This guide covers a wide range of sources, some specific to a particular celebrity, others general sources of information to current personalities. People covered are those listed in the Celebrity Register (4th ed., 1986 and selectively from the 3d ed., 1973), so a few of those whose stars have recently risen are included.

Most of the celebrities come from the motion picture, television, music, and sports fields (excluding television journalists). An introductory section covers general sources in the following formats: reference books, collective biographies, periodicals, computerized databases, organizations (e.g., libraries, museums, halls of fame), commercial sources and services (e.g., those who purchase and/or sell biography books, artifacts, memorabilia), fan clubs, individual biographies, and general books about celebrity and fame. Separate sections on film and television, music, and sports cover the same formats. The weakest sections by far are those on periodicals, primarily because individual references to articles on the celebrities are not included. The listings of magazine titles are supplemented by brief descriptions and indexing sources. More useful are the fan club, organizational, and commercial sources of information. Name, title, and subject indexes complete the work, and the name index includes listings from the annotations as well as the general entries to the 900 celebrities covered. Although not containing nearly the number of references as Biography Index (see ARBA 88, entry 75) or Biography and Genealogy Master Index (see ARBA 87, entry 420), Celebrity Sources suggests a wide range of sources useful to those seeking biographical information on the most well-known figures in the present entertainment fields.
