the cities in the exercise of the right of suffrage; not that they are to chain the lion as they now find him—for they now regard him as harmless—not to place manacles upon the population of the cities as they now exist—for they look upon them now as weak and impotent—but they would have the chains prepared for the lion, by the time he becomes strong and powerful, and when he will be in a condition to make the whole people tremble at his roar. The gentleman from Christian is not for chaining the beast in his infancy, but for keeping him weak by dividing his strength whilst he is still young, and preventing its concentrated exercise when he has grown to his full size. Gentlemen think that the commonwealth is not yet in danger, the body politic is not yet diseased. I see no necessity, then, for calling in a physician. Would he call in a surgeon to amputate a limb, whilst it is yet sound and healthy, and in mere anticipation that at some time or other it would become diseased, and that gangrene would follow? Why not wait until the proper time arrives, for placing this restriction? If it is to be applied at all, let it be applied when the necessity arrives. The proposition of the gentleman from Christian is, to apply it at once—to apply the remedy before the disease exists—to amputate the limb before gangrene has taken possession of it. I can see no necessity for it.

I have remarked that unity of representation in counties has been provided in all the constitutions of the various states, and for the wisest purposes. This unity of representation should be extended to towns and cities. I can see no good reason why it should not be. Whenever gentlemen can show a good reason why unity of representation should be denied to cities, then let it be done; but I say the time has not yet arrived, at least so far as any facts have been adduced to indicate it, and until it does arrive no such principle should be applied, because by applying it you depart from the great principle running through the report of the committee, and running through the old constitution, and through the constitutions, I think, of all the states, that unity of representation in counties, and in towns and cities, ought not to be abrogated, unless for very good and sufficient reasons. Does the reason exist at this time for breaking in upon this harmonious action of the people in towns and cities? What is that reason, if any does exist? Is it that the power of Louisville, of Covington, of Maysville, or of any other town on the Ohio river that is to wield this tremendous influence, is such now as to make it necessary to break down this principle?

Let us look at the condition of things, because it is important that the question should be properly understood. What is the power of Louisville? She has three representatives—not five, as the gentleman from Breathitt has said. They are distinguished gentlemen, possessing great talents and influence, and every way worthy of the city which they represent, fully able to defend her rights and interests. But what is the amount of influence that can be exerted by those highly respectable delegates, over the great body of the people of Kentucky, or over the balance of the delegates to this convention? Can these three gentlemen place themselves in opposition to the power of the mighty people of Kentucky? Are we apprehensive that their power is or will become so great as to be irresistible? I acknowledge that their power is considerable, but I confess I am not at all alarmed at it, nor do I admit that it is greater than that of other gentlemen on this floor. Let them come here with any proposition they may think proper to bring, and let them unite all their forces upon it, if the proposition be objectionable to the balance of the delegates here, we can over-rule them, and put them down without scarcely an effort. Let them bring all their powers into the field, they cannot drive the remaining ninety seven members from their position. Take the city of Covington. Let us see the power that she can wield against the balance of the state. She is represented by a gentleman who is able to sustain the interests of his constituents, a man of weight and influence I admit, but when united with the three gentlemen from Louisville what can they do against the remaining ninety six delegates? Pass on to Maysville. She is not entitled to a representative, nor in fact is Covington, but I take both county and city together, and add one delegate for Lexington, and here are six arrayed against ninety four. Is this so powerful an array? Can they exert so powerful an influence that we are now obliged to place restraints upon them, to prevent their overslaughing the balance of Kentucky? I do not believe we have any cause to be alarmed. I say then to my friend from Christian that I do not think this is the time to apply the principle contained in his proposition.

But let us trace this matter a little further and see how this power is to be exerted. Is it to be exerted in relation to the finances of the state? In raising the taxes? In the building up a great system of internal improvements, or in the borrowing of money? These are important measures of state policy, alike interesting to the people of the country, and to towns and cities. How far can the cities of Kentucky control the state in carrying out all or any one of these measures. If their power is such as some gentleman imagine, they have but to will the accomplishment of any purpose and it is already done. Like the greatest general of the Romans, they have but to come, to see, and to conquer. Let us examine the extent of their power over the first of these important measures. And here permit me to remark that there is nothing upon which the people, not only in the country, but in towns and cities, are more sensitive than on the subject of raising the taxes—it concerns every citizen of the commonwealth—and so alive to the proper exercise of this great power are the people of every republic, that each man seems to stand as a sentinel, not only to guard his own, but the property and person of every other citizen, from unjust or oppressive taxation. According to our present constitution, all bills for raising the revenue are to originate with the lower house of the legislature—with the immediate representatives of the people—fresh from their bosoms—sympathising with them—acquainted with their wants, and ready to make any sacrifice to protect their rights. It is a fearful array this, which a city would have to break through, in the accomplishing of any purpose of injustice in the raising the taxes of the state. Their own people (as they certainly would be) resisting the people of all other parts of the state, and the members of the legislature, high on the watch tower of freedom, calmly surveying the advanced posts of the enemy, and ready to sound the tocsin of alarm on the first approach of danger. With such watchful sentinels—with such powerful protectors—what could the puny arm of a single city—nay, of all the cities combined—accomplish in the way of injustice or oppression in raising the taxes on the people of the commonwealth. They would be, when opposed to the balance of the state, as a pigmy opposed to a giant. The wrath of the people, once awakened, would sweep them away as chaff before the wings of the Storm-God careering in his might. There is no danger at this point upon this subject, the whole people of the state are bound together, as by magnetic cords, and where you touch the interest of one, it vibrates along these cords to the hearts of all. There can be no danger then at this point. Whenever a proposition to increase the revenue of the state is made, whether by the representation of city or country, it is responded to by the people from every part of the commonwealth. Their voice comes up to the halls of legislation from every city and hamlet—from every valley and hill top—proclaiming their assent or dissent to the measure, and woe be to the faithless representative who disregards the warning of that voice; they will never disregard it; and I again repeat, that I have no fear of danger at this point.

Is the danger greater in building up a great system of internal improvements for the improvement of the roads and rivers of the commonwealth?

Mr. Chairman: The sectional divisions of the state, as well as local and conflicting interests, forbid that there should be any concert, or unity of action, when a proposition is made to improve any one road or river. I remember that I was a member of the senate of Kentucky when the project for the making of the great southern railroad was brought before the legislature. I remember that the north and the south and middle sections of the state, as well as all the cities, so far from harmonizing in support of the measure, found it impossible to agree as to the route it should take, or the town on the Ohio river at which it should terminate, and it fell under the ponderous blows of those who would have been its friends, could they have shared with the rest of the state its benefits. One portion of the people wanted the road to terminate at the lower extremity of the state; another was for extending it to the city of Louisville; and another to some other town on the Ohio river in the northern part of the state; and thus situated they could never have but one city on the river, or but one section of the state in favor of the measure. It was lost, as I before remarked, by these conflicting interests.

But, sir, how was the great system of internal improvements for the state spoken into existence? Not by the influence of any one city, nor by the influence of all the towns and cities of the state combined; but by the union of the interests of the different sections of the state, stimulated by sectional advantages and strengthened by the idea of general good to the whole people of the commonwealth. Through a beautiful and fertile country in the middle section of the state, comes winding the Kentucky river, inviting, as it passes along, the products of the farmer and the mineral wealth of the mountain, to take passage on its bosom to the great and beautiful Ohio, and from thence on its broad and capacious waters onward to every market in the world. Far above, in the northern part of the state, and termination at the city of Covington on the Ohio, might have been seen the Licking, meandering its way through a country little less rich than that on the banks of the Kentucky, and pouring its waters down from mountains stored with mineral of almost every description, and which had slept in their quiet bosoms through the long lapse of ages; whilst in the distant south, stretching gracefully through a level and fruitful country, inhabited on each side by thousands of the honest and hardy yeomanry of the state, comes the Green river, starting from the same range of mountains, and mingling its waters with those of the Ohio in the county of Henderson. These great natural outlets for the rich products of the farmer and the mineral wealth of the mountains, were, nevertheless, obstructed, during a large portion of the year, by shoals and rocks, which prevented navigation, and required the united wealth and energy of the whole people of the state to remove. It is true that the towns and cities along the banks of the Ohio were to share with the farmers in the country the benefits of navigation, and to secure the advantages which might result to all, from the removal of these obstructions.

But how was this great end to be attained? Could it be brought about simply by the exertions of one particular section of country? Could one county, or one range of counties, effect anything by their exertions? No sir, it required the combined and united efforts of the people at large. All of these separate interests were joined together, and by means of a universal and united appeal to the liberality of the state for her encouragement and support, they accomplished that which they so much desired. This co-operation resulted from the fact that it was deemed essential and important by the people of the state at large, that their resources, their rich and wavy fields of corn, tobacco, and hemp, and all the other products of the soil, should find a market upon the banks of the principal river, or some other great point, and this was utterly impossible, unless these obstructions were removed and a great system of internal improvements instituted. The people of all parts of the commonwealth united sir; but they did not unite for the purpose of building up a particular city. Nothing of the kind. They joined hand in hand to accomplish a great object, and that was to promote, by a general and united movement, the interests of the whole state. Neither the influence of one city or of all the cities combined, nor of one section of the state, could have brought about this result. It required the united and conjoined efforts of all the people of Kentucky to accomplish it. This was the view taken by the statesmen who advocated that great system. I was opposed to it—not to the improving the navigation of the rivers, or to the making of roads such as would have been of utility to the whole state—but to the tacking on to the system objects not of public advantage, but intended merely to secure to it the support of particular localities. For sir, I beheld it starting up like a giant with its hundred hands stretching its arms into every part of the state, and holding out golden promises to the wavering, the venal, and the corrupt. I did not think it projected in fairness, or carried out in principle. But this unfairness was not from city influence, it was from the force of a thousand causes which circumstances had united to bring about the result. Its blessings or its evils, whatever they may have been, were not from city influence more than from that of the country. I do not see, therefore, that the danger of city influence is to be feared in the improvement of the rivers and roads of the commonwealth.

But let us come to the last proposition, and that is, to the borrowing of money on the credit of the state. That Kentucky has involved herself in a large debt, but not beyond her capacity to pay, there can be no doubt; but that the influence of towns or cities, or any particular section of the state, was alone exerted to bring about this result, no one believes. All the interests and sections of the state united in pledging her credit; but it was to effect and accomplish objects in which all were deeply interested, and which are now dispensing their benefits to all, broadcast through the land. But sir, if any danger is to be apprehended from the exercise of this power, the determination of, I think, a majority of the members of this convention to restrain the legislature in the future exercise of it, by denying it to them without first referring it to the people, should forever put an end to even the fear of danger. Whether the principle here indicated be inserted in the new constitution or not, I am certain that the mere influence of the towns can never bring about an extravagant exercise of the power. I have shown before, in the address made by me some days since to the committee, that the interests of the towns and country were dependent on each other, and that they should mutually aid and assist each other. This I still think, and I am confident that no great measure of state policy is ever likely to be adopted unless mutually advantageous to the people of the towns and country. Are the people indeed so utterly ignorant of their own interests as to be swayed from the path of duty by the mere influences of the towns? Have we not heard gentlemen here—when it was proposed to require qualifications from clerks, and the ineligibility of judges for fear of the corrupting exercise of their power upon the people—insist that the intelligence and purity of the people, their soundness of judgment, quickness of apprehension, and powers of discrimination forbid the conclusion that they could be deceived or imposed upon? If this be true, can that people then be overpowered and overreached by that influence which gentlemen seem to think must exist in the cities. But it is an influence which does not and cannot exist, as I have shown before in a calculation I have made on a fair and correct basis. I have shown that allowing the ratio of increase in the cities to be four hundred per cent. over the country, that when Louisville reached a population of 200,000 she would still have but three senators, while the state would have the balance. It therefore, must be utterly impossible for gentlemen, with these facts before them, to argue any body into the conclusion that this overpowering influence can ever exist.

But the gentlemen from Madison and Bourbon would lay these restrictions upon the people of the cities with a view of protecting certain interests in this commonwealth. If so, why not apply the principle to their own counties, and elsewhere, wherever the spirit of emancipation may display itself. The gentleman from Madison has insisted, in the first speech made by him on this question, and again repeated it in the one made by him yesterday, that numbers, in the towns and cities along the Ohio river, should not form the basis of representation.

Mr. TURNER. The gentleman will permit me to remark that I represented the proposition that property or territory should be the basis of representation.

Mr. DIXON. It would not be well, probably, for me to read the gentleman's speech on that subject.

Mr. TURNER. You had better read it.

Mr. DIXON. Then here it is: "I protest," says the gentleman, "against basing representation exclusively on population." Now will the gentleman from Madison inform me, if he will not base the principle of representation on numbers, on what will he base it? On what else can he base it, unless on territory or property? I understand there are three bases of representation, one is population, another is property, and a third is territory. If he does not mean to base it upon property or territory, will he be good enough to tell us upon what he will base it. Does he mean to assert, that he will have no basis at all? I would like to be informed upon this point.

But sir, let us return to the subject. The gentleman would protect the slaveholder by disfranchising thousands of those who do not own that description of property, and from the groundless apprehension that this is the best mode of protecting the interest of the slaveholder. Sir, such a system of proscription would be not only unjust, but in violation of every principle of propriety. It cannot, and it surely will not be done. Such a principle in the constitution, and for such a purpose, would alarm all the people of the commonwealth; it would strike terror into the hearts and minds of men. It would arouse a spirit of indignation amongst the non-slaveholding portion of the people, that would sweep the whole institution to destruction. I know of no magic power by which it could be appeased. Sir, as well might you attempt with your puny hand to arrest the white-crested wave of the ocean, when rising and swelling to mountain height it sweeps resistless on before the storm compelling power, or to chain the lightnings when loosed from their home of slumber in the clouds, they dash on, destroying and blasting in their mad career. Remember sir, that they who own slaves are but a fraction of the whole people of the state; and that the fact that we constitute a majority here, is no authority to exercise our short-lived power to the destruction of the rights of others. I implore gentlemen to be more careful of what they do. Do not attempt, under the pretence of protecting the institution of slavery, to inflame upon it a stab from which its heart's blood must flow. Beware, beware—lest with the besom of destruction you sweep the whole institution away, and that you leave nothing to tell that it existed but the records that we are now publishing to the world.

Beware, I say, how you trample on the rights of the non-slaveholding portion of the community. I have the utmost confidence in that community, and I take leave to say, that were it not for their forbearance, their high sense of justice, and their noble and elevated attachment to principle, the institution would have been very greatly endangered. They know that you are entitled to the property that you have inherited and purchased, and they fully recognize the great principle, in our constitution, that no man's property shall be taken without full and fair compensation. This was a high, and a great principle asserted by the people of the whole state, in the August elections, and whether from the Ohio border, or any other part of the country, I believe there is not a single emancipationist returned here to proclaim the wishes of that portion of our people who believe in the propriety of emancipating the negroes without compensation. Is not this an evidence of the fidelity of the people on the banks of the river to the institutions of Kentucky, and the institution of slavery itself? I understand from the gentleman from Madison, that there were polled, in his county, at the last election 680 odd emancipation votes. Are not those people in his county obnoxious to the same restriction that he would impose on those who live on the banks of the Ohio. But the gentleman in his argument did not refer to that fact. He did not seem to think that they became obnoxious to that censure, but allowed the whole weight of it, that fell from his lips, to come with its withering influence solely upon those who reside on the banks of the Ohio. But it falls upon the whole state, if not so intended, yet with the random shot that destroys. I can never assent to any such principle of proscription.

I go along with my friend from Christian, (Mr. Morris,) in the principle avowed in his proposition, and desire to apply it wherever the necessity for its application shall exist. I say if such a danger exists from Louisville, apply it at once; if not, why apply the principle at all. If there is no reason for it, no benefit will come out of it. There is no reason for breaking down the unity of representation for a proposition, which, when attained, will accomplish no good. The amendment I offer proposes to give full power to the legislature, when they deem it necessary as a safe-guard for the interest of the country, at any moment, to impose this restriction upon the city of Louisville, by dividing their representation. While I go with my friend as to the principle of his resolution, I wish that we could harmonize as to its details and its mode of application. I still trust we may, but I fear we will not. I stand here as the representative of my own county, on a great principle. I came not here to represent any party, but as the representative of both parties in my own county. I had no opposition to the place I hold here. I was supported by both parties. Those who differed from me on questions of national policy, were as ardent in my support, as the friends who had long entertained the same political sentiments that I do. I received their united vote, and was elected to carry out certain great principles, which no mere party consideration shall ever induce me to depart from.

MR. MORRIS. I am sorry to find that my highly esteemed friend from Henderson and myself will have to part company here. I am sorry we are to be separated upon what I consider a high conservative principle. I am sorry that more mature reflection has induced him to scratch out his endorsement of the amendment which I proposed the other day.

MR. DIXON. I hope the gentleman will not misunderstand me. I stated at the outset that I did not retract my endorsement of the principle, but that I differed with him as to its application.

MR. MORRIS. That is right, it is only a difference between us as to the application of the principle, and not as to its correctness. I am satisfied that my friend misapprehended its application, as indicated in my resolution, and only intended to endorse the principle. My proposition is, that the legislature shall now be required to district those cities entitled to more than one representative. Put off this operation until the contingency, which gentlemen seem to apprehend, shall arise; the danger we are seeking to ward off will then have arrived, and it will be too late to apply the remedy. Apply the principle to every city, as it becomes entitled to more than one representative, and the difficulty we apprehend will be met before the danger arrives. Delay its application, and the whole conservative force of my amendment will have been destroyed. We are seeking to break the force of a united city representation; for that is the danger we apprehend. We say to the legislature, as my friend proposes, you shall have the power to district the cities, and thereby destroy their unity of representation, whenever the contingency arises. But when that contingency does arise, when this city power shall have grown strong in our legislature, may it not be too late for the legislature to act? May it not be possible that this influence will be too powerful to overcome?

Perhaps it may be necessary, on account of the peculiar position which I occupy upon this question, and the remarks made by the junior gentleman from Nelson, on yesterday, with respect to himself, the honorable president of this body, and myself, and the party tendency which this amendment has been made to assume in the eyes of some people, for me to say that no conversation nor communication ever took place between the president and myself, with regard to the amendment which we now have under consideration. I am confident he knew nothing whatever of my intention to offer the amendment, until it was submitted to the house. It is true that I did exhibit it to some of my friends, irrespective of party, and consulted with them as to its propriety and strength. It is equally true, that the idea of its effect upon the two great parties never for one moment entered the head of one of us. We were consulting and deliberating upon a great principle of compromise, upon which I hoped the chafed and agitated spirit of the house might possibly unite. It is true that my friends concurred with me in the belief that it would probably promote harmony and union; that while it would secure the great principle, that representation should be based on population, it would at the same time, by dividing the cities against themselves, preserve the rural districts against the dangerous influence of a united city representation. I had not the remotest idea that sinister motives could be attributed to me, and nothing could give me more pain, than that the insinuation could be thrown out against me, that I, a democrat, representing a whig constituency, could, for the purpose of accomplishing the miserable party gain of one member in the legislature, coolly introduce into this body a measure solely calculated to promote the democratic cause, and with that object in view. I never dreamed of such a thing; such an idea never entered my brain. And yet, such "sinister" motives have been attributed to me by one of the leading journals of this state, and judging from the remarks made by my friend from Nelson, on yesterday, have found their way into this house.

Sir, there are men in this world—I will not say they are to be found in this body—who have been so long chained to the car of party, who have so long fed upon the crumbs which have been sparingly doled out from the party table, and fawned and flattered that a few more morsels might be offered—who have so long breathed the polluted atmosphere of the party brothel—who are so completely prostituted, both in mind and body, to the trickery and chicanery of party politics, that they can no more understand the operations of an honest and independent mind, or appreciate an independent course, than the fiends of hell can appreciate the enjoyments of heaven. When any great question is proposed to them, instead of considering the great principle which may be involved in it; instead of asking themselves, is it right? is it proper? is it for the good of the country at large?—the single and sole view which they take of the subject, the only question which they ask is, will it promote the democratic or the whig cause? God forbid! that I should be classed with such men.

Sir, an enlightened and a patriotic constituency, a large majority of them differing from me in political sentiments, has honored me with a seat upon this floor. I came here pledged to represent them correctly. I came here fully possessed with the belief that a member of this convention should stand high above the petty manoeuvres of party politics. I came here to assist in making a constitution which will rise far above all party differences. I think there are gentlemen in this house, with whom I have been intimately associated, who will sustain me in the declaration, that I have all along been actuated by higher principles than mere party considerations.

Mr. DIXON. I have been intimately associated with the gentleman, and he has grown more and more upon my esteem and confidence every day, and if any man upon this floor or elsewhere, has placed himself entirely above all party influence, in his action here, I certainly think it is the gentleman from Christian. If it was necessary to endorse him, and I know it is not, it is but justice to him to say, that in all things he has acted on the most elevated principles, irrespective wholly of party, and with a sole eye to the good of his country.

Mr. MORRIS. I am extremely gratified at the high compliment the gentleman has paid me, and for his kind endorsement.

When I introduced the amendment which is now under consideration, it was done in a pure spirit of compromise—it was done with every feeling of kindness towards the population of Louisville, and her distinguished representatives upon this floor. The only fault I found with it, was, that it was an insufficient guaranty to the country population. I have not now the least idea of making a further concession; the feverish and excited state of mind among the members seemed to call for a compromise; the most distinguished gentlemen on this floor were almost ready to fight; a high state of excitement existed all over the house; it was impossible, under their existing state of mind in the house, that correct conclusions could be arrived at; it was necessary that something should be done; I faltered and found myself retracing a step which I had already determined upon; I modified my position, and by this course gave my friend from Caldwell an opportunity to give me the heavy blow which he fairly dealt me in the able speech which he delivered to the committee the other day; I brought forward this amendment; when it was read, many gentlemen who had stood out against the broad principle of representation upon numbers, and who had determined to restrict Louisville and all city population, stepped forward and declared their willingness to support it; and it was not until the base insinuation was thrown out, that its principle object was to promote the democratic cause, that it began to lose favor.

I did not rise sir, for the purpose of discussing this amendment—my object was simply to relieve myself from a false position. The subject has been fairly eviscerated, and there is scarcely a foot of ground upon which to rest an argument which has not already been occupied by some one of the able gentlemen who have discussed this question. I have stated to the committee that I cannot go with the gentleman from Henderson, for the amendment which he has just offered. It is weakening the force of the amendment which I offered, and my own is not strong enough for my taste. I cannot say that I apprehend no danger from the city representation—I think that its strength is derived, to a great extent, from sources even above population. It is stated, and a computation has been made by the gentleman from Henderson, and the gentleman from Montgomery, (who is great at figures), that the city population is not increasing to such an extent over the rural population, as to render the danger imminent at this time. I believe this to be true. I too have made a little estimate, and the result of my calculation is that the increase of the whole urban population in all the towns and cities, over all the rural population in every part of the state, is in the ratio of three to two. Now I do not think there is anything so terrible in this—but I would ask you, sir, and this committee, if there are not other causes which are brought to bear upon the legislative halls of the state, by the larger cities. Time was, sir, when Lexington and its junta controlled the whole destinies of Kentucky, because there was the concentration of the talent, the wealth, and the political influence of the state. The time may not be far distant when Louisville may occupy the same position. The city of Louisville is the concentration of the fashion, the intelligence, and the power of Kentucky—there the great men congregate to reap the rewards which belong to their talents—'tis there that banking accommodations are extended to the people—'tis there that the merchants from the various parts of the state do congregate, to supply themselves and their customers with merchandise—'tis there that individuals, of all classes, go to dispose of their surplus productions. There sir, last, but not least, is the mighty and controlling press of the state—the press which controls public opinion and popular action in this country, more completely than any man or particular set of men—the press which is almost above the people themselves. There sir, is the Louisville Journal, the Democratic Chronicle, and many other papers of different political hues. Where, sir, is the whig politician who is anxious to rise in the political world, who will dare to stand opposed to the Louisville Journal? He cannot be found. Let any whig in this state but incur the displeasure of that paper, and down he sinks like Lucifer, never to rise again. Let the same paper place its stamp of approval upon any individual and up goes his flag—he at once rises in the political scale—he walks into the legislature, congress, and the senate of the United States. This, sir, is an influence and a power greater than that which will spring from any excess of population. This is the power which has always operated so heavily upon our legislatures, and plays its part in this hall, at this time. It was this influence operated upon me, and caused me to hesitate whether, in order to check it, I should not break one of the great fundamental principles of our government. Go into the democratic ranks, and there you will find the democratic presses—there is the Chronicle and other papers, and though they have not grown so great as the Journal, yet it will be difficult to find an ambitious democrat who would willingly incur this democratic displeasure. It is this power which renders Louisville far more formidable than any increase of population, however rapid—it is this influence which controls our legislature, guides our senate, elects our governor, makes small men great, and controls public sentiment. This is a power which you cannot estimate by figures—you cannot reach the mind of man by figures—you cannot fathom the motive which induces him to take a particular stand—you cannot, by your mathematical calculations, tell why a gentleman turns whig to day and democrat to-morrow, nor why he votes one way on a proposition one time and another way at another. These are the unfathomed secrets of man's heart, but many of these secrets, could the truth but out, would be found depending on the press at Louisville.

In monarchical governments, the king is the fountain of all power—and I have read that there are many who flatter and bend the knee to this fountain of power—seeking that its waters may be poured upon their humble heads. In republican governments like ours, the fountain of all power is the people. The great controller of the people is the press; and you will find many men bowing and cringing at the footstool of this political press, praying that its waters be poured upon their heads.

These are some of the influences which Louisville can bring to bear in this state—whenever her interests may make it necessary—her population, her talent, her fashion, her commercial capital, her banking capital, her press—and shall there be no guard at all, backed against this power? Sir, I fear this conservative amendment of mine is too weak. I am willing to compromise upon it, but I can go no further. I cannot go with my friend from Henderson into the details, even though the principle be preserved. It is proper sir, that great principles be preserved though we incur danger in their preservation. I am willing to stand by this amendment, be it whig or be it democratic. If the democratic party is to be promoted by the support of great principles in this convention, let it be so. If whig principles are to be weakened by the same course, let it be so. I care not; I stand above party here, and whether it be whiggery or democracy that is promoted by the amendment upon your table, it is the same thing to me.

Mr. DIXON. I extremely regret that my honorable friend has found cause of offence in the Louisville Journal. I, of course, do not concur, nor can I be held responsible for the articles in that paper. It is a valuable and justly influential and popular public journal with the party to which I am proud to belong, and which I have acted for a quarter of a century. I regret that anything has appeared in it in regard to my friend's conduct in this matter, which he is constrained to regard as personally disrespectful to himself. I doubt if it was designed to impute to him any improper or dishonorable motive. Most assuredly none who know the gentleman as I know him would ever think of imputing to him, in the course which he has pursued here, any other than motives the most honorable and patriotic. It is very true that we differ widely in political sentiment upon questions of national policy, but I have not regarded this as the arena for tournaments between gladiators espousing the cause of one or the other of the great national parties. So far as I know or believe, no such feeling has been manifested by the gentleman from Christian, (Mr. Morris.) I heartily concurred with him in the principle of his amendment when he presented it the other day. I yet concur in the principle. I propose, however, to modify his proposition so as to assert the principle and give to the legislature the power to apply it, whenever, in the wisdom of that branch of the government, it shall be deemed necessary or expedient.

I do not impute to him any desire to make the proposition which he offered subservient to party. I trust, and believe, that he, and all others on this floor, will, in making the new constitution, rise above party and party considerations, and look steadily and alone to the honor and glory of our great state. Such, I know, are the honest sentiments of my heart—such I believe to be the honest sentiments of my friend from Christian. I have not changed in my position towards the proposition now under consideration. I am for the principle, and the only difference between the honorable mover and myself, is, that we differ as to the mode of applying the principle and the time of its enforcement. If the legislature shall believe, at the first apportionment of representation under the new constitution, that the time has arrived when the good of the state demands that the legislative delegation from Louisville shall be disunited, I would cheerfully give the power to that legislature to disunite the delegation. I would not, however, disunite that representation, unless it is believed that the safety of the state demands such a course. I propose, by my amendment, to authorize the legislature to judge of that necessity. This is the position I occupy; and I trust my friend will consent to the modification, that we, who so fully concur in the principle contained in his amendment, may not be separated in declaring how that principle shall be applied.

Mr. RUDD. This question seems to have narrowed down to a point here. It is apprehended that Louisville will have too great an influence upon the agricultural section of the state, and to guard against that, gentlemen who came here advocating the pure republican principle of equal representation according to numbers, are ready at once to abandon it. It seems to be a desire, on the part of some, to punish Louisville for the failure of some favorite measure of their own. Others have expressed their desire to apply the restriction to all the counties bordering on the Ohio river; some twenty-four or five in number. It is a strange doctrine to be advocated here by men of clear heads and sound hearts. Even if it had the power, why should Louisville desire to oppress the rest of the state, or any portion of it? Is it not interested in the prosperity of the whole state? And yet the patriotism and the enterprise of Louisville, in the public improvements she has projected and carried out for the benefit of the state, and to enable the agricultural community to reach a sure and certain market, have actually been made a theme of reproach by gentlemen here, as if it was a great crime. Is it not the best, the most stable market in the western country? Why, then, should Louisville be restricted in her right to full and equal representation? Is she not a part and parcel of this commonwealth? or is she inhabited by a separate and distinct people? Why, if a stranger had heard the arguments of gentlemen, he would have supposed that the city belonged to a different people, one hardly speaking the same language with the rest of the state. Is not Louisville benefitted, too, as well as the rest of the commonwealth, by these public improvements? Certainly—it was not to be supposed that her citizens were to spend their money and construct improvements for the benefit of the state, without some apparent compensation for it. And instead of seeking to throw obstacles in the way, gentlemen should rather seek to aid her in these works. Who is to receive the benefit of them? Why, the whole state, the city of Louisville of course included. The state would not take stock in them, nor did the people of the country, generally, and the city of Louisville, consequently, was mainly forced to do it herself. And in this great work of opening to the vast products of the country a sure and stable market, we should go together as a band of brothers, for the benefit is mutual. Lands through which these improvements have run, have been increased thereby to double their former value. Louisville did not, of course, alone do this, but I say she aided most essentially in doing it.

Gentlemen have argued that the institution of slavery is to be endangered by the growth of Louisville, and the kind of population that is forming that growth. And this population has been described as the offscourings of the jails of Europe, as the renegades from the northern and eastern states, and as not desirable citizens of the great state of Kentucky. Where was our opposition to slavery in Louisville during the last canvass? Why, there was far more opposition to it in the very heart of the city, than among the emigrants from the centre counties of the state. It was these people that composed the very head and front of the emancipation party.

Gentlemen have drawn on their imagination in the fear they have expressed of the influence of Louisville being cast against the institution of slavery. And upon these fears gentlemen would deprive that city of her fair and equal representation, and violate a great fundamental republican principle. How is Louisville situated? She is vitally concerned in the interests and prosperity of the state; because if it prospers she prospers, if it is blighted she is blighted; and she will ever be the first to step forward in defence of the institutions and interests of the state. She is the great market for the whole of the commonwealth; as an evidence of which it may be stated, that 130,000 hogs were slaughtered in Louisville during the last year. It is the great commercial and manufacturing city of the state, and every one must see how vitally it is interested in all the agricultural pursuits of the commonwealth. There is nothing then to be feared by those interests from the influence of Louisville. And so far from ever seeking to destroy or injure the agricultural interest which gentlemen seem apprehensive of, she will ever be the readiest, even if governed alone by self-interest, to foster and protect it.

As to the emancipationists, I will admit that we had at one time a strong party of them in our city. The act calling a convention had scarcely passed when the office holders and the men in power avowed emancipation principles, and by their exertions got the leading merchants, lawyers, and mechanics, the leading men of the butchering interests, and river men, (both of whom wield a powerful influence,) to unite with them. They held their meetings and debates, and within three weeks of the election seemed to be sweeping every thing before them. The pro-slavery men seemed afraid to move, until the President of this convention came forward and took ground against this strong array in opposition to the interests of the state. Meetings were held, and arguments used, appealing to the patriotism and the understanding of these men. The Germans were shown that they came amongst us of their own free will, knowing what our institutions were, and that they prospered under them, and that therefore it was not their interest to subvert any of those institutions. This appeal took like wild fire among them. They instantly saw its reason and justice, and despite the exertions and the money of the emancipationists, they rallied to the support of the interests of the country. The people were appealed to by arguments, their connection with the interests of the state was clearly pointed out, and their duty urged upon them to unite with the pro-slavery men of the rest of the state in sustaining the institution of slavery. They were appealed to in language of this import:

Do not let it be said that you stood back, or made common cause with the enemies of an institution of your country. They listened attentively to what was said to them, and in the course of twenty five or thirty days they came forward and acknowledged that the advice was good, right, and just, that they ought to support the pro-slavery candidates, that it was their interest to do it. In the upper ward, where the German population principally reside, and the emancipationists expected a large majority, we beat them one hundred and fifty four votes, I think. We talked to the Irish and other foreigners living in the lower wards, in a similar strain, and we defeated them, but in the fifth and seventh wards, where there was scarcely a foreigner, they were successful against us. As to the population, which had emigrated into the city from the rural districts, of which gentlemen have spoken, as being so moral, pure and immaculate, how did they vote? Why, against us, and perhaps for want of reflection; and no doubt, a great many who did so, would now be glad, if they could say they had not been on that side of the question. What reason, I ask, has the rest of the State of Kentucky to fear the growth of our city population? None. The gentleman from Madison, who denounced our population in the most unmeasured terms, calls upon me to endorse his statement. He says that I introduced a resolution in this convention to prevent our citizens from running into excess in times of excitement, which went to show I have no confidence in the people. He is mistaken; but I say I have more confidence in the proper exercise of the elective franchise in the election of the judges and other officers than in any other mode of appointment. I will read the thirty first section of the report of the committee on the legislative department for the purpose of showing what confidence they have in the people. It is in the following language:

"The credit of this commonwealth shall never be given in aid of any person, association, municipality, or corporation, without the concurrence of two thirds of each house of the general assembly."

Why should the gentleman make this charge against us? The section I have read is almost identically the same as the resolution to which he has referred. But here they call in the aid of two thirds of each house to carry the law into effect. I, however, acted more on the republican principle, for I required only a majority.

I anticipate that after the great railroad from Louisville to Frankfort is completed, we shall have one to Nashville, to strike the head of navigation, but I do not want it till the people are prepared for it. The gentleman from Madison said we restricted the property holders. I do not want any reflections to be cast upon us, or the yankees and foreigners who reside among us, for I think we are as pure and upright as other people. The great question is, whether Louisville shall permit herself to be trampled down and disfranchised, without raising her voice against the injustice attempted to be done her. Shall it be said our people are not capable of representing themselves—that we are not worthy of being represented in the legislative halls in proportion to our numbers? I trust not; and yet those very men professing to be governed by republican principles have come here and declared that a man should not be qualified for a clerk, or be a lawyer to try a case of yours or mine, without first obtaining a certificate from a judge. But when it comes to the great principle of the elective franchise, I say give the vote according to population. The gentleman from Logan, in his proposition, comes forward and almost declares that Louisville is to swallow up the whole of the rural or agricultural part of the country. Now, he need not be afraid that Louisville will swallow them up, for the smaller cannot swallow the greater, the greater must swallow the lesser. I think, however, one of the gentleman from Logan, from his appearance and happy countenance, is with us. No, we will not swallow them up, but they can swallow us up, and trample upon us, if they please, and give us what representation they think proper. They have the power, but I believe they have souls above exercising it.

When the proposition of my friend from Christian was brought forward, the whole house was in a state of agitation and confusion, and it appeared to me that Louisville was not to be represented. Really I did not know but what there would be a motion made to cut her off entirely; but that was not done, and I thank the house for

it. When the gentleman from Christian brought forward his proposition as a compromise I knew nothing about it, and he asked me if I was willing to agree to it. He said to me, "you had better go for it, it will be a benefit to your city. If your city had a little larger population, I would say it was just and right." Now, when I found the house arrayed against Louisville, and trying to disfranchise her of her power and weight in the legislative halls, to which she is justly entitled, I told the gentleman I would support it on principle, but that I preferred the proposition offered by the gentleman from Nelson. If we should have but three representatives, I should prefer they would vote in a body; if four, to have two wards, and if five, districted in five wards. But, if it will settle this question and quiet the house, I will go for it as it stands. I came here to do justice to all parties, as far as my vote and voice are concerned. I came to make a constitution on equitable principles, and I hope that gentlemen who differ with me in opinion, in relation to my city being partially disfranchised, will reflect that we have promised these people, who have fought the battles of our country, that they should be dealt with justly, their persons held sacred, their property protected, and that their voices should be heard in the legislative halls. Now, with all the ingenuity of the gentleman from Madison, I should like him to place himself in my situation, and have him to go back and tell his constituents he could not vote to give them a full representation. Why? they would ask. Because you are a mixed population of foreigners, Germans, Irish, and others. We could not give you just representation—you had not virtue enough. Would they not be almost inclined to throw him over the fence, and tell him they had no further use for him? We do not claim for Louisville more of virtue than any other portion of the state. We claim an equality and nothing more. But if you fear the power of Louisville, put us in the same relation to the rest of the state that the counties stand in, so that we may have opposing influences within ourselves, by being divided into wards. I am willing to go for the proposition of the gentleman from Christian to district the city. I like to please those whom I represent, but I intend to do justice, let the opposition come from what source it may.

I was not pledged to any particular principles in forming the constitution, but I am to act as my judgment shall direct when matters come up. The emancipationists called a meeting of whigs and democrats after the whigs had brought out their ticket. They rejected the whig nominees and nominated a ticket of their own, and thus caused the defeat of the whig ticket. The democrats stuck together, and there were sent here two democrats and one whig emancipationist. It was difficult to find three men who were willing to run for this convention. But men were found, men who never gave an inch, who were not in favor of the act of 1833, or of incorporating its principles in the constitution. We accepted no terms, but insisted on standing by our own principles, unpledged. I do not blame the gentleman from Madison for his course, because he is pledged to carry out the principles of the act of 1833. We came here to make a constitution, not only for ourselves, but posterity. Some gentlemen seem to think it is sufficient that we should have a representation only for the present population, and they say, we do you no wrong, we give you what you now have. This is the language of the emancipationists applied to a different subject. They said, we will not take your present slaves from you, but those only that may be hereafter born. So gentlemen here say, we will give you what you now have of representation, but we will grant no more in the constitution for posterity. That is a principle which cannot be sustained, and he who advocates it before the people, will be beaten, as was an individual in the fifth congressional district, who advocated the Wilmot proviso, as was said, merely to ascertain how the people stood in regard to it, and though he had a capital of about 800 votes in his favor, he was, notwithstanding, beaten about 1200. Why was it so? Because those who held slaves contended for the principle, though it was not a matter in which they had a direct pecuniary interest. They held that the people of the territories had a right to make a constitution for themselves, and to admit slavery or reject it. It was the principle of equal right for which they contended.

