2012

From "Life Stories"

Paul Hetherington
University of Canberra, Australia
DOI: https://doi.org/10.13023/disclosure.21.08

Follow this and additional works at: https://uknowledge.uky.edu/disclosure

Part of the English Language and Literature Commons
This work is licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-Noncommercial 4.0 License.

Recommended Citation
DOI: https://doi.org/10.13023/disclosure.21.08
Available at: https://uknowledge.uky.edu/disclosure/vol21/iss1/8

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the Social Theory at UKnowledge. It has been accepted for inclusion in disClosure: A Journal of Social Theory by an authorized editor of UKnowledge. For more information, please contact UKnowledge@lsv.uky.edu.
From “Life Stories”
-Paul Hetherington

1. Monterey Cypress

At the bottom of the oval the twisted Monterey Cypress was a green-fringed broken corkscrew
where we climbed to hide from the furious history teacher.
He was looking for the culprits who’d chalked “liar” on the board after he’d praised America’s cause in Vietnam.
Next to it we buried childish, risqué comics;
neady a broken drain drizzled a stale aroma
like old washing-up onto frothing soil
and the curved tongue-and-groove of the gardener’s shed leaked smoke and whisky smells.
Under that Monterey we found a clump of mushrooms—
Agaricus bisporus—
growing in the grass:
upturned, pale boats,
bulbous, taut umbrellas with tender brownish struts—and you, at twelve, plucked five.
Sautéed lavishly in butter in a shimmering smooth-black pan, releasing and gathering their copious, staining moisture, the woody, earthy flavours soaked our crunchy toast.
Only afterwards did we read that, all too often, Agaricus was mistaken for Amanita, the notorious Destroying Angel, even by experts—an imposter with its own exquisite taste, purveyor of organ failure.

2. Bombs

One of my father’s stories could have been a parable:
last from a mess hut in Darwin during the war he faced a line of Japanese bombs with the slit trenches’ protection an impossible short distance away.
There was a moment of seeing his own oblivion, and, perhaps, because of his lapsed Catholicism,
an aura of an afterlife as death ambled near in clumping, explosive steps.
His training had taught him to lie on the ground and, after bombs fell either side and dirt sprayed his helmet, to the surprise of his mates he stood up, pale but cheery, saying something they didn’t catch.