Abstract

We at the Journal of Appalachian Health would like to thank the multitude of reviewers who have volunteered their time, talents, and attention to the journal. Reviewers help us consider the rigor and quality of the submissions we receive, and their willingness to read material ahead of publication ensures we can bring timely research to our readers in Appalachia and further afield.

Every year we reflect on the generosity of a group of people who have volunteered their time, talents, and attention to the journal: our peer reviewers. Reviewers help us consider the rigor and quality of the submissions we receive, and their willingness to read material ahead of publication—and always alongside a raft of competing personal and professional commitments—ensures we can bring timely research to our readers in Appalachia and further afield. As a completely free, open-access publication, the Journal of Appalachian Health simply could not remain the public research outlet it is without the generosity of those listed below. In an environment in which all journals increasingly struggle to secure content experts to review submissions, we are especially thankful for the passion and kindness of those who choose to serve our small, but mighty journal.

Alongside our reviewers, we thank the members of our Editorial & Advisory Board, whose institutional affiliations span Appalachia. Additionally, much gratitude is owed to East Tennessee State University (our managing institution), the University of Kentucky (our publisher), and the Appalachian Regional Commission, who for the first time this year provided grant funding to keep our mission afloat. We are excited to see what the coming year will bring as more people join this community in service of all those—near and far—who are proud to call Appalachia home.