This question is pretty much the same. It is not to deprive us of property, but of the privilege of equal rights in the existence of the elective franchise. Property, what is it? It was mine and it is yours, but liberty is a very different thing. The principle we are contending for is representation according to population, and if we were to give it up, we would go home dishonored and disgraced. What could I say in answer to charges that might meet me from my constituents, if I did not resist this attempt to deprive us of equal rights? If I were to tell them that this republican convention had overruled us and deprived us of our just representation in the legislative halls, would they not say, we will go with you no more, we will go with the emancipationists. Thus you see you would arm the emancipationists, and they would carry the city, and might carry some of the adjacent counties. Do not arm then I beg you. Give us equal rights, we ask nothing more, nothing but equality. Let us have a constitution on the republican principle of representation according to the population, and we can go home satisfied, and ready to urge every man to endorse it.

The committee then rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

The convention then adjourned.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. NORTON.

REPRESENTATION OF TOWNS AND CITIES.

Mr. IRWIN offered the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That elections for representatives for the several counties entitled to representation, shall be held at the places of holding their respective courts, or in the several election precincts into which the legislature may think proper to divide any or all of the counties; Provided, that when it shall appear to the legislature that any town or city hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such town or city shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation; which shall be retained so long as such town or city shall contain a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio which may, from time to time, be fixed by law, and thereafter elections for the county in which such town or city is situated, shall not be held therein.

2. Resolved, That the same number of senatorial districts shall, from time to time, be established by the legislature as there may then be senators allotted to the state, which shall be so formed as to contain as near as may be an equal number of free white male inhabitants in each, above the age of twenty one years, so that no county, town, or city shall form more than one district, and when two or more counties compose a district, they shall be adjoining.

I would simply remark that this proposition contains the fifth and twelfth sections of the second article of the present constitution, except that it is so changed as to give to cities and towns a separate representation. I only desire to place it before the convention, and to move that it be referred to the committee of the whole, having in charge the report of the committee on the legislative department, with the intention of asking for a direct vote upon it.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention resolved itself into committee of the whole, Mr. MERIWETHER in the chair, and resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the legislative department.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be on the amendment of the gentleman from Henderson, (Mr. Dixon) submitted as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Christian (Mr. Morris.)

The PRESIDENT. I will suggest that we shall never be able to get along in committee of the whole with the business before us. It will be much better to consider this bill in convention. I simply make this suggestion. I shall make no motion; but I hope every gentleman will consider the suggestion I have made.

Mr. GHOLSON. I concur fully with the gentleman, and that has ever been my opinion. If we are to go on with the discussion of these questions in committee of the whole, and they are all to be reargued in convention, when are we to complete our business?

Mr. IRWIN. To test the sense of the convention, and ascertain whether that is its disposition, I move that the committee rise, and report the article back to the house with all the amendments that have been made and offered.

The CHAIRMAN. I apprehend it is out of order to report the pending amendments to the house.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I should like the clerk to read the rule in relation to the transaction of business in committee of the whole. We have a rule which directs the manner in which we shall proceed in the consideration of articles.

If I recollect aright, the rule says they shall be referred to the committee of the whole, and there considered in a prescribed manner.

The secretary read the rule as follows:

"RULE 54. Upon a proposition being committed to a committee of the whole house, the same shall be first read through by the secretary, (unless otherwise ordered by a majority,) and then again read for amendment by clauses and sections, leaving the preamble, if any, to be last considered. After report, the proposition shall again be read, if desired by a majority, for amendment and debate, before a question be taken."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. That is the rule to which I referred.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule occurred to the chair, and the chair apprehends that to change that rule will require a vote of two-thirds.

The chair will put the question on the motion of the gentleman from Logan.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill and its amendments to the convention.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. It having been agreed to proceed with the consideration of this article in the convention, I ask the convention to adopt a resolution, such as that adopted in committee of the whole for the regulation of debate, by stopping all discussion, except ten and five minute speeches, at 12 o'clock this day. In the convention at present we have no rule to limit debate, except the previous question, and that will preclude all amendments also. I ask unanimous consent to the introduction of such a resolution as I have indicated. (Leave, leave.)

The secretary read the resolution as follows:

Resolved, That all debate in the convention, on the report of the committee on the legislative department, shall cease this day at 12 o'clock, m., and the convention shall then proceed to vote upon such amendments as may then be pending or may be thereafter offered: Provided, That the mover of any amendment may be allowed ten minutes, and any other delegate who may desire it five minutes, to explain or oppose the amendment, but in such limited debate the speaker shall confine his remarks to the amendment under consideration.

Mr. HARDIN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "five" and inserting "ten," so that each member shall have the same right to speak ten minutes, as the mover of an amendment.

The amendment was agreed to and the resolution as amended was adopted.

Mr. JAMES. I have been indisposed for some days, and I am not well this morning, but before the discussion shall be closed, I desire to offer some remarks, and I desire to do it in committee of the whole, as more appropriate and convenient to me. I ask the convention again to resolve itself into committee of the whole.

Mr. IRWIN. I move that the gentleman be allowed to proceed.

Mr. JAMES. I feel obliged to the gentleman, but it would be more convenient to me to speak in committee of the whole.

Mr. BARLOW. I move that the convention again resolve itself into committee of the whole on this article, for the special purpose of hearing the remarks of the gentleman from Hickman.

The motion was agreed to, and the committee again resolved itself into committee of the whole on the article on the Legislative Department. Mr. MERIWETHER in the Chair.

Mr. JAMES. In the remarks I am about to submit to the consideration of the committee upon this occasion, if I do not confine myself strictly to the question in issue, I shall but follow the example of several gentlemen who have preceded me.

I have had the honor of a seat in one or the other branch of the legislature when five apportionment bills have been passed, and I have always found the question of apportionment one of the most exciting questions that has ever been presented for the consideration of the legislature, and why? Because it affects, to some extent, the interests of every portion of the country. While some are struggling to acquire more strength, others are endeavoring to retain what they have; whilst the neutral portions, those which do not themselves expect to be affected by the decision of the question, generally take sides with one or the other of the parties interested, and hence the excitement which always attends its agitation. It is not to be wondered at, therefore, that when this convention is engaged in framing an organic law, to direct and settle the principles that shall govern the legislature in its future action in regard to this important question, there should be manifested some little excitement.

I came here with my opinions matured, in relation to the great leading questions that have been agitated throughout the commonwealth upon the subject of constitutional reform. I did expect, however, upon coming here, that we should have some discussion in respect to details; but when asked, upon leaving home, how long I supposed the convention would continue in session, I gave it as my opinion, unhesitatingly, that they would be enabled to close their labors within seven or eight weeks, but we are now entering upon the eighth week, and it is impossible to say when we shall be ready to adjourn. It is all very well for gentlemen who live near, and who are enabled to go home occasionally, about one third of whom have availed themselves of that privilege, but this I have no opportunity of doing.

I regret that crimination and recrimination have been indulged in upon this exciting subject, and none do I regret more than fell from the lips of the honorable president of this convention. He took part in this discussion on the 13th and the 16th instant, and indulged in a very wide range indeed; in the course of which, he took occasion to denounce, in very unqualified terms, those who felt it their duty to sustain the proposition that was then under consideration. He alluded to the subject of internal improvement, education, and the proposed negro law of 1830. I say proposed law, because it did not pass. He also alluded to the act of 1833. Well, sir, I have been in the legislature for a number of years, and if I do not know something about the history of these questions, it must be admitted that I ought to. My district composes the one hundredth part of the sovereignty of the commonwealth, and I came here to exercise the right to which she is entitled. The question that was under consideration at the time the honorable president addressed the committee, was the proposition to restrict the cities in apportioning the representation in the senatorial branch of the legislature; and he then took occasion to denounce those who were disposed to favor it, as invading the rights of his constituents. If that proposition invades the rights of the citizens of Louisville, the convention of 1799 invaded them. Let me call the attention of the committee to the twelfth section of the second article of the constitution of Kentucky; it reads as follows:

"The same number of senatorial districts shall, from time to time, be established by the legislature, as there may be then senators allotted to the state; which shall be so formed as to contain, as near as may be, an equal number of free male inhabitants in each, above the age of twenty one years, and so that no county shall be divided, or form more than one district, and where two or more counties compose a district, they shall be adjoining."

Did not that restrict the county of Jefferson to one senator? Well, sir, whose names do you find appended to that constitution? First, the name of Alexander S. Bullitt, the delegate from the county of Jefferson, who presided over the convention that framed this constitution, and the father of the distinguished delegate now, in part, representing the same county on this floor. You find the name of Col. Richard Taylor, the father, I believe, of the President of the United States, an early pioneer of Kentucky, and a most worthy and honorable gentleman. I had the pleasure of serving with him in the legislature, as early as the year 1825.

The gentleman says we are here sworn to do justice. Well, that is the very thing we are about to determine; and the question presents itself to this committee—is it proper and right to restrict the representation of large masses, when congregated within a small space? I think it is, and the convention of 1799 thought so too. The gentleman says it is an invasion of the rights of his constituents. I cannot help that. In carrying out a great principle, though it is by no means my design to invade the rights of the gentleman's constituents—yet if they suffer what the gentleman may call an invasion of their rights, in consequence of the application of such principle, be it so. I am one who thinks the establishment of the principle necessary for the public good. It is a principle that is recognized in the federal constitution, and in the constitutions of many of the states. We have many illustrious precedents for this course. I am told that a great many cities will fall under this proscription, this invasion of rights. Suppose they do, that has nothing to do with the great principle—that is not to be regarded as a reason why the principle should not be applied. I am told that there are many towns along the Ohio river, that are destined to become great and populous cities, and that it will be an injustice towards them, to make them fall under this proscription. I design nothing prejudicial or injurious to them, sir. Covington, Henderson, and Paducah have been named as cities which are, in time, to fall under this principle. Surely sir, I would do nothing calculated to prejudice either of them. The latter city I have, in times past, represented, first in one and then in the other branch of the state legislature. I rejoice in her prosperity—in her growth and her promise of greatness and wealth. I have many friends among her citizens—friends of long standing. I would not injure them. I believe, sir, they will cheerfully acquiesce in the adoption of this principle—though it may, in some degree, restrict them—if thereby the public good is to be promoted.

Columbus and Mills' Point have been also alluded to; they will be populous cities, no doubt. Thirty years ago my attention was turned to that section of the country, and I then believed the day was not far distant when a great city would spring up near the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi rivers. I have not yet lost the hope, but my expectation has been greatly postponed. I trust, however, a brighter day is dawning upon them. To the former place, especially, a promising future is now opening. The great enterprise of uniting the city of Mobile with the Ohio or Mississippi rivers, we have now a just reason to hope will be pressed forward energetically. Part of the road is already under contract, and the best spirit prevails throughout all the section immediately interested in its completion. Should Columbus be its terminus, as many hope and believe, it must become a great city, and its influence shed upon neighboring towns must greatly advance them. And I am sure these towns, if the bright picture we now paint for them shall be realized, will not clamor against the principle which we now propose to insert in the constitution.

The honorable President took occasion to tell us, in rather a loud, authoritative, and dictatorial tone, that if the rights of his constituents were thus invaded, he would not sign the constitution—that he would go home and denounce it. I was really very much alarmed when he said this. I know that gentleman claims long to have been the advocate of constitutional reform. I claim, however, to be his senior in that respect. I heard the gentleman from Nelson (Mr. Hardin,) say, the other day, he had advocated constitutional reform for five years. I take occasion to say I advocated it for thirty years. I have never given a vote, in or out of the legislature, that has not tended that way. I say, I was alarmed when I heard the gentleman declare that he would denounce the constitution, for I know his weight and influence in the country: but, after a moment's reflection, I consoled myself with the hope that the Sun would not be veiled in mourning—that it would rise in the east, and set in the west, as usual—that the seasons would roll on, as heretofore—that we should have spring and autumn, summer and winter yet; and that neither war, pestilence, nor famine would be visited upon those who felt it their duty to engraft this conservative principle—a principle that was recognized by the framers of the federal constitution, and by those who made the present constitution of Kentucky—in the constitution we are about to make. Look at the great state of New York; she has but two senators, while Texas and little

Delaware each have the same number. Had Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and Madison denounced this principle, in its application to the federal government, and declared they would not sustain the constitution, what would have been our condition? It would have been disastrous, indeed. But I trust that no such evil will result, should our President carry out his determination. In discussing this question, he took occasion to use this language:

"Well, every gentleman can reconcile it to himself, in his own way. His constituents, because they receive the benefits and advantages of it, may look over it, but if they shall be chary in trusting him again, when they see he can trample on their rights, as he has trampled on the rights of others, their distrust will be manifested, and the consequences will be visited on his own head, and not on mine."

Now, this might be received in a two-fold point of view. First, as a caution, or warning; secondly, as a piece of advice. Well, I suppose that every school boy of ten years old in my district, is aware that the president is not responsible for my conduct on this floor, and I will take occasion to say, that I think my constituents have as much confidence in my integrity, and disposition to do right, as the constituents of the gentleman have in his.

It was a maxim of Lord Coke, I believe, that a man should not be permitted to adjudicate upon matters in which he was personally interested. When I am in need of the president's advice, I will call upon him for it. I am rather distrustful of advice that is given without being asked for. The principle laid down by Lord Coke, would apply in either case.

I regret exceedingly that those who are acting with me in discussing this important question, have alluded to the subject of emancipation. All such paltry considerations have nothing to do with my action. I came here as thorough a pro-slavery man as any in this convention. I was born and educated in this faith. I told my constituents—and my worthy friend from Graves heard me declare it—that I would not accept a seat in this convention with a view to the disturbance of the slavery question. It was stated by a writer in the News Letter, about that time, that there was a majority in the representative district in favor of emancipation. That was the reason why I made the declaration, and I added, that if they were inclined to elect a man, who would act in a manner so injurious to the interests of the country, as to favor the schemes of the emancipationists, they might select some other person, I would not answer their purposes. Well, what was the result? I was elected without opposition, and came here, not to disturb the question of slavery, with two exceptions; and they were to secure to the citizen the right to import slaves for his own use, and to prohibit the emancipation of slaves without a provision for their deportation when emancipated.

The president has told us, that he was an advocate of the proposed negro emancipation law of 1830. That law did not pass. I beg leave to refer for a moment to that enactment.

"A bill more effectually to prevent the importation of slaves into the state as merchandise.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That none shall be slaves, except such as shall be slaves within this commonwealth on the first day of June next, and the descendants of the females of them, and such slaves as shall thereafter be lawfully imported into this commonwealth, and the descendants of the females of them.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That from and after the said first day of June, it shall not be lawful for any person, or persons, to import into this commonwealth any slave, or slaves, except emigrants to the state, bringing their slaves with them for their own use, and not for merchandise, and citizens of this state claiming slaves in another state, by devise, descent, or marriage; in all which cases, it shall be lawful for any such persons, to import such slaves for their own use, and not as merchandise.

"Sec. 3. All laws now in force, prohibiting the importation of slaves into this commonwealth, shall be, and the same are hereby repealed, from and after the said first day of June: Provided, That the provisions of this bill shall not apply to persons transiently passing through the commonwealth with slaves, on their way to any other state or country: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed, as to prevent persons emigrating to this state, and settling permanently in it, from selling their slaves."

The yeas and nays being demanded upon the question of engrossing it for a third reading, the name of the president of this convention (Mr. James Guthrie) is found among those voting in favor of the bill.

Now what would have been the effect of this act, had it gone into operation? Would it not have emancipated all the slaves that had been purchased for a valuable consideration by our citizens and brought within the state? I ask the President, if in this act of his, he was not invading the rights of my constituents, when he voted for this bill? He was. And when I looked at the names recorded in this journal I thought I stood "solitary and alone," in opposing this atrocious measure. But when I looked around I found my worthy friend from Monroe, (Mr. Barlow,) who voted with me against that bill. It has been my good fortune often to act with him, and I have found him about right, on all important questions. I was gratified to find that he was a delegate to this convention.

I said the President was invading the rights of my constituents in that vote of his, and I will thank the president, with the chairman and this committee, to accompany me to the state line, for the purpose of illustrating my views upon this subject.

Suppose that one of my constituents has gone to Tennessee—(many of them came originally from that state—and very good citizens they are—they make good Kentuckians—I would be glad of a thousand more, and I have no doubt my friend over the way from Graves would gladly receive as many more,)—to buy a servant to assist in the labors of their farm. I want them to have the right to do so. And to attempt to prevent them doing so is a flagrant violation of their constitutional rights. Now suppose one of them is bringing his servant across the line, and our president meets him, with this act in his hand, and says to him, you shall not bring your servant into this state, for if you do, I have assisted in passing a law which sets your negro free the moment he comes within the limits of Kentucky. This being heard by the negro, produces insubordination. My constituent, thus accosted, says, your law is a nullity; my right is secured to me by a higher power than your law, the constitution of your state; and here it is:

"The general assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owners, or without paying their owners, previous to such emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated."

Upon this guaranty in the constitution, regardless of this law which you have aided in passing, I demand my right to enter as a citizen of your state, and to bring with me such chattels as are held and esteemed property by the constitution, whether that property be in slaves or not.

The statute proposed by the president contemplated the emancipation of the slave without compensation; but my constituent says to him, when thus standing upon the line, I shall disregard your statute. I claim protection for my property, not under or by virtue of your law, but under the constitution, and though you declare by virtue of your law that my slave ceases to be property and becomes free whenever he crosses the line, the constitution, which I hold to be the paramount law of the land, and which must be co-extensive with law, secures me in the possession and property of my slave until just compensation shall have been made for him; and he will say to the president, while thus attempting to enforce the power of his statute, I stand by the guaranties of the constitution of my state; you propose to disregard those guaranties, and to set at defiance the fundamental law of the land—your law cannot be enforced—it is an infraction of the constitution—a direct invasion of my rights as a citizen of the commonwealth.

I understand the president has said that at one time the friends of the proposed act of 1830 abandoned it, because it might result in bringing into this state a great number of worthless slaves, to be emancipated and supported at the public charge, the owners having no further use for them, and choosing this manner to get rid of them. I was in the legislature, but never heard that reason assigned for the abandonment of that law. I do not dispute the president's word however. There was a very distinguished gentleman from old Logan, Judge Ewing, who raised his voice—and it was heard throughout the commonwealth—advocating the rights of the proslavery party, and this commonwealth is more indebted to him than to any other man for defeating that nefarious act. I heard him with pleasure; the advocates of the law were panic-stricken. Well, says the president, I don't want you to bring in any more slaves, we have got plenty. He was living in the blue grass region, where they could hire white laborers, who, when sick, could be turned out of doors to shift for themselves. The people in his region, while they could get such labor, did not want more slaves; they could invest their money more profitably in bank stocks, and other stocks, which pay enormous dividends—and in the erection of princely residences. Such persons needed no more slaves, and hence their representative, the president, was willing to proscribe my constituents; but I did not then tamely submit to the outrage, and will—so long as my voice can be heard—be found opposing such an iniquitous measure.

Now I call upon the common sense, the plain and thinking men of this convention—for I will not ask alone the judgment of the lawyer, with his nice distinction—his subtleties and his technicalities—to look fairly at the illustration of the law of the president, which I have presented, and say if it does not present the operation of that law fairly and justly; and if it was not an infraction of the constitution and an invasion of the rights of my constituents? Was not the president's voice raised in support of this law? Did he not override the constitution in voting for this act? And in response to his denunciation of those who dared differ with him here, I will say "I have no more confidence in those men" that have heretofore attempted "to invade the rights of their fellow citizens, than I have in the voice of the Autocrat of Russia."

The proposed act of 1830, was a concession, not only to the emancipationists, but to the abolitionists; because it was abolition in its grossest shape. The friends of this measure, I will not say retreated, but they fell back upon the act of 1833. What did they propose by that act? They proposed again to pass an act that conflicted with the constitution. The constitution gives the legislature the right to prohibit the importation of slaves as merchandise, and of course, and by the universally accepted rule of construction, the legislature has not the right to prohibit their introduction, for any other purpose. There is a large and respectable minority in Kentucky, who believe it to be unconstitutional, notwithstanding the appellate court has recognized its constitutionality; and another reason why I have reason to suppose it unconstitutional, the act remained a dead letter upon your statute book; for sixteen long years, it had no operation, except that it served to expel from Kentucky some of her best citizens. This was its effect. Whenever a man who had some influence, was instructed by his constituents, to obtain the passage of an act, permitting them to bring in slaves for their own use, it was done, and hundreds of slaves were imported in this way. I will call the attention of the committee to the fourth section of this celebrated act of 1833, commonly known as the negro law. The attention of the country was not called to the design of this law, it having been transferred to the digest, under the head of "Attorneys." The fourth section reads thus: "It shall be the duty of the attorneys for the commonwealth, now in office, at the first court after the passage of this act, and every other attorney for the commonwealth, who may be hereafter commissioned, at the time of taking the oath of office, to take a solemn oath, that they will faithfully prosecute all offenders, against this act, within their knowledge, or of which they may be informed, and who may be found within their respective districts, and in each case of conviction, the prosecuting attorney shall be entitled to a fee of twenty per cent. out of the amount collected, and the balance shall be paid into the public treasury, and set apart as a fund, to be under the direction of the governor, and such other or others as the legislature may appoint, for colonizing the free persons of color, on the coast of Africa." Now, sir, the country is to be taxed for sustaining courts of justice, whose time is to be devoted to the trial of such cases, and the commonwealth attorney, in addition to his regular salary, is to receive after being sworn to prosecute such cases, for fear he would not do it, twenty per cent. of the amount received as an additional inducement to prosecute.

I have said that many excellent citizens were driven out of the country, on account of the oppression of this act. Two of those cases are from my own county, and another was from the county of Livingston, now Crittenden county. The facts in the latter case, as I obtained them from a delegate, who is better informed upon the subject, are these:

"Richard Cruse in 1838 bought a family of negroes, seven in number—mother and six children. They had been hired out one year by a lady, removing from Tennessee to Illinois, and at the end of that year she came to him again, and Cruse bought them. He was maliciously indicted for it and had to leave the county. He did not even know at the time that such a law was on the statute books. He was worth about twenty or twenty five thousand dollars."

This old lady, I understand, was of the opinion that if she went to Illinois, with her servants, having an agreement with them that they would serve her, they would be bound to do so. She found she was mistaken, however, and hired them out in Livingston county. And let me state, that Mr. Cruse knew nothing about this statute of 1833, for it had lain on the statute book a dead letter for many years. Cruse designing to accumulate such property, struck a trade with the old lady, and gave her, I believe, $300 each for her family of slaves, taking old and young together, making a total of $2100. Some of Cruse's neighbors, who thought he had made a bargain to their detriment, informed against him, and he was therefore indicted. Finding he could not get relief, he abandoned his native state, and went to Missouri. What would have been the consequence if he had remained and defended the case? The fine was $4200, double the value of the negroes he had bought. The attorney getting $840 for his services, and the remainder of the fine, $3360 going into the treasury, but not to pay the interest on the state debt, not to defray the expenses of your courts of justice, but to be set apart for colonizing free persons of color, for colonizing the slaves that might be extorted from the good people of the state, to send them to the coast of Liberia, where an attempt has been made for many years to build up a colony, and where there are now some three or four thousand blacks in a state of wretchedness and starvation. You cannot get an intelligent negro to go there. I told one of my negroes, who has a wife and child that are free, he might go if he would take them with him and stay there. He consented to go, but could not be prevailed on to promise to stay. It was a splendid idea to give to the commonwealth's attorney $840, and to expend the other in colonizing those blacks, in that unhealthy region; you might as well consign them to the grave at once as to send them there.

There is another view that I have not heard advanced—though I do not mean to take credit for having made any very great discovery. We are now engaged in forming a constitution, and I would like to call the attention of the convention to the tenth article of the miscellaneous provisions of the present constitution. If it does not inhibit imposition of the fine specified in the act of 1833, I call on the convention to say what it does mean, it reads, "That the general, great, and essential principles of liberty and free government may be recognised, and established. We declare &c." Now turn your attention to the fifteenth section of this bill of rights, and we find, "that excessive bail, shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel punishment inflicted." And I believe the committee that has had this matter under consideration, have reported the same clause. What is its meaning? Its meaning is evident, excessive fines shall not be imposed. The framers of the constitution evidently intended to prohibit the legislature from passing any act by which excessive fines should be imposed. What is the object of a fine? Is it not to punish the individual for any injuries he may inflict on society, and to furnish a warning to those who are disposed to offend in like manner? But was it not intended by this provision, that the legislature should not have power to inflict a fine so exorbitant as to break a man up. Now what great sin was Cruse guilty of? He was merely endeavoring to better his condition, and to enable himself to extend his agricultural pursuits. He had committed no sin against his fellow citizens of Livingston county, nor against the commonwealth of Kentucky. If he had, it was not to the extent of $4200, and in this view of the case, if that clause of the constitution has any meaning at all, it is a prohibition upon the legislature.

Well sir, one of the most worthy citizens of Hickman county, a man who owned land in Missouri and Tennessee, as well as in Kentucky, and I believe had negroes employed in cultivating his lands in those different states, brought three negroes to Hickman county. And I have heard him say, he did not think he was violating this law in doing so—he was indicted however in three cases, and the fines would have been $1,800, and although he was able to pay it, he was indignant at such treatment, and left the country. I met him in New Orleans afterwards, and he enquired if the act had been modified. I told him it had not, and asked him if he would come again to Kentucky if it had been; he said he believed not, he was doing very well where he was. This was a most useful citizen; many young men owe their advancement to his assistance, and he was driven from this state by the operation of this law.

There was another case at Mills' Point. A very worthy citizen there, was in need of a few servants, and a man residing just over the line offered to sell him such as he wanted; he told him he could not purchase, as it would be in violation of the act of 1833. The man afterwards moved over into Hickman county, and then sold him the negroes, and then moved back. This raised a suspicion that there had been some combination. He was indicted, and I believe a fine of $1200 was imposed; however, the result was he left the county, and went to Tennessee. Now was not this an excessive fine, to extort from his earnings? I have regarded the population of Louisville, from the time this act was passed, as making concessions to the emancipationists. I had a conversation recently with citizens of Louisville, who told me, if the voting had been by ballot, the emancipation ticket would have been elected by 500 votes.

A case of this kind occurred whilst I was in the senate. A gentleman died in Tennessee leaving to two of his sons a negro; one of the sons resided in Fulton and the other in Tennessee. The one in Fulton, was able to buy his brother out; he wrote on to me asking me to get a law passed for the purpose of permitting him to bring the negro into the state. In the progress of the act I met with opposition from Jefferson county. I was somewhat astonished at this opposition, as it was a case of such evident justice, that the owner should have the privilege of bringing his negro into the state, being the owner of half of the negro, and there being no law to cover the case. This I thought was drawing a very nice distinction.

There are some two or three other topics, to which I will barely allude, for I fear that I am trespassing upon the indulgence of the committee. The subject of internal improvement and the subject of education. I concur with the president in the declaration which he here makes: "Upon the subject of internal improvement, which some men like to denounce, but which have in their effect more than doubled, or nearly doubled, the value of the whole of the real estate in the country, where did Louisville stand? She was in favor of them, and with her voice, and her aid and assistance, enabled them to be carried on." I know the great influence and power which the president of this convention exercised over the legislation of the country at that day; but, sir, whether it is for weal or for woe, I am disposed to adjourn the question for posterity to decide, for those who may have these debts to pay, with the interest that may have accumulated upon them. I raised my feeble voice against it; and I recollect on one occasion, in the senate, I stood with my friend from Henderson, in a lean minority of five, in opposition to the extravagant, wasteful system of internal improvement. The president says it has doubled the value of the property in the state. I deny the fact. It may have doubled the value of property in Louisville, but it has more than doubled, yes sir, it has trebled the taxes on the balance of the state, while the value of property has not been enhanced. What is the effect of the system? It is a system of injustice, calculated to build up the few at the expense of the many. What did the president of the board of internal improvement report to the legislature in 1847? That to the people navigating the Kentucky river, there was a saving of over $170,000 per annum; yet they were not willing to increase the tolls sufficiently to pay the interest on the cost of these improvements, though they were reaping more benefit than all the taxes they pay annually. When the surplus revenue of the general government was about to be distributed, $850,000 were set apart and solemnly dedicated and pledged as a fund for common school education. The president of this convention, I believe, advocated that feature, and in this he had my hearty co-operation; but when we were short of means to carry out the system of internal improvements, and the state bonds could not be disposed of, money was borrowed from the banks, which so increased their circulation, that brokers were enabled to make a rush upon the banks, which mainly caused the suspension in 1839, and this education fund was invested in state bonds. Well, it is true that the interest on these bonds belonging to education must be raised by taxation, and it has induced the legislature to violate a sacred, republican democratic principle. What has been done? You have resorted to your odious and specific taxation, which is unequal and unjust. You tax carriages, buggies, watches, and even our grandmother's spectacles, all this to resuscitate the credit of the state. How has this money been expended? $2,525,456 15 have been expended in turnpike roads. What has been the effect of this measure upon the country? There was a committee raised in 1847 to ascertain the amount that had been expended and the revenue that had been raised from that expenditure. Well, sir, these $2,525,456 15 have only yielded a dividend of $291,000, in the ten years previous to the date of the report. Now what is the interest of that sum for the same period of time? It is $1,515,000, leaving a deficiency of $1,224,000 to be supplied by taxation or otherwise. And the other improvements are in but little better condition. Take the whole amount that has been expended, viz: $5,344,764 82, it does not yield two per cent. interest. I have alluded to this matter out of no unkind feeling to the president. He has thought proper to allude to it himself, and has claimed the credit of having carried these measures through the legislature. I know he took a prominent part, and I know a portion of the delegation from my section favored it, and for what reason? Because they had the promise of a small appropriation of $5,000 for the improvement of Bayou de Chien, and other small appropriations which were to rest upon certain contingencies. The board of internal improvement decided that Bayou de Chien ought to have $3,000; but not a dollar has yet been expended. The same bill that contained this conditional appropriation gave to the Louisville, Lexington and Ohio railroad company, $200,000 unconditionally, which she received. There was an appropriation to this company besides of $20,000 for building a bridge across Kentucky river, at the mouth of Benson. The state also endorsed for the company to the amount of $150,000, and, after all this, the only manner in which she could get out of the contract, was by taxing her citizens and paying up.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, was the state almost hopelessly involved in debt, and thus was the fund set apart, and with all the forms of law and the solemnity of legislative action, dedicated and set apart to the children of this commonwealth, squandered in unproductive works—and, sir, the president of this convention was one of the chief actors in that scene—he was among the foremost in concocting and executing this misapplication of the fund dedicated to the poor children of the commonwealth. He it was that invaded the rights of the orphan and the fatherless, and swept from them the means which the state had provided for their education.

I take the ground that it was improper, thus to squander the poor children's money—that it was an unwise, an injudicious act, thus in a conflict between the education of the children of the state and the improvement of roads and rivers, to choose the latter to the exclusion of the former. I also believe it was improper and unjust to impose upon posterity the enormous debt created by the president (Mr. Guthrie) and those who acted with him, for internal improvements. I was unwilling to create a large state debt, and leave it for those who come after us to bear the burden.

Take the amount that was expended on Licking river—$372,520 70—and tell me how much this has benefitted the state? I am informed that so far as improvement is concerned, the money there expended might as well have been thrown in the river. The work has been abandoned in an unfinished state, and amounts to an obstruction.

This is the system of internal improvement, which the honorable president boasts of having been instrumental in adopting.

Although the constituents of the honorable president may have approved his course on all these questions, yet I have also the satisfaction of knowing that my constituents regard my course as worthy of their approbation, for they have continued me in the councils of the country for many years, as long perhaps as any man in the state, for which I take the present occasion to return them my sincere acknowledgments. I have never appealed to them on questions of national policy, although in that respect my opinions have harmonized with them.

I have felt it my duty to make these remarks, for I have hitherto taken no part in this discussion during the seven long weeks we have been in session. I have made a motion or two, and have said yea or nay when called upon to vote. That is all. My constituents are beginning to enquire what has become of me, and I desire that they shall know where I am. I am somewhat like a very intelligent gentleman, (the delegate from Mercer,) with whom I fell in company a few days since, and who has not as yet I believe addressed the convention. I enquired of him the reason for his silence. And sir, he gave me a very good reason. It is the very same reason by which I have been influenced myself. Why, said he, I came here with my opinions formed, in regard to the leading questions; there has been a good deal of discussion, and the country will hold the convention responsible for these protracted debates, and I thought I would not take the responsibility of participating in them. That was precisely my own view. When we come to put this constitution together section by section, I intended to aid in the accomplishment of the great work for which we have assembled. I shall at all events, not detain the convention long with any speeches of mine. If I deserve anything for my course in legislating heretofore, it is not for making long speeches. I am not much for talking, but I am somewhat inclined to investigation; I am governed a great deal by facts. One fact, with me, outweighs whole volumes of arguments.

The honorable president has said that Louisville has done a great deal for education. I am not disposed to take from that city any credit she may have on that score. I believe she has done much for the support of schools. But we find by the report of the 2nd Auditor that the city of Louisville has received $7,597, besides $13,500 for the Blind School. Thus, it will be seen, that Louisville has received more than one half the sum expended—considerably more than double her share of the school fund. I never supposed that she had been slighted in regard to this school fund, or in any way. I remember when we were about fixing the salaries of the officers of government, the Louisville judges were allowed $1,500 per annum, salary, while other judges were allowed but $1,200. That was based upon the ground that living was very high in Louisville. I believe it is a maxim, that when the reason for a law ceases, the law itself should cease. I have an extract from the "Louisville Journal," of date September 25th, and I was very much gratified to find the price of living so much reduced there. Now, as this paper is very good authority in Kentucky, I would recommend the committee to amend their report in relation to salaries of judges, and make them equal and uniform throughout the commonwealth. But the extract:

"As to the cost of living, those who know anything about the matter, know that living is as cheap in Louisville as in Frankfort. Fuel and provisions are decidedly cheaper."

I am very glad to know that. I hope the "Journal" will not come down upon me, as a paper did the other day upon my friend from Daviess, (Mr. Triplett,) because he dared to oppose what was demanded for Louisville. He was spoken of in very disrespectful terms. I have no desire to war with an editor, because gentlemen of that profession wield their pens with great force and severity, and the paper is sent to places where a man has no opportunity to defend himself. They can bark at my heels if they choose, it shall never deter me from doing my duty.

This proposition, it is said, is intended to array city and country interests in opposition to each other. This is no part of my motive. I have no hostility to any city in the commonwealth. But the question is, is it right and proper that we should impose this restriction? The patriots who formed the constitution of 1799, thought it necessary to impose such restriction—many of the states have done the same. Louisiana has done so; although New Orleans contains one-third of the whole population of the state, and will, probably, soon contain one-half, yet she is restricted to four senators. Is that invading their rights? Did we hear the delegates from that city make the declaration that they would not sustain the constitution if it contained such a provision? Did they take any such stand? And here follows another restriction: "That the seat of government shall, until the close of the year 1848, continue at New Orleans, and that the general assembly which shall meet after the first election of representatives, shall within the first month after the commencement of the session, designate and fix the seat of government at some place not less than sixty miles from the city of New Orleans, by the nearest travelling route, and if on the Mississippi river by the meanders of the same; and when so fixed, it shall not be removed without the consent of four-fifths of the members of both houses of the general assembly." And this restriction was, no doubt, imposed for wise purposes, and cheerfully acquiesced in by her patriotic citizens.

The honorable president says we are sworn to do justice. He says the foundations of government were laid in justice. This is what no one is inclined to dispute. We are all contending for the same principle. As the Irishman said when about to be tried for his life—a very honest fellow—but he did not understand the technicalities of the law; when the question was put to him "guilty or not guilty," he replied "that is what you are about to try." Now we want to examine the question. This is a great conservative principle. We give to all cities, their free representation in the popular branch of the legislature. It is very properly based on population in that department, either according to the ratio of voters, or according to the whole number of souls—and I am inclined to think, the latter is the best mode. But the president says we are invading the rights of Louisville. If she falls under the restriction, that is her misfortune. I came here to do justice, but where a question comes up in which city interests are arrayed against those of the country, I am always to be found on the side of the country. It is the country that sustains the city. The city is sustained by her trade. And what is it that sustains that trade? The rural population. Your wealth arises from your imports and your exports. The country furnishes your exports and consumes your imports. I am disposed to do injustice to no city, but self preservation is the first law of nature. But I shall not be influenced by any supposed power the emancipationists may gain by an increased representation, and I regret that the subject was introduced.

I will not cast any imputation upon cities. But if you want to find industry, contentment, virtue and morality, will you go to a city to find them? If you do, you will be mistaken. To sustain this position, I will call the attention of the committee to a few facts. It appears that in 1847, there were one hundred and sixty six convicts in our penitentiary, seventy nine of them were from the city of Louisville—almost one-half of them. And for the twelve years beginning in 1835 up to 1847, there have been sentenced from the various towns and cities in the commonwealth, eight hundred and eight convicts, and how do you think they are apportioned? The city of Louisville sent three hundred and fifty six, averaging a fraction over twenty nine per annum. In the whole of the balance of the state, the convictions were but forty six per annum—not averaging one for two counties. It is said that these convicts are not of the legitimate population of Louisville. This I believe is true. But it only sustains me in the position I took, that there is something to induce persons to commit crimes and felonies in cities. It seems to show that crime is stalking abroad there, at noonday. Look at the mobs that have committed violence in almost every city in the union. Not long since a mob took possession of a church in the city of Pittsburgh; the mayor was compelled to call out the military to stop it.

