As trade begins to look promising, you notice that your knife has been snatched. You see a man running away and you shout, "Hand him a lesson." Deduct one point.

Colonialism Game

Native have kidnapped five of your men to death. During an attempted rescue, a small child burst his teeth and three faces upon you. In order to save face, you shock five of their children and decide that you are not welcome on the island. Deduct five points.

Fruit taken from fruitful islands has long been depleted. Leaves develop upon your game and you feel your teeth begin to loosen. Deduct four points.

Swirling waters cause you and your crew to become sick. The seventeen chickens that washed off the deck provide even greater mishap. Deduct four points.

Rethinking Politics, Scholarship, and Economics: disclosure Interviews David F. Ruccio

Dr. David F. Ruccio is currently Associate Professor of Economics in the Faculty of Economics' Department of Economics and Policy Studies at the University of Notre Dame. He visited the University of Kentucky in February 2003 to participate in the Spring Seminar and Lecture Series on Globalization sponsored by the UK Committee on Social Theory. His lecture entitled “Globalization and Imperialism” explored the intellectual and material foundations of globalization discourses. In particular, he challenged the “depressing inevitability” of these discourses by connecting their production to specific intellectuals and policy makers and by re-envisioning them through the Marxian concepts of imperialism and the “imperial machine.”

Consistently defying dominant notions of what an economist should be and should study, Ruccio has investigated a multitude of topics that can be broadly gathered under the category of radical political economy. While his earlier writings focused intensely upon the economics of development and underdevelopment, Ruccio has more recently pursued questions of value, subjectivity, and the changing dynamics of class in economic systems raised by postmodernism and poststructuralism. He has also written about the production of economic knowledge both within the field of economics and in its variation across other disciplines. In addition, he continues to be a key figure in the ongoing project to reconceptualize the Marxian tradition and currently edits the
