September 2015

Drink From the Jar

Erik Tuttle

University of Kentucky

Follow this and additional works at: https://uknowledge.uky.edu/kaleidoscope

Part of the Creative Writing Commons

Click here to let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Recommended Citation

Available at: https://uknowledge.uky.edu/kaleidoscope/vol4/iss1/12

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the The Office of Undergraduate Research at UKnowledge. It has been accepted for inclusion in Kaleidoscope by an authorized editor of UKnowledge. For more information, please contact UKnowledge@lsv.uky.edu.
During my years as an undergraduate at UK concentrating on Appalachian Studies, I have, as well, studied writing through classes with Rebecca Howell, James Hall, and Gurney Norman. The work here is part of two collections that are approaching the intersection of experience, history, and home. My home is Girdler, Kentucky (Knox County), and while attending school here in Lexington I have participated in the Robinson Scholars Program and the Gaines Fellowship Program. My learning with Rebecca Howell led to work with Wind: A Journal of Writing & Community, of which I am now an Editor. I edited Wind's most recent issue, #94. That issue spotlights the Hindman Writers Workshop, a community of which I am a dedicated member.

Lecturer, Creative Writing, Department of English Director, Women Writers of Kentucky

Erik Tuttle

Erik spends his free time memorizing maps of Kentucky. From the passenger side of a truck, down the most rural, unmarked road, he can take you home again. An unimaginable left turn here, a deft right there.

After having worked with Erik for four years now, as a poetry writing student, as an intern with the women writers conference, as an apprenticing editor, and now as a Gaines Fellow, I can say without hesitation that, for Erik, study is a sacred opportunity to better understand, and when called upon, defend, that which is most important to him — his home. These early poems of his, published here, are just a glimpse of a larger, maturing, body of work in which he consistently approaches the occasion of a poem in the same way he does those maps: whether he is writing in the voice of a coal miner's son or the ancient Gilgamesh, to Erik, every poem is an opportunity to get back home — and more, to quietly, deftly, bring us with him.

Drink From the Jar

Red-Handed
— young boys in the mountains used to work in the coal mines, pulling impurities out of the coal coming out of the mine into the trucks. The sharp slate cut their hands so much that the tops of coal trucks were stained red, and received the name red tops.

1

They stood on ladders, rickety piles of dead Chestnut the boys climb the dry-rotted bodies — ladders ladders to nowhere ending up no place, dropping off to no world they'd climb up to look down at their bloody hands blood, to pay for the house blood, to pay for the food that keeps Papaw out of the cold soft dirt they do it — ravens to snatch up shards of slate pieces of jagged shale.
means of life
come from pure hair-black coal No gray
Only shining black, like hogs cry for at night the boys know though it ain’t that pure black they get, what they get’s a bloody chalkboard like looking at a new moon from inside a pomegranate when they do it, razor shale cuts their hands the boys’ blood pours out on top leaks out from in between stubby coal-clouded fingers cakes up when their tears drip down to where they should fall off elbows but instead they flow down and across leave white tracks, unbalanced lines down forearms fall into palm pools.
Sticky blood makes movement hard tops it all with red.

I dreamed I was the little boys’ mommy when they came home with hollowed out souls and scooped out palms
I screamed and ran to them — all I could see was when they were born I saw their tiny hands stretching and gripping in the air strings of afterbirth flashy red on their hands In a moment like this here one my tears came again and I mourned the day they even came to me I licked their hands try to zip them back up with my open hoping lips I kissed their hands when they cried minutes old and they stopped now, they just get louder.

I dreamed
I was one — a little boy on a chestnut corpse lifting out slate and I lost my brother, my brother was gone I went looking for him in dark morning’s clouds where lizards hide their fallen blue tails and I saw him but not the one I looked for I saw a boy on a horse on a hill sitting, face hanging down maybe on his horse he could take me to my lost brother criing in closets over his burning red hands I walked up saw his shining black hair — but there was no light felt his heart heart that lay holy in his fallen face tears rolled and he was from home Could not find it in the red sandstones blocking his way he looked up and in his face was my brother’s face the face that knew me in a way no other ever would here is my brother black with the dust of deep deep earth and his eyes wide open & white His cheeks smeared red lines finger-wide I looked finger-wide
I looked down and my hands were gone
I can still smell them.
Laying in the Mine

here, cold, on my belly Stretching me out, to where I feel like I’ll fall into the sky— up through the ground so I grab a hold, my fingers squeezing on black earth bones

My body forgets but in the moving I remember in February cold Six quilts down Mom would lay with me and whisper quiet every so often she’d drift off but it was lonely without the whites of her eyes I would tap just so little on her cheek and she would wake up and talk and then, there under the six quilts I wasn’t lonely

Now I remember what Danny told me when I started in the mines He was tapping a seam with a pick and he said hush now...if you listen the vein speaks But now out of the six quilts I lay down the pick tap this seam and wait.

Foxfire

here with the garden in the turn up of onion rows in the water snap of cucumbers, I remember that love is a man’s hands finger deep in cool dirt in June that when I reach into the ground the dirty fingernails of my grandfathers reach back up

In the dark, on my way to bed, the garden is where I’m last finishing the rows up I turn the soil over to the green glow of foxfire shining — I’m sure — from God’s broad hand.