I wish it to be distinctly understood that I am making no invidious distinction to the prejudice of Louisville in particular. I merely mention these facts to show that a great deal of crime is perpetrated in cities, and for the proof of this, I have written testimony. Is it proper then, that this character of population should be trusted with the representation there is demanded for it?

Having labored under severe indisposition for several days, I must bring my remarks to a close. And here I wish to be distinctly understood, that in any allusion I have made to the honorable president of this convention, I have not been actuated by any ill will towards him, but as he has thought proper in some degree to impugn the motives of myself and others, because we are in favor of restricting over-grown cities, I have thought it necessary to make these remarks. I have the utmost respect for his authority in the chair; but when he chooses to come down on the floor, and give admonition and advice to delegates, and make threats, I regard him as no more than any other delegate, and he must not expect exclusive privileges. I do not intend that the little reputation I may have gained during my political course, shall be destroyed by the denunciations of any man. It may be all the legacy I shall have to leave my children, and I intend that to go to them untarnished, if my feeble efforts can sustain it.

I return my sincere thanks to the committee for the kind attention they have given my desultory remarks.

And then, on motion of Mr. MITCHELL, the committee rose and reported the article and amendments to the house.

The first amendment of the committee, fixing the hours during which the polls should be opened, at from 6, a. m., to 7, p. m., was then read.

Mr. MACHEN understood the amendment not positively to require the polls to be opened and closed at those hours, and inquired if such was the intention of the mover.

Mr. WOODSON. I intended to leave it entirely at the discretion of the judges of the election. There may be instances where it may be required to open at an earlier hour in the morning than others, and others where a later hour of closing them might be deemed necessary. The only object was to prevent the polls from being kept open until too late an hour of night, and to prevent voters being then brought in improperly to control the election.

There was some conversation as to the propriety of amending the section, when

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE expressed his opinion that the subject could better be disposed of in a separate clause, which should have the effect to require that in all elections the polls should not be opened before six, nor continued open after seven.

The section, as amended in committee, was then adopted.

The second amendment, being to strike out the words in the second line of the 5th section, "and equal," was concurred in.

The third amendment, being to the same section, to strike out the word "legislature" and insert in lieu thereof the words "general assembly," was concurred in.

The fourth amendment, being a verbal one to the section apportioning the representation of cities, was then concurred in.

Mr. IRWIN then offered his proposition, submitted this morning, as a substitute for the whole section.

The PRESIDENT decided that motions to amend and perfect the section, would have precedence over those to strike out.

Mr. MORRIS then proposed his proposition, (heretofore published,) as an additional clause of the section.

Mr. HARDIN. I desire to offer an amendment, which will not be in order until the vote is taken on that of the gentleman from Christian. I would ask that gentleman what he intends by it, not having heard the reasons assigned for it at the time it was first offered. Is it to establish in this part of the country, that principle known in New England as gerrymandering? Take for instance Nelson county, which is now entitled to two members. It gives 700 whig majority, but yet you can lay off the county in such a way that its representation will be equally divided. That was the principle established in New England by Eldridge Gerry, and from him has since been called gerrymandering. I understand that the gentleman's proposition is to lay off Louisville so that, although there is a whig majority there of 400 or 500 votes, yet that there will be one or two democratic members returned to the legislature. I do not know whether such was the intention of the gentleman, but such obviously will be its effect. Let the whole voice of the city or county be heard, whatever may be its representation, and not be divided. I am informed that the proposition was offered as a compromise. Now a compromise supposes a mutual yielding, but in this case it seems to me that the yielding is all on one side.

Mr. MORRIS. When I offered this amendment, I explained to the convention, the motives which influenced me, and I also stated the grounds upon which I considered it a compromise. I am sorry that my venerable friend was not in the house to hear me, but I have no disposition to go over the ground I then occupied, and with which I suppose the convention to be generally acquainted. I had no disposition to gerrymander Louisville, or any other city in the state. The great difficulty was, how we could give to Louisville, and the other cities, a proper representation according to numbers, and at the same time prevent that concentration of city influence, which seemed so much to be apprehended by gentlemen on this floor. I thought there was a great principle which was established in the old constitution, and which we are seeking to establish in this—that representation and popular numbers should go hand in hand. But I still saw and felt that there were great dangers to be apprehended, of the power that might be exercised by the concentration in the legislative halls of the representation of the large cities that were springing up, and believing it to have been demonstrated by experience in other states, that by dividing the cities into districts, we would divide the representation of those cities against themselves, as the country representation in this state is divided against itself, I offered this proposition. I am aware that a democratic legislature by an unjust system of gerrymandering might send to the legislature from Louisville, two or three democrats instead of whigs, but yet we are obliged to trust something to the legislature. I have already, most emphatically, on the day before yesterday, expressed that I was not governed by party views, and I am sorry the gentleman was not here, to hear my vindication on this point.

Mr. IRWIN. The whole point here is this, the gentlemen from Louisville desire an equal senatorial representation with the rest of the state. Now, in the proposition I present, I say she shall have but one senator; and gentlemen who prefer "two" can move to strike out, and so insert, or if the gentleman from Louisville will move to strike out "one" and insert "equal" then the question on each of these propositions can be presented at once, and the convention come to a speedy determination.

The PRESIDENT stated the amendment of Mr. Morris to be first in order.

Mr. MORRIS. I withdraw my amendment, so that the vote can be taken on the proposition of the gentleman.

The question was then stated to be on Mr. IRWIN'S proposition which was then formally offered.

Mr. PRESTON. For myself, I intend to stand by the fifth section, simply because it declares that equal representation shall be allowed to the cities, in both houses of the general assembly. I prefer that the house should test the question by standing by the report of the committee.

Mr. IRWIN. I will amend the proposition so as to leave the number blank, and gentlemen can fill it as they desire.

Mr. MERRIWETHER. I apprehend the whole question to be, whether we shall or shall not place restrictions on cities. I beg leave to suggest to the convention that there is a restriction existing now, and which will exist, even if the section is passed, as reported by the committee, which will effectually protect the balance from all danger from the increase of Louisville. The present boundaries of that city, if as compactly settled as is possible, can never accommodate, at the furthest, more than 100,000 people, and those boundaries are restricted by law. The legislature will have it in their power, if deemed necessary to restrict her influence, by refusing to extend those limits; therefore let the section stand as it is.

Mr. CLARKE desired to offer his amendment proposed in committee.

The PRESIDENT ruled it out of order, while the present amendments were pending.

Mr. BROWN. I believe the friends of the section have a right to amend, and perfect it, before action is had upon a substitute. I make the same motion made in committee by the gentleman from Franklin, (Mr. Lindsey,) to strike out the words "both houses of the general assembly." If this amendment prevails, it allows the city her full representation, based on numbers, in the house. So far as representation in the senate is concerned, that can be provided for afterwards.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. PRESTON. This amendment goes a little further than any I have seen yet. There have been many propositions, either from those friendly or hostile to the city, some to give one, and some two senators to Louisville. To all of these I am opposed. I am in favor of the section as it stands. But the gentleman goes further still, and proposes to cut us off from any senator at all, leaving it precisely as we were under the old constitution. The amendment to give the city any senatorial representation at all may not be adopted, and it is for that reason I think the amendment of the gentleman from Hardin, (Mr. Brown,) goes further than any yet offered. I appreciate the compromise offered by the gentleman from Christian, for it was offered when we needed aid, but I still have confidence in the justice of the convention. I believe it is not going to compound a debt of justice, or mete out to us by instalments, our rights. I believe it intends to pass the section as it stands, and to give us our full representation in the upper house. I never will believe this convention will compromise a principle of justice, until I see the act consummated. We want no compromise. We claim it as a right, which I believe the house will accord to us.

Mr. BROWN. The gentleman has not correctly represented the ground I occupy. My object is not to deprive the city of all representation in the senate; but to go for some restriction. I am willing to go for one senator to the cities, and as I said before, the effect of the amendment is not to cut them off from all representation in the senate. I intend at a proper time, if no other gentleman does, if this amendment is adopted, to offer another, which will secure to cities one senator. As to what is right and just, I intend to be governed by my convictions, and the dictates of my own judgment, regardless of all imputations which may be made against me.

Mr. W. JOHNSON. I shall vote to strike out, because I want some kind of restriction. These who go with my friends from Louisville, will vote against striking out.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I shall vote against striking out, and I mean to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Christian, if he renews it; if not, I will renew it, or something like it, myself. I cannot understand why it is that gentlemen will give unlimited representation in one branch to the cities, and restrict it as to the other. When it is acknowledged that in both, representation is based on numbers, you are but doing half the business if you restrict it in one and not the other. To my mind, there is more reason for the restriction in the popular than in the upper branch; for it is the number of representatives that is to control. If the amendment of the gentleman from Christian is not adopted, then I shall vote for some other restriction as to the representation of numbers from the city.

Mr. HARDIN. I have gone over the census of the United States, for the years 1820, 1830, and 1840, and over the list of voters as they have been returned. I find that when representation was to be apportioned, in 1843, Jefferson county, including the city of Louisville, returned 5398 voters. In 1847, when the next apportionment was made, she had 6799, and yet in 1848, when there was no apportionment to be made, the returns showed but 5076. This year, when it was known that some change was to be made, it ran up to 9283. Now, what does all this prove? Why, that the commissioners, when any thing is to be done, include the itinerant men who are not residents of Louisville. Go back for twenty years, and it would be found that whenever there was an apportionment to be made, there was a remarkable increase, and whenever there was not, an equally remarkable falling off. The reason is, that the commissioners know what is to be done, and they will take in men who, in reality, are not qualified voters. The other cities present the same facts, but not to the same extent. It is a matter of importance, therefore, that we should put a limit upon the representation of these cities. I would propose that it should never exceed five in the house, nor more than one in the senate. Louisville, or any other city, would then have a very full representation in the legislature. Representation meant the power to present their wishes, wants, and grievances; and was not five in one house and one in the other enough for this purpose? There were counties—Bullitt and Spencer, for example—in regard to which it was a matter of great doubt whether the next apportionment would entitle them to a representative at all, and they will go to Louisville to swell her representation, when she would, as I have shown, be sufficiently represented without it. And I have shown, too, how the basis of representation in the cities is run up just before an apportionment is to be made. It is, as we know, a city of great influence in the state. There always was a town which stood as the metropolis of every state, and that town is the one to which our exports go, and our imports come; and from this and other causes, it has an immense influence upon the legislation of the country. It is the point to which all news is brought, and the newspapers themselves give it a great and undue influence. I shall vote for limiting Louisville to one senator and five representatives, and that is giving them much more than they would have under the present constitution. And it seems to me, so far from being an act of injustice, that every requirement of justice would be complied with.

Mr. GRAY. I shall vote against the motion of the gentleman from Hardin. Whether so intended or not, the effect, it seems to me, will be to deprive the cities of their fair representation in the senate. We see it in our old constitution, and in this report, laid down as a principle that representation should be equal and uniform throughout the state, and forever to be based on the number of qualified voters therein. If that principle is a correct one, and should occupy a place in this constitution, then every portion of this commonwealth should be operated upon by it. Every gentleman here, I believe, except the gentleman from Franklin, has declared that representation should be on population, or the qualified voters, which is the same thing in principle. In New York, negroes not subject to taxation, and aliens, were excluded from the basis of representation, as they were also excluded from voting and participating in the government. In this state, also, slaves were not represented, and the basis was the number of qualified voters, and they act as the trustees of the community at large in selecting the men to represent them. If this is a correct principle—and all say that it is—what is the apology offered here for departing from it? I have heard none. When brought down to a nutshell, the whole apology amounts to this, that it will be entrusting too much power to a particular locality. The principle of self-preservation, I am aware, ought to be guarded in all republican governments, and it is proper that the majority should not be entrusted with the power to oppress and override the minority, but I ask, where is the proper place to guard against it? Here in the formation of the organic law, we have the right, for the protection of that minority, to impose restrictions on the majority. Is there any right more sacred than that of suffrage, or which the minority desire more strongly to be secured to them? But gentlemen say that they do not propose to deprive the cities of the right of suffrage but merely to restrict their representation. Does it not amount to the same thing in principle? It is to say to one hundred thousand voters, if you live in the city you shall vote for but one senator, but if you live in the country, you may vote for five or six. It amounts to the same thing according to my idea. And the only apology offered for this, is the desire to protect ourselves. I contend it will never have that effect. Place in this constitution all the rights that are dear to us as citizens, and which ought to be protected, and then take it away from the power of the majority of the legislature—for there the power is exercised—to infringe upon those rights. There is the place to put this restriction. Another apology offered for the violation of this great principle is, that it is done by other states. But are gentlemen willing to adopt other errors which those states have engrafted into their organic law? They are not. The gentleman from Caldwell, who offered this apology for the violation of this great principle, referred to the constitutions of many of the states for this purpose. In Virginia, east of the mountains, they have nineteen, and west of them never but thirteen senators. There is this principle violated there, and for what reason? Would the gentleman from Caldwell ever be willing that the Green river county should be placed under a similar restriction as compared to the rest of the state? This restriction was laid on western Virginia, because the eastern section, with its population and wealth, had the power to do it. But was it an exercise of power which gentlemen could justify upon principle before their constituency? I contend it is not. Another apology is, that it would not be depriving the cities of any rights which they enjoyed under the old constitution. When that constitution was formed, was any community at that time thus restricted? No sir; our fathers at that time saw no city in the state that was entitled to a separate representation, and that there probably would not be until the people in their wisdom saw fit to change the constitution. I believe Louisville at that time contained only about five or six hundred inhabitants. In 1810, eleven years thereafter, she had only thirteen hundred. Therefore, no question of this sort was agitated by the framers of the present constitution. And the very principle they have there declared, of representation upon population, is in contradiction of such a proposition. My friend from Hickman knows that ever since Louisville has been entitled to a senatorial representation, the legislature have seen the injustice of her being deprived of it, and by way of compensation, they have given to Bullitt and Spencer, where they are not, from the number of their voters—some twenty-three or twenty-four hundred—entitled to a senator between them. They are counties adjacent to Louisville and Jefferson, where they do not get their fair and just proportion upon the principle laid down in the constitution. I hope the principle of representation according to population will govern, and it must always in this state, where the people are in favor of equal rights and privileges. And all the feelings of the people of the country, so far as I understand them, have been against any such propositions for restriction, as have been here proposed. Then, sir, I am opposed to striking out, and in favor of the section as it stands.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out, and it was rejected—yeas 38, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS.—John L. Ballinger, Wm. K. Bowling, Thomas D. Brown, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, William Cowper, Garrett Davis, James Dudley, Milford Elliott, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, Mark E. Huston, James W. Irwin, Thomas James, William Johnson, Thomas W. Lisle, Willis B. Machen, Richard L. Stoner, John J. Thurman, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John Wheeler—38.

NAYS.—Mr. President, (Guthrie.) Richard Apperson, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, Charles Chambers, Wm. Chenault, Benjamin Copelin, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Alfred M. Jackson, George W. Johnston, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, George W. Mansfield, Martin P. Marshall, Wm. C. Stevenson, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John L. Waller, Andrew S.

White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robt. N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—50.

Mr. BROWN then proposed to amend the 5th section by adding the words, "and no city or town shall ever have more than one senator."

Mr. McHENRY moved to amend the amendment by striking out the word town, and inserting county, and by adding the words, "nor more than five representatives."

A division was called for, so that the question could be taken separately on each proposition.

Mr. McHENRY. I will then offer but one, and move to strike out "town" and insert "county."

Mr. BROWN accepted that amendment.

Mr. McHENRY then moved to add, "nor more than five representatives."

Mr. TRIPLETT. I would suggest to my friend from Ohio to permit us to vote, if it can be done, upon these amendments severally. There are several delegates who are for restricting the cities, and who believe it to be not only within the scope of, but demanded by considerations of justice. The delegates from Louisville have a right to act upon a standard of justice they may establish for themselves, but they have no right to attempt to erect one for the balance of the state, or to denounce the object which delegates wish to attain, as unjust or improper. Talk to me about a sense of justice. Do you not protect yourselves when it comes to the taxing power? Do you desire to permit vagrants and vagabonds to vote to tax the property of Louisville? All that I ask, is, that we of the rural districts should be permitted by the same standard of justice to protect ourselves, should our interests ever come in contact with those of Louisville or any of the other cities. I want—and I believe a majority of the delegates here are willing to go for it—the power to protect ourselves against high taxation, if ever that question should come before the legislature, as come it must. You tell me, and tell me truly, that to some extent, railroads, canals, and turnpikes, wherever they may lead, benefit the district through which they may run. But they are benefited to but a small extent, compared with the point at which they terminate, and this is generally Louisville. I am for a more equal division. All the tracks go into the lion's den, and few, very few, come out again. And it is necessary that there should be one conservative branch of the legislature where the property of the rural districts may be protected from excessive taxation for the benefit of these cities, or even of particular rural districts. This view has been well presented by my friend from Hickman, (Mr. James.) The Green river and Kentucky river improvements were, to some extent, beneficial to the people in their vicinity, but they were much more so to the cities, while to other portions of the state they realized nothing but taxation. And we desire that there should be one branch of the legislature which will guard us against this overwhelming influence of the cities when they shall attain their full strength, and the taxation which their desire for internal improvements for their benefit may entail upon us. It is for these reasons, together with others that I stated the other day, that I advocate these restrictions upon their representation. It is with us a principle of self-preservation.

Mr. TAYLOR. If any apology be necessary for my addressing the convention now, it is to be found in the fact (and I will use no stronger term, and to some extent it is almost too strong,) that an unkind and ungenerous act is sought to be perpetrated upon the cities of this commonwealth, in one of which I have the pleasure to reside. It is an unjust and unkind attempt, upon the part of the delegates from the rural districts of the state, to array them in positive and deadly hostility to the cities in this commonwealth. It has been beautifully and aptly said, that "man made the town, but God made the country." But some gentlemen seem to argue upon the principle, that while God made the man who resides in the rural districts, the old gentleman who lives below, and who seems a saint when most he plays the devil, made all of us whose lot is cast in the cities of this commonwealth. And I will venture to say, that if a stranger had come into this convention during the pending of this question in respect to city representation, and had not known it was a body organized for the purpose of making a new organic law for the state, he would have thought that the presiding officer was a judge, and my friends around me a jury, and that an action of assumpsit had been brought against Louisville for money paid, laid out, and expended for her use. Time after time have the statistics been summed up and paraded here, and gentlemen have enquired what has Louisville got, rather than to what she is entitled. All admit, that population is the true, just, and proper basis of representation, and we are for its liberal application to the rural districts, and yet desire to withhold it from the cities. I ask gentlemen upon what just principles can they give full representation, according to numbers, to the former and deny it to the latter? And this question will be asked with much more significance by the people. If Louisville should have a population of one hundred thousand, why is it that she is to be entitled to but one senator? The people will certainly ask for a bill of particulars—for the reasons for this unjust treatment of their urban fellow citizens. Has it come to this, that the right to be fully and fairly represented in the legislature, depends upon the venue of the voter? So long as a citizen resides in the country, he is entitled to a fair and full representation in the legislature; but if operated upon by motives of convenience or interest, he moves into Louisville, or any other city entitled to separate representation, that moment he is stripped of a large portion of his political and social influence and power.

Is this right? Is there any good reason for this condition of things? It is true, we are told that Louisville is strongly represented in the penitentiary. So she may be—'tis her and our misfortune that such is the case. We are told, also, that she has her internal improvements—her railroads and turnpikes, all conferring upon her positive benefit, and imparting to her great influence. Be it so. Do these works confer no benefit upon the country through which they pass? They were constructed as much for the benefit of the whole state as for Louisville.

The interests of commerce required they should terminate at some point on the Ohio river, and because they terminate at Louisville, they are to be pleaded as a set-off to her claims to a proper and just representation in the legislative halls of the state. Is it not one of the objects of all constitutions to prevent partial legislation? Is there any thing to which the people had a stronger repugnance than to partial legislation? And yet it is proposed to embody in the organic law a principle which would deny to your fellow citizens—because they reside in a particular district—their proper political rights and influence. For my own part, I mean to vote for the principle that population is the true basis of representation, to the correctness of which every gentleman here almost has borne testimony. I care not how it works, it is just in itself; and I mean, so far as my action is concerned, to incorporate in this constitution no principle that is not just in itself. The judge who asks himself, when about to render a decision, what will be its popularity, by that very question he puts to himself, he has already soiled the judicial ermine with which the confidence of the people has invested him. And the man in this convention, I care not who he is, who asks himself whether an apportionment is to operate to the benefit of one party or the other, has already exhibited his unfitness for the discharge of the responsible duties his constituents have confided to him. In this great work in which we are now engaged, I thank God that we are all whigs and all democrats—(or ought to be.)

There is a beautiful allegory I once read, of a good and just man who pursuing a long journey, and every night he laid down with hope and confidence in his heart and prayer and thanksgiving upon his lips, he found himself in the morning surrounded with a tent to shelter and protect, the work and providence of a kind hearted and benevolent fairy. I mean to vote that population is the true and just basis of representation, and when I vote for the incorporation in this constitution of principles which by their inherent justice commend themselves to my confidence and support, I shall have the cheering assurance that it will be to us all indeed a fairy tent which will be over and around us whithersoever we may go, or wherever our lot may be cast. I do not stop to enquire what party influence any principle here proposed may have, or whether it will extend the influence of this or that section of the state, but is it just and right in itself? I mean to act upon the maxim so pertinently cited a few days ago by my venerable friend from Harrison, (Col. Newell,) "equal rights to all, exclusive privileges to none." When I see gentlemen, in reference to this demand for equal representation, guilty of special pleading, attempting to excite the prejudices of one portion of the community against another, I put at once upon it the seal of my condemnation, and I will go for no principle which requires to be strengthened by such appeals. I in part represent a city, one which has not set up for housekeeping as yet, but the time may come, and I hope it is not far distant, when she will so do. And when that time does come, I want her to have as many representatives, both in the senate and house, as her population will entitle her to. I care not where a man lives, whether in the city or the country, if he is a citizen of this commonwealth, as such, he is entitled to equal, just, and fair representation in the legislative halls of the state. This thing of making fish of one and fowl of another may do in the legislature of the country, but not here, and I shall therefore vote against the restriction proposed in the amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERS. The county which I have the honor to represent, contains within its borders no city or large town, nor is it probable that it ever will have one entitled to a separate representation, yet I shall vote against all restrictive amendments to the fifth section, and for a fair and equal apportionment, applicable alike to town and country. These restrictions and distinctions are not only unjust towards the inhabitants of our larger towns and cities, but to my mind they are a violation of one of the first principles of our government, the political equality of freemen.

I can perceive no good reason why the same man, when he may chance to reside in a town or city, should possess less political weight and consequence than when he lives in the country, nor why the inhabitants of cities should be restricted beyond those of the country—they are all citizens of Kentucky, and, so far as I can see, entitled to equal representation. But I forbear to press my views further than to say I fully concur in the remarks made by the gentleman from Mason.

The convention then took a recess until 3 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. RUDD read the following amendment as one which he intended to offer when the proper time should arrive. He would submit it as a compromise for the settlement of the question which occupied the attention of the convention. There were fears expressed of the concentrated influence of the city of Louisville, but he apprehended they would be diminished and their cause removed by the adoption of his amendment, which was in these words:

"That whenever any city is entitled to four representatives, it shall be divided into two wards, or districts; and when it is entitled to five or more representatives, it shall be divided into single elective districts; and whenever it is entitled to two or more senators, it shall be laid off into senatorial districts."

Mr. HARGIS, after recapitulating the positions which different gentlemen had taken on this question, re-stated the population of the cities of Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New Orleans, and the several districts into which they are divided. He also again noticed the division of the state of Virginia, and pointed to these facts as examples for the convention.

After a few words from Mr. MERIWETHER, the vote was taken on the pending amendment, to add to the 5th section the words, "no city or county shall ever have more than one senator," which was rejected; yeas 31, nays 60.

Waller, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—60.

Mr. TRIPLETT offered the following amendment, to be added to the section:

That the cities now incorporated, or which may hereafter be incorporated in this commonwealth, and to which a senator or senators may be allotted, shall not, together, under any future apportionment, be entitled to more than one fourth of the whole number of senators; and when ever, under any future apportionment, the whole number of senators to which said cities would be entitled, shall exceed one fourth of the whole number of senators for the whole state, the legislature shall apportion the one fourth of the whole number of senators among the cities entitled, according to some just and equitable mode of apportionment; and provided that no city shall ever be entitled to more than two senators.

The amendment was rejected; yeas 41, nays 49, as follows:

Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Ninian E. Grey, James P. Hamilton, Vincent S. Hay, William Hendrix, Geo. W. Johnston, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Geo. W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, William C. Marshall, David Meriwether, Wm. D. Mitchell, Thos. P. Moore, John D. Morris, Hugh Newell, William Preston, John T. Robinson, Ira Root, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, George W. Williams, Silas Woodson, Wesley J. Wright—49.

Mr. JACKSON offered an amendment, but the President ruled it out of order, as being in substance an amendment which had been voted down.

Mr. RUDD offered the amendment to which he had just called the attention of the convention.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE suggested to the gentleman from Louisville to strike out the words "the city of Louisville" and insert "any city."

Mr. RUDD assented, and so amended his amendment.

Mr. IRWIN remarked that if cities could be gerrymandered, he could not see why counties could not be gerrymandered also. He understood the object which gentlemen had in view was to avoid the concentrated influence of cities, but he suggested that counties also could have their concentrated influence.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE asked the gentleman from Logan to be good enough to express his opinion as a representative on this floor, whether any county, with the limited number of one hundred representatives in the legislature, would be entitled to four representatives.

Mr. IRWIN replied that such a case might arise.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE said when such a case should arise, he would vote for it.

Mr. GRAY. I cannot conceive that this amendment is in effect a compromise. I think with my friend from Logan, and can see no reason why a city should be divided in her representation any more than a county. Gentlemen have argued a great deal about the power of these cities, from the concentration of a large number of citizens or representatives in one body. In what respect are we to apprehend danger from the action of these numbers? Is it from any general principle on which the cities will oppose the state at large? I think not. If I understand the objection, it is that there may be some private interests or views peculiar to the cities that would influence them, and cause them to unite together in advocating a single principle in which they would oppose the interests of the agricultural portion of the state. I ask if dividing up the city and allowing her a single representative from each locality, will weaken the force that she will have in the legislature? If there are interests peculiar to the city as opposed to the balance of the state, they will vote in a solid phalanx. I cannot see that dividing the cities is to do any good, or that this is any compromise at all. It can do no good unless it is to divide up the influence of the great political parties of the country, and on local questions they will unite. There is another objection to it. It provides for just what is provided for in the twelfth section.

Mr. BRADLEY offered the amendment of the gentleman from Christian. (Mr. Morris,) which has been heretofore published.

Mr. T. J. HOOD. When that resolution was first presented, it was attempted to make it palatable by calling it a compromise. I have not been able to see in it the idea of a compromise. A compromise is a mutual concession. What are the interests which are supposed to be arrayed against each other between the city and the country. They are the agricultural interest on the one part, and the commercial and manufacturing interests on the other. I see no concession on either part, nor the first feature of a compromise. I can well conceive how a conflict may spring up in the city in relation to municipal regulations, but when the interests of the whole city are opposed to those of the state, the city will be united. Suppose a work of internal improvement affecting the city is proposed, will the first ward oppose the second or third? Their interest is united in such a case, and no division will arise except with reference to local questions. If the city is to be divided, with a view to creating dissensions, why should not a county be divided for the same reason? On what principle is it that cities are to be divided and not counties? The object is said to be, to divide the concentrated power of cities in the legislature. Why not do it in the counties? I am opposed to the principle as applied to both.

Mr. RUDD. The gentleman asks, where has there been an example of a city being divided into wards or elective districts. We have examples throughout the United States. There is no city which has as many as four members, which is not divided into wards. New York has four senatorial districts. Philadelphia and New Orleans are likewise divided off in the same way. The object of my amendment is to approximate as nearly as possible to the present system of districting the counties. No county in Kentucky has more than two representatives. My amendment says, that when the city of Louisville is entitled to four, she shall be laid off into two districts; and when she has five, they shall be chosen in five separate wards. This will prevent their coming up here and speaking with one voice in your legislative halls. I think this is fair. We did not ask for more at first, than to have equality of rights, and perhaps this is equal and just.

Mr. PROCTOR. I shall be satisfied to leave this matter to the legislature, and thereby we shall relieve ourselves from the responsibility of incorporating such a provision in the constitution, and we shall not expose the constitution that we may make to the opposing interests that may, in consequence, be brought against it. I am willing that Louisville shall be districted when she knocks at the door of the legislature and asks for it.

Mr. CLARKE. I have been struck by the opinions expressed by gentlemen this evening. Some two or three days ago, this proposition offered by the gentleman from Christian, was very popular, and now a vote has been taken, to which I submit, which shows that the sense of the house is to give Louisville a representation based on popular numbers. It has been well said by the elder gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Rudd), that in every city in the United States, the rule proposed by him has been adopted, and there is not a single state, so far as I know, where they vote in a mass for senators or for representatives, where they are entitled to more than one. What the reason has been for this, I cannot tell, but it was argued the other day by the gentleman from Christian and the gentleman from Henderson, that as there were those who were afraid of the concentration of power from Louisville if she should send five or six members into the lower house, this was the best means of avoiding this concentration of power; and I confess that I see some reason in the suggestion. That it may have that effect permanently, I do not pretend to argue, but that it may by possibility prevent that concentration of influence and power which some gentlemen apprehend, there can be no good objection to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Christian or the one offered by the gentleman from Louisville. I hope that either the amendment or the substitute may be adopted.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was much astonished to hear gentlemen who are opposed to representation in Louisville according to numbers urging the impropriety of any such restriction, as has been proposed in these two amendments, and calling on members for some good reason why this restriction should be imposed. From what I have heard here, the unity of representation, the concentration of numbers within so small a space, was the great objection which was urged by those who were opposed to extending to Louisville a representation corresponding to her numbers.

The proposition now before us is to break the population up into separate political associations, and thus make their interests separate. It was said they would come up in solid phalanx, shield locked in shield. It was urged that there was an identity of purpose, and this would give them power. Now when it is proposed to break up this power into separate political associations, the very same gentlemen come here and seem to be opposed to it. You cannot convince me that one who represents ten thousand would have the same responsibilities and be governed by the same influences as one who represents fifteen hundred. Break them up then and you create separate political interests, you destroy that unity of representation which has constituted the great objection to giving Louisville what I conceive to be her due. I went for representation based on political numbers, for giving Louisville this representation, let the consequences be what they may. But I conceive she may be broken up in this way without doing her injustice. By dividing her into districts she will lose none of the strength to which she is entitled, and the objection which is urged is overcome. It has been said it would be better to leave the matter to the legislature. I would rather it should be passed as it is. I would not give it to a party in the legislature to district at one time and repeal at another, as party purposes might require. I want some fixed rule, and as I believe the amendment proposed will effect this I shall go for it.

Mr. PRESTON. I wish to state my position in reference to this matter, before I cast my vote. The house seems inclined to give the city of Louisville the same representative privileges that the report indicates. I announced this morning that I did not feel inclined to compromise that matter, and I feel assured, if the house were to adopt the amendment proposed by my friend and colleague, a gentleman whom I know desirous to harmonize the conflicting views of delegates, I believe, without effecting any great or material good, it would work, in some respects, an important injury to us. It would prescribe one mode of voting in Louisville, and another in the counties. It would declare the principle that it was necessary to cut up into wards and representative districts cities, when it was unnecessary to divide the counties into separate districts, and the consequence would be a great deal of domestic dissatisfaction. If we go back to our constituents after having put this principle in the new constitution, they will say, you have achieved no good by adopting the district system. You send us back to meet this injurious imputation everywhere. You, Mr. President, will be spoken of as having been in favor of the district system in the city, when the same rule did not prevail in the counties. After having gone in a body for those representative rights and privileges to which the cities are justly entitled, we are now to go back to meet a great many objections, to hear a great deal of cavil, and to furnish our enemies, and those of constitutional reform, with this weapon to assail us. And if we go back to our city, having obtained the equal rights of representation, we are enabled to give an aid, strength, and support to this constitution, which no opposition can possibly overcome. It is for this reason I must respectfully ask the house to pass the fifth section of the report as it stands. I know the worthy desire that actuates my colleague to allay this difficulty, but I believe if we pass the substitute, it will not be a source of strength to us, and there is no necessity of sending us back to Louisville to meet the storm of opposition which may await us there, and about a thing which amounts to nothing in itself. I am therefore, unwilling to accept any compromise.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. It will be remembered that the other evening I made a suggestion to the gentleman from Christian to modify his proposition, so as to relieve it from the attack which has been made, that we restrict the cities as we do not the counties. So far as I was concerned in announcing my determination to vote against all restrictions, and going for representation according to numbers, I yielded the difficulties that had been presented to my mind against this representation in solid masses. But I beg to be understood, that while I have voted against every species of restriction heretofore, I have not been deaf to what has been thrown out as to the possible danger of that description of representation. I scorn the imputation that I desire, or that those who act with me desire to change the local representation either from whig to democrat or from democrat to whig. Those who are familiar with the character of a city population, know that great changes are made by removing from one ward to another. The application for districting will come up as well from Covington as Louisville, and may operate differently there from what it may be supposed to do in Louisville. Now I could have hoped that those who are against concentration of power in small space, when the proposition to divide into districts was made, would have met it. I was prepared to do it. I will take either the original amendment or the substitute.

The PRESIDENT. If the convention will pardon me, I desire to make a statement. (Leave, leave.) I did desire that we should go on, in relation to the subject of representation, as we have gone heretofore. I consulted with both the gentlemen, and told the elder gentleman I would go with him in whatever course he might take. I would state that I prefer his amendment to that of the gentleman from Christian. If this is received there will be no division until her population entitles her to four representatives. If the population remains as it is, it will make no change probably in the present condition of parties, and as I did not come here to gain political advantages, I prefer that amendment; but if the convention deem it essential to district the city, I yield to that wish.

Mr. TURNER. I wish to make a statement to show my consistency. I have not urged the restriction of Louisville on the ground of her consolidated vote. I am utterly opposed to the proposition offered by my friend from Louisville. I do not believe that the people of Louisville want it, nor the people of the state at large.

Mr. DAVIS. I am in favor of districting cities, if it can be fairly and equitably done, without leaving too much to legislative discretion, and consequently to legislative power. And upon this principle the cities have a general politics as well as a local politics. My idea is this, that wherever there is a representation in an assembly, in either the general or state governments, that that representation ought to be single, as far as practicable, in congress, in the legislature, and in the election of a president in the college of electors. I cannot conceive any reason for districting a city that would not make the argument the stronger in favor of single than double districts. And for that reason would I be opposed to the proposition of my friend from Louisville, that the city of Louisville be divided into two districts. If, then, it be proper to district the city at all, in my judgment it ought to be divided into single districts, that each number of separate people entitled to a representative in the general assembly should be represented there by a man reflecting their own principles and their own wishes. But that object and end might be defeated by the double district system. I do not know what would be its present effect, or its probable effect within a short time, in the lower house. It might be that the proposition of the gentleman from Louisville would divide that city equally between the two parties. And suppose that would be the effect, what effect would it have on Covington? His double district would exclude Covington giving one party the advantage in both cases. I should be opposed to that, and to any arrangement now with a view to parties in this body, or any other body. And, if there is any proposition to district Louisville, or any other city, by single districts, and legislative discretion is so controlled as to prevent much abuse, I will vote for the proposition, because I believe it to be right in principle. I think the proposition of the gentleman is not sufficiently guarded. Now, the wards of a city might be large and numerous; and, while I would prefer that different language should be used, that the cities should be divided into single districts by squares of contiguous territory, so as to throw the districts into as compact a form as possible, I would leave the matter to legislative discretion. It might be that the wards would be strung out into a long line. I want a general regulation for the convenience of voters and without reference to party advantage.

Mr. MORRIS. I am obliged to the gentleman from Bourbon for his suggestion. Nothing has given me more pain than the idea which has been thrown out, that I have been influenced by party consideration. I wish to place the matter so that the city cannot be gerrymandered, and I accept the proposition he has made, to substitute the word "squares" for "wards," and after the word "contiguous" to insert "so as to make the most compact form."

Mr. RUDD suggested that the city of Louisville should be laid off by wards, divided by the different cross streets, commencing at the river, and running south to the extreme limits of the city. This would place them in a compact form. He would like such a provision put into the constitution, as it would prevent all future trouble.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE agreed with the gentleman from Louisville. He thought that gentleman's amendment contained the best description of localities, and when they were taken as electoral limits, all temptation to gerrymander was avoided. He called for the yeas and nays on the substitute.

The question was then taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 56, nays 34:

YEAS—John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Jas. S. Chrisman, B. L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benj. Copelin, Wm. So the amendment of Mr. Morris was substituted for that of the gentleman from Louisville. The question then recurred on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE moved the previous question.

Pending this question the convention adjourned.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER, 20, 1843.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LANCASTER.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. CLARKE offered the following resolution: Whereas, in the formation of a republican constitution, it is right and proper to establish some true and correct basis of representation. Wherefore,

Resolved, That all free white inhabitants who have been born in this commonwealth, and reside therein, or who shall have resided in the county, town, or city, in which they shall be enumerated, one year preceding the census or enumeration of the people, (aliens not naturalized excepted,) shall form the basis of representation.

I offer that resolution to test the sense of the convention whether population in the sense in which it is presented in that resolution, is the true basis of representation as many gentlemen have contended. There are many persons in this commonwealth who ought to be considered as well as the qualified voters.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I do not understand the object of the mover of that resolution. If I understand it, we are to base representation upon the number of individuals, whether male or female, qualified voters or not qualified to vote.

Mr. CLARKE. I desire to change the word "or" to "and," so that it shall read, "and reside therein."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I have a still stronger objection to it as it now stands; for I understand its purport to be to exclude naturalized citizens, in forming the basis of representation.

Mr. CLARKE. The gentleman certainly misunderstands me. I mean no such thing.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I presume my friend does not intend to make the exclusion, but I think a proper construction would have the effect which I named.

Mr. CLARKE modified the resolution, so as to exclude aliens not naturalized.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. That makes a great difference? I do not desire to pursue the discussion, for I presume this convention have made up their minds on the subject of the qualifications of voters, and are satisfied to leave that matter as it is at present, and to take the basis of our fathers—to wit, the qualified voters of our country—as that on which we shall act.

