1930

The College of Law

Kentucky Law Journal

Follow this and additional works at: https://uknowledge.uky.edu/klj
Right click to open a feedback form in a new tab to let us know how this document benefits you.

Recommended Citation
Available at: https://uknowledge.uky.edu/klj/vol19/iss1/4

This Comment is brought to you for free and open access by the Law Journals at UKnowledge. It has been accepted for inclusion in Kentucky Law Journal by an authorized editor of UKnowledge. For more information, please contact UKnowledge@lsvaky.edu.
It is always gratifying to find in the student body, among the different classes, students whose type of mind shows that they have capacity for doing something in the way of original work and research. There will probably always be a sufficient number of "client caretakers," but the number of law school men who have capacity for research is likely to be limited, and students who have inquiring minds, filled with curiosity, and who are unwilling to accept the ipse dixit of courts or professors as final, should always be sought out and encouraged.

The Kentucky Law School is glad to say that every year it finds within its ranks some few men who are ambitious to make a more extended scientific study of the law than has been possible during the three years course. Every year there are some who, by the character of their work, have shown a capacity above the average. It has been possible to find fellowships for some in a number of the larger institutions who profess to give an extended graduate program. The Law School does not perform its full function if it does not seek out the more gifted men and do what it can in the way of inducing them to undertake graduate study.