DEDICATION

With this issue, the Journal of Natural Resources and Environmental Law enters a new phase. Throughout the past ten and one-half years, we have sought to publish a quality journal dedicated to the examination of law and policy issues primarily associated with minerals, natural resources and the environment. This issue represents a quantum leap forward and reflects the Journal's commitment to law, science, and policy jurisprudence.

This issue is dedicated to Professor Myres McDougal, Professor Emeritus, Yale University College of Law. Professor McDougal is unique. His life, interests, writings, and intellectual leadership have resulted in the most comprehensive and complete jurisprudential model developed to date. The intellectual momentum, initiated by Professor McDougal, with the able assistance and collaboration of Professors Lasswell, Reisman and many other distinguished scientists and scholars, will continue into the future. Professor McDougal's commitment to the pursuit of world peace, equal access to justice, and equal access under law mirrors and extends these ideas that he has pursued throughout his life. He is truly deserving of this dedication.

With these remarks, I complete my service as Editor in Chief of the Journal and charge the current and future student editors and staff to continue and carry on the journey we have begun. May the pursuit of enlightenment direct their efforts as they continue. Special thanks and recognition to former Managing Editor, Doug Henderson, the new Editor in Chief, Janice Johnson, and all editors and staff of the Journal for the 1992-93 and 1993-94 academic years. All labored mightily to bring this issue to completion, and their efforts deserve recognition and praise. I also send special thanks to all former Journal editors, staff, and Editorial Advisory Board members. Their contributions have helped make the Journal what it is today. Their support has made a difference, and I am grateful to them.