Mr. HARDIN. I understand this is a government of the people. The people, I understand to be men, women, and children, who are white, and who are born citizens of the United States, or of foreigners who have been naturalized. That I understand to be the qualification when you take the gentleman's resolution as it stands. And he meant nothing but that before in the use of the word alien, meaning those who have not been naturalized. The basis then proposed is the whole free white population that are citizens of the U. States, and are residents of the county, or town, or city, in which they may have been resident one year. Upon the subject of the uniformity of that basis, I do not think the gentleman is correct. The basis of representation in the congress of the United States is exactly the basis laid down there, with the exception of the slaves in the slaveholding states. By way of compromise, they were allowed a representation of their slaves, upon the basis of three fifths. With that exception the representation is that precisely which is laid down in the gentleman's proposition. I have not examined the constitutions of the various states, in order to ascertain what is the basis that has been adopted. I believe it varies in some of the states; in some it is the free voting population, and in others, the free white population. I have no doubt my worthy friend from Bullitt, (Mr. Thompson,) in his remarks the other day, was correct in quoting the provisions in the different constitutions of the states, as to what forms the basis of representation. And that only goes to show that the federal government has the basis of white population. Now, I ask why in the nature of things it should not be so in all the states, and why should not women and children under twenty one years of age have a right to be represented by the law-making power? Are they not subject to the laws? Do they not pay taxes upon their property? Have they not rights at stake as well as men? Are not their persons subject to the laws just as much as if they were voters? To be sure it is so. A young man of eighteen fights like voters, and works on the roads, does militia duty, and many other acts, and I cannot see why young men, women, and children should not form the basis of representation, and have a voice in the government. And there is another reason. You go to your cities and large towns, and there is a floating population of unmarried men. Go to the least village in your state, (God forbid I should again mention Louisville,) and you find a disproportion of voters to the number of the population: some journeymen mechanics, some young unmarried men in stores, or young men studying law or medicine. And go to every town and take the number of people in the town, and then go into the country and take the same number, and you find the town furnishes more voters in proportion than the country. I think the basis of the gentleman is the correct one; it is based upon the same principle as the congress of the U. States, and I believe at least half of the states. I beg pardon if I should again go to Louisville; there is a floating population there, if it is not treason against my worthy friend from Louisville to say so. They stop also at Covington, at Newport, and at Maysville awhile, and they are taken in among the list of voters. They are mechanics, working men, and peddlers, and have no permanent residence; and what is more they will give in their names to the commissioners when an apportionment is to be made. And hence if you go over all the towns in the state, and take Lexington, Maysville, Covington, and Paducah, you will see a disproportion of voters taken down the year the representation is to be apportioned. Louisville gave as many in 1843 as in 1848; not that there was as many people there, but she took in, in 1843, a moving, itinerant population. Lexington was in the same position. I want the country to have a chance. We have been taught by our fathers—what? That it should be a white population. They let the free negroes vote from 1792 to 1800, but we were taught certain principles of government which were excluded by the present constitution, and that constitution contains many things to which the people now object, and we are sent here to make a new one. We are not to consider that constitution as binding upon us either as precedents or in any other way. We came here to reconstruct and remodel it. What was in the constitution in 1792 was excluded in 1799, and what was in 1799 will be excluded in 1849. The world is advancing; the world is improving. We appear to be standing still, but we move as the world moves, in all the arts and sciences. We do not see our advance, but we are advancing. The world is improving as well in the arts and sciences generally as in the science of government; and I say that men, women, and children have a right to be represented. I looked around me the other day, and found that I had twenty five grand children, and not one of them can be represented under this constitution, and yet more than half are just verging into manhood and womanhood, and some of them pay taxes on $25,000. I am obliged to the gentleman for bringing in that resolution.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. This convention was called to re-model our form of government in those respects where experience had pointed to existing evils in the present constitution. I did not understand that it was called for the purpose of changing those great principles which seemed to have been sanctified by time, and acquiesced in by common consent, approved by all, and complained of by none. Under this opinion, I did not, when addressing my fellow citizens who sent me here, feel it my duty to say to them that I desired, or expected to change certain great principles secured to the country in the present constitution and bill of rights. I insisted that this should remain undisturbed as it was; that the right of representation, as therein guaranteed, should remain secure and inviolate; that liberty of conscience, and the freedom of the press should also remain secure, and guaranteed to the people and to posterity.

Now, if the basis of representation has been any where in Kentucky a cause of complaint, or has entered into the elements which led to the call of this convention, it has escaped my vision and my hearing, and I understand now from my colleague that he has come into it since his warfare upon cities commenced. I have not looked at tables, or the census of this commonwealth, to see where this will strike heaviest, or benefit most, nor would I care.

He says that population is the basis of representation, and that it is the basis adopted by the federal government. Does not my colleague know, that when the thirteen sovereignties were forming this compact of states, that very point was the subject of dispute, and ultimately of compromise, and none more so than this very question of representation according to numbers, in the two houses of congress? The slave states, contended for the representation of persons whose lives they had under their charge and protection. The free states insisted on free population. A compromise was made, by which the whole population was to be enumerated, and three fifths of the slaves. We have no such contending interests of sovereignties in this state to allay, settle, adjust, and compromise.

The resolution is to change the basis of representation as it has existed for fifty years without complaint, so far as my recollection goes, from any quarter. The argument is, that the women and children shall be represented, and young men who bear arms. I am against giving to matter, property, or territory, or to persons, the right of representation, when they are placed in a condition where they cannot exercise it. I have no idea of giving to one man whose locality may place him in the neighborhood of men, women, and children, more political power than the man who lives where they are not so abundant. I am for placing on each man who acts, the responsibility of a citizen, the same equal privileges, though he may not be wealthy. The gentleman objects that there is a floating population—voters who have no responsibility. I am opposed to giving one of that class any more than his due political weight, on account of his being surrounded by men, women, or children. Let him have his own weight and no more.

Why this change at this late hour, when I believe the members of this convention, individually and collectively, are anxious to bring the labors assigned to us, to a close; when the country is impatient to see the end of these labors; when the bill on your table which we had under consideration for some days, fixed the basis of representation by the judgment and sanction of the chairman and the whole committee? Why introduce at this late hour into this hall, and into this constitution, this new element, which is not calculated, let me assure my colleague, to form a constitution in conformity with the wishes of the people? I believe my colleague desires, as much as I, or any man, to form a constitution which will be satisfactory to them. I will not follow out the argument, but unless I can see some better ground for changing the basis which I think my countrymen desire still to maintain, I will not, for the sake of stripping any city or any town of one fiftieth, or one twentieth part of the political weight which it enjoys, introduce into this constitution this new basis of representation.

Mr. KAVANAUGH desired leave to record his vote on the question taken yesterday in his absence, which was granted.

Mr. HARDIN. I have always believed that representation should be according to numbers, that is, the free white population of this state who are citizens either by naturalization or by birth. Now I know many widows in this county, who have perhaps, a property of eight or ten thousand dollars and pay taxes, and they are subject to our laws, and though they cannot vote they ought to be represented. In the formation of the federal constitution, the negro population was a subject of compromise. The slave holding states for fear they would be swallowed up by the north, insisted that their slaves should be represented, and if there was any compromise about the white population, I have not seen the article which shows that on the journal. I do not believe it was a matter of compromise.

My colleague asks if we knew of this proposition when we came up here. No, he says, it was not mentioned in any way in the discussions of the canvass. I will ask, was it mentioned that Louisville should be gerrymandered as it was yesterday? No sir, you may say what you will, that was the first time that principle was ever introduced in Kentucky, either in the constitution of 1792 or of 1799, that you shall divide a town or city into precincts or wards to make it give a divided vote. This will be virtually making a division of a county. We are not to turn a deaf ear, nor shut our eyes to what is going on. Any man can see that the agricultural interests are to be led up and sacrificed at the altars of the towns and cities in the state. Yes sir, they are, and to give them a fair chance, I want the free white population to be the basis of representation. I know that the county which I represent can in no wise be affected. It was once an extensive county, but has been cut and cut till it has lost all form and shape that it ever had, and is reduced to the lowest point of representation. We never can get but one, and you never can take that one from us, and our county never can be gerrymandered, thank God. I speak that word without any disrespect to any one. The practice of thus dividing was first introduced by the celebrated Elbridge Gerry, and was carried into various states, but I never thought it right. The whigs were accused of it in the division made in this state in 1833. I believe it was called gerrymandering, but I think the division was as fair as could be made. I can see that we are to be sacrificed by a great and leading party. Our party is to be sacrificed this day or to-morrow. I know it, I can see it, but so long as I can raise my voice, sick or well, I will protest against it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I came here as the representative of the people of my county without regard to party politics, to act according to my conceptions of what is just. In the discharge of my duty I shall not regard the influence which my action may have on the political parties of this state. Regarding, as I do, political numbers as the true basis of representation, I should think sir, that if the resolution under consideration were to receive the countenance of this convention, its action would be a departure from principles that have in Kentucky been long and well settled. Representation results from necessity. If the people could assemble together and directly perform all political acts necessary for governmental purposes, there would be no necessity for representation. But as in large states they cannot thus assemble, it is necessary that thousands should be represented by one man. Whom do we represent? Whose voice does the representative speak? Is it the voice of the whole population or that of those who, if assembled together primarily, would do the business of legislation? Has it ever been the case from the earliest history of man, that women and children have constituted any part of the assemblage for the purpose of political action? Such was not the case in Athens? When the Athenian democracy assembled for political purposes, the convention was composed of those who had arrived at full age, the men of the country, male adults, who alone were entitled to vote. And, sir, if we could thus assemble, such would be the individuals who would vote with us. But as primary legislation is altogether impracticable, it is necessary that its exercise should be delegated. Out of this necessity has grown representation, which is designed to reflect the intelligence of the country, to embody the will of those who are vested with political power. It is the concentration of the popular voice—that voice which speaks at the polls. It is the creature obeying the behests of its creator. It is the ascertained will of the freemen of the country expressed through their representative.

The resolution under consideration proposes that women and children who are born in the country, as well as men, shall constitute the basis of representation, excluding aliens; and yet the children of the country have no more right to the exercise of political power than the alien. The alien may acquire it but the female child never can; the male child, it is true, will also be entitled to it at a proper age, but until that time he is as devoid of political power as the alien. Why then exclude the alien? Nay, why exclude the free negro or any one else, if population without regard to political numbers is to be the basis? If the burden of taxation is to have any influence, the free negro may acquire property and be taxed. He may be compelled to contribute toward the support of the government, as well as the white man, as well as the child. The child has no more political right—has no more voice in the councils of the country, than the free negro. Why make this discrimination if population, in its broadest sense, is to be the basis of representation? I do not see how gentlemen can escape from this difficulty. The gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Harlin), says that this is the principle on which representation is based in the congress of the U. States. Free negroes, aliens, and three fifths of the slaves are taken into the estimate. The constitution of the United States declares, that "Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."

Here all free persons are included, without regard to color, so that free negroes and aliens are actually included in the estimate made in the apportionment under the federal constitution. Then so far as that example goes, and indeed any other example within my knowledge, this resolution presents a novelty. It proposes to exclude aliens and all those from other states who have not a year's residence. Why make these exclusions, if population in its broadest sense, is to be the basis of representation? I should like to hear the philosophy of the thing, why population in its broadest sense should be the basis, and I should like to hear, then, the reasons why women and children who pay taxes should be represented, and aliens and free negroes who also pay taxes should not be represented.

If representation is to be based on the intelligence of the people you cannot place it on the basis of taxation. We exclude property because the idea of intelligence does not attach to it. We say that our government is supported upon the intelligence of the great mass of the people.

It is not the errand of woman's destiny to go forth and wrestle on the political arena. Her duty is to dispense the blessings that cluster around the domestic hearth. She constitutes the brightest link in the chain of man's association—that tie which makes "A paradise on earth,

Where hearts and hands combine."

To her, as the mother of mankind, is entrusted the task of fashioning the mind of childhood for future greatness—her teachings are seen on the battle-field, heard in the senate chamber. Her glory is like the Roman Cornelia's, whose jewels were her children. To man, from the beginning of time, has been assigned the task of cultivating the earth, defending the country and controlling its political destiny. It is proposed here to enlarge the basis of representation so as to embrace women and children, and yet give them no voice. How could an individual come up here and reflect the will of his constituents, when but a minor portion of that constituency has placed him in the position which he occupies? Does it not, to some extent, contravene the great principle of the right of instruction? If the whole people constitute the basis of representation, how is he to be instructed by a part and not a majority of the whole? The women and children will be his constituency, and how is he to reflect the will of that constituency when the larger portion of them are voiceless? I do not perceive any reasons for this proposed extension of the basis of representation.

It occurs to me that when Kentucky fixed her representation on political numbers, I mean on those who have the elective franchise, she placed it on the true principle: she was then in advance of all her sisters and shone out among them

"—Veluti inter ignea Luna minores."

Mr. CLARK. The younger gentleman from Nelson (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) asks why it is, at this late hour, I have thought proper to introduce this resolution. If I were to concede the right to him to ask that question, I would answer and say it was introduced for the purpose of basing representation upon what I believe to be the true basis. And, whether we have discussed another question, to some extent, involving the same principle, for several days, or not, is not a matter of any consequence when I, as the representative of a free and enlightened constituency, think proper to submit a resolution to the house. That gentleman, as well as the gentleman who has just taken his seat, (Mr. Mitchell,) has assumed that this was a question not discussed last summer before the people any where. The gentleman from Nelson says he came here a reform delegate—that he had pledged himself to the people to bring about certain reforms, and that this reform was never mentioned. He says this is changing a great principle, and the gentleman from Oldham agrees with him in that statement. Now I put it to the two gentlemen whether there has not been another change made within the last two suns in the old constitution, and one which was not discussed in the newspapers or by the delegates during the last canvass. I allude to the change made in the constitution yesterday upon the subject of city representation in the senate. When it is proposed to make a change that does not correspond with the views of certain gentlemen, it is very easy for them to get up and say, you are now proposing to make inroads on established rules and principles, which have been sanctioned by time and hallowed by experience in this country—you are attempting to do this without having informed the people when you came here that such was your intention. But when the same gentlemen think proper to make inroads on principles that have been sanctified by time and experience, then these arguments are of no weight whatever. The gentleman from Oldham declares this to be a departure from principle. What principle? He inquires how it is you intend to allow women and children to be represented, and at the same time he says money shall not be represented; that representation is based on the idea of patriotism, virtue and intelligence, and that intelligence cannot be expected except in adults, and according to the rule for which he is contending, those adults must be male adults. It has been well remarked by the elder gentleman from Nelson, that there was no controversy in the convention that framed the federal constitution as to the basis of representation in the sense indicated by some speakers here. There was a controversy in the convention as to whether population or property should be the basis of representation; but there never was, according to my recollection, and I have read with some care the Madison Papers and Elliott's Debates, a controversy as to whether population in a restricted sense, (such as here proposed) or in an unlimited sense, should form the true basis. I have yet to see where there ever was a controversy in the federal convention as to whether population, restricted or population unrestricted, should furnish the true basis of representation, whether population, as used, meant free white inhabitants, or those only who were qualified voters.

When you lay off your state into ten congressional districts for representation in congress, do you not take men, women, and children into the calculation? Have not women and children their rights? And although you deprive them of voting, should they not be represented when you tax them to the last dollar, as well as those who make the laws are taxed? I am perfectly satisfied, from the examination I have made, that in the towns and cities, and particularly the cities, there are more voters in proportion to the balance of the free white population, than can be found in the rural districts. There are those who apprehend, and I think justly, that there is danger to be expected from the cities, as far as the rights and interests of the rural districts are concerned, perhaps not now, but in after times. You then here insist upon a basis, which does what? A basis, which is a departure from the great principle of population as a basis. And your restricted basis of population gives to every city an advantage over the rural districts. Why select that basis? Why select qualified voters, when if you will take up the auditor's report, or the census for 1840, it will satisfy every mind that that basis gives an advantage to the cities over the rural districts. Why do that? If you make qualified voters the basis, it only goes half way. When you stop there, you give the cities an advantage over the country; but if you take the free white inhabitants of the state, if you give any advantage at all, you give it to the rural districts.

Now, why stop at this half way house? What is the fact? Go to the manufacturing establishments in the cities, you will find a number of men there, as well as upon your wharves and steamboats, who have no families at all. They cannot afford to keep families in the cities. They go there, and according to this half way principle, they go to the ballot box and elect their representatives, and control the rights of men, women, and children. I should like the gentleman from Oldham, when he returns to his constituents, to explain to them why he stopped at the half way house. Let him take the number of qualified voters in his county, and then the number of children between five and sixteen years old; then take the same classes in Jefferson county, and city of Louisville, and I will ask if there are not, in proportion to the voting population, more children between these ages, than in the county of Jefferson and city of Louisville. What is he doing? He is depriving his own county of a full representation on the great principle that population is the true basis of representation. With all your schools, charity establishments, and asylums in the city of Louisville, the fact does still exist, that there are more children, according to a given number of voters, in the rural districts than in the cities. Now, by way of illustration, I will take the counties of Christian, Trigg, Todd, and Logan. These are the heaviest slave counties in the southern part of the state. They give a voting population of 6,792. According to the Auditor's report for 1847, those four counties have within their limits, children between the ages of five and sixteen, to the number of 8,677. Take the voting population of the city of Louisville, and the county of Jefferson, which is 6,737, and there is but 55 difference between them; whereas, Louisville and the county of Jefferson, have but 7,406 children between those ages, thus showing, with an equal voting population, a difference in favor of those counties over the city, of 1261 children between those ages. Take the counties of Simpson, Hart, Allen, and Barren, and there are 6,373 qualified voters. They have quite a heavy slave population. The number of children in them between five and sixteen years of age is 8,849. The voting population of those four counties is less than that of Jefferson and Louisville by 364, and there are 1443 children in favor of those four counties.

There are great principles that regulate population, and increase or diminish it, and every one of them is in favor of the rural districts, unless the philosophy of the schools be false. First, the morals of a community have much to do with the increase or diminution of population. I will be understood, and it is a fact, without intending any disrespect to the population of any city in this Union, that there is more immorality, and such immorality as to prevent the propagation of our own species, in the cities than in the rural districts. By a calculation made by a distinguished gentleman in the state of Ohio, when you estimate the population of New York and Boston, and compare the number of deaths among children between birth and the age of five years, with the same number of the rural population; it is as six to one. That is one great principle which governs the increase of population, and the superior morals will always secure an increase to the country over the city. There is another principle: go to your populous cities, and there you will see hundreds of half fed children, a spectacle you never witness in the rural districts; there, they may be poor, and in humble circumstances, yet they have always a sufficiency to sustain life, and are hearty and healthy. Exposure exists in the cities, to a greater extent, than in the country. Nor will it be denied that the pure and balmy air of the country is more conducive to health than the malventilated atmosphere of a crowded city. I maintain it can be demonstrated that the growth of the rural districts, with a given number of inhabitants to begin with, must always outstrip the cities, so far as their own production of population is concerned. If gentlemen will carry out the principle on which that increase of power has been conferred upon the cities, by the vote of yesterday, they will do much to dissipate the danger apprehended here. It is right and just, and is a principle agreed upon by the framers of the federal constitution. Not more than two years ago, the same principle was adopted by the convention which framed the constitution of New York. Gentlemen have drawn upon the example of other states, as precedents by which to govern their own action. In 1847 the convention which assembled in New York for the purpose of revising the constitution of that state, adopted the following article:

"An enumeration of the inhabitants of the state shall be taken under the direction of the legislature, in the year 1855, and at the end of every ten years thereafter; and the said districts shall be so altered by the legislature at the first session after the return of every enumeration, that each senate district shall contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of inhabitants, excluding aliens and persons of color not taxed; and shall remain unaltered."

The very principle laid down in my resolution is the very principle adopted in the constitution of New York. It is one of the very last conventions that have met for the purpose of framing a constitution. Now, I put it to the gentleman on this floor, when it is perfectly manifest and apparent, if you establish this as the true principle of representation, you will shield the rural districts from that overshadowing and impending danger which they apprehend from the recently increased power of the cities. If you do thus shield them, I ask my friend from Nelson, why he opposes it? Why not carry out the principle? And if it does give the rural districts any advantage, let it do it. And I protest against stopping at that very point, if there be danger to the rural districts, which will place them at the mercy of the cities.

I have said that throughout almost every report that has been made from the committees, qualified voters have been made the basis of representation; but there is nothing in the world more easy than to strike out the words "qualified voters," wherever they occur, and insert "white inhabitants." And the declaration of gentlemen that we are going back to undo all that we have done, is a mere scarecrow, for not more than half a yard of talk and work (I believe some gentlemen's speeches are measured by the yard) will be necessary to accomplish all. I hope the subject will be discussed by gentlemen better acquainted with it than I am, and I trust the reasons and advantages here suggested, will be so demonstrated, that there will scarcely be a dissenting voice to the adoption of the resolution. I shall ask for the ayes and noes.

Mr. MAYES. This is an interesting question, and one that I think merits the calm consideration of the members of this body. I shall not be actuated in my vote on this subject, by the question whether the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Simpson, will affect cities or the country. I inquire whether it is right or wrong. Is it just, or if adopted will it operate oppressively or unjustly on any portion of the state. I have thought, and I still think, that the cities have been very improperly drawn into the various discussions we have had in this convention. We are acting with a view to promote the general interests of the state, and local interests are not to be taken into the general action for the general weal. Yet we have seen the city of Louisville arrayed on almost every question presented for the consideration of gentlemen, and now that we are on the question touching representation in some degree, we find that Louisville and other cities are brought up here in all their grandeur. That is no part of the question. If the resolution of the gentleman from Simpson be right, whether it affect the city or country materially, it becomes our duty to adopt it. If, on the other hand, to fix on the basis of qualified voters is more just, it becomes our duty to adopt that principle. That is the view that I take. It strikes me forcibly, and at present I give my assent unqualifiedly to the proposition of the gentleman from Simpson, that it is right and will redound to the general good. I do not restrict it to town or country particularly. This is not a new question. True, heretofore representation in Kentucky has been based on the number of qualified voters in the counties and towns. The proposition now is, to change the principle on which Kentucky has acted heretofore in reference to this subject.

Will it be right to change? We know that under the present system, if I am twenty one years of age, though I do not possess a cent's worth of property, and feel no interest whatever in the government in which I live, still I have the right to vote, and thereby determine and select the man who is to stand on this floor, and control the property of others who have no voice in it, and are not to be represented in the slightest degree. It seems to me there should be some provision for protection of that class of persons who own property in the state, who have a deep, abiding, and powerful interest in the government. Can we not ascertain the number of free white persons in Kentucky, when we apportion the representation? That can be learned with as much ease as we can ascertain the number of qualified voters. Then the widows, or unmarried ladies who own property, who have a stake in the government, will be counted, because they have an interest to be protected. The free white children should also be counted, for the same reason, for they have an interest which should be guarded and shielded by the law making power of the state.

I am glad this question has been presented. How it will be determined by the convention, I know not, but I have no doubt they will determine it, for the common good, without regard to city or country.

I rose to turn the attention of the convention to some of the constitutions which have provisions of this kind, that the delegates may see there are other states, or statesmen, who, in forming the organic law of their country, regarded this as an unjust provision as it now exists in this state. These it seems had reference to the general good, and I wish we might talk less about sectional interests, and more about the general good. I hope, however, no such motives have operated, as have been attributed to gentlemen. I do not believe there has been any reference to national politics on this floor, but gentlemen on both sides have been engaged in what they thought would redound to the best interests of Kentucky. I regret to see gentlemen referring to national politics when forming a constitution. I will read first from the constitution of Pennsylvania.

"Within three years after the first meeting of the general assembly, and within every subsequent term of seven years, an enumeration of the taxable inhabitants, shall be made in such manner as shall be directed by law. The number of representatives shall, at the several periods of making such enumeration, be fixed by the legislature, and apportioned among the city of Philadelphia and the several counties, according to the number of taxable inhabitants in each; and shall never be less than sixty, nor greater than one hundred. Each county shall have at least one representative, but no county hereafter erected, shall be entitled to a separate representation, until a sufficient number of taxable inhabitants shall be contained within it, to entitle them to one representative, agreeably to the ratio which shall then be established."

What principle operated on the convention of Pennsylvania in forming their constitution? It was that which was well illustrated by the elder gentleman, as he is called, from Nelson, that although we may have no right to vote we have deep interests which should be protected by the country, and therefore in that sense we have a right to representation. The constitution of Mississippi is as follows:

"The legislature shall, at their first session, and at periods of not less than every four, nor more than every six years, until the year 1845, and thereafter at periods of not less than every four, nor more than every eight years, cause an enumeration to be made of all the free white inhabitants of the state."

That constitution goes on the same idea as that of the resolution of the gentleman from Simpson.

Now, look at the constitution of Illinois:

"The number of senators and representatives shall, at the first session of the general assembly, holden after the returns herein provided for are made, be fixed by the general assembly, and apportioned among the several counties or districts to be established by law, according to the number of white inhabitants."

These, with the exception of that of Pennsylvania, are the constitutions of new states; and in that state we see that the voting population is not the only criterion.

If gentlemen will be patient, I shall soon be done. I have not troubled the convention at great length; my name will not appear on the journal very frequently. It is necessary that we should express our views and interchange our sentiments.

The constitution of Missouri, says:

"The general assembly, at their first session, and in the years 1822 and 1824, respectively, and every fourth year thereafter, shall cause an enumeration of the inhabitants of this state to be made; and at the first session after such enumeration, shall apportion the number of representatives among the several counties, according to the number of free white male inhabitants therein."

The constitution speaks of free white male inhabitants, while the others based the representation on free white inhabitants as a proper criterion. In Pennsylvania taxable inhabitants are represented.

The gentleman from Oldham, says, why exclude aliens from being counted when you come to fix the ratio of representation? I should have supposed a gentleman of his intelligence would not have propounded such a question. Why not include them? The reason is obvious to every gentleman. Why not, he says, include free negroes? If he is disposed to include them, he can offer an amendment to that effect. I am not willing to give free negroes, nor foreigners not naturalized, the right of determining the manner in which I shall dispose of my property, nor the right to influence the law which may take away my life and liberty, because they have not a sufficient stake in the government. But those who are part and parcel of the people of the United States have a deep interest, and I am disposed to think they should have a part in the enactment of such laws as shall protect and secure that interest.

I thank the house for the indulgence they have given me, and will not trespass longer, nor shall I speak often in future, unless it may be with reference to some section which I desire to see modified in some slight degree.

Mr. W. JOHNSON. I am inclined to vote for this proposition—and in order to try whether the principle is a good one, allow me to state an extreme case. If it is good, I intend, as far as my vote is concerned, to carry it out. Suppose there are five hundred voters in one county, each of them having a family of ten persons, making five thousand persons in all; and suppose in another county you have five hundred voters who have no families, is it right that the five hundred voters without families shall have the same influence in the government as the five hundred voters with families? Is it right to say that four thousand five hundred beings shall count nothing? If the principle is good in itself, it is good every where.

Mr. NEWELL. To carry out the gentleman's principle thoroughly, he had better provide that the number of votes shall be regulated by the number of children.

Mr. MACHEN. In reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Harrison, I ask if it would not be as well to include widows, and base representation on the number of widows and children? I have reflected some little on this subject, and believe the proposition is founded on a correct principle. It appears to me that the house should vote upon this proposition at once, and adopt it by a unanimous vote. I will refer you to an analogous principle that has already been acted upon in this house. It is that representation shall be based on federal numbers.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Does the gentleman desire that representation be based on federal numbers, which includes three-fifths of the negroes?

Mr. MACHEN. No, sir; I do not mean that negroes are to be taken into the account at all. The constitution of Wisconsin has the same provision, and there are no negroes there. On what basis does the gentleman place representation? I believe that only a few days since this hall was made to resound with his eloquent voice in favor of basing representation upon population.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I have never contended for any other basis than that of population, as recognized in the old constitution; that is, the voting population.

Mr. MACHEN. I do not know the exact phrase used by the gentleman. But I presume the house has intended that the white population should constitute the basis of representation. That is the doctrine that has been contended for, and although gentlemen may choose to narrow it down to the voting population, it seems to me, to confine it to that, would be departing from the principle upon which the government has been erected. Property is entirely unrepresented—the widow and orphans are deprived of that protection which representation would give them, yet they are held subject to the laws which you enact. We do not propose to give them the right to vote, but we propose that their voice shall be heard, to some extent, by computation of numbers. That I hold to be the correct principle.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I have not yet heard this proposition placed precisely on a correct basis, according to my view. I have great disinclination to detain the committee with any remarks, and would not do so now, if I was not aware that there has been an effort made by the younger delegate from Nelson (Mr. Wickliffe)—though probably it was unintentional—to place those who shall vote for this proposition in a false position. First, he endeavors to connect us with those who desire to establish a property qualification; next he endeavors to connect us with those who want to make federal numbers the basis of representation. He shall not do either with me. There can be no plainer proposition than this. What is the duty of the legislature? It is to protect persons and property. Do they protect only the persons and property of the voting population? Not at all; they protect the persons and property of the whole state. Then, in putting members of the legislature into office, what should be the basis? Plainly, those on whose persons, as well as those on whose property they are to operate. But how are you to get the true basis, as they are to operate on persons and property both? Why, clearly, persons or white inhabitants, whether they own property or not. Suppose the gentleman from Nelson has fifteen children and grand children, and he the only male representative of the family, and that he loses his life, while fighting the battles of his country. Previous to that event the persons and property of his widow and descendants were represented. Well, he fell not by his own act, but while defending the rights of these identical men who are opposing this resolution. What then becomes of the rights of his widow, children, and grand children? They are represented no longer. They are stricken down, trampled under foot. Now, I ask if the gentleman can reconcile it to his conscience, that the loss of the head of the family shall be followed by the further misfortune of the loss of the right of having their persons and property wholly unrepresented, by having their persons stricken out of the basis of representation?

There is another point of view in which this question presents itself to my mind. It is this: Although persons that have no property have not the same interests to protect in that respect with those who have, yet they have persons and character to protect; and it seems to me that women and children have the same right to have their persons and reputation protected, whether they have property or not, that men have. They own persons and reputation, and persons and reputation have the same right to be represented and protected that property has. It strikes me, that when you look at the object of all laws, (which is to protect and regulate persons and property,) that all persons, capable of owning property, or having persons and character to protect, should be represented.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. President: When this proposition was first presented, I regarded it as a restriction upon the river counties, and the foreign population that seemed to concentrate in the large cities on the Ohio river—that were constantly roving from one point of the state to another, and that ought not be represented—more than the stationary population in the country, although that population might be females or minors. I regard that population as the true basis of representation; but, I see that the effect of the proposition will be to affect the rich counties as well as the cities; and if the rich counties choose to barter that part of their population whose "heritage are their children," why, let them take the consequences.

I have made out a table of twelve counties. Six I consider among the most wealthy, and six are considered as poor; and you will see that the children in the six poor counties will give them great advantages, by increasing their political power:

Anderson,	-	-	-	1086 voters	1546 children
-----------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

Breathitt,	-	-	-	588 voters	996 children
------------	---	---	---	------------	--------------

Butler,	-	-	-	870 voters	1312 children
---------	---	---	---	------------	---------------

Wayne,	-	-	-	1423 voters	2281 children
--------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

Allen	-	-	-	1413 voters	2221 children
-------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

Morgan,	-	-	-	1225 voters	1815 children
---------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

				Voters.	Children.
Breathitt,	-	-	-	588	996
Morgan,	-	-	-	1225	1815
Total,	-	-	-	1813	2811

Bourbon,	-	-	-	1769 voters	1628 children
----------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

Jessamine,	-	-	-	1323 voters	1482 children
------------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

Woodford,	-	-	-	1255 voters	1242 children
-----------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

Clarke,	-	-	-	1715 voters	2030 children
---------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

Madison,	-	-	-	2549 voters	2913 children
----------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

Scott,	-	-	-	1839 voters	2387 children
--------	---	---	---	-------------	---------------

				Voters.	Children.
Bourbon,	-	-	-	1769	1628
Woodford,	-	-	-	1255	1242
Total,	-	-	-	3024	2870

The result of the above table is very remarkable. Take the counties represented by the gentleman from Morgan and Breathitt, (Mr. Hargis) and we have the astonishing fact, that the aggregate voters only amount to 1,813, and there are 2,811 children between the age of five and sixteen. Truly, this is a great place for children. Sir, I believe that all the free population is the best basis of representation, and shall vote for the proposition.

Mr. NUTTALL. We have got along very well under our old system of enumeration, and by trying to amend it, it is possible we may make it worse. This is not a new proposition to me, and it does not strike me as altogether just. I think that the voting community, should be the basis of representation. If we are going to attempt to provide in this constitution for every possible contingency that may arise, our labors will be endless. I am as much in favor of widows and orphans as any delegate on this floor. I have always had a special leaning in that direction; but I do not propose to make a constitution that will meet the case referred to by the gentleman from Daviess. If a lady is made a widow by her husband falling in battle, it is only a casualty; and for such, no constitutional provision can be made. But if the gentleman will go a step further, and propose that widows shall be allowed to vote, I could never oppose such a proposition as that. I would go for it as certain as the Lord liveth. But there being nothing of this sort contemplated, I shall adhere to the old doctrine, of basing representation on the voting population. I am very much like the boy who was found one morning trying to jump into his breeches. When asked what he was doing he replied, "why daddy jumped into his breeches this way, and I am following the old plan."

Mr. GHOLSON. It is to me a matter of astonishment that upon so plain a proposition there should be so much debate. If it be in order, I will move the previous question.

The previous question was then sustained.

The question was then taken upon the resolution offered by the gentleman from Simpson, (Mr. Clarke,) and it was adopted; yeas 69, nays 23,

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention then proceeded to the consideration of the report of the committee on the legislative department.

The pending question being upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Christian, (Mr. Morris,) to the fifth section of said report.

Mr. GHOLSON. If it is in order, I will move to strike out, the latter clause of this amendment. "But no ward or municipal division shall be divided by such division of senatorial or representative districts."

The PRESIDENT. The amendment having been adopted as a substitute, it will not be in order to amend by striking out.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The amendment as it now stands, is perfectly correct. It is necessary, I think, to preserve the municipal divisions of the city, that no ward shall be divided in forming a representative district. There is no necessity for it; and if the latter portion of the amendment be stricken out, it will be in the power of the legislature, if such should be their inclination, to gerrymander the city.

Mr. MERIWETHER. If you permit a division of wards in forming an electoral district, a portion of the voters may have to go to two wards to vote. A voter may have to go to one ward to vote for representative, and to another to vote for senator.

Mr. PRESTON. As I have heretofore stated, I will vote against the amendment, and for the section as it has been reported. But if the proposition of the gentleman from Christian should be adopted, I would like to have it in as proper a shape as possible. It strikes me however, that it would be better to leave it alone altogether, lest difficulty should arise out of those divisions of wards.

Mr. GHOLSON. It does appear to me, with all deference to the gentleman, that it will still be subject to the same objection that lies against confining representation to county lines. My object was to make it incumbent upon the city authorities, to divide the city into districts, that this gerrymandering should not be practiced.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I think I can obviate the difficulty by inserting the words "representative district," so that it will read "no representative district shall be divided."

Mr. IRWIN. I cannot believe it is necessary that the city should be divided into wards for representation. She will not have more than three or four representatives in the lower house. Suppose when you divide out the city in this way, you have two individuals in favor of emancipation, and two opposed to it; and suppose the open clause shall be adopted in this constitution. You immediately raise the question of emancipation. I believe that if you adopt the principle of dividing the city for representation in the lower house, it will have the worst possible influence. I can see no reason why Jefferson, or any other county, might not be divided for a similar purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. The difficulty in relation to this matter, occurred to my mind last evening, when I suggested some verbal alterations. If a city is to be divided into election districts, it certainly is desirable that the districts should be equal, that they should each contain, as nearly as may be, the exact ratio of representation. There must be ward arrangements, and if these ward arrangements are to be adhered to strictly, in the formation of districts, they might constitute districts of unequal strength, in point of voters. I think this ought to be guarded against while we are on the subject, and I will suggest an amendment, to be added to the latter part of the amendment of the gentleman from Christian. It is this, "unless it be necessary to equalize the senatorial or representative districts."

Mr. RUDD. If gentlemen will reflect, I think it will be evident to them, that the city council, being themselves elected in wards, are better qualified to make the proper divisions than any other persons. The census is taken once in every year, and the wards become from time to time unequal in population. You cannot prevent it. Leave the matter then as it is, without any alteration, and let the representative districts be equalized by the city council. They are better qualified to regulate the election precincts than any other body of men. If you leave the amendment of the gentleman from Christian as it is, there will be no danger of gerrymandering. That is what I want; I do not want any of this cutting and dividing.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I am satisfied with the amendment that is proposed by the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis,) and I will therefore withdraw mine.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of the gentleman from Bourbon, (Mr. Davis,) and it was agreed to, on a division, yeas 41, noes 18.

And the question being then put upon the amendment as amended, and the yeas and nays being demanded, they were taken, and resulted as follows, yeas 62, nays 29:

Charles A. Wickliffe, Robert N. Wickliffe, Geo. W. Williams, Wesley J. Wright—62.

YAYS—John L. Ballinger, William K. Bowling, Thomas D. Brown, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Archibald Dixon, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Stoner, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Silas Woodson—29.

So the amendment, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WM. JOHNSON. I will re-offer the amendment that was proposed by the gentleman from Muhlenburg, (Mr. Jackson.) It is this, "Provided, That no city, or county, shall ever be entitled to more than two senators."

