1985

Dedication to Willburt D. Ham: A Quarter Century, Not a Raised Voice

Robert G. Lawson

University of Kentucky

Follow this and additional works at: https://uknowledge.uky.edu/klj
Click here to let us know how access to this document benefits you.

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://uknowledge.uky.edu/klj/vol74/iss2/2

This Tribute is brought to you for free and open access by the Law Journals at UKnowledge. It has been accepted for inclusion in Kentucky Law Journal by an authorized editor of UKnowledge. For more information, please contact UKnowledge@lsv.uky.edu.
I.

I was a second-year law student, a transfer to the University of Kentucky from Tulane University, when I had my first encounter with "Burt." Twenty five years ago when I walked into Professor Willburt D. Ham's corporation class, I knew very little about him except that he had law degrees from Illinois and Harvard. As a transfer student, I had no access to the information that always filters down from one generation of law students to another. And yet, on this first day, I could see that there was something special between this man and his students. The next year, as a third-year student, I enrolled in Professor Ham's course again, having divined the nature of that special relationship.

Looking back, with the benefit of my own teaching experiences, I can see that Burt Ham was extremely knowledgeable in his fields of study, knew exactly what he wanted to accomplish in each lecture, had the capacity to organize his thoughts to a point of perfection, and was able to capture and hold the attention of the students. But what I saw back then—the basis of that something special—is far more revealing than anything one can find in performance evaluation forms, computer printouts, and standard deviations. It was really very simple at the core. Burt Ham taught; students learned. He was not just a presider over a class. He was a teacher.

* Dean and Professor of Law. B.S. 1960, Berea College; J.D. 1963, University of Kentucky.
II.

Having later returned to the College of Law to join the faculty, I had a chance to observe him from a different vantage point. After twenty years as a colleague I still marvel at his success in the classroom and would like to patent the formula for his relationship with students. His students have a respect for him that is universal, an affection that is clearly extraordinary. I am still not sure that I understand the chemistry of this relationship, but I believe that I can describe some of the critical ingredients.

Burt Ham has a genuine love for teaching that has survived the wear and tear of four decades in the classroom. Nearly every teacher experiences classroom fatigue at some time, but not Burt Ham. I doubt that he has ever been less than perfectly prepared for an encounter with his students. He thoroughly enjoys what he does and does it with an enthusiasm that has not waned since he taught his first class in 1946. As a result, he creates an atmosphere in the classroom that ought to be emulated by every teacher. Nothing he says is perceived as trivial or irrelevant. Everything has a logical relationship and thus is understood and absorbed.

Another characteristic I have seen in him has a similar effect. It is very easy for a professor, because of his own intellectual interest in the nebula of the law, to neglect or obscure the certainty that exists in the legal universe. Among the ambiguity, controversy, and convolution that exists in the law, there is a massive set of rules that needs to be understood by aspiring lawyers. Professor Ham has been more sensitive to this need than most law teachers. He has succeeded in confronting the perplexity of the law in the classroom without creating the impression that perplexity is the essence of the law. Every day, as the students say, he teaches some law.

And then, of course, in accounting for Burt Ham's success, you come to the personal traits of the man himself. He is exactly what he seems to be—warm, patient, considerate, concerned, dedicated. I have never known a more even-tempered human being; in twenty-five years I have never heard him raise his voice to a single person. He has taught over three thousand students at the University of Kentucky, and to this day I have never heard an unkind word about him from a single one. More than anything else perhaps, it is Burt Ham the person that accounts for the great success of Burt Ham the teacher.

III.

It is easy to wish Burt Ham well in his retirement. He has enjoyed his professional career, will continue to have a proper place in the life of the institution, and has the good health to enjoy a real change in routine. It is not easy, however, for the College to experience this particular retirement without a special sense of loss, for Burt Ham is truly the last of a generation of teachers.

The names of these true teachers are well known to several generations of students. Some in the group I have known only by reputation—Dean Alvin Evans, Professor Frank Murray, Professor Pinky Roberts, and Dean Elvis Stahr. Others I have known better, first as a student and later as a colleague—Dean W.L. Matthews, Professor Paul Oberst, Professor Roy Moreland, Professor James Richardson, Professor Richard Gilliam, Professor Fred Whiteside, and Professor Burt Ham. The group was small, distinguished, and highly dedicated. Its members shared an extraordinary sense of common purpose. Overshadowing individual ambition was a jointly held aspiration for an institution of special quality. These teachers sought excellence for the College of Law and turned the pursuit of that goal into a tradition that will persist long past the end of their era.

One thing about the group stands out. They considered it an honor to share their knowledge of the law with the young people who came to Lexington from all over the state and country. To them, teaching was not just an occupation; it was a calling. For many years, long after we became close friends, I could never bring myself to address Burt Ham as anything other than “Professor Ham.” Now, I can see the reason. As much as anyone I have ever known, he deserves the title he holds. We may in our light moments think of him as Burt; but when it matters he will always be Professor Williburt Ham.