It is also true that the jury is sometimes moved by a sudden wave of excitement and is prejudiced in its decision.

Fortunately these waves move usually against the guilty. But is the jury moved more than other tribunals? Would a judge render an impartial decision in such a case? Those who answer this question in the affirmative base their argument on the premise that judges are superhuman and that it is harder to influence the mind of one man than the minds of twelve men. The same thing may be said with reference to bribery.

The jury should consist of twelve honest and intelligent men from the community. If we say the American citizen is not equal to his task, we belie American manhood, contradict the course of judicial proceedings, and fail in the duty to the communities which rely upon us for a legislative machine by which juries are to be secured.

Trial by jury is an institution which the people control. To take it away would be depriving the people of their share of the right in the administration of justice.

The advantage of trial by jury may be summed up in the following words of Elihu Root: “I do not now believe that the people are dissatisfied with the time honored institution of trial by jury. I am not dissatisfied with it, sir. I believe it is one of the most important, most vital, and most sacred of the institutions which maintain our free and popular government. I believe it serves to bring the people—not lawyers and judges, the plain people—who vote, and who underlie the whole structure of our government, into immediate participation in the administration of law. I believe that it mitigates the severe logic of our law, and makes its administration tolerable; and I believe that it reaches correct results in fact and in reason, though not always by logic.”

Cutting.

In a case of slander a lady had gone into the witness-box on behalf of the plaintiff, whose counsel was examining her.

“Now, madam,” the lawyer began, “please repeat the slanderous statements made by the defendant on this occasion just as you heard them."

"Oh, they are unfit for any respectable person to hear," was the emphatic answer.

"Then," said the examiner, coaxingly, "suppose you just whisper them to the judge?"—Tit-Bits.

Too Short.

At a time when it was thought that Germany wanted to get a foothold in Holland, Bismarck and the Dutch Ambassador stood watching a review of the German Army. As a well set up body of men marched past the Ambassador said: "Fine soldiers, but too short." Then came the Grenadiers, between six and seven feet tall; nevertheless the Ambassador's comment was the same as before: "Fine soldiers, but too short."

"What does your Excellency mean?" asked Bismarck.

"I mean that we can flood Holland eight feet deep," replied the Ambassador.—Boston Transcript.

No Spoils to Share.

An old negro was charged with chicken-stealing, and the judge said:

"Where's your lawyer, uncle?"

"Ain't got none, jedge."

“But you ought to have one,” returned the Court. “I'll assign one to defend you.”

“No, sah, no, sah, please don't do dat,” begged the defendant.

“Why not?” persisted the judge. “It won't cost you anything. Why don't you wan't a lawyer?”

“Well, Ah'll tell yo', jedge,” said the old man confidentially. “Ah wants ter enj'y dem chickens mahself.'—Ladies' Home Journal.

Vague Questioning.

“Do you believe in whipping?”

“Please be a little specific; eggs and cream, or children?”