This motion the president heretofore ruled out of order, but after an argument on the point by Mr. W. JOHNSON the decision was reversed, and the motion received.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. NESBITT. I suppose that I represent the only county of the state, in which the question of restricting cities has been discussed. There were several adjourned meetings for the purpose of nominating candidates for this convention, and there was drawn up, by the old preceptor of the gentleman from Todd, a platform, or a set of resolutions, one of which was, that it would be expedient to incorporate into the constitution, a provision for restricting the representation of cities and towns. The resolution was submitted on county court day, and I believe it did not meet with a single dissenting voice, until it came to me. I remarked to the gentleman who drew it up, that he had put it in a little too strong language, that it would be as well to let the constitution remain as it is, in that respect; that it would furnish restriction enough. I became the nominee, and pledged myself to sustain the old constitution in every provision, where I was not instructed to change it, but reserved to myself the right to act as a free delegate on this floor, on all questions on which I was not instructed, and on which the old constitution was silent. In carrying out what I believed to be the will of the people of my county, I have universally voted in favor of restriction upon cities.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. My course on this subject has been a silent one. I have voted for restricting cities, and shall vote for this proposition. Upon almost every proposition that has been submitted to this body, I have been able to form some idea of the opinions and feelings of my constituents, and felt instructed by the knowledge of what these feelings were. This proposition however, was entirely a new one, and as I have always felt desirous of carrying out the wishes of my constituents, I took occasion yesterday—it being court day in my county, to visit the county, and I conversed freely with the people upon this subject. It was not new to them—they had examined the discussions which have taken place in this house, and with but one single exception, I found the people of Jessamine county, most decidedly in principle, agreeing with me in the course which I had pursued. They have always believed that it was essential to maintain the separation of the two branches of the legislative department of the government, that it was essential that the senate and house of representatives should be differently constituted. They look upon the division that exists in the legislative department, into two branches, as a conservative principle. They have believed that those two branches would be found to be in some degree, a check upon each other. And they believed that if constituted exactly alike, the object of division is entirely lost. I shall vote for the proposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted thus, yeas 40—nays 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. IRWIN moved to strike out the 5th section, and insert the following.

"Elections for representatives for the several counties entitled to representation, shall be held at the places of holding their respective courts, or in the several election precincts into which the legislature may think proper to divide any or all of those counties: Provided, That when it shall appear to the legislature that any town or city hath a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio then fixed, such town or city shall be invested with the privilege of a separate representation; which shall be retained so long as such town or city shall contain a number of qualified voters equal to the ratio which may, from time to time, be fixed by law; and thereafter, elections for the county in which such town or city is situated shall not be held therein.

"The same number of senatorial districts shall, from time to time, be established by the legislature as there may then be senators allotted to the state, which shall be so formed as to contain as near as may be an equal number of free white male inhabitants in each, above the age of twenty one years, so that no county, town, or city shall form more than one district; and when two or more counties compose a district, they shall be adjoining."

A division was called for by Mr. Waller, and the question was taken, first on striking out, and it was decided in the negative, as follows—yeas 36, nays 55:

YEAS—John L. Ballinger, Wm. K. Bowling, Thomas D. Brown, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, William Cowper, James Dudley, Milford Elliott, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ben. The question then recurred upon the adoption of the 5th section as amended. The yeas and nays being taken, they resulted as follows:

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie.) Richard Apperson, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, Charles Chambers, William Chenault, Henry R. D. So the section was adopted.

The convention then took a recess until 3 o'clock, P. M.

EVENING SESSION.—3 O'CLOCK, P. M.

The sixth section was then read.

Mr. GRAY moved to strike out the section, and insert the following:

"SEC. 6. Representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be, forever regulated and ascertained by the number of free white citizens therein. At the first session of the general assembly, after the adoption of this constitution, provision shall be made, by law, that in the year _____, and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the free white citizens of the state shall be made. The number of representatives shall, in the several years of making these enumerations, be so fixed as not to be less than fifty-eight, nor more than one hundred; and they shall be apportioned for the eight years next following, as near as may be, among the several counties, cities, and towns, in proportion to the number of free white citizens; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of free white citizens to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjacent county or counties may not have a residuum or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representation, it shall then be in the power of the legislature to join two or more together, for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining, which have residuums over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio; in that case, one representative shall be added to that county having the largest residuum."

Here is the principle contained in the old constitution, amended so as to correspond with the indication given by the vote of the convention this morning, of what should constitute the basis of representation, and in relation to the taking of the census every eight years, in which it corresponds with the report of the committee. I am not particular about this last change, and do not care whether the convention shall think proper to require the apportionment of representation on the returns of the United States census, or one taken every eight years, at the expense of the state. Under the old plan of making the apportionment once in every four years, it was complained of, that there would sometimes be two senators residing in the same district, and this, at least, would not happen more than half as often under the proposed plan. The plan of apportionment in the present constitution, I think, the people are satisfied with it, and that it is far more equal in its operation than would be the plan either of the committee or the gentleman from Trigg. (Mr. Boyd.) The plan of the committee—as shown by the tables of the gentleman from Montgomery—is very unequal. It would give six representatives to counties with eight thousand nine hundred, and only the same number to counties with ten or twelve thousand voters. That clearly is a greater inequality than any which ever existed under the present constitution. If it is thought proper, however, to provide here for an apportionment by districts, I should much prefer that of the gentleman from Montgomery, (Mr. Apperson) as being more equal, to that of the gentleman from Trigg. I have made some calculations which will show the inequality of the latter gentleman's plan. In his eleventh and twelfth districts, lying in the same section of the state, there is a residuum of one thousand three hundred and eighteen voters not represented. These districts are composed of the following counties: Estill, Owsley, Breathitt, Floyd, Pike, Perry, Letcher, Clay, Harlan, Madison, Rockcastle, Lincoln, Laurel, Casey, Pulaski, Whitley, and Knox. Now, his eighth district, with a residuum of only seven hundred and fifty-seven votes, has an additional representative upon that residuum. This district is composed of the counties of Scott, Harrison, Pendleton, Kenton, Campbell, Nicholas, Mason, and Bracken. Now this certainly was a very great inequality. Two districts lying together, with a joint residuum of thirteen hundred and eighteen, were to have no additional representative, while another district, with a residuum of only seven hundred and fifty-seven, has an additional representative. These inequalities show the plan to be imperfect, and not so well adapted to the situation of the counties as the plan under the old constitution. I hope, therefore, we shall adhere to the old constitution on this subject, amended as I have proposed in my proposition.

Mr. BOYD. I would offer the following as a substitute for the amendment:

"That representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of qualified free white citizens, electors, therein. The house of representatives shall consist of one hundred members, and to secure uniformity and equality of representation as aforesaid, the state is hereby districted into twelve districts.

DISTRICT No. 1. To consist of the counties of Fulton, Hickman, Graves, Ballard, McCracken, Calloway, Marshall, and Livingston.

DISTRICT No. 2. To consist of the counties of Trigg, Christian, Caldwell, Crittenden, Union, Henderson, and Hopkins.

DISTRICT No. 3. To consist of the counties of Todd, Muhlenburg, Logan, Simpson, Allen, Warren, Butler, and Edmonson.

DISTRICT No. 4. To consist of the counties of Daviess, Ohio, Hancock, Breckinridge, Grayson, Hart, Larnie, Hardin, and Meade.

DISTRICT No. 5. To consist of the counties of Monroe, Barren, Cumberland, Clinton, Adair, Green, Taylor, Wayne, and Russell.

DISTRICT No. 6. To consist of the counties of Jefferson, Bullitt, Nelson, Shelby, Spencer, Washington, and Marion.

DISTRICT No. 7. To consist of the counties of Oldham, Trimble, Henry, Franklin, Owen, Carroll, Gallatin, Grant, and Boone.

DISTRICT No. 8. To consist of the counties of Scott, Harrison, Pendleton, Kenton, Campbell, Nicholas, Mason, and Bracken.

DISTRICT No. 9. To consist of the counties of Fayette, Woodford, Bourbon, Clarke, Jessamine, Anderson, Mercer, Boyle, and Garrard.

DISTRICT No. 10. To consist of the counties of Lewis, Fleming, Bath, Montgomery, Morgan, Greenup, Carter, Lawrence, and Johnson.

DISTRICT No. 11. To consist of the counties of Estill, Owsley, Breathitt, Floyd, Pike, Perry, Letcher, Clay, and Harlan.

DISTRICT No. 12. To consist of the counties of Madison, Rockcastle, Lincoln, Laurel, Casey, Pulaski, Whitley, and Knox.

In the year and every fourth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the free white citizens of the state shall be made in such manner as shall be directed by law.

In the several years of making such enumeration, each district shall be entitled to representatives equal to the number of times the ratio is contained in the whole number of free white citizens in said districts: Provided, That the remaining representatives, after making such apportionment, shall be given to those districts having the largest unrepresented fractions.

Representatives to which each district may be entitled, shall be apportioned among the several counties, cities, and towns, of the district, as near as may be, in proportion to the number of free white citizens; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of free white citizens to entitle it to one representative, and when the adjacent county or counties, within the district, may not have a residuum or residuums, which, when added to the small county, would entitle it to a separate representation, it shall then be in the power of the general assembly to join two or more together, for the purpose of sending a representative: Provided, That when there are two or more counties adjoining, and in the same district, which have residuums over and above the ratio then fixed by law, if said residuums, when added together, will amount to such ratio, in that case, one representative shall be added to the county having the largest residuum."

As I remarked on a former occasion, my object in proposing this plan of districting the state into representative districts was to prevent the carrying of residuums from one section of the state to another, which was the practice under the present mode of apportionment. It does not make any difference whether any of the districts I have proposed have a greater or lesser number of representatives, so that each get the share it is entitled to, according to the ratio.

The gentleman from Montgomery the other day was pleased to intimate that in making these districts, regard had been had to the political strength of parties in these districts. To satisfy the gentleman and all others that I had not that object in view, an examination of my proposition only is required. In the first district composed of the counties of Fulton, Hickman, Graves, Ballard, McCracken, Callaway, and Livingston, they would have their full ratio of five members and a residuum of 470; that residuum will be unrepresented, and the district is democratic by about 1300 majority. The second district will be fully entitled to seven members, and there would be a residuum of 1009 which would entitle it to an additional representative. This will fall to the county of Christian and be taken from the democratic counties of Hopkins and Caldwell. It would be the whigs therefore, who would gain there. The Third district would be entitled to seven members, and there would be a residuum of 856, and be entitled to an additional representative. That district is whig by some 1700 or 1800. The fourth district would have eight members, and there would be a residuum of 913 which would entitle it to an additional member. The district is also whig by some 1400. The fifth district would have eight members and a residuum of 207. The district is democratic by about 200 majority. The sixth district would be entitled to twelve members, and there would be a large residuum of some 1224, and entitling it in any way to an additional representative. The district is whig by some 1700 to 2000. The seventh district, it is true, gets an additional member upon a residuum of 735. It is democratic, and in that perhaps, the gentleman may find some grounds of complaint. The eighth district would be entitled to eleven members with a residuum of 735, only five less than the seventh, and it gets no additional member. It is democratic also. There is but one district, it will be seen, where there is any considerable residuum, which gives a whig majority, where it will not receive an additional member. It is the twelfth district composed of the following counties: Estill, Owsley, Breathitt, Floyd, Pike, Perry, Letcher, Clay and Harlan, and they will have a residuum of 740. I am sure, therefore, that there is no gentleman but what is satisfied that I had no such intention, as was insinuated by the gentleman from Montgomery, in view of offering my proposition. No plan I have seen is more fair and equal than this, except that of my friend from Fulton, which is certainly more equal, but I have my doubts whether it is practicable in its details.

MR. GARRARD. I am not prepared to say what effect the alteration of the basis of representation may have in the sixth section of the report, but if that change had been made, I believe the section notwithstanding the many attempts that have been made upon it, would have more friends here than it now seems to have. The desire of all is to agree upon some plan that will forever put it out of the power of any party that may be in the majority in the legislature to gerrymander the state for their particular benefit. The plan of the committee, if the relative strength of the counties continue as they now are, will not operate more injuriously upon any particular section of country, than any plan we may possibly adopt. I have made up a calculation upon mature reflection and examination, which I think, will satisfy gentlemen that the plan of the committee is about as near correct as any that can be devised.

All the calculations are based upon the list furnished the convention by the second auditor, for the year 1849, of white male citizens over the age of twenty one years, and not by the qualified voters, and I only propose to show how the section would operate under this list.

By the first provision all the counties that have two thirds of the ratio are entitled to a separate representative. They are, Allen, Anderson, Boyle, Bullitt, Carter, Crittenden, Calloway, Grant, Grayson, Green, Hart, Jessamine, Knox, Larue, Lewis, Lincoln, Montgomery, Meade, Monroe, Morgan, Oldham, Pendleton, Simpson, Spencer, Todd, Taylor, Trigg, Trimble, Union, Woodford, Wayne, and Whitley; in all thirty two. Larue, with 1,013, the smallest, and Todd, with 1,499, the largest county in the list. The thirty two counties have an aggregate population of 39,626, which is an average of 1,238 to a representative, and an actual deficit of 282 to each county.

The counties under the second provision having the ratio, and not two thirds over, and which will not under this plan have but one member, are, Adair, Bracken, Breckinridge, Boone, Bath, Campbell, Caldwell, Clarke, Daviess, Franklin, Graves, Greenup, Garrard, Hopkins, Henry, Harrison, Bourbon, Logan, Mercer, Marion, Nicholas, Owen, Henderson, Muhlenburg, Scott, and Washington, in all twenty seven; with an aggregate population of 50,543, which is 1872 to a member, or a surplus of 352 in each county.

The cities and counties under the third provision, that have the ratio and two thirds are, Louisville city, three, Barren, Fayette, Hardin, Kenton, Madison, Mason, Jefferson, Pulaski, Shelby, Fleming, Christian, and Warren. They will have two representatives each, in all twenty four, and the city of Louisville three, with an aggregate population of 37,885, or 1,403 to each member, and a deficit of 117 to each representative. The counties of Hardin, Pulaski, Shelby, Fleming, Christian, and Warren have two members each, under the last provision of the sixth section, which gives to the largest unrepresented fraction the surplus members, notwithstanding the counties of Christian and Warren have not the ratio and one half of the ratio, and yet complaint is made that counties near their numbers are treated badly by this section.

The remainder of the counties under the fourth provision are attached together under two provisions of this section: first, small counties with less than two thirds of the ratio attached together. Secondly, where there is no similar adjacent county, they are united with the smallest contiguous county. Casey and Russell one, Ohio and Hancock one, Estill and Owsley one, Breathitt, Perry and Letcher one, Ballard and McCracken one, Butler and Edmonson one, Carroll and Gallatin one, Cumberland and Clinton one, Clay and Harlan one, Floyd and Pike one, Hickman and Fulton one, Lawrence and Johnson one, Rockcastle and Laurel one, Livingston and Marshall one. These twenty nine counties have an aggregate population of 26,450, or 1,888 to each member, and a surplus of 368 to each member. So that the twenty nine counties attached together to send fourteen members have a larger surplus fraction than any other lot of counties. Still this is said to be a proposition for the benefit of the small counties.

This gives fifty nine counties a separate representative. They have an aggregate population of 90,159, and an average to each member of 1528—within eight of the ratio.

Under the present apportionment fifty seven counties have separate members. At the time the apportionment was made, Russell, the smallest, had but 822, and Pulaski, the largest, had 2156 votes, by this plan Larue with 1013 has a member, and Campbell, the largest, has 2182, which is much nearer equality than the old plan, when comparing counties represented by a single member. I have not examined what would be the effect politically, but I have understood from a friend, who generally attends to such matters, that there would be about sixty whigs and forty democrats, if the counties voted as usual. I find that in this respect, there is positively no difference between the plan of the committee and that of the gentleman from Montgomery, which seemed to meet with so much favor here. But there was this difference in the new plan. The one reported by the committee, requires the legislature under any and all circumstances to confine themselves to numbers which might not be the case under the plan of the gentleman from Montgomery. I have not fully examined the plan of the gentleman from Trigg, but I am fully satisfied that in both his and that proposed by the gentleman from Christian, there would be a greater inequality between the counties than could possibly arise under the plan of the committee. I have no personal interest in this matter, as my county can in no case be affected by any apportionment, and my only desire is to guard against the improper adjustment of the matter hereafter by any party which may be in power in the legislature.

Mr. DESHA. From the reflection that I have given the subject, I have been led to believe that the principle contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Trigg is more correct than any that has been submitted, or that I can conceive. The twelve different localities to be provided for under it, would leave to the legislature but little discretion in the manner of rolling residuums as they have heretofore. They are compelled to be confined to the district in which they occur, and thus each and every locality in the state will be fairly represented in the house of representatives. By the plan reported by the committee, the region of country from which I come would be deprived of two representatives. By reference to the second auditor's report, it will be seen that the counties of Mason, Bracken, Nicholas, Harrison, Pendleton, Campbell, Kenton, Boone, and Grant, embrace in the aggregate a voting population of 18,756. The ratio being 1520 would entitle these counties to thirteen representatives, if it be determined that the house of representatives shall consist as now of one hundred members; whereas, if the report of the committee on the legislative department be adopted, those counties will only have eleven members, thereby depriving that region of two representatives, to which it is justly entitled. It may be said that I am actuated by interested motives, but in this matter I only claim clear justice. I represent, as I believe, a just people, and I want to convince them that justice has been administered to them as well as to all other portions of the state. And who gains the representatives that we lose? Their are gained by the small counties in the southwest that have but two thirds of the ratio. Is it fair that the residuums belonging to this section of the state should be rolled to the opposite extreme? It would give to them, when questions came up in the legislature affecting particular localities, a decided advantage over the section from which I came. With these views, I am decidedly of the opinion that the principle contained in the proposition of the gentleman from Trigg is much more correct, and awards even handed justice to every portion of the state. The twelve different localities would have their fair representation in the house, and therefore the plan in this respect, would operate far more upon the principle of even justice. I hope gentlemen will take the matter into consideration, and if they have not made their calculations, will look to it, and see how they are all affected, if the principle proposed by the committee is adopted.

Mr. BRADLEY. I have made up my mind to vote for the substitute presented by the gentleman from Trigg, believing it to approach nearer to equality in representation than any other that I have seen or can conceive of. I prefer it to the plan under the existing constitution, as proposed by the gentleman from Christian, and I differ with him when he asserts that there has been no fault found in the country against the present constitution on that account. There was great complaint, to my knowledge, on the subject. If he will remember, he will find that in the celebrated platform laid down by the friends of constitutional reform, to which some gentlemen attach a great deal of consequence, this very subject is complained of as one of the wrongs in the present constitution which requires amendment. Some statesmen in by-gone days, and of very considerable experience too, have held that it was utterly impracticable, under the present constitution, to apportion representation equally. We can only approximate to it as near as possible, and this I think is done by the proposition of the gentleman from Trigg. Of the twelve districts into which he divides the state, but six of these districts have any residuums, and the great principle is sought to be established there of settling representation in each locality, and of preventing residuums being rolled beyond the districts where they arise. By this arrangement, the largest unrepresented residuum in any one district would be 735; and taking all the districts together, the unrepresented residuums would amount to only 3140. Believing that no system can be proposed which will be found to approximate so nearly to just and equal apportionment, I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Trigg. I am at any rate decidedly against the provisions of the old constitution on the subject.

Mr. JACKSON. I came here with the design to effect certain changes in our constitution, such as were demanded by the citizens of the state. I did not come here to alter the basis of representation, nor can I aid in doing it; but if the vote taken this morning on the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Simpson be an index to the mind of the convention, then a most unexpected alteration in that basis will be effected. Nor did I come here to cut up cities into representative districts, and thus destroy their unity; but this has been effected.

I did hope to preserve to some extent that cardinal conservative principle, recognised in our present constitution, in relation to the senatorial representation of the state, and with that view I offered my amendment yesterday, which, being ruled out of order, was offered by my friend from Scott, (Mr. Johnson) to-day; but that great principle has been overthrown.

In relation to the apportionment, it is certainly to be desired that we adopt some plan for apportioning representation, which will be as far as possible just and accurate in its results. I am sensible of the difficulty of the task. After casting my eye over the various plans submitted for this purpose, I am convinced that the one submitted by the gentleman from Trigg, approximates as near to correctness as we may hope to arrive, and I will give it my support, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Christian.

Mr. GRAY called for the yeas and nays.

The question was then taken on substituting Mr. Boyd's proposition for that of Mr. Gray, and it was agreed to, yeas 49, nays 38, as follows:

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Francis M. Bristow, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, James Dudley, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Richard D. Gholson, James P. Hamilton, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Kavanaugh, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Richard L. Mayes, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, William D. Mitchell, Thomas P. Moore, James M. Nesbitt, Jonathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, Larkin J. Proctor, John T. Robinson, Ira Root, Ignatius A. Spalding, John W. Stevenson, John D. Taylor, John Wheeler, Charles A. Wickliffe, Wesley J. Wright—49.

The question was then taken on substituting

Mr. BOYD'S proposition for the sixth section, as reported by the committee, and it was rejected, yeas 34, nays, 53, as follows:

Mr. HARDIN moved to amend the 6th section by striking out the words "qualified voters therein," and substituting the following: "free white inhabitants of such county, town, or city, and who shall be citizens of the United States, and residents of the state two years, or of the county, town, or city, one year next preceding the enumeration, or children born within one year, of mothers who are entitled to be enumerated."

It was designed merely to carry out, in the section, the idea in the amendment of the gentleman from Simpson, adopted by the convention this morning.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I conclude, from the vote given this morning, that it is the settled purpose of the convention to change the basis of representation. I could add something to what I said this morning upon the subject, but I will not detain the committee with any additional reasons why I am not in favor of doing it at this time, except that I think we may be misled by adverting to the tabular statements presented by the Auditor's report, as to its effect or operation. I was not mistaken in supposing, this morning, that it was the warfare between the rural districts and the cities, that in some degree led to this innovation upon the basis of representation. The tendency of population in our state is found to be, I admit, to the borders of the state, and gentlemen will be mistaken if they do not suppose that tendency will be as great, aye, greater for the next fifty years. So far as relates to the purpose which this amendment is calculated to effect, time will prove that it has been founded in a mistake.

I suppose it is the intention of gentlemen who wish this innovation, that all the citizens of Kentucky, native born and qualified voters shall be enumerated somewhere in this commonwealth, when the assessors are directed to take the enumeration. Ours is rather a moving population, and a large portion of our native population are in the habit of changing their residence. Now if a citizen of Madison, in the month of July, shall remove to Allen, though he may have a family and become a resident, yet the resolution adopted this morning, forbids him and his family to be enumerated until he has been a resident of the county twelve months before he is assessed, and becomes a part of the basis upon which representation is authorized. All will find by referring to the resolution adopted this morning, that such will be its effect. Was it the intention of the convention thus to exclude native born citizens who might be removing from one county to another for permanent or temporary residence?

Mr. HARDIN. A reference to the books of the census and the tables of population exhibits the fact, that the population of women and children in the country is much larger than in the town. I can show that it is so in any county in the state, if gentlemen desire it. Go to Malthus on population, the best author that has ever written on the subject, and he gives you the tables of the population of every city and country in Europe, and they, in all cases, show that there is a greater proportion of men in the town than in the country, in the same amount of population. And the reason, as assigned by the gentleman from Simpson this morning is, that the people in the country are more inclined to marry than in the town. The same reason is given by Malthus, and is explained by the fact that men have not the means, do not own land and houses, and if they do, may not possess the inclination. As to the objection of my colleague, (Mr. Wickliffe,) the amendment might be liable to it if the word "and" instead of "or" had been used, in reference to the requirements of residence. The amendment also provides for the enumeration of children born within the year, because it is said somewhere, they are to come unto the Lord, and I think they ought to be taken care of. I have no feeling on the subject myself, and have introduced the amendment merely to carry out what I suppose from the vote this morning, to be the settled purpose of the house in regard to the basis of representation.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. My objection to changing the basis of representation is not based upon the question whether more children are born in the county or in the town, but on higher grounds. We should not throw into the element of representation either property, territory, or human beings who cannot act in the selection of the public servants.

And then the convention adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 21, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LANCASTER.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. BROWN gave notice of a motion to reconsider the vote taken yesterday adopting the resolution offered by the gentleman from Simpson, (Mr. Clarke.)

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention then resumed the consideration of the article reported by the committee on the legislative department.

Mr. TRIPLETT. The convention adjourned last evening after a few remarks by the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe,) which attracted my attention, and for a moment alarmed me. I thought if I had allowed a provision to pass without my usual watchfulness, that could bear the construction which the gentleman gave it, I had done that which I did not intend. The purport of the gentleman's remarks was, that if this resolution was not altered the free white inhabitants would not be enumerated unless they had been born in Kentucky, and had also resided in the town or county two years. On reading it over, I thought there might be something in it. But on further examination, I am satisfied it will not bear the construction which was put upon it, and that it should not be altered, provided the principle is right. Our present constitution provides that,

"In all elections for representatives, every free male citizen (negroes, mulattoes and indians excepted,) who, at the time being, hath attained to the age of twenty one years, and resided in the state two years, or the county or town in which he offers to vote one year next preceding the election, shall enjoy the right of an elector; but no person shall be entitled to vote, except in the county in which he may actually reside at the time of the election, except as herein otherwise provided."

The provision now proposed makes all who have resided in the county, town, or city, one year preceding the census or enumeration of the people, (aliens not naturalized excepted,) the basis of representation.

It is best always in writing out an instrument which is to last for ages, as I hope this constitution will, to use language to which a construction has been given, with which we are familiar, provided it corresponds to the course we wish to pursue. The old constitution says "every free male." The word free is surplusage, because whites are free of course. The language is precisely that which is used in the resolution which this house adopted, with the exception of the words relating to a residence of one year in the town, county, or city, preceding the election. If not born in the state, but having resided one year in the county, town, or city, you are a citizen. I would prefer that the resolution should be so altered as to agree, word for word, with the old constitution, and also adopt the resolution, that where the party has resided in the state two years, he shall be enumerated, although he has not resided in the county or town one year.

When in order, I will move to strike out all of that part of the sixth section of the present report, which comes in contact with this, which I propose to offer, and insert this in lieu of it. It will save the very difficulty into which we have sometimes fallen in the old constitution—the difficulty of construction. That is a thing on which I wish to keep my eye fixed, to leave as little as possible to judicial construction. The principles are not the same in two respects, as the house will see.

"At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, and every eighth year thereafter, the general assembly shall cause an enumeration to be made of the representative population of this commonwealth, and such a ratio shall be fixed as will give one hundred representatives, which shall be divided among the different counties, cities, and towns, in the following ratio: Each county, city, or town, having two-thirds of such ratio shall be entitled to one representative: each county, city, or town, having the full ratio and two-thirds over, shall have two representatives; and when any county, city, or town, shall have less than two-thirds of the ratio, it shall be added to the next adjoining county having the smallest representative population: and if, when thus added, the two counties shall have the full ratio and two-thirds over, they shall together, be entitled to two representatives."

Some advantage is gained here by the clearness of expression, leaving little to construction. Another matter in which it differs is, it authorizes the legislature to vary from seventy-five to one hundred representatives. I am opposed to that, and I believe the convention will be. When it is necessary to decrease or increase for party purposes, they can do it to some extent, as they formerly rolled residuums from one part of the state to the other. It is better to have it fixed in the constitution. Who has a better right to say how many representatives Kentucky shall have than this convention?

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. The remarks I made last evening, were more immediately directed to the amendment offered to the section under consideration, and a little reflection and examination of that amendment, have not changed my own opinion of the proper construction and reading of it, nor do I rise to extend any philological discussion on the article. But I suggest to my friend to take that article and read it. I think it proposes to enumerate all persons who pay taxes, though not entitled to vote; that you propose to make population the basis of representation; that you intend to enumerate all citizens of the United States, who are inhabitants living within any county. Do I understand the advocates of the amendment? I will put the case. A citizen removes from Indiana into Kentucky with his property, or from Tennessee, or Virginia, being a native born citizen of the United States, and will not be entitled to vote for two years. But do you not intend to have him enumerated? Your resolution does not reach him, according to my construction.

Mr. TRIPLETT. It is perfectly apparent that if a family moves across the Ohio the day before the election, they should not be enumerated, and it was to prevent frauds that a residence of one year was required. One of the causes of complaint against the river counties and cities is, that with great ease they could import voters when voters were the basis of representation. Unless you require a residence of some time within a city, county, or town, you do not get clear of that fraud. On the contrary, you leave it wider than before, because if they could move voters across the Ohio, now they can remove families, and by enumeration would increase the representation from that city or county. Therefore, it was proper that a residence of some time should be required. How long a residence? The probability is, that if they live in a county for one year, they will feel an interest in the state, and should be added to the population. It is only those whose interests are identified with Kentucky that Kentucky should represent. We ought not to represent those who have no Kentucky feelings or interests. I am willing that those who have resided in the state two years should be added, although they have not resided in the city or county one year, and thus place them on the same footing that voters formerly occupied.

Mr. HARDIN. The constitution now requires that a man should have lived two years in the state and one year in the county, immediately preceding the election. If he has resided in the state two years, he may vote, although he has not resided in the county one week. The present provision of the report requires all that the present constitution requires, in the eighth section, with this addition, that they must have resided in the precinct, town, or county, sixty days; and further, that each voter must vote in the precinct in which he lives; because, before that time he might vote in different precincts. I know a man who once voted in three precincts in one day. This is a wise provision, that they shall vote only in the precinct where they live, and shall have lived in that precinct sixty days before the election. I recollect there was a whig out at the furnace in Bullitt county, who went over into Hardin and Grayson, and hired a number of wood-choppers ten days before an election. That is what they call in the state of New York "pipe laying." It was to prevent that, that a residence of sixty days was required. This provision requires that the qualifications of those enumerated shall come up to those contained in the eighth section; that is, they shall be citizens of the United States, residents of the state two years, and of the county sixty days. Whatever would qualify a man to vote, would qualify him to be enumerated.

Mr. PRESTON. I offer the following substitute for the amendment of the senior gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin.) Strike out the words, "qualified voters," and insert, "free white inhabitants."

We have heard this subject discussed with a great deal of ability in this house, and though differing from my colleagues in my vote, I went for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Simpson, and am prepared to maintain it, and not only to maintain it, but to proceed a step beyond it. I listened with no little pleasure, to the senior gentleman from Nelson, when he proposed and advocated his amendment yesterday. He invoked the authority of the federal government, cited the practice of our sister states, and proposed that a different basis of representation should be introduced into the commonwealth of Kentucky. Now, the right of suffrage is one thing, and the basis of representation another.

For instance, under the federal constitution three-fifths of the negroes in Kentucky are represented. They enter into the basis of representation, and fall within the enumeration, but they constitute no part of the voting population. And so far as I understand, those states of the union that have adopted white inhabitants—including the women and children—as the basis of enumeration, not one has deemed it necessary to place the same guards around it that they do around the right of suffrage; but simply state that the white inhabitants are to be enumerated. Thus the federal constitution operates, and you enumerate every alien in this state in order to send our representatives to congress. The reason of that enumeration was the one referred to by the gentleman yesterday; that is, the alien pays taxes, as well as the women and children, and that motive has induced most of the states of the union—fourteen, as I find from examination—not to make the qualified voters the basis of enumeration, but the free inhabitants of the several states. I would direct attention to the list of states, and mention, in order to be brief, that there are three bases of enumeration, in the states of the union. First, qualified voters; second, inhabitants—(in some, free white inhabitants, in others, are enumerated free negroes)—and in the third, it is arbitrary, thus:

Wisconsin, Texas, Indiana, Tennessee, New Jersey, Maine, and Kentucky, require an enumeration to be made of qualified voters; making six states of the union. But Iowa, Texas, and Missouri require the white inhabitants to be enumerated. Michigan requires the whole population to be enumerated, free negroes and others. Ohio, and our sister states, Alabama, Mississippi, and South Carolina, require the free white inhabitants to be enumerated, with no restrictions, such as the gentleman desires to be thrown around them. Pennsylvania requires those who pay taxes to constitute the basis. New York makes it broad, and applies it to all her inhabitants, excluding simply aliens. Connecticut uses the broad word, "population"—Rhode Island the same—Massachusetts, "inhabitants," and some arbitrary provisions. Taxation is the basis in North Carolina. The state of Georgia adopts the federal plan of enumerating three-fifths of the negroes. Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, New Hampshire, and Vermont are arbitrary in their provisions.

Now, what I mean to say is this: that Kentucky and her six sister states use the term, qualified voters, in forming the basis of representation. Fourteen of the states have generally declared for the free white inhabitants; some of them, however—the northern states—making a variation in relation to free negroes, to form the basis of representation. In order to be consistent, we have to come to one of those three plans.

But what is the necessity of throwing the guards around the enumeration which the gentleman has introduced? Are we to invest the census taker with the power of judging whether an alien has received his naturalization papers or not? Are we to give him the right of saying whether a man is a citizen or not? Is there any state in the union that constitutes a census taker to be a judge of the qualifications of citizens? Is he like a man midwife, to tell the period of the birth of children? Is he to proceed and ascertain how long a man has been in the country? and cross question him about his domestic affairs? With what compulsory powers is he to be invested? These exist, and are exercised only, by the judges of election; but they are absolutely unknown to the census taker, either under the federal or state government. It is perfectly impracticable in itself. Now, this is the first great practical difficulty in throwing guards around the enumeration. The gentleman from Daviess says, unless you throw guards around the mode of taking the enumeration, and unless you make the census taker, he says, the judge in this case, you will be flooded by immigration from all the neighboring states around our borders. Is not the fear absolutely idle? It is a hard enough thing to colonize the real voters when a pressing election is near at hand, for the purpose of making an enumeration in the city, but to set to work a year before the legislature meets in this hall, to frame its apportionment bill, and get men, women, and children all huddled together—because a child does just as well as a man under this plan—and bring them across to Kentucky to be represented, is absurd, and not at all likely to take place.

Mr. TRIPLETT. I expressly said the object of putting in one year, was to prevent their being brought in, as heretofore, just before the election.

Mr. PRESTON. It amounts to the same thing. The fear is perfectly unfounded. The city of Louisville, it is said, is not blessed with the same number of children as the country—that she is not so prolific as the counties. Gentlemen go to a certain extent in reference to forming a basis. I am willing to go further. We have some fifteen hundred children in the counties of Hart, Todd, Logan, and Trigg, more than Louisville has. It seems to be made an incident in the proposed restriction. I was willing to do any thing fair, and I voted for it, and I will not only sustain the gentleman in that, but I will vote to put the whole population of the state in, and carry that principle out to the extent to which fourteen states have gone. I will give him all the assistance I can, in the furtherance of his plan. To return to the gentleman from Daviess. Is it not, let me ask the house, an unnecessary apprehension, that when seven or eight thousand souls will constitute the basis of an assembly district, we will proceed to colonize just before an enumeration takes place, in order to swell it up? I want the attention of the house to that point for one moment. That is the main argument of the gentleman from Nelson, on which all his others are based, if I understand him correctly. Now, out of all these fourteen states, none of them have ever deemed it necessary to throw this guard around the enumeration. None have armed the census taker with the examination of the rights of citizenship and suffrage.

Mr. DIXON. I voted for that resolution, offered by my friend from Simpson like many others. I suspect I voted too hastily, although it looks well in the resolution. I am not disposed to attach any thing to the constitution which I think will weigh it down, when it comes to be acted on by the people. I have examined the amendment offered by my friend from Nelson, and I say, that in his opinions on this, and all other subjects, I have the greatest confidence, and I would yield to his views, if I could with consistency. But I am not prepared to go for his amendment.

I see many difficulties growing out of this matter, which cause me to pause before I proceed further. The difficulty suggested by my friend from Louisville is a great one, which is, that of determining who is, and who is not to form the element of this basis. We start the census taker through the state or city to find out who the qualified persons are. He comes to a house where there are children, a woman, and a man, and the question comes up, is that man naturalized. He may be a foreigner; the children may have been born here, or not; the wife may have been naturalized, or not. I do not see how in the name of justice he is to tell, who is to form the basis.

There is another objection. It is substituting one basis for another, and this will have some effect. It will transfer representation from one point to another, or from one class to another class. I want to know if gentlemen have made up their minds that this transfer is fair. Are you to take it from the slaveholding population, and transfer it elsewhere? How will it effect the slaveholder? I do not know, and I want gentlemen to inquire into it.

I understood it was the object of the gentleman to restrict cities, but I think this will not do it. If I understand it, Louisville contains 50,000 inhabitants, and the whole population of the state is 700,000. If from the 50,000 in the city of Louisville, 10,000 are taken for negroes and aliens, it will reduce the population to be represented to 40,000. If those not represented in the balance of the state are subtracted, it will leave 600,000, beside the 40,000 in Louisville. If this is true, Louisville will then have, instead of four representatives, six and two thirds. That is the way the matter presents itself. I was for giving them the old basis, but it is now a question whether, if the principle is correct, we should apply it in this instance. If we take the new basis of representation, we transfer that which belongs to other parts of the state to the city of Louisville. I do not wish to do it. Whether children are born there in as great numbers as in other parts of the state, in proportion to numbers, or not, people are moving in there from all parts of the United States, and swelling the population of the city. I am not for taking population from the slave counties, and transferring it to that city.

Mr. DAVIS. We are now about to settle—I suppose—what is to be regarded as a just representative principle; and some of our friends are very fond of following out, and identifying principles. The question is, what principle does the convention intend to adopt, and adhere to, in regard to representation? It was a favorite notion, a few days past, that population should be the basis of representation—not population generally, because if so, the slave population would be represented, or at least would be made one of the elements of the basis of representation; and free negroes, also, would be made one of the elements of this basis of representation. But all gentlemen repudiate these, as two of the components of this basis of representation which we are about to form.

Something has been said about the mingling of taxation, in the adjustment of the principle of representation. If this should be the case, my county would fare much better than she is likely to do. The taxable property of Bourbon county, is about $12,000,000; furnishing a revenue of from $18,000 to $20,000 a year. But I believe, on the principle of representation, as indicated yesterday, she would fare worse than any county in the state; for she seems to have a smaller proportion of children than many other counties—whatever the reason may be, I am not able to account for it.

