DEDICATION TO PROFESSOR WHITESIDE

This volume of the Kentucky Law Journal is dedicated to Professor Frederick W. Whiteside, Jr., in recognition of his retirement as a faculty member of the College of Law on July 1, 1978. Professor Whiteside served the College of Law with distinction for twenty-nine years, having joined the faculty in the fall of 1949. A native of Arkansas, Professor Whiteside received his A.B. degree from the University of Arkansas in 1933. He then attended Cornell University Law School where he received the LL.B. degree in 1936. He later received an appointment as a graduate fellow at the Yale University Law School during the 1956-57 academic year. Before joining the Kentucky law faculty, Professor Whiteside engaged in private practice in New York City and served with the Department of Justice in Washington, D.C., as well as on the law faculties of the University of Arkansas and Rutgers University.

It seems particularly fitting that the Kentucky Law Journal dedicate its current volume to Professor Whiteside since he served as its faculty editor for the years 1951-56. These were years when the law school enrollment was much smaller than it is today, when the editorial staff of the Journal was correspondingly smaller, and the resulting burden and responsibility on the faculty editor proportionately greater. Nevertheless, Professor Whiteside willingly assumed this added burden and responsibility and skillfully supervised the production of this important law school publication during those years. Later, during 1967-68, Professor Whiteside applied his editing skills to the position of Editor of the Journal of Legal Education, at a time when the University of Kentucky College of Law had assumed the responsibility for the editorship of this Journal for the Association of American Law Schools.

If one of the attributes of a quality law teacher is a high level of teaching performance, then Professor Whiteside fills that attribute well. Although Professor Whiteside, like most law teachers, taught a wide range of subjects during his teaching career, in later years his specialty became Federal Taxation, and his expertise and keen insight into that perplexing and ever-changing area of the law has been acknowledged by his students and faculty colleagues alike. The high regard with which he has been held in the teaching profession is reflected in the numerous visiting professorships which he has enjoyed from time to time at other institutions, including the University of Oklahoma, George Washington University, the University of Illinois, and Ohio State University, as well as at his alma mater, the University of Arkansas.

Along with his excellence as a law teacher, Professor Whiteside has contributed substantially to the legal literature in a wide variety of subjects. His interest in scholarly research as an essential ingredient to the improvement of the law has been genuine and constant and has been reflected not only in his writings but also in his public service to the bar and legal education.

Those of us on the College of Law faculty who have known Professor Whiteside throughout his years of service with us are looking forward to our continued association with him in his post-retirement years. The younger members of the faculty, his present and former students, and others with whom he has been associated likewise wish him well in the years to come. All of us through this dedicatory issue of the Kentucky Law Journal want him to know the high esteem with which he is held in the academic and legal professions and the great appreciation we all have for his contributions to the University of Kentucky College of Law.
