CONTRIBUTORS

James D. Birchfield is the author of articles on Julia Ward Howe, Mark Twain, and Algernon Swinburne as well as essays on the collecting of books and manuscripts. He is currently investigating Kentucky’s bibliographical ghosts.

Joseph H. Gardner is an associate professor of English at the University of Kentucky. His publications include several studies of Dickens and D.G. Rossetti, as well as essays on Mark Twain, Frank Norris, T.H. Huxley, George Cruickshank, Aubrey Beardsley, and other nineteenth-century figures.

Linda Pannill teaches English at Transylvania University in Lexington, Kentucky. She has served as the director of a series of national women writers’ conferences at the University of Kentucky and helped to establish a minor in women’s studies there.

The Kentucky Review gratefully acknowledges the contribution of Mr. David Rowland of Freline, Inc., Hagerstown, Maryland, toward underwriting the cost of this issue.