It seems to me, that there is a principle, that should be traced as a golden thread, in the adoption of a basis of representation. We have a representative government, and we are about to adopt a basis, upon which the representative principle shall be carried out. What is the correct basis? It is, that the population of the country which possesses the political power, and which has a right to possess it, shall form the basis of representation. It is not numbers that we propose to represent, it is not slaves, it is not free negroes, it is not women and children that are to be represented, according to the philosophy of our system of government. It is the political authority of the country that is represented; and that alone can be represented. Women do not vote, children do not vote; they do not petition for a change of measures, they do not remonstrate against the adoption of measures. They exercise no control whatever, over the operations of government. There is a power that does exercise the control, and what power is that? It is the adult male voting population of the country. It is not numbers alone, it is will and purpose that is represented—it is only purpose—will, that ought to be, and in truth is represented. We may give to a country additional political power and strength, on account of children, yet they do not vote; or on account of women, yet they do not vote. They have no voice in the adoption of measures of government—like that which is spoken by men; no persons have a right to be heard, save the men who have the power and the right to vote. They instruct the representatives at the polls, and they instruct them afterwards by petition and remonstrance. This being the only controlling power, then, it is idle to say, that women and children are to be an element in forming the basis of representation. Your political power is derived from the voting population, and all you have to do is, to represent that power. Suppose you could modify your form of representation, and instead of establishing agents, go back to the primary and original holders of power, and let them wield that power, and rule the destinies of the country. Upon whom then would it fall? Upon the voting population of the country. But this being inconvenient, and in fact impracticable, it becomes necessary to rule by agencies. Is it not as important then, that the voting population should be the basis, when agencies prevail, as when the primary power is employed—otherwise you subvert and revolutionise the principles upon which the government is founded. That is the power that wields all political authority; that power alone speaks potentially in all the measures of government; and it is that power alone that has a right to be represented.

Now it seems to me very plain, that all you have to do, is to ascertain the voting population of the country, and when you have done that, provide for the impartial and just representation of their power. Whatever the frauds which the gentleman from Nelson adverted to yesterday—that intervene in cities, and that may be prevented by legislative enactments—may be, guard this mode of representation, represent fairly that power, and constitute it the basis of representation, and when you have done that, you have adhered to the true principle upon which representation should be based. Any departure from it is a departure from the true philosophy of our system of government.

Mr. HARDIN. A great part of the argument of the gentleman from Henderson and the gentleman from Louisville consists in the supposed difficulties of ascertaining the number of qualified voters on the part of the individual who takes the census. Are not the gentlemen aware, that as the law now stands, he is required to take the number of qualified voters? Any man who chooses to see spirits, can see them. Gentlemen can conjure up difficulties where none exist. The assessor or commissioner is now not only required to ascertain who are entitled to vote and who are not, but he is also required to ascertain the number of children between the ages of five and sixteen years; and the United States marshal is required to ascertain the number of individuals between the ages of ten and fifteen, and so on to one hundred. I understand the force of the gentleman's argument very well. You are, says he, only to take those who are inhabitants of a county or a city. That is the very thing I want to guard against. I want the population which is to be the basis of representation, to have precisely the same qualifications that voters have in regard to naturalization, and not swell your representation by taking in persons who are not citizens. It is upon this point that we are at issue. The gentleman assigns one set of reasons and I another. He says it is impossible to take into the enumeration women and children under the age of twenty one years. I say there is no difficulty whatever in doing so.

My friend who was last up, says it should be confined to the voting population because they are the only persons who have the power to act in relation to the measures of government. Well sir, I take the whole population. Suppose the whole population in a county is sufficient to entitle it to a representative in the house, and the voting population is not sufficient. Take the county of Larue, she has about two thirds of the ratio for a representative. And in the course of two years, if the river counties should increase as they have done, and the interior stock raising counties should not increase in the same proportion, Larue will fall below two thirds; but if you take in the women and children, Larue will be entitled to a representative. Take Hardin county, and at the end of two years, she will hardly have enough for one representative and two thirds over; but if you take in women and children, she will have a number amply sufficient for two without any controversy. The voters in Hardin county are 2,367, the children between five and sixteen years of age are 3,308—a difference of about 1000. The gentlemen can see exactly what I am driving at. It is that the interior counties will be cut off from their due share of representation, if you take the voting population as the basis of representation; whereas they will be entitled to their proper share if you include women and children; and as to the difficulty of enumerating them, there is none whatever.

As to the argument of the gentleman from Henderson. He says there is a constant crowd of population pouring into the cities. I know there is; but there is a larger proportion of men than of women and children. Why is it so? Because men go their for business purposes. Examine the commissioners' books all over the United States, beginning at Massachusetts and going to the mouth of the Mississippi river, and you will see that the numbers of the two classes of population, male and female, in city and country, approximate much nearer between the ages of twenty and forty, than at any other age. Take any age below twenty and above forty, and you will find a wide difference in the population. What does this prove? It proves that there is less difference between the voters and the whole population in the towns and cities than there is in the country.

The gentleman from Bourbon advanced, I presume without much reflection, a proposition which I hope he will retract. That women and children have no right to petition. They are the very class of population that are entitled to the right of petition.

Mr. DAVIS. I did not intend to assert that they have not that right.

Mr. HARDIN. That is what I supposed. I know my friend from Louisville, wants to get in men, women, and children, who are not citizens, and if his amendment should be adopted, he will get in hundreds and thousands who are not citizens; who are not Americans, and who may, perhaps, not have been in the country fifty days. I want to exclude them, unless they have been here two years. The gentleman says we should protect the foreign population. Well sir, I shall vote for making the native population and the naturalized aliens the basis of representation.

Mr. MITCHELL. It seems to me, the whole scope of the gentleman's argument goes to show that what has been presented here as the basis of representation, is not in fact, such a basis. The principle, if there be any principle, that is embodied in this resolution, is designed not to fix what I regard as the basis of representation, but to establish the means of distributing political power throughout the state. It amounts to nothing more than that, a means for the distribution of political power throughout the state; and we shall be at length compelled, in establishing representative responsibility, to fall back upon the true basis of representation, which is political numbers. In the federal constitution, population is assumed, for what purpose? Not as I conceive, to fix the basis of representation; but to give to each state the measure of its political power. I apprehend that federal numbers assigns, by our national compact, the measure of its political power to each state, and that the state itself afterwards fixes the basis of representation. This results from compromise and necessity. In some of the states the right of suffrage is restricted, in others it is more extended; hence the necessity for adopting the plan which is laid down in the federal constitution; which amounts to nothing more than a distribution of political power among the states, and the state afterwards fixes her basis of representation when she determines the extent of her elective franchise. The very term basis, itself, implies that something must rest upon it. When therefore, you say that the whole population is the basis of representation, and yet that that representation covers but a part of this basis, there is a portion of the basis on which nothing rests. In adopting the resolution which has been adopted here, and engrafting the amendment now proposed to be engrafted on the section under consideration, we depart from the principle which has heretofore governed us in our apportionment of political power among the different sections of the state, and adopt a new mode. But when we carry out the principle of representation, we are compelled to fall back upon the old principle. Whose voice does the representative bring into the council chamber? It is not the voice of the whole population. It is the voice of those who created the representative! Representation must be as large as its basis. I cannot conceive of an agent, without supposing some principal who has vested power in the agent; I cannot conceive of a principal outside of those who have created—if you please, this agency. It is true, sir, that there are other interests in the country, besides these which reside in the political numbers, who wield the power of the country; but these other interests are so intimately associated with the interests of those who wield the political power, that while subserving the one you subserve the other, also. The voting population of the country is the quasi guardian of all other interests in the country which are not represented. By adopting the principle contained in the resolution, and contained in the amendment now proposed, you create an irresponsible mediate representation. Inasmuch as there is no voice represented, but that of the voting population, the voting population must represent the other interests. If this be true, then, those who have the largest amount of this sort of association connected with them should have the largest voice. If the husband represent the interests of his wife and children, the husband ought to have, at the polls, a more potential voice than the man who has none of these interests connected with him. If on the other hand it is right that every free-man who is entitled to vote should have an equal voice, then sir, there is none of this mediate representation which this new basis would seem to contemplate. I take it, sir, that this is nothing more than a provision for the distribution of political power—it is not a basis of representation. I was opposed to the resolution, and I am also opposed to this amendment.

Mr. WOODSON. Mr. President: The amendment just offered by my friend from the city of Louisville, (Mr. Preston,) involves an interesting and an exceedingly important principle—no less sir, than the true basis of a free representative government. I have given no vote since I have occupied a seat upon this floor, that has not had for its object the promotion of the interest, the welfare, and happiness of the greatest possible number of my fellow-citizens. The maxim, "the greatest good to the greatest number," has never been lost sight of in any vote I have given—any speech I have made, or in any act I have performed.

I have been voting for, and uncompromisingly advocating, for the last five or six days, the extension of equal, political, and representative rights and privileges to all the citizens of every portion of the state, regardless of partizan or local considerations; permitting my love of equality and my devotion to principle alone to govern my action. And when the convention on yesterday determined, by an overwhelming majority, to regard nothing but numbers in the distribution of political representative rights, I supposed that the same high and elevated considerations were influencing every other delegate upon this floor.

The resolution of the delegate from Simpson, (Mr. Clarke,) which this convention adopted yesterday morning almost without a dissenting voice, asserts that the free white inhabitants in the state shall constitute the basis of representation in both branches of the legislature. The amendment now pending reiterates the same great principle, and nothing more or less. We yesterday declared, in the most solemn manner—no one seriously objecting that I remember—that such should be the basis. This morning we are about to reverse the decision of yesterday, and declare that representation shall be founded upon the number of qualified voters, and not the number of free inhabitants in the state.

The resolution was presented yesterday, and its inherent merits were so manifest to all, that few of us failed to give it our support. The pil- lows of gentlemen during the past night, suggested I suppose, a different policy; and we find this morning the friends of the measure yesterday, most boisterous in its denunciation. It is not for me to say, why this change? Gentlemen have sufficient reasons, I doubt not. I trust, however, that a bare suggestion, that figures may have been resorted to by them, and that a mathematical demonstration, that certain localities were to be shorn of a portion of their political privileges, may have had a tendency to overcome their preconceived predilections for the intrinsic merits of the proposition, will not be unkindly received. Sir, when an attempt was made recently to deprive the counties bordering on the Ohio river of their just rights in the administration of the government of Kentucky hereafter, I did not stop to enquire what effect the injustice attempted would have upon my particular locality; I only looked at the great principle of equal representation which was sought to be violated, and I determined, at every hazard, to do all I could to prevent its consummation. We succeeded—and now, let us adopt what basis we may, there are no invidious distinctions to be drawn between the rights of the citizen living upon the green banks of the beautiful Ohio, and the citizen of the interior. This is all as it should be. But sir, I desire to regard other interests than those of the qualified voters, in fixing the basis of representation. The widows, orphans, mothers, and children of this commonwealth, in my estimation, have equal claims upon our attention. Where ever a woman or child is found, protection is required. The truth is, the children of Kentucky have a greater interest in what we do, and what the legislature may do, than ourselves. The subject of education has occupied much of the attention of our legislatures for many years past, and no subject is more worthy the attention of this convention, or will have higher claims upon those who are destined to fill our legislative halls under the new constitution. Mothers and children are peculiarly interested in the legislation of the state upon the subject of education. Yet sir, if qualified voters are to be the established basis of representation, the wishes and interests of mothers and children are not to be consulted in this matter. I do not desire that minors or women shall exercise the right of suffrage. The first has not the maturity of judgment to warrant its judicious exercise, nor is the latter to be soiled by being thrown into the political arena. What I desire, is, that they shall be represented by some one who feels an interest for them. Why sir, if there was not a qualified voter in the counties I represent, I should still feel the responsibility resting upon me here, or in the legislative councils of the country, to be quite as great as at present—indeed, more so. I represent upon this floor two thousand seven hundred and forty six children, between the ages of five and sixteen. Shall I be told that these children have no interests in the government? No one will do it sir. Yet in the apportionment of representation under the present constitution, they have no more weight than so many cattle, horses, or hogs. I do not think that this is as it should be.

But my friend from Henderson, (Mr. Dixon,) says that when the proposition to apportion representation according to the resolution of the gentleman from Simpson, that is to say, when the proposition to apportion representation agreeably to the number of inhabitants in each county, including women and children, was voted upon, that it was passed for the purpose of restricting the rights of the cities—particularly the city of Louisville—but that it has now been ascertained, that so far from injuring Louisville, that she will get an additional representative, and that he does not suppose that gentlemen wish to give her any more political power than she already has. Now sir, I must confess that I was greatly surprised indeed, when the gentleman resorted to such an argument. He has been the bold, fearless champion of the rights of Louisville, in all that has been done to affect her, in any wise, since we have been here; and I now venture to say that if he were directly asked if he voted for the resolution because it was to injuriously affect Louisville, he would not own it—indeed I know that he did not—that he could not have been influenced by any such considerations, after the unlimited and unqualified advocacy of equal rights to all, in which he indulged a day or two since. No sir, no. But then there are perhaps gentlemen upon this floor who were influenced by such motives, and who the gentleman may think will reverse their steps whenever it is ascertained that Louisville is to be benefited by their course. How far the remarks alluded to were intended or expected to influence such gentlemen, the author of them is better aware than myself. I have not been able thought to increase the strength of Louisville by the establishment of the basis proposed. I do not believe that it will be increased.

That the mountains are to be benefitted by it, however, no one doubts. For sir, let the residue of the state outstrip us as far as may be in every other sort of prosperity, thank God we stand unrivalled in the number, the beauty, and (equal opportunities afforded,) the intelligence of our children.

If the proposition under discussion should be carried, the county of Knox will not only have the full ratio entitling her to a separate representative, but a large overplus. The same advantage will accrue to Whitley, Laurel, Rockcastle, and Floyd, and perhaps Clay. And if the increase of the population of the mountain counties increases as much faster for the next ten years, as it has for the last ten, over the counties of the interior, every mountain county will have a separate member upon the floor of the house of representatives. And when such shall be the case, does any gentleman suppose that because the mountain representative has the interests of the rising generation in his hands, particularly, that he will occupy a less interesting, important, or responsible position, than if he were representing qualified voters alone? But sir, I will extend my remarks no farther, simply suggesting that when the rights of the city of Louisville were pending in this hall gentlemen were appealed to—their sense of justice invoked—and equal rights have been extended to her. I now ask for no equal rights for a great city—already the proud metropolis of a great state—I ask sir, though, for justice to be done the women and children of our beloved, glorious old commonwealth. I admit that some portions of the state will be deprived of the privileges they now enjoy. But gentlemen ought to be and will be consoled by the reflection that all they have lost, the women and children, the pride and glory of our common country, have gained.

Mr. NUTTALL. I understand that the principle contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Simpson, is now proposed to be engrafted in the Constitution. Whilst I would not vote with my friend from Hardin (Mr. Brown,) for a re-consideration of the vote, by which that resolution was adopted, I nevertheless cannot vote for the incorporation of an abstract proposition in the constitution. It is strange indeed, that the pro-slavery men in this convention who have been, on all other subjects, so vigilant, so watchful, so careful, to guard their interests, are now for the incorporation of a principle in the constitution that will pull down one of the bulwarks by which their property is protected. I will not stop here to assign the reasons why it will have this effect. I think they ought to suggest themselves to the mind of every delegate. We have heard a great deal about the river counties, by which the interior of the state is belted. With what sort of population are those counties and the cities that are to grow up within them, to be filled? With a population sir, that care nothing about your slave property. And you do not base your representation on the population of the state.—The negro population is to be totally disregarded in the enumeration.

I declared originally that I was willing to violate one of the cardinal doctrines of republican government, in order to restrict the cities; and I shall not go now for giving them greater power under the enumeration proposed, than they would otherwise have. I understand that the adult voting population is the proper basis of representation in this country. They, and none other, have the right to exercise political functions. No other class of the population is clothed with political power. The women and children of the country have no political powers—have no power to control the measures of government. They ought not therefore, to enter into the enumeration, in order to form a basis for representation. I shall vote against this proposition, believing it is wrong in principle.

Mr. BROWN. The question is not whether women and children should be taken into the enumeration; it is whether the voting population of the country shall be the basis of representation. I conceive their interests will be as well represented upon one basis as the other. The question is not whether we shall permit them to come to the polls and cast their votes. They are not allowed to do this. If they were, I would be in favor of including them in the basis of representation. The senior gentleman from Nelson has taken occasion to refer to my county and to present the fact, that it has a larger proportion of children than other counties. That may be true; and I am glad if it be so. But I shall allow no such consideration to influence me here. For more than half a century, the voting population has constituted the basis of representation; and there has been no dissatisfaction expressed on the part of the people—they have not demanded a change in this respect. But I have seen a disposition on the part of delegates to go beyond the public demands, in reference to reforms in the constitution of Kentucky. I have occasionally had the honor to represent my county, and as a public man, I have always been prepared to meet my responsibility. The gentleman need not give himself any uneasiness on my account. I do not fear that my county will be deprived of her two representatives. I have no such apprehension. And if I had, I would not permit any consideration of that kind to induce me to depart from an established principle—a principle sanctioned by time and experience.

Mr. McHENRY. I voted yesterday for the resolution of the gentleman from Simpson, though my intention was originally, to vote for no abstract proposition whatever; and subsequent reflection has confirmed me in my first determination. I believe that vote was wrong. The people have not complained of the present basis of representation, and I think it is better to let the present system remain, than to adopt another that might operate unequally, and detrimentally to some portions of the state; and which might create many enemies to the new constitution. I have not arrived at this conclusion, from any calculation by figures, as the gentleman from Knox (Mr. Woodson) has suggested, in regard to the effect it may have upon my county. In fact, I have not been able to see, precisely, how it will operate. As the resolution for which I voted was a mere abstract proposition, I do not feel myself bound to vote for its introduction into the constitution, but shall sustain the old basis of representation; that is, according to the number of qualified voters. That is a system that the people understand, and I believe it is the one they most approve of.

Mr. GHOLSON. I do not suppose I can shed any light upon the subject; indeed I will not attempt it. I want to know the nearest mode of getting a vote upon the question. If I was ever astonished in my life, it was to see the exhibition that has been made here. The proposition that was before the house yesterday, was so evidently founded in justice, that I thought the house could have no hesitation in coming to a conclusion; I therefore moved the previous question.

Now, I want to see how many of the talented gentlemen of this body—to whom we have been accustomed to look up, as examples for our imitation, in point of consistency—will, within twenty-four hours, change their minds, and vote against a proposition which they were once in favor of. What does it matter, where the representation shall fall, so long as the result must be that representation will be equal, in proportion to numbers. If it be now in order, I will move the previous question.

Mr. CLARKE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion for the previous question for a moment, and I will renew it if he desires that I shall do so.

Mr. GHOLSON. Certainly, I withdraw it.

Mr. CLARKE. I had supposed, after the debate which took place yesterday, and after the vote that was taken, that the principle had been settled, that the description of population referred to in the resolution I had the honor to submit, should form the basis of representation. I supposed the principle had been settled, and permanently settled, by that vote. I should not trouble the convention, however, with any remarks, were it not for the fact, that the gentleman from Henderson (Mr. Dixon) has presented an argument here, based upon a calculation, that in my judgment, is fallacious, and logically speaking, false. The gentleman assumes that we are all in error when we say, that the rural districts of this state will be benefited, by making the whole white population of the state—with the restrictions thrown around them by the resolution—the basis of representation; and he contents himself with assuming this to be the fact, without furnishing the basis upon which he arrives at such a conclusion.

Mr. DIXON. I presented the basis of my calculation as I received it from the honorable president of this convention, from the gentleman from Louisville, (Mr. Preston) and from my friend from Shelby, (Mr. G. W. Johnston.) I gave what I supposed to be a fair basis.

Mr. CLARKE. I have no doubt the information of the honorable president, and of the other gentleman from Louisville may be correct; they may have the means of obtaining the number of free white persons in Louisville. I say they may be correct, because I do not know what their city regulations are; I have not examined the subject for I felt no interest in it. But I would like to know how it is that gentlemen can state with any certainty, what the free white population now is, or what it has been at any period since 1840? I grant, that if you allow gentlemen to assume their facts, there is no difficulty in arriving at the conclusion to which they wish to come. But when the census was taken in 1840, I believe the whole population of Louisville was but 21,000, and at that time the population of the state was 590,000. Is it not reasonable to conclude, that if Louisville has, since 1840, grown from a population of 21,000 up to 50,000, the state has grown in the same ratio? Let me assume facts, and I can give to Louisville, or any other city in the state, twenty members in the lower house. But there has never, since 1840, been a criterion furnished, by which the white population of the city can be ascertained. I grant, sir, that we can ascertain the number of white citizens over twenty-one years of age; I grant, sir, that we can ascertain the number of qualified voters; I grant, sir, that we can ascertain the number of children between the ages of five and sixteen. We ascertain all these facts from the Auditor's report; but, sir, when you go to the innumerable number of those males and females under five years of age, and females over sixteen, there are no data furnished, by which you can arrive at a correct conclusion.

Now, sir, allow me to assume a fact. If it be assumed here that Louisville has a population of fifty thousand, I assume that the state has a white population of one million, and then let the gentleman make his calculation upon this assumption of facts.

Many difficulties present themselves to gentlemen here this morning. One is the supposed difficulty of ascertaining the number of the white male citizens of Kentucky; and the gentleman from Louisville undertook to say that you are conferring upon the commissioner the exercise of an arbitrary power, in permitting him to determine who are the qualified voters. Now, sir, if I know any thing about the duties of a commissioner, as prescribed by the laws of this state, they are, that he shall ascertain the number of qualified voters, and it is upon his report that the apportionment of representation is based. There is no other practical mode by which you can ascertain the number. Why, the commissioner has the power of fixing the value of your property. If you do not place it as high as he thinks you ought to place it, he can put his own value upon it. And I ask how long it will take, when he is ascertaining from the head of a family how much taxable property he has, to ascertain, at the same time, how many children there are in his family between certain ages. And yet this has presented an insuperable objection to the minds of some gentlemen. I have not time to discuss the merits of the principle contained in the resolution; but if we are to establish the principle that population shall furnish the basis of representation, I appeal to every gentleman on this floor, whether it is not safer and better, as far as the rural districts are concerned, that we should base representation upon the whole white population, than that we should base it upon the voting population? For no one here will be bold enough to say that if there is an increase of population that increase consists of voters, and not to the same extent of women and children. You may take any place you please, in the union, that is increasing in population, and you will find that where an increase of voters has taken place, more women and children are to be found, in proportion to those voters, in the rural districts than in any city or town.

Mr. BRISTOW. I fear that we are attaching rather too much importance to Louisville. I have been constantly voting to give to Louisville equal representation with the balance of the state. I did so because I thought it was but just and proper that she should have it. But I apprehend that if every question is to be settled by a reference to the bearing it is to have upon Louisville, we shall find ourselves involved in some difficulty.

But we are about to settle a very important question. It is proposed to change a principle that has been acted upon, under our present constitution, ever since its formation, and which has been entirely satisfactory to the country.

It is one of the points on which I was particularly guarded before I left home, that I would not spring new questions, nor vote for new propositions, which had not been considered by the people. I came here to make changes on those subjects only, upon which complaint existed. But the principle contended for here, gentlemen say, is so clear, so palpably just, that we ought not to hesitate to adopt it; especially as we voted for it yesterday. There are a great many principles that I would vote for, as abstract principles, that I would not put into the constitution. Looking at this question in a practical point of view, I am satisfied that the qualified voters in the state should be the basis of representation. My course in regard to this proposition, is not influenced by any effect it may have on my section of country; for I suppose gentlemen are correct when they say it will increase our representation. But if the elder gentleman from Nelson is correct, I am the more confirmed in my opposition to the introduction of this new principle; for if all these frauds can be committed in cities, when qualified voters constitute the basis of representation, I ask how it would be if we put a new element into that basis? We must then, of course, be swallowed up entirely. How do gentlemen find out that frauds are committed? The proper mode of preventing fraud is, to constitute the voting population the basis of representation. It is true, I voted for the resolution on yesterday, but I would not then have voted to incorporate the principle into the constitution. How can we tell what the result will be? We have not the data before us to enable us to come to a conclusion. Gentlemen say they care not what the result may be, if we have a correct principle to stand upon; but I would like to test its practical operation before adopting it. Besides, the question has not been discussed before the people, and they are not prepared for it. However clear it may seem to some gentlemen, it may not prove advantageous in its operation; and it is better that we should not risk the introduction of a new principle, that may prove injurious in its operation.

Mr. CHAMBERS. I am one of the few who voted against the new basis of representation adopted yesterday, and I shall continue to vote against it, however just and correct its principles may appear to other gentlemen. This new measure of representation appears to me as but another effort to create political inequality amongst the freemen of this commonwealth, and it loses none of its inherent vice and injustice by being involved in such uncertainty, that gentlemen cannot point to the particular locality which is to be unduly benefitted or injured by it. Indeed, this uncertainty enhances its dangers, and to such a degree, that they may be dire to the friends of this movement and their constituents, and may work out results the very reverse of those anticipated by these gentlemen yesterday. Gentlemen seem to be sensitive on this point this morning, and many of them willing to retrace their steps; hence they move a reconsideration.

This is a struggle to transfer political power from one portion of the commonwealth to another; and to effect it, gentlemen resort to a basis of representation containing new elements, and propose to take from the qualified voters of some section, (but what section is uncertain,) their political power, influence, and weight, and to transfer and lodge the same with the women and children of another section of the state, but denying to these women and children the exercise of these powers, whilst their husbands and fathers are allowed the double privilege of voting for themselves and their families, and for the widows and orphans of these favored districts. Sir, if this new basis is to be acted upon, let us confer upon the women of this commonwealth the right of suffrage, and let them vote for themselves and their children; but let us not give to one freeman double the political weight and importance of another in the legislation of the country.

I have examined the auditor's book, and I find that the new basis of representation would probably advance the weight and influence of my county as greatly as that of almost any other county. I find that, whilst in many counties the children aged between five and sixteen do not exceed in numbers the qualified voters therein, in Boone there is an excess of children, within the years before named, of near four hundred over the voters; and it is not from any apprehension that my constituents will lose by the change that I oppose this new measure of representation. No sir. It is because, to my mind, it appears unequal and unjust, and full of inconvenience, that I have recorded my vote against it. Sir, let us strip the thing of all disguise and concealment, and how will it appear? Is there any delegate upon this floor that is willing to say that he will vote for an apportionment which shall give to one thousand voters in the county of Cumberland, or any other interior county, as much political importance and weight as he gives to 1500 or 2000 voters in Jefferson, or a border county. Scarcely, sir, will any one be found to advocate such a proposition. Yet, sir, in principle the new basis of representation is the same, and in practice it may work out very similar results.

Thus stands this measure in its naked deformity; but when disguised under the habiliments of conferring rights upon women and children, it appears a very different thing from what it really is. Our present constitution provides "that all freemen, when they form a social compact, are equal," but I have never yet heard of any declaration of principles, or political platform, declaring that women and children were equal, or that they were equal with men in a political point of view. At present the qualified voters of the commonwealth form the basis of representation and I think the correct basis. These voters are the husbands, fathers, or guardians, of the females and children of our state, and they represent them and do their voting; and as the people have not demanded any change I shall not vote for any.

But as to the mode of apportioning representation, whatever basis may be adopted, I have a word to say. My county, with a large residuum above the ratio required for one representative, has never yet been entitled to two; but has, for many years, been a creditor of her adjoining counties—lending them her residuums to entitle them to a representative. But, sir, under this new or amended constitution, which we are making, we want to use our whole force for ourselves; and if I can ascertain that the plan offered by the gentleman from Fleming can be made practicable, I shall go for it. This plan proposes one representative to each county, and that each representative shall be entitled to one vote for every one hundred constituents he may have. This would leave no residuums, and would give to each county its just weight in the legislature of our state; but in committee of the whole I do not see how the vote could be taken under this plan, and it would be somewhat troublesome even in the house.

I hope we shall adhere to the old basis of representation, and adopt that plan of apportionment which shall operate most equally and justly upon the counties, towns, and cities, entitled to separate representation.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I rise, more particularly, to ask my friend from McCracken and Ballard, (Mr. Gholson,) that although his perception is so clear upon this subject, that he is astonished that men differ with him, I hope he will bear with this convention, and allow us to take a little time for reflection and further examination of this important subject. I said yesterday, I thought I saw, without the aid of figures, without the aid of the Auditor's report, or the old census books, the general effect of this principle, if engrafted in the constitution of your state. I do hope, that there will not be manifested by my friend—with whom I differ with great pain on this occasion—so much impatience, and so much astonishment, that we are consuming time on this important question. I said yesterday, that the effect of the proposition is, to give to certain persons, wherever located, a greater political power than they had under the old basis of representation. When gentlemen talk about constituting women and children a part of the basis of representation, I ask them to engraft in the constitution, if they fear that the interests of married women, widows and children will not otherwise be secured—the principle that once existed, if it does not now, in the constitution of New Jersey—to give to widows and unmarried women of mature age, the privilege of voting. But do not sir, under the plausible declaration that emanates, I know, from a kind heart—that you are giving to women and children additional security, while in fact you give them nothing—increase the number upon which representation is based. Give them the power to vote, if you will, and let them exercise it. When you establish the true principle of responsibility in reference to the basis of representation, and place all freemen upon a perfect equality, then I am content. I do not wish to increase the power of one freeman, when his location may be among women and children, at the expense of another, who may not be similarly blessed.

Sir, I know that gentlemen may go to the Auditor's books and reports, and ascertain the number of children, of a particular description, in different parts of the state; and ascertain the number of the foreign population that is contained in the despised city of Louisville, and how much that population is to increase the power of the city; yet all this does not affect the great principle of equal representation.

How this provision is to operate, I do not know. But I do not wish to engraft in the constitution, an element in the basis of representation that will have the effect of creating a prejudice against this constitution that we are now making, when it shall be submitted to the people.

Mr. GHOLSON. There are certain gentlemen in this house, who seem desirous of having every thing their own way. I recollect that I made a movement in this house at an early period of the session. Gentlemen were not then prepared to vote upon the proposition I submitted. They wanted time for reflection. It was granted to them, and they then had it all their own way. Now I am again told not to press this question, and I have no doubt gentlemen will have this matter all their own way too. Yet I have no objection to pass this section over, and take up the next. I am willing they shall have as much time as they want. What I object to is, so much talking and no voting.

Mr. MACHEN. There seems to have been such an entire revolution in this house, within the twenty-four hours past, that perhaps the same course of reasoning that has superinduced the change of opinion on the part of gentlemen who oppose this proposition, might, when understood, change the opinions of the balance of us. I think it is due to us, that we should at least have time for reflection. The resolution was passed by such a triumphant vote yesterday, that I did not think it necessary to prepare any arguments in its support; for I did not expect it would meet any opposition to-day. I thought the question was settled. It is now pronounced to be an abstraction; if so, it is an important abstraction; it is one on which a great deal of the future action of this government is to be based.

I will therefore move, that this subject be passed over until to-morrow. I think we shall then be better prepared to act upon it.

Mr. DIXON. I believe the gentleman is right in making that motion. My friend from Simpson (Mr. Clarke) has satisfied me it should be done, both for his sake, and for the sake of all of us, in order that we may come to a right understanding. The gentleman asked me how I knew my basis of calculation was correct. I told him, and he replied, that that was no basis of calculation which any body could say was correct—that there was no data on which I, or any member of the convention, could determine the number of the white population in Kentucky.

Mr. CLARKE. The gentleman certainly misunderstood me. I did not say there was no data upon which he could base such a calculation. I said there had been no census taken since 1840, of the whole population of the state.

Mr. DIXON. I understood the gentleman. He said, according to his basis of calculation, the population of the rural districts increased as fast as that of the cities and towns. But he does not pretend to say that his basis of calculation is correct. Is it fair for the gentleman not only to grope his own way in the dark, but to insist that others shall follow such a lead? I do not wish to make any innovation upon the great principles of the old constitution, unless I know what I am doing. I am not for doing injustice to the people of any portion of Kentucky. If the gentleman chooses to rush madly into the adoption of a principle, the result of which he cannot calculate, he ought not to expect us to follow him.

The PRESIDENT. I ask leave of the convention to state in a very few words the position I occupy on this question. I am in favor of the basis established in our present constitution and voted for it, not that I believe the new basis would unjustly affect my constituency, for I believe from all the calculations I have made that it would, in all human probability, give them an additional member; but I have felt satisfied that the old basis was correct, and understood by the people, and that no change was demanded. I did not come here to vote for any thing that would give my constituency any advantage to which they were not entitled. All that I desired for them was equal representation according to the number of qualified voters in every portion of the state. That was the reason I voted against this measure yesterday, well apprised, from a calculation made by my colleague, and my own observation, that in all probability it would give Louisville another member. I will state my objections to the proposed basis. It might so happen that a gentleman who had been twenty years a naturalized citizen might have a wife who never had been naturalized, and who, under the provisions of this proposition, would not be entitled to be enumerated; she not being a citizen; though the laws of the state entitle her to all the civil rights of holding property and enjoying it. If he came with infant children they would be aliens and not entitled to be enumerated. Those that are born here, though of foreign parents, according to my understanding of the law, are free born citizens, and when they come to mature age are entitled to the rights of mature age upon that subject.

Thus, according to my understanding of the law, all that are born in Kentucky or in the United States are citizens, although of foreign born parents. The assessor then, in making out the enumeration, is to select from the household of the naturalized citizen and leave the wife out if she is not native born, and to exclude the children not native born and to take only those born here. I have another objection, and that is, the requirement of residence one year in the city and county next preceding the enumeration. They would by the time the apportionment was made for two years have been entitled to vote, and thus for one year they would have been excluded from the apportionment. It struck me that even if it be true that a larger portion of children between the ages of five and six are found in certain counties of the state than in others, there would be the same proportion of from sixteen to twenty, and that the years as they elapse will add to those counties their fair proportion of representation according to their increase in numbers, and that they will thus be represented. Well, I have another objection, it is the principle (if gentlemen will forgive me for the word,) of native Americanism, which excludes the family and children of men naturalized from the enumeration, and proscribing them, for it has that effect, from participating in the government of the country. It was undoubtedly not designed, and I feel satisfied that many who voted for this principle were unaware that it was striking at that population, and indirectly at the naturalization laws. I have made these statements that gentlemen may reflect on it, and to show my position, which is upon the basis of political numbers. Those to whom you give the right to vote should, in my judgment, be the basis of the representation. If we were a democracy, where all might meet to make the laws and govern themselves, you would select some to do it. We select all that are twenty one years of age, native born and naturalized citizens, and when we make a representative government it is to represent them.

Mr. CLARKE. I beg leave to ask if it was the original resolution, as adopted by the house, or the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin,) upon which the president commented.

The PRESIDENT. It was the amendment now pending. I was not able to get hold of the original resolution.

Mr. CLARKE. In drawing that resolution I certainly did not intend, either directly or indirectly, to withhold from the children of our naturalized citizens the right to be enumerated. Nobody can be more opposed to Native Americanism, in any shape or form, than myself. And if there be any language contained in my resolution that could be construed into such a thing, I am willing, when the principle shall have been adopted, to place it in language so clear that no such construction can be placed upon it.

The section, by general consent was then passed over.

The seventh section was then read, and adopted without amendment.

The eighth section was then read as follows:

"Sec. 8. Every free, white male citizen of the age of twenty one years, who has resided in this state two years, or in the county, town, or city, in which he offers to vote, one year next preceding the election, shall be a voter, but such voter shall have been, for sixty days next preceding the election, a resident of the precinct in which he offers to vote, and he shall cast his vote in said precinct, and not elsewhere. Voters, in all cases except treason, felony, breach, or surety of the peace, shall be privileged from arrest during their attendance at, going to, and returning from elections.

Mr. McHENRY moved to strike out the word "precinct," and insert "county," so that it should require a residence of sixty days in the county instead of the precinct, before the citizen should be entitled to vote.

Mr. DESHA moved as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out all of the section except the clause requiring a residence in the state. He had no desire to disfranchise a citizen of the state merely because he removed from one county to another, a couple of months before the election.

Mr. CLARKE. I will briefly state the reasons which influenced the committee to report the section. They were aware that in some instances it might operate as a hardship upon citizens of the state, who had removed to another county a day or two before the election, but there were evils suggested, the necessity for the removal of which, for the purpose of preserving the elective franchise from imposition, was so powerful as to outweigh the consideration of these little sacrifices. When counties are nearly equally divided, so far as parties are concerned, it very frequently occurs that voters are colonized there from other counties, and it intended to guard against this. And where one would be disfranchised by the operation of this section, every gentleman at all acquainted with politics will bear me out in saying that three now come into a county and give their vote where they are not entitled to. Again, the committee assumed as the sense of the convention, that the different counties in the state, should be laid off into districts, and that there would be election precincts in each district, and the very same reasons which influenced them in the first instance, induced them to say that no voter should vote out of the limits of his district. If this thing of colonizing votes in districts was not restrained, it would allow districts where parties were strong to send their surplus vote into other districts where they were not so strong, and determine wrongfully the result of their elections. These were among the reasons which influenced the committee in reporting the section as it stands.

Mr. MACHEN. I go with the gentleman from Harrison, (Mr. Desha,) in striking out the requirement of a residence of sixty days in the precinct; but I am in favor of requiring him to vote in the precinct in which he resides. Is that the purport of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. DESHA. My object is to leave the constitution in this respect, as it now is, and as I stated before, to give to every citizen of the state who proposes to become a permanent resident of any county, the right to vote there, even if he has come only a day before the election.

Mr. PRESTON. This vote is to decide whether the voters shall vote within or without their precincts. The amendment of the gentleman from Harrison gives them the right to vote any where in the county or in the precinct as heretofore provided under the old constitution. This section restricts the voter to his precinct, and the object of this was explained by my friend, the chairman of the committee, (Mr. Clarke,) to be to prevent what has frequently been complained of, pipe-laying and frauds upon the elective franchise in this state. If, as it seems to be contemplated, the counties shall be divided into convenient districts for voting, nothing is so sure as that, if you give the elector the right to vote any where in the county or at the county seat, it will, in excited elections, retard the operation of fair voting by crowding the polls, rendering it difficult to take the votes, and leading to great disorders. But, if the section is to be stricken out, I desire that Louisville shall be made an exception. Otherwise, should the city be divided into assembly districts, the voter would, under the proposed amendment, be allowed to vote out of his district, and where ever he chose in the city.

Mr. GHOLSON. Upon this subject at least, I came here instructed fully. It was fully discussed in my section; and if the people there want any thing, it is that the voter shall be confined to his county and his precinct, and that this pipe-laying shall be put an end to. If there was any objection to the section in my judgment, it was perhaps to the length of residence required in the state, and in the county. Where a man moves into a county, pays taxes, and becomes a bona fide resident, he should be entitled to the right of suffrage. However, I shall vote for the section as it stands, believing that the voter should be required to vote in his precinct, and to have resided sixty days in it. Otherwise, men might ride all over the county and vote in as many precincts as they choose. Such things have been done.

Mr. GRAY. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, (Mr. McHenry,) if I understand it, does not alter the operation of the section, but merely allows those who may remove from one district to another in the same county, the right to vote wherever they may reside, and before the end of sixty days, if they are bona fide citizens of the precinct, and have the requisite residence of sixty days in the county. Then the amendment does not permit, as suggested by the gentleman, the voters to go from one precinct to another to vote. If a gentleman has resided sixty days within a county, there clearly can be no reason why he should be deprived of the right of suffrage. If he has that residence, it makes no difference in what precinct he votes, so that he does not vote in more than one. But the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is a sufficient guard against fraud, in that it requires him to vote in the precinct in which he resided. The words "and not elsewhere," should be stricken out as mere surplusage, a fault not to be desired in a constitution. The restriction is sufficiently explicit without it.

Mr. TURNER. It was the necessity for reform in the legislative department of the government that mainly induced the region of country in which I live, to go for a convention. It was an every year's practice in the upper part of the state, and I presume all over the state, for young men to migrate from one county to another in contested elections for the purpose of influencing the result. For instance, there might be a contested election in Franklin, and a very easy race in Anderson. Well, the candidates in Franklin would get young men to come from Anderson into their county, and they might reside or even work there for a few days before the election, and vote there and thus control the result. This is an abominable abuse of the elective franchise, and is practised to an outrageous extent. It is so in other elections. I could allude to an election in my congressional district, which made a figure in the national councils some years ago, in which more than twelve hundred votes were cast that did not reside in the district. This clearly was all wrong.

It is very seldom that I differ from the gentleman from Ohio, and I always doubt my own judgment when I do, for he is a gentleman of most clear and dispassionate judgment, but on this occasion I feel constrained to do so. Besides members of the legislature, it should be remembered that we have to elect magistrates, constables, and other officers, to do the public business. It is necessary to destroy this corrupting influence to which I have referred in reference to them, for there will doubtless be a struggle for those offices, and if permitted in the choice of these minor officers, they will extend to other and greater ones. This colonizing practice would therefore be likely to be increased, from the fact that there would be more persons interested in it, who, by their combination, would carry it to a greater extent than has yet been known. I hope therefore the section, as reported by the committee, will be retained, and that not a word of it will be changed. It is a proposition which will carry out correctly and thoroughly the true principles of the government. Every voter should be confined to the precinct in which he resides. If you allow them to vote at any point in the county, all this corruption which now arises from the congregation of a large body of men at the court house, and their often illegal and immoral proceedings, will continue to go on. Let us have cool and deliberate elections. Let every man vote in his own precinct, and then all the votes can be taken in one day, and the result will be a cool, deliberate, and dispassionate one. But allow all the floating votes to collect at one place, as heretofore, and you keep back the old staid citizens, and allow all the young, passionate, and daring in spirit, to go forward and control the elections. Such has been too much the case in Kentucky, and I would prevent such a thing hereafter. The people desire a government based on the free, uncontrolled, and deliberate expression of opinion, and not one based on brute force and outrage. I think therefore we ought not to vary even in a word from the proposition as reported by the committee.

Mr. MERIWETHER. It will be perceived by the convention, that if they adopt either the amendment of the gentleman from Harrison, or that of the gentleman from Ohio, the great evils complained of in one section of the country will not be remedied. Now, we have some experience in Jefferson, which goes to show the utility of confining voters to their precincts.

Our county seat is at Louisville, and by law, for the last eight or ten years, the voter has been required to vote in his precinct, because by law he was not allowed to go to the county seat. Now, if a man resides in Louisville, he is also a resident of the county of Jefferson, and if a sixty days residence in his precinct is not required, he has but to change his residence to Jefferson, and then he becomes a legal voter.

Mr. GRAY. He ought to be so.

Mr. MERIWETHER. Then it ought to be in the power of the city of Louisville to control the election in Jefferson county, if that principle is right. I have seen an occasion when three hundred voters were thus moved in Jefferson, and I do not attach the blame to either party; but if you look at the vote for and against a convention in the year preceding, you will find that there were only one hundred and seventy-four votes for a convention in 1837. In 1847, after these frauds were committed, it would be found that a large majority in the county went for a convention, and one of the principal reasons for it, was a desire to correct this thing. If you require the voter to reside sixty days in a precinct, the judges of the election or the clerk will know the voter, and whether he is entitled to vote or not, and they can permit him to vote or not, as he may be authorized under the constitution. But if you permit a man to come in but yesterday, and vote to-day, you put it in the power of either candidate who may so wish to obtain the election by fraud, to succeed in the county of Jefferson, more particularly perhaps than elsewhere, because the sixty days residence in the county would also include a residence in Louisville. As to the remark of the gentleman from Harrison, that the voter changing his residence immediately preceding the election, should not be deprived of the right of suffrage. It is true there may be some hardships thereby produced, but it must also be recollected that there are very few bona fide residents of the state who change their residence at that season of the year. And as for the few who do, it is better to let them submit to that deprivation, than to open the flood-gates to "pipe-laying" throughout the state.

Mr. HAMILTON, in order, desired to offer an amendment, reducing the requirement of residence from sixty to thirty days.

The PRESIDENT ruled it out of order at that time.

Mr. IRWIN called for a division of the question, so that the vote could be taken first on striking out.

Mr. APPERSON. I was at first disposed to go for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, but on reflection I am satisfied that it would lead us into difficulty. The counties are to be districted for the election of justices of the peace and constables, and experience proves to us that there will be just as much excitement about the election of those officers as any other. Now, if the voter is only required to be sixty days in the county, without reference to the precinct, will they not run over from one precinct to another, for the purpose of electing a magistrate in a particular district? Therefore, it seems to me we had better stick to the text, as presented to us by the committee.

Mr. COFFEY. I am against striking out, and for the best reason in the world. I came here tied hand and foot, and for the very reason assigned by my friend from Madison, (Mr. Turner) that there is a class of young men in the country, that change their residences, and come into counties to influence the election. It was this that brought me here tied hand and foot. I speak, therefore, from my own knowledge. There were some six or eight votes of this description polled, for and against me, and this led to the tie. Let the section stand as it is, restricting every man to voting in the precinct where he resides and is known.

Mr. McHENRY changed his amendment to meet the views of some gentlemen, so as to substitute for county, the words "city or county." He called for the yeas and nays on his motion.

Mr. DESHA. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, but I shall vote against the adoption of the section, unless it is further amended, as I have indicated.

Mr. NESBITT. Like the gentleman from Ballard and McCracken, if I have been instructed on any thing, it is to vote to require a man to have a residence some length of time in the county, before he is entitled to vote. The ground upon which I ran the race was, that he should be required to live there nine months, and the people, by a strong majority, ratified it. I would like to enquire of the gentleman from Harrison if he desires to perpetuate what we call importing votes and frauds on elections, by allowing a candidate and his friends to go to an adjoining county, where they do not have so much use for the voters, and bring them over by scores to determine the election? I have seen the people so outraged by transactions of this character, that they have come to the polls armed, and driven off these imported voters. I know in one particular instance, where to the number of twelve; and I could call the names of every one of them, and where they live. They were brought into my county from the adjoining counties. They were taken to one precinct, where the old precinct law was rung in upon them, and they were refused the right to vote. They then came to the court house, where every body has a right to vote, and nothing but the force of arms drove them off. And they went to another precinct, and my friends and the friends of good order generally, had to intercede to prevent the people from going and attacking them on the highway, as a band of political robbers.

The people of Kentucky, are in my opinion en masse honest, and they do not desire that a man from another county should be allowed to step into another, and there first cast his vote, and step back again. Some gentlemen seem to think that under the report of the committee, some honest bona fide voter of the county will be deprived of voting. That difficulty can be remedied very easily, by every man who desires to retain the exercise of the right of suffrage taking the spring of the year, about the time he intends to plant a crop, and raise something for his family, for the period of his removal. The sixty days then would not touch him. But those fellows who dodge about and come in to cut wood, or get out iron ore, and who vote for the dollar, and nothing else, and whose residence it would be hard to fix; these are the men I desire to guard against. I am opposed to pipe-laying, and against it out and out. I therefore hope that the convention will adopt the report of the committee just as it stands. It is, to be sure, not quite as strong as I am instructed to go, but I will take it, believing that it will do.

Mr. MACHEN. These things are certainly new to me. We have nothing of this kind in my county, and I should like to hear the experience of other gentlemen on the subject of pipe laying, and see if it corroborates that of the gentleman last up. I certainly am disposed to act for the good order of the country.

Mr. NESBITT. I merely ask that the gentleman should suspend his vote at the next election, and I think I can carry him where he will have ocular demonstration of these facts.

Mr. DESHA. I am as much in favor of guarding the purity of the elective franchise, as any gentleman can be, and notwithstanding I have been engaged in several canvasses, the citizens of my county and all who know me, will attest that I abhor corruption in elections, and have never resorted to it. My amendment was only to guard the bona fide innocent residents from being deprived of the right of suffrage. As to the remark, that very few would change their residences, except in the spring, this would apply very well to those engaged in agricultural pursuits, but there are many in other professions, mechanics and others, that would come within that two months requisition, and thus be deprived of their votes. It was these that I desired to protect.

Mr. DIXON. I regard the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio as proper and right. It requires that the voter shall reside in the county sixty days before the election, which is a safeguard against fraud. If a citizen has lived that length of time in the county, why not let him vote at any point in it? It can do no wrong. The object was to prevent those who live out of the county from coming in and voting. I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio and against excluding an honest citizen from voting merely because he may chance to remove from one precinct to another.

Mr. RUDD. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, in my view, would promote those very practices against which the committee are seeking to guard. The object of the section was to prevent this immigration from one precinct to another, by requiring a fixed term of residence in the precinct. Without such a requisition, voters would be transferred from one ward to the other in the city of Louisville, as candidates might desire to effect a particular object. It was to prevent occurrences like those referred to by the gentleman from Jefferson (Mr. Meriwether) that the section of the committee was designed. It was hard, to be sure, for a man to lose his vote for want of the requisite time, but it was a greater hardship for the people of a county to see a man foisted upon them against their will, by voters from other counties. I know an instance where one of the parties had forty voters concealed in the neighborhood of the city, with the intention of having them vote the next day in a certain precinct. That night, however, men of the other party went out and stole them, if you please—took every one of them off and voted every man of them. Well, it was perhaps all fair, seeing that they were brought there for a fraudulent purpose. This is the kind of practice that I desire to prevent.

Mr. DIXON. I desire to present this amendment:—"Provided, That when any city or town, shall be entitled to a separate representation the sixty days residence here required, shall be in the city, and not in the county, and when any town or city shall have been divided off into separate election districts, the same period of residence shall be required in such district.

Mr. PRESTON moved the previous question, which was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The amendment of Mr. McHENRY was then rejected—the yeas and nays being demanded by him—yeas 30, nays 60, as follows:

YEAS—William Bradley, Thomas D. Brown, William Chenault, James S. Chrisman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Lucius Desha, Archibald Dixon, Milford Elliott, Selucius Garfield, Ninian E. And then the convention adjourned.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 22, 1849.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LANCASTER.

Mr. TURNER moved that the roll be called.

The attendance of members was smaller than usual, attributable probably, to the stormy and inclement weather.

The yeas and nays were called for, and taken on the motion to call the roll, and it was rejected; yeas 23, nays 56.

Mr. BARLOW submitted a resolution to obtain an expression of the sense of the convention on the subject of evening sessions. He proposed that each day at one o'clock, the president should announce a recess to 2½ o'clock.

After a brief conversation, the resolution was laid on the table.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. APPERSON offered the following, which on his motion, was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That representation shall be equal and uniform in this commonwealth, as near as may be, and shall be forever regulated and ascertained by the number of representative population therein. At the first session of the general assembly after the adoption of this constitution, and every eighth year thereafter, provision shall be made by law, that in the year , and every eighth year thereafter, an enumeration of all the representative population of the state shall be made. The number of representatives shall, in the several years of making these enumerations, be so fixed as not to be less than eighty, nor more than one hundred; and for the purpose of apportionment, the state is hereby divided into four districts.

The first district shall be composed of the counties of Pike, Floyd, Johnson, Lawrence, Carter, Greenup, Lewis, Mason, Bracken, Harrison, Nicholas, Bourbon, Clarke, Estill, Montgomery, Bath, Fleming, Morgan, Breathitt, Owsley, Clay, Laurel, Rockcastle, Madison, Whitley, Knox, Harlan, Perry, and Letcher.

The second district shall be composed of the counties of Pendleton, Campbell, Kenton, Boone, Gallatin, Carroll, Trimble, Oldham, Henry, Franklin, Owen, Grant, Scott, Fayette, Woodford, Jessamine, Garrard, Lincoln, Boyle, Mercer, Anderson, Shelby, and Spencer.

The third district shall be composed of the counties of Pulaski, Casey, Russell, Marion, Washington, Nelson, Bullitt, Jefferson, Hardin, Meade, Grayson, Monroe, Clinton, Cumberland, Wayne, Adair, Barren, Hart, Larue, Taylor, and Green.

The fourth district shall be composed of the counties of Hancock, Breckinridge, Davies, Henderson, Union, Hopkins, Muhlenburg, Ohio, Butler, Edmonson, Warren, Allen, Logan, Simpson, Todd, Christian, Trigg, Caldwell, Calloway, Graves, Fulton, Hickman, Marshall, Livingston, McCracken, Ballard, and Crittenden.

And the representatives shall be apportioned, as near as may be, among the counties, towns, and cities, in proportion to the number of representative population; but when a county may not have a sufficient number of representative population to entitle it to one representative, then such county may be joined to some adjacent county or counties, to send one representative, or it may draw a residuum or residuums, from one or more counties in the same district, as may be most equitable, having due regard to the number of representative population in each county, and the locality of such county to the residuums from other counties: Provided, If there should be any county not having a sufficient number of representative population to entitle it to one representative, yet it shall have one representative if all the adjacent counties in the same district have a sufficient number of representative population to entitle them respectively to one representative: And provided further, That due regard shall always be had, in carrying residuums through the district, to that county having the largest number of representative population above the fixed ratio, or which has not a separate representative: And provided further, That residuums shall not be taken from any county or city in one district, to a county or city in another district: And provided, That any county which may hereafter be formed, may be placed in such district as the general assembly may order.

LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT.

The convention resumed the consideration of the report of the committee on the legislative department.

The ninth section was read as follows:

"Sec. 9. Senators shall be chosen for the term of four years, and the senate shall have power to choose its officers biennially."

Mr. TURNER suggested that the section required amendment. If the governor should resign, the lieutenant governor would be required to take his place, and it would be necessary that the senate should be convened for the purpose of filling the vacancy occasioned by the removal of the lieutenant governor from the the presidency of the senate. But if this section should remain unaltered, such vacancy could not be filled as the senate would be restricted to biennial elections of its officers.

After a few words of explanation, in which several members of the convention took part, Mr. TURNER withdrew his objection, as it was understood that provision would be made elsewhere to meet the case suggested.

The section was then adopted.

The tenth section was next read and adopted, as follows:

"Sec. 10. At the first session of the general assembly after this constitution takes effect, the senators shall be divided by lot, as equally as may be, into two classes. The seats of the first class shall be vacated at the end of two years, from the day of the election, and those of the second class at the end of four years, so that one half shall be chosen every two years; and when an additional member shall be added to the senate, he shall be annexed by lot, to one of these classes."

The eleventh section was read as follows:

"Sec. 11. The senate shall consist of not less than thirty, nor more than thirty eight members."

On a suggestion of Mr. TRIPLETT, this section was passed over for future consideration.

The twelfth section was read as follows:

"Sec. 12. The same number of senatorial districts shall, from time to time, be established by the general assembly as there may be senators allotted to the state, which shall be so formed as to contain, as near as may be, an equal number of qualified voters, and so that no county shall be divided in the formation of a senatorial district, except such county shall be entitled, under the enumeration, to two or more senators."

Mr. IRWIN said the question arose on this section which had been discussed on a preceding one. The convention had not determined what should be the basis of representation, and hence this section should be postponed for consideration, when a kindred section should again come up.

After a few words from Messrs. TRIPLETT and CLARKE the section was passed over.

The thirteenth section was next read:

"Sec. 13. One senator for each district shall be elected, by the qualified voters therein, who shall vote in the precincts where they reside, at the places where elections are by law directed to be held."

Mr. GARFIELDE moved to strike out the words, "who shall vote in the precincts where they reside, at the places where elections are by law directed to be held."

The motion to strike out was rejected, and the section was then adopted.

The fourteenth and fifteenth sections were read and adopted, as follows:

"Sec. 14. No person shall be a senator, who, at the time of his election, is not a citizen of the United States, who has not attained the age of thirty years, and who has not resided in this state six years next preceding his election, and the last year thereof, in the district for which he may be chosen."

"Sec. 15. The first election for senators shall be general throughout the state, and at the same time that the election for representatives is held, and thereafter, there shall be a biennial election for senators to fill the places of those whose term of service may have expired."

The sixteenth section was read as follows:

"Sec. 16. The general assembly shall convene on the first Monday in November, after the adoption of this constitution, and on the same day of every second year, unless a different day be appointed by law, and their sessions shall be held at the seat of government; but if the public welfare require, the governor may call a special session."

Mr. GRAY moved to strike out "November" and insert "December," which was both more convenient and in accordance with the custom in this state, for a large portion of the last fifty years.

Mr. MACHEN explained that the committee had fixed the month of November for the commencement of the first session after the new constitution should go into operation, inasmuch as there would be then an unusual amount of legislative business to be transacted, and it was inconvenient for many members of the state legislature to remain from their homes beyond the first of March. The time of meeting, after that session, was left by the section to legislative discretion.

Mr. BOYD called for a division of the question, so that the vote could first be taken on striking out.

The motion to strike out was negatived, and consequently the motion to insert fell with it.

The section was then adopted.

The seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, and twentieth sections were read and adopted, as follows:

"Sec. 17. Not less than a majority of the members of each house of the general assembly shall constitute a quorum to do business, but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and shall be authorized, by law, to compel the attendance of absent members, in such manner and under such penalties as may be prescribed thereby."

"Sec. 18. Each house of the general assembly shall judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its members; but a contested election shall be determined in such manner as shall be directed by law."

"Sec. 19. Each house of the general assembly may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish a member for disorderly behavior, and with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member, but not a second time for the same cause."

"Sec. 20. Each house of the general assembly shall keep and publish, weekly, a journal of its proceedings, and the yeas and nays of the members on any question, shall, at the desire of any two of them, be entered on their journal."

The twenty-first section was read as follows:

"Sec. 21. Neither house, during the session of the general assembly, shall, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which they may be sitting."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. Do I understand that the committee design that the two houses of the legislature shall not have power to adjourn, for the purpose of transacting public business, to any other place than that which is fixed as the seat of government? If it is the object of the section to take away the power of the two houses to adjourn and meet at some point, when the necessities of the country may require it, I am opposed to it. I know that is the reading of the present constitution. I very well remember that owing to that constitutional restriction, the legislature of 1814, convened in Frankfort, had their session broken up in consequence of the breaking out of a pestilence, called the Canada fever. I think three or four members died in a single night, and we terminated our session, leaving important business unfinished. Had there been power to adjourn to some other place, the business might have been completed. Unless this is provided for by the committee, in some way, I shall be opposed to this section.

Mr. CLARKE. When the convention was acting on the 16th section, this objection occurred to my own mind; and I am inclined to think that some power should be conferred on the executive, to convene the legislature at some other point in case of necessity. As the section now stands, no discretion is vested any where to change the place of meeting.

A conversation ensued, in which Mr. MACHEN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. T. J. HOOD, and Mr. PRESTON took part, on the propriety of certain changes of the phraseology.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL said he foresaw that the amendment of this section would involve the removal of the seat of government, and therefore on any amendment, he should demand the yeas and nays.

All opposition was withdrawn, and the section was adopted.

Mr. IRWIN moved a reconsideration of the vote adopting the 20th section, with a view of moving to take away the power from two members of the legislature to demand the yeas and nays on any question, and to confer it on one fifth, as in the house of representatives of the congress of the United States.

Mr. CLARKE opposed the motion, contending that it was the right of a representative of the people to have the votes of the house put on record.

Mr. IRWIN replied, and argued that such power should not be given to two individuals to obstruct legislation. It would be much better to give it to one tenth than to two members, though he was willing to add a provision, that on the passage of all laws, and the adoption of all resolutions, the yeas and nays should be entered on the journal.

On the motion of Mr. HARDIN, the motion to reconsider, was laid on the table.

The 22d section was read as follows:

"Sec. 22. The members of the general assembly shall severally receive from the public treasury a compensation for their services, which shall be three dollars a day during their attendance on, going to, and returning from the sessions of their respective houses: Provided, That the same may be increased or diminished by law; but no alteration shall take effect during the session at which such alteration shall be made, nor shall a session of the general assembly continue beyond sixty days, except by a vote of two thirds of each house; but this shall not apply to the first session held under this constitution."

Mr. KAVANAUGH moved to strike out "two thirds of each house," and insert "unless it be by a direct vote of a majority of each house, which shall be entered upon the journal."

Mr. NUTTALL thought that if there was to be but one session in two years, the legislature should not be thus limited.

Mr. McHENRY thought nothing would be gained by limiting the legislature to biennial sessions, unless some such restriction was placed upon it.

Mr. DESHA approved of the section as it stood. He thought sixty days was sufficient, and with such a limitation, the members would go to work when they met here.

Mr. NUTTALL replied that the example which the convention had set, furnished an argument against the position which gentlemen had assumed.

Mr. NEWELL disapproved of the frequent introduction of the two thirds principle. As they were proceeding, he should not be surprised if it was proposed that the same principle should be carried into ordinary legislation.

Mr. W. JOHNSON called the attention of the convention to the fact that after the expiration of sixty days, this section would place the defeat of the legislation of the country in the hands of a minority of one third, how necessary so ever such legislation might be.

Mr. TURNER was in favor of this section, and he would be willing even to make it more stringent than it is. If there was one thing of which the country complained more than another, it was excessive legislation. This had a powerful influence in inducing the people to call for a convention. A session of sixty days was long enough; but if an extraordinary emergency should arise, the governor could call another session on the very next day after their adjournment.

Mr. GRAY suggested that an effectual mode of shortening the duration of the session would be, to provide that the compensation of the members and officers should be reduced one third at the expiration of sixty days.

Mr. BARLOW. If I were to make any change in this section, it would be, to make it more absolute than it is, for the purpose of getting rid of so much legislation. I call for a division, so that the vote shall first be taken on the motion to strike out.

Mr. KAVANAUGH. I did not intend to say a word, but I know that one of the reasons for calling this convention was that biennial sessions might be had for the purpose of lessening the expenditures of the government. I know that the salvation of some sixty thousand dollars annually was one reason held up by others, and by myself, for the calling of this convention. We say they shall meet once in two years. The business of the session may be increased or it may not. I think it probable it will not, although they meet only once in two years, because I know it is the desire of the convention to cut off special legislation by the constitution. But can the convention foresee what emergencies may arise in the future? Important questions may arise, requiring legislative action near the close of a session, which, unless the amendment prevail, would be under the control of the minority. What does this amendment propose? That at the expiration of sixty days the session shall close, unless a majority of both branches shall enter their names on the journal in opposition to it, upon a call of the ayes and noes. The legislature will know that their session will close at the end of sixty days, unless their names go out to continue the session longer. It seems to me that this will be a sufficient guaranty, and I therefore desire it may be left to a majority.

Mr. TAYLOR. There is no truer maxim, and thank God the people of Kentucky are satisfied of it, that the world is governed too much. I can easily conceive that in a young and growing state, like those on our western border, there may be a necessity for the legislature to sit more than sixty days; but in an old community like ours, I can see no reason for this. Sir, one of the prophets of old, in looking down the vista of coming years, exclaimed, "when shall the tears of Judah be dry?"

We are engaged in the most solemn acts of legislation, and we know the people are restive at our delay. I will ask gentlemen to walk into the library with me, and I think they will be satisfied that we have been governed too much. One strong inducement for calling this convention was, because there had been too much money and too much time spent in legislation. The legislation too was like a running stream: "a moment it was, and a moment it was not." The gentleman wishes the word majority inserted. If public interest or public necessity require it, the patriotic representatives of the people, possessing that virtue, intelligence, and patriotism, about which we have heard so much, will continue the session, and the people will be satisfied. I have been forcibly reminded of the old distich:

"The honey bee makes honey, and fills chock full the comb, Who are the drones that eat it, they are those who speak for home."

Mr. CHRISMAN. I promised my people that I should go for a sixty days' session, and I shall be in favor of striking out. I hope the house will indulge me in an explanation respecting the table presented by the gentleman from Logan. He has as he says taken six of the most wealthy and six of the poorest counties, and he has placed Wayne, my county, among the poorest counties. I find the fact is, that there are forty-eight counties that pay less into the treasury of the state than Wayne. He refers to the number of children. We have in our county 2,221 children. I suppose we must account for it from the pure air we breathe.

Mr. CLARKE. There may be many imperfections in this session, but take it as a whole and I am anxious to see it pass through the house. We have in this same report restricted the legislature in special legislation. We have said they shall not grant divorces, which has consumed one fourth or one third of the time of each legislature for the last ten or fifteen years. We have restricted special legislation in other respects, and it was the opinion of the committee that the restrictions imposed upon the legislature would result in a diminution of the time necessary to transact the public business, and that there would be no session, after the first session immediately succeeding the adoption of the new constitution—if it shall be adopted—which need sit longer than sixty days. It was thought if there were questions of paramount importance pending before the legislature—questions in which the whole state was interested, the speedy settlement of which involved the rights of the entire community, there could be no doubt a majority of two-thirds of the legislature would concur in lengthening it. These are the reasons why the two third principle was adopted by the committee on the legislative department. The past history of the legislature of the state—I say, without in the remotest degree intending to reflect upon their industry, their motives, or any thing of the sort—shows that the first month, or forty days, was consumed in a variety of ways not altogether compatible with the transaction of business. And, just at the close of the session, the most important matters are brought up in the reports of committees for the action of the two bodies, and they are consequently either compelled to dispose of them without due deliberation, or leave them untouched. Now, I am of opinion that if this session shall be adopted, the members will go to work immediately on their assembling here, and dispose of the business of the legislature before the expiration of the sixty days.

There will never be any necessity for a longer session, in all probability, and if there should be, there will be no difficulty about extending the time.

Mr. THOMPSON. If the legislature is to determine the length of the session, I shall vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Anderson, (Mr. Kavanaugh.) This matter has been acted upon by the conventions of several states lately, and they have been inclined to favor the proposition of the gentleman from Christian. Louisiana, however, has provided that no session shall extend beyond the period of sixty days, from the date of its commencement, and any legislative action had afterwards, shall be null and void. Then the sessions are biennial, and we propose to require the sessions of our legislature to be the same. In the state of Iowa, they have adopted a provision similar to that presented by the gentleman from Christian. After fifty days the pay of the members shall be reduced one half, and I believe a similar provision has been adopted in Illinois. I think that the best mode to remedy this evil. It is admitted by all that the country has for years past groaned under excessive legislation, and no reform has been louder called for than a limitation upon the session. If the power is to be given to the legislature to declare how long they will sit, I am in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from Anderson, that a majority of all elected to both houses should decide, by yeas and nays, to be entered upon the journal, whether they will extend the session. I am opposed to the two third principle in this respect. However, I think the proposition of the gentleman from Christian, would be a better remedy for this evil than any I have yet heard mentioned.

Mr. MORRIS. I am opposed to any of this close Yankee legislation that has taken place in the state of Illinois and Iowa, to which gentlemen have alluded, and also to the amendment of my colleague, from Christian. If it becomes important and necessary that the legislature should set over sixty days, I want them to have enough pay at least to live on. I am not disposed to restrict their pay, small as it now is. As regards the two thirds, I think it to be particularly applicable here, and if we leave the power to a majority to decide as to the length of the session, it will still leave the question open to all those objections of the people which entered largely into the calling of the convention. All will concede that the people have imperatively demanded that there should be some restriction on the length of the sessions and on excessive legislation. I see very distinctly that emergencies in the disposition of important public business may arise, when it will be necessary for the legislature to set over sixty days, and I believe that the members, generally, will be honest enough to continue in session until such business is disposed of. I hope therefore, this restriction of two thirds will be retained.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out and it was rejected.

Mr. MERIWETHER moved to amend, so as to allow to the members of the legislature twelve and a half cents per mile as the necessary travel fee, in going to and from their homes, in conformance with the present law on the subject, leaving to future legislatures to change it.

The amendment was adopted, as was the section, as amended.

The twenty-third section was then read, as follows:

"Sec. 23. The members of the general assembly shall, in all cases, except treason, felony, breach or surety of the peace, be privileged from arrest, during their attendance at the sessions of their respective houses, and in going to and returning from the same, and for any speech or debate in either house, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Mr. TRIPLETT. The original object of this provision was, that members of the legislature should be privileged from arrest, in order that they might not be interfered with in the discharge of the public business. At the time that provision was adopted, there was arrest for debt allowed, which is not the case now. If the object now is, that they shall not be compelled by any legal process to be carried to another part of the state, while in the discharge of their public duties, it is necessary that the section should be amended. A man might now be sued, or by other process prevented from attending here without neglecting his private interests to an inconvenient degree.

Mr. CLARKE. I would enquire of the gentleman if there are not now laws in this state, by which a citizen may be detained by civil process.

Mr. TRIPLETT. He can by attachment, when he is a witness, but I do not recollect any other.

Mr. DAVIS. He may be sued on an action for trespass, and on a judgment being got against him, be put in jail for twenty days.

Mr. TRIPLETT. My object is, that a man may attend here as a member of the legislature, and not be compelled to attend to suits at home, and the way to attain that would be to put in some clause, declaring that all suits against a man shall remain continued during the time he shall be acting as a member of the legislature. Such has been the course adopted in several states, in consequence of changes in their law. I throw out the suggestion that it may be acted upon or not, as gentlemen think proper.

Mr. PRESTON. The clause of the old constitution was retained because we did not know but that the legislature, in its discretion hereafter, may revive the ca. sa. as it existed in the year 1799, when the old constitution was adopted. Neither did the committee design to carry the immunity of the member so far as the gentleman seems to think desirable. For these reasons the committee believe the clause had better be adopted as reported.

The section was then adopted.

The twenty-fourth section was then read, as follows:

"Sec. 24. No senator or representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, nor for one year thereafter, be appointed or elected to any civil office of profit, under this commonwealth, which shall have been created, or the emoluments of which shall have been increased during the time such senator or representative was in office; except to such offices or appointments as may be filled by the election of the people."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I agree with what I understood to be the principle of the section, and perhaps the intention of the committee in reporting it. It is, that the legislature shall not create offices that they themselves may fill them by appointment or by election. I agree with the section until it comes down to the words in the fifth line "in office" and the latter clause "except to such offices or appointments as may be filled by the election of the people." We intend by this constitution, that all appointments to office of trust or profit shall be made by the people, and the appointing power we are taking away from the governor. The old constitution prohibited the appointment of a man to any office created during the time he was a member of the legislature, and in office. Such is the clause as reported, and I propose to strike out the words "in office" and amend so that it shall read "during the time for which such senator or representative was elected;" and also to strike out the last clause, "except to such offices or appointments as may be filled by the election of the people." I do this from an actual knowledge of occurrences that have taken place under the present constitution. I have seen the members of our state legislature laboring to create offices, and continuing those labors until just before the final passage of the measure through the last house of action, and then resigning their seats to receive the executive appointment. I would therefore take away all temptation to the creation of unnecessary offices by the legislature, whether the appointment is to come through an election by the people, or from the executive.

Mr. PRESTON. The object of retaining the clause as it is in the present constitution, is to provide for offices created by the legislature—such as an assistant superintendent of common schools for instance—the appointment of which may be devolved on the executive rather than the people. But if such officer should be elected by the people, the committee were not willing that the fact that a gentleman was a member of the legislature at the time the office was created, should exclude him from being a candidate therefor. The first amendment of the gentleman the committee have no objection to.

Mr. MACHEN. I do not see that any thing will be attained by striking out the words assented to by the gentleman from Louisville (Mr. Preston) unless at the same time the latter clause of the section is also stricken out. I am, however, opposed to both changes, and for these reasons. It very frequently happens that after a senatorial election has taken place, circumstances afterwards spring up surrounding the senator elect, which necessarily require him to resign his seat. This may occur at the very first session after he is elected, and then if this amendment was adopted he would not be eligible to any office that might be created by the legislature during the four years for which he was elected. This exclusion I think is not desired by the people. I am opposed also to striking out the last clause of the section, as I believe the people ought to have the privilege of selecting from the great mass of candidates. And if the office was created for the purpose of being filled by those who help to create it, I think the people will have wisdom enough to see and judge of that fact for themselves. Nor do I think any man would risk his reputation by a resort to any such action before the people.

Mr. WOODSON. It appears to me that the section is highly inconsistent and contradictory in itself: in that it seems to draw a distinction between officers elected and those elected by the people. I have not heard it suggested that officers are to be appointed by any other power than the people. I would, therefore, strike out the word "elected" in the second line.

Mr. PRESTON. There are several electoral bodies beside the people. Some elections are made by the legislature, and some by the county courts, and that I presume was the reason for the adoption of the last clause of the section, which gave the members the right to accept those offices elected by the people, but excluded them from those filled by the other different modes of election. For instance, the justice of the peace is nominated by the county court, and that is in fact an election; and there are various other modes of election to office.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. If we intended to leave the offices of trust and profit to be filled in the same way as required by the present constitution, I should have no objection to the retention of the section as it now stands. I might consent to leave the officers elected by the people, as an exception, under the old constitution, because that instrument prescribed that most of them should be constituted by the governor and senate; but when it is proposed that the appointing power shall be transferred to the people, do not the same reasons which require you in the former case, to guard against an improper exercise of the appointing power, and the purity of the legislature, by disqualifying the member elected here to pass your laws, and who had the power of increasing the salaries of your judges, independent of the power of creating new offices, operate in the other case also? You get into the legislative halls a popular man from some district, and the election of judges is about to come off—he has reputation for purity of character at home, and if he can induce the legislature to increase the salary of the judges, he goes home and can be a candidate for the office under the section as it now stands. The argument for the retention of the principle is, that the people will judge properly of the motives of the man who is a candidate before them, and who has been instrumental in getting the salary raised. It is difficult to trace the motives of individual members for their action. There may be such a thing as a member not voting to increase the salary, if a majority without his vote is in favor of it. I have frequently witnessed men in legislative bodies, anxious to get a law passed by any other votes than their own, and my object is, that as we are to transfer the entire appointing power to the people, where it ought to be, we shall guard the purity of the legislature by saying that the members elected, who have the power of raising salaries or creating offices, should be disqualified from filling them during the term for which they were elected. I want to take away all temptation from the legislature to do wrong. As for the objection suggested by the gentleman from Caldwell, (Mr. Machen) in the case of a member resigning from other causes, if the convention agree with the principle I propose, the cases referred to by him can be especially provided for.

Mr. A. K. MARSHALL. If I felt as confident as the gentleman (Mr. C. A. Wickliffe) that all appointing power should be placed in the hands of the people, I should feel assured that all the difficulties he apprehends would be obviated by that appointing power. I cannot understand, how any one, confiding as he does in the judgment and purity of the people, and relying as he seems implicitly upon it, can hesitate for a single moment as to committing into their hands the care and guardianship of those offices. I differ with him in one respect. He says that he is exceedingly anxious to remove all temptation out of the way of these gentlemen to do wrong, while I am exceedingly anxious to put all manner of temptation in their way. I think that the best way is to place them before the people, as then the people could decide whether they can or ought to trust them. I shall vote against striking out any thing. I think the section is correct as it is. It is precisely the language of the old constitution, and those who framed that instrument did not seem to have much confidence in the popular wisdom and purity; and yet if even they could trust the people, I think we who profess unlimited confidence in the people will not do wrong in following their example.

Mr. GRAY. I concur with the gentleman from Nelson in the propriety of his first amendment. If that section means any thing, it has been entirely perverted by the construction that has been given it by the executive, sanctioned I believe by the decision of the court of appeals. I know of a member of the legislature who voted for a law creating an office, and retained his seat until the law was passed through the senate, and who, while it was waiting the signature of the governor, resigned that seat, and under the construction placed on that clause of the present constitution, received the appointment to that office. Whether that was the object of the gentleman, in seeking to create the office, such at any rate were the facts. This construction of the clause was certainly a perversion of all the framers of the constitution had in view; and, if with these lights before us we re-adopt the section, it will be sanctioning all the action that has occurred under it. I am aware that in making all these officers elective by the people, it will obviate in a great measure the necessity for this provision. Nor am I in favor of restricting the people. If they desire to select a man who participated in creating the office, they have a right to do it, and I would not restrict them. I am therefore in favor of the amendment first suggested by the gentleman from Nelson, and I would make its object so plain as not to be misunderstood.

Mr. CLARKE. I should be very slow to believe that any man, influenced by improper motives in a legislature, in voting for the creation of an office or the increase of the salary of an office, would be taken up and elected by the people to fill such office in either case. But if the people are willing to do that, for one I am willing to give them the privilege of so doing, and I have no fears of the occurrence of such cases as the gentleman from Christian, (Mr. Gray,) has referred to as having occurred under the old constitution. I can very well understand how there could be great abuses under executive appointments, and how there might be arrangements and combinations to secure an appointment to office through that medium, but there can be no such arrangement between the people and the legislature, if the appointing power is restored to the people. And any attempt to create an office for the purpose of being selected to fill it, would operate against the man when he came to be a candidate before the people.

Mr. TURNER. All concede their readiness to trust the people, but that is not the question here. It is whether we shall place a member of the legislature or any officer of the government in the discharge of his duties in a position where he would be liable to temptation, and to be swerved in his action from the influence of those disinterested and patriotic motives, which should govern statesmen in their action. Even after a man has yielded to such temptation, he might possibly succeed before the people, and it is therefore desirable in making a constitution to guard against it as far as possible. Would it be right for a judge to have the power of benefiting himself by his decision? If we would not allow a judge to place himself in that attitude, why should we allow a member of the legislature? It is true, the present constitution only refers to executive appointments, but here we are going to make all officers elective, and shall we put no restriction on the action or motives of individuals in the creation of offices or the increasing of salaries? I think every conservative principle of government requires that we should, and it argues no distrust of the people so to do.

If we were to put a clause in the constitution declaring that no man should be elected a judge who had been in the penitentiary, or been convicted of a high crime or misdemeanor, it would be said that we were distrusting the people; still no person will say that such a man ought to fill the office. An individual who came to the legislature and exerted his influence for the creation of a new office, or to increase the salary of an office, with a view of going home and becoming a candidate for that office, would be under the influence of just as improper motives as the individual who commits a high crime. Why do we exclude from office those who hold positions under the federal government? Because their allegiance to the state government might be influenced by their office under the federal government, and it would be a temptation for them to sacrifice state rights and sovereignty to the federal government. This matter might be presented in various aspects, but I think what I have said sufficiently illustrates the matter. I shall go therefore for the amendment of the gentleman from Nelson.

Mr. MACHEN here suggested a verbal change in the first proposition of Mr. C. A. Wickliffe, not changing its principle, to which that gentleman assented.

Mr. DAVIS. I am in favor of the amendment, and am glad that it has come up, as it offers a very favorable opportunity for the presentation of a proposition which I made at an early stage of the session. I would propose as an amendment to the amendment to add the resolution I offered in relation to the exclusion of members of this body from office for ten years, and on it I call for the yeas and nays.

The amendment was read as follows:

"And that no member of this convention shall be eligible to any office, or place of trust or profit, established directly by it, or that may be established under the authority of any constitutional provision which it may adopt; or the mode of appointment, or election, to which may be prescribed by any such constitutional provision, or by any such law, until after the expiration of — years from the ratification and approval of this constitution by the qualified voters of this commonwealth."

The question being taken resulted as follows, yeas 22, nays 66:

NAYS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) Richard Apperson, John S. Barlow, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, Charles Chambers, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Lucius Desha, Archibald Dixon, Benjamin F. Edwards, Milford Elliott, Green Forrest, Nathan Gaither, Selucius Garfield, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Thomas J. Gough, Ninian E. Gray, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Thomas J. Hood, Alfred M. Jackson, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, James M. Lackey, Peter Lashbrooke, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, Martin P. Marshall, William C. Marshall, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, Thomas P. Moore, James M. Nesbitt, Jonathan Newcum, Elijah F. Nuttall, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spaulding, John W. Stevenson, Michael L. Stoner, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, Howard Todd, Philip Triplett, John L. Waller, John Wheeler, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, Silas Woodson—66.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE. I can attain my object by modifying my amendment. I will therefore move to strike out the following words, "except to such offices or appointments as may be filled by the election of the people."

The vote was then taken upon the amendment, as modified, by yeas and nays, which resulted as follows—yeas 39, nays 47:

YEAS—Mr. President, (Guthrie,) John L. Ballinger, John S. Barlow, William K. Bowling, Francis M. Bristow, William Chenault, Garrett Davis, Lucius Desha, Archibald Dixon, James Dudley, Chasteen T. Dunavan, Benjamin F. Edwards, Green Forrest, Thomas J. Gough, James P. Hamilton, Ben. Hardin, Vincent S. Hay, Andrew Hood, Thomas J. Hood, James W. Irwin, James M. Lackey, Thomas W. Lisle, Martin P. Marshall, Nathan McClure, William D. Mitchell, Jobathan Newcum, Hugh Newell, Elijah F. Nuttall, Larkin J. Proctor, James Rudd, Ignatius A. Spaulding, Albert G. Talbott, John D. Taylor, Phillip Triplett, Squire Turner, John L. Waller, Andrew S. White, Charles A. Wickliffe, George W. Williams—39.

NAYS—Richard Apperson, Alfred Boyd, William Bradley, James S. Chrisman, Beverly L. Clarke, Jesse Coffey, Henry R. D. Coleman, Benjamin Copelin, William Cowper, Edward Curd, Milford Elliott, Nathan Gaither, James H. Garrard, Richard D. Gholson, Ninian E. Gray, John Hargis, William Hendrix, Mark E. Huston, Alfred M. Jackson, Thomas James, William Johnson, George W. Johnston, George W. Kavanaugh, Charles C. Kelly, Peter Lashbrooke, Willis B. Machen, George W. Mansfield, Alexander K. Marshall, William C. Marshall, John H. McHenry, David Meriwether, Thomas P. Moore, John D. Morris, James M. Nesbitt, Henry B. Pollard, William Preston, Johnson Price, John T. Robinson, Thomas Rockhold, John T. Rogers, Ira Root, John W. Stevenson, Michael L. Stoner, William R. Thompson, John J. Thurman, John Wheeler, Silas Woodson—47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAY moved to amend the twenty fourth section by striking out the words "the time such senator or representative was in office," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the term of such office." Which amendment was, upon a division, adopted. Yeas 41, noes 30.

The section, as amended, was then adopted.

The twenty fifth section was next read as follows:

"Sec. 25. No person while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society, or sect, nor while he holds or exercises any office of profit under this commonwealth, or under the government of the United States, shall be eligible to the general assembly, except attorneys at law, justices of the peace, and militia officers: Provided, That attorneys for the commonwealth, who receive a fixed annual salary, shall be ineligible."

Mr. WALLER requested the convention, as a favor to him, to pass over that section for the present. Other sections had been passed over, and as he desired to make some remarks on that now before the convention, which he was too much indisposed to make at this time, he hoped it would be passed over also.

The section was passed over accordingly.

The twenty sixth, twenty seventh, twenty eighth and twenty ninth sections were adopted without amendment, as follows:

"Sec. 26. No person who at any time may have been a collector of taxes, or public moneys for the state, or the assistant or deputy of such collector, shall be eligible to the general assembly, unless he shall have obtained a quietus, six months before the election, for the amount of such collection, and for all public moneys for which he may have been responsible."

"Sec. 27. No bill shall have the force of a law, until, on the three several days, it be read over, in each house of the general assembly, and free discussion allowed thereon, unless in cases of urgency, four fifths of the house, where the bill shall be depending, may deem it expedient to dispense with this rule.

"Sec. 28. All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives, but the senate may propose amendments as in other bills, provided that they shall not introduce any new matter under the color of an amendment which does not relate to raising revenue.

"Sec. 29. The general assembly shall regulate, by law, by whom, and in what manner writs of election shall be issued, to fill the vacancies which may happen in either branch thereof."

The thirtieth section was read as follows:

"Sec. 30. Divorces shall not be granted, save by courts of justice, in conformity to law."

Mr. T. J. HOOD. I desire to offer this amendment as a substitute for the thirtieth section of the report.

"The general assembly shall have power to pass laws, to regulate divorce and alimony; also to prescribe, by like general laws, the manner in which the names of individuals may be changed; or the lands of infant heirs, or other persons laboring under legal disabilities to act for themselves, may be sold or conveyed. But in no case shall special laws be passed for the benefit of individuals in either of the above class of cases."

By an examination of the thirtieth section, gentlemen will perceive that it provides but for one class of cases. The substitute that I have offered embraces two other classes that fall within the same category, and which have been a fruitful source of legislation. Year after year a great portion of the time of the general assembly has been consumed in the passage of acts, for the benefit of private individuals. Against this unnecessary consumption of time, and the expense attendant upon it, there has been universal complaint throughout the commonwealth.

It may be said that the provision contained in the thirty-sixth section will supercede the necessity for my amendment; but it will be seen that the amendment provides more effectually against the evil; because, if adopted, the discussions which might arise in the legislature, upon the subjects embraced under these heads, will be cut off.

Mr. CLARKE. The committee all concurred in the opinion that the legislature should be restricted in the practice that has prevailed, to a considerable extent, for many years past, of granting divorces. The question came up as to how we could express this restriction, in the most proper terms; and my friend from Louisville, (Mr. Preston) being a member of the committee, drafted, with much care, the section that is now proposed to be amended. I believe that the constitution of every state in the union, where a restriction has been placed upon legislation in relation to this subject, if they have not followed the language employed in this section, have at least carried out the same idea.

I believe we all understand that under the federal constitution, all powers that are not delegated to the federal government, in express terms, or by necessary implication, have been reserved to the states. But the same rule does not attain, as far as state constitutions and state legislatures are concerned. All powers that are not specially withheld from the state legislature by the constitution of the state, may be exercised by the legislature. I grant that the legislature would have power to settle all cases of alimony, and all questions that might be presented, in regard to the sale of estates, in which infants are concerned. Although I am opposed to special legislation, yet there are many cases having reference to the rights of individuals, in which the legislature ought to have power to act. I have been informed that within the last two or three years, there have been cases, in which the prayer of the petitioner, by the guardian, in behalf of infants, for the sale of lands and the application of the proceeds for the benefit of the heirs, has been refused, and injustice has been done to them. If the petitioner had to stop there, there would be no remedy, and I incline to the opinion, that in such cases as these it would be right and proper for the legislature to act, by laying down a rule by which the court shall be governed, in order that justice may be reached.

We say in this report that the legislature shall not grant divorces; but we do not say the legislature shall not pass laws—on the contrary they are required to pass such laws—conferring on the judicial department the power to act upon applications for divorce; and, as a necessary consequence, the power to settle alimony, and all the incidental rights existing between the parties, or that grow up under the separation of husband and wife.

Mr. T. J. HOOD. I am at a loss to perceive the force of the objection, or of the reasons urged by the gentleman from Simpson, (Mr. Clarke,) why the legislature should not be restricted in its power to pass laws regarding the rights of infant heirs. If I understand the reason he assigns, it is, that justice is not always done by the courts. Now, this is an objection that may exist in reference to all other cases. We have provided a remedy for a failure of justice in courts of original jurisdiction, by the establishment of an appellate court. If the principle contended for by the gentleman is correct, it would only be converting the legislature into a high court of errors, to correct the decisions, not only of the inferior, but of the superior courts of the state.

As I have said, these subjects have occupied so much of the time of the legislature, that it seems to me to be required of this convention to establish in the constitution, some restrictive provision that will save the state in future, the expense attendant upon special legislation.

The convention then took a recess, until 3 o'clock, P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. PRESTON. The thirtieth section, provides simply, that divorces shall not be granted, save by courts of justice, in conformity to law. That is one class of cases embraced in the amendment that is proposed by the gentleman from Carter, (Mr. T. J. Hood,) and the thirty-sixth section provides, "that the general assembly shall have no power to pass special laws for individual benefit, unless a majority of two-thirds of both houses concur therein." The committee, in drafting the thirtieth section, desired to prohibit the legislature from acting at all, upon the subject of divorce; and that the power of acting in relation to that subject, should be confided to the courts of justice alone; that the decision should be a judicial act. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Carter, is liable to the objection, that it does not require the decision of the court of justice in order to pronounce the decree of a divorce. So far then as any material difference between the substitute and the provision in the report goes, it relates to these classes of cases. One is alimony, another is empowering the legislature to act in regard to the estates of infants; and the third is in regard to changing the names of individuals. In regard to alimony, I have never heard a doubt expressed, that the legislature had the power to act, without any constitutional provision conferring that power. It is therefore unnecessary to insert any such provision. Another objection to the gentleman's proposition is, that it does not provide where the decree of divorce shall come from. The substitute says the legislature shall have the general power of regulating divorces. No one doubts, that they have such power already. And this section is decided by the committee to be better than the substitute, because it says, that divorces shall not be granted, save by courts of justice; making it a judicial act, which the substitute does not require it to be.

If it shall be deemed desirable by the convention, that the legislature shall have the power to act, in regard to the changing of the names of individuals, or to prescribe a general law for that purpose, and the proposition be brought forward at the proper time, I do not know but I will vote for it. So in regard to the provision relating to the estates of infants, or other persons laboring under a disability to act for themselves. The provision regarding these two classes of cases had better be incorporated in a different section. The committee are desirous that the thirtieth section should relate exclusively to the case of divorces, without having any other question inserted in it. It was also thought by the committee, that the provision contained in the thirty sixth section—for this amendment is virtually a substitute for both—requiring the concurrence of two thirds of the general assembly, was a sufficient barrier to prevent repeated applications being made. But if it should be the opinion of the convention that this is insufficient, it can be remedied by a substitute, such as the gentleman now proposes, when we reach that section.

Mr. T. J. HOOD. I have no objection that the provision contained in my amendment should form a separate section; but I see no reason for dividing it from a class of cases precisely similar, which have given rise to much complaint, on account of the consumption of time, and the expense attending their investigation by the legislature. I did not design that my amendment should be a substitute for the 36th section; if I had I would have extended its provisions to some half dozen other classes of cases, which do not certainly occur so frequently, but which nevertheless sometimes do occur. The check of two thirds may be a sufficient barrier to these; but in relation to granting divorces, and in relation to the estates of infant heirs, they occur every year; and in great numbers; and I desire that my proposition shall embody these paramount points. The gentleman suggests, that the 36th section will meet the difficulty. I would like to hear the answer of the gentleman to this view of the matter. If the complaint be in regard to the consumption of time, and the expense, how will the 36th section remedy it—since the vote by which it is to be ascertained, whether there be a majority of two thirds, or only a bare majority, cannot be taken until the discussion is completed? The time will have been expended, and the expense attending it will have accrued? My object is to cut off the discussion by the legislature altogether; and it is with this view that I have offered the amendment in this connection.

Mr. HARDIN. I am very much in favor of the section prohibiting the legislature from exercising the power of granting divorces. It has been a growing evil for twenty years, and last year I understand, there were perhaps some three hundred cases or more. It is time to stop this kind of legislation.

I have two or three objections to this substitute, which I will suggest to the honorable mover. I understand that the legislature can do any thing that is within the power of legislation; any thing that the law-making power can do, unless they are prohibited by the federal constitution, or the constitution of Kentucky. Their power is unlimited, as to sovereignty, except in those cases where the exercise of that power is prohibited by one or the other of these constitutions. It is now proposed, that we shall give to the general assembly the power to do what? To pass a general law regulating divorces. They have that power now. They have passed laws on that very subject; and those laws have been adjudicated upon, and their validity decided upon, for more than twenty years. We are then proposing to confer upon the legislature a power that they have already. They have the power, not only of regulating divorces, but of regulating controversies relating to alimony; and they have exercised that power ever since we have had a state government. Our statute book is filled with acts of this description; and the decisions of the courts upon them are numerous; yet here, for the first time, we are told that the power ought to be conferred upon the legislature, to act upon these subjects, and that they should have the power to prescribe by a general law, the manner in which the names of individuals shall be changed. If they choose to pass such a law, they can do it now. But I go further than that. A man may change his name without the intervention of the legislature; and if he do so, he may be sued by the name which he adopts.

The amendment goes on to provide, that the legislature shall have power to pass laws regulating the estates of infant heirs, or other persons laboring under legal disabilities. Have they not that power now? They have the power at any time to remove the disability of infants, by providing that an earlier age may be the period of majority. Does it require a constitutional provision to give to the legislature these powers? Not at all. Why? Because there is no constitutional disability.

The amendment declares that "in no case shall special laws be passed for the benefit of individuals in either of the above class of cases." In regard to this part of the proposition, I think it had better be put into another section, as suggested by the gentleman from Louisville (Mr. Preston.) The first part of the proposition, I do not consider necessary. Besides, it makes us commit ourselves, by the expression of an erroneous view, in regard to constitutional law. I do not wish to declare to the world an opinion, as to the powers of the legislature, which I know to be at war with the opinion that has always been entertained by legislators and jurists.

Mr. GRAY. I am very much inclined to favor the proposition of the gentleman from Carter. It strikes me, it is not subject to the objection taken by the gentleman from Nelson, (Mr. Hardin.) He seems to think, because it is generally understood, that the legislature possesses all the power of legislation, unless specially restricted by the constitution, that it is, therefore, unnecessary to say any thing in relation to legislative power, unless it be by way of restriction. Now this appears to be a construction which prevails or not, according as it may suit the case. Our courts apply such construction when it coincides with the views that they are attempting to establish; but when it fails to accord with those views, that principle of construction does not seem to be acknowledged, as entirely obligatory, in all cases. But the gentleman says, that it will commit us to the statement, that the legislature shall have a power which they already possess. I cannot conceive of any objection to that. Suppose the legislature has the power. Is it not permissible to say, that they shall have such power? It certainly can do no harm. But here you propose to restrict the legislature, by saying, they shall not pass special laws upon certain subjects. I think it is proper, that when you place a restriction you should declare in the same clause what powers they shall have. And the manner in which those powers should be exercised by the adoption of general provisions, and let the courts of judicature act upon the particular cases that may fall within such general provision. That I understand to be the object and intent of the amendment. There is a similar provision in our present constitution, relating to the subject of slavery. The legislature is prohibited from passing any act for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of the owner, and the constitution goes on to say that the legislature shall have full power to pass an act to prevent slaves being brought into the state as merchandise.

Now if the construction of my friend from Nelson is right, all this is ridiculous and absurd.

It seems to me to be very proper, that in the same clause which contains the restriction, you should give them the power to pass general enactments in relation to the subject, if you intend they shall have such power; whilst you take away from them the power to act in individual cases.

It seems to me that the language used in the report is not the clearest in the world. It is, "divorces shall not be granted save by courts of justice, in conformity to law." I think the amendment of the gentleman from Carter, carries out the same principle, and makes it much more explicit; because it says, they shall pass laws in relation to divorces and alimony; but that they shall not pass laws granting divorces in individual cases. But it seems to me, if it were intended merely to restrict the legislature, it should have been expressed thus, "that the legislature shall have no power to grant divorces." I am for all the principles contained in the amendment. I think it is better than the original section, and I can see no objection to substituting it for that section.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am decidedly in favor of the principle embraced in the proposed substitute. There are many things that certainly ought not to be the subject of special legislation. But the wording of the amendment of the gentleman from Carter, does not exactly suit my ear. I will read one which I have drawn up, and it will probably suit the views of the gentleman. I believe it covers the whole ground.

"The general assembly shall have no power to grant divorces, to change the names of individuals, or direct the sales of estates belonging to infants, or other persons laboring under legal disabilities by special legislation; but, by general laws, shall confer such powers on the courts of justice."

Mr. T. J. HOOD. I am not at all wedded to the phraseology of my amendment. All that I desire is that the principle shall be incorporated. I accept the amendment of the gentleman as a substitute for mine.

Mr. HARDIN. I have no objection to that amendment.

Mr. APPERSON. I think the gentleman from Carter has given a very good reason why this is the proper place for the amendment. Every one understands the reason why the legislature should not have power to act upon individual cases. The great object is, to save time and expense. But you will not save either, if you leave the matter to be regulated as provided for in the thirty sixth section; because you never can determine until the final passage of the act, whether there be two thirds for it or not. And I believe there is a general feeling throughout the community, not only in regard to divorces, but in regard to other classes of cases that the legislature shall not interpose its action in individual cases. The estates of infants have been disposed of with great facility and with very little regard for justice, in many instances by the legislature.

The question was taken on the substitute, and it was agreed to.

The 30th section, as amended, was then adopted.

The 31st section was next read as follows:

"Sec. 31. The credit of this commonwealth shall never be given or loaned in aid of any person, association, municipality, or corporation, without the concurrence of two thirds of each house of the general assembly."

Mr. C. A. WICKLIFFE moved to strike out after the word "corporation" the words "without the concurrence of two thirds of each house of the general assembly." He was opposed to lending the credit of the state by way of endorsement, even though a vote of two thirds of the legislature were obtained.

The amendment was agreed to, and the section, as amended, was then adopted.

The 32d and 33d sections, in relation to the contracting of debts by the general assembly, were passed over for the present.

The 34th section was read and adopted as follows:

"Sec. 34. No law enacted by the general assembly shall embrace more than one object, and that shall be expressed in the title."

The 35th section was adopted as follows:

"Sec. 35. No law shall be revised or amended by reference to its title, but, in such case, the act revised, or amended, shall be re-enacted and published at length."

The 36th section was read as follows:

"Sec. 36. The general assembly shall have no power to pass special laws for individual benefit, unless a majority of two thirds of both houses concur therein."

Mr. HARDIN moved to strike out the whole section. He was utterly opposed to the principle that two thirds should be required to pass a law.

Mr. KELLY moved to amend by striking out after the word "benefit," the words, "unless a majority of two thirds of both houses concur therein," and adding the words "except in cases of claims against the commonwealth, preferred by public creditors."

Mr. HARDIN said there were other cases in which it might be necessary to have a special law, such as for the erection of a toll gate or a dam. He hoped the whole might be struck out. The same law-making power that could take life or lands, was competent to enact a law for an individual benefit.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the section, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS offered the following substitute for the section which was stricken out.

"The general assembly shall have no power, by special enactment, to allow any private claim against the commonwealth; and shall direct, by law, in what manner claims against the commonwealth are to be adjusted, and in what courts suits may be brought against the commonwealth."

The present constitution has this section:

"The general assembly shall direct, by law, in what manner, and in what courts, suits may be brought against the commonwealth."

The legislature has failed to point out how suits shall be brought against the commonwealth. The consequence has been, that ever since the present constitution has been in existence, there have been many claims presented to the legislature, and much time has been consumed. I am satisfied the legislature should have power to authorize the courts to adjudicate claims between individuals and the commonwealth, and to point out how these claims shall be adjusted. This will save time and expense; and, besides, these claims are rarely, if ever, adjusted fairly when brought before the legislature.

Mr. HARDIN. There is not a single session of the legislature in which there are not a hundred claims allowed in the bill concerning claims. A man carries a lunatic to the hospital, or another furnishes a few articles to the assembly, and they bring in special claims. We are not to allow the claim at all. The man must bring his suit. I am well aware of the difficulty the gentleman has spoken of. But I have always been unwilling to pass any law of that kind, because there will be too many interested against the government, and none for it, as in the case of an old man who had some beef cattle to sell to the federal government in the time of the Indian war in 1793. He said to the agent, remember there is the whole United States against poor old Jesse Black, now give me about double price, because I have always labored under great disadvantages. If this passes, I think we shall labor under a thousand worse disadvantages than we do now.

Mr. BROWN. I have had the honor to be chairman of the committee on claims in the house of representatives, and I do not think that one hour was consumed in the passage of the appropriation bill, although it contained a hundred little claims. If the gentleman's amendment prevails, the allowance of these claims by the general assembly will be precluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My design is to exclude those claims which may be decided by the courts of the country, and not those which relate to the ordinary expenses of the government. I am perfectly aware of the difficulty, named by the gentleman from Nelson, but it seems to me there is another class of claims that has consumed more time, and been decided with less justice in the legislature, than would have been the case, had they been decided in courts of justice. I desire to add the following to the substitute I have already offered:

"No money shall be drawn from the treasury

but in pursuance of appropriation made by law, and no private claim for money shall be allowed in appropriation laws except for necessary expenditures of the government; nor shall any appropriation of money for the support of an army be made for a longer time than one year; and a regular account of the receipts and expenditures of all public moneys shall be published annually."

Mr. HARDIN. There is some complicity in that. There are many claims which government should allow and which a court would not. I will state two cases which occurred during the administration of President Jefferson. He ordered General Wilkinson to Louisiana to arrest Aaron Burr and all others whom he thought concerned with him. Among others, he arrested General Adair and put him in confinement and sent him around from New Orleans to Virginia. There was no proof against him and he sued Wilkinson and recovered $3,200 for assault and battery. Wilkinson was not worth a dollar, and the execution was returned, "no property found." Mr. Rankin furnished me a copy of the record, and I presented Gen. Adair's claim and congress paid it, with the interest, to a dollar, without a dissenting voice in either house. If that claim had been presented in any court not a dollar could have been recovered. That was the sum total of General Adair's being concerned in the conspiracy. General Wilkinson relied on probable cause for proof, and there was not a shadow of it. Another case was that of James McCarty, of Hardin county, who sold a boat load of lime to the contractors for the erection of certain public works. The contractor failed and could not pay. The government of the United States stepped in and paid the demand, because the lime had been appropriated for the benefit of the United States. There would have been no claim upon which a suit could be based. There are many claims of that kind, in which the government is bound in honor and justice to pay, in which no suit would lie. This is a reason why it is proper it should be left open for the legislature, for there are many strong cases in which the government is bound in honor to pay.

Mr. DIXON. I am not in favor of the substitute of the gentleman from Bourbon. It has been the practice of the government, and I believe of all governments, to appropriate money to individuals, and to public purposes by legislative enactment. I do not know a state in the Union which has a provision by which the state itself is to be sued. I believe some have provided laws for the presentation of petitions, not to the legislature, but to some power created for that purpose. But the gentleman provides that the legislature shall not pass any laws appropriating money to individuals, while it may pass laws to provide the code by which courts shall settle individual claims. Now, if the legislature provides how courts shall settle claims by bringing a suit against the state, after having recovered judgment, how will you enforce it? There will be no use in obtaining the judgment, unless you have some means of enforcing the collection of the demand. I do not see how that can be effected. Suppose the court decides a case in favor of an individual, and the legislature thinks the decision wrong and will not pay the money—the decision of the court falls to the ground of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not like to oppose the wishes of gentlemen. The first proposition contains two provisions—the first of which authorizes the legislature to direct in what mode claims against the commonwealth shall be adjusted. My proposition does not necessarily take the claims before the courts; it merely, as I have already said, leaves it to the Legislature to point out the mode in which they shall be properly and justly settled. The legislature may point out by law the court, or direct the establishment of a tribunal, or a commission before which these claims may be examined and speedily disposed of. My second provision is, that no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in pursuance of appropriations made by law; and no private claim for money shall be allowed in appropriation laws. With regard to the position taken by the gentleman from Henderson, it amounts, in my opinion, to nothing; because, is not the legislature competent to provide by law that when an individual has a claim against the commonwealth, that claim shall be paid out of the treasury, if substantiated? Every gentleman who has been in the habit of attending here when the legislature is in session, knows that the greater part of its time has been consumed in the consideration of private claims. I know one case that has been before the legislature for the last four years, session after session, the case of Robert Williams, which was a claim on account of some contract on Licking river, and I believe it can be shown he has received money time after time. I repeat that the object of this proposition is not at all to interfere with the ordinary expenses of the government.

Mr. DIXON. I have listened to the argument of the gentleman from Bourbon, and I, by no means, think his amendment ought to be adopted. I suggested a difficulty which I still think would exist, and that was the enforcement of the judgment of the court. But there is another still greater, to which I will call the attention of the convention. There are a great many individual claims that must come before the legislature to be adjusted, and nowhere else. There are claims too, growing out of committees appointed by the legislature, of individuals who appeared as witnesses before them, and other claims of a similar description, which must be paid in some form or other. I think the power is better where it is with the legislature, than in the hands of an individual.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BOYD offered the following as an additional section:

No charter shall be granted giving banking or trading powers, without providing that the private property of stockholders be made liable for all the debts and obligations of any such corporations or chartered company.

Mr. GRAY moved to substitute the following: "Taxation shall be equal and uniform throughout the state."

Mr. HARDIN. In reference to the proposition of my friend from Trigg, (Mr. Boyd,) I do not see how we can act on it. It will cut down every corporation in Kentucky. It will be a veto on all corporations so long as this constitution shall stand, because we know no company will ever be incorporated. Would I take a hundred dollars stock in any company? Never in the world. It is nearly as broad as that of David Trimble, when he offered a resolution in congress. He said he would take the world for his theatre, that heaven should contribute to his speech, the sun, moon, and stars as his quarry, and with the indulgence of the house, he would take a whack at eternity. [Roars of laughter.] This is the broadest whack at eternity I ever saw. [Renewed laughter.]

Pending this question, the convention adjourned.

Prayer by the Rev. Mr. LANCASTER.

CLERICAL REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. DAVIS presented the memorial of two clergymen of the city of Frankfort—Mr. Robinson and Mr. Brush—in opposition to the twenty fifth section of the report on the legislative department, which provides that no person while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society, or sect, shall be eligible to the general assembly.

It was referred to the committee of the whole, and is as follows:

To the Honorable, the Constitutional Convention of Kentucky, now in Frankfort assembled.

The memorial of the undersigned, citizens of Kentucky, respectfully sheweth.—

That your memorialists have observed, with much concern, in the report of the committee on the legislative department, (section 25,) a clause proposed for the adoption of your honorable body, as a part of the new constitution, to the following effect, to-wit:

"No person, while he continues to exercise the functions of a clergyman, priest, or teacher of any religious persuasion, society, or sect, shall be eligible to the general assembly."

In regard to which proposition, your memorialists beg leave to lay before your honorable body certain considerations, which, in their view, go to establish the injustice and inexpediency of any such constitutional provision.

We make no objection to the opinion that, as a matter of practical duty, clergymen ought not to be aspirants for political office, nor mingle in political strife. Not only are we averse to such a course, but we should feel bound, moreover, as office-bearers in the church, to vote for the suspension of any clergyman from his office in the church, who should be shown to have prostituted the influence of his ministerial character to the promotion of his political elevation. And that this is the general sentiment of the various bodies of christians in our country at large, is most clearly evident from this fact,—that in twenty one states of the Union no such constitutional provision, as we here complain of, exists; this provision being found only in the constitutions of nine states—namely, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Florida, Texas, Louisiana, Missouri, Tennessee, and Kentucky. And yet in the twenty-one states no more disposition to interfere with politics has ever been manifested by the clergy, than in the nine states in which the clergy are excluded from political preferment by the constitution.

It will not fail to occur to any one, on reflection, that such a prohibition in the constitution is, practically, wholly inoperative to prevent the perversion of their clerical influence, by designing men, for the purposes of political promotion. Facts show, that none who sincerely love their calling as clergymen, will be willing to endanger their ministerial influence and reputation by becoming candidates for political favor. While on the other hand, it is obvious that those whose clerical character sits loosely upon them, and who aspire after political distinction, can very easily qualify themselves for holding office under such a constitutional prohibition, by some immorality of conduct, if they be ministers in churches which hold that the clerical office may not voluntarily be laid aside; or by a temporary resignation, (when the views of their church may admit of it) as has frequently been done in this and other states. Or they may render the constitution inoperative against themselves, by holding in fact, the position and influence of a clergyman, without formally assuming the title.

Thus the practical effect of such a clause is to restrain and preclude only the worthy and conscientious of the clergy, whose influence need not be feared in any position; while it is no restraint whatever upon the unscrupulous, who might be disposed to make a bad use of the influence over the minds of men, which their office confers.

Considerations of this kind alone, would not, however, have induced your memorialists to remonstrate, thus publicly against the adoption of the proposed clause in the constitution. But we conceive there are far more important objections to this measure—objections arising out of the grounds on which, if adopted at all, this clause must be adopted. Here we believe are involved certain great principles of civil and Religious Freedom.

We suppose that any constitutional provision clearly in conflict with, or an exception to the general rule of equal privileges to all classes—or which operates in restraint of the power of the people to choose whom they please to office; ought to be founded on the plainest reasons of expediency, if not of necessity. The provision in question is, manifestly, such an exception in both points of view. In the first place, it excludes a large and reputable class of citizens from the enjoyment of one of the highest privileges of citizenship—the privilege of being chosen to office. In the second place, it is an exception to the great law that the people are capable of judging; and ought to judge, who may be chosen to office.

The adoption of the proposed clause, as a part of the constitution implies therefore, of necessity, some more important reason for it, than any as yet alluded to. And though no reason for this ineligibility of the clergy is set forth in the clause reported by your committee, we are constrained to conclude, and we doubt not, the great mass of men will come to the same conclusion,—that the ground on which a provision, is adopted so obviously in conflict with generally admitted principles, as above shown, must be some supposed incompatibility of the clerical office in its very nature with the duties of civil life. And we are led the more certainly to this conclusion by the fact that we find this reason actually assigned for the ineligibility of ministers to civil office in three out of nine of the state constitutions which make ministers ineligible. In each of the three, (and only three assign any reason) the same words in effect are used—namely: "Ministers of the gospel are by their profession dedicated to the service of God, and the care of souls, and ought not to be diverted from the great duty of their functions, therefore no minister shall be eligible &c."

If this, therefore, be the implied ground of the restriction reported by your committee—and we can conceive of no other ground sufficient to justify a manifest departure from the general law of equal rights to all—then we feel bound, solemnly, to protest against any such provision, as in conflict with one great principle of free government—which it is the peculiar glory of the American states to recognise—the principle of non-interference of civil government with matters of religion.

We deny the competency of the civil government to define the character and functions of the gospel ministry. Admitting the truth of the general sentiment above quoted, still we protest against such a declaration, as a portion of constitutional law. It is solely the office of the church to declare the functions of her ministers. To say nothing, therefore, of the fact that the tastes, the views, and the habits of those composing the bodies which frame state constitutions, are not necessarily, nor always, such as to qualify them for deciding justly, in regard to the proper character and duties of the gospel ministry, we hold that this declaration, either expressed or implied, in any constitution, is in conflict with the great doctrine of non-interference with religion. And the history of modern nations teaches, that it behooves freemen to watch, with jealousy, any interference of the state with the church; seeing that from the slightest beginning, the precedent shall grow till designing and ambitious politicians corrupt the purity of the church, and thereby render her a fit instrument for the purposes of tyrants.

Not to mark, either, the obvious impropriety of a declaration either in words, or in effect, by the civil authority—or indeed any other authority that the ministry, any more than all other christians, are, by their profession, dedicated to the service of God—we object, furthermore, to the conclusion derived from that premise, that "ministers ought not to be diverted from the great duty of their functions," by being eligible and elected to the legislature. Why select this one, out of a thousand modes of being diverted from their duty, as the sole object of constitutional guardianship? Why not as well declare that ministers shall not engage in farming or merchandise, or in any other than this single pursuit—the care of souls? Or why provide, by constitutional enactment, that this profession alone shall not be diverted from the duty of its functions? It is obviously equally competent for the constitution to declare that physicians, who have the important care of the lives of men, ought not to be diverted from the duty of their functions, and, therefore, should not be eligible to political office. And also, that aged men, especially those yet impenitent, ought not to be diverted from the high duty of preparation for death, and therefore shall not be eligible to political distinctions, which are, in their nature, so unfavorable to this great duty.

The chief objection, however, and that which has led your memorialists to obtrude themselves upon your honorable body, is, that while this provision is advocated most warmly, by those who are peculiarly jealous, as all men ought to be, of any interference between the church and state; yet, the insertion of such a clause in the constitution, on such grounds as we have shown to have been expressed, and as are necessarily implied in so doing, is a decision by civil authority of the great theological question of the age.

The great point in dispute between the church of Rome and those who sympathize with her on the one hand, and the churches of the Reformation on the other, is involved in the question—Is the minister of religion a priest? Is he a peculiar sacred person—standing to mediate between God and his offending creatures, by the offering of sacrifice? Or is he chiefly a teacher—an expounder of the truth, and administrator of sealing ordinances in the church? The church of Rome, if we understand aright her teachings, holds the former view; and consistently with that view, has for her ministers priests, ministering at an altar—offering the sacrifice of the mass—absolving the penitent on confession and penance, and constituting the channel of mysterious grace to the faithful. Protestant churches, on the other hand, have for their ministers teachers, called of God as they believe, and chosen by the people to instruct the people, and administer ordinances established to be signs and seals of spiritual blessing. Of course the ministry of the latter has not that sort of sacredness of character, which necessarily separates them from the mass of christian people—nor that spiritual power and that control over the conscience, which the office of a priesthood in its very nature confers.

Now if the minister of religion be a priest—a man apart from the mass of christian people, by the mysterious sacredness of his office, and if in virtue of his office, he have a spiritual power which can be shown to be incompatible with the free suffrage of the people in any way—there might then be some good reason for debarring him from civil office. But if the minister of religion be merely one of the people, set apart to the duty in the church of expounding the truth and dispensing ordinances, with no other influence and power than that, which the faithful discharge of his duty confers upon him; then clearly there is no reason for making any distinction between him and other citizens in regard to the privileges of citizenship.

If this statement of the question be correct—and we have no motive to misstate it—or do we think any one, whichever view of the question he takes, will be disposed to controvert its main features, then it follows that to decide by the constitution, that ministers of the gospel shall be ineligible to political preferment, is, in so far, to decide this great theological controversy against Protestants. Our complaint, however, is not that it is decided against us—but that it is decided at all by such authority.

It may have been wise to provide against the undue influence of the priesthood in the government, in an age when statesmen still had reason to fear the influence of a doctrine that held the power of the church to be above all civil power. For in that case the priests would be the subjects of an adversary power to the civil government. But we can see no strong reason for such a provision, even against a priesthood, in an age when all men treat with derision, the claim of a spiritual power above civil government, more especially does it seem to us needless, to apply such a prohibition to those teachers of religion, whose distinguishing characteristic as a body of men, has ever been to be foremost in the war against the domination of the spiritual over the civil power.

Entertaining these views we respectfully submit them to your honorable body for consideration. Nor do we doubt that a careful examination of the subject, will lead you, as it recently led the convention of New York, to strike this clause from the constitution of the state, as incompatible with those enlightened views of republican government, which are the glory of our age and country.

And thus your memorialists will ever pray.

STUART ROBINSON.

GEO. W. BRUSH.

BASIS OF REPRESENTATION.

Mr. WOODSON. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the basis, as well as the apportionment of representation, as provided in the sixth section of the report of the committee on the legislative department, is just and equitable, and that this convention will not depart therefrom.

On this resolution I wish to offer a few remarks. We have been engaged about two weeks in the discussion of the proper basis of representation and apportionment among the several counties of the commonwealth. I am emboldened to offer this resolution from the fact, that if it is adopted, to the exclusion of the basis of free white inhabitants, it injures my immediate constituency as much, if not more, than that of any other delegate on this floor. I have been figuring pretty extensively to see what peculiar benefits would accrue to my region of country by the adoption of the basis contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Simpson; and I find the mountain counties, except two, will be entitled to a separate representative in the lower branch of the next legislature. At the first blush, I was inclined to the opinion that it was right and proper that that basis should be adopted. And I now must be permitted to say I am not convinced its adoption would be improper, or that the basis is not the true basis in all free and well organized governments. I know we have the precedents of many state governments for its adoption. But, as the people are not familiarized with it, and as I would do nothing calculated to be the slightest drawback to the constitution we shall make, I should be unwilling to see this new basis adopted; for I care not whatever benefits might accrue to my own region of country, I trust I shall not overlook the interests of the whole state. Whilst I know it would benefit my own section of country, I am sure it would injure the largest and most wealthy portion of the state; and I feel assured if we were to adopt this basis, that in the large or blue grass counties, it would sink any constitution we might frame, so that it would never be resurrected again.